FOREWORD

I warmly welcome this new publication: Catholic Archives. When I first learned of the founding of the Catholic Archives Society I felt a sense of deep relief, as many must have done. Every now and then one had heard of the irreparable loss of Catholic documents and wondered what future generations would think of us for allowing such things to happen. Mgr. Philip Hughes once stated that more than one third of the Catholic papers listed in the last century by the Historical Manuscripts Commission had been lost by the time he became archivist at Westminster.

Lately, indeed, something has been done to avert further losses. The valuable papers of the Old Brotherhood still remaining have been gathered and bound and deposited for safe-keeping. A number of dioceses are now placing their records on permanent loan in county record offices established since the last war.

I offer congratulations to all who have inspired and supported the new venture and the publication of Catholic Archives. It will be a notable addition to the scholarly volumes which the Catholic Record Society continues to issue annually to its members.

THE CATHOLIC ARCHIVES SOCIETY

The Catholic Archives Society was founded in 1979 'to promote the care and preservation of the records and archives of the dioceses, religious foundations, institutions and societies of the Roman Catholic Church in the United Kingdom and Eire in order that these may be of greater administrative service to the organisations they concern and may become accessible for academic and cultural purposes.' The value of Catholic archives for educational purposes has long been recognised; for example, in 1904, the Catholic Record Society was founded for the 'advancement of education in connection with the history of Roman Catholicism in England and Wales since the Reformation.' Since then, the Catholic Record Society has published its distinguished series of Catholic Record Publications and, in more recent years, Recusant History and monographs. In addition, there are flourishing local Catholic History Societies publishing valuable articles.

Archives, records and personal manuscripts are the raw material of history. Hitherto, their existence has been taken for granted but with the changed economic and social conditions and the various technological revolutions which have taken place since the Second World War, their very survival is threatened. To counter such threats public and private bodies during the last three or four decades have provided and developed professional archives services and now to assist in providing for Catholic archives, the Catholic Archives Society has been founded to bring those who are in charge of the archives of their diocese, house or congregation into contact with one another and with professional archivists.

Although the Society is yet still young and has only a few members, it has already held three conferences at Spode House and a seminar at Leicester for religious archivists, and has promoted two meetings of archivists and officials of northern dioceses. Similar activities are envisaged for the future and by the publication of Catholic Archives it is hoped to reach a wider field, especially users of archives.

By a happy coincidence, in November 1979, only eight months after the Society was formally founded, Cardinal Samore began his duties as Librarian and Archivist to the Holy See; in the same month he presided over the Congress of the Association of Archivists of the Church of France and UNESCO held its International Archives Week. This was the occasion for Pope John Paul II, in sending his greetings to the Cardinal, to emphasise the important role archivists have in the service of the Church and the special responsibilities of the various ecclesiastical authorities in preserving both their ancient and modern archives, since they 'are imprinted with a character proper to the nature of Christianity, which is founded on the mystery of Christ.' The Catholic Archives Society hopes to provide some ways by which those responsible for the archives of the Church in these parts might make themselves better able to fulfil their role and to discharge their responsibilities.

The Society cannot hope to attain its objectives without wide and active support. I earnestly encourage all who are interested in the Society's work to become full members.

EDITORIAL NOTES

The Society at its Annual Conference in April 1980 decided to publish a yearly periodical containing articles describing the archives of religious orders, congregations and other foundations, dioceses, parishes, families and individual persons, and other documentary sources, relating to the Roman Catholic Church in the United Kingdom and Eire. The long term objective of Catholic Archives, of which this is the first issue, is to record the character, content, arrangement, accessibility, and use of such archives for the benefit of all who are concerned to promote their care and scholarly use.

The articles in the early issues will relate mainly to archives which are already wholly or partly arranged and accessible but in the later issues it is hoped also to describe archives in the process of arrangement, even though these may not be open to inspection for many years. A secondary objective is thus to encourage those who are responsible for Catholic Archives of all classes to emulate the orders, dioceses and other bodies which have made arrangements for their archives. It is also hoped to assist archivists who are presently collecting and arranging records by publishing articles on problems specific to Catholic archives, and in this issue two outline schemes of classification, one for archives of religious orders and the other for diocesan archives, are printed as possible guidelines.

In each issue an attempt will be made to publish articles on different classes of archives. It may be noted, however, that not one of the articles in this issue concerns the archives of a women's order or foundation: this is unintended, and the editor, being anxious to avoid a reputation for male chauvenism, hopes to rectify this failing in future issues.

His Lordship Bishop Foley, President of the Society and ever the friend and counsellor of Catholic historians, has generously written a Foreword, and the Society is further honoured to publish in this first issue articles by such distinguished Catholic scholars and archivists as Fr. Francis Edwards, S.J., Archivist of the English Province of the Society of Jesus, Fr. Mark Dilworth, O.S.B., Keeper of the Scottish Catholic Archives, Fr. J. Denis McEvelly, Archivist of Birmingham Archdiocese, Fr. Bede Bailey, O.P., Archivist of the English Province of the Dominican Order, Fr. Michael Sharratt, Librarian of Ushaw College, and Fr. J. M. Tweedy of St. Cuthberts's parish, Durham.

The Society hopes that Catholic Archives will commend itself to archivists, record repositories, libraries and institutions, and to all who are concerned for the care and use of the archives of the Catholic Church. Subscription details appear on the inside of the end cover.

REFLECTIONS ON THE ARCHIVES OF THE ENGLISH DOMINICAN PROVINCE

The Rev. Bede Bailey, O.P.

The Catholic Record Society, volume 25, published nearly fifty years ago, was said by one its editors, if I remember rightly, to contain all the Dominican historical papers except, as he put it, those of a mere administrative nature. The volume consists of records from the seventeenth, eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries. By and large, the volume represents the records that were housed in safe accommodation specially built for them in St. Dominic's Priory, London, just over a century ago, accommodation at most the size of two large cupboards. These were the archives.

So what of the clutter, and in part order, that fill a large room at Hawkesyard, spread through three rooms at Carisbrooke — not to mention cupboards in passages — and take up a considerable amount of storage space in the provincial office in London. The amount of paper has grown, as though presided over by Professor Parkinson, so that a large horsebox, built for three horses and a groom, was needed to move what is now at Carisbrooke from the North East.

He who is now the archivist of the English Dominican province had already held that job for fifteen years before he became aware of any of those simple rules that should control the keeping and growth of archives. When our chairman, Dr. Parker, spoke at our preliminary meeting about the do's and don'ts of any competent archivist — no biros, no sticky stuff, no re-arrangement of material, (keep it as it comes), constant warfare on damp, rusting paper-clips and pins (so much more common than mice) — then I realised that for many years I had been encouraging deplorable habits. But when I heard Robin Gard say at a later meeting that perhaps we may think of the archives of religious as being akin to family archives — some doubtless kept in a strong room, in the library or lawyer's office, but others as likely as not in boxes under a bed in a spare room, in a cupboard on the stairs, or in a trunk in a loft or garage — then I began to wonder whether I had really offended — so grievously against all that archivists hold most dear.

How worth while has it been, this gathering together from drawers, attics, corners, cellars, and anywhere else where unwanted clutter is put away? The great majority of our papers since 1850 are concerned with details. It is interesting that of the great topics of the last 130 years, negotiations between the new hierarchy and the religious orders, the Rambler controversies, Infallibility, Anglican Orders, Modernism and its condemnation, there is; save for the first, hardly a trace. The brethren may have been expert in covering their tracks, though some evidence can be found elsewhere, among the Richard Simpson papers at Downside, and perhaps the Clifford papers in the Clifton Diocesan archives. Or was it that the English Dominicans of the time were so taken up with positive pastoral work, largely among the Victorian poor — Manning said that St. Dominic's in London was the best run parish and that Fr. Austin Rooke (once a curate at St. Saviour's, Leeds) was the best parish priest in the diocese — that they had no time, or even interest, for those theological mountains that were agonized over at the Birmingham and London Oratories, in Bishops' Houses, in Farm Street and Richmond? Looking through our papers there is hardly a clue of any controversy in the Church, of disagreement over Vatican I and Manning coming out on top. There is hardly a mention of Modernism, and no recorded contact with von Hugel — the greatest English-speaking theologian of this century Bishop Michael Ramsey judges him — though he lived for some years only a short tri-cycle ride away in Hampstead. And yet Fr. Hugh Pope, that epitome of orthodoxy and English tradition, was expelled from his teaching post in Rome because he was said to be a modernist; and there is barely a reference to this among his English brethren's surviving correspondence that has so far come into the light of day. So what use is that horsebox full of papers?

I have said that the great majority of our papers since 1850 are concerned with details; also, as with many family archives, the personal and the administrative are inextricably interwoven and the classification should doubtless preserve this. There would be nothing odd if the first part of a provincial's letter was to do with some important policy decision, the second with young Brother X and his having enough to eat, and the third about the recipient's corns. They might, at first sight be considered of no, or little, interest to a later generation, especially if they are of a purely personal character. Yet these letters are not just details for those immediately concerned, but rather clues to the circumstances of their lives.

In the year before his death in 1648, Dom Gregoire Tariesse, president of the Benedictine Congregation of St. Maur and the progenitor of the great Maurist tradition, and achievement, sent a circular to the houses of the Congregation. 'Reject and despise nothing, even if it is only a distich or an epigram, and be careful not to fall asleep at your work' (quoted by Sir Richard Southern in Downside Review, July 1967, p. 173); Professor Southern commented that 'nothing was too small for the attention of the greatest of the Maurists.' (ib. p. 175.) Professor Southern had previously declared that 'there must be no delay in making libraries active centres of civilisation: they must not be repositories, still less tombs, of learning, but places where systematic, well-directed work is done.' (ib. p. 171.)

Family archives can be prime sources of the way in which people actually lived and thought; they can provide clues to the day-to-day way in which members of the family thought about each other and their neighbours, towards their social and religious circumstances, to their life.

We often remember only details. So Fr. Mark Schoof, recalling the first lecture in theology he ever attended (it was at Blackfriars, Oxford), wrote that 'of what was actually said I understood little and remember even less'. Yet the lecture for him 'was a very memorable one', for 'the lecturer, Fr. Thomas Gilby, added to his words a striking, almost prophetic, gesture. As soon as he had finished a page, he picked it up, crumpled it slowly and very audibly in his right hand and, while reading the next page, dropped it into a waste-paper basket'. This, for Fr. Schoof, was a 'fascinating demonstration' of an attitude to theology that he has valued ever since. It was perhaps unfortunate for the archivist; but it was an action that at any rate for one of the audience spoke more than words; and the detail is worth noting among the Thomas Gilby papers. Is it just a meaningless detail that Fr. Dominic Aylward provincial from 1850 to 1854, and again from 1866 to 1870, wrote anxiously from London to the Mayor of Newcastle upon Tyne about an alleged murderer; and to the priory there about the health of a young boot-black called Patrick Rooney? At the time he was seriously ill, and the province embarrassed by serious financial difficulties which haunted him. Or those many letters of Fr. Bede Jarrett, provincial from 1916 to 1932, dashed off in answering a daunting pile of letters and in the middle of so much else, that still have the power to bring wonder to those unborn on St. Patrick's day 1934 when he died.

So what, very broadly, do these 'family' papers include? Apart from the Acts of the general and provincial chapters, there are letters from Masters of the Order, both circulars and personal — 'I come as a brother to brothers' was the stated policy of old Fr. Aniceto Fernandez fifteen years ago. There are letters of provincials from the eighteenth century onwards, full of insight in to the hopes and actual achievements and failures of the brethren; letters from hundreds of brethren, of very varied 'importance', and collections of individuals' papers — Fr. John Baptist Reeves, who died at the age of 88 in 1976, left a heap of papers which he could deliberately have intended to prove the truth of his own estimate of himself, 'Alas and alack, and yet at the same time thank God, I am not a normal priest, and nobody who knows more of me than the clothes I wear would ever write me off as that'; Fr. J.B., far from covering his tracks, carefully mapped them; not many have been so explicit about their own self-judgement, but some have unconsciously left vivid accounts of themselves. There are published volumes of over eighty members of the province, starting in 1738. Letters to and from architects, and benefactors, and bishops, concerning various houses founded since 1850 are more, or less, complete. There are many photographs of all sorts since the 1850s. Fr. Raymond Palmer spent forty years copying documents in the Public Record Office and the British Museum, mostly to do with the pre-Reformation province. Fr. Godfrey Anstruther has indefatigably copied in libraries and collections in most western European countries, mostly to do with the post-Reformation province. When the house of contemplative nuns at Oxford closed soon after the end of the Vatican II, a large collection came to the Province archives, from the beginning to the end of the house. There is the beginning of a collection of Dominican Rite liturgical books, starting with a missal of 1603. There are papers, many volumes, about what we used to call 'the overseas missions of the province.'

Sometimes I have been tempted to think that our collection is notable. I am coming to think that there are many collections greatly its superior in the care of religious institutions of one sort or another. A few years ago, one of the brethren wrote of a shift in ecclesiological consciousness which had, in the 20th century Church, given priority to life and mystery over structure and institution. This shift, he said, had begun in the 1930s and had been affirmed in Lumen Gentium of Vatican II. It has produced a wavy and uncertain line on the graph of opinion in this country, and our province has been no exception.

My aim — though I gather this is a serious archival offence, but perhaps not for the keeper of 'family papers' — has been to provide, in a small way, some clues and evidence about the Church in England, (and so about ourselves who are a little corner of the Church in England), and how people thought and did during the 20th century. There are many footpaths, as well as lanes, roads, and motorways. A reviewer of a book called The English Path wrote, 'To be reminded of what footpaths mean in emotional, social, spiritual and metaphorical terms to the generations of country feet that created them, comes as something of a surprise .. . Mapping is one thing, and a life-time's repetitive treading of intimate little routes quite something else. Professor Richard Cobb has long since known this, but most of us have not.' I believe that the archives of religious orders and congregations, because they are family archives, may be able to provide some of those 'intimate little routes' which, so it seems to me, can sometimes tell the truth better than the administrative highway.

THE SCOTTISH CATHOLIC ARCHIVES

The Rev. Mark Dilworth, O.S.B.

The Scottish Catholic Archives as a homogeneous collection can be said to date back to the early nineteenth century, i The person responsible was James Kyle, the place where they were put together was the seminary at Aquhorties, on Donside. The facts of James Kyle's life are simple. Born at Edinburgh in 1788, he entered Aquhorties as a boy of eleven and was appointed master there at the age of twenty. Four years later, in 1812, he was ordained priest and became prefect of studies, a post which he held for fourteen years. He then spent two years as missionary in Glasgow before returning to the north-east to be vicar apostolic of the Northern District. He went to live at Preshome near Buckie and remained there until his death in 1869. Apart from two years in Glasgow, therefore, Kyle spent seventy years of his life in the rural north-east, and he received his entire education from the age of eleven in the small college of Aquhorties. He was, however, a man of quite exceptional gifts, both intellectual and practical, and became proficient in many fields, with a wide reputation for scholarship and learning. .

There had been a seminary in Scotland since 1716, at Scalan in the Braes of Glenlivet. It remained there until 1799, then for thirty years it was at Aquhorties, until finally in 1829 it was transferred to its present site at Blairs near Aberdeen. The books and papers at Scalan went with the college to Aquhorties in 1799. Material from elsewhere in Scotland also found its way there, and it became the repository of archival material rescued after the French Revolution from the Scots colleges on the continent, particularly that of Paris. The Paris material is so valuable, and the history of the Paris archives is so distinguished, that they need to be considered at some length.

PARIS

When James Beaton, archbishop of Glasgow, sailed from Leith to France in July 1560, just one month before the Reformation Parliament altered the country's religion, he took with him the muniments and treasures of his cathedral church. He went to Paris, where the young Mary Stuart was queen of France as well as of Scotland. A year later, however, she returned to Scotland, leaving Beaton in Paris as her ambassador. He was to remain there over forty years and to serve as a focal point for Scots Catholics in exile. As it became increasingly clear that the medieval church was not going to regain its former position in Scotland, Beaton refounded the ancient Scots College in Paris with two ends in view: not only would it educate Catholic students but it would provide safe-keeping for the silver ornaments and title-deeds of his see until a Catholic restoration should take place.

To ensure continuity and provide security, Beaton placed the new college under the jurisdiction of the Prior of the near-by Charterhouse. It was in the Charterhouse in fact that the valuables and muniments of Glasgow archdiocese were deposited on the archbishop's death in 1603, though his library and his diplomatic and personal papers were taken to the new college.

The story of the college and its archives during the seventeenth century is one of development and growth. The medieval foundation and that of Beaton were definitely merged in 1639 and new premises, including a spacious library and archive-room, were built in the early 1660s. The archives grew steadily; Beaton's papers and the college documents were augmented by administrative material and by correspondence with the Mission and other Scottish establishments on the continent. The college also became the repository for the papers of many Scots Catholic emigres. Thus the Album Amicorum of George Strachan, the celebrated orientalist, and Gilbert Blackhall's Brief Narration found their way with other manuscript volumes into the archives. A document of 1660 lists 225 manuscripts and we have the record of at least one visiting scholar from Scotland using the material.

The college assumed new importance after the Revolution of 1688 when the exiled Stuart king set up his court near Paris; links between college and court were very close. It was at this time that Thomas Innes began his work in the college archives. Born in 1662, he entered the Paris college in 1681, was ordained priest ten years later and, apart from three years on the Scottish mission, spent the rest of his life there. He was a disciple of Mabillon, also living in Paris at the time, and became in his turn a brilliant historian. Innes, having found the college archives intact but in a chaotic condition, arranged them according to the best principles of his master. That was in 1686-87. Then, after ordination, he turned his attention to the Glasgow diocesan muniments preserved in the Charterhouse, which were likewise in a parlous state. In the winter of 1692-93 he catalogued them and stored them carefully in a specially made cupboard and series of wooden cases. He also set to work to transcribe the original bulls and charters.

Thus far he had worked as a good archivist should. Now fortune took a hand. Innes came across a document showing that Robert II had received a papal dispensation for his marriage. The legitimacy of the Stuart dynasty springing from that union, which had been impugned by George Buchanan and others, was decisively vindicated. King James made full use of the discovery. In a great assembly of courtiers and the leading scholars, the document was examined and pronounced authentic, and notarial copies made for distribution. The 1709 edition of Mabillon's De Re Diplomatica singled out the document and proceedings for special mention.

It was no doubt as a result of this that the Glasgow muniments were transferred from the Charterhouse to the college. Not only had the affair given wide publicity to the archives, but James promised an endowment to enable the college to continue as guardian of these invaluable records. In 1701, a few months before his death, he went further and deposited in the college his autograph memoirs and personal papers. In effect this made the college archives the official archives of the Jacobite court, and leading Jacobites followed the example of their king. Among the accessions at this time were the earl of Drummond's fifteenth-century manuscript of the Scotichronicon, the papers of Mary of Modena and other state papers, the papers of the Erskines of Mar, a family history of the Gordons and, rather later, the papers of Bishop Attenbury of Rochester.

Thomas Innes returned from the mission a few weeks after James' death and resumed his work in the archives. His Critical Essay in 1722 was an epoch-making work, dispelling the myths and setting the early history of Scotland on a scientific basis; he also unstintingly and painstakingly assisted all scholars who sought his help. Numerous works acknowledge his transcriptions, while the civic authorities of Glasgow made him a burgess of their city. This same spirit of co-operation continued to animate the college after his death in 1744, though the archives were no longer so well cared for.

The Royal Stuart papers were used during the eighteenth century, even if the reasons for consulting them were political rather than scholarly. King James' own papers consisted of three autograph volumes of Memoirs, together with a three-volume copy, and about ten volumes of letters and papers. In 1707 a life of the King was compiled from these sources. It filled five folio volumes and, apart from one instance, whenever royal permission was given to consult the Stuart papers, it was this Life and not the original that was made available. The college authorities looked on their custody of the Stuart papers as a sacred trust.

It is worth summarising the holdings of the archives when the French Revolution put an end to the college. The medieval Glasgow muniments included 500-600 original charters and bulls, two registers of the diocese, its rental book and much besides. Beaton's diplomatic correspondence filled fourteen thick folio volumes, containing many letters of Mary Stuart and James VI; in addition there were his personal and family papers. The Stuart papers comprised the memoirs and correspondence of James VII and II as well as papers of the court in exile and many Jacobite emigres. The college archives proper contained not only the muniments of the college itself but also papers of Catholic emigres, two centuries of correspondence with the Mission and other colleges, and the papers of Thomas Innes, not to mention accessions like the Scotichronicon manuscript.

In the early 1790s, as the situation in Paris worsened, Alexander Gordon, principal of the college, failed to act promptly enough to save the archives. He did indeed send King James' memoirs and other documents in a box to St. Omer for transportation to England, but at St. Omer they were burnt. He himself then escaped with a few valuable documents. Some outstanding items were confiscated by the civic authorities in 1794 but were recovered three years later. The bulk of the material, however, was taken away 'in several carriages and in twenty-four boxes or small coffer's' and was never seen again. A fair amount seems to have been scattered round the college premises or simply abandoned.

In May 1798 Abbe Paul Macpherson arrived in Paris on his way to Scotland. When he resumed his journey he took with him a box full of what was considered most worth preserving of the material salvaged from the wreck. Then, having brought the Paris documents safely to Britain, Macpherson did a very foolish thing. While passing through London he lent four Glasgow medieval manuscript volumes to a Scottish antiquarian and writer, George Chalmers. Not only that, but he later had Thomas Innes' notes and the five-volume Life of James VII and II sent from Scotland for Chalmers to examine. Negotiations to get these volumes returned dragged on until after Chalmers' death and were only partially successful, so that today Innes' notes are in Edinburgh University Library and one Glasgow cartulary is in the Scottish Record Office. Indeed a great deal of pilfering as well as scavenging among the remains of the college archives went on at this time, with the result that pirated Paris items were printed and 'lost' treasures are to be found today in various collections and libraries.

AQUHORTIES, PRESHOME, BLAIRS

This article, however, is more concerned with the present holdings of the Scottish Catholic Archives than with losses in the past, great though these have been. The manuscripts brought from Paris to Scotland began to find their way to Aquhorties. Macpherson had brought material from Rome as well as from Paris. He was the Roman agent of the Scottish Mission and when in 1798 the revolutionary army invaded Rome he set off for Scotland with what he could collect and pack, in the short time at his disposal, of the Scots College and agency archives. Even though he later took much of these back to Rome when the college was re-established, valuable material remained in Scotland and was preserved by James Kyle. To Aquhorties also came William Wallace bringing documents and books from the Scots College in Valladolid. Aquhorties already had the material from Scalan and to this was added material from elsewhere in Scotland, in particular the books and papers of Bishop John Geddes (died 1799) and Bishop George Hay (died 1811). We also know of a trunk full of old papers sent to Aquhorties by the priest in Aberdeen. The seminary thus had a fair-sized collection of eighteenth-century documents from Scotland, to which the material from the continent was added.

As a young priest and teacher at Aquhorties, Kyle set to work to arrange the material from home and abroad. Quite early on he deciphered the secret letter code used in the diplomatic correspondence of Mary Stuart. His major achievement, however, was to amalgamate the correspondence brought from Paris with that of Bishops Hay and Geddes and their predecessors in Scotland. Particularly valuable were the numerous letters to and from Will Leslie (died 1707), who was for many decades both the Scottish Mission agent in Rome and the secretary of the Congregation of Propaganda Fide. Every letter was folded and docketed, sorted into bundles and pigeon-holed. Before he left Aquhorties, Kyle had had a large oak cabinet made to hold them,² with 200 pigeon-holes in its upper part.

When the seminary moved to Blairs, the library and archives went with it, except for this collection of letters and some other historical items, which were taken to Preshome, where Kyle (now bishop) resided. Here he continued his archival work; indeed, the new house at Preshome built about 1830 according to Kyle's specifications contained a library and archive room. Papers continued to accumulate, for instance documents from the Valladolid archives in 1843 and 1853 and charters and papers of families in the north-east. The collection of letters grew steadily, for Kyle's prestige made him the recipient of a voluminous correspondence on matters of scholarship as well as church affairs. When he died in 1869, the orderly collection of letters totalled 75,000. Almost single-handed he had reconstituted the archives of the Scottish Catholic church and had provided both continuity with the past and safe custody for the future. He encouraged his young priests to take an interest in the archives and was, like Thomas Innes, generous in his help to scholars. Since this was the golden age of the Scottish publishing clubs, their volumes include many items from Preshome.

Blairs seminary also received accessions. Portraits from Douay and the remains of the Paris library were taken there in the 1830s. The most valuable items came from the Scots Benedictine abbey at Ratisbon (Regensburg). Since the late sixteenth century Scots monks had occupied three monasteries in Germany, at Ratisbon, Wurzburg and Erfurt. The latter two were secularised in 1803 and 1819 respectively, and their archives taken over by the state. The Ratisbon abbey lingered on, crippled by hostile legislation and in constant difficulties, until it was finally dissolved in 1862 and its magnificent archives went to the local bishop. Some of the most valuable items, however, came to Scotland, brought by the last surviving monk to Fort Augustus abbey, which he constituted the continuation and successor of Ratisbon. Earlier, in the 1840s, Bishop James Gillis (vicar apostolic of the Eastern District) had visited Ratisbon and been given documents to help him prove that the seminary attached to the monastery was the property of the Scottish Mission. After Gillis' death in 1864, these were taken to Blairs.

When Bishop Kyle died, his former curate, William Clapperton, was parish priest at Buckie, a few miles distant, and took charge of the Preshome collections. Thus it was that Joseph Stevenson made a survey for the Historical Manuscripts Commission of the papers at Buckie and in the bishop's house; at Edinburgh; later Blairs was also surveyed. The Scottish bishops then ordered the transfer of the Preshome collections to Blairs, an operation which was not efficiently carried out, for about one-third of the letters (that is, 25,000) and some very valuable documents remained at Preshome. All the same, now that most of the Preshome muniments had been joined to the collections brought from Aquhorties in 1892 and the accessions since that date, the Blairs library and archives had no rivals. When the new college was erected at the end of the century, it included a spacious library and a special muniments room.

Naturally, it was now Blairs that received accessions of value: Henry Gall's newspaper cuttings and notes from continental libraries in 1891; Clapperton's historical papers and his Memoirs of Scotch Missionary Priests after his death in 1905; Canon George Wilson's transcripts in 1916; books from Edinburgh cathedral house, many of them belonging to the old Mission, in 1924; documents relating to the Paris and Douay colleges in 1928; valuable items from Paris which had remained in the bishop's house in Edinburgh.

In 1913 a retired priest, Mgr Peter L. Butti, came to Blairs, where he was to spend the remaining nineteen years of his life cataloguing the library of 30,000 volumes and making an index, by year and writer, of the 50,000 letters from Preshome. Material had been made available for publication, notably, in 1874-75, two further volumes from the medieval Glasgow muniments and thirty documents from Archbishop Beaton's papers. In at least one case, however, permission to examine material had been refused; the seminary could not easily cater for the needs of scholars. Conditions improved with the arrival of Mgr Butti, enabling work of collation and synthesis to be done, for perhaps the first time, by visiting scholars (as distinct from the priest curators). In 1929-30 two works appeared: Bibliographia Aberdonensis using the printed books and The Blairs Papers 1603-1660 using the Kyle collection of letters.

With Mgr Butti's death in 1932, however, the situation deteriorated once again. Hay continued to publish, aided by the transcripts of documents provided by Bishop George Bennett of Aberdeen, but most scholars were discouraged. Blairs could not offer scholars the facilities they needed; even less could it combine these facilities with the necessary security. Although some research work was in fact done, it was more or less confined to a limited number of known persons.

It was to remedy this situation that a full-time archivist was appointed. Fr. William James Anderson, of Arbroath, after a brilliant scholarly career in which he was senior assistant to E.A. Lowe in the production of Codices Latini Antiquiores, had spent twenty years in parochial work in London. On his retirement in 1954 he accepted the bishops' invitation to take charge of the Blairs muniments and at once began to work in close co-operation with the Scottish Record Office, depositing documents for examination and use in Edinburgh and providing facilities for the National Register of Archives (Scotland) to compile an up-to-date report on the Blairs holdings.

COLUMBA HOUSE

Fr Anderson had been only four years in Blairs when a further important step was taken. The bishops in November 1957 decided that the archives should be stored in a central place in Edinburgh, where they would be accessible for research and within easy reach of the Scottish Record Office and the National Library of Scotland. With a grant from the Columba Trust, founded by Lord Colum Crichton-Stuart, a house in the Georgian new town was bought. The archives moved south in August 1958 and Fr Anderson took up residence in the new centre, now named Columba House.

Mgr. Peter Louis Butti (1847-1932) at work in the Blairs College Library, about 1930.

Fr. William James Anderson (1894-1932) at work in the Scottish Catholic Archives in 1959. The nineteenth-century wooden cabinet contained part of the large collection of post-Reformation letters preserved in the archives.

For the next ten years, until his health broke down completely, Fr Anderson undertook research in Columba House and encouraged others to do the same. When he died in 1972, Mgr David McRoberts, a priest of Motherwell diocese and well-known as a liturgical scholar, was appointed to succeed him as Keeper. Columba House was thoroughly renovated and equipped to serve as a repository for documents and a centre for research, again with the generous help of the Columba Trust. The house was formally reopened in March 1974. Unfortunately Mgr McRoberts did not enjoy good health and died quite suddenly in November 1978. The present Keeper was appointed some months later.

During his short term of office Mgr McRoberts carried out one much-needed operation: the 25,000 letters and other documents still at Preshome were brought to Columba House, and so were the 3,000 letters in Oban dealing with the Western District in the early nineteenth century. Together with the Blairs Letters the collection in Columba House now totalled about 80,000 — some estimates put it higher — from the sixteenth to the twentieth century, and all were taken out of their tight bundles and laid flat in 600 dust-proof cardboard boxes stored in ten large metal cabinets. The entire library of printed books in Blairs also moved south, when in August 1974 it was deposited on long-term loan in the National Library. The books and manuscripts collected during four centuries are now housed in Edinburgh in fairly close proximity to each other.

Enough has been said to show what the Scottish Catholic Archives are and what they are not. They are a national institution, the property of the bishops, but there has been no centralising policy for depositing documents. When the hierarchy was restored in 1878, the three vicariates became six dioceses, increased to eight in 1947. In no way does Columba House replace the various diocesan archives. There is, for instance, no systematic official correspondence later than 1869 among its holdings. Nevertheless, the existence of an institution for the specific purpose of safeguarding archives with a full-time Keeper, should stimulate a greater readiness to deposit material — it has indeed already done so — and a greater interest in preserving present-day documents for the future. No doubt Columba House has a part to play in liaison with college and diocesan archivists.

Perhaps this account can most fittingly end with an assessment of the present condition of the Scottish Catholic Archives and their needs. The muniments of the medieval see of Glasgow, Archbishop Beaton's papers and the Royal Stuart papers are well known and are to a large extent available in print. The Blairs Letters are also known and they are indexed, but their full potential is still to be realised. The Ratisbon documents and the Oban Letters are listed. Some outstanding items from the Mission at home or the four colleges abroad are easily identifiable.

Besides this accessible material there is a vast and rich collection of varied material — letters and papers, manuscript volumes, pamphlets and books — that has been accumulated at home and abroad from the sixteenth century to our own times. Some of it has been carefully labelled in the past, some is completely unsorted. Accessions since Columba House was established are considerable and continue to arrive. There is also a policy of purchasing relevant books and pamphlets and acquiring photocopies of manuscript material (e.g. of the Douay college registers, which survived the French Revolution).

This great collection, only partially sorted and listed and therefore only partially accessible, will be of great value to scholars and historians when it becomes readily available. Plans are on foot at the moment to deal with this backlog of 200 years and produce a catalogue of holdings for circulation where it is likely to be of interest. The Blairs Letters have been recognised as constituting one of the most important sources for the history of emigration from Scotland; similar distinction perhaps awaits the less well-known material.

Meanwhile, even before this is accomplished, the pleasant, spacious reading-room, with its reference library of several thousand volumes, is at the disposal of scholars. Since Columba House was opened in 1958, and especially since its renovation in 1972-74, its holdings have provided for numerous doctoral theses and also much published work by scholars of established reputation, in a wide range of countries. There is close liaison with the Scottish Record Office, the National Library of Scotland, museums and universities. The Innes Review, a twice-yearly journal devoted to the history of the Scottish Catholic church in its widest aspects, continues to be edited from Columba House. If the role of the Scottish Catholic Archives can be stated at its most fundamental level, it is perhaps something like this: to show that the historiography of Scotland is incomplete and lacks an integral element, unless it takes into account, as a constant factor, the Roman Catholic Church.

THE ARCHIVES OF THE ENGLISH PROVINCE OF THE SOCIETY
OF JESUS AT FARM STREET, LONDON. Part 1.

The Rev. Francis O. Edwards, S.J.

By way of preliminary to a brief catalogue raisonné of the archive titled above, a short note on the organization of the Society of Jesus as it affects the English Province, seems indispensable. The division of the Society for administrative purposes has not much changed in its main principles during the 400 years or so of its existence. The General, at least until the time of writing (June, 1965), has always been elected for life by a General Congregation specially summoned for the purpose at the death of his predecessor, in accordance with rules laid down in the Constitutions. All other superiors, including Provincials (heads of Provinces), hold office for a term only, six years being a norm for higher appointments, and for all practical purposes. The world-mission of the Society is divided into Assistancies, each consisting of one nation or group of nations, associated usually according to language or culture, and having an appointed representative in Rome to advise the General in governing the Assistancy. The Assistant is appointed from one of the constituent countries or Provinces of the Assistancy. So there is, for example, a French Assistancy, a German, Spanish, Italian, Indian, and an English-speaking Assistancy. Although of the same language, the United States form another Assistancy. The Assistant does not give orders: advises only. Each Assistancy is divided into Provinces headed by the Provincial appointed from Rome. The Provincial has authority to command and institute policy, albeit under the supervision of the Roman Curia of the Society. The offices of the latter are staffed by responsible Jesuits of appropriate nationality so that no unnecessary conflicts arise. Every Provincial has a Socius, or secretary, and a Procurator to deal with the financial side of provincial administration: also Consultors to advise. According to these various divisions by office and responsibility, the contents of the archive under review may be conveniently grouped; and the terminology given above will suffice to explain most, or at least much, in the labels.

The English Province, which included Wales from its beginnings, and Scotland from the beginning of the restored Society (1815), came into formal existence as such in 1623. From the coming of Edmund Campion and Robert Pearsons in 1580 until 1619, this area was a Mission with a local superior in England and a head in Rome. From 1619 until 1623 it was a vice-Province dependent on Flanders. In 1623 it became an independent Province. The Province archives are mainly concentrated in two places. Stonyhurst College, Lanes., has most of the extant early papers and transcripts running from about 1580 and covering the 17th century, but with many later papers as well. The Stonyhurst collection has been summarily surveyed in the second and third reports of the Historical Manuscripts Commission of 1870 and 1872 respectively. Farm St. has most of the later papers on general province affairs running from about 1700, especially those dealing with procuratorial matters. These have not previously been adequately summarized or calendared in any published report.

The logical point at which to begin this short survey would appear to be the correspondence with Rome. There are six volumes of photographic reproductions of the Generals' letters to Mission Superiors and Provincials. The originals covering the same period, 1605–1769, are kept in Rome. Signed originals of similar letters for 1750–1892 occupy four more volumes, while for subsequent years the letters form a loose collection. These letters, written by hand by secretaries and signed by the General, are more confidential in nature, and were intended mainly for the attention of Provincials and their confidential advisers. In this they are opposed to circular letters sometimes addressed to the whole Society, sometimes to an Assistancy, or even a single Province. Provincials also issued their own circular letters to their Provinces from time to time. The Generals' circulars begin in the Farm St. collection at April 3, 1587 (a reprint of a letter detailing passages from the Old Testament to be omitted by the public readers during meals in the Society's refectories). The series is only continuous from about 1830. Letters from the Assistant are included in a bound volume, "Foreign Correspondence, 1776–1859" (472 ff.), and also in a series of loose letters for 1877–1888. Nineteenth-century transcripts from old catalogues in Rome give terse but essential details of birth, place or origin, time in the Society, health, studies and work of individual members of the Province between 1593 and the suppression in 1773. There are also printed catalogues of Jesuits in Russia for 1803/4, 1805, 1809/10, and although there are no recognizable British names among them, one is reminded of the curious and transient connection of the English Province with the Russian Empire. As is general knowledge, the 1773 Bull of suppression remained unpromulgated in Russia since Catherine the Great withheld her placet, an essential condition to its valid application. Thanks to the irony of circumstances, Protestant Britain likewise made no special move against the Society, and without continuing the title, the Jesuits in Britain virtually pursued a policy of business as usual. Indeed, on May 27, 1803, Pius VII gave oral permission for the former British Jesuits to affiliate themselves to the unsuppressed Jesuits in Russia. From the universal restoration of the Society in 1815 until the present day, the series of printed catalogues is fairly complete, especially from about 1840.

From 1623, England and Wales was divided for provincial administrative purposes into "Colleges" and "Residences". "College" is here taken in its sense of a group or assembly, as used, e.g., in describing the College of Cardinals, and indicated an area of operation, certainly not a building. "Residence" was used in much the same sense, and was used to refer to an area of lesser importance and usually smaller extent, where the superior had less power of individual action, theoretically, than the Rector, who ruled a College. In fact, the superior of a Residence could come to enjoy more freedom, perhaps, than the Rector himself since the latter was bound more specifically and expressly in his work by the written Constitution of the Society in a way the local superior, technically his subordinate, was not. As correspondence in the archives makes clear, in the Society as elsewhere, a great deal always depended on personalities. In the days of persecution, the Jesuits were scattered for the most part among the houses of Catholic gentlemen and nobles. With the 18th century, if not before, Jesuit communities and houses as such became more common, resembling the smaller houses of the contemporary Society. Even in the darkest days, however, there were a few houses where Jesuits could be reasonably secure from pursuit, and lie up for a brief while for rest, and go through the spiritual exercises of St. Ignatius. All of which explains how it was possible to preserve records at all, but also why there are so many lacunae and inadequacies in these archives.

The bulk of the records described here are divided according to these "Colleges" and "Residences". Many are still kept in files or deeds-envelopes, but they are gradually being guarded and bound in volumes, beginning, of course, with the oldest and most interesting: or one should, perhaps, say resuming, since many early papers were bound in the late 19th century.

The College of St. Ignatius covered London and extended into Middlesex, Berkshire, Kent and Hertfordshire. It retained the title of 'novitiate' until 1773, although in fact no novices were trained here after the celebrated "Clerkwell search" of March, 1628. The Jesuits were established in this "College" at some 29 places at different times in the 17th century. Included was the well-known "White Webbs", associated with Father Henry Garnett, S.J., from 1604-1606. Two colleges in an educational sense existed from 1687-8, at the Savoy, and in Golden Square at the Bavarian Embassy. Of these no more need be said since there is no record of these earlier institutions at Farm St. beyond modern notes. The earliest original records of the London District begin at 1750 and are mainly financial, dealing with gifts and bequests to the mission made by Charles, Earl of Shrewsbury, Frances Rawe, Father John Poyntz, and others. There are details of a school or college which ran in London from 1824-1835, the earlier ancestor, in some sense, of the contemporary Jesuit schools at Stamford Hill and Edge Hill, Wimbledon, each of which has a deed-envelope in the archive. From about 1834, when a church was established at St. John's Wood, records become more numerous. Records of the 19th century throw light on a church in Westminster which preceded the cathedral, Farm St. Church, opened in 1849, a residence at 9 Hill St., about the same time, and the chapel of St. Augustine at Tonbridge Wells. There are a number of early registers, account-books and files also dealing with the Church of the Immaculate Conception, Farm St., and a recently bound volume (315 ff.) illustrating the history of the church and its earliest origins from 1802 to 1865. More light on this project may be found in a box-file on Cardinal Manning which includes letters and papers also on a proposed Catholic University College (1880-1888), and the foundation of a central school at Westminster. Concerning the latter is a "Prospectus for establishing in London a great Catholic central middle-class school for boys, on the great commercial principle of the age, co-operation and limited liability". There are also a few interesting papers, some printed, on the question of Catholic attendance at Protestant universities which was a live issue from 1869 to 1885.

The College of the Holy Apostles operated mainly over Suffolk and Norfolk, Cambridge and Essex. The most important papers for 1775-1840 have been bound (309 ff.). They deal principally with Norwich and Bury St. Edmund's. A foolscap box-file contains later 19th century material while the Bury Historia Domus, account books and other papers bring the story down to 1929 when the parish was handed over to the secular clergy.

Lancashire, Cheshire, Staffordshire and Westmorland formed, in 1623, the College of Blessed (afterwards Saint) Aloysius. This district included Stonyhurst College, the oldest surviving institution in the Province, and has left behind the largest group of documents in the collection for a single area. They fill some eighteen deeds-envelopes as well as a number of account-books, day-books and financial analyses drawn up in the mid-19th century. From 1660, Staffordshire hived off to form the Residence of St. Chad, becoming a College in 1671/2. For archives purposes, this distinction is practically ignored. Records for Lancashire begin about 1700 with a file on the costs of salaries and services for 1702-1836, and another on district affairs, 1725-1765. Procurators' letters for the district run from 1744-1792. Portico, Prescott, Bedford, Leigh, Gilmoos, Croxteth, Fazakerley, Dunkenhagh, Formby, Croft, Westby Hall, Ince, Crosby (Little), Accrington, Blackpool, Chipping, Clitheroe, Clayton all have at least a few papers, commonly starting from about 1750. Preston, especially the three churches of St. Wilfrid, St. Ignatius and St. Walbergh has several files. Liverpool is also well represented. Separate files deal with the Mile End Chapel and its transfer to the secular clergy, 1822-24; the Edmund St. Chapel, and a dispute with the good Benedictines, 1743-1844; St. Anthony's Chapel, 1819-40 and Sir Thomas's Buildings' Chapel, 1788. There are two modern files on the church, parish and school of St. Francis Xavier's, Salisbury St., a mid-19th century foundation. Wigan and St. Helens each has a file of modern papers. Two envelopes enclose the accounts of the curious West Leigh Corn Tithes, a source of income to the Society recorded here from 1656 to 1941 and not always yielding its modest harvest without controversy. Papers on Stonyhurst here in London are source material from 1793 onwards: that is from the time of its transfer from the continent owing to disturbances created by the French Revolution. There is also much original material for its history while at St. Omer, which has been put to good use most recently by the Rev. H. Chadwick, S.J., in his St. Omers to Stonyhurst, London, 1962. The college also made a relatively brief stay at Liege. Its history is contained in several volumes: "Correspondence relating to St. Omers and North Wales, 1666-1781" (volume 1, 184 ff.), and "Liege: Procurators' Correspondence, 1682-1739" (volume 2, 307 ff.); volume 12, (305 ff.), is devoted to St. Omers and Stonyhurst in the period 1763 to 1829 as well as with the restoration of the Society and the Paccanarists, which may be described as an interim substitute for the Society.

The Old College of St. Francis Xavier, as opposed to the present homonymous institution in Liverpool and its dependencies, was founded for the West Country, including not only Devon and Cornwall but also Wales. Incidental references apart, records at Farm St. only begin with 1743 for this College as a whole. A volume of papers on Bristol and its environs begins at that date and ends in 1847. Unfortunately, many of these papers were damaged seriously at some time by damp. They have recently been sundexed, guarded and bound in black buckram. They form an interesting supplement to the papers held by the Bishop of Clifton. Another volume for 1746 to 1853 is made up of general and mainly financial documents on the mission (282 ff.) and at least touches on Bristol, Shepton Mallet, Hereford, Swansea and Glamorgan; Hereford also has a volume to itself for 1779-1855 (224 ff.). After 1666/7, North Wales ceased to be part of the College of St. Francis Xavier, when it became the Residence of St. Winefride. A volume noted above (vol. 2), dealing with St. Omers, also embraces the St. Winefride papers for 1666-1781. In addition, there is "An abstract of writings relating to the Star Inn in Holywell" for 1639 to 1669 (2 ff.); also an "Abstract of old writings relating to Llanvechan", 1620-1728 (8 ff.). There are two copies of this. A deeds-envelope of loose documents deals mainly with the shrine and the Society's interest at Holywell for 1743 to 1843, but the papers are not numerous.

Returning to the eastern side of England, Durham, Cumberland and Northumberland comprised the Residence of St. John the Evangelist. One rather inadequate volume (212 ff.) covers its history from 1717 to 1858. A Residence of St. Dominic, also part of the primitive foundation, and dealing with Lincolnshire, was transformed in 1676 into the College of St. Hugh. Its papers for 1723 to 1869 have been bound. Yorkshire formed the Residence of St. Michael which served at different times or simultaneously some thirty-seven mission posts. Its headquarters was at York until 1685 when it transferred to Pontefract. In 1849 it was raised to the status of a "College". A bound volume (417 ff.) covers the period 1813 to 1860. Richmond, Pontefract, Wakefield, Skipton, Huddersfield, Selby, Brough Hall, and Leeds are the centres mainly covered.

Oxfordshire, Buckinghamshire, Bedfordshire and Northamptonshire formed the Residence of St. Mary. A volume (358 ff.) having as its main subject Oxford itself runs from 1729 to 1876. It includes a number of holograph letters from Bishop Ullathorne and a short, hitherto unpublished (?) letter from Cardinal Newman to the Jesuit Provincial, dated February 22, 1871: "My dear Father Provincial, Thank you for your letter. Nothing can be more natural than that the Society, which so lately has had the mission of Oxford, and for so long, should resume it. Yours [&c.]" There are also several letters from the Marquis of Bute dated between 1871 and 1876.

Moving south brings us to the oldest series of papers on the English mission. They occupy a volume (321 ff.) for the period 1613 to 1839 and are the records of the Residence of St. Thomas of Canterbury. This part of the mission included Sussex, Wiltshire, Hampshire and Dorset; and the main stations for the missionaries were at Soberton, Bonham, Canford, Stapehill, Lulworth, and Wardour. The many names of donors and benefactors have among them the distinguished Arundell family of Wardour the heads of which enjoyed the very rare distinction of being Counts of the Holy Roman Empire as well as barons of their titular seat. Next to this residence in time, though not of course in space, was another named after St. George which covered Worcestershire and Warwickshire, the earliest papers of which fill a volume (238 ff.) beginning at 1635 and going up to 1695. Two more foolscap files contain 18th century and later papers. Among other interesting items in the volume is a small account-book for the two years preceding the Popish Plot of Titus Oates. It includes two pages in the hand of Anthony Turner, the Jesuit martyr, who was executed for alleged complicity in the plot. This diary has been published by Mrs. A. M. Hodgson in a recent issue of the journal of the Worcestershire Catholic Historical Society. The volume also contains references to, and the signatures of, the Winter/Wintour, Windesor and Talbott families among many others. The south-west of England was, for Jesuit purposes, the Residence of Blessed Stanislaus (Saint Stanislaus from 1701) and comprised Devon and Cornwall. A smallish volume (228 ff.) contains much of the Jesuit history of this area for 1655-1845. Ugbrooke and Chudleigh were the principal stations. The documents include a number of references to the family of the Lords Clifford, Barons Chudleigh. The bulk of these letters date from the end of the 18th century. Here too there are references to the family of the Barons of Wardour. The Rev. Joseph Reeve, superior of the ex-Jesuit mission in the Napoleonic era, is well represented, and provides an example of the continuity of the work of the Society in England even after its formal suppression. In this part of the collection there are interesting letters from Lord Petre and Dr. George Oliver, an old Stonyhurst boy, who made valuable historical collections for the history of the Society and the Catholic Church in the West Country generally.

BIRMINGHAM DIOCESAN ARCHIVES

The Rev. J. Dennis McEvilly

GENESIS

In the summer of 1955 a few people met in Oxford with the object of forming a group for the promotion and study of Post-Reformation Catholic History in the former Vicariate of the Midland District. This entailed an approach to Archbishop Grimshaw for permission to list the Archives of the Midland Vicariate kept at Archbishop's House. Accordingly, a deputation waited upon His Grace in the autumn and received warm encouragement from him for the work proposed.

In the following year of 1956, some rough listing was made of the papers at Archbishop's House and a promise was given by the National Register of Archives to reproduce such lists as they were completed. By now, the group had co-opted two or three other members and called themselves the Midland Council for Recusant History. Advice and help was given by one of the new members, a County Archivist but, even so, faced with such a heterogeneous collection of documents, the work was slow and complicated. Hence the unsatisfactory state of the 1st Report (catalogue) as explained later under Calendaring. Again, valuable help given by assistants in two County Record Offices was terminated by three ladies joining Religious Orders! Prior to this, at the request of the Archbishop, a priest had to be appointed as Diocesan Archivist (either to fulfil some rule of Canon Law or to give the work an ecclesiastical 'cachet'), and eventually the Rev. J.D. McEvilly was appointed in March 1957.

It is useful to note that this Committee or Council for Midland Recusant History was responsible for inaugurating the Annual Conference on Post-Reformation Studies at St. Anne's College, Oxford. The first was held in April 1958 and after the 1960 meeting the organisation was handed over to the Catholic Record Society.

PROVENANCE

The papers appear for the most part to have belonged to the Vicars Apostolic of the Midland District and the Bishops of Birmingham, though the origin of certain bundles is uncertain.

A number of documents were probably lost down the years, due to the bishops changing their residences. Bp. Giffard lived at the ancestral home of Chillington Hall, near Wolverhampton, Bp. Witham resided at St. Thomas' Stafford, the home of the Fowlers, Bp. Stonor at various houses of his family in Oxfordshire, while their successors Bp. Hornyhold, Talbot, Berington and Stapleton were housed at Longbirch, the dower-house of the Giffards on that estate. Bp. Milner, within a year or so, moved from Longbirch into the town of Wolverhampton and

Bp. Walsh, his successor, also lived there until 1841 when the new Bishop's House was opened in Birmingham along with St. Chad's Cathedral. Bp. Ullathorne continued to reside at Birmingham, though he often 'wintered' at Oscott College. Bp. Ilsley lived continuously at Oscott, but his successor, Abp. McIntyre, acquired new premises at Norfolk Rd., Edgbaston, and there his successors lived until 1959, when a new residence was obtained outside the city of Birmingham. A few years later (1965) a new Cathedral House was built containing specifically designed Curial offices, including a strong-room and office for the Archives. Here the deposit of papers from Archbishop's House, Edgbaston, was brought, together with the collection of Midland District and Diocesan documents formerly housed at Oscott College. A few papers have been added from the Cathedral archives, Cotton College and from a few parishes.

Dr. Kirk appears to have abstracted papers for his projected continuation of Dodd's Church History: would some of these be in the Southwark archives, as Kirk lent papers to Canon Tierney? Again, Ushaw College has some 80 or more documents of correspondence between Bp. Walsh and the Earl of Shrewsbury (dated 1838–1847): did Cardinal Wiseman take them up there on one of his many visits there? Also housed there are a few letters from Alban Butler to Bp. Hornyhold. Photocopies of these have been kindly provided by the college authorities.

CONTENT

In spite of the losses, the collection (the total number of documents we hold is over 17,300) remains one of the best sources for the history of the Catholic body in England in the 18th and 19th centuries. While there are not many documents of the 17th century (about 160) and they are chiefly concerned with financial matters, yet some deal with religious matters: the faculties of the Arch-priest, the regulations and appointments made by the Chapter, some inventories and the controversies over jurisdiction between the Vicars Apostolic and the Regular clergy. Also, of this period, there is a small group of papers concerning the Rev. Thomas More (great-grandson of the Martyr), agent in Rome for the clergy. Even these are mostly financial, dealing with his rent to his landlord and even the apothecary's bill in his last illness, and a few concern his successor as agent, the Rev. Peter Fitton (vere Biddulph).

Most of the papers of the late 17th century and early 18th centuries deal with what we would term in modern language curial affairs, including a large group dealing with the constitution of the Chapter, its relations with the Vicars Apostolic, the reference of controversial matter to Propaganda; the establishment of missions and chaplaincies, including lists of the stations of various priests.

Many of the papers deal with the correspondence and relations of the Vicars Apostolic with the Holy See through the Nunciature in Brussels, the Cardinal Protector and Propaganda. A great amount of the documents deal with the financial organisation of the Vicariate: trust funds drawn up to evade the Penal Laws, the funds of the Common Purse, the Common Fund and Johnson's Fund, with a complete early 18th century account of the latter's foundation.

In the early documents of this collection there appears little evidence of any contact between the English Government and the Catholic body. Under Bp. Giffard (1668-1702) there appears to have been some relations with the Court at St. Germain, and Bp. Hornyhold was deeply attached to the House of Stuart, but the general tendency among the clergy and more prominent laity was towards the established succession. Bp. Stonor's well-known Whig principles and the rank of the leading Catholic laymen certainly led to unofficial relations after the passing of the Clandestine Marriage Act in 1753, Bp. Challoner discusses the best method of approach to the Government for putting forward Catholic objections to it.

In the whole collection there is surprisingly little reference to any international questions; it would appear that the English clergy had, with the passing of the centuries, lost nothing of their insularity.

The controversies over jurisdiction between the Vicars Apostolic and the Regular clergy, with the answers given by the Holy See to the various complaints of the protagonists, are well represented. A few papers deal with matters of Cult; alleged cures, Indulgences, the inclusion in the calendar of the feast of English saints, &c.

The Colleges abroad are featured by correspondence to and from the Superiors to the Vicars Apostolic, the establishment of funds or burses for students and the sometimes vexed question of appointments of Superiors.

The 18th century papers mainly consist of the Howard, Stonor and Kirk collections, dealing with the business of the Vicars Apostolic in the Midland District, their correspondence with the Roman authorities and financial transactions over wills and bequests. Kirk's papers are largely concerned with the controversial issue of the Oath of Allegiance arising out of the Catholic Relief Bills, his lengthy correspondence with the Rev. Jos. Berington, the collection of 'data' about priests, letters about the clergy Funds and correspondence with the egregious Rev. Alex. Geddes on scriptural matters.

The Archives also contain Dodd's original manuscript of his Church History, his collection of material for a biographical dictionary of English Catholics and other papers on theological subjects. Alban Butler's documents on the Martyrs, used by Bp. Challoner for his Memoirs of Missionary Priests is also preserved here.

The early portion of the 19th century papers consists of the controversial issue of the Oath of Allegiance prior to Catholic Emancipation, hence the large amount of correspondence between Bp. Milner and Charles Butler and other members of the Catholic Committee. The 'Veto' question the 'Staffordshire Clergy' controversy are both well-documented. After Bp. Milner's death in 1826, Bp. Walsh appears to have set himself the task of building churches, opening new missions and introducing religious congregations into the Midland District. The building of the new Oscott College (1838), St. Chad's Cathedral, Birmingham (1841), Nottingham Cathedral (1842), St. Mary's, Derby (1839), resulted in much correspondence, especially as Bp Walsh lived at Nottingham while building operations were in progress, thereby causing many letters to and from Bp. Wiseman, his coadjutor.

The latter half of the century shows inevitably from the papers the day to day administration of the diocese and its parishes. However, some are of more than local interest, viz. the division of the country into eight Districts or Vicariates in 1840, the negotiations for the Restoration of the Hierarchy in 1850 (in which the young Bp. Ullathorne was prominently concerned), and the letters and comments of the latter during the sessions of the Vatican Council in 1870. Correspondence from Dr. Newman, Fr. Faber, John, Earl of Shrewsbury, Ambrose Phillipps de Lisle and others, illustrate the rapid strides the Faith was making in the middle of the 19th century.

Education is a prominent feature of correspondence, from the vexed question of University education to the struggle for survival of the Poor Schools.

CALENDARING

Faced with the task of sorting and listing the deposit of papers at Archbishop's House, the first group of workers found themselves in difficulties. The papers were in no reasonable order nor classified; many were damaged, some almost undecipherable and numerous ones were undated. Added to this, many were in Latin, some in French, some in Italian and even a few in Flemish. Consequently, progress was slow, and although various attempts were made at classification, it was decided to list the documents in chronological order. Even this had to be abandoned since time was valuable and all work done was purely voluntary. Therefore, by 1959 the 1st Report or catalogue was produced by the National Register of Archives. Suffice it to say that, though the papers listed are not in chronological order, a separate Index was made later, this consists of names of persons, places and subjects and should make it easier to find a particular document. The 2nd Report followed, covering the same period as the first, i.e. 1600 to 1829, consisting of the papers brought from Oscott College. This is in chronological order, as far as possible. The 3rd Report, printed by the Royal Commission on Historical Manuscripts, lists all papers from 1830 to 1900.

Since then, three issues of 'Addenda' have been compiled, consisting of papers newly found or previously mislaid: a fourth one is now completed but awaits typing for reproduction.

The working method has been as follows:- a) read a document, then list it by a short title or summary, with special attention to date and names of persons and places, b) such listing is done on rough slips, because sometimes a document has to be put aside for further consultation as to a possible date or name,

c) type out lists on foolscap (13" x 8") sheets, numbering each entry consecutively. This gives time and opportunity to check and correct any errors.

This absence of 'classification' may seem a grave disadvantage to the members of the new Catholic Archives Society who have drawn up an excellent scheme for the classification of Diocesan Archives. We can only plead the initial difficulties attendant on our callow efforts in tackling such work for the first time, and the lack of expert guidance in a field alien to most professional archivists.

As it is too late to use the suggested classification, at least for the post-1850 papers, it may be possible to avail ourselves of this method for the post-1900 material — though, in fact, these are already in typescript up to 1911 and 'rough-listed' beyond that year.

PARISH ARCHIVES

The first address given at the First Conference at Oxford on Post-Reformation Catholic History in 1958 was entitled "The Vanishing Archive". This high-lighted the grievous loss and destruction of parish documents that have occurred over the years and it was urged that some means of ensuring the safety of such records should be found. Abp. Grimshaw drew the attention of the clergy to this in an 'ad clerum'. Then, through the efforts of the then County Archivist in Warwick, every parish in the county was visited and an inventory made of the parish archives. Some parishes were likewise visited in Staffs., but little has been done since owing to lack of personnel for this work.

REGISTERS

With the authorisation of the Archbishop, the Registers of the older parishes in Warwickshire, i.e. dating from the 18th century, were brought for safety to the Archives in Birmingham, having been micro-filmed in the County Record Office. Some registers of the same period have been collected in Staffordshire, and a few in Oxfordshire and Worcestershire.

Episcopal Registers we hold include a Confirmation Register starting at 1768; Ordination Registers from 1829, but earlier entries are found in Bp. Milner's Diary with further entries by Bp. Walsh.

LIBRARY

A small but adequate library of reference books is essential for any Diocesan Archives. A set of Catholic Directories is most useful for tracing priests and their sphere of work and their obituaries. We are fortunate in possessing a complete set even going back to 1820. Gillow's Biographical Dictionary of English Catholics (5 vols.), Kirk's Biographies of English Catholics 1700-1800, are still very useful despite the need for correction. FY. Anstruther's Seminary Priests (4 vols.) has now given us an up-to-date and well-researched account of all seminary priests up to 1800. After this date, all Dioceses should compile their own lists of priests gathered from the rolls of the seminaries and colleges they attended. The volumes of the Catholic Record Society are of great help in many ways for checking information — we have a complete set at Birmingham. The standard lives of Cardinals Wiseman, Newman, Manning, Vaughan and Boume, of Bp. Challoner and Abp. Ullathorne can prove useful for reference, especially for items of church government in the 19th and early 20th centuries.

Parishes should make it a duty to send in to the Diocesan Archives any history of the parish that has been written, also any brochure or booklet issued at the opening of a church or school or the occasion of a parish's jubilee.

RESEARCHERS

As the Diocesan Archivist is a parish-priest, he can devote only one day per week to the work of the Archives—Wednesday, 10.30 a.m. till 6 p.m. Visitors are welcome to consult the papers, giving adequate notice. But it is important to consult our catalogues beforehand, noting the reference numbers of the documents to be seen and sending such a list before their arrival. This saves much time and labour at the time of the visit, and enables the papers to be ready for perusal. Copies of our catalogues can be found at the British Museum (Library), Bodleian Library, Oxford, Historical Manuscripts Commission, Westminster Diocesan Archives, Downside Abbey, Ushaw College, Leeds Diocesan Archives, Oscott College, and the County Record Offices in Stafford, Worcester and Warwick.

Enquiries can be dealt with by post, providing a s.a.e. is enclosed and the search does not entail more than ½ an hour. Protracted searches delay the normal work in the Archives and are best done by a personal visit.

THE ARCHIVES OF THE PARISH OF ST. CUTHBERT, DURHAM CITY.

The Rev. John M. Tweedy

OUTLINE HISTORY

The nominal date for the foundation of the parish is 1685, although this may only be because circumstances clearly allowed the existence of a public chapel; no other specific event in that year has yet been found to explain the choice of date. The Recusant Roll of 1624 is the earliest indication of a substantial number of Catholics in the city: of the 1,112 persons convicted in the county, 129 lived in the city. Fifty men of the city refused the Protestation in 1642, indicating an adult population of about the same size. The Catholic population seems to have dropped during the interregnum but rose rapidly again after the Restoration, reaching about 300, including children, by the turn of the century. Nearly half this number were concentrated in one district of the city, Elvet, which became known as "popish Elvet;" this was also the fashionable part of the city and many houses were occupied by Catholic gentry fleeing the loneliness of their country houses.

Secular and Jesuit priests are known to have been working in the city and three distinct missions emerged; one Jesuit and two secular, one of which was in Gilesgate based on the Maire family chaplaincy and the other in Elvet. The Jesuit one was soon also established in Elvet. The Catholic population reached a peak about the time of the 1767 Return, when 420 Catholics were reported; after that it declined somewhat, for reasons which, I think, were economic not religious; no manufacturing had been established in the city and many were leaving to seek work elsewhere. It looks as if many of the Catholics who left Durham went to Sunderland, for the Catholic population there rose as Durham's declined. The mission in Sunderland had been lacking a resident priest since a riot destroyed the chapel in 1745 and was looked after by the priest from the Gilesgate mission; he wisely went to live in Sunderland in 1769, closing his chapel in Durham.

Irish immigrants did not come to the north-east of England in any number until 1848, but the number of Catholics in Durham city was increasing rapidly long before that date; by 1824 it had outgrown the two existing chapels so a new church, the present St. Cuthbert's was built and the two old chapels closed.

The first wave of Irish immigrants arrived in the years 1848-53 and many new parishes were started in the surrounding area. St. Cuthbert's itself was split into four in 1868-69: a second parish, St. Godric's, was founded in the city, another at Sacriston three miles to the north and another at Brandon (now Langley Moor) to the west. The city was surrounded by coal mines — some 78 pits were sunk within five miles of St. Cuthbert's — but it had become a backwater as far as the general industrial development of the county was concerned; the parish life by the end of the century reflects this situation. The Irish seem to have used the city as a staging post; staying a few weeks or months before moving on to the main industrial centres, in particular attracted to the large iron works at Consett.

EARLY RECORDS

Most of our information about the parish before the middle of the 18th century comes, naturally, from government or Anglican church sources. The earliest surviving parish records are the registers of two Jesuit sodalities: that of the Immaculate Conception, started in 1702 with entries continuing until 1739, and that of the Bona Mors, started in 1706. The entries in the register of the latter do not continue after 1770, but apparently the sodality itself continued to function until well into the 19th century. The lists of names in these registers do illuminate one interesting point; they include many members of the congregation of the secular chapels, one secular priest of the area and most probably a secular priest from Durham itself. One may conclude that relations between the two missions, which were in the same street and only about two hundred yards apart were amicable.

A baptismal register was started at the Gilesgate mission in 1739 and at the Jesuit one in 1768; the copies of these which were made before the originals were surrendered to Somerset House in 1840 are in the archives, though I think that of the first, which gives only the names of those baptised, also includes baptisms at both secular chapels. This has to be confirmed by comparing with the micro-film copies of the original which are available at the Durham County Record Office.

A "Miscellaneous Book" contains lists of those confirmed on 9 July 1745 (before the Rebellion!) by Bishop Dicconson, on 8th and 9th June 1752 and 9 May 1757 by Bishop Petre, plus another rather obscure list which may be confirmations by Bishop Smith in 1750/1. There is also in existence an 18th century obit book, which somehow found its way into the Leeds diocesan archives but is now safe in the vast collection of Fr. W.V. Smith; this has only limited value as only the day and month are given for many names and when the year also is given it does not always correspond with the date of burial given in local Anglican church registers.

THE 19th CENTURY REGISTERS

It is with the nineteenth century that the parish records start to become really useful and may well be unique. The baptismal registers from 1800 both include the names of the parents and of the priest. Entries of conditional baptisms, i.e. converts, commence in 1826 there are only 17 entries in the first eleven years, then they become much more numerous. The church was registered for marriages as soon as this was possible and we have the 1837 certificate; the first marriages were recorded in a small book, which also includes a copy of the report to the bishop of 1839 made by the priest, William Fletcher, but from 1841–55 they are in a proper register which shows the place of residence of the parents of the couple; this enables one to see not only which were recent immigrants, but also to determine how many immigrants married natives.

CENSUS BOOKS

Repeated censuses of the parish were taken to keep track of the rapidly changing Catholic population and the books in which three of these were recorded have survived. The first is dated 20 September 1854; it gives the names and ages of the children and the streets the families were living in, but does not always make clear the distinction between married couples and adult syblings living together; it includes the names of many single men and women. The second is undated but comparison with the baptismal register enables one to ascribe it with confidence to September 1858; this also gives the sacramental status of each person, showing the reception of first confession, first communion, confirmation and Easter communion, and indicates when a spouse was Protestant. The third, of September 1861, gives all ages and the sacramental status, but does not distinguish between the Catholic parents in mixed marriages and the widowed. The completeness of the recording of sacramental status varies, mainly according to the district; the poorer districts, mainly occupied by immigrants, are the most incomplete in this regard.

EASTER. COMMUNICANTS

Two books contain the names of all the Easter Communicants from 1824 to 1860; the totals rise from about 170 to 1,000 ! An analysis of the actual names enables one to determine something about the sacramental practice of recent immigrants. The parish statistics, combined with those of the rest of the diocese and the national censuses of 1841, 1851 and 1861, enable one to form a very clear picture of the arrival and subsequent movements of the immigrants.¹

NOTICE BOOKS AND SCHOOL LOG BOOKS

Another probably unique feature of the archives is the possession of all the notice books from 1857 to the present day, with the unfortunate exception of those covering most of the period of World War I. In these one can see something of the impact of the Irish, the pastoral methods used to cope with the new situation and the general pattern of parish activities. They also tell us quite a lot about the personalities of the various parish priests! The school log books cover from 1865 until recent times, providing a good picture of the difficulties of running a charity school in the late 19th century.

LIBRARY AND MUSIC

The parish ran a lending library from some time in the 18th century until well into the 20th; many of these books, together with books which were the personal property of successive priests, have survived to form a substantial collection. They have been sorted and catalogued; those of which Ushaw College did not already possess a copy have been deposited in a separate section of the library there, the remainder are together in the Presbytery. The collection includes early editions of the Douai-Rheims Bible, a very few 16th century books, many from the two subsequent centuries.

The church first obtained an organ in 1841 and ran a flourishing and enterprising choir for many years. No one ever seems to have thrown anything away, so there is a cupboard in the choir loft containing a remarkable collection of music, some of it printed, some in manuscript with separate little books for the four lines. The writer has made a rough survey; a more careful one would show clearly the changing musical taste throughout the 19th century as sufficient of the music is dated.

Finally, if anyone should suggest that this material should be used to produce a parish history, let them be assured that the work is well under way.

THE LISBON COLLECTION AT USHAW¹

The Rev. M. Sharratt

In August 1628 two priests and ten students set out for Lisbon from the English College at Douai. They were the founder-members of the English College at Lisbon. The last of their successors left the College of Saints Peter and Paul in Lisbon to complete their training elsewhere; that was in 1971. In 1973, when it was clear that the College had closed definitively, the President, Monsignor James Sullivan, began to make arrangements to preserve in England some permanent record of the College's life during the three and a half centuries in which it had trained priests for work in England and Wales. The result was the transfer to Ushaw of the College's archives, along with a selection of books from the College's libraries and a number of portraits and other objects associated with the history of the College. This collection (known as the Lisbon Collection) is housed in the Big Library Wing at Ushaw in a former classroom now called the Lisbon Room.

The purpose of this article is to give a brief description of the Lisbon Collection, so that scholars will have some idea of what they may hope to find in it. Although it will be some years before an adequate catalogue of the archives is completed, even the uncatalogued papers are available for consultation in rough groupings, while a provisional card-catalogue of the earlier papers and correspondence is being added to steadily. The books are now catalogued in a short-title catalogue of authors.

There are about 1,900 printed books in the Collection. They were selected from the College's libraries to illustrate the life and work of the College, the interests and activities of its members, and their connections with their host country. It should be said at once that most of the books are in poor condition, since they have been ravaged by worm. In fact, despite all precautions, live worm was discovered to have survived the journey to Ushaw, and the whole Collection had to be fumigated in 1975. On the other hand, about one hundred books have already been repaired and more will be repaired as time goes on. Next year two or three hundred badly wormed books will be released from 'quarantine' and, if found to be free from worm, will be replaced in the Lisbon Room so that each book in the Collection can be given its definitive location.

Many of the books are connected with the teaching and spiritual training provided by the College. Others are concerned with the Church in England and with controversial theology, including several works by the controversialist John Sergeant, himself a Lisbonian. A large number deal with the history of Portugal, especially the history of the Church in Portugal, and with the Anglo-Portuguese relationships. A number of books are there because of their association with the

the College, for instance, because they were written by Lisbonians or were given by the author. Altogether it makes a useful little collection, although it is known that in the past many books had to be destroyed because of damage by worm, so it is only too likely that many of the College's acquisitions in its earliest days have disappeared long ago.

Among the portraits are those of Joseph Harvey or Haynes (the first President), Bishop Russell of Portalegre and Vizeu, and John Sergeant. The splendid silver sanctuary lamp from the College Chapel hangs in the centre of the Lisbon Room, and on the east wall is the magnificent ivory crucifix from the High Altar. The College sundial (by Thomas Wright, 1732) and an orrery (at present away for restoration) are reminders of the College's interest in science in the eighteenth century, while a small display case includes (among other objects) four seventeenth-century azulejos, the blue and white tiles which are such a pleasing feature of Portuguese interior decoration.

The main interest of the Collection lies, of course, in the archives. Here no selection was made: the complete surviving archives are at Ushaw (with the exception of some stubs from cheque books). This is not to say that all the College's archives have survived. It is only too clear that there are regrettable gaps — tradition has it that the archives suffered badly when the College was occupied in the Peninsular War. In this preliminary survey I shall deal with the archives in two sections: book archives and sheet archives.

There are over two hundred and fifty items in the book archives. Most important is the Annates, or register of staff and students from the very beginning of the College. This was used by Gillow in his Register (Appendix I to Croft's Historical Account of Lisbon College) and by Anstruther in The Seminary Priests, but it contains information not used by either; despite its patchiness it is a very useful record. It can be supplemented by other official records, such as the Liber Missionis, the Juramenta Praesidum and Juramenta Alumnorum, the Regimina (a book of instructions for office-holders) and the minutes of meetings of superiors (the earliest being from the eighteenth century), while things that the annalist fails to record sometimes turn up as jottings in account books or in private note books. These official records, when used with the long series of account books, will eventually provide a fairly full, though summary, account of most of the members of the College, at least for the period which they spent in the College.

The printed Constitutiones have survived in their various drafts and versions (1635, 1819, 1865). The original version was drafted by the second President, the famous or notorious Thomas Blacklow, and will repay detailed study. (Unfortunately, apart from the occasional signature, nothing else by Blacklow has been discovered so far in the archives).

The Protector of the College was the Inquisitor General of Portugal. The written records of his various visitations are sure to contain useful items of information. One can, moreover, reconstruct the framework of life in the College in astonishing detail, since the Regimina of 1639 sets out to provide just that. Here one finds pretty well everything one has always wanted to know about meals, clothes, teaching, disputations, examinations, recreation, the infirmary, funerals, the sacristy, Church services, sermons, refectory reading, libraries, rewards and punishments and a few more things as well.

Nearly all the items mentioned so far go back to the very early days of the College. It is a great pity that dictated lecture notes (dictates) from the same period have not survived. The dictates are nearly all from the eighteenth century, so there can be no great hope of discovering from the Lisbon Collection just what was taught in philosophy and theology during the seventeenth century. Among the dictates which have survived is John Preston's course on Physics given in 1752: it bears out what was already known, namely that his course was Newtonian, though fragments of another course show that, at least at one time, he was not a Newtonian in astronomy. There is also a set of Douai dictates in theology (1698–1704), some of which are duplicates of ones already at Ushaw: the duplication shows that the dictated notes are a faithful record of what was said in lectures. (A handlist of the sixty volumes of Douai dictates at Ushaw is in preparation; it will include those in the Lisbon Collection).

A substantial proportion of the book archives consists of account books which cover the day to day expenses of the College and its income from various sources. There are also letter-books of Presidents from the early eighteenth century onwards, though the bulk of the extant correspondence is in the sheet archives and consists of letters to the presidents.

The sheet archives are as yet only partly explored. There is indeed a catalogue which was completed in 1852. This is of great assistance in that it puts the papers into natural groupings. Much of this work was done by James Barnard, who was President from 1777 until 1782. Since no one is likely to acquire his knowledge of the College's properties and rights without enormous research, it is of immense help to be able to rely on his sorting of the great mass of legal papers. But a more detailed catalogue is needed of the rest of the papers.

For the correspondence a simple chronological sequence has been adopted: a summary of each letter is included on a card. This arrangement works well for the bulk of the correspondence, since most of the letters are ones written to the President about College business. But it has occasionally proved useful to make a separate classification for a collection of letters. Thus thirty letters written by the Founder, Dom Pedro Coutinho, are grouped together: these, by the way, have yet to be deciphered. Likewise about one hundred and fifty letters written between 1667 and 1683 by Bishop Russell to the President have been kept together. Apart from these two collections there is not much correspondence from the seventeenth century, though one or two very important letters from the years just before and just after the opening of the College have fortunately been preserved. With the eighteenth century there is no shortage of letters (or letter-books to give the College's side of the correspondence). The provisional card-catalogue of the presidents' correspondence has now reached 1770. As one would expect, the letters provide a great amount of detailed information about College life that would otherwise be unknown. There is also a fair scattering of letters written by prominent members of the English Secular Clergy.

One important group of papers is that belonging to Bishop Russell when he was in the Portuguese diplomatic service at the time of Catherine of Braganza's wedding with Charles II and for a few years afterwards. There are over fifty of these diplomatic papers and all have been catalogued.

Other classifications employed are worth mentioning as they will serve as a summary of the documentation to be found in the archives: papers connected with the foundation of the College; Roman ecclesiastical documents (e.g. dispensations); non-Roman ecclesiastical documents (e.g. confessional faculties); ordination certificates; letters patent (e.g. appointing presidents); rules and constitutions of the College; certificates of reconciliation to the Catholic Church; and papers connected with the Bridgettine nuns in Lisbon.

Of the remaining papers some are connected with teaching in the College but disappointingly few theses sheets or posters have survived. This is curious when one considers the importance attached by the College to the public defence of theses. (By way of comparison: Ushaw alone has many more Douai theses sheets or posters than the Lisbon Collection has from Lisbon).

There is a large collection of sermons from the eighteenth century onwards. These are being catalogued by the author and date. Those examined so far are mostly sermons given by the President or another of the staff to the College. As regards the legal papers, little is likely to be added to Barnard's summary descriptions, while a large collection of business papers belonging to families connected with the College will come at the end of the queue for cataloguing.

I hope that this brief and impressionistic survey will be sufficient to give a fair idea of what the Lisbon Collection contains. Anyone who wishes to make use of the Collection is asked to write to The Librarian, Ushaw College, Durham DH7 9RH. The Collection is already beginning to be used — for several articles have appeared in recent numbers of the Ushaw Magazine and it seems reasonable to hope that now that it is more accessible to scholars in Britain more work will be done on the history of the College than was ever possible in Lisbon. This will be some consolation to Lisbonians (who have generously made over funds at their disposal to support the Collection), and will fulfil the hopes of the College's last President: that there should be a permanent record of the College's work and that its achievements through three and a half centuries should become better known.

SCHEME OF CLASSIFICATION FOR ARCHIVES OF RELIGIOUS ORDERS

This outline scheme has been prepared by a Working Party¹ on the Archives of Religious Orders appointed at the first Catholic Archives conference at Spode House in July 1978. It is published simply as an aid to archivists in the initial identification of archives and archive material and not as a blueprint for their arrangement. This will be determined largely by factors individual to each order, congregation or other institution, such as its original foundation and rule, its spiritual, missionary and vocational work, and its structure and national and international organisation.

- XVI. MATERIAL NOT DIRECTLY RELATED TO THE PROVINCE

NOTE

1. The scheme was drafted by Fr. Bede Bailey, O.P. and Fr. Placid Spearrit, O.S.B., convenors of the Working Party, in consultation with archivists of other religious orders.

SCHEME OF CLASSIFICATION FOR DIOCESAN ARCHIVES

This outline scheme has been prepared by a Working Party¹ on Diocesan Archives appointed at the first Catholic Archives conference at Spode House in July 1978. It is an attempt to identify all diocesan records created after 1850 which are already recognised as Historic archives and also those which are of long term value for administrative or historical purposes.

Regarding records dating before 1850, although it is presumed that any survey of diocesan records would reveal the identity of early documents it is thought likely that these would have been known about already and be preserved in appropriate places. In character, the pre-1850 records are essentially the personal papers of the vicars apostolic and all that would possibly be needed would be to collate existing information about their character and whereabouts.

Even after 1850, it is possible that for several decades the records of many dioceses would consist very largely of the personal papers of the bishop and the principal diocesan officials. However, the Working Party considered it likely that in the course of time the government of populous and extensive dioceses would require the establishment of diocesan administrations broadly speaking similar in character and practice. The scheme was originally based partly on the nature of the surviving archives of a few dioceses and partly upon evidence, for, and presumptions concerning, the creation of certain records, even though few examples of such records had been found.

The Working Party hoped that the final scheme might provide a framework for a survey of diocesan records throughout England and Wales and might encourage the adoption of common procedures so as to ensure that all post-1850 archives and records of long term value would be dealt with uniformly for the mutual benefit of administrators and historians. However, while this remains a desirable objective, the experience of revising the first draft scheme six times, following discussions with various diocesan officials and archivists, has convinced the Working Party that no single scheme could accommodate the differences of administration and record keeping practice from one diocese to another. This latest draft is therefore published primarily as an aid to officials and archivists in identifying diocesan archives and not as a blueprint for their arrangement.

The scheme also includes records which do not arise from the diocesan administration but which, because they are territorially related to each diocese, may be comprehended in any survey of diocesan archives.

The post-1850 diocesan archives are roughly classified under the following main groups:

SCHEME OF CLASSIFICATION FOR DIOCESAN ARCHIVES

- A. THE BISHOP AND DIOCESE IN RELATION TO ROME AND THE ENGLISH HIERARCHY
- B. THE BISHOP AND DIOCESAN CLERGY
- C. DIOCESAN ADMINISTRATION

RELATED RECORDS

- D. CLERGY FUNDS
- E. THE CHAPTER
- F. DIOCESAN SOCIETIES
- G. PARISH RECORDS

A. THE BISHOP AND DIOCESE IN RELATION TO ROME AND THE ENGLISH HIERARCHY

- A1. Papal bulls, papal chancery or other documents received directly or indirectly from Rome, including appointments of bishops if not kept by the Chapter. Certain papal documents, e.g. marriage dispensations, encyclicals, may be among other classes of diocesan records.
- A2. Minutes, agendas, etc. of annual (Low Week) meetings of hierarchy and of any other meetings of bishops.
- A3. Papers of committees, commissions, etc., of the hierarchy, especially if the bishop a principal member, e.g. chairman or secretary.
- A4. Reports to Rome on the state of the diocese prepared for the bishop's quinquennial ad limina visits.
- A5. Personal papers of the bishop. Possibly the most important class in this section because of the personal character of the bishop's work and diocesan administration. Correspondence (copy letters out and letters received) may survive for many bishops and these, together with other papers, have been sorted and arranged, chronologically or otherwise, in certain dioceses.
- A6. Bishop's correspondence and other papers relating to civic authorities or government bodies.

THE BISHOP AND THE DIOCESAN CLERGY

- B1. Clergy lists and records of appointments, etc. The form in which these may have been kept may vary from index cards to registers. Lists of deceased clergy also.
- B2. Clergy ordinations and records thereof. A liber ordinatorum may be kept, and duplicates or 'stubs' of ordination certificates may survive.
- B3. Ad clerum letters.
- B4. Pastoral letters, for example a) Lenten pastoral; b) circular letter re Ecclesiastical Training Fund; and c) Advent letter re Diocesan Rescue Society. In one diocese the ad clerum and pastoral letters, together with papal encyclicals, letters apostolic, etc. are bound into volumes.
- B5. Status animarum records. Dioceses may have had different practices in collecting parochial statistics. Possibly yearly returns giving: a) details of baptisms, marriages, confirmations, etc; b) statement of parochial accounts; c) numbers of Easter communicants and Mass attendance in Lent. These have been replaced in recent years by a standard form sent to the Catholic Education Council for processing, but finance not included.
- B6. Diocesan synods. Held infrequently but nevertheless occasionally so that some records may survive. Presumed to have been held to establish or renew clergy rules and diocesan 'standing orders.'
- B7. Deanery conferences. Possibly five or six meetings of clergy in each deanery held yearly. Printed agendas and minutes may survive, and quarterly 'reports' on the theological, liturgical or other subject discussed.
- B8. Meetings of diocesan clergy. Doubtful if any annual or regular meetings of all the clergy in a diocese were held, but minutes of the Senate or Council of Priests (post-Vatican II) could be considered under this heading. (Records of clergy meeting as members of historic clergy funds, should be described under section D).
- B9. Visitation records. Visitations were generally held every three or four years and records, if only in the form of a pre-Visitation circular, may survive, and possibly detailed records for special visitations. Records of numbers confirmed may survive but diocesan confirmation 'registers' are unlikely to exist, the names of persons confirmed being recorded in parochial confirmation registers.
- B10. Correspondence and papers concerning individual parishes. Several dioceses have a parish files series.
- B11. Correspondence and papers concerning religious orders and congregations, etc., within the diocese, if not kept in a parish files series.

DIOCESAN ADMINISTRATION²

- C1. Deeds of property. May be kept by diocesan solicitors.
- C2. Records of Diocesan Finance Commission or Committee, e.g.
 - a) Committee minutes;
 - b) Account books, statements;
 - c) Treasurer's papers, correspondence, etc;
 - d) Parochial accounts.
- C3. Parish boundary documents.
- C4. Diocesan litigation. Papers kept by diocesan solicitors or among bishop's papers.
- C5. Records of Chancellor and Chancery.²
- C6. Marriage Tribunal records. Probably an extensive series.
- C7. Diocesan Schools Commission records. Again probably extensive records which may include;
 - a) Education Committee minutes, c. 1870–1902;
 - b) Diocesan Education Commission minutes, and papers concerning relations with local authorities and the Education Department;
 - c) reports of Diocesan Inspectors of Schools;
 - d) records of Secondary Schools;
 - e) papers re parish schools, possibly individual files of each school;
 - f) papers concerning relations with teachers' professional bodies, parent/teachers associations (especially following the 1944 Act and the re-organisation of schools within recent years).
- C8. Other Diocesan Commissions or Committees, e.g:
 - a) Social welfare (Rescue Society, etc.);
 - b) Vocations;
 - c) Missions;
 - d) Liturgy.
- C9. Church building. An artificial category which might include, for instance, architects' plans and drawings for churches, correspondence between the bishop and priest concerning new churches, alterations, etc., and possibly photographs.
- C10. Photographs. The number of miscellaneous photographs found may require a separate section.

E. THE CHAPTER

F. DIOCESAN SOCIETIES

In as much as few of the traditional diocesan societies required more than the bishop's patronage, it is thought unlikely that any actual records of diocesan societies, except perhaps of long defunct bodies, would be found among diocesan archives. Nevertheless, any society having the bishop as its patron or one in which the bishop may have had a particular interest would possibly have sent him its annual report or accounts, and these may be found among diocesan records. (The identity of diocesan societies and their period of activity may be found from information in old diocesan year books).

G. PARISH RECORDS

Few parish records are likely to be found among the diocesan records but, insofar as the Bishop may have issued directions from time to time about their safe keeping and may have inspected registers and other records at visitations, it is possible that information about parish records may be found among diocesan records.

However, the identification and possible surveying of parish records is essentially a distinct task to that of surveying diocesan records, to which this draft classification relates. The main classes of parish records are:-

1. Registers — baptisms, marriages, confirmations, burials.
2. Church minutes and accounts.
3. School records, especially managers' minutes, also logbooks.
4. Records relating to the upkeep of the church and parish matters.
5. Notice books
6. Copies of returns to the Bishop, and elsewhere, and correspondence.

NOTES

1. The original members of the Working Party were Miss J. Close (Bristol), Miss E. Poyser (Westminster), Mgr. G. Bradley (Leeds), Fr. J.D. McEvilly (Birmingham) and Mr. R.M. Card (Newcastle), convenor and correspondent. The working party continues and has been augmented by Miss A.J.E. Arrowsmith, Fr. M. Dilworth, O.S.B. (Scotland), Fr. A. P. Dolan and Mrs. L. Loewenthal (Nottingham).
2. Technically speaking, the chancellor is the official responsible for diocesan records and, as chief administrator of the diocese after the Bishop, he is most concerned in practice in their creation and keeping.

THE CATHOLIC ARCHIVES SOCIETY CONFERENCE, 1980

The first annual conference of the Society, formed in March 1979, was held at Spode House from 18–20 April, and was attended by 45 members and observers. As on the two previous meetings, the programme afforded opportunities for learning about professional archive practices, for discussing problems met by fellow religious archivists, for descriptions of specific archives, for reports on work in progress and, since this was the first formal AGM, the adoption of a constitution.

On Friday evening, 18 April, Fr. Bede Bailey OP (Vice-Chairman) described the archives of the English Province of the Dominican Order and his particular concern to collect the papers of individual members of the Order. The following morning, 19 April, Miss A.J.E. Arrowsmith, County Archivist of Berkshire, spoke on practical aspects of archive keeping and indicated how certain principles stated by Dr. L.A. Parker in a similar talk at the 1979 meeting should be applied in practice. Even though religious archivists may have only limited resources, it was important that they should be aware of the accepted standards of record keeping.

The AGM was held in the afternoon, 19 April, when a policy statement setting out the aims of the Society and a constitution were both adopted, and the officers and Council were elected. This was followed by progress reports by the working parties on the archives of religious orders and dioceses respectively. Outline classification schemes had been drafted in each case. Work on the diocesan archives of Nottingham, Clifton and Westminster was reported by Fr. A. Dolan, Miss J. Close and Miss E. Poyser, Fr. M. Dilworth OSB spoke about Scottish Catholic archives, Fr. L. Leyden referred to the Irish Society for Archives, Fr. E. Lanning reported on Salvatorian archives, while Sr. Angela Gallagher, Sr. Marguerite Greene and Sr. Grace Hammond were among others who commented on work in their respective congregations. On Saturday evening, Dr. David Rogers, Bodleian Library, gave a masterly review of the history and traditions of record keeping within the Church from the earliest centuries to post-Vatican II.

In the final session, on Sunday morning, 20 April, Dr. L.A. Parker (Chairman) invited members of the Council to describe their work and ideas for the Society. Fr. F. Edwards SJ justified the formation of 'yet another Society' and referred to the potential isolation of the archivist and the need to share information and advice. He pleaded also for strict historical impartiality, openness of access, and he hoped that archivists of other Churches would join the Society. Mr. R. Gard (Hon. Editor) outlined a prospectus for the proposed periodical Catholic Archives, and mentioned the Newsletter, information sheets and a directory as means of keeping members in touch. Miss Close and Fr. Lanning suggested a list of religious archivists, notes on their holdings, the places where these were kept, and details of access, and Miss E. Poyser volunteered to compile such a directory. It was arranged to hold the 1981 Conference at Spode from 28–30 April.

When the Society decided in 1980 to publish a yearly periodical it had barely fifty members so that the first issue which appeared in April 1981 was inevitably a trial one — indeed that it was published at all was due to faith, hope and charity. Happily, its reception and circulation justify its continued publication on a regular yearly basis.

Catholic Archives is devoted mainly to the description of the archives of religious orders, congregations and other foundations, dioceses, parishes, families and individual persons, and other documentary sources in the United Kingdom and Eire. Its long term objective is to record the character, content, arrangement, accessibility and use of these archives for the benefit of all who are concerned for their care and scholarly use.

The Society, which itself was founded only in 1979 to promote the care of Catholic archives (its objectives are stated more fully on the inside of the end cover), is very much a self-help body and it is hoped that the articles by religious archivists describing the collection, arrangement, listing and indexing of the archives in their charge will assist others faced with similar problems.

However, Catholic Archives, also seeks, by describing particularly the content, accessibility and use of Catholic archives, to introduce institutions and scholars to a perhaps hitherto unrealised wealth of historical evidence for the study of the history of the Church in the spiritual, administrative, missionary, social and other aspects of its life and influence.

The periodical cannot possibly succeed without the generous support of the distinguished scholars and archivists who contribute articles on their archives. In this issue the Society is grateful to the Very Rev. Mgr George Bradley, Archivist of Leeds Diocese, Dame Eanswythe Edwards, O.S.B., Archivist of Stanbrook Abbey, Sister Mary Clare Holland, F.C.J., Archivist of the Sisters, Faithful Companions of Jesus, Fr Edmund Lanning, S.D.S., Archivist of the English Province of the Salvatorian Fathers, Fr William Mol, M.H.M., Archivist of the Mill Hill Missionaries, and, not least, to Fr Francis Edwards, S.J., Vice-Chairman of the Society, Archivist of the English Province of the Society of Jesus.

All Catholic archivists, particularly those working in isolation and under difficulties, will have been greatly heartened by the Pontifical message addressed to Cardinal Samore on his assuming his duties as Librarian and Archivist of the Holy Roman Church in November 1979, and it is printed here for easy reference. Likewise, the Society has been encouraged by the establishment of links with associations of Catholic archivists in France, Ireland and the United States, reports from each being included in this issue.

THE ARCHIVES OF STANBROOK ABBEY: GATHERING UP THE THREADS

Dame Eanswythe Edwards, O.S.B.

To know that a religious community of today has a continuous history since 1623 is to expect that it must possess very full and historically interesting archives. In the case of the Stanbrook Archives, this expectation is only partially fulfilled. The purpose of this article is to explain why this is, and to give a general idea of what they do in fact contain. However, before they can be described, it will be as well to give a brief sketch of our history. This will explain how much has been lost, but also how, bit by bit, various threads have been picked up over the years, so that continuity can still be traced back to the beginnings.

Our Community was founded in Cambrai by the monks of the English Benedictine Congregation, for their fellow-countrywomen, who could no longer become nuns in their own country owing to the dissolution of the monasteries. On 1 January 1625, which we reckon as our foundation day, the nine foundress members were professed, having received the habit on 31 December 1623 from the hands of the Archbishop, Francis Vanderburgh. This Prelate had welcomed them very kindly into his diocese, placing them under the immediate jurisdiction of the English monks, and exempting them entirely from his own.

Of the nine foundresses, the most noteworthy, and the one whose dower in fact made the foundation possible, was Helen More, (who became Dame Gertrude), great-great-granddaughter of St Thomas More. The nine were joined by three professed nuns from the Brussels Community, which had been founded in 1597. These came at the request of Dom Rudesind Barlow, then President General of the English Congregation, to instruct and train the postulants in the monastic life. One of them, Dame Frances Gawen, was named Abbess, but in 1629 the Community elected one of their own number, Dame Catherine Gascoigne, to be Abbess.

In order to help the nuns in their life of prayer, Dom Rudesind Barlow sent to them Dom Augustine Baker to be their spiritual guide. It was while he was at Cambrai, 1624- 1633, that Fr Baker wrote the greater number of his spiritual treatises, which were originally conferences for their instruction, to lead them in the paths of contemplative prayer.

The Community increased, and lived peacefully at Cambrai until the French Revolution, when, on 18 October 1793, they were driven from their monastery at less than half-an-hour's notice, and imprisoned at Compiègne, where they were later joined by the sixteen Carmelite nuns who were martyred at Paris on 16 July 1794. While in prison, four of the Benedictine nuns died of hardship, and also the President of the English Congregation, D. Augustine Walker, who had accompanied them as their chaplain.

In 1795, nine months after the fall of Robespierre, they managed to obtain passports to return, now only 17 in number, to England. They had no secular clothes, and the governor of the prison, fearing lest he should get into trouble if they were seen in their religious habit, gave them those left behind in prison by the Carmelite Martyrs. Having lost house, money, and everything they possessed, they settled for a while at Woolton, near Liverpool. To give them a means of livelihood, one of the monks, Dom Bede Brewer, handed over to them a small school he ran there.

The house at Woolton, however, was not at all suitable for the monastic observance which the nuns longed to recover, so in 1807 they moved to Salford Hall, near Evesham. This manor was kindly lent to them rent-free by Mrs Stanford, the owner, but it could not become their permanent home as the estate was entailed. Accordingly they moved once more, this time, in 1838, to Stanbrook, near Worcester, where they have been ever since.

Here, owing to the devoted efforts of D. Laurence Shepherd, their chaplain, and Lady Gertrude Dubois, their Abbess, the Community was once more raised to a high level of monastic observance. A new church was built in 1871, and the first wing of the monastery, including the parlours which enabled the re-establishment of strict monastic enclosure, in 1880. Fr Laurence was much influenced by the great restorer of Benedictine life in France, D. Prosper Gueranger, Abbot of Solesmes, whom he visited yearly. Since the Cambrai Constitutions were found unsatisfactory for those times, D. Laurence obtained permission in 1869 to introduce, for a trial period, the Constitutions which the Abbot had just completed for his newly-founded monastery of Benedictine nuns at Ste Cecile, Solesmes. With a few modifications, these continued to regulate the observance of the Community until the renewal required by Vatican II. Owing to the zeal of Fr Laurence, the standard of studies was greatly raised. He himself taught the nuns Latin, and Plain Chant, and gave them regular conferences on Scripture, and the Fathers. He also inaugurated the Printing Press, in 1867.¹

The good work begun by Fr Laurence and Lady Gertrude was consolidated by her successors, D. Caecilia Heywood (Abbess 1897—1931), and D. Laurentia McLachlan (Abbess 1931-1953). The latter was herself an authority on Gregorian Plain Chant.

That suffices to set our present archives in their context. The summary expulsion from our Cambrai house made it impossible for our nuns to bring any of their records with them to England. Dame Anne Teresa Partington wrote an eye-witness account of those last days at Cambrai.

On Sunday, October 13th, 1793, the District sent four of their creatures to fix the public Seal on the papers, and effects belonging to the nuns.

They arrived at about halfpast eight at night, and then, all the nuns being assembled, one of the men who seemed the most cruel of the Company read a very long paper the purport of which was that all the Effects belonging to the Nuns were confiscated to the Nation . . . They then proceeded to fix the seals on all the Books, papers etc. belonging to the Lady Abbess and Dame Procuratrix Dame A. T. Partington, threatening them all the while how severely they should be punished in case they concealed the smallest article of their property. They were told they were now prisoners. They went out of the monastery about Eleven o'clock to put the public seals on everything in the outward buildings and apartments. From that time they were strictly guarded, until Friday, 18 October, when a body of light horse guards surrounded the street door, and entered the Convent with a crowd of blackguards at their heels. A very brutal Man sent by the District of Cambray was at their head . . . he gave orders that the nuns should be totally out of their house in half a quarter of an hour and that they should take neither Trunk nor Box with them. He only allowed each one of them a small bundle. . . . At this afflicting moment the future want of every necessity found no place in their minds - they were stupified with grief. The Procuratrix, however, petitioned to carry off a small Book where was written a few memorandums very useful to her, but the Ill natured Man to whom she addressed herself wrested the Book from her hands, telling her at the same moment to fetch Brandy for the Hussars, which she instantly was obliged to do, while the barbarous man was running about the house with a club in his hand ready to make anyone feel the weight of it who did not make haste to be gone.

That makes it clear enough how our Cambrai archives were lost. When we eventually managed to get to England, we were evidently so busy just surviving, and, at first, hoping to get back to Cambrai, that we never thought of preserving records until 1875, when Lady Gertrude Dubois began putting into order various old papers which had been thrust, pele-mele, into a drawer by former Abbesses. She realised their value, and was inspired by them to make further investigations about our early records, and also to appoint an official Archivist, Dame Benedict Anstey. Together they did a wonderful work of salvage and reconstruction, and laid the foundations of our present archives.

At the-time of our expulsion from Cambrai in 1793, the contents of our archives were transferred to the public library and archives of that city. At a later date, some of these were carried to the Archives Centrales of Lille.² About the year 1867, Lady Gertrude Dubois had several of these documents copied.

From this time onwards, various good friends copied for us many items in the archives and libraries at Cambrai and Lille. Some of these have since been destroyed in one or other of the two world wars. For instance, in 1909, Dom Benedict Weld-Blundell obtained for us a photo-copy of the ground-plan for our house at Cambrai, dated 1630. The original no longer exists so we value the copy the more. Most of the material acquired by these kind friends was incorporated into the account of our Abbey at Cambrai, 1623—1793, in C.R.S. vol. XIII, pub. 1913. The documents were at that time carefully verified and edited by Mr Joseph Gillow, and there they can be read today by all.

The other source of information on our early history is Dom Bennet Weldon, (1647—1713), monk of St Edmund's, Paris, who was the first Annalist of the English Benedictine Congregation. He compiled two folio volumes of 'Collections', written in 1701, and now at Douai Abbey, Woolhampton; and also a book which he called 'Chronological Notes', 1709. Both of these works survive in manuscript. The latter is at Downside, but was printed in 1881 at Stanbrook. The material for Cambrai, Weldon obtained from Cambrai, so that his work may be taken as representing the lost archives of our house.

There is very little, then, of the original Cambrai material now at Stanbrook. In our library at Cambrai, there were 17 folio volumes, containing the originals of Fr Baker's spiritual instructions given to the nuns. These were deposited in the Bibliotheque Municipale of that town after our expulsion in 1793; but by 1821³ they had disappeared, and so far all attempts to trace them have been in vain. Fortunately, copies were made very early, some by contemporaries of Fr Baker, particularly at the time of the foundation from Cambrai of the Paris Community (1653). These copies were mostly small pocket volumes. Sadly, we have at Stanbrook only four of these 17th century MSS, as well as several 19th or 20th century copies of early MSS now in other hands.

Another MS, quarto size, which has come down to us is 'Dame Anselma Ann's Book'. Dame Anselma died in prison at Compiègne, of hardship, and our nuns must have brought it back to England with them. It is composed of extracts from various spiritual writers, letters of spiritual direction, and so on, all in the hand of D. Anselma. Some of them date from the early days of the foundation, and may have been copied from a commonplace book of such items which was kept in the Community, and part of which is now in the Archives du Nord, Lille.⁴

We have a small manuscript copy of the vows made at Cambrai in 1630 by Dame Brigid More. It is written in her hand, but not signed. There is a similar one recording the vows of Dame Benedicta Warwick in 1702, which is signed. These were probably not the original charts of vows, but small copies made by their owners for their private devotion.⁵ One of the most intriguing manuscripts to have survived is a copy of our Cambrai Constitutions, dated in 1687. Shortly after the nuns came to Woolton, it was found fluttering in a ditch, not far from our Woolton house, by a professor of dancing employed for the school. How it got there remains a mystery to this day.

Another item of historical interest is the Knight family correspondence: a series of letters written by three of our nuns to Alexander Knight, of Sixhills Grange, Lincolnshire. He was nephew to one of them, and brother to the other two. They give a vivid picture of life at Cambrai during the early years of the French Revolution. They were donated to us by Col. Alexander Knight, grandson of the original recipient, in 1897. 6

Other smaller items which came with our nuns from Cambrai are a few printed mortuary bills, dating from 1734; a few pathetic little scraps of notes relating to customs of the house, and evidently treasured against the day of their return; and a tiny envelope addressed to 'Citoyenne Philippe', from Compiègne. This was Sr Mary of the Incarnation, one of the three Carmelites who happened to be away at the time of the arrest of their Sisters, and so escaped the guillotine. 9ie often visited our nuns in prison.

An interesting relic of our last days at Cambrai is a parchment cut-out of the Royal Arms, mounted on velvet and framed. It is extremely delicate work, and gives the effect of very fine lace. It was completed a few weeks before the nuns were expelled from their house, accompanied them to prison, was brought safely to England, and is now in our archives. The rest of our material on Cambrai consists in transcripts of MSS, mostly in the archives at Lille and Cambrai, made at different times, as I mentioned above, by friends of our Community. This material continues to grow as friends still obtain for us photocopies of MSS from these sources.

From our early days in England we have several notable MSS. Firstly, there is D. Ann Teresa Partington's 'Brief Narrative' of our expulsion from Cambrai, and all that followed, to which I have referred above. We also have a small note-book headed, in her hand, 'Str. Ann Teresa's Little Book' — evidently the successor to the small book 'wrested from her hands' by the ill-natured man at Cambrai. After notes of 'Extraordinary expences', (including such ordinary items as brown sugar and coffee pots!), there follows a list of 'Young Ladies in the School when the nuns arrived at Woolton' — eleven of them, and two secular teachers. She then adds the names of all the children who came subsequently, up to 1820, the year of her death. At the other end of the book, she had made short notes on the nuns' journey to England, and arrival at Woolton. Then follow seven pages of lists of gifts, from the greatest to the smallest, received by our nuns in those early days in England, and recorded with touching gratitude.

We have a whole series of account books, from our arrival in England in 1795 onwards, and these supply us with interesting details about our daily life. In 1802, a Petition was drawn up for presentation to the French Government when negotiations for peace between England and France were going on. Though nothing came of it, the document is of the greatest interest to us as it gives an accurate account of the house and church at Cambrai, and of all their furnishings.

Of our time at Woolton, 1795—1807, we have very few records, apart from the account books. There are a dozen letters, dating from 1795—1818, from the Constable brothers, Edward and Francis, of Burton Constable. They were both most generous benefactors to the Community. Another interesting correspondence, 1806—1811, is that between Mrs Stanford and Dame Agnes Robinson, the last of the Cambrai nuns to be Abbess. It deals with the negotiations for our removal from Woolton to Salford Hall, and illustrates Mrs Stanford's great kindness towards us.

From Salford days, various oddments have come down to us. They include two letters from Bishop Milner; a letter from a former cure at Cambrai, 1814; a letter from Marie, a faithful old servant at Cambrai, 1817; several letters from the Maire of Cambrai, and drafts of replies from Mother Agnes Robinson, concerning proposals for our return to Cambrai, which, of course, came to nothing; a printed prospectus of our school at Salford dating from between 1822—1830; a pitifully scanty list of library books at Salford; an inventory of furniture, 1825; and a letter from the Prioress of Stapehill, RM. Augustin de Chabanne, 1826. There are letters from Presidents of the Congregation, 1816—1838; and from Procurators of the Southern Province, 1795—1838. There is a letter from Dr Bede Polding, 1834, thanking for an offer to make his pontificals. We have a packet of 'Chapter Speeches' of Abbess Christina Chare, given between 1822—1830.

Once we get to Stanbrook, the records are much fuller. Letters from Presidents, and a few Bishops, continue, 1838—1854. Bishop Ullathome's letters, 112 of them, dating from 1850—1889, are kept apart.

In 1842, one of our nuns, D. Magdalene le Clerc, went to Australia with Archbishop Polding as one of the two foundresses of the first Community of Benedictine nuns in that continent. We have a fairly large correspondence in connection with this foundation, including letters from Archbishop Polding, many from D. Magdalene, some from Princethorpe, one from Archbishop Vaughan.

There is a box-file of very heterogeneous papers entitled 'Stanbrook Papers 1851—1872'. It contains amongst much else a letter from Lord Beauchamp, 1859, acknowledging the gift of 'cuttings in parchment'. (So we were still producing them!) There are letters from Mile Muser, Maid-of-Honour to Queen Marie Aemilie, regarding four visits Her Majesty paid to Stanbrook in 1858. There is a letter from Mother Imelda Poole, with a post-script by Mother Margaret Hallahan, about a visit of our Abbess Placida Duggan to Stone in 1867.⁷ There is a curious letter from Br Ignatius, Anglican monk of Llanthony, written in 1869.

Another collection of letters, 43 in all, dating from 1859—1885, is from a Mr John Hopkins of Great Grimsby. They accompanied gifts of impressions of old monastic or other ecclesiastical seals which he sent to the Abbess over these years. They make a quite remarkable collection.

We have a box full of letters to D. Laurence Shepherd, concerning his translation of D. Gueranger's Annee Liturgique. They include letters from Cardinal Manning, Cardinal Newman, and many Bishops, priests, monks, nuns and seculars.

There is a box of papers and letters relating to our new buildings: church and monastery, P.P.Pugin's specification for the latter, etc. There are packets of letters from Archbishop Scarisbrick, 1877—1897; Bishop Hedley, 1885—1897;

Archbishop Ilsley, 1885—1922; a box of letters from three Abbesses in succession of East Bergholt, 1876—1904; a box of letters from various other Abbeys of nuns, both at home and abroad; and letters from the Anglican Prioress of Llanthony, which resulted in her conversion.

Letters from Solesmes, both from the monks of S. Pierre and from the nuns of Ste Cecile are very numerous, forming a large part of the papers of D. Laurence Shepherd, and of Lady Gertrude Dubois, and continuing, though in smaller numbers, during the abbacies of Lady Caecilia Heywood and Lady Laurentia McLachlan. Besides his correspondence, we have many books of sermons and conferences of Fr Laurence's, dating from 1863 until his death on 30 January 1885. Also among Lady Gertrude's correspondence, there are a considerable number of letters from Pere Rabussier S.J., (written 1885—1897), and from Dr Butler, Rector of St Charles's College, (written 1888-1897). There are many letters to her from Prior, later Abbot, Ford, Prior Raynal, and various other Benedictine monks and nuns.

The letters and papers of Lady Caecilia Heywood, Abbess from 1897—1931, have never been sorted. The letters are mostly from other monasteries of nuns in England and abroad. In 1907—1911, we trained at Stanbrook the Brazilian members of the first Benedictine monastery for nuns in South America. They went out to Sao Paulo, Brazil, in 1911, accompanied by three of our nuns. From this time on, there is a large correspondence with this Brazilian Community, and others which have since sprung from it. We have many unsorted letters from members of our own Community to other members staying for some reason in another monastery, together with their letters home.

Letters from various Bishops are scattered through the years: besides those already mentioned, there are some from Bishop Amigo, Bishop O'Neill, and a few from Archbishop McIntyre, Archbishop Williams, and Bishop Keating. Naturally, there are considerable collections of letters from Presidents of the E.B.C., including D. Aidan Gasquet, both before and after he became Cardinal. There are letters from Abbot de Hemptinne, the first Abbot Primate, from Cardinal Manning, one from Cardinal Vaughan, and a good many from Cardinal Pitra. There is a box of letters on historical matters from Abbot Justin McCann, D. Gilbert Dolan, D. Benedict Weld-Blundell, Mr Joseph Gillow, and others.

There is a great deal of matter about the Carmelite Martyrs of Compiègne, owing to the fact that our Community acted as witnesses in their cause of Beatification, which took place on 27 May 1906.

After 1931, the beginning of D. Laurentia McLachlan's Abbacy, there is a good deal of correspondence which is still very largely unsorted. Her own correspondence, both before and after this date, is kept apart, and is roughly sorted. Many of the letters of Bernard Shaw and Sir Sydney Cockerell have been published in our book In a Great Tradition. The largest part of Lady Laurentia's correspondence is concerned with Plain Chant, or monastic history. On the former subject, there are packets of letters from Dom Mocquereau, Rev. George Palmer, Donald Edeson, H.P.Allen, to mention only a few. One packet is concerned entirely with the Society of St Gregory. There is also a packet of letters from Sir Ivor Atkins, then Organist and Choir Master at Worcester Cathedral. There are letters dealing mostly with historical matters from Henry Worth, Edmund Bishop, and Canon Wilson of Worcester Cathedral, particularly while he was the Cathedral Librarian. The present Librarian, Canon J. Fenwick, recently lent us the other side of this last correspondence, and we now have photocopies of these.

One of the MSS discovered in the Archives Centrales at Lille was the Entry Book, giving the names and other details of all who entered the Community from the time of its foundation until November 1725. At this point, unfortunately, it breaks off, the rest of the book having been at some time torn out. A similar book was begun, about 1869, by D. Benedict Anstey, who filled in all the entries since 1838. It has been kept up ever since, and we are now in the third volume.

There are also six MS volumes of Annals of the Community, which gives its history from 1623- 1907. This was almost entirely the work of D. Benedict Anstey, who collected together all the matter. Unfortunately, the style is so aggravating that it could never be published. The same applies to a MS life of Fr Laurence Shepherd, and another of Lady Gertrude Dubois, both of which she wrote. But the facts are there, at least. In 1869, with the encouragement of Fr Laurence, a house journal was instituted. He gave three stout volumes with which to begin it, and it has been continued, with a few unfortunate gaps, until the present day.

There is a small box of material concerning the school, or 'alumnate', which was always very small. The list of pupils seems to be complete, at least since 1795, though the 'Pensioners' of Cambrai days also are entered in the Entry Book, until the point where it breaks off in 1725. We have several diaries of varying reliability, and a drawer-full of photographs.

In our Archives,⁸ there is much waiting to be done in the way of sorting and listing. The great obstacle is the one which besets most amateur archivists: shortage of time, and the competition of other seemingly more urgent duties. One can only do one's best to preserve the threads so carefully gathered up, and ensure that they never get tangled.

THE SALVATORIAN PROVINCIAL ARCHIVES:
HOW IT ALL BEGAN

The Rev. Edmund Lanning, S.D.S.

When asked to write about 'How it all began', I had a few qualms of conscience. What do I write about? Has what I have attempted to do with our Salvatorian Archives any relevance, or will it be of any help, to others? Well, perhaps it may be. I had to start from scratch, had no purpose built room to take over, no shelving, indeed nothing. But, is not that how all things start, usually from nothing? I know of two of our parishes starting on £10.

Well, it all began some five years ago, in January 1976, when I was asked, perhaps better to say appointed, to our Provincialate House at Abbots Langley. I was asked to assist the Provincial in his office and to assist Brother Joseph in our appeal work. First impressions were indeed great, everything looked to be in apple-pie order, the office seemed and looked tidy. But upon examination, things turned out quite differently, the filing cabinets being crowded with all sorts of things. So my first job was to try to give some order to the existing files and I did this by extracting all that did not seem to be in its proper place, taking out periodicals, brochures and so on. At least, one created a little room to work in within the filing system. Then, I spent months just sorting out letters into their appropriate year and headings.

In May 1976, our Generalate in Rome sent out questionnaires concerning the structure of the Secretariates of the various Provinces and asking for a detailed picture of how things were ordered. They wanted to know the contents of the files, about membership, etc., and they spoke about 'archives'. Well, we did not have any. This was certainly an easy question to answer. Shall I say that I began to get curious and so I thought a little more on the reasons for trying to get some order. During August, the then Provincial received a further communication from Rome asking that a member be sent to a meeting concerning the history of the Society and who would also be able to say where this and that could be found. This meeting was not to be held until the end of December 1976 and beginning of January 1977. So the next three or four months were spent trying to get together a list of the contents of the Provincialate files. It also asked that we furnish a plan of how they were organised. Well, all that I could do was to say that we had eight steel filing cabinets and that certain subjects were contained in Drawer A of Cabinet 1 and such and such were in the remaining drawers of the other cabinets.

To the meeting itself I took a rough plan of how matters were arranged. Indeed, it was at this meeting that I became the Corresponding Member of the British Province on our International Historical Commission. The meeting turned out to be a little high powered for me as I was not an authority on the history of the Society, but at least I learnt a great deal. It was only towards the end of the meeting that the various Province delegates were asked as to how their respective Secretariates were organised and to what extent were archives in existence. My eyes were certainly opened when I saw that some of the Provinces were highly organised, but I was also pleased to note that some were very much like ourselves. We were all asked to try to bring to the notice of our respective Provincials the necessity of a proper filing system and that certain materials were to be deposited in the Archives.

Just to show us how things ought to be ordered we were shown the Generalate archives, and saw how they were organised and indexed. We were given ideas on how ours ought to be organised, indexed etc., and were given the Roman order and asked to follow it. It was quite plainly stated that for many of the Provinces this was impossible. First of all, men had little time — no Provincial was going to put a man full-time on it. Furthermore, most of the Provinces did not have purpose built archives accommodation and they would have to make use of any type of room that the Provincial or Superior could give. At any rate, we were asked to speak nicely to our Provincials, state what was needed (the minimum needs), and try to get on with things as best we could. Why all this? Well, the year 1981 was to be our Centenary Year of Foundation. Each Province was asked to write up its own history and to send to Rome details of this, that and the other. This made one think, 'Ah, Rome has not got everything, it is not quite as well organised as it makes out to be, it has not all the information that it should have.'

One afternoon, we were taken to the Vatican Archives and shown how they were ordered and the conditions in which the documents were stored. Certainly very interesting. Indeed, the whole trip to Rome was interesting. I learnt a lot from it. It made me feel very humble in that I knew very little of the history of the Society to which I belonged and that I knew nothing at all about the other provinces, their work, number of personnel and their apostolates. So this meeting was to generate enthusiasm for the Centenary. We were to go back to our Provinces and to look into our various files or archives and see if they contained information about the early days of the Society and within a year we had to report by letter giving an indication of what materials we had up to the year 1921. For this Province it meant only the years 1901—1921. Even so, I found some very interesting things, for instance, that the founder had visited this country on two occasions and that he had written certain letters which had been posted in London. At the time of our meeting in Rome, the Centenary year looked to be so distant, yet now when this is written, it is with us, and in fact now nearly completed.

After about a month more detailed information sheets were sent from Rome, asking for all sorts of information: who had been novices, names of novice masters, if novices had left, dates to be given; lists of all who had left during Scholasticate, if dispensations had been sought, numbers to be given; lists of all priests and houses to which they been assigned; lists of Superiors, when they entered office and when their term finished. As I said earlier, I think that their files were not in order, that many gaps existed in their histories of the various provinces. At any rate, I did the best I could in getting together all that was required. It also gave me a chance to think of how things were to be ordered. It was then that the Provincial asked me to establish the Archives, if possible. Just as a matter of interest, in our early days one of the brethren was always appointed as Archivist, but just before the First World War that title seems to have disappeared.

On my return from Rome, I noticed in the Universe the first proposed meeting for Catholic Archivists here at Spode in July 1978. I asked if I could go. I attended, listened to what people had to say, and went back home and reported. That meeting was certainly the answer to prayer. Certainly, our Provincial saw the need and asked whether something could be done about it. I said that I thought that it could, that we would need certain things, and so a start was made.

The start had to be made at source, namely with the Provincial files, what did he want to keep in his office; if he did not want it, then it was archival material. So I set about indexing the Provincial files, giving each file, and in some instances a group of files, a number. I used nearly five hundred numbers in all. It sounds a lot, but then I think that I have worked out a fairly good system to meet our needs. Numbers were given to our houses past and present, to our various apostolates over the years, to the professional people who advise us, and so on. Once all these had been sorted out, numbered, and in some instances lettered and numbered, we were on our way.

In between times, I made trips to the Catholic Library in London for the purpose of consulting the Catholic Directories to find out about our membership, where they were, and what they were doing. Members only seem to have stayed in a house for about three years in those days and then went off to another place. We have our own Catalogus of membership but this is only issued on average every three or four years. People tend to get lost for a while. So with the aid of these sources I have now got together a pretty fair record of where people have been, what they have been doing, where they entered, were professed and ordained. This information is on a card index system and also contained within the files of each member, past and present. Also, we have cards on people who have applied to join us over the years, those that have left during the Novitiate or Scholasticate and, recently, those that have left the priesthood, or have sought incardination into a diocese. All deceased members are listed, when and where they died, the work that they have done, and names and addresses of relatives, which I think is essential, because they are still part of the family. We also have index cards giving information about all students who have attended our minor seminaries at Christleton Hall and Sindlesham, and of those who were late vocations and studied at Abbots Langley.

The Provincial Files are contained in 9 filing cabinets. This gives 39 compartments or drawers, each identified by one or two letters of the alphabet. The contents of these compartments are numbered from 1 to 500.

Compartment 1. This contains information about our coming to England and the early years of the Province. Each file contains 5 sub-divisions: A. Rome; B. Diocese; C. Members letters; D. Other letters; E. Ratio's and Miscellaneous.

1. History of the Province
- 2.1 1902

In 1908 we became part of the Anglo-American Province. This lasted until 1926.

3. Anglo--American Province 1908
- 3.1 1909
- 3.18 1926

In 1926 we became a Commissariate with Italy.

4. Commissariate. 1926
- 4.1 1927
- 4.21 1947

In 1947 we became a Province.

- 5K. 1947 [K. stands for the Provincial, Fr Kevin Kenny]
- 5K.1 1948
- 5M. 1975 [M. stands for our present Provincial, FV Malachy McBride]
- 5M.6 1981

Materials up to 1921 have been catalogued, as well as other small sections. This is all recorded in a Master File, which one can consult when looking for a particular letter or document. A copy of an original letter or document is recorded by the letter c within brackets, thus (c).

Each House has a number, thus:

150. Wotton-under-Edge
151. Kings Langley Pastoral area
- 152 Australia
- 153 Noctorum, Birkenhead
156. St Augustine's, Runcorn

The missing numbers are to be found in the Master File. They are houses that we had had to leave for one reason or another.

Renewal, Formation, Chapters (General and Provincial), Insurance, Banks, Accountants, Solicitors, and so on, all have an individual number and are prefixed by 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, etc. to denote year.

As Archivist, I am lucky in that I also have the job of filing all the current materials in the Provincial's office. When materials are moved from these

I mentioned earlier that we have not always been a Province. We are an international Congregation and so countries with which we were associated appear under Provincialate (i.e. 1), until we separated from them. All correspondence with Rome appears under 1—5 until 1947, then under 200; likewise the United States is under 1—5 until 1926, and then under its own number; and, again, likewise with Belgium and Italy. I found it easier to work in this way, following the way the files were set out when I took over. It seemed more sensible to keep an existing order or system than to devise a new one. International Commissions and Committees are dealt with in the same way as those of the Province, that is by number and letter. Roman documentation and periodicals are to be found under 200A, with 1.2.3. after the A.

All archivists are, I believe, expected to be mines of information. I am expected to know this and that and the other. I have been asked to prepare brochures for various conferences; give children who are doing projects for School all sorts of information; prepare histories of various houses and establishments. For the smaller congregations this seems to be what is expected of the archivist, but with the larger Orders it is not the case.

Where do I keep the archives? What sort of room have I got? To begin with, I used old cupboards and wardrobes and had shelves put in them. Recently, I have been able to purchase some steel shelving and so was able to get rid of the cupboards and wardrobes. I keep the Archive materials in 'Storflat' storage cases and other reinforced cardboard storage boxes, e.g. bankers' boxes. Such boxes are cheaper than steel cabinets and far easier to move around. This may not be ideal from the professional point of view, but order is being kept. In years to come, we may, like our Church of England brethren, be able to use the facilities of county record offices and other official repositories.

1981 has been the Centenary year of our Congregation and I have been able to publish materials about our early years in this country which have been informative for the membership of our British Province. The room where the archives are situated is large and serves also as my office (I am Information Secretary, now Provincial Bursar, as well as Archivist), and so it is the home also of the typewriter, the scanner, the duplicator and now the photocopier. I see my job as trying to bring together as much information as possible about the Congregation, its work and apostolates abroad, and also keeping the membership informed through a monthly Newsletter, in which we try to record events, such as anniversaries of members and relatives, sermons at special events, jubilees, professions, and the like.

Earlier, I mentioned about filling in gaps: one know that materials exist, but they are not in one's possession now. I try to find out if they exist, where they are to be found, whether copies be obtained, and, if not, to record details. Last year I went to the States and came back with over a thousand copies of letters and documents dealing with our days as the Anglo-American Province, and I have been to Belgium and acquired further copies from there. I know that materials exist in Rome and I hope one day to be able to visit Rome again.

Over the years one gets to know what one is looking for, the piece of information that will complete the puzzle. For instance, information gathered from these sources has helped to fill in the picture of the early days at Wealdstone. The Fathers were all German, and after five to ten years here moved on to America, and it has been interesting to find out what they did there. Similarly, I have visited Campion House, Osterley, and found out more about our early links with them, of how the Jesuit Fathers gave financial assistance to some 70 of our students, of whom 15 became priests. Some of the German Fathers came to England to learn English before going to Assam for missionary work. They had studied in Liverpool but where did they stay? Here the Christian Brothers were a great help, because it was found that they stayed with them, and all were recorded in their House Chronicles.

I find my work interesting. I like History and so perhaps I do more than just keep or preserve records. The religious archivist is different from the professional: they are doing a job for other people; we are doing a job for ourselves, our religious family. The job is not an impossible one, but I still feel that I am a beginner and have much to learn. If I can do what I have done, I am sure that others can do the same. It means hard work, it needs dedication, it is a lonely job and one can become the butt of community jokes, indeed those of the Province. However, the value of our work I am sure will be seen when we are long gone. We have tried to gather our heritage together and to make it available for others.

The motto of our Centenary Year was taken from the words of John's Gospel, Chapter 17, 'That all may know the Saviour' — words that inspired Father Francis Jordan to found a religious Congregation bearing the title of 'Society of the Divine Saviour'. I hope that my work as Archivist is valuable in keeping alive the memory of the Salvatorians who over the years brought, and at this present time are now bringing, the knowledge of the Saviour to the People of God.

THE ARCHIVES OF THE MILL HILL MISSIONARIES

The Rev. William Mol, M.H.M.

INTRODUCTION

When in 1837 Victoria became Queen of England, vast territories of our world, especially in Africa and South America, had yet to be explored and to be placed on the map. By the time Queen Victoria died, almost all the world had not only been mapped out but also an ever growing number of missionaries had followed the explorers. Many missionaries of the second half of the last century and the first decades of this century were themselves explorers.

Most missionary work done by the Catholic Church before the 1830s was done by the old religious orders, the Dominicans, the Franciscans and, since the sixteenth century, the Jesuits. The missionary work of these old orders became so involved with the political aspirations of the great colonial powers, Spain and Portugal, that Rome decided to have the missionary work centralized and taken out of the jurisdiction of the great Catholic countries. In 1622 the Congregation of the Propaganda Fide was started in Rome. From then onwards Rome slowly managed to regain from the secular powers the right to appoint Ecclesiastical Superiors for the mission territories.

In 1660 the first exclusively missionary society in the Catholic Church, the Societe des Missions Etrangeres de Paris (M.E.P.), was started in France. Most of its members were French, and their missionary work, except for India, was done in countries colonised by France. The next exclusively missionary society, the Societe des Missions Africaines (S.M.A.), was started in Italy, and aimed solely at Africa. Today there are about twenty exclusively missionary societies, founded since 1860, in France, England, Italy, Spain, Portugal, Belgium, Germany, Austria, Switzerland, Canada, the United States and Mexico.

A MISSIONARY SOCIETY IN ENGLAND

On 19 March 1866, Archbishop Manning of Westminster officially opened St Joseph's College of the Sacred Heart for Foreign Missions at Mill Hill, then a small village some ten miles north west of London. Earlier that month, the College was started by Fr Vaughan with one student, Fr Vaughan himself being the only priest.

Herbert Vaughan was the eldest son of Colonel John Vaughan, a member of one of the old English noble families which in spite of persecutions and fines remained staunchly catholic. Born in 1832, he spent his childhood on his father's estate at Courtfield, not far from the border of Wales. He was educated at Stoneyhurst (1841-1846), Brugelette, Belgium (1846-1848), and Downside (1849-1851). In 1852 he left for Rome to study theology. He was ordained a priest on 28 October 1854 at Lucca in Italy. On his return to England he was appointed Vice-Rector of the College at Ware in Hertfordshire.

During his years of preparation for the priesthood Herbert Vaughan wanted to become a missionary in Wales to bring that country back to the Catholic faith. After his ordination, his dream of being a missionary made him look not only at Wales but at the whole wide world, especially at all the newly explored territories brought under the British sphere of influence. England, he thought, ought to be sending Catholic missionaries to all these countries. The fact that his health was poor probably decided him to start a College to train young men to be sent out to, as he put it 'where the need is greatest', instead of going out himself. He did, however, go to the Americas in 1863 on a begging tour for his missionary College.

Vaughan's College at Mill Hill started very humbly in a country house. His idea was to send British missionaries to overseas territories partly with the idea of taking away the general concept that England was a purely Protestant country. Two years after the opening of the College, the first foreign student, a Dutchman, applied for admission and since that early date St Joseph's Missionary Society (as it is known today) has been a very cosmopolitan Society, to the benefit both of the Society and its work in the mainly former British colonies.

In 1871, when Vaughan had four young priests ready for missionary work, Rome assigned to the young Society the work of evangelizing the negro population of the southern states of the United States of America. Only a few years previously, the negro slaves in the United States had been set free but, so far, no one had taken much interest in their spiritual welfare. On 18 November 1871, Fr Vaughan set sail for America with his first four priests. The young missionaries were received very cordially by Cardinal Gibbons, of Baltimore, and placed in charge of St Francis Xavier's Church in that town. After having seen the four missionaries settled and made a start on their vast field of labour, Fr Vaughan toured through the eastern part of the United States, begging for money for the new undertaking, and inviting young boys to join his young Society and work as priests among the black population.

THE ARCHIVES AT MILL HILL IN THE PAST

It is from this time onwards that the contents of the archives of the Mill Hill Missionaries (as they are also known) are dated. The missionaries wrote to Mill Hill about their work, their expectations, their disappointments, the conditions in which they had to live, and the results of their labours. All these letters, reports and publications were kept in Mill Hill in a special room. Unfortunately, a number of letters, mainly of the first quarter of this century, have been lost.

In the early 1950s, one or two people asked permission to study some of this material. Mill Hill kindly allowed such a study of documents and letters of the early years and helped the researchers to find things. One of the results of these first studies is H. P. Gale's book Uganda and the Mill Hill Fathers.

The authorities at Mill Hill then realised that all the material in their archives provided a wonderful account of the work of their men on the missions, and a well of information for the future student of the history of the evangelization of parts of Africa, Asia, America and New Zealand. They decided that the time had come that their archives should be properly sorted and indexed for the benefit of future researchers. Up to 1976 this task was allocated to one of the four consultants of the Superior General of the Mill Hill Missionaries, but, since they often had so many other and more pressing work to do, only the period between 1866 and 1903 was properly sorted and all the letters written by the Founder transcribed. Even so, this was quite a formidable task completed.

In August 1976 I was asked to put the archives in order and to index its contents. As a student for the Mill Hill Missionary life I had already a great interest in the history and the work of the Mill Hill Society. I read through all the Mill Hill publications, and compiled lists of the names of the missionaries and the places where they worked. I copied maps of the territories of their activities and collected articles written by them in the Mill Hill mission magazine. When, therefore, in 1976 I had my first look at the material in our archives, I was a bit over-awed seeing letters written a century ago by the 'workers of the first hour', for whom I had developed a great admiration, especially since I myself had worked as a missionary in Uganda, and experienced the great distances these old missionaries travelled on foot, and the climate in which they had to live.

THE ARCHIVES OF MILL HILL TODAY

When I was appointed archivist, I did not have a clear idea about the work involved. On the advice of my Superior, I visited a few archives, mainly in the Netherlands. I also studied a few books on the administration and maintenance of archives. During my visit to the municipal archives of Nijmegen, the place where I was born, I was very impressed by the neat and practical way the archival material was stored in uniform boxes, and the easy way of finding any material by means of the card index system. Also, the archives of Nijmegen University I found very neatly and clearly arranged. Both archives were re-started after their destruction in September 1944 during the battle around Nijmegen and Arnhem.

Back in Mill Hill I decided to arrange the archives along the lines of the archives I had visited at Nijmegen. Two storage rooms were built in the basement underneath the College chapel, together with an office. Although the material in the archives has by no means all been indexed as yet, at least it has been sorted now and arranged as follows. One storeroom contains all the original documents. This material can be studied by appointment, except for all the personal correspondence of the last fifty years. The other storeroom houses the open archives which are more readily accessible, and contains a bound set of all the Mill Hill publications in England, Scotland, Ireland, U.S.A., the Netherlands, Belgium, Germany, Austria and South Tyrol. There are also bound sets of diocesan publications from territories where the Mill Hill missionaries are working, or used to work. Books written by Mill Hill missionaries can also be found here, together with all the photographs, slides, and films made by the missionaries. Eventually, this storeroom will also contain microfilms and the index to the contents of both storerooms.

The main divisions used in sorting all the material are:

- a. Cardinal Herbert Vaughan, the Founder. [All his letters, notes, and articles by and about him]. 48 boxes.
- b. The daily government of the Society. [Correspondence, general chapters, meetings, reports, logbooks, etc.]. About 180 boxes.
- c. The members. [Personal correspondence]. About 60 boxes.
- d. The missions. About 250 boxes.
- e. The colleges and houses. About 120 boxes.

Except for the bound sets of publications, the photographs and the films, all the material in both storerooms is stored in uniform boxes of 10 x 14x5% inches. Everything in these boxes is arranged in chronological order. Each box has a clear 'code' of three capital letters, indicating the subject material. For example, all the material by and on Cardinal Vaughan is coded HCV (Herbert Cardinal Vaughan). The boxes are then numbered from 1 to as many boxes as are needed to contain all the material on that subject.

Inside each Box, the material is placed in Files, each given a small letter (a,b,c, etc.). Each File may contain one or more Sleeves, each given a number. The material in each Sleeve is page numbered. Thus, for example, on 10 October 1871, Fr Vaughan wrote a circular letter 'The Mission Assigned to St Joseph's College of the Sacred Heart, and the First Departure of the Missioners'. This letter is indicated in the index system as HCV 6 a 1, pp. 15—16, and can be found in the set of boxes coded HCV, Box no. 6, File a, Sleeve 1, pages 15 and 16.

The most interesting part of the archives for the student of Mission history will no doubt be the material from the various countries where the Mill Hill Missionaries have been working, or are still working. For that reason, I will now give a list of these territories, and their place in the archives.

These boxes contain, first of all, the correspondence between Mill Hill and the mission territories. But, besides this correspondence, there are diaries, dictionaries (some of them hand-written), descriptions of journeys, studies of local languages and tribes. Of course, by no means everything that has been written by our missionaries is now in our archives. There is still quite a lot of material, especially diaries, in the mission countries. To obtain these, and other interesting material, I make regular appeals in our Society magazine. Of late, one of our Dutch priests, who spent over forty years in Cameroon and who is now retired in the Netherlands, has followed a course in interviewing. He now visits the old missionaries, lets them talk about their years on the missions, and records their recollections on tapes. These tapes will eventually find their way into the Mill Hill archives.

It is exactly one hundred years ago (1881) that our first missionaries went to Borneo. Because of this centenary one of our priests, who had been in Borneo, was asked to write a book about these past one hundred years. He went to Borneo and collected quite a lot of interesting material, including a diary kept by one of the Sisters during her years of internment in a Japanese camp in the Second World War. Much of what he found he was not allowed to take with him to Europe, but he was allowed to photocopy all this material. He has now finished his book, and all the material he had collected (25 box-files of the A4 size) has been placed in our archives.

THE INDEXING

It will take several years before everything is properly sorted and indexed. The first indexing will be placed on cards. Each card contains a global index to the contents of the file. The advantage of this way of indexing is that if someone wants to know what the archives contain on a certain subject, the card, or cards, containing the index to that subject can easily be photo-copied and sent to the enquirer. He will then be able to decide whether it is worthwhile for him to come to Mill Hill for further information.

All the correspondence will be transcribed. Alongside the transcription there is a broad margin in which all the names of persons and places referred to will be noted down. This will make a more detailed indexing later on much easier, and it will also enable future researchers to find things more easily. A synopsis of the contents of each letter will also be compiled.

Articles written by Mill Hill Missionaries, or about the Mill Hill Missionaries and their work, will also be transcribed and indexed.

Eventually I intend to make a file-index combination about every member of the Mill Hill Society and about every mission station served by Mill Hill Missionaries. This will enable future students to find out straightaway everything the archives hold on each missionary, mission station, school and college. A photo-copy of the transcribed articles will be added to each file.

Photographs are being placed in special files, each photograph having its details as to subject, date and photographer added on a separate paper.

CANADIAN DIARY OF MISSIONARY SISTERS OF
THE FAITHFUL COMPANIONS OF JESUS, 1883

Contributed by Sr Mary Clare Holland, F.C.J.

Monseigneur Vital J. Grandin O.M.I., one of the great pioneer missionaries of the North West Territories of Canada approached Reverend Mother Josephine Petit, second Superior General of the Sisters Faithful Companions of Jesus, and asked for some teaching Sisters to help him in his work of evangelizing the Red Indians in his diocese of St Albert. He promised her that the Sisters would have the opportunity of doing much good and of suffering a great deal in their work for souls. Reverend Mother replied: 'If it is a question of sacrifice, I accept'.

So, on 11 May 1883, eight Sisters embarked on 'S.S. Peruvian' at Liverpool. There were 1,200 passengers on board including 800 Irish emigrants travelling steerage. These latter were most friendly but the first-class passengers found the Sisters objects of curiosity and pity. During the voyage there were the usual hazards from fog and icebergs. The Sisters succumbed to sea-sickness.

On 18 May they had their first sight of land and on the 21 May they landed at Quebec. From Quebec they went by train to Montreal where they were met by Bishop Grandin who now undertook the direction of the journey. After a prolonged stay, caused by the Bishop's desire that they should meet as many missionary priests and sisters as possible, they left Montreal on the evening of 29 May for Ottawa, thence along the Great Lakes to St Boniface and Winnipeg, arriving at Winnipeg, 1 June.

Here, the last preparations were made for the final stages of the journey. The Sisters were amused when they saw the store of provisions which included, among other items: 17 hams, 8 pieces of bacon, 44 lengths of sausages (each nearly a yard long), 3 bags of flour, 2 crocks of butter, 1 canister of coffee, 1 chest of tea; also, utensils such as a stove, buckets, frying pans, etc.

On Monday 11 June, they went by train to Qu'Appelle. The Canadian Pacific Railway was in the course of construction but it had not yet crossed the Great Prairie which was still the domain of the Red Skins, so the only method of making the journey from Qu'Appelle was by covered wagons and carts. The rendezvous for the caravan was the O.M.I. mission station 24 miles west of Qu'Appelle.

As well as the letters which the Sisters wrote, they kept a diary,¹ which, from time to time, they illustrated with sketches. It is from this diary preserved among the Society's Archives,² that the following extracts describing their trek across the Prairie are taken.

[June 15th] The man charged with our luggage went on in advance and arrived at the spot chosen for the evening encampment about an hour before us, so when we arrived we found our tents already pitched on the summit of a hill commanding a beautiful view of the surrounding country. . . . On a hill opposite was an Indian encampment, whose red-skinned inhabitants soon began to execute a strange dance around their wood fire, while the hollow sound of a drum alternating with a loud shout was meant no doubt for music. This performance lasted the greater part of the night, and did not exactly favour our slumbers. The Fathers told us they make use of these ceremonies when anyone in the tribe is ill: it is their manner of praying to the gods for recovery. . . .

As our daily routine during the caravan voyage was always the same, let us give an account of it. About 4 a.m. a loud 'Benedicamus Domino' from our good Bishop is repeated at each tent, and if his Lordship does not hear our answer, 'Deo Gratias' and a great bustle in a second or two, the call is again made. In less than a quarter of an hour, we have to be dressed and our bundles made up. These bundles are made by strapping into our rugs, our pillows (for our good Bishop provided them, fearing we should not sleep well without), night-dress, waterproof cloak, camp stool, Communion veil, and merino cloaks. Our bundles made, we arrange them against the side of the tent, and Mgr enters with his stand and box which serves for an altar. Then he brings his pillow, upon which he has laid his Vestments, and upon which he places the two tiny bottles containing the wine and water. How fervently we prayed during the few moments that our Lord is sacramentally present, for His protection and blessing for the coming day, perhaps fraught with a thousand difficulties and dangers. During the Masses (for there were two or three every day) the guides light the fire and put on the saucepan. Our thanksgiving is made while completing our bundles and folding the sheep skin rugs ready to be put into the carts as soon as the men want them. The first day we remained in our tents to make our thanksgiving, but the Bishop asked us the next time to set to work immediately, for not a moment must be lost in the morning. 'It was,' he said 'only leaving the good God to find the good God.' Our meals are spread on the grass, a little piece of oilcloth serves for a tablecloth, and on it are placed tin milks, plates and dishes, knives and forks . . . We think only of getting over our repast as soon as possible.

. . . Our fare was the same every day except when game or eggs are brought in by the men. The guide Matthias makes a very good omelette of the wild birds' eggs, As soon as breakfast is over the Bishop takes down the tents, and folds them and puts them into their respective sacks, some of us wash up the breakfast things and put into the waggons our bundles, which serve for seats during the journey. Others take a walk in advance of the caravan until the rest rejoin them. [Illus. 1] In the meantime the men go to seek the horses, 14 in number, besides two colts and a foal, and by the time they are harnessed and the caravan overtakes us, we have¹ said our prayers and finished our meditation. The signal is given to mount, and in a few minutes we are closely packed in our covered wagons, drawn by two horses, and thus we sit, singing and praying and reading by turns, except when prevented by the jolting. . . . We proceed on our way for four hours at a time, towards the end of which we are eagerly looking out for the signal to camp. . . . The head guide acts as outrider during the whole journey. . . . He is a fine, strong man, and forms quite a picture mounted on his beautiful black courser, whose harness is the embroidered bead-work of the Indians. Matthias holds the lasso and gallops at full speed in advance, first on one side of the road, then on the other. Sometimes he goes a long way seeking a place where both wood and water are to be found. . . . The spot for dinner being chosen the horses are taken from the carts and let loose to graze and refresh themselves in the neighbouring lakes and streams. The fire, for which we help to gather the wood, is lighted and the meal prepared. A break of two hours is allowed at this time. We wash up the dinner tins and try to perform our morning toilet out of sight of our travelling companions, for the tents are not pitched at midday. If there is any time before the caravan starts we take our recreation walking along the road, in other words, the cart ruts. Then when the caravan comes up to us, we remount and sit on our bundles until the end of the next four hours, for it is not allowed to stop the caravan while on march. We have no recreation after supper so we take it on the road. The supper is made and arranged the same as dinner and breakfast. Afterwards the tents are erected, we spread our rugs on the ground, and if the mosquitoes are troublesome we fumigate and close the tents for the night.

Our canvas dormitories (for we have two) are 12 ft. by 9 ft. There are four of us in each tent; two place themselves with their heads at the end and the other two each side of the opening. . . . A tin basin, which serves for a soup tureen at dinner, has treasured in it about a pint of water (full of insects), and into this we dip our towels and wipe our faces and hands. This was sometimes the only wash we could get for days together. We consider ourselves very fortunate if we can, during the day, get near to a stream or lake, but often these beautiful spots are surrounded by marshy ground in which grow long reeds, so that to approach the water one would have to run the chance of sinking in the mud. The men take off their shoes and stockings and go into the water to fill our pails for tea. They are very clever in detecting unwholesome ponds or lakes, though they look very clear and good. Our beds made and the supper things washed, Mgr. calls the men together for night prayers, in which, at his desire, we gladly join, when it is not too late. The Bishop recites them himself and gives his blessing at the end. After this we retire, taking care to place our clothes under the waterproof cloak (in case it should rain during the night), and then we cover ourselves with our woollen rugs. Our sleep is sometimes disturbed by a sudden gust of wind which threatens to overturn our little canvas convent, shaking it to its foundations, or by a horse grazing too near our heads, which are in danger of being struck by its nose or feet. The croaking of the numberless frogs, or the cry of the prairie dog or wolf has occasionally roused us, but generally speaking, we sleep better than in our beds.

On June 18th, in passing through a swamp about 10.30 a.m., the shaft of one of our carts was broken and we were obliged to encamp. The guide cut down a large branch from a tree and in a short time the cart was fit for use again. During the afternoon we passed through a stream 15 or 16 feet wide, with five or six feet of soft mud on each side, in which the horse stuck when climbing the far bank, and again we had to dismount. . . . That evening the mosquitoes were very troublesome, and to provide the horses with a place of refuge the Bishop set fire to the dry grass. The moment the poor animals see the smoke they rush into it, for they know the mosquitoes won't go near it. Unfortunately our little foal had not sense enough to stay in the smoke and was stung to death. . . .

On June 19th we travelled through beautiful woods till 11 a.m., when we came in sight of the open prairie. Here we dined, and before leaving took a provision of wood to last for some days, [illus. 2] We cannot better describe the appearance of the prairie here than by saying it looks like the boundless sea, its undulations resemble the waves, in the distance it has even the colour of the sea. . . . During the night it was so windy We feared every minute our tents would be turned over. There are now neither woods nor hills to favour our accustomed walk. [June 20th] In the course of the morning we traversed four streams. In the second the large waggon became embedded in the mud and the horses fell several times. Our two horses were taken to assist them, whilst the Bishop and the men pushed at the wheels with all their strength. After half-an-hour's efforts they succeeded in extricating it. In the fourth stream it was our fate to be at a standstill; it was not till we had lightened the burden by some of us descending on the muddy bank that the horses were able to draw out the cart. . . . [Y/us.3]

On June 21st, the feast of St Aloysius, our little altar was decorated with a bunch of wild flowers equalling in beauty any hot-house flowers we had ever seen. There were a great many cranes flying about the numerous lakes and marshes that we passed. Matthias was very fortunate with his gun. Amongst other booty he brought home a young fox, which he boiled with a large piece of bacon and ate for his supper. We were not to pass this day without another misfortune in crossing streams. The heavy waggon was again embedded in the mud, and some of the things fell off and our beds (or rugs) took a little journey down stream. Everything had to be taken off the waggon before the horses could move it. . . . This afternoon we passed through the widest stream that we had yet to traverse: it was at least 35 feet wide, though not more than 2V% feet deep. We passed without incident. It gives rather a strange sensation to feel that you are being driven through the water and to hear the men shouting and the horses dashing through it. The flowers growing around us to-day were very abundant and beautiful. . . . We tied several bouquets round the poles of the tents under the statues of the Sacred Heart and Our Blessed Lady. The rain which began to fall about 5 p.m. obliged us to camp an hour earlier than usual; it lasted without intermission till two a'clock the next afternoon. Our preparations for the night took rather longer than usual. The rain runs down the sides of the tents and forms little pools, which we with difficulty avoided. Nevertheless, though the grass was so wet and the rain so heavy, we contrived to get to sleep. Several times during the night we had to change the position of the waterproof cloaks which covered us, when any part was getting more than an ordinary shower. [June 22nd] Next morning the Bishop said Mass in one tent and Father Soulier in another, so that four of us assisted at it and went to Holy Communion in each tent. It was raining and blowing so much that we were obliged to remain in one place all the time for fear the tent should be moved — so Holy Communion was brought to us. . . . At breakfast we all sat very close together under the canvas, our tin cups arranged on the ground in front of us. The Bishop and Priests breakfasted in their tent. We enjoyed our cup of tea or coffee, and are now quite accustomed to do without milk. We have not tasted bread since we left Qu'appelle. We are still in the open prairie, not a tree, scarcely a bush to be seen.

About 1 p.m. the weather cleared a little and word came from the guide to be ready to start at 2 p.m. Soon we came to a stream about 40 feet wide, with a strong current. The large waggon drawn by the two new horses, and laden with 1000 lbs weight of luggage, sank in the middle of the stream as deep as the axle-tree of the wheels. The horses tugged and pulled, but to no purpose, and there was no alternative but to unload the cart — no small labour with such heavy boxes as ours. It took an hour and a-half for the caravan to cross this stream. . . . We had not proceeded on our way more than a few paces when we came in sight of another stream, to be crossed with hardly less difficulty. In four hours we advanced two miles and crossed five streams. On June 23rd, about 10 a.m., in crossing a stream nearly 50 feet wide, the big cart again broke down and became embedded in the mud. Every means was tried to extricate it, four horses even were put to it, but in vain. So the guide gave orders for the rest of the caravan to pass, which was done in safety. We were obliged to camp and prepare dinner as well as we could without the men, who were all occupied in unloading the cart. Whether the horses were too tired or not, we do not know, but all of us joined in a good laugh at seeing the men themselves draw the empty cart across, the horses standing on the opposite bank, looking very stupid. The heat was unusually great in the afternoon and one had constantly to beat off mosquitoes; nevertheless, we cannot always escape their bites, and the faces and hands of some of us are very swollen.

About 6.30 am. on June 25th, our bundles were made and we were ready to start on our walk in front of the caravan. The men had gone in search of the horses. Mgr. said in a passing way, 'It will be time enough for you to start when the horses are in sight.' It was well we waited — the horses were lost. While the men were away we made a laundry dose to the beautiful lake near which we were encamped. We washed our own clothes and those of the Fathers. . . . The drying and folding were soon completed, the sun being excessively hot these days. . . . About 2 o'clock, Matthias came back looking very dejected and without the horses: he had walked more than twelve miles in search of them. After dinner they again set off; this time our good Bishop accompanied them. They walked all afternoon in the burning sun and returned about 5 o'clock without any success. The men were very disheartened, but could do nothing more than look for them; we could not move on our way till they were found.... About 7 p.m. the men were seen returning with the runaway horses. . . . The poor creatures, tormented by the mosquitoes, had fled to a wood about 27 miles distant. . . . During the day the two young Josephs had amused themselves searching for eggs in the ponds close by, and brought in more than 90, which made a good breakfast next day. (The eggs were very small: a boy would eat 10 at a meal.)

During supper on the evening of June 27th a party of savages came up to us; they were in a little cart drawn by one horse; another horse with a foal walked beside, and a boy with a gun preceded them. The boy came up and spoke to the men in the Cree language; he was a Christian and an orphan, and was hired by the women in the cart to hunt for them. They sat on the grass for some time watching us; we gave them a few biscuits, and after a time they drove away.. .. [June 28th] We had just spread our beautiful tablecloth for breakfast this morning when who should appear on the scene but our five savages of the previous evening. They sat on the grass and watched us. They were of the Cris tribe, with long black hair and feathers, and anything but a savage appearance; some were good-looking. They were enveloped in their once white blankets; they wore trousers, and some had ear-rings and necklaces of blue beads. One had a brass thimble suspended like a locket. They spoke to Matthias and asked him to tell us that since we were using their prairie they would like us to give them something. We gave them biscuits and some pieces of bacon, and filled their own tin cups with good tea. We noticed that they used a kind of skewer in eating rather than their fingers. . . . Their faces beamed with pleasure. . . . We continued our journey, descending towards the banks of the South Saskatchewan River. From the heights the view was magnificent. The river well deserves its name: Saskatchewan, which means 'fast-flowing', for it seems to rush forward impetuously. Although it is about a mile wide and there is considerable traffic between the two banks, there is as yet no other means of crossing than by raft. Travellers, baggage, vehicles, animals are placed on this raft which is surrounded by a railing about one foot high and four men ferry it across. . . . We waited from ten in the morning till three o'clock in the afternoon for our turn to cross. Our wagon and baggage were placed on board; then to our surprise, Monseigneur's wagon, a cart, five or six men and seven horses were added. It took some time to equalise the load and then the signal was given. Matthias and Joseph helped with the rowing. When we had all landed safe and sound on the other bank we breathed a fervent 'Deo Gratias'. [illus.4]

It was decided that we should not wait for the rest of the caravan as we had lost the greater part of the day waiting to cross the river. It was six o'clock and we were still some way from St. Laurent, our destination....

When we came in sight of the St. Laurent mission the bells rang out joyously and priests and people came out to meet us. We went to the Chapel where the Bishop gave Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament and we all sang the 'Te Deum.'

Our convent is extremely poor — a cottage, one storey high, without chairs or beds. We slept on the floor on our rugs and we certainly found that these beds were harder than our beds on the prairie.

Immediately after Mass on June 29th, Mgr. went through the ceremony of blessing the Convent. . . . When, according to the Ritual, the Bishop placed the crucifix on the wall, he turned to us and reminded us that we had come to help our Lord Himself to work for those souls that He had died to save, and that we could never suffer as much as He had endured for them.

On 30 June, four of the party left the mission of St Lawrence's for that of Prince Albert, 40 miles distant, where the little house, just four walls built of tree trunks, was placed under the patronage of St. Anne.

NOTES

1. The original diary was written, in French, in simple notebooks measuring c. 8¼ x 7 inches, and illustrated with roughly drawn sketches. Later, manuscript copies were made and illustrated with more finished copies of the original drawings, adding details taken from the artist's notes and embellished with decorative borders. The illustrations reproduced here are taken from these later copies, but omitting the borders. Extracts from the diary were translated into English and printed in the Sedgely Magazine during the centenary year of the Society in 1920, but the diary has not otherwise been published. As well as the description of the Sisters' journey across the Prairie in 1883, the diary also contains later entries, including references to Riel's Rebellion.

THE ARCHIVES OF THE ENGLISH PROVINCE OF THE SOCIETY
OF JESUS AT FARM STREET, LONDON. Part 2

The Rev. Francis O. Edwards, S.J.

With the achievement of Catholic emancipation in 1829, the 'Second Spring', and wider opportunities for expansion, the Society in England, with the approval and, indeed, the orders of the Roman authorities, began to turn its attention to foreign missions. Even before this, from the 1630s in fact, English Jesuits were deployed in the Maryland mission. Letters from January 23, 1772 until March 10, 1835, make up volume 25 of these archives. They include original letters from the hand of Bishop Carroll of Baltimore, Bishop Neale his co-adjutor, and from a number of Jesuits. The British Guiana mission was entrusted to the English Province in 1857. A series of letters and reports contained in two files covers the history of the mission from the foundation year until 1939. It contains, among other items, Bishop Etheridge's notes for a history of the mission up to 1877, although the relevant material for the period prior to the Jesuit take-over is missing, presumed destroyed. Letters for the Rhodesian, formerly known as the Zambesi, mission begin at 1878 and continue until 1934. There are many original letters, and most recently, by courtesy of the Rev. W. F. Rea, S.J., transcripts of letters still in Zambia itself have also been added. There are also tables of general statistics and a clip on colleges. An interesting relic is part of the diary of an early pioneer, Peter Prestage, S.J., for 1882—3, eaten by white ants through some of the pages but still preserving valuable information. The other half of this diary is still in Africa but a microfilm of it has been sent to London. Here also is the first register of the first school opened at Empadeni in 1887 by Father Prestage in the days of Lobengula. Admittedly, it is not a prepossessing relic, being a small note-book of the cheapest kind.

Until quite recently, the English Province had a direct hand in missionary endeavour in India. The Catholic mission at Calcutta was founded by the Prince Bishop of Paderborn in 1802. English Jesuits went to the mission from 1834. By that time it was clear that English-speaking missionaries would be indispensable if proper liaison were to be maintained with the paramount political, and growing cultural, influence. A clip on general history and lists of personnel includes a brief history, printed in India, consisting of three magazine articles with written notes at the end; also a copy of the 'Relatio . . . fundationis' of 1802; a report for 1832—41, and a list of Fathers and Brothers from 1834—1847. Another clip of outgoing letters from India covers 1834—1847, while nineteen letters addressed from Dublin, Rome, London, Clongowes, and Stonyhurst deal at least in part with this mission from 1833 to 1848. With the sale of St Francis Xavier's College to the Protestant Bishop of Calcutta, Dr D. Wilson, at the end of 1847, the connection of this Province with India seems to have ended for a time. Apart from a few miscellaneous and undated papers, there are general accounts and financial details for 1834—1849. The English Jesuits' connection with India was re-established a few years later. Documents on the Bombay mission, including printed memorials, especially concerning the Portuguese question, go from 1861 to 1911, though very intermittently. There are also letters on Madras (1871), Karachi (1870—71), an address from Travancore of 1881, Poona letters of 1889-92, and one from Cannanore (January 24, 1893).

A mission in Jamaica began in 1837 and consisted of one Jesuit. The mission was held by the English Province until December 8, 1893, when it was transferred to the Maryland and New York Province. Correspondence in this archive goes over the whole period of its association with the English Province and even beyond: until 1901 to be precise. Among the documents is an interesting diary for 1872 kept by one of the Fathers. It mentions many details of local life and illustrates a few of them with small sketches. The first move made to bring British Jesuits to Honduras seems to have been in 1821. The first superior of the English mission was appointed only in 1853, although until 1875 his charge was to some extent subordinate to Jamaica. In 1882, Salvador de Pietro became Superior, Prefect Apostolic in 1889, and received consecration as a bishop in 1893. On December 8 of that year, Honduras was transferred to the American Jesuit Province of Missouri. Correspondence at Farm St runs from 1821 to 1897, and includes statistics and two sketch-maps; but is scanty being limited to some fifty-two pieces.

Malta, as is a matter of general knowledge, came under enduring British political influence at the close of the Napoleonic wars by the treaties associated with Vienna. With the early 1840s, English cultural pressures were considerable; and there was some fear of a Kulturkampf between the indigenous Catholic tradition of the island, with strong Italian influences, and the new factor being rather forcefully introduced by the Anglo-Saxons. The British Jesuits were called in, primarily by the authorities of the Catholic Church and the Society itself, but also by sheer destiny, perhaps, to avert, as far as they could, a serious clash. Their task was to preserve the essentially Catholic features of Maltese higher education, at the same time making it compatible with northern tradition. In this they were at least tolerated by the English civil administration as the lesser of two evils, the worse one being unmitigated Italian and Mediterranean influence. Nevertheless, there were many cross-currents as ever in this small but highly complex island, and the history of the colleges run at different times by the English Province was far from unchequered. Farm St papers on the Maltese ventures fill three large deeds envelopes. Among them are two small diaries kept by the Minister, or vice-Superior, between 1848 and 1858 when the first college — St Paul's as it became — was kept open. The staff was mainly Italian, although British Jesuits taught English and mathematics. The General of the Society leaned rather to Italian, it seems, than English culture, if only because the islanders themselves were more in sympathy with this at that time; and it then seemed a more obvious vehicle for Catholic education. The Archbishop of Valletta was not friendly to the anglicizing element, and even refused to give the college a church. Financial difficulties were present from the start. Finally, Father Beck, the General, deemed it prudent to yield to the views of the Archbishop, and on May 21, 1858, the college was suppressed. The need for higher education remained, however, and since, for political reasons, the government refused to countenance an Italian college as such, it was almost inevitable that the English Province should be called in to make a fresh attempt: this time with what had once been a Protestant school at St Julian's Bay. Father John Morris, S.J., later editor of The Month and well-known for his writing, was appointed Rector on July 26, 1877, and the school opened in November. Its transactions mainly fill another envelope (deeds). On the whole this College of St Ignatius flourished for some years; but there were difficulties, this time with the University of Valletta, very much under the same enduring Italian influence. The college came to an end in 1907, although Joseph Dobson, S.J., remained behind to wind up its affairs, and only returned to England in the following year. Property rights in the college were not relinquished for some time: papers from 1908 till 1928, in fact, form the third section of this part of the archive.

Since the British civil administration took a lively interest in these colleges, the letters from the Governors of Malta and other officials concerned give the subject a wider appeal, perhaps, than other documents, or than many of them: hence the somewhat larger treatment given them here. A movement began to re-open a college run by British Jesuits soon after the first world war. Times had changed, and from 1921 to 1923, the British authorities, hesitant enough in the 19th century, fully favoured the re-entry of the English Province to the island in an educational way. Negotiations came to nothing, but they occupy another file. The failure was due, as much as anything, to pressure on the manpower of the Society in England and elsewhere. Special clips among these Maltese papers deal with one or two personal causes celebres; also the question of mixed marriages between Catholics and non-Catholics, a problem which came to the fore between 1891 and 1896, and involved correspondence with the Archdiocese of Westminster as well as with the Governor. Not only the English Province but the Sicilian was concerned with Maltese higher education at one time; and representing as they did diverse ethnic cultures, something like rivalry developed between them, if not a serious difference, as is apparent from documents for 1888—1898 when the problem of English versus Italian influences in education became rather acute. A few interesting transcripts of original documents on the island and elsewhere illuminate the expulsion of the Jesuits from Malta in 1768 and events leading up to it. A printed monograph of Dr Alfredo Mifsud, published in Malta in 1914, enlarges on the same topic.

The above collections, systematized according to place, consist in large part of letters and reports of individuals. Sometimes individual members of the Society and others left behind sufficient letters, or were important enough in their own right, to justify the classification of their correspondence, as it was thought, under their own names. The following are the more significant collections, perhaps, of this kind, but from the foregoing it will be evident, no doubt, that the fact that an individual is thus listed does not mean that some of his letters do not appear elsewhere under place- or other headings. The earliest collection of this kind fills volume 1, 'Notes and Fragments of Father Thorpe, 1585-1790'. John Thorpe, S.J., was at the English College, Rome, from 1757 till the suppression in 1773. He stayed on in Rome, acting as agent for his brethren until his death on April 12, 1792. He was professor, seemingly, of literae humaniores and English penitentiary at St Peter's. He was responsible for saving much and even most of the English Province records from loss or destruction at the time of the suppression. Thus he deserves special mention even in so short a paper. The best of what he saved or salvaged is now at Stonyhurst. The volume under review, as the name implies, is in the first part, mainly a collection of torn letters and scraps, but there are a number of complete original letters and transcripts in the volume, and the whole is of considerable interest if only for some of its autographs and signatures. Among them may be found writings of Dr Barrett, President of Douai College — his is the first fragment, of November 19, 1585 — Robert Persons, Richard Blouant, Giles Schondonck, John Gerard, Ralph Bickley, all of the Society of Jesus, and, conjecturally, of Tobie Matthew. There is a good deal in the way of notes and transcripts on the English College, Rome, itself in the hands of Father Thorpe. Another volume is filled with his extracts for 1707—1773, while transcripts of his own correspondence from Rome with Henry, 8th Baron, Arundell of Wardour, between 1773 and 1791, fills another. Charles Brooke, S.J., likewise compiled interesting historical notes and transcripts for the 17th and 18th centuries which fill two small volumes.

As one would expect from the introduction to this brief survey, the more numerous, and probably more significant, letters kept at Farm St date from the middle of the 18th century. A volume of letters (351 ff.) from bishops and cardinals for 1753—1853 includes correspondence from Cardinal Wiseman and Bishop Ullathorne of Birmingham. A companion volume (492 ff.) is made up of letters from non-Jesuits, mainly priests and Catholic laymen, for 1766—1857. Included are a number of letters of Dr George Oliver, the antiquarian and scholar, who published a valuable Collectanea on the Society in Britain (two editions, Exeter, 1838 and 1845). Dr John Lingard, a shining light of Ushaw, is represented in original correspondence, including his own letters, which fill a 260-folio volume and run from 1818 to 1860. Among his correspondents in this volume was Canon M. A. Tierney. Another two volumes of transcripts of Lingard's correspondence cover together 1818—1851. Among other 18th and early 19th century collections, one must note a volume of original letters of Father Charles Plowden, S.J., running from 1764 to 1821 (428 ff.); also transcripts of his and Father William Strickland's letters for 1779—1791; letters of Marmaduke Stone (1788-1832) (124 ff.), of Nicholas Sewell (1776-1832) (124 ff.) and of James Connell (1792-1803) (67 ff.), all of the Society. These letters were taken to Rome in 1895 by John Hungerford Pollen S.J., at Father General's request, re-arranged in chronological order, and rebound in July 1898. Dr John Milner, Vicar-Apostolic of the Midland District, wrote fairly often to Charles Plowden and his brother Robert, also a Jesuit, and to others whose letters are bound together in two volumes for the period 1790 to 1826, the year of Milner's death. To complete a reasonably detailed picture of life for the Jesuits and ex-Jesuits in the years preceding, during, and following the suppression, i.e. at the restoration, there is also the volume of William Strickland's letters for 1756 to 1811 (244 ff.). Further information on the English scene at this time is contained in volume 10 (327 ff.), 'Scottish Mission: 18th and 19th Century'. Thomas Glover, S.J., sent to Rome in 1825, was secretary to the General from 1829 until 1849. During his stay he compiled three volumes of historical transcripts which went to Stoneyhurst. The third volume was copied once again, and very legibly, by a Servite nun of South Tottenham in 1896. This copy was given to the Rev. J. H. Pollen. It bears the title, 'Re-establishment of the English Province, S.J., 1773-1829'. A further mine of information on this era of Province history is provided by Brother Henry Foley's five manuscript volumes on which his widely-known 'Records of the English Province . . .' are based. There is a fair amount of unpublished material here, although the ore takes a good deal of digging out from the inevitable informality and almost disordered array at times of what are essentially personal notes.

Penetrating more deeply into the 19th century, the Rev. Joseph Stevenson, S.J., was, in his day, Rector of All Saints' (C. of E.) Church, Leighton Buzzard, part-editor of the Calendar of State Papers (P.R.O.), a scholar of eminence, and eventually a Jesuit. He maintained a wide correspondence, and Farm St possesses a fair number of his received letters. Four loose-leaf books, home-made from contemporary (?) printed works, contain letters of 1831—32 from R.Wedall and J.Smith; of 1833 with R.Pitcairn, R.Wedall and I.Morton while the recipient was working in the Department of MSS. of the British Museum; of 1829—33, and of 1834 with largely the same correspondents. Other letters of Stevenson's include an interesting correspondence with J. Hosack, the writer on Mary, Queen of Scots, on precisely that subject; with various Catholic notables, bishops, fellow-Jesuits and scholars, including Sir J. Duffus Hardy and his colleagues in connection with the publications of the Rolls Series. Stevenson's interests ranged over a broad field of scholarship, and a considerable number of transcripts, mainly medieval, from his hand or by his commission, are kept at Farm St. They fill fifteen foolscap files and are principally in French, Latin and English. They begin with Alcuin and end in the 17th century; include John de Trokelow's annals of Edward II (from a Cotton MS.), documents from the Vatican before 1500, from the Inquisition at Lisbon (demolished 1822), antiquities of Leighton-Buzzard (Henry II—Richard II), a list of historians from the 11th to the 14th centuries whose work at the time Stevenson wrote was either in print or manuscript, the Nuncio Grimani's correspondence with Cardinal Farnese of 1543, de Selve's dispatches to the King of France for 1547—48, Acts of Privy Council for 1555 (Harleian MS., 353, ff. 146-17%), Queen Christina of Sweden's Draco Normannicus, and many other documents including royal letters of 1438 to 1605. One may note in passing there is an extensive collection of Elizabethan and Jacobean transcripts at Farm St, but these are, for the most part, in active and continual use by the historiographers of the Province and are not generally available.

Further collections of 19th century letters include transcripts of Canon M. A. Tiemey's (editor of Dodd's Church History) letters to ecclesiastics and scholars. The Rev. Henry Coleridge, S.J., who wrote a life of Mary Ward, left behind a correspondence on the subject. There are also copies of letters sent to him by John Henry Newman. Richard Cooper's letters to Thomas Cooper, of 1842—44, deserve mention, but more important are those of Henry Schomberg Kerr, S.J., who has been honoured with a full-length biography. The archive has his letters from Cyprus of 1879, papers concerning the Kerr family at Dalkeith (1738—1896), his chaplaincy to Lord Ripon, Viceroy of India, a correspondence between Lady Kerr and E. Bellasis of 1850 and 1870, and H. S. Kerr's letters from the Zambesi mission together with his journals and diaries. Joseph Keating, S.J., a former editor of The Month, left a number of letters, among them two from A. Conan Doyle of 1894. Augustus Henry Law, S. J., another pioneer of the Zambesi and Rhodesian mission, is well represented in letters, journals and diaries for the period 1845—1880. Among the letters of J. H. Pollen, S.J., historian (dL 1925), is a holograph from W.E. Gladstone of May 15, 1894. Edward Purbrick, S.J., Provincial for the uniquely long period of eight years (1880—88), was probably responsible for a Liber Responsorum of 1864 to 1896 recording the answers of the Generals to various queries ranging from the time to be given to examinations in philosophy to whether The Month should discuss the question of the Papal temporal power. Another Purbrick note-book has for subject the Provincial, General, and Procurators' Congregations between 1883 and 1906. This Jesuit was an ardent educationist, and a collection of his printed papers on higher Catholic education is useful for related topics from 1871 to 1895. Apart from what may be learned of him in his letters, there is an anonymous MS. account of him by one who knew him personally. A well-known writer in his day on spiritual matters was Joseph Rickaby, S.J., whose diaries and correspondence, with a few other papers, run mainly from 1889 to 1926. William Amherst, SLJ, brother of a bishop, is recorded not only in letters to his mother and to the Poor Qares, but also in a rather valuable collection of documents, notes and transcripts, including some original correspondence and press-cuttings, for a history of the Catholic Church in England from 1748 to 1850, with notes for subsequent years also. A separate foolscap box-file holds the correspondence of his brother Francis Kerril Amherst, Bishop of Northampton from 1858 until his resignation in 1879. Among them are letters written when the bishop was present at the First Vatican Council describing its incidentals to family and friends. James Albany Christie, S.J., bequeathed to posterity an album of correspondence and press-cuttings with other papers which throw light on — inter alia — a case in Chancery in 1873 involving the Baroness Weld. Another court-case which left behind a considerable amount of paper was associated with the Rev. W. H. Eyre, S.J., while the Caddell-Jerningham case of 1888 involved Father Peter Gallwey, a well-known writer, in a charge of 'undue influence' in the making of a will. With the exception of Father J. Stevenson, and possibly Brother Foley, the largest number of papers and letters in the archives here were left behind by Herbert Thurston, S.J., who wrote journalistically but very reliably on a vast number of topics. He reached depth in several of his researches especially in the field of psychic phenomena. Unfortunately, his handwriting is often very difficult to decipher. John Morris, S.J., editor of The Month for a time, and author, also left behind a significant correspondence which includes original letters from Cardinal Manning. Many of the documents outlined above have already been used in various published works.

Every growing archive collects a certain number of documents which do not fit readily into any general scheme of classification, or which deserve mention in their own right. Among Farm St papers of this kind one may note four short tracts or studies formerly among the Phillipps MSS., with their catalogue number in that collection 'News from Spain, 1618' (7186) (cf. British Museum, Stowe MS. 281, a pamphlet by Thomas Scott, printed in 1620 and suppressed, and reprinted in Somer's Tracts, vol. ii, 1809); a 'Life of Pope Gregory the Great' (8694); 'Rome's Plea for her Popes' (4939); and 'England's Safety' (9454). All appear to be in an early 17th century hand. An original letter, seemingly, of Michael Baius, the celebrated theologian of Louvain, to Father Polanco, Secretary of the Society, bears the date March 17, 1569. The oldest document in the collection is an indenture concerning the village of Hyndley in Lancashire, and is dated March 25, 1537 (28 Henry VIII). A devil's advocate view against raising Cardinal Robert Bellarmine to the altars is provided in 'Voto dell . . . Cardinale Domenico Passionei fatto e presentato a N. S. Papa Benedetto XIV nella causa di beatificazione del . . . Cardinale Roberto Bellarmino', a manuscript of 231 pages written in 1757 at Rome. A gift of Alexander Falierton, Esq., was the French MS. 'Tableau de l'Ordre Religieuse en France avant et depuis l'Edite de 1768'. It is possible it came from the library of the Archbishop of Paris when the Archeveche was destroyed in 1831. It is a neatly drawn-up catalogue of 210 pages giving details on the principal French foundations of the various Orders and Congregations throughout France, viz. their numbers, houses and incomes. The small 4to volume retains its original 18th (?) century binding in red morocco leather with embossed spine and gold tooling. It carries the following notice on p. 210, 'Delibere et approuve en l'assemblee generale du Clerge de France sous la presidence de Monseigneur l'Archeveque de Narbonne, Primat: session de . . . [1773] . . . 2^o exemplaire'. A curious heraldic album with coats of arms in colour,

'Preuves de Noblesse des Dem [oiselles — cf. index] de St Cir', is another leather-bound small 4to volume of some 100 pages, each indicating the descent of a girl received at the college. Its conjectural provenance may be the same as the last. From the other side of the world are thirty holograph oaths of obedience made in accordance with the Papal Bulls Ex illa die of 1715 and Ex quo singulari of 1742. Such oaths had to be taken by all Catholic missionaries to the Far East between 1742 and 1942. Signatures include the Bishop of Peking's, of Nanking's, of Macao's and also for some Annamite priests for whom the oath had been translated according to an early form of the romanization of that language. Some of these missionaries were Jesuits, all are of the 18th century. For the other side of the world, there are notes and papers on the unsuccessful canonization cause of John Palafox (1600- 59), Bishop successively of Angelopolis (near Mexico) and Osma. Original letters to the Rev. William Bliss from the Rev. John Keble, and from the latter to William Henry Bliss, son of the clergyman, have been stuck in an album. The letters are dated from 1812 to 1866. There are also a few from Dr Pusey to W. H. Bliss seemingly taken — torn, in fact, and clumsily enough in places — from another similar album. This volume is inscribed, 'The library of William Henry Bliss, Oxford, 1866' with 'from' inserted before Bliss's name. It is further inscribed on f.1, 'Sent to the Rev.d H.J.Coleridge [S.J. July 29, 1870. Will. H. Bliss' - all in the latter's hand.

Artistically, the two most attractive documents, if historically among the less significant, are a communication of the spiritual privileges of the Society to the noble ladies Magdalen, Veronica and Anne Cecily, all of Hatstein: such communication was sometimes granted to notable benefactors of the Jesuits, and this document is signed by the General, Mutius Vitelleschi, given at Rome on March 8, 1628; also an authentication of a gift of relics of Saints Sulpicius and Aurelia to William Wolfgang, Duke of Neustadt, likewise signed by Vitelleschi, and dated from Rome, March 15, 1616. Both documents are illuminated on vellum, beautifully written in capitals in a Spanish (?) style in brown ink with gold initials. Although the illumination is not comparable in fineness of execution with the best work of this kind, it is competent enough, the same hand apparently producing both documents.

The Farm St archive, to sum up, is a small highly specialized collection, but having connections with subjects more generally pursued, and certainly indispensable for some aspects at least of the history of the Roman Catholic Church in Britain.

Since this article was written, there have been considerable additions to our archival holdings. Many of these are of fairly recent date; the papers of fathers recently dead, for example, so that they are not yet available for study. We have a forty-year rule limiting access: forty years from the date of death of an individual for his papers and letters; forty years from the date of any administrative paper. A number of deeds and testamentary material have come to us including the papers of the Leicester Fields Estate in London and the Ridley Hall Estates in Northumberland, formerly belonging to the Earl of Strathmore. More recently letters and papers connected with George Tyrrell, S.J., and the 'Old Catholics', including Bishop A. Matthew, and many papers and letters of Herbert Thurston, S.J., are now accessible. His original notes and correspondence in connection with his well known work on poltergeists and mystical phenomena are now open to inspection to bona fide scholars. A fuller treatment of this subject will be included in a later number of this journal.

THE LEEDS DIOCESAN ARCHIVES

The Very Rev. Mgr George T. Bradley

The archives of the Diocese of Leeds include not only the records of the present Diocese which was established by the Apostolic Brief Quae ex hac on 20 December 1878, but also those of the former Diocese of Beverley, and, in common with other diocesan collections, part of the papers of the earlier Vicars Apostolic. The archives of the Northern Vicariate have probably not survived as fully as those of the Midland District or of the London District now preserved at Birmingham and Westminster respectively. The Vicars Apostolic of the North rarely resided in the same place as their predecessors, consequently their archives appear to have moved from place to place. Some papers were inevitably left behind, and so are now to be found in a number of depositories.¹

A number of the papers originating from Lancashire are now in the Lancashire Record Office at Preston. These include part of the papers of Bishop Edward Dicconson, for example his clergy list for 1741, and in the Weld Bank Papers, his four volumes of diaries when he was assistant to Lawrence Mayes, the Vicars Apostolic's agent in Rome.² Perhaps the fullest collection of the papers of the Vicars Apostolic of the North are to be found in the Ushaw Collection, preserved at St Cuthbert's College, Ushaw, Durham. The Ushaw MSS. are three bound volumes and several files of documents concerned with the government of the Church in the North of England from 1650 to 1850. They include the records of the visitation and confirmation tours of the Vicars Apostolic between 1723 and 1788.³

The remaining principal part of the Vicariate papers is to be found in the Leeds Diocesan Archives. This collection seems to have had its origin in York about 1720, when a secular clergy house was established in Lop Lane, later Little Blake Street. The missionary priest in York was usually someone of importance. Edward Parkinson, Bryan Tunstall and Thomas Daniel were each Vicar General to the Vicars Apostolic between 1711 and 1769. In 1770 Bishop William Walton came to reside with the priest in York and continued there until his death in 1780.⁴ Although the next four bishops lived elsewhere, Bishop John Briggs returned to York in 1836 bringing with him the papers of his four predecessors, Matthew Gibson, William Gioson, Thomas Smith and Thomas Penswick. These, together with the papers which had accumulated at Little Blake Street, appear to have been transferred to the bishop's new residence at Fulford House, York.

On the death of Bishop Briggs, the next bishop, Robert Cornthwaite moved in 1862 to Springfield House, Little Woodhouse, in Leeds. He brought the diocesan archives with him from York and they were stored in a specially prepared room in the basement of Bishop's House. Although the bishop, by then Bishop Poskitt, again changed house, the bulk of the archives remained at Springfield House. From 1939 to 1956 the archives were virtually untouched, but 1956 the old Bishop's House became the Diocesan Curia and some work began on sorting the papers. In 1970 the Curia, together with the archives were transferred to their present home in North Grange Road, Headingley.

The main collection consists of the personal papers of the various bishops from 1688 to the present. For many dioceses a curial administration did not appear until well into the present century. The bishop's papers represent then a wide range of documents, and the following brief conspectus will perhaps illustrate this.

1. Bishop James Smith (1688—1711). His papers include abull of Clement X dispensing him from the canonical defect, 'ab haeresia' before the reception of orders. There are a number of other Roman documents addressed to him when he became Vicar Apostolic. It is not a large collection but included amongst his papers are the private wills of Cuthbert Morley of Thumham (Lanes) dated 1712 and Margaret Howard of Durham (1718) and a donation to the Franciscans at Osmotherley for 1709. There are scarcely any papers for the episcopates of Bishop George Witham (1716-1725) and Bishop Dominic Williams, O.P. (1726—1740). There is an odd letter from Edward Parkinson, missioner at Wycliffe, and former secretary to Bishop Smith, on the financial arrangements for some Yorkshire missions in 1734; and another from Rev. Edward Hatton, O.P. at Huddleston Hall to Bryan Tunstall at York in 1740, sending him a copy of the Propaganda document from the late Bishop William's archives on the prodecure to be adopted on the death of a Vicar Apostolic.
2. Bishop Edward Dicconson (1740—1752). Amongst another small collection is an account book for 1738—1745 and a note-book containing the list of letters which he wrote between September 1741 and December 1751. There is an interesting packet of 13 letters from Rev. Peter Grant in Rome to Dicconson. Grant was the son of the laird of Blairfindy, Glenlivet, and became the Scottish agent in Rome in 1737. It was no doubt because of his Jacobite sympathies that Dicconson sought the assistance of Grant as his agent in Rome. Two of his brothers were in exile with the Stuart court in Rome, where Grant was also resident. There is a fascinating reference to Prince Charles Edward appearing at one of the Carnival Balls in Rome in highland dress.
3. Bishop Francis Petre (1752—1775). There are a few papers of administration of the District including letters to William Walton, his coadjutor. There is the first example in this collection of a printed pastoral for 1753 and there is the original of his private will signed in 1771.
4. Bishop William Walton (1775—1780). The series now begins to take on a more typical format. There is a short series of letters to the bishop dealing with donations to various missions, mostly in Lancashire (e.g. Charles Townley's Bequest). There are the customary grants of faculties from Rome forwarded by Christopher Stonor, the usual Vicar's agent in Rome. There is a transcript of his instructions to his executor in 1778 and fragments of a personal note-book with a list of Mass obligations and notes on confirmations and visitations. There are also some copies of the oaths taken by the Jesuits in the Northern District, on their suppression.

5. Bishop Matthew Gibson (1780—1790). There is a continuous series of Pastoral Letters commencing at this time, some printed, others in the original handwritten draft. There is a note-book containing the bishop's draft of his status of the Northern District for 1787 which he was to forward to Rome. Once again there is a collection of letters to the Bishop on a variety of District matters; faculties from Rome, legacies to missions, establishment of funds, including one on behalf of the suppressed Jesuits in the district.
6. Bishop William Gibson (1790—1821). A much larger collection of papers is to be found in this group. There are a number of letters from the other Vicars Apostolic, including a series dealing with the negotiations which Gibson carried out on behalf of the Vicars Apostolic on compensating for the loss of Douay College. He had himself been President there. There is also preserved the Bishop's Diary or what is more accurately described as his Faculty Book. In this, between 1792 and 1797, the bishop lists the French emigre priests to whom he granted faculties in the Northern District. There is a sad note for January 1793, 'Monseigneur d'Amicile, who ordained me priest, was guillotined at Cambrai when 90 years of age. He was suffragan Bp. there.' There are twelve files of documents in all, sorted chronologically, but not yet listed.
7. Bishop Thomas Smith (1821-1831). There are 521 documents largely made up of correspondence addressed to him, including letters from Pius VIII, the other Vicars Apostolic and Dr John Lingard. All are sorted chronologically, numbered, listed and indexed by subjects.
8. Bishop Thomas Penswick (1831—1836). The earliest documents are dated June 1824. There are the letters for his appointment as Vicar Apostolic, some of his own letters to his coadjutor, altogether a collection of 237 items, sorted, numbered, listed and indexed by subjects.
9. Bishop John Briggs (1836—1861). Bishop Briggs was Vicar Apostolic of the Northern District (1836—1840), Vicar Apostolic of the Yorkshire District (1840-1850), and then the first Bishop of Beverley (1850- 1861). This is the largest collection of documents in the archives, numbering over 3,000 items, commencing with letters from his family when he was a student at Crook Hall and Ushaw, correspondence when he was the missionary at Chester, when he was President of Ushaw, and then as Bishop. He appears to have preserved almost any papers which came to him. As one of the senior members of the restored hierarchy, Bishop Briggs was frequently consulted by his episcopal colleagues. There are interesting letters from Thomas Grant as a student at the English College in Rome, then as Rector of the College, and later as Bishop of Southwark. Briggs had known Grant as a child in his parish in Chester.⁵ Briggs' papers cover almost three decades of nineteenth century Catholic life in very many of its aspects.⁶ There are some visitation returns for the period before the division of the old Northern District in 1840.⁷ There are also some letter books of the Bishop with copies of his own correspondence. All the papers are sorted, numbered, listed and indexed by subjects.

10. Bishop Robert Cornthwaite (1861—1891). This is also quite a considerable collection, covering a wide aspect of diocesan administration from the establishment of new missions to the problems of the appointment of clergy. There is a valuable visitation record of the Diocese of Beverely, commencing in 1861 with additions for 1875, a series of documents concerned with the division of the Diocese into Leeds and Middlesbrough in 1878. The Bishop's own notes from the hierarchy Low Week meetings for most of his episcopate are valuable for the light they throw on the discussions on the subject of Higher Education. In 1878 Bishop Comthwaite, following Manning's policies on seminaries, opened St Joseph's Seminary in Leeds. The papers concerned with the building, including letters of the architect George Goldie, some of the seminary accounts, and the Seminary Register (1878—1939) are included in the Cornthwaite Papers. There is also some material from the time when he was rector of the English College, Rome (1851—1860). At present the papers are sorted chronologically but have not yet been listed or indexed.

The papers of the bishops of the twentieth century have yet to be sorted and listed, but by this time diocesan administration had begun to take on a more departmental aspect and the bishop's papers are no longer concerned with the vast range of subjects which was the case in the nineteenth century. Already by the first quarter of the century, commissions for education, finance, building, rescue work and other areas of diocesan activity had been set up and begun to produce their own collection of records.⁸ However one general view of this can be traced in a series of volumes entitled 'Acta Diocesis Loidensis' (in the earliest volumes 'Beverlacensis'). These comprise the printed pastorals, letters ad clerum, reports of Diocesan Committees, of Diocesan Inspectors of Schools, and such like items, dating from 1861 to the present.

An additional part of the archives is entitled the Hogarth MSS. These are three volumes of transcripts of documents concerned with the secular clergy of Yorkshire dating from the mid-seventeenth century. They were transcribed by Rev. Robert Hogarth between 1842 and 43 from documents which have since disappeared. Robert Hogarth was the brother of Bishop William Hogarth. He was chaplain to the Stapletons of Carlton Hall (West Yorkshire) from 1810 to 1823, and then chaplain at Burton Constable for thirty-five years. In 1858 he became missionary at Dodding Green (Westmorland) where he died ten years later. His first volume is entitled 'An account of the Yorkshire Brethren's Fund, compiled from original documents'. Hogarth transcribed the original register 'A' of the Brethren which begins on 20 November 1676, although the register of benefactors goes back to 1660. These transcripts are valuable not only for the clergy lists of members but also for the minutes of the meetings of the Brethren in the second half of 17th century. There are also transcripts of accounts for 18th century, as well as details of some Yorkshire Missions' funds. The second volume of transcripts entitled 'Extracts and Copies of Books and Papers ...' gives the history of other mission funds, many of them from Rev. John Lonsdale's (1736—1802) account books when he was at York and Linton-on-Ouse. There is also a transcript of Bishop Matthew Gibson's Account Book. The third volume of Hogarth's transcripts is entitled 'An account of certain missionary stations in the South Deanery of the Yorkshire District'. It is possible that there were further volumes of Hogarth's work which have yet to be discovered.

Another item concerned with the secular clergy is the original account book of the Yorkshire agent, or procurator, for Douay College for 1722—1808, which details the Yorkshire funds for the College during those years. Presumably these were transferred to Ushaw in 1808.

The archives also contains a number of miscellaneous collections from various sources. The largest, some six files, is the Taylor of Cornsay MSS. These are the family papers of the Taylors of Cornsay House (Co. Durham) and cover the years between 1722 and 1850. They also include, through intermarriage, some papers of the Tancreds of Brampton (West Yorkshire). The papers came through Bishop Briggs who appears to have been the executor of the last of the Taylors who left the estate to Ushaw.

A later item is the Fitzgerald—Hart MSS., a collection of four books of news cuttings dealing with the various crises facing Catholic schools in Yorkshire at the beginning of this century. This collection has been found useful by students of Catholic education, together with various educational committee collections for the Diocese.

Diocesan archives do not contain as a general rule any parochial records. However, there are some documents dealing with individual parishes where the bishop, or a diocesan authority, has been involved. For example, there are a number of architectural drawings for various churches in the Diocese, including a very full set of J. H. Eastwood's for St Anne's Cathedral.

Through their kind assistance the West Yorkshire County Record Office in Wakefield has begun a survey of the parish records preserved in the parishes themselves, and has so far published five reports, copies of which are deposited with the Diocesan archives.

The task of conserving Diocesan records is an ongoing process. Not only are new items from the past being continually discovered, but at the same time records from the immediate past are being deposited in the archives. This presents storage problems for many dioceses, as well as deciding what modern records should be preserved.

The Archives has also attempted over the years to build up a library of reference books. For example, the Leeds Archives possesses a series of the Catholic Directory from 1803 to the present, and a set of the volumes of the Catholic Record Society. There is also a large collection of printed papers, pamphlets, pastoral letters of other bishops, circulars, college prospectuses, copies of which were often sent to the bishop and which have been preserved in his papers. These now form a separate collection, but have yet to be sorted and listed. Some of these items can be of considerable interest to the social historian. For example, rule books of early Benevolent and Friendly Societies found their way into the bishop's papers, e.g. Rules of the Hibernian Benevolent Burial Society, published in Liverpool in 1833. There are also rule books and reports of many diocesan societies.

The Archives also collects, as far as possible, printed parish histories and brochures published for church openings, parish jubilees and other such events. These are added to the printed papers collection.

The Archives have no full-time staff and although visitors are welcome to consult the documents, this can only be arranged by prior appointment made in writing to the Diocesan Archivist.

It is hoped that eventually a full catalogue and report on the Leeds Diocesan Archives will be published, following the lead given by the Birmingham Diocesan Archives.

PONTIFICAL MESSAGE TO CARDINAL SAMORE,
LIBRARIAN AND ARCHIVIST OF THE HOLY ROMAN CHURCH, 1979

SECRETARIA DISTATO
No. 27338

From the Vatican, 21 November 1979

Monsieur the Cardinal Antonio SAMORE
Librarian and Archivist of the Holy Roman Church

Monsieur the Cardinal.

The existence of the Scrinium Sanctae Romanae Ecclesiae is attested as early as the century which saw the end of the persecutions; its antiquity shows the interest shown by the Church in the conservation of its documents. The important function of Librarian and Archivist to the Holy Roman Church which your Eminence assumes today is further proof that the Church in our century continues to attach great importance to the memory of the past — history — and therefore to the archives which make the historical evidence possible.

The Holy Father was pleased to learn that your Eminence had been invited to preside the Congress of the Association of Archivists of the Church of France; the theme is 'Archives from ecclesiastical and religious sources as a specific element of the patrimony of humanity'. This year too the Congress has an added interest because of the solemn Session organised by UNESCO in connection with the International Week of Archives. His Holiness desires that this message should help the archivists to be more deeply conscious of the importance of the task which is entrusted to them in the service of the Church.

The nature of Christianity — a religion founded on the mystery of Christ — imparts a particular character to the documents concerning the life of the Church and her universal Mission. Amongst other results it follows that ecclesial and religious archives possess a specific character which marks their essence inprescriptibly no matter what their date, their form, their contents, the situation in which the hazards of time have placed them, or their origin whether diocesan or religious.

Hence the responsibility incurred by the various religious authorities, which they cannot ignore; they should preserve both ancient archives and documents referring to daily life. The Church should take particular care not to sell or alienate these manifestations of her activity and life. On the contrary, like the faithful steward of the Gospel she has a duty to guard and increase them so as to pass them on to the generations to come.

Canon Law stresses several times the responsibilities placed on the archivists: they have a specifically ecclesial role to fulfil. That is why the Sovereign Pontiff desires — through your Eminence — to encourage all those who devote themselves to this important work. For believers who study not only with a scientific end in view but in the light of faith, these archives of the Church witness to the Christian lives of previous generations through their history; in general, archives are part of the intellectual, cultural and spiritual heritage of each country and of the whole human race.

Archivists therefore preserve the heritage of the past by using all their expertise to grasp the full meaning and import of the documents they communicate. Furthermore, by their international collaboration, they contribute towards making the various countries and cultures meet one another in mutual understanding. The archivists thus become makers of peace and unity.

The Holy Father sends his cordial regards to M. Amadou Mahtar-M'Bow, Director General of UNESCO and to the important people who, by their presence, honour this Congress of the Association of Archivists of the Church of France. He prays that the Lord will bless the participants as well as the efforts of all those who preserve evidence from the past and strive to enhance its value in the eyes of contemporary society so that man will gain a true sense of history and thus a better understanding of his own day.

I am happy to transmit this message to your Eminence and I beg you to accept the assurance of my faithful devotedness, Agostino Card. Casaroli.

THE ASSOCIATION OF RELIGIOUS ARCHIVISTS OF IRELAND

The editor has been very insistent that I write a short account of the origins of the above Association. Let me begin by recalling the origins of the Catholic Archives Society itself. The first edition of the Society's Newsletter carried a report of that event. A letter from Ireland in June 1977 to Fr Conrad Pepler, O.P., Warden of Spode House Conference Centre, asked if 'the Centre offered courses to help religious sisters who, without any training for the work, found themselves in charge of their congregation's archives. Fr Conrad replied that he knew of no such course but that it might be a good idea to plan one . . . A course was plotted and a seminar was arranged to be held in Spode House from 18 to 20 July 1978. Over 30 attended.'

That first group had among it 6 Irish religious. Along with the Presentation and Louis Sisters, were members of the Passionist, Vincentian and Holy Ghost Fathers. Some lively discussion took place at this meeting which included professional archivists and librarians. It concluded with a call for the setting up of what we now know as the Catholic Archives Society (CAS). During the discussions it was agreed among the Irish group that there would be a renewal of contacts among them in the autumn.

This renewal of contact did indeed take place during the autumn of 1978. Visitation of each others archives was undertaken by the religious who had got acquainted at Spode House. Gradually a picture began to emerge. Many religious involved with preservation of archives had little or no professional training. Most were part-time, work in archives taking place when other administrative chores were less pressing. At the same time there was evidence of the existence of some very valuable archival material. Some questions then arose. How could religious best undertake the organisation of archives so as to benefit the whole Order, Congregation or Society to which they belonged? How to attain an easy retrieval system? Where go to look for archival aids? These questions (and there were many others) were easy to ask, but there was no one to answer them.

About this time too the extent of interest in archives was not quite clear. The Irish Catholic Directory, a very comprehensive work which lists the clergy and religious of Ireland, identifies only a few of the archivists belonging to the many religious houses. (In this connection it is perhaps also worthy of note that in the 1980 Directory only 6 of our 26 dioceses have named archivists.) This, then, seemed to be the measure of interest in archives. However, nothing was to be taken for granted. Here, the Conference of Major Religious Superiors (CMRS) entered upon the scene. Informal contact was made with this august body during the course of 1979 with a view to testing the degree of interest among member groups. The result was a letter from the Secretary-General, CMRS, at Milltown Park, Dublin, addressed to Major Superiors affiliated to Conference. The date was 18 October 1979. The letter referred to a recent Executive Council Meeting at which archives had been discussed. Now it was suggested that Superiors should 'nominate a person to attend an initial meeting of archivists'. As a result of this initiative there were 41 replies. This was indeed encouraging. A first meeting was fixed for 19 March 1980.

At the first meeting, after some informal discussion, a Steering Committee was formed with 6 members. There were quite evident signs at the meeting of active interest in archives and archives management. When this Steering Committee had in turn its first meeting at the end of April it was decided to invite Fr Mark Tierney, O.S.B., of Glenstal Abbey, to deliver a practical paper at the next general meeting and this would be a prelude to a business meeting later in the day. Fr Mark's paper ('An Approach to Archives Management') was very well received by an appreciative audience when about 40 archivists assembled for the next general meeting on 14 June 1980. At the business session on the same day the possibility of forming an archives association was considered and accepted in principle.

At the Steering Committee meeting in September 1980 it was decided to keep up the momentum by calling another general meeting for 11 October. In spite of the many demands on people at this busy time of the year, there were 29 interested religious at this meeting in October with apologies from 8 others. A proposal to set up an archives association was carried unanimously. A draft constitution, already circulated, was then amended and adopted as the constitution of the society.

Thus was born the Association of Religious Archivists of Ireland. At the next full session of the Association on 11 April 1981, the officers were elected. A notable contribution at this meeting was the paper read by Sr Ruth Kidson of the Holy Rosary Sisters entitled 'Archive Principles and Practices'. Her professional training and work as an archivist before she entered religious life gave Sr Ruth a great advantage over most of us.

It was perhaps this professional touch which gave Sr Ruth's listeners a taste for more. If the new Association was to command the respect of its members and hold out any attraction for the still uncommitted ones, it would have to have some professional input. It was at this stage that the Irish Society for Archives was approached. This is the professional body in Ireland dealing with the subject of archives and it is attached to University College, Dublin, with headquarters at 82, St Stephen's Green, Dublin 2. A letter to the Society requesting a course for beginners was very sympathetically received and, to cut a long story short, a week long course for archivists ran from 6 to 10 July 1981, with a formal opening by Professor Donal McCartney (Professor of Modern Irish History, UCD) and an opening lecture by Professor R. Dudley Edwards (Emeritus Professor of Modern Irish History and, might I add, presiding genius over all things archival in Ireland at present).

It would be difficult to exaggerate the benefit to the 22 participants of the lectures which followed. The staff of the archives department put themselves at our disposal. The two main lecturers were Kerry Holland and Seamus Helferty. There were workshops on the afternoons with 3 tutors in attendance. There were two conducted tours — one of the Royal Irish Academy in Dawson Street, and another of the UCD archives in St Stephen's Green. At a reception in Newman House towards the end of the week we got to know still more professional people in the world of archives. The week's work left everyone feeling much better equipped to face and solve their own archival problems.

Before concluding this narrative another venture of the Association might be mentioned. It was felt that as yet not all religious superiors were aware of its existence. To remedy the situation the CMRS was again approached, this time before its AGM in June. The organising secretary of CMRS put ten minutes of a very tight schedule at the disposal of a speaker on archives. This time was eagerly availed of to inform the assembled superiors from all corners of Ireland that an organisation now existed which could be of help to them in their individual secretariats. They were encouraged to apply for membership. It was also suggested to them that during the next working year they might consider the possibility of listening to a lecture from a professional archivist. It was not immediately ascertainable how this suggestion was received.

This is where we stand at present (November 1981). The executive committee will shortly be meeting to review progress so far. It will also consider how best to implement the object of the new association. This object is outlined thus in the Constitution: to promote the care and preservation of records and archives in order that (a) they might be of greater administrative service to religious congregations and other bodies and (b) they might be accessible for academic research and other cultural purposes.

For further information about the Association, please contact either the chairman, Fr L. Layden C.S.Sp. (Holy Ghost Fathers, Cypress Grove North, Templeogue, Dublin 6) or the Secretary, Sr Margaret Mary Altman (St Catherine's Provincial House, Dunardagh, Blackrock, Co. Dublin).

CATHOLIC ARCHIVES IN THE U.S.A.

In the last few years, interest in Catholic archives in the United States has grown at a truly encouraging rate. The bicentennial of American independence, which was celebrated in 1976, was responsible for an upsurge of interest in historical studies of all kinds. Even though Catholicism had not played a major role in the American Revolution — the first bishop for this country was not appointed until 1789, well after the end of the war - the bicentennial nonetheless made all people more aware of their history. Happily, it also made them renew their efforts to preserve the documentary evidence necessary for the study of that history.

The important first initiative among Catholic archives was taken by the communities of women religious, through the agency of a national coordinating body, the Leadership Conference of Women Religious. Encouraged by a handful of dedicated archival 'missionaries' and aided by financial support from departments of the national government, the LCWR sponsored six workshops in which nearly 400 archivists, most of them recently appointed their tasks, received a basic course in professional archival training. The LCWR has followed this effort with the compilation of a Guide to the Archives of Women's Religious Orders, publication of which is expected shortly. This volume will certainly prove to be an invaluable tool for scholars and church officials alike.

Diocesan archivists have been somewhat slower to start than their women religious colleagues, but have recently been developing quickly. In 1974 the national conference of bishops called for the appointment of an archivist, even if only part-time, for every diocese, and the bishops of the United States seem to be heeding this call. At the present time, just over half the 170 dioceses in the country have a formally designated archivist. Most are part-time, though an encouraging number are full-time; many dioceses have hired professional archivists to arrange and care for diocesan records. Since 1979, diocesan archivists have held an annual meeting (with attendance in the 30—50 range) to discuss mutual concerns, generally in conjunction with the regular meeting of the Society of American Archivists. The diocesan archivists have presented recommendations on matters of archival policy to the bishops' conference and are currently developing a more formal organizational structure.

Archival activity among men's religious orders is not as extensive as that of the women's orders, but some efforts are being made. Many orders have well-established archival programs and these are serving as models for others. Catholic colleges and universities are also devoting attention to archival matters and are actively preserving the records of lay societies and organizations.

Much work remains to be done, but the archival movement within the American Catholic Church has made a good start. At the very least, Catholic archivists are coming to realize that they are not alone in their efforts, that there are many others who face the same questions and problems. The knowledge that our colleagues in the United Kingdom and Eire also face those problems is an additional boost to morale: we are all in this together.

THE ARCHIVES OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN FRANCE AND THE ASSOCIATION OF ARCHIVISTS OF THE CHURCH OF FRANCE ¹

The archives of the Catholic Church in France have had to undergo, throughout history, a certain number of vicissitudes. Thus, the Reformation in the 16th century and the French Revolution in the 19th century caused grave and irreparable losses.

At the Revolution the church registers were generally seized for use as civil registers, title deeds —and like documents — were placed in the office created for that purpose, the Agency of Deeds (the forerunner of our public archives). As to other archives, the spoliation laws, the destruction circulars, and decrees for sale were variously applied. At the Restoration, the restitution laws (for example, concerning documents useful for the government of dioceses) were also observed unequally.

Thus, such diocesan and parish records which survive from the time of the Ancien Regime are mostly preserved in public collections. As to records concerning the religious orders, the most precious spiritual documents (those relating to the foundation, rules and constitutions, registers of vows, etc.) have often been saved. The archives of charitable foundations (their very function as hospitals sheltering them more from political upheavals) have always been subject to a special fate, for, during the centuries, the hospital has veritably been maintained by the community, otherwise it would in other respects always be easy today to distinguish between what concerns the community and what concerns the charitable foundation.

At the end of the 19th century and the beginning of the 20th century the laws of secularization and Separation again affected ecclesiastical archives, not only in their content but also in their role as the living memory of the nation.

Today, then, the ecclesiastical and religious archives preserved in their original fonds represent only a small part of those which ought to exist.

Meanwhile, the present situation concerning ecclesiastical and religious archives which are in the hands of the Church is marked, on the one hand, by a renewed interest and, on the other, by circumstances which require certain action and which call for urgent work.

Various reasons have combined to renew the Catholic Church's interest in its archives. In the last century the concern shown by certain senior and responsible ecclesiastics and religious as well as the efforts of certain local scholars have begun to bear fruit. During the last decades, pastoral, archival and academic interests for different reasons have directed attention to the documents which answer the questions raised.

More recently, the losses sustained during two world wars and the consequences of raggiornamento following the Council have induced the Catholic Church in France to rediscover for itself the historical sources for its own identity. Moreover, the political, social and cultural upheavals, as well as the active and many-sided presence of the renewed Church and its bodies at the heart of the contemporary changing scene, has required the examination of documents to answer the question: what does the Church have to say to the world?

So much for the signs of a renewal of interest for ecclesiastical and religious archives.

However, this very interest again highlights the gaps in ecclesiastical and religious fonds, the losses they have sustained, the destructions suffered, and certain grave, even critical, situations. Paradoxically, indeed, just when the ecclesial and social role of archivists gives the Church needed and increasing relief, the conditions required to ensure the physical condition, the proper housing, the management and the use of archives present conflicting demands. The decreasing number of qualified people scarcely helps in placing trained archivists where they are really needed. Moreover, the sale of religious houses and the re-arrangement of others in order to make the best use of accommodation often includes even the lofts, in which, until recently, documents could at least accumulate!

It also happens that certain documents considered to be those of an individual person but which often contain papers relating to his work, which is still being carried on, have, on the death of their holder been burnt, transferred, broken up, neglected, or even sold by a searcher who was the first to use them!

Such is the context within which the Association of Archivists of the Church in France was founded in 1973.

In 1967 I was asked to undertake rescue work on a category of documents particularly at risk, that of the archives of women's congregations. Thus it was that on 16 December 1971 the 'Group of historical and archival research of French women's congregations' was born (it now has some 200 members and meets for a weekend every quarter). And, at the end of 1974, there appeared the Guide des sources de l'histoire des congrégations féminines françaises de vie active (Paris, 1974, 480 pp.).

In September 1973, a meeting organised at Paris for diocesan and religious archivists was attended by 51 persons. It was there that, with the agreement of the ecclesiastical and religious authorities, the Association of Archivists of the Church in France was born: in order to establish what might be called a general policy for the archives of the Catholic Church in France, not only to make those in overall responsibility more aware but also to help in training archivists.

Since 1974, a half-yearly bulletin has been published (No.1, March 1974; No.16, October 1981) providing liaison, information and training. To make this bulletin a useful working tool, an index of ten main categories has been devised: it comprises some 3,000 names arranged under three headings — persons, groups, places.

Apart from various regional and specialist (diocesan and religious archivists, etc.) meetings, a national congress is organised every two years. These national congresses enable combined projects to be undertaken as well as special seminars: the programme includes both workshop sessions and discussions to promote the general theme chosen for each congress.

From this has emerged the Manuel des Archives de l'Eglise de France (Paris, 1980).² This publication contains, firstly, the pontifical message addressed to the congress held at Paris in 1979,³ then the general rules for the archives developed from experience. There follow certain principles concerning the character, classification and use of archives, and a practical note on the preparation of handlists. Finally, there are various classification lists (for the archives of dioceses, parishes, religious, monastic, teaching and charitable foundations) approved by the congresses.

Since 1980, annual two-week courses for specialist archival training have been organised by the Association at different Catholic Institutes. And, for the benefit of archive instructors, it has been possible to organise archival information weeks at the Vatican, thanks to Cardinal Antonio Samore, Librarian and Archivist of the Holy Roman Church.

Another fruit of work in progress might also be mentioned. It is not strictly the work of the Association but it is warmly encouraged by it. I refer to the publication of articles by archivists and these are frequently included in the bulletin. This work is very important, at least when it is done well!

These various initiatives are witness to the mobilisation of ecclesiastical and religious archivists in France. Doubtless, this effort needs to be continued, improved and intensified, but progress is clearly evident. By this progress, nationwide in coverage, the Church is becoming more aware of archives, practical training is extending among ecclesiastical and religious archivists, amongst whom a common spirit is being forged in both their ecclesial and social roles. Within the perspectives of the common heritage it is a matter of 'Servata tradere viva'.⁴

The second annual conference, held at Spode House, 28—30 April, was attended by 44 members, mainly archivists of religious orders, congregations and dioceses, with some professional archivists and observers, among them Mr G. H. Foulkes of the National Archives of Mexico.

On 28 April, Fr Edmund Lanning, S.D.S. described how, starting from scratch, he had collected and was arranging the Salvatorian archives. The following morning, 29 April, Miss Judith Close (Bristol Archives) dealt with many of the practical problems of record keeping and displayed useful materials, during the afternoon Dame Eanswythe Edwards, O.S.B. traced the history of the Benedictine archives of Stanbrook Abbey, and in the evening Fr Michael Williams spoke of his experience in using the archives of the English Colleges at Rome and Valladolid.

During a brief A.G.M. on 30 April, Dr L. A. Parker (Chairman) read messages from Bishop Foley (President) and Fr Layden, Chairman of the new Association of Religious Archivists of Ireland, and reported on two training seminars held during the year, the officers for 1982 were elected and other business expeditely dispatched, leaving time for a short open forum during which Mr Foulkes described the mechanics of a current survey of Catholic archives in Mexico involving the training and use of local volunteers, Fr F. Edwards, S.J. (Vice-Chairman) skilfully answered the awkward 'are we archivists or historians?', Mr R. Gard (Hon. Editor) introduced the first issue of Catholic Archives and reported that the Working Party of Diocesan Archives was still alive and that a meeting of diocesan officials had been held in the North, Miss M. A. Kuhn-Regnier (Hon. Secretary) promised a Newsletter shortly, and members were assured that a directory of Catholic archives and archivists would be forthcoming this year.

The conference was saddened by the tragic death of Fr Jim Murphy of Dublin a few days earlier and of Fr J. D. McEvilly in February. Fr Conrad Pepler, O.P. Warden of Spode, was warmly thanked for helping to found the Society and wished well on his retirement. The 1982 conference will be held at Spode, 13-15 July.

OBITUARY NOTICES

FATHER JOHN DENNIS McEVILLY

All those concerned with and for Catholic archives will have been saddened by the death in February 1981 of Fr McEvilly who did so much pioneering work with diocesan archives and championed the cause of the preservation of Catholic archives generally when little official or professional interest was shown in their care and organisation. It is indeed largely because of the work of Fr McEvilly and others like him that our Society has been able to become quickly established and accepted. His article on the 'Birmingham Diocesan Archives', published in the first issue of this journal — it was possibly the last article he wrote — reflects the thoroughness and tireless application he applied to his diocesan archive work and also the modesty and diffidence with which he regarded his considerable achievement in collecting and arranging and cataloguing the major part of the archives for which he was responsible.

Fr McEvilly was born on 7 November 1907 and educated at Cotton College (1918-26) and Oscott (1926-32). After his ordination on 21 May 1932, he served as parish priest at St Patrick's, Walsall (1932- 37), Our Lady's, Shirley (1937-41), St Augustine's, Meir (1941- 43), and St Nicholas, Boldmere (1943—81) where he built the church, school and presbytery. His work on the archives of the Birmingham archdiocese began in 1955 and in March 1957 he was appointed diocesan archivist. From 1957 until his death he travelled into Birmingham every Wednesday to spend a full day at the office in Archbishop's House. He was also editor of the Worcestershire Recusant from its beginning in 1963 and contributed many articles on archives and on Recusant History. May he rest in peace.

FATHER JAMES MURPHY, C.M.

Tributes to the memory of the late Fr Jim Murphy and appreciations of his work have been published elsewhere (for example, the Irish Times, 26 May and the Catholic Herald, 15 May 1981) but it is fitting that his interest in archives should also be recorded, not least because he died on the morning he was to leave for England to attend the AGM of the Catholic Archives Society.

Fr Jim had been with us since we took our first tentative steps to organize ourselves as religious archivists in Ireland. He brought experience and expertise to the task. Moreover, he was enthusiastic about the possibilities of our archival association. There has hitherto been a certain element of mystery attaching to archives — confidentiality must be respected; skeletons must be kept buried. That has often been the thinking in the past. But now a plea has arisen for more knowledge about origins and founders. Fr Jim saw great possibilities in learning more about the whole missionary movement in modern Ireland — and he saw the work beginning with a new approach to and a new organization of archival material.

We elected him on to the Committee of the Association of Religious Archivists of Ireland, and he was going to represent us, as I have said, at Spode House when he met his untimely death. He surprised two intruders in the presbytery, one of whom attacked him with a knife. He was dead before help could reach him. Even now we who worked with him can hardly realize that he is gone. May he rest in peace.

Catholic Archives differs from other periodicals concerned with archives and archival problems by publishing mostly descriptions of archives, in our case those of religious orders, congregations and other foundations, dioceses, families and individual persons, in short all significant or characteristic documentary sources for the history of the Catholic Church in the United Kingdom and Eire. The long-term objective is to record the character, content, arrangement, accessibility and use of these archives for the benefit of all who are concerned for their preservation and scholarly use.

While the yearly publication of seven or eight descriptions of particular archives will, it is hoped, build up over the years to become in itself a valuable body of reference to a wide range of Catholic archives, the potential number of reports of archives worthy of publication would sustain a quarterly periodical for many years. In this context, therefore, Catholic Archives can hope only to throw a little light on an already broad and extending scene. Even so, perhaps this will be sufficient to indicate to scholars and research institutions that there exists in such archives a range of evidence referring by no means solely to the bodies to which they directly relate, nor even restricted to the Catholic Church, but relevant to research into political, educational, literary, social and moral aspects of life in developed countries and a vital source for studies of emerging nations.

Many religious bodies have only recently become aware of the need to record their history, and often a centenary or a similar event has prompted the collecting of archives and other historical sources and provision for their care and use. The Catholic Archives Society, founded only in 1979 to promote the care and preservation of Catholic archives in the United Kingdom and Eire, can claim some modest credit for the progress made in recent years by enabling religious archivists to meet together in order to share their experiences and work out solutions to their problems with sideline advice of professional archivists. Catholic Archives, by publishing reports on archive work in progress, likewise performs a valuable role in demonstrating to religious archivists new to the work what can be done even with very limited resources. Religious archivists may perhaps lack formal training but they bring to their work, among other talents, an intimate knowledge of their foundation, an awareness of its life and continuity, an appreciation of the value of non-documentary materials, and a vigorous common sense approach to archival problems which professional archivists much admire.

The Society is grateful to the religious archivists and historians for their articles published in this issue and it wishes them success in their continuing archive work. The Society is also fortunate to have formed links with associations of Catholic archivists abroad, and reports on the situations in Australia and Mexico are published in this issue, as is a report on the Society's annual conference in 1982. Finally, the Hon. Editor would welcome offers of articles for future publication.

THE ARCHIVES OF

THE ENGLISH PROVINCE OF FRIARS MINOR

The Rev. Justin McLoughlin, O.F.M.

Part of the Archives is a large collection of manuscript material beginning in 1625. Much of this section comes under what is often marked RECOLL. ANGLO, or English Recollects.

In 1517 the Friars Minor were divided by Pope Leo X into two autonomous branches, the Friars Minor Conventual and the Friars Minor Observants. The Observants in the middle of the sixteenth century promoted Houses of Recollection where the missionaries could prepare and to which missionaries returning came back to re-invigorate their energies. Gradually these Houses got their own Statutes with an emphasis on poverty and austerity of life. In 1595 several of the Northern Provinces of the Order adopted these Statutes and became known as Recollect Provinces: England, Ireland, Brabant, Flanders, Strasburg, and Thuringia. They were all subject to the one Minister General of the Friars Minor and never became an independent body. They had representatives on the General Council of the Order at Ara Coeli in Rome, and to facilitate communications the Minister General gave wide faculties to a Commissary General based in Flanders. He it was too who appointed Visitators and, if it was within his competence, he dealt with all requisite permissions and controversies.

The General Chapter held at Rome in 1625 decreed the restoration of the English Province, a novitiate and House of Studies having been opened at Douay in 1618 and many vocations having attached themselves to John Gennings and the first community. In 1629 Gennings was officially appointed Provincial with a Council which included Sancta Clara Davenport and Francis Bel, and on 1 December 1630 the first Chapter of the Restored Province took place at Brussels in the Convent of the English Franciscan Nuns.

The Chapter Register dealing with this event and the Registers of all subsequent Chapters up to 1838 along with other Capitular Registers, such as those of the Procurator, form a major part of the Official Records. All the entries are in Latin.

Reg. I.A. Acta Capitulum, 1625—1746

Reg. LA. and B. A copy of I.A. and I.B.

Reg. I.B. Acta Capitulum, 1746-1788

Reg. I.C. Acta Capitulum, 1790—1808

Reg. I.D. Acta Capitulum, 1808—1838

These are a record of every Chapter and Intermediate Chapter from 1630 to 1838, when the friars of the penal day generation were reduced to nine. For each Chapter the name of the Visitor and President of the Chapter is given with the date and place. In spite of civic conditions, 123 Chapters took place between 1630 and 1838 and the minutes of each of these meetings are recorded. The business transacted covered personalia problems, friars and their missions, appointments, elections, faculties, obituary notices, and the record of an occasional lapse or apostasy. All the martyrs and confessors are mentioned: Bullaker, Heath, Bel, Woodcock, Colman, Wall, Levison, East, Batten, Wrest, Gregory Jones, Langworth, Mathews, Osbaldeston, Marianus Napper, Parry, Hardwick, Lockier, Cartwright, Barras, Selby, Grimbalsen, Angelus Fortescue, Paul Atkinson, and Germain Helme.

In Register I.A. and in the notebooks of Antony Parkinson, Provincial, are interesting items connected with the Mission of the Province to Maryland from 1672 to 1720, regulations for the running of Baddesley School, and care for imprisoned friars, others being deputed to visit and assist them if possible.

The Official Account Books that have survived are:

4. Mass Book, 1788-1863
- 5.A. Procurator's Book, 1773-1783
- 5.B. Procurator's Book, 1784-1803
- Procurator's Book, 1798-1832
- Procurator's Book, 1832-1843

The Note Books of Provincials also contain much relating to the individual friars, chaplaincies, and missions. There are seven such notebooks belonging to Antony Parkinson (1713-1715), John Joseph Pulton (1728-1731; 1737-1740; 1746—1748 - he had three terms of office); Felix Englefield (1755); George Joachim Ingram (1767—1770); Peter Bernardine Collingbridge (1810—1818; 1822-1829); Edward Ignatius Richards (1827-1828); and Charles Francis McDonnell (1815-1818; 1821-1824; 1827-1830; 1832-1838).

Some smaller Registers of individual friars are informative not only about themselves but also the missions they served, notably the Register of Edward Madew and Athanasius Baynham. Fr Madew who served Grove Park and Ufton Court (1758—1770) has many baptismal entries at the end of the book. Of similar personal value are notebooks of Samuel Bonaventure Fisher (1821-1872), and James Anselm Millward (1821-1857).

Two other important volumes must be noted: first, a Register marked Collectio Rerum Memorabilium. On 5 July 1741 the Commissary General wrote to the English Provincial, Thomas Holmes, citing the text of a letter he has received from the Minister General, Cajetan a Laurino, regarding the continuation of the Annals of Luke Wadding. Wadding (1588-1657) was a distinguished Irish Franciscan from Waterford who became a prominent Churchman in Rome both with regard to the Church and the Order. His literary output on theology and history is incredible. Among his more notable writings must be mentioned his monumental Annates Minorum and Scriptores Ordinis Minorum. The Minister General states that Wadding's work must be continued. To this end each Province must provide 'Viri Idonei'. When one considers the circumstances of the English Mission it speaks well for the English Province that the Collectio was begun that very year 1741. It contains an astonishing amount of information about personnel, missions, benefactors, bishops, and controversies.

Among the texts preserved in this Collectio are authorizations for the foundation of St Bonaventure's, Douay, issued by the General Chapter of Salamanca, 8 June 1618, and the incorporation of Francis Bel in the English Province from Segovia, 31 December 1619. The full title of this register is: Collectio Rerum Memorabilium spectantium turn ad fundationes Conventuum Fratrum et Sororum Provinciae Angliae Ordinis Seraphici Patris Sancti Francisci, turn ad personas Virtute et Religione eximiae, Benefactores, Epitaphiae.

The second important more localised Register to be noted is the Ledger of Baddesley School in the early nineteenth century. This private school, originally a kind of juniorate, started in Osmotherley, Yorkshire, in 1672 and continued at Edgbaston whence it was transferred to Baddesley towards the end of the eighteenth century. The Baddesley Ledger is really an account book giving the names of all paying the fees and the names of many of the pupils, some of whom emerge as important in later life: Bishop Weathers, Auxiliary in Westminster, Canon Shattock of the Western District, Canon Cheadle, first Vicar General of Nottingham, and many others, especially for the years 1823—1828.

The Inventory Register, begun in 1704, is much more than it suggests. It is a mine of information about many things other than goods, properties, and monies. During the lengthy controversy over Faculties and the controversy between Regulars and the Vicars Apostolic in the mid-eighteenth century, transcripts of endless letters to and from Bishop Stonor, the Administrator Apostolic at the Nunciature at Brussels, and the Minister General and individual friars involved in the Midland and Northern Districts, are all entered. In connection with this controversy there are also two large folders of other documents on the case and a box file containing sixty letters from Felix Englefield O.F.M., written in Rome between 1749 and 1753, to his Provincial. Englefield had been sent to Rome to argue the case for the Regulars.

Occasionally, statistics occur. For example, in 1708 the number of friars in St Bonaventure's, Douay, is given as 17 priests, 1 deacon, 3 subdeacons, 5 clerics, 13 brothers, and 3 oblates, a community of 42, of whom 9 were students. Residences in England are listed under 'Our Concerns in Northumberland, Yorkshire and Nottingham', while other places listed are: Samlesbury, Wales, Osmotherley, houses in Fleet Street, the mission in Monmouth, benefactors, and some Mass obligations.

The Procurators' Account Books register various annuities and investments, the names of Patrons of Missions, missionaries serving them, and salaries per quarter. Expenditure and income become interesting because of the place and personalities mentioned. Practically the last entries are interesting payments for 1834—1835. The Procurator is disbursing £100 per annum for the education of seven boys studying for the Franciscans with the Benedictines at Douay. Their names and places of origin are recorded. Unfortunately, when they were ready to enter, our novitiate was temporarily closed, and they had to look elsewhere. What we lost can be guessed from the fact that six persevered to the priesthood: George Ambrose Gillett, John Anselm Bradley, Charles Stanislaus Holoham, and John Augustine Gilbert as Benedictines, John Bond from Lanherne who died as a Jesuit missionary in Calcutta; and James Bond, his brother, who became a priest in the Midland District, taught for a time at Oscott, and died at Wolverhampton in 1846.

Apart from these official Registers and Note-Books, there are nearly a thousand letters, loose manuscripts, and small bundles. It is not easy to assemble them either chronologically or in much order. A Card Index has been compiled, but there is no Catalogue as such. From 1650 to the end of the seventeenth century, there are perhaps a hundred items of Religious, ecclesiastical, personal, and local matter. From 1700 to 1800 there must be at least three hundred papers, including printed notifications from the Commissary General of the Order in Flanders and occasionally notifications from the General himself which reached England via the English Friary in Douay.

Documents connected with families touch on the Pendrills, Eystons, Powells, and Mountrneys and Stonecroft. A large number of wills occur. There is an interesting will of Thomas Reeve of Rowington 7 June 1688 in which one of the trustees bears the distinguished name of William Shakespeare. Reeve left one shilling a year to each poor Catholic in Rowington. The Pendrel Papers include a grant to the Pendrel brothers for assisting Charles II to escape to France in 1651. The Eyston Papers concern, with one exception, an annuity due to Bonaventure Eyston, a Franciscan who transferred to the Dominicans in 1758, and the claim that the annuity should follow him. The one Eyston paper unconnected with the lengthy correspondence about the annuity has been of some interest to the Knights of the Holy Sepulchre. It consists of a two-page written appointment of Robert Eyston of Hendred as a Knight of the Holy Sepulchre. Issued by the authority of Fr Antony a Badalato, Custos of the Holy Land, on 5 November 1715, it lists all the Privilegia and Obligationes of the office and is signed by the Secretary of the Holy Land, 'de mandato Patris Suae Adm. Reverendae'.

Such papers are a pleasant relief from the mass of documents concerned with wills, indentures, and legal matters. Such papers, for example, are those connected with St John Wall, the Venerable Thomas Bullaker, the notes on Paul Atkinson in prison for twenty-nine years, and letters of Germain Helme, who died in Lancaster Castle in 1746. The Wall Papers include John Wall's letter to the Provincial written from Worcester Gaol in 1679, a Latin translation of his last speech from the scaffold, and an account written by a priest who styles himself 'His True Honorer'.

The Venerable John Baptist Bullaker (Thomas) was executed at Tyburn on 12 October 1642. The Provincial must have been surprised and pleased to receive a lengthy letter in Italian written in February 1643. The letter in Italian is from a Genoese nobleman who with his wife has just returned from England and describes how he and his wife were at Tyburn and witnessed the death of 'un santo martire di Nazione proprio Inglese dell'Ordine de S.Francesco'. Another letter from two Italian friars of the Province of Turin and addressed to the Provincial, John Pulton, thanks the English friars for their hospitality when passing through London, from which they sailed for Abyssinia on 'The Cumberland'. The letter was posted in India in 1728.

Of much later date but quite informative with regard to names are the programmes of the Midsummer Concerts or Exhibitions at Baddesley Academy, 1825 and 1827. Wills have been mentioned as though entirely uninteresting reading, whereas in fact they link quite a number of people as witnesses, provide addresses of the friars, and add to family histories. Bundles of documents on the more extensive scale concern Bishop Prichard, the 'Jockey Hall' controversy, and disputes concerning Stonecroft, Goosnargh, and Lee House. The closing years of the eighteenth century touch on two renowned missionaries, John Pacificus Nutt and William Leo Pilling, and the question of the Oath.

It is fairly well known that in the middle of the nineteenth century the English Province was restored from Belgium and questions are sometimes asked as to how the extensive Archives of recusant days came into our possession. Most of the 270 manuscript items of the nineteenth century deal with the negotiations between the men of the old generation and the Franciscans of Belgium. In 1848 the surviving friars met at the Franciscan Convent, Taunton, to discuss with the representative of the Belgian friars the restoration of the Order in England. Throughout the whole business it was a matter described as 'ab initio propositum illorum semper fuit instaurandi Angliae Provinciam Antiquam'. The Belgian friars who had never been involved in parish work had many doubts and difficulties, but eventually came in 1858. Propaganda decreed that the old Franciscan Funds should be handed on to them and all the bona, etc., including books.

The last Superior of the old generation was William Joseph Hendren, who retired from the See of Nottingham to Taunton Convent in 1853, and it was at Taunton with three other friars that negotiations with the Belgians were initiated. So far as we can ascertain the Archives were in Hendren's possession at Taunton and remained there for some years after his death in 1866. It is clear that they were there and examined by the nuns who compiled a 'Taunton Miscellany', listing the majority of the papers, in fact one would have the impression that the many documents are still there. It is only a list however. The actual Archives collection was handed over to the Commissary General of the Friars in Manchester by Bishop Clifford, who had concerned himself very much with both the old friars and the Belgians, he himself having been ordained priest at Clifton by Bishop Hendren. When forwarding the collection he says he had made a promise to Fr Emmanuel to restore the old books and manuscripts. Fr Emmanuel was Superior of the Belgians who arrived in 1858. The Archives then went to Manchester and at the end of the last century to Forest Gate where they are at present.

The 'old books' are quite a large collection of published works by friars of recusant days, from 1626 to the early nineteenth century, being the writings of fifty-six authors, excluding the Opera Omnia of Francis a Sancta Clara Davenport, bound in two volumes. Their scope covers Theology, Philosophy, as in the case of Le Grand, and a number of works on controversies, as with John Vincent Canes and Stillingfleet. On the liturgical side, there are Missals of 1584, 1657, 1711, and 1744. Divine Office Books of 1668 and 1744, and an Epistle and Gospel Book for High Mass of 1750. Published sermons are dated 1686, 1687, and 1688.

Among objects of interest are of course the two Observant seals 1482 and 1555, chalices of 1711 and 1718, seventeenth-century Bruges lace from a Franciscan alb, a number of portraits, and a handwritten ceremonial of 1765.

Outside material inherited from the recusant generation are a number of other items. There is a 1533 deed of affiliation of a husband and wife in Southampton, signed and sealed by the Observant Provincial, Francis Faber. This deed came via the renowned Canon George Oliver of West Country fame.

Of tremendous value for information on pre-Reformation Franciscans is a Card Index compiled personally by Fr Conrad Walmsley, O.F.M., from Episcopal and Cathedral Registers, from which he extracted all the known dates of ordination covering nearly two thousand friars from the 13th to the 16th centuries. Along with this Index are two box indexes dealing with pre-Reformation Franciscan friaries in England and Wales.

For detailed data of a much later period but quite invaluable for the early nineteenth century history of the Order in this country is a bound volume of 289 typed pages of transcripts from the Archives of Propaganda, made by Fr William O'Connell of our Province, in Rome since 1948. All the correspondence connected with the difficulties of the nineteenth century, in which the famous Bishop Baines had a hand, is printed in full, as are the decrees of Propaganda.

For modern times since 1858 we are fairly well documented and many albums of photographs and newspaper cuttings have been assembled. We were beginning to experience the familiar problem of lack of storage space when our solicitors transferred all the legal deeds and papers connected with our modern houses. These make heavy reading but have already proved useful, for a young solicitor has already consulted them for evidence of the drafting of early legal documents dating from the seventeenth century.

The foregoing is but a brief outline of the main content of the Franciscan Archives housed at present at the Friary, 58 St Antony's Road, Forest Gate, London, E7 9QB.

NOTTINGHAM DIOCESE ARCHIVES

The Rev. Anthony Dolan

In 1840 the four Districts or Apostolic Vicariates into which England had been divided in 1688 were reorganised into eight Districts. The territory of the present Diocese of Nottingham, which had belonged entirely to the Midland District, was then split between the Central District (Derbys., Notts., Leics.) and the Eastern District (Lines., Rutland). Bishop Thomas Walsh, the first Vicar Apostolic of the Central District — he had previously been in charge of the Midland District — moved his residence from Birmingham to Nottingham in 1844. His home was the presbytery attached to the newly-erected church of St Barnabas on Derby Road.¹ After Walsh's translation to the London District in 1848, William Bernard Ullathorne, who had succeeded him in the Central District, lived in Birmingham.

Two years after this, when the Catholic hierarchy was restored by virtue of the Letters Apostolic Universalis Ecclesiae, Nottingham was one of the bishoprics to be created. It was to consist of the counties of Nottinghamshire, Derbyshire, Leicestershire, Lincolnshire and Rutland, an arrangement which lasted, with minor modifications occasioned usually by the revision of county boundaries, until, on 30 May 1980, parts of North Derbyshire and the Bassetlaw District of North Nottinghamshire were cut off to form part of the new Diocese of Hallam.

In 1850, the Diocese of Nottingham had twenty-eight missions.² In 1979, just before sixteen parishes went over to Hallam, there were 132 parishes.³ In 1850 there were approximately 20,000 Catholics;⁴ in 1979 there were 150,293.⁵

For the first nine months of its existence, Nottingham had no bishop of its own. Bishop Ullathorne of Birmingham acted as Apostolic Administrator. Then, Joseph William Hendren, a Franciscan born in Birmingham, who had been Vicar Apostolic of the Western District and later first Bishop of Clifton, became the first Bishop of Nottingham on 22 June 1851. His episcopate lasted, in effect, for little more than six months. Age and ill-health on his part, and the immense amount of work to be done, coupled with very inadequate resources for doing it, led to his resignation in the summer of 1852.

He was succeeded in September 1853 by a Lancastrian, Richard Roskell, Provost of the Salford Chapter, who was to rule the Diocese for twenty-one years. It is from Bishop Roskell's time that the earliest records contained in our Diocesan Archives, apart from some parish registers, survive. The Book of Ordinations begins in May 1863.

The third Bishop of Nottingham, and from an archival point of view one of the most important of our bishops, was the London Oratorian, Edward Gilpin Bagshawe, who received his episcopal ordination in November 1874 when he was not quite forty-six. His episcopate, which was to be the second-longest in the history of the Diocese, lasted until 1901 when his failing powers and ill-health led to his resignation. He did not die for another fourteen years, however, and he is the first of our bishops to be buried in the crypt of the cathedral.

I said that from an archival point of view — and of course it is this angle I am primarily interested in — Bagshawe is one of the most important of our bishops. We have, for example, his diary. This gives mainly a list of things that happened rather than his thoughts. We learn that he went on Visitation to Worksop on 3 October 1878; that a new parish was founded at Glossop on 15 March 1882; that his mother died on 6 May 1878. The diary is invaluable as a source of reference and for cross-checking.

Bagshawe also kept a book for each of the parishes of the Diocese. In these books he made notes on the occasions of his Visitations. Unfortunately, all the books for the Derbyshire parishes are missing, and I have been unable so far to track them down. We have an incomplete set of the Reports on the state of the Diocese which he sent to Rome in preparation for the 'ad limina' visits. I have found these very useful for information about my own parish of Ashbourne. We also have reports prepared by parish priests prior to a Visitation of their parishes by the Bishop or the Dean.

It may be recalled that, during Bagshawe's episcopate, two Congregations of Sisters, the Little Company of Mary and the Sisters of St Joseph of Peace, were founded in Nottingham. We have a handwritten copy of the Constitutions and Rules of the Little Company with the Bishop's signature inside the front cover. It was in Bagshawe's time, too, that a Diocesan Major Seminary was founded — in 1883. It lasted for a mere nineteen years, but the last priest to be ordained from it died as recently as 1962.

Towards the end of this vigorous episcopate, things began to slip as the Bishop's age and ailments increased, and it was unfair to expect that the fourth Bishop would catch up on what had been left undone in the way of administration. Robert Brindle, a Liverpoolian ordained for the Diocese of Plymouth, was, after all, sixty-four when he came to Nottingham after three years as Auxiliary in Westminster. Prior to that he had spent a quarter of a century as an army chaplain of outstanding calibre, a fact recognised by the award of the D.S.O.⁶ Brindle appointed Canon Croft as his Vicar General.⁷ This was important because Croft was interested in the history of the Diocese. His papers, the 'Croft Collection', form an important part of the Diocesan Archives and are one of the bases of the later work done on the history of the Diocese by my immediate predecessor as Archivist.

Bishop Brindle resigned in 1915, and later that year Thomas Dunn, a Londoner, was appointed to Nottingham. He took possession of the See in March 1916 after his episcopal ordination at Westminster the previous month.⁸ Dunn, partly because of his training at the Academia dei Nobili Ecclesiastici and his subsequent experience as Secretary to Cardinals Vaughan and Bourne, was beyond question the greatest administrative bishop Nottingham has ever had. He had lots of other qualities of which we cannot speak here, but from an archivist's point of view his episcopate is a delight: "... he was one of the most orderly and neat men that could be found ... He loved law and order ... He revelled in his statistics ... so we read in an obituary notice published in the Diocesan Year Book for 1932,⁹ a publication which Bishop Dunn had inaugurated in 1921. The Bishop's devotion to his duties was outstanding; he wore himself out and died in 1931, two months after his sixty-first birthday. A lot of the materials and of the order in the Diocesan Archives derive from the meticulous work of its fifth bishop.

John Francis McNulty came from Manchester to Nottingham as its sixth bishop after a mainly academic career, part of which (1921—1929) was spent as Master of St Edmund's House, Cambridge. Of his contributions to the Archives it is difficult to say much as we have not yet sorted out his papers and, indeed, we are not exactly sure what we have from his time.

Bishop McNulty died in June 1943, and in the centenary year of the consecration of its cathedral church, Nottingham at last saw one of its own priests, Edward Ellis, who was born not two miles from the city centre, ordained as its chief pastor. He was to rule the Diocese for thirty years until, at the age of seventy-five, he made way for his Coadjutor, James McGuinness of Londonderry, whom Bishop Ellis had ordained to the priesthood in Nottingham in 1950 and to the episcopate in 1972.

So much, then, by way of an outline of the history of the Nottingham Diocese. I will now discuss the Diocesan Archives and will do so by posing and attempting to answer the following five questions:

1. Where are the Archives housed?
2. What do they comprise?
3. How are they arranged?
4. How have they been acquired?
5. What work on the Archives is being currently undertaken?

1. WHERE ARE THE ARCHIVES HOUSED?

Sometime in the mid-1950s, a lady interested in the history of the Catholic Church in the East Midlands came to see Fr Sweeney, the Archivist, at Tollerton where he was Rector. After the usual polite chit-chat she asked: 'Where exactly are the Diocesan Archives kept?' With more than a trace of embarrassment, he replied: 'Under my bed in two cardboard boxes'. It was a slight exaggeration, but it broke the ice and there began a friendship which endured until Canon Sweeney's death in 1979.

By then the Archives had grown and they had spent some time in Cambridge where Sweeney was Master of St Edmund's house from 1964 to 1976. Often they travelled round with him in his shooting-brake. When ill-health forced him to retire from the active ministry, he came to live at St Hugh's College, Tollerton, where he had already spent sixteen years of his priestly life. A lot of the material belonging to the Archives stayed in the college library, but some was housed in one four-drawer filing cabinet and several boxes in a small, insufficiently ventilated, first-floor room at Cathedral House, Nottingham.

In the late summer of 1978 Canon Sweeney asked the Bishop if he might have some help in the Archives and my name was mentioned. We spent a total of three afternoons together working in the Archives. That was the sum-total of my initiation! Fortunately, Mrs Loewenthal, the present Assistant Archivist, had done some work on the Archives and knew more about their structure and content.

The room at Cathedral House was inadequate for a variety of reasons, and the idea was put forward that the Sisters of Mercy in the convent next to the Cathedral might be willing to let us use a spare room until we were able to get somewhere really adequate. Accordingly, we moved the contents of the room in Cathedral House and the archival material still at Tollerton, together with Canon Sweeney's notes on the history of the Diocese, to two rooms on an upper floor of the convent. This took place in August 1980, after Dr Parker had given us his opinion as to the suitability of the premises and had suggested certain improvements, such as better lighting, locks on doors, etc. In that same summer, with Bishop McGuinness' permission, we investigated the cellar of Bishop's House "where we discovered, among other things, some personal letters of Bishop Dunn to a seminarian who subsequently became his Secretary. About the same time we began to collect old registers and other documents from some of the parishes.

In May 1981 the Bishop's Secretary asked us to do him a favour by removing from Bishop's House to the Archives a lot of non-current material. In fact we took away sixty-five 'items', a term which could be misleading since a single 'item' might consist of five or six fairly thick files tied together! We have not even tried to work out how many documents there are in this latest bulk-acquisition.

More recent documents, which probably are not archive material anyway, are still at Bishop's House. Most of the title-deeds and similar documents relating to property owned by the Diocese are kept in the office of the Diocesan Solicitor in Nottingham. We are in the process of making a list of these documents for our own reference. Nearly everything relating to the area covered by the Diocese from the time prior to its creation is to be found in the Birmingham Archdiocesan Archives.

With these exceptions, most of the contents of the Nottingham Diocesan Archives are housed at the Convent of Mercy, College Street, Nottingham.

2. WHAT DO THE ARCHIVES COMPRISE?

The main types of documents within the Archives may be listed as follows:

- a) Correspondence on all sorts of subjects with all sorts of people, but usually with a diocesan official at one end of it. We have, for instance, a copy of a letter (17.5.1956) referring to an agreement between the East Midlands Electricity Board and 'The Bishop and Deity of the Roman Catholic Diocese of Nottingham'!
- b) Reports — on the state of the Diocese, on parochial visitations by bishops and deans, on school visits by Diocesan Inspectors, the 'Red Books' of Bishop Bagshawe.
- c) Pastorals and Ad Clerums; Deanery Conference Cases; Orders of Procedure at and Statutes of Diocesan Synods.
- d) Statistical information — on parishes, finance, etc.
- e) Parish and local histories, the former often produced on the occasion of a centenary, etc.
- f) Some books and articles written by priests of or in the Diocese.
- g) Files on parishes and religious houses.
- h) Files on some individual priests and students.
- i) Rules and Ceremonials of some of the religious congregations in the Diocese.
- j) Miscellaneous documents, such as attestations of relics, authorisations for erecting Stations of the Cross.
- k) An incomplete set of Catholic Directories from 1880 and a complete set of Diocesan Year Books.
- l) Photographs of all sorts and from various sources.
- m) Personalalia of some of the bishops. Among the most touching of these is a letter which the twelve-year old Edward Ellis wrote to Bishop Brindle on 6 May 1912 asking to be accepted as a student for the priesthood. There is also Bishop Dunn's wallet.
- n) 'Collections', of which 'Croft' and 'Sweeney' are the most substantial.
- o) Registers and other documents acquired from the parishes.
- p) Copies of recent and current correspondence.

The extent and the chronological and subject reference of the Archives, particularly the files, may be stated, again roughly, as follows:

Temp. Vicars Apostolic	one file, but contents not related to them.
Ullathorne	no files
Hendren	no files
Roskell	no files
Bagshawe	many files
Brindle	eleven files
Dunn	large quantity of files
McNulty	fair number of files, as yet unsorted
Ellis	likewise

3. HOW ARE THE ARCHIVES ARRANGED?

The classification scheme under which the Diocesan Archives are arranged is given in Appendix A.

I wish I had had the opportunity to discuss with Canon Sweeney the thinking behind the system of classification I inherited from him. I am not certain that he devised the system, but it is probable that he did, perhaps on the basis of Dunn's work, for it was the fifth Bishop who labelled the parish and convent files.

When the suggested system of classification for Diocesan Archives was produced by the Working Party, we had a good look at it and, as a result of so doing, modified the Canon's system somewhat. We did not, however, feel that we could adopt the new system entirely — it would have required far too much work, and we were not convinced that it was necessary to do so anyway.

If you look at the Classification and Finding List (see Appendix A), I will try to explain how it works. Within each file, each document will eventually have an individual number. Thus, E.02.05 would be Bishop Bagshawe's fifth report to the Holy See. The parish files (or some of them), together with a number of other files, were handlisted by Canon Sweeney's father, but these lists will have to be revised as fresh documents come to light.

The outer and larger of our two rooms at the Convent of Mercy contains one small and two large desks, two filing cabinets, two large steel cupboards and a number of boxes. In the inner room we have some steel shelving and more boxes. Most of these are empty but we hope, eventually, to transfer most of the files from the cabinets to the boxes.

One cabinet holds files on the parishes and religious houses together with Canon Sweeney's papers. This collection is made up mainly of his unpublished outline of the history of the Diocese, as well as his notes on recusancy in the counties which now make up the Diocese. The other cabinet contains files on some or all of the topics in the Finding List; these are arranged in chronological order within each episcopate. The cupboards contain parish registers and Bagshawe's 'Red Books'.

In the inner room are to be found Directories, Year Books, publications by priests of the Diocese and boxes of documents relating to individual priests.

4. HOW HAVE THE ARCHIVES BEEN ACQUIRED?

Reference has already been made to this in discussing where the Archives are housed. Apart from the things already mentioned, the most important acquisitions have consisted in registers and other documents, such as Church notice books, which have been collected from many parishes in the last two to three years.

This collection from the parishes had been inspired by Bishop McGuinness who, as well as asking parish priests in more than one Ad Clerum to send in old registers, has, in several instances, contacted me directly and asked me to collect documents from such-and-such a parish.

When I go on one of the archival visits, I usually begin by making a note of what older registers are being retained in the parish. (I also have developed a habit of scouring churchyards for graves of priests and scribbling down their details on bits of card to the occasional consternation of passers-by.) Then, for the documents I am going to take away with me, I fill in two copies of a form, signed by the parish priest and myself, one copy being retained in the parish and the other placed in the Archives.

5. WHAT WORK ON THE ARCHIVES IS CURRENTLY UNDERTAKEN?

Our main task at the present time consists in sorting, stamping and listing the documents we received from Bishop's House in 1981.

When we acquire new documents, we enter them, in some cases individually e.g. registers, in other cases collectively, e.g. files on Hierarchy Meetings 1957—58, in an Accessions Register. Then we try to work through them in more or less chronological order of accession. Eventually, we hope to have an index for most of the documents in the Archives!

Usually we work on one or two days a week, but how many hours we can spend will vary. We sometimes take work home with us. For myself, I find it much more profitable to deal with archival correspondence at home, even though some of the work preparatory to dealing with a query has to be done in the Archives. There is a fair amount of correspondence.

Because it is important to know not only what records have been created in the past but also what is being preserved for the future, we have recently tried to find out about the creation of records at the present time in the various areas of the Church's work in the Diocese, e.g. in the Marriage Tribunal, the Liturgical and other Commissions, the Cathedral Chapter. We have enquired of each of these bodies: Who keeps the records?; Where are they kept?¹, What records are kept?; and the approximate date of the earliest records.

Sometimes we are asked to do research for other people — for example, in connection with the history of a parish. We used to do quite a lot of this ourselves, but we are finding that it can take up too much time. Because the time we have available for archive work is so limited, we are tending to follow the example of most local Record Offices and cut down on the amount of research we do ourselves. We prefer to invite people to come in and, under our supervision and guidance, to do their own digging.

As we began to get more organised, and since we are finding that more people want to do work in the Archives, we decided that it would be useful, indeed necessary, to have a set of Guidelines for Searchers. These were drawn up at the end of last year and have received the Bishop's approval. They are based on the regulations customary in county and municipal record offices, on the rules obtaining in the Birmingham Archdiocesan Archives, and on our own experience.

Acknowledgments

We are very grateful to the Sisters of Mercy in Nottingham for letting us have the use of two of their rooms. This is a vast improvement on what we had before, but we dream that one day we may be able to house the Diocesan Archives in premises which are fireproof and in which it will be possible to ensure the regulation of temperature and humidity. We realise, however, that this is out of the question at the present time and that, like other amateur archivists, we will have to be content with non-ideal conditions, at least for the time being.

In so many ways we in the Nottingham Diocese Archives are very fortunate. We have the whole-hearted support of Bishop McGuinness, who encourages us in so many ways and gives us practical help too. Dr Leslie Parker, who lives in the Diocese, has given us, on numerous occasions, the benefit of his long experience and we regard him as our honorary, part-time archival consultant. Above all, we are fortunate — and myself in particular — in having as Assistant Archivist, Mrs Lilian Loewenthal. If you were to ask me the difference between an Archivist and an Assistant Archivist, I would say that, in the case of Nottingham at any rate, the Assistant Archivist does most of the work and the Archivist gets most of the credit!

THE ARCHIVES OF THE PARISHES OF ST JOHN AND ST MARY, WIGAN

J.A. Hilton

The archives of St John's and St Mary's, the old town-centre parishes of Wigan, have been catalogued, and, as they cover the years since the mid-nineteenth century, are available to throw light on this period of Catholic expansion.

The two churches, both built in 1819, stand almost side by side in Standishgate. The Jesuits established a mission in Wigan by 1688, and built the first public chapel in 1785. In 1819, this chapel was re-built as St John's, but part of the congregation called in the seculars and built St Mary's. The accompanying controversy left a legacy of bitterness, which lingered on in a rivalry which persisted after the Jesuits surrendered St John's to the seculars in 1933. The last rector of St John's was the late Canon John Campbell, who retired in 1981, and the two parishes now share the same ministry. Meanwhile, another eight Catholic churches have been founded within the boundaries of the old county borough of Wigan.¹

In the task of cataloguing the archives, which took a few hours spread over some weeks, the parochial clergy gave every encouragement and assistance, and the Lancashire County and Wigan Metropolitan Borough Archivists and the editor of Catholic Archives gave information and advice. The archives of the two parishes are kept in their respective presbyteries, and do not include the archives of the schools, which are kept in their own buildings and have not been catalogued. The archives of each parish have been catalogued, numbered consecutively, and divided into sections. Copies of the catalogues are kept in both presbyteries, and have been sent to the Lancashire and Wigan Record Offices. Access to the archives may be had by application to the Rev. Parish Priest, St Mary's. The parochial archives for the period before the mid-nineteenth century are deposited at the Lancashire Record Office, microfilms of the registers up to 1900 are held by the Wigan Record Office, and these items are listed at the end of the parish catalogues.²

St John's is a working archive, in that all the records of the parish are kept together in the priest's study. They include notice-books for the years 1884—1959, which give a detailed picture of parish life, and register-books of baptisms from 1840, confirmations from 1860, marriages from 1860, and deaths from 1960 only. Genealogists will be assisted by the alphabetical index-books to the baptismal registers. Other records include a few exotic items: the note-books of a London prison chaplain, covering the years 1879—92, probably brought to Wigan by one of the Jesuits, who served here, and providing detailed information of the circumstances of Catholic prisoners.

St Mary's archives are kept separately (in a set of cupboards labelled 'Archives') from the recent records and current registers of the parish, which have not, therefore, been catalogued. These archives too include notice-books for the years 1851—1940. There are also a set of various financial accounts for the years 1834—1918, which include a book of pew-rents for the years 1834—1916. There are also the records of parish devotional and charitable societies for the years 1859—1918, which provide information on religious practices and on social conditions. Other records include the company rosters of the regular infantry garrisoning Wigan in the years 1807—10, a time of industrial unrest during the Napoleonic Wars. How this item came to be among the archives is unknown, but one may hazard a guess that many of these soldiers were Irish Catholics.⁴

There may be no such thing as the typical parish archive, but Fr Tweedy's pioneering account of St Cuthbert's, Durham, which outlined the material available for a parish history, indicates that one would be unlucky not to find registers and notice-books, though other items may vary. The use of parish archives is vital, not only to the study of parish history, but also to the understanding of the Second Summer of English Catholicism that followed the restoration of the hierarchy in 1850. However, they cannot be effectively used until they are catalogued. At least a start has been made on the massive, but not impossible, task of cataloguing and publishing guides to every Catholic parish archive in the country.⁵

THE PROVINCIAL ARCHIVES OF

THE SOCIETY OF THE SACRED HEART IN ENGLAND

Sr Joan Loveday, R.S.C.J.

The Society of the Sacred Heart began in France in the year 1800. Ever since her childhood Madeleine Sophie Barat had a special love for the Hearts of Jesus and Mary, whose pictures were openly displayed in the home and before which many prayers were said all through the Reign of Terror.

Seeing the havoc wrought in the lives and hearts of the people, Sophie recognised in devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus the means of rebuilding society after the cataclysm of the French Revolution. Life occupations open to single women at the time were practically non-existent, those of education and nursing being the only ones available to them outside religious life. Sophie, however, realised that these were the very means by which love of the Sacred Heart could be fostered, and, as for her, so for her religious, true devotion was a matter of being rather than doing. Today, our vocation can be explained as incarnating in our lives the love of God for those with whom we come in contact, especially those we teach.

In 1802, only two years after the foundation of the Society, Madeleine Sophie first expressed her interest in the British Isles — 'a country destined for great things', she said. In her letters (of which we have ten published volumes and hundreds of others still being worked on) there are numerous references to this country and its needs, especially that of its conversion. There was of course no question of Ecumenism at this time. Madeleine Sophie's wish to found convents in the British Isles was not fulfilled until 1841, when Roscrea in Ireland and Berrymead in England were both opened. In 1850 Berrymead moved to Roehampton where it has remained to provide a continuous history of Catholic education in this country.

At first the Mother House was centred in Paris, but in 1909 it moved to Ixelles in Belgium, and finally to Rome in 1920. The fact of centralised government, added to the world-wide expansion of the Society, necessitated the keeping of accurate records. Communication, which in Madeleine Sophie's lifetime was restricted to letters and to travel in person, became increasingly difficult for her in view of her age — she lived and governed until she was eighty-five.

With the formal approbation of the Constitutions in Rome in 1826, the life-style of the communities became more organised according to the pattern set out by the Mother House. In the communities uniformity of behaviour, customs, etc., was taken to be the sign of union with, and loyalty to, the Mother House. This emphasis on uniformity gave rise to a uniform system of records.

Since Vatican II the Church has shown renewed interest in her own archives and those of her members. At the same time there was a movement amongst religious orders towards giving up their institutions in favour of smaller communities. In our case, giving up the Mother House necessitated transferring the Central Archives to the Villa Lante (another of our houses in Rome). A further change brought about by Vatican II affected both the size and status of the groups of communities known throughout the world as vicariates and governed by superior vicars. Now the Society was organised into provinces, each under a Provincial and having a greater measure of independence whilst in no way causing any fundamental change in the closeness of their relationship with the Mother House. Thus was the scene set for the creation of updated and organised archives. At the Centre, the task of formulating a system of classification was undertaken, and in due time it was adopted for the Society's archives at Provincial level.

In 1972 it was realised that no historical records were being kept, and this was seen as a form of failure in communication. The remedy taken was to begin the keeping of archives in earnest at the Provincial house. The exigencies of the war years had caused damage and dispersal of the archival treasures of the Province, so that the next two years were spent in gathering up archival materials, accepting contributions and receiving the archives of houses recently closed. These were centralised at Roehampton and assembled in a small store-room there. By 1974 it had become clear that more space was essential if order was to be created and research work undertaken. Later, it was seen how fortunate it was that we first had the Archive Store-room before the Archive Room. Such an important asset would have been difficult to come by later on.

Research work continued with preparation for the Digby Stuart College Centenary in 1974 at Roehampton and went ahead despite the fact that the archive materials were only summarily arranged and labelled. A period of great activity followed. There were visits to the houses of the Irish-Scottish Province, historically closely connected with us, visits to the archives of other religious orders for the purpose of seeing something of methods in use. Help was had from joining The Society of Archivists and from reading some excellent books. Since almost all our records, lives, and writings are in French, the co-operation of translators was sought. Later on, classifying and cataloguing was begun, but, in general, work on the archives was slow as the enquiries by letter, telephone, and visits steadily increased.

Ten years after the setting up of the Provincial Archives at Roehampton, certain bookcases began to show serious signs of disintegration which could not be ignored. I had no doubt about the kind of storage unit I should like to see in the Archive Room! As four units would be needed for books alone, it was decided that now was the moment for radical re-organisation. Accordingly plans were made. The entire Archive Room had to be emptied to admit nine new metal storage units, and the only other pieces to gain re-admittance were the plan chest, one very deep cupboard six feet long of convenient counter height, a long centre work table and an invaluable piece of furniture consisting of two pairs of low, back-to-back cupboards beneath an over-all flat top which became, with the minimum of adaptation, an ideal writing bureau. The filing cabinet was also kept and one glass-fronted bookcase was to be found for an overflow section of books.

We shelved the archive materials according to the Mother House classification and this gave us three broad divisions, viz. materials from the Centre, from the Province, and from some individual houses. Up to this time we had spent nothing on expendable goods for we were able to have the empty duplicating paper boxes from the College, in black, red, and blue. The lid ends of these were given a broad band of self-adhesive binding to cover unwanted lettering, to strengthen the corners and to enable us to have the colour scheme we wanted. Pamphlet boxes we made from cereal cartons, cut to the required size and shape, and covered with wall paper. Only stationery and preservation materials needed to be bought.

Our archives are steadily becoming more available for research, but nothing may be taken away. As far as possible, second and third copies of books and provincial papers of the last ten or twelve years are kept in the store for more extended use.

The labour of collecting and arranging the archives is most rewarding as we are now beginning to feel more confident of our ability to answer the many and varied questions. Although there are lamentable gaps in our material, due in some cases to thoughtless destruction, they serve to strengthen us in our determination to ensure that records are both made and kept for the archives of future generations. The increased interest in the roots of our Catholic culture augurs well for the future.

CATHOLIC FAMILY PAPERS
IN HULL UNIVERSITY LIBRARY ¹

J. Anthony Williams

Although peripheral to the stated objectives of The Catholic Archives Society, concern with Catholic family muniments is by no means irrelevant to them, especially as regards the religious orders and congregations which, in addition to the secular clergy, provided for the spiritual needs of the English Catholic community prior to the 1790s. Inevitably, in view of the hazards of penal times and the disruptions which preceded the return of various English religious communities from Revolutionary Europe, there are many gaps in their 'internal' archives and information gleaned from family papers may go a little way towards repairing these. References to chaplains, records of payments to them and to continental colleges and convents, correspondence with members of Catholic religious bodies both within the kingdom and overseas: such evidence can crucially augment the information preserved in Catholic institutional archives, while evidence of the employment of priests in non-religious capacities (e.g. entrusted with financial and estate responsibilities) may add a dimension to the biographical data which these archives contain. Cases in point in early Georgian England are Father Richard Holland, S.J., at Wardour and Dom Bede Potts, O.S.B., at Everingham.²

But as well as their occasional pertinence to religious institutions and their individual members, these private papers have, of course, a more substantial bearing on Catholic family history and on the local and general history of post-Reformation Catholicism and so upon the context within which those institutions functioned, for the story unfolded by estate-papers, account-books and worldly correspondence may well have implications for pastoral and educational provision (and for chapel-building and embellishment).

The Catholic family papers considered in the remaining paragraphs are all preserved in one repository, the Brynmor Jones Library of the University of Hull, and all are fully listed in typed catalogues duplicated and distributed by the National Register of Archives. There are three collections of such papers: those of the Constables of Everingham and elsewhere, those of the Stapletons of Carlton and those of the Langdales of Holme-on-Spalding-Moor and Houghton Hall.³ The two first-named families married into the ducal house of Norfolk and their archives are now owned by His Grace, the Duke of Norfolk, with whose approval they are deposited at Hull not far from the principal seats of these two families.

Of these three collections the first, the Constable papers, is by far the largest and the most generally illuminating over a long period of time — as far as

Catholic affairs are concerned, from the early seventeenth century onwards — whereas the other two, while containing much further material of Catholic interest, are perhaps chiefly important for sets of documents associated with one notable member of each family: Sir Miles Stapleton, upon whose life at Carlton in the second half of the seventeenth century and the opening years of the eighteenth much detailed information is preserved, and the prominent and public-spirited Charles Langdale (born Stourton) whose active involvement in Catholic affairs in early Victorian England is reflected in his family's papers.⁴

These two collections will be considered first and then attention will be paid to the more widely rewarding Everingham muniments.

1. Stapleton of Carlton (ref. DDCA & DDCA 2)

This deposit, besides masses of property-documents relating chiefly to the north and west Ridings of Yorkshire and to Northumberland (partly reflecting the Errington connection) contains wills, marriage-settlements, pedigrees etc., showing links with Catholic families, a little recusancy material (quietuses, or receipts, for payment of fines, etc.) correlating with Exchequer documentation,⁵ and a small amount of correspondence. The most striking and valuable items, however, are the series of detailed account-books, covering half a century (1656—1705) kept by Sir Miles Stapleton and casting a flood of light on numerous aspects of his life during that period: estate-business, personal and household expenditure, family-gifts, travelling expenses, gifts to the Catholic poor, provision for chaplains, double land-tax, fees for overseas education, payments for fish in Lent, purchase of Acts of Parliament, expenses connected with the descent upon Carlton of a voracious posse who consumed large quantities of his food and drink before taking Sir Miles into custody during the 'no-popery' drive which marked the end of James II's reign. Extracts from these household account books were printed and discussed eighty years ago by the eminent antiquary J.C. Cox in two issues of *The Ancestor*⁶ but the originals have a great deal more to reveal than was there disclosed and will repay further study.

2. Langdale of Holme and Houghton (DDHA, DDLA)

Besides a large amount of estate-documentation, there are settlements, wills and genealogical material involving other Catholic families, a few documents concerning official action against papists,⁷ a little seventeenth- and eighteenth-century correspondence and a nineteenth-century collection (DDLA 35) supplemented by 'Miscellaneous' material (DDLA 38) embodying documentation on Catholic public affairs⁸ and perhaps most notable for their association with the Hon. Charles Langdale (1787—1868) whose many public activities included membership of Parliament (he was elected for Beverley in 1832 and later sat for Knaresborough), involvement in the Catholic Institute of Great Britain and the chairmanship of the Catholic Poor Schools Committee.⁹ Among the somewhat random collection of papers reflecting his multifarious activities are some on educational matters in various areas, on the restoration of the hierarchy in 1850 and on religious controversy, as well as printed material on the Catholic Institute giving particulars (of nationwide relevance) of its work both in tract publication and dissemination and in the field of education through grants to specified schools. Although touching on a variety of matters involving Charles Langdale, these papers (there are others on family and estate affairs) shed flickering side-lights rather than steady illumination.

3. Constable of Everingham (DDEV)

This massive deposit is important not only for the internal history of a family persistently recusant in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries but for the light shed by some of its contents on post-Reformation Catholicism generally. One batch of papers, with ancillary material, the Everingham estate correspondence (1726—43) between Sir Marmaduke Constable and his estate manager, Dom Bede Potts, O.S.B., has been printed, with a valuable Introduction by Dr Peter Roebuck¹⁰ who has also drawn on these muniments for articles on the family's fortunes during the Civil War and Interregnum and on the future Sir Marmaduke's abbreviated 'Grand Tour' in 1701—03,¹¹ and for a major study of the family between the mid-seventeenth and the mid-eighteenth century.¹² This and other Yorkshire families already mentioned feature in the indispensable works of Mr Aveling¹³ and some of the Everingham MSS. have provided material for various articles by R.C. Wilton,¹⁴ and Mr P.J. Doyle's study of the last Beverley election¹⁵ and for short sections in two Catholic Record Society volumes.¹⁶ All this printed material has to be borne in mind when considering these documents which, however, include much which precedes or post-dates the bulk of the published work. There is a vast amount of estate material relating chiefly to the family's properties in Yorkshire and Lincolnshire but also in other counties: surveys, valuations, mortgages, conveyances, leases, deeds, grants, gifts, etc. As well as material already studied on recusancy, delinquency and double taxation there is nineteenth-century correspondence concerning attempts to amend the double assessments fixed in earlier years and to recoup overpayment. Marriage settlements, trusts, conveyances and wills reflect, as with the Langdale and Carlton manuscripts, relationships with many other Catholic families as do documents of an explicitly genealogical nature, chiefly pedigrees of the Constable and other families including one proudly illustrating the Langdales' links with three martyrs. Inventories shed light on the interior and furnishing of Everingham Hall and several detailed handwritten catalogues reveal the contents of its large Catholic-orientated library at various dates from the late seventeenth century — a significant and somewhat unusual body of evidence. There are many [persona] and household account books and stewards' accounts shedding light on estate-management, building and repairs, labourers' and servants' wages, etc. Much of this material has been used by Dr Roebuck but some relates to periods earlier and, especially, later than that studied by him and the later items also include further documents embodying dealings with the Catholic-owned Wright's Bank, ¹⁷ relating to the erection of the great church of Our Lady and of St Everilda adjoining the Hall and reflecting many other topics.

Although Catholic-interest material is scattered throughout this collection, three sections are particularly rich in it: DDEV 60 (correspondence), 67 (Roman Catholic material) and 68 (miscellaneous). The first comprises documents running from the mid-seventeenth to the twentieth century including two volumes of 'Everingham Correspondence, 1720—1804', containing letters from, among others, Father John Thornton (or Hunt) S.J. at Haggerston Castle ¹⁸ and from members of the Haggerston, Salvin and Swinburne families, touching on many aspects of eighteenth-century life: visits to Scotland, to London and to Bath ('a veritable Mecca for Catholics') ¹⁹ ; on dogs, horses and hunting; on business affairs, dealings with continental religious establishments, taxation and legal problems and numerous other matters, including library-cataloguing.

In category DDEV 67 are Father John Knaresborough's 'Sufferings of Catholics, 1558—1654' in five MS. volumes, plus supplementary material;²⁰ MS. prayers and meditations; observations on various penal laws; the Everingham register of baptisms, marriages and burials, 1771—1801; a petition by Yorkshire Catholics against the division of the diocese of Beverley, founded in 1850, into the dioceses of Middlesbrough and Leeds (a topic also represented in the Langdale papers) and other nineteenth-century material, chiefly printed.¹ The 'Miscellaneous' group (DDEV 68) includes the important library catalogues already mentioned, and a bound volume of original documents reflecting various aspects of the penal laws: recusancy and delinquency, oath-tendering, imprisonment, double taxation, travel restrictions, the restitution of recusancy penalties under James II, the comprehensive if badly drafted Act of 1699 against 'the Growth of Popery', the Act of 1722 imposing a special levy of £100,000 on Catholics.²²

Also in this collection is a batch of documents relating to the Shireburn family of Stonyhurst (DDEV 69) and a much larger group stemming mainly from the Constables' Scottish connections (Maxwell, Hemes, Nithsdale) of which a separate, detailed list is available.²³

3. Catalogues of these collections are to be found in the copyright libraries and in the library of the London University Institute of Historical Research as well as at Hull. The Humberside Record Office, Beverley, has copies of the Constable and Stapleton (but not the Langdale) lists. A brief, selective account of the Constable MSS. is printed in the First Report of the Historical Manuscripts Commission (pp.45—6).
4. Further Langdale (and Stourton) papers are in Leeds City Libraries' Archives Department. The collections at Hull also include papers of Irish and West Indian interest, chiefly eighteenth and nineteenth century, viz. DDLA 39, 40 (Grattan and O'Kelly); DDLA 41 (Scarlett, Jamaica).
5. e.g. with Recusant and Memoranda Rolls in the Public Record Office (series E.377 & 368 respectively). The quietuses and related documentation (1616—49, 1654) are DDCA 29/1, 2 & 4.

THE ARCHIVES OF THE ENGLISH PROVINCE OF THE HOLY GHOST FATHERS

The Rev. W. Wilfrid Gandy, C.S.Sp.

By way of introduction I would like to point out that the Holy Ghost Fathers date back to Whitsun 1703, when Claude Francois Poullart des Places founded his Seminary and Society of the Holy Ghost in Paris. His aim was to train aspirants for the priesthood who could not afford to pay the fees demanded in other seminaries, 'for a hard laborious life and in perfect disinterestedness, as curates, missionaries and clerics to work in hospitals, poor parishes and other abandoned posts for which the bishops could scarcely find anyone'.¹ By 1762 this work was summed up as 'evangelising the poor in the country, the sick in the hospitals, the soldiers in the army and the pagans in the New World'.² Little by little overseas missionary work came to dominate and following the suppression of the Jesuits in France (1764) the Holy Ghost Fathers became officially responsible for the spiritual welfare of the French Colonies. With the revival after the French Revolution between 1802 and 1848 they became one of the three legally recognised Missionary Societies in France.

Meanwhile, the Venerable Francis Libermann was founding the Missionaries of the Most Pure Heart of Mary for the evangelisation of the Black Race (1841). In 1848 Father Libermann's Society was suppressed by Rome and its members incorporated into the Congregation of the Holy Ghost under the invocation of the Immaculate Heart of Mary — the Holy Ghost Fathers as they are known today.

Our combined history, then, consists of three distinct periods of uneven length: 1703—1848, the life and work of Father Poullart des Places and his disciples known as 'Les Messieurs du Saint Esprit'; 1841—1848, the foundation and short history of Father Libermann's Missionaries of the Most Pure Heart of Mary; and 1848—today, the fusion of the two Societies by Libermann and the growth of a religious missionary congregation.

The principal records of all three periods are conserved in our General Archives, originally housed in the Mother House, 30 rue Lhomond, 75005 Paris, but transferred quite recently to spacious quarters at Seminaire des Missions, 12 rue Pere Mazurie, Chevilly, 94150 Rungis, France. These are open to researchers by appointment. They form an important source of information on the missionary history of Africa and the former French Colonies in America, the West Indies, the Indian Ocean and India from mid-eighteenth century until today.³

the Holy Ghost Fathers made their first foundation in England when they took a three-year lease on Prior Park College in September 1904. The records of the English Province date from that month. The decision to found the community was taken on 21 September, the lease is dated 27 September, and the minutes recording the first community meeting 29 September. However, our archives contain many pieces of much greater age, either in the form of books and bound collections or of copies of letters dealing with works of different kinds offered to us but not accepted. The task of collecting, sorting and classifying this material started only four years ago as a part-time job, so there is still a lot of work to do.

The archives are divided into two distinct sections. The first section is built round the books and bound collections mentioned above. To these I have added, and am continuing to add, community diaries, magazines and newsletters, and background material dealing with the Congregation in general as well as with the different Provinces and Missions. The whole is being catalogued according to an adapted Dewey System. The aim is to make it a kind of Information Centre dealing with the Congregation and its works. The scope of these pieces varies. There are, for example, two very important collections of considerable value for the history of Africa and its Missions from the mid-nineteenth century, namely the Bulletin of the Congregation, dating from 1863, which has so far reach 48 volumes, and Notes et Documents Relatifs a la Vie et a l'Oeuvre du Venerable Pere Francois Marie Paul Libermann in 13 volumes and 2 Appendices. Then, if we turn to particular Missions, we have, for example, twenty-six items dealing with Mauritius, its Dependencies and the life and work of Blessed Jacques Laval (1803-1864).

The second section contains all manuscript material — archives in the strict sense. Here the work of classifying is still continuing. All the different pieces are being classified under five main headings or categories:

1. Relations with the Generalate.
2. The Home Province, its houses and works. (See Appendix 1).
3. The Provinces, their number and development. (See Appendix 2).
4. The Missionary Districts: in particular, those where members of the English Province work. (See Appendix 3).
5. Groups not yet erected into Missionary Districts. (See Appendix 4).
6. Special Items of Administration: Chapters—General, Provincial, District; Enlarged General Councils; Other Assemblies.

In each category all material is classified under one of four headings: Correspondence; Decisions, General and Local; Information; Finance. Wherever possible we add classified photographs.

For storing the documents, we have opted for standing metal lockers in blocks of six which can be extended as and when needed. At the moment there are six rows and I hope to buy a further six shortly. Each row carries a letter of the alphabet in a different colour, and each locker is numbered from 1 to 6. For containers for the documents themselves, I am using wallets or folders. Each document will have its own number. Thus A1 Folder contains Mother House Correspondence, 1907—1913, and in this collection there are ninety-three letters, numbered 001—093. There is also a brief description of the contents of each letter.

I hope this description gives some idea of the contents of our archives as they are at the moment. As I have now been appointed full-time archivist, I hope that the process of sorting and classifying will be speeded up. In the meantime, I would like it to be known that they are open to researchers by appointment and that I am ready to help anyone to the best of my ability.⁴

The Provinces, Their Number and Development.

In all there are seventeen Provinces in the Congregation. The essential requirement is that each one possesses within its territory the works of formation necessary for the training of its own members. The evolution of these provinces follows one of three patterns: the original five were recognised as such by the General Chapter of 1896; the second group grew out of foundations in Europe and North America; the third group developed within mission territories in the Third World. Thus we get:

Name	Earliest Foundation	Vice-Province	Province

THE ARCHIVES OF THE SOCIETY OF THE HOLY CHILD JESUS

Sr Winifred Wickins S.H.C.J.

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

The foundress of the Society was an American, Cornelia Connelly (1809—79). In 1835 she and her husband, Pierre Connelly, rector of the Protestant Episcopalian Church in Natchez, Mississippi, became Catholics. They spent two years in Rome and Europe and then returned to Grand Coteau, Louisiana, where, in 1840, Pierre told her that he wished to become a priest. The matter was referred to Rome and Cornelia summoned there in 1843. In 1845 the Pope gave permission for the separation; Cornelia took a solemn vow of chastity and withdrew to the Sacred Heart Convent at the Trinita. Bishop Wiseman knew the Connellys well and suggested that Cornelia, an intelligent and cultured woman, should come to England to found an English teaching order. With papal approval she and three companions took possession of the first S.H.C.J. convent in Derby in October 1846. Within two years the little community moved to St Leonards-on-Sea, and by the early 1850s the nuns were also teaching in London and Preston. Cornelia saw the importance of the training of teachers and opened a small but successful training school at St Leonards. Unfortunately, it had to be closed; attempts to work in schools and establish a college in Liverpool failed and the nuns moved on to Blackpool. In 1863 the Duchess of Leeds, herself an American, gave to the Society the Old Palace of Mayfield providing it was restored; this was done, and schools opened for orphans, village children and junior boarders. Later the novitiate was moved there and Mayfield became the Mother House. Two other foundations were specially dear to Cornelia: in 1862 another gift from the Duchess of land in Towanda made possible the sending of the first nuns to America; in 1869 a small school was begun in Hyeres, moving later to Toul and finally to Neuilly. Cornelia died in 1879 and for some years the task was one of consolidation and development rather than expansion. About the turn of the century new houses were opened in Oxford and Harrogate: a training college for graduates was set up in Cavendish Square, a house of studies in Oxford and pupil-teacher centres in London and Preston. A generation later came the next period of expansion; foundations were made in Ireland and Birmingham, and in 1930 the first S.H.C.J. missionaries went to Calabar and the West African mission began. There was corresponding expansion in the States but the Society has always remained, as Cornelia had described it, 'this little society', and its archives are accordingly small.

HISTORY OF THE ARCHIVES

For almost a century there was very little explicit concern about archives. In 1868 Cornelia stressed the importance of keeping house diaries containing 'facts and dates, not flights of fancy' but, despite constant reminders that these should be up-to-date, there are many gaps. After Cornelia's death her brother asked what he should do with her letters and was asked to send them to England; requests were made within the Society for information about her early companions but the response was limited. Otherwise, little was deliberately kept; M. Francis Bellasis copied out and preserved the writings on Cornelia by M. Maria Buckle; some sisters treasured letters or books; much survived merely because it was put away and forgotten. Early biographers of Cornelia used these sources and were also able to consult those who had known her and the early Society. Thus they both preserved and stimulated interest in the early records.

The great drive came about 1950 with the beginning of the work for the 'Cause' of Cornelia. As this was to be an historical cause everything possible written by, to, or connected with Cornelia had to be found and presented. A first reaction was 'We have hardly anything' to be countered by 'Look, you'll find you have plenty'. Every house was asked to carry out its own search and much was found pushed to the back of cupboards or drawers or stored in long-unopened boxes and trunks; the historical commissioners or the sisters visited archives wherever there had been any connection with the Connelys or the Society, and brought copies back to Mayfield.

The second impetus came from Vatican II and the call to religious to go back to their origins. Much of the material collected for Cornelia was relevant and so expedited our renewal movement. A special General Chapter in 1967—68 on the Rule and Constitutions was held in two parts; after the first, Fr James Walsh S.J. said 'What is needed is some sort of fresh program which would make it possible for members of the Chapter at the second session to have available from the archives of the Society material ordered and arranged according to the topics to be discussed. We have the instruments for such a crash program . . . the archives at Mayfield and the Historical Institute at Rosemont'.

This Institute originated in the S.H.C.J. college at Rosemont, Pa; it has as its aims widespread research, not only into the spirit of the Society and the personal life of its Foundress but also into the general life and times of these; and the dissemination as widely as possible of the fruits of this research. The results have been an increase in actual archival resources and in the appreciation of their usage and value. From its inception in 1968 the Institute has urged the professional training of archivists. The first official S.H.C.J. archivists were the sisters in charge of the Cause Room; since then there have been Society archivists in Rome, and provincial archivists in England and the States; some were historians but none had any archival training — they did magnificent work through a combination of common sense, intelligence, zeal and thoroughness. Our hope is that the trained archivists we now have will live up to their standards.

LOCATION OF ARCHIVES

Until work began on the Cause, archival material quietly collected its dust in whatever house it had originated or to which it had found its possibly devious way — the exception the transfer of generalate records to Rome after the generalate moved there from Mayfield in 1924. From 1952 the Cause Room at Mayfield became the archival centre and by the time the first part of the work was completed in 1968 several thousand documents had been amassed, sorted and carefully arranged in drop files in forty drawers in large steel cabinets. The Cause Room was renamed the Archives Room, but in 1971 the Provincial moved to London and the archives followed — into a basement flat. The filing cabinets occupied most of a large entrance area; all the rest of the provincial archives were tightly packed into the wall cupboard and wardrobe of a rather small bedroom. In 1981 they were moved back to Mayfield. The present office is a long narrow room, a pleasant but specifically utilitarian working office — any displays would be held elsewhere. It is fitted with steel shelving, nine stacks on the two long walls and eight (placed back to back) down the middle of the room giving double depth for larger boxes; the remaining wall space is used for book shelves.

The Archives Room

CONTENTS AND ARRANGEMENT

The history of our archives has led to a situation of two virtually self-contained sections. The stacks on one wall contain the documentary material relating to Cornelia Connelly. Some are originals, most typed or photocopies of documents originating elsewhere — over 500 letters were found in Southwark alone. On removal from London these were carefully transferred from filing cabinets to flat boxes; 38 boxes relate to Cornelia herself, 1837—79, with a few earlier documents; 20 contain background material, the Rule, journals and ledgers, schools, etc.; 18 contain material apropos the 'Cause', regulations, Fama, favours; 7 contain business records and 2 contain miscellaneous papers — larger volumes are in the deeper middle stacks. The use of all this material is facilitated because we have eighty-nine volumes of typed copies of the documentation put into order by the historical commission and professionally indexed.

The stacks on the other wall contain the rest of the province archives. One stack has material relating to the whole Society or to the generalate — rather thin as the main generalate archives are in Rome, but including the early annals of the Society, details of some of the later general chapters and letters from various superior-general. The next stack is that of the province since 1924: documentation of provincial chapters (reports on renewal should be of considerable value to future writers on religious life in the 1960s); letters from provincial superiors; memoirs of and by individual sisters; 'communications', i.e. newsletters, magazines, etc. One stack is entitled 'Religious Life': it includes factual records of our sisters, writings on religious formation, on prayer and the liturgy, on education and the apostolate, publications of Signum, the CMRS, the ATR. Two stacks are filled with archives pertaining to separate houses in the European province and, apart from the house annals, there is considerable variety of quantity and kind — correspondence about houses or schools, letters, school and parish magazines, etc. There are regrettable lacunae: we have almost nothing connected with the work most of the nuns have been engaged in for well over a century, taching in 'poor', parochial or elementary schools; and sometimes a house has closed and very little survived. We have a few boxes of Amercian material, few because they have their own archives and our older records are either in the general annals or the Cornelia material; and several boxes connected with the West African missions in Nigeria and Ghana — a rich holding but one not likely to grow much as the vice-province has its own archives and archivist.

Legal documents, both civil and ecclesiastical, are stored according to geographical origin; they are few and rarely the result of planned survival. Civil documents concern the purchase or leasing of land, contracts for buildings, regulations or agreements about schools. The majority of the ecclesiastical manuscripts are rescripts or permissions, often illustrative of the relations between bishops and religious, convents and parishes; detailed documentation of the long and involved history of the Rule of the Society shows the complicated intercommunication of Rome, local bishops and religious in such an important matter. Journals, ledgers, work-books and day-books (mostly 1846—80) are good hunting ground for the social historian, as are log-books, work-books, minutes of governors' meetings for the educationalist. Letters and memoirs are real treasure houses. The Connelly documentation reflects the social as well as the religious life of Rome in the 1830s and 1840s, and that of the Catholic Church in America then and from the 1860s; their life and work brought both Pierre and Cornelia into contact with many of the eminent churchmen of the day, while teaching in schools, such as those in London and Preston, brought an awareness of some of the worst of social conditions. In France the sisters experienced the Franco-Prussian war, the suppression of the religious houses, the evacuation of Paris in 1939 and the return six years later; they worked in London and occupied Rome from 1939—45, and in Nigeria in the Civil War.

We have a few films, mostly made in 1946 for the centenary of the Society, several boxes of slides, and the beginnings of an oral-history library tapes made by our older nuns. These are large and seemingly ever-growing piles of photographs — some sorted, the rest probably offering an opportunity for 'considered destruction'.

The books in the archives office have been deliberately collected both as background material and as archives in their own right. The collection began with the assembling of books used or referred to by Cornelia and the early nuns; these have been added to until there is quite a good library of nineteenth-century Church history, spirituality and education. It also contains books written about the Society or by the sisters. In our convent in Hastings is 'Mr Jones's Library'; the Rev. Mr Jones was parish priest of St Leonards when our nuns went there — in his library a few volumes are collectors' pieces in themselves but the real value is in the library as an entity, the collection made in the early nineteenth century by a man of moderate means who was at once a Catholic priest, a scholar and a bibliophile. In addition to the archives in the Mayfield office, the holdings in the various houses belong morally to the provincial archives. Apart from the basic house diaries and annals these vary considerably according to the age and size of the house and the work done. Lists of these holdings are in the office.

USE AND AVAILABILITY

As with most religious houses the archives office is private but we are very pleased indeed that it should be known and shared by others. Anyone wishing to visit it should write or ring to ensure it is open and we always try to supply information to those who write for it.

The archives are chiefly used by our own sisters and by students seeking information for theses, usually on some aspect of nineteenth-century education.

CATHOLIC ARCHIVES IN MEXICO

In spring 1981, invited by the Catholic Archives Society, I attended the annual Spode Conference where I was able to share the Mexican experience on ecclesiastical archives, and become aware of the progress achieved by Catholic archivists in Great Britain.

In the 1982 issue of Catholic Archives I have read with interest the report on the situation of Catholic archives in the United States, France and Ireland, and was very pleased on receiving that issue to be asked to report on the situation of Catholic archives in Mexico for a future issue of Catholic Archives.

The National Register of Archives was established in 1978 as a Division of the Archivo General de la Nacion (National Archives of Mexico), the head institution of the National System of Archives of Mexico, to rescue, register and inventory the documentary wealth of the country, that is, all State or civil archives; and, regarding the local documentary holdings of the Catholic Church in Mexico as patrimony of national interest, we considered all ecclesiastical records as well.

A programme was set forth, taking into account the benefits it could render to both Government and Church, and considering above all the rules and principles dictated by canon law, and also the rules and constitutions of the different religious institutes which show the spirit of the founder and his view towards archives and history within the institute.

Surprisingly, the episcopal body reacted with enthusiasm, and was willing to co-operate with the officers of the National Register of Archives, who have so far registered archives in thirty-five ecclesiastical districts, that is, fifty per cent of the total; classified and inventoried parish archives in twenty dioceses; and have organised meetings and courses for the training of archivists in ten dioceses. We must add that twenty-five inventories of ecclesiastical archives have been published.

Early this year, the enthusiasm of the head of the National Register of Archives, Mtro. Jorge Garibay, led him to contact the Conference of Religious Institutes of Mexico, with whom an agreement was signed to train and advise on archival matters members of religious institutes who would apply for this service through the Conference of Religious Institutes.

On 10 August 1982, the first meeting with superiors of religious institutes of women took place, with an audience of approximately 250 Provincials to whom we explained the aims of the Archivo General de la Nacion and the Conference of Religious Institutes.

On 7 August 1982, another meeting took place, attended by school teachers members of religious institutes of women, on which occasion we lectured on principle of provenance and archives as a media of educational apostolate.

During the first week of September, we had the first Conference on religious archives, attended by superiors, secretaries and archivists representing twenty-three religious institutes. The topics discussed were: the use of archives for a better government of the religious institute; ecclesiastical archives in the light of canon law; duties of religious archivists; ecclesiastical archival action in Mexico, and oral history.

At present, the Ecclesiastical Archives Department of the National Register of Archives has advised and helped on the keeping and the arranging of archives of religious institutes to various communities, among them: Salesians of Don Bosco, Dominican Sisters, Daughters of Mary, Help of Christians, Society of Priests of Saint Joseph, Society of Sisters of Saint Joseph, and Columbian Fathers. In most cases, the Archivo General de la Nacion provided materials and staff required, and produced inventories of the archives.

Many other religious institutes have applied for advice on the arrangement, the keeping of archives, and the writing, preserving or propagating the history of their own organisation, as well as on the undertaking of oral history projects. We hope to attend all of these requests in due time, and in this way contribute to the preservation of Catholic records, and to the propagation of the history of the Catholic Church in Mexico.

THE CHURCH ARCHIVISTS' SOCIETY OF AUSTRALIA

After being appointed to my present position (Diocesan Archivist, Toowoomba, Queensland) in October 1977,¹ I joined the Australian Society of Archivists, the body to which most professional archivists belong. Church archivists and others employed in non-government or public companies can be accepted as associate members only with no franchise. Apart from the benefit of being kept up to date in the archival world and making contact with professional archivists, the A.S.A. has very little to offer church archivists.

At the biennial General Meetings and Conferences in 1979 and 1981,¹ met no more than half a dozen confreres, but from conversation then and correspondence later with them and others I contacted in my travels, I gathered that the same major difficulties were common to all. These are smallness of budgets, lack of space and facilities, but above all dearth of suitable training for their specific needs. I had, rather early in my career, reached the conclusion that the duties of a church archivist differed very noticeably from those employed in a State or public archives. The former has to be prepared to wear many hats and personally, I find that factor makes the profession more challenging and far more interesting than it otherwise might be.

As a result of the fore-mentioned discussions, and counsel asked for and received, and acting on the age-old dictum 'if you want to get something done, etc.', I began preparations to found a Church Archivists' Society. I never entertained the thought that it should be for Catholics only, for several reasons. Chief of these are the scattered nature of the population in this country and the knowledge that both Catholic and non-Catholic archivists would benefit from the interchange of ideas that would result.

The inaugural meeting was held at the State Archives in Brisbane in October 1981. There were representatives from the Catholic Dioceses of Brisbane, Toowoomba and Rockhampton, the Anglican Diocese of Brisbane and the Presbyterian Church of Queensland. Apologies and support came from the Lutheran and Uniting Churches in Queensland and other Catholic and Anglican Dioceses. It was felt that there was enough interest to warrant the erection of a new society, so on the morning of the second day, the C.A.S. was born. It was never envisaged that regular meetings would be held — at least on a national scale — owing to both distance and expense. The modus operandi was to be by means of a monthly Newsletter (February to November). The draft Constitutions drawn up and accepted were (and are) very sketchy with administration minimal. This was in line with advice received from the two professionals who helped greatly, but in this respect I think we were badly advised. The matter has yet to be resolved.

I took over the editorship of the Newsletter (there were no other volunteers) and had the first edition ready by mid-November. Who was to be on the mailing list? From the start I had seen the necessity of going national immediately as the Society needed members and support if it were to be viable. Queensland is a vast State (over one-and-a-half million sq. kms.) but with a population of only two million it couldn't supply sufficient of either by itself. I therefore drew up a list of some 280. This included all Anglican and Catholic Dioceses (some fifty-one), the State headquarters of the other main Churches, the Jews and some 170 Religious Orders — both Catholic and Anglican.

By February 1982, membership had reached a respectable figure but was below expectations. The second edition went to over 230, but since then the list has been kept to a more viable 130 plus, as a continued large number of complimentary copies was financially impossible. Growth has never ceased, so by the end of August membership reached the very creditable total of ninety-five. Every State and Territory are represented and we have even been invited across the Tasman to New Zealand. Anglican and Catholic Dioceses are equally represented although overall only one-third of members are non-Catholic.

The correspondence has revealed that there is great interest and support ('filling a long-felt need, etc.')

but on the whole, the members have failed with the latter as regards supplying material for the Newsletter. This has meant my having to write up to 80 per cent of each edition — a practice which is time-consuming and not conducive to keeping up a good standard. I have been fortunate in getting permission to reprint some good pertinent articles from outside sources. This practice will have to continue unless members overcome their 'shyness' and provide copy at an acceptable level.

At the inaugural meeting the publication of a Register of Church Archives in Australia was proposed and the project was adopted. Information sheets were sent out with the first edition of the Newsletter and subsequently to all new members. Getting a satisfactory return has not been easy. Fewer than sixty have been received to date and they are very uneven in quality. Some are excellent, particularly as regards a description of the holdings, but others leave a lot to be desired. I have made repeated appeals trying to 'educate' members into a proper appreciation of the value of the records under their care, for basically I believe therein lies the trouble. Many do not realise they are custodians of documents which form an integral part of the national heritage which the public have a right to know about and equally a right to have access to, under normal conditions and controls. Every archives (Church or State) has its sensitive areas which have limited access (or none) but I cannot credit that a blanket prohibition is ever necessary or justified.

Publishing date for the Register is November of 1982. That may seem rushed for a society so new, but the gathered data has to be used quickly if the work is to be of any value. With no capital worth speaking of, the Society has had to rely on pre-sales. These have been slow but a widespread interest has been expressed in all sectors of the community contacted. These comprise archives, tertiary institutes, public libraries and colleges — over 1,000 in all. The main attraction, I think, lies in the fact that no national register of church archival records has ever before been published, though there have been some devoted to individual States. This work will also contain details of some holdings of church records in the National Library at Canberra and in some of the major municipal and university libraries. As a first edition, it will doubtless have many flaws, but it might lead to one of the universities making a grant for some post-graduate team to produce a definitive work.

As the C.A.S. (Australia brand) enters its second year, the future is an unknown. Perhaps we will have to conduct biennial or triennial meetings and conferences, if for no other reason than to enable a spirit to develop. However, Church archivists are proverbially hard up and the cost of travel in this fair land is prohibitive. For members in Perth (W.A.) to travel to Brisbane by train, the cost would be over $1,000 return, and by air it would be dearer. Coach travel is much cheaper but very trying over such a distance (4,500 kms.) for the elderly members who comprise the greater proportion of the C.A.S. I can only hope that more members will become active with their pens to give more support to the lifeline — the Newsletter.

Recent enquiries about the Earl of Shrewsbury and Epstein indicate wider possibilities and while one would never make the claim for one small office, I think that generally the following statement is as true of religious archives in England as in America. In an article entitled 'Archives of Roman Catholic Orders and Congregations of Women' (The American Archivist, 1970), the author writes: 'How much information of general interest to American historians is included remains unknown and apparently not even considered. A survey would be a tremendous undertaking; it might be a profitable one'.

The third annual conference, held at Spode house on 13—15 July, although attended by only thirty religious and professional archivists, happily including some new members, proved to be a useful as well as an enjoyable meeting.

On the first evening, 13 July, Fr F. Edwards, S.J. (Vice-Chairman) described Bishop Challoner's missionary life and showed slides of places where he stayed during his 1741—42 Visitation and on other occasions. The next morning, 14 July, Fr A. Dolan gave a talk on the Nottingham Diocesan Archives in his care, the text of which is published in this issue. This was followed by a practical session in which Miss K.M. Topping, Deputy County Archivist of Kent, spoke about storage and conservation problems, balancing some cautionary advice on what not to do with an encouraging demonstration of basic equipment, materials and methods which archivists could employ for essential running repairs on certain documents and books.

During the afternoon of 14 July members divided into two parties. Nineteen members visited the County Record Office at Stafford where they were welcomed by Dr M. O'Sullivan and shown work in progress in the reading room, the conservation room, and the archivists' work room, the visit indicating the practical help and advice which local record offices are pleased to give to religious archivists. The remaining members were taken by Sr Mary Barbara, O.P. on a guided tour of St Dominic's church, Stone, and saw Bishop Ullathorne's tomb, the conventual buildings, and the little chapel in the grounds built by Pugin in 1845, where Blessed Dominic Barberi said Mass, preached, and was buried in 1849. The enthusiasm of members after these two visits if somewhat dampened by a torrential downpour of rain was soon revived by a lively talk by Fr J. McLoughlin, O.F.M., on the archives of the Friars Minor, held at Forest Gate, London, the text of which also appears in this issue.

The Society's AGM was held in the morning of 15 July. Dr L.A. Parker (Chairman) reviewed progress during the preceding year, reporting, inter alia, that there were 152 full members and a further 82 institutional and private subscribers to Catholic Archives. The Association of Religious Archivists of Ireland was now well established and contacts had been made or continued with France, the U.S.A., Mexico and Australia. Two meetings of the Midland Group of Diocesan Archivists and one meeting of the Northern Group, which Bishop Foley (President) had attended, had been held, and the need for practical measures to preserve diocesan records was becoming more widely recognised.

The officers and committee members for 1983 were duly elected and the retiring and continuing officers thanked for their service. During a useful 'open forum' discussion, Dom Placid Spearritt, O.S.B. voiced the concern of religious archivists that the office and duties of the archivist should be stated in the constitution of religious orders.

A fuller report of the conference appears in the Newsletter, Vol.2, No.1 (Autumn 1982). The 1983 conference will be held at Spode House, 12—14 July

EDITORIAL NOTES

The main purpose of Catholic Archives is to publish descriptions of the archives of religious orders, congregations and other foundations, dioceses, and other institutions and individual persons relating to the Catholic Church in the United Kingdom and Ireland. This purpose has a twofold objective: firstly, to bring to scholarly notice the wealth of original documentary evidence held in hitherto little known or even inaccessible quarters and, secondly, to promote the preservation of all Catholic archives, thus helping the Society to fulfil its primary objective.

The variety of articles in this 1984 edition witnesses the wide range of archive resources for original research into numerous aspects of the Church's history both in this country and abroad. In scarcely one article are the archives described restricted solely to the body which created them, and few are limited to the spiritual life or institutional growth of the Church itself. Certain records are clearly relevant to subjects of general historical enquiry, for instance in educational, literary, social, political and moral issues, while in a few cases, such as the archives of the Holy Ghost Fathers in the context of the history of Africa, some documents identified are likely to provide unique information.

The Society is concerned to encourage the preservation of Church archives in all quarters. Discussion at recent Conferences has revealed several basic problems for the religious archivist — once the little matter of recognition of the need for an archivist at all is decided! An initial uncertainty about the essential character of archives, without down-grading the invaluable associated historical materials which generally fall within the purview of the archivist, is fairly easily overcome. Likewise, the practical problem of finding suitable accommodation, storage containers, proper conditions, and so on are readily appreciated, even if difficult to achieve at first. The acquisition of archives and historical materials is clearly a matter of the support of superiors and methods of advertisement within and peculiar to each foundation. But where a new archivist can feel at a serious loss is in how to sort, classify, list, index and even store the records. Catholic Archives does not attempt to provide answers to what are essentially questions of professional archive management technique and procedure (there are archive manuals for this) but, even so, it is hoped that professed as well as novice archivists will be able to elicit many useful lessons from the articles contributed by more seasoned campaigners.

The Society is aware of the isolation, as well as the lack of time and resources, under which many archivists labour, and it is hoped that the sharing of experiences through the medium of articles in Catholic Archives will lessen the sense of being 'lone arrangers'. Religious archivists working on their own will share the trepidation expressed by Sister Ita Moore, MMM in the first issue of ARAI Newsletter (February 1983), published by the Association of Religious Archivists of Ireland, but also take heart from her reflection: 'For many of us the Archivist is that person — all alone in a room, attic or basement — with boxes and files of material which she has been asked to preserve! In actual fact she is the person appointed by the Congregation to make available to us the priceless heritage of our Congregation'.

Happily, the importance of archives has been clearly established since Vatican II and by the new Code of Canon Law but this recognition conveys a new challenge to Catholic archivists. The Society, conscious of the value of model rules and standards, has drafted 'Clauses for the Guidance of a Diocese or Congregation in the Administration of its Archives' (see pp.70—71). These will be discussed at the annual Conference at Spode (29—31 May) and advance comments will be welcomed.

The Society is grateful to all the authors and contributors of articles, and wishes them continued success in their archive work or research. Finally, the Hon. Editor again extends an open invitation to archivists to submit articles for publication.

THE USHAW COLLECTION OF MANUSCRIPTS

The Rev. Michael Sharratt

The archives of Ushaw College, Durham are arranged in series, such as the Lingard Correspondence or the Wiseman Correspondence, and each series has its own internal reference system. So the Ushaw Collection of Manuscripts (UCM) is only one series out of many. But it may be considered as the foundation series of the College's archives, so it is important enough to merit separate description.

In its present form UCM consists of four large bound volumes and one box-file of loose documents. I say 'in its present form' because originally the series consisted of only the first two volumes. These were already collected into their present arrangement when Joseph Gillow used them in the 1880s, though he refers to them by pages rather than by item-numbers: the item-numbers were added at the beginning of this century, and it is possible that the volumes were bound at the same time. The third volume was put together and bound in 1936. Volume four was presumably assembled soon after, though I have not discovered when it was bound; the box-file serves as a location for suitable additional manuscripts.

The catalogue of UCM (i.e. the first two volumes) was compiled under the supervision of the Rev. Edwin Bonney in the first decade of this century. It was revised and then extended to the additional volumes by the late Mgr Bernard Payne, who was Librarian at Ushaw from 1930 until 1977. This catalogue was originally included in the catalogue of Ushaw's Big Library and so was written on index cards (5" by 3"). It was supplemented by transcripts of selected parts of the first three volumes: the transcripts were made by Fr W. Vincent Smith.

In 1982—3 I re-catalogued the whole series (again on 5" by 3") and added a name-index of authors and correspondents and a selective index of subjects and persons. Since UCM has been quoted frequently in publications, there was no question of changing the reference system or of re-arranging any of the documents. So, for instance, 'UCM 2/49' still refers to the item numbered '49' in the second volume: these item-numbers were introduced by Bonney. Each of the first three volumes re-commences the item-numbering afresh, whereas volume four and the box-file (which I have treated as volume five) continue the numeration of the third volume — not very tidy, but there it is. As in many bound series one finds misplaced or split items: these have been noticed by cross-references on the cards.

The main cards have customarily been filed in chronological order, an arrangement which users have often found convenient when combing the collection for material on a given period. I have continued this arrangement, with the consequence that I have had to make a second series of cards in numerical order of items in order to provide an adequate cross-reference system and to provide a list from which one can check rapidly whether any item has been removed from the collection. (A check showed that a letter cf. No.9, attributed to Challoner, seems to have been removed in the last decade or two.) The index to the main cards gives references to the manuscripts by date and by item-number. Users should continue to quote by volume and item-number (e.g. UCM 2/49). It is not necessary to give page numbers within an item, though it can help in a very long item. Old published references, such as Gillow's, which only give page numbers present no difficulties, since the items can easily be found by anyone who is using the actual manuscripts.

The bulk of UCM is concerned with Catholicism in the Northern District of England from the establishment of the Vicariate in 1688 until the early years of the nineteenth century, though there are also earlier and later manuscripts. It is not by any means the complete archives of the Northern Vicars Apostolic, but it includes many documents which certainly belonged to whatever de facto served as the Bishop's archives.

Even prolonged efforts at detection would probably not yield completely convincing results about which items were brought together at what stage, though it seems likely that a large part came to Ushaw at one time as a single deposit from the District's archives. It is almost certain that the present arrangement of the first two volumes was devised by an archivist at Ushaw, while the later volumes bear clear evidence of obsolete reference marks, showing that smaller series within Ushaw's archives were dismantled so that they could be incorporated into an extended UCM. There is no reason why the collection could not be extended further as and when appropriate materials are deposited at Ushaw.

I have said that UCM may be considered to be the foundation series of Ushaw's archives. It is well known that Ushaw's first President, Thomas Eyre (1748—1810), was one of those who hoped to continue Dodd's Church History of England. Gillow mentions that in 1791 Eyre 'began to circulate queries, and to collect materials' for this purpose.¹ Although Eyre's presidency of Crook Hall from 1794 until 1808 and of Ushaw from 1808 until his death prevented him from carrying out his project, it is certain that it was he who brought much of UCM to Ushaw, and many of the documents in it are annotated in his hand. But it is also certain that the later volumes of UCM include papers not collected by Eyre, and that a good deal of the material which Eyre did collect is scattered across other series in Ushaw's archives.

The material collected by Eyre will have included what were already collections: one collection within UCM consists of a considerable number of letters, copies of letters, memoranda, diary entries and other documents which were written or collected by Edward Dicconson (1670—1752). His library was already in the possession of the College when it moved from Crook Hall to Ushaw in 1808, so his papers may well have been entrusted to the College along with the library. The contents of these papers of Dicconson's are already pretty well known.² Even readers who have not come across them in modern publications will occasionally feel that they have seen them before. There is more than one reason for this. Gillow drew on them heavily for his account of how the secular clergy were wrongly accused of Jansenism in the early years of the eighteenth century.³ But they also seem familiar because they are very much in Dodd's tradition of narrative, where the principal theme is the long-suffering virtue of the secular clergy despite the continual provocations of the Jesuits. Yet another reason may be that it is not just a question of Dicconson's sharing Dodd's obsession: it is that some of these papers (or their originals, in the case of copies) are among Dodd's sources.⁴

Of all the papers in UCM Dicconson's are the ones that have received most attention. It has to be said that there are only a few from his time as Vicar Apostolic (1741—1752), while the papers from his Roman Agency are in the Lancashire Record Office. But there are in UCM some items that would repay further attention, for instance, his disagreement with Bishop John Talbot Stonor over swearing loyalty to George I.

It would be pleasant to announce that in UCM there is a vast amount of hitherto unexplored material on the day-to-day life of the Northern District over many decades. But it must be remembered that UCM is a series which has been easily available to researchers for a century, so one can be fairly sure that most of the items have been examined several times by discerning eyes, and it is not surprising that there is little that will strike the informed reader as novel. Still, now that there is an index to the material, it is more likely that users and inquirers will spot material relevant to their research. So a brief outline of the kinds of material available will help readers to decide whether an inquiry will be worthwhile.

The first Vicar Apostolic of the District was James Smith. There are a couple of dozen letters to or from him, with a handful of papers (e.g. cases of conscience, admonitions to the clergy) which give glimpses of his pastoral work. Similar glimpses are given into the work of Bishops Williams and Dicconson, but one has to wait until the 1750s and 1760s for more abundant evidence of episcopal administration in the papers of Bishop Francis Petre. Even in the last decades of the century the papers of Bishops Walton and Matthew and William Gibson amount to only a few dozen in each case. A significant proportion of the items throughout the eighteenth century is material (instructions, queries, correspondence) from or to the Congregation of Propaganda. There are also a couple of dozen letters and papers by Bishop Challoner.

Even this limited material has recurring themes: how to deal with civil legislation for marriages, details of the Lenten fast, renewal of faculties for regulars, or a flurry of submissions to the Brief for the suppression of the Society of Jesus, with intermittent queries thereafter about the ecclesiastical status of former Jesuits. There are a few lists (e.g. of regular priests working in part of the district, or of confirmations administered by a Vicar Apostolic), but there is no cache of hitherto unknown statistics to shorten the labours of patient gleaners. The documents written by or to the Vicars Apostolic are, of course, not the only ones to shed light on the life of the Church in the district: there are a few letters by priests and some documentation of clergy funds and funds set up by lay persons for pious purposes.

The colleges on the continent were, of course, a prime concern of the Vicars Apostolic. The few documents in UCM concerning the Venerable English College in Rome help to fill out its history in the second half of the eighteenth century. An isolated little collection on the College at Valladolid has already been drawn to the attention of Dr Michael Williams, who is engaged in writing a history of that college. The few items concerning Lisbon College have already been discussed in a recent article.⁵

The more substantial series of papers connected with the English College at Douai has already been explored pretty thoroughly, starting with Gillow's article on Hawarden in his Biographical Dictionary and Bonney's articles in the Ushaw Magazine early this century.⁶ But items such as Dicconson's Diary or the answers to the queries from Rome in 1741 remain essential documents for anyone studying what was the most important of our continental seminaries, and the new index to the material brings together a few snippets to add to the dossiers which are already well known.

Isolated collections are occasionally important: one example is the correspondence of Richard Short in the first decade of the eighteenth century. He is interesting for his connection with leading figures in latter-day Jansenism and the Church in Holland. Another example, from the following decade and the 1720s, is the correspondence of Edward Blount. His interest is the mitigation of the penal laws against Catholics: he is a sort of unofficial secretary who tries to steer Catholic opinion between pro-Stuart intransigence and Bishop Stonor's tactless pragmatism. Another self-contained item is a little booklet of letters by Sylvester Jenks to Thomas Fairfax S.J. on the subject of Jansenism. These were written in 1710 and 1711 and are yet another instance of the extensive documentation in UCM which was penned to clear the secular clergy from the charges of Jansenism.

Brief mention may be made of letters and documents concerned with the activities of the Catholic Committee, though similar collections are available elsewhere (or in other series at Ushaw, for that matter). A few letters about choosing successors or co-adjutors to Vicars Apostolic throw some light on how bishops were chosen by Rome. A short series of items give the seculars' side of the story of how they took over the running of the College of St Omer, after the Jesuits had been ejected.

UCM is not very strong on nineteenth-century documents. I think the explanation is that any such documents (at least after 1810, the year of Eyre's death) would seem to be additional to the original deposit of material. This fact by itself would not have prevented any amount of later material from being added, but it is noticeable that the Ushaw archives contain major series (such as the correspondence of Lingard or Wiseman, already mentioned) which would not have fitted readily into UCM. So it is not surprising that other series such as the President's Archives should have served as the location for what otherwise might well have been added to UCM. Still, there are in UCM quite a few interesting petitions and consultations concerning the restoration of the hierarchy and a sprinkling of clergy petitions and complaints about curtailment by the bishops of their customary rights.

It should also be noted that after the restoration of the hierarchy Ushaw was no longer the obvious place to deposit diocesan records. In fact, one may take 1840, the date when the Northern District was divided, as beginning a new period in which district/diocesan records would no longer be deposited at Ushaw.

CONCLUSION

The re-cataloguing and indexing of UCM will make more accessible a collection which has long been fairly well known. It is an important collection for the history of English Catholicism in the eighteenth century, though a good deal of it is discoverable in equivalent form in other archives. It remains essential for research on the Northern District, on English attitudes to Jansenism in the early eighteenth century and on the history of the English College at Douai.

To prevent disappointment, I must add that it is not possible to photocopy items from this collection; nor, since it is a bound collection, is it possible to lend items from it for exhibition.

UCM may be consulted at Ushaw by anyone who is interested, provided that an appointment is first made in writing. Anyone who wishes to consult the collection or to make an inquiry is asked to write to: The Librarian, Ushaw College, Durham DH7 9RH.

THE GENERAL ARCHIVES OF THE HOLY GHOST FATHERS

The Rev. W. Wilfrid Gandy, C.S.Sp.

The General Archives of the Holy Ghost Fathers are predominantly missionary, although they contain items dealing with seminary training in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, education at home and abroad, and relations between Church and State, particularly in France, Germany and Portugal. Their original home was the Mother House at 30 rue Lhomond in the Latin quarter of Paris which has belonged to the Congregation since 1731. However, quite recently they have been moved to spacious new quarters at the Seminaire des Missions, 12 rue Pere Mazurie, Chevilly-La-Rue, just off the Fontainebleau road. The main reasons for this move were the lack of space and the danger of fire.

In May 1983, I worked there for a week and I would say the locale is almost ideal. It covers two floors and a basement. The ground floor houses the archives themselves, provides an excellent room for researchers, and contains an office and living accommodation for the archivist, Fr Bernard Noel. On the first floor there are work rooms for repairing, preserving, photostating and micro-filming. The basement is a well arranged store.

The archives, which cover the years 1703-1960, are installed in a large room, 42ft by 32ft, the floor of which has been reinforced to take the weight. The archives proper occupy one side and are arranged in what Fr Noel calls colonnes-classeurs, or steel lockers, built together in rows. In all there are 1,050 lockers (what the French call boites). Each boite contains at least 2 dossiers, or large folders, headed A & B. Within these there are several chemises, which I think we would call single jackets, each of which contains documents relative to a given subject. Thus every item has four numbers, e.g. the manuscript life of Fr Bertout is 8.A.I.4. The general classification is geographical and chronological. On the other side of the room is what I would call a 'back-up library'.

All material is divided according to four categories:

1. Official Documents and Correspondence with the following:

Rome. In particular with Propaganda Fide and the Congregation for Religious.

National Governments. Of particular interest here are the relations with the different French Governments since 1703. As these deal with many aspects of Church/State relations I would like to come back to them later.

Provinces and Missions. To the number of more than 65 jurisdictions (cf. Catholic Archives, No. 3, 1983, pp. 34—7).

Bishops, Vicars and Prefects Apostolic. Here the most interesting are those concerned with the old French colonial dioceses and the early Vicars Apostolic in Africa.

2. Private Correspondence with Members and Others. There are tremendous riches here. Fr Noel was telling me that they amount to many tens of thousands. Not all are yet classified. They include Fr Libermann's spiritual letters to all kinds of people – seminarists, nuns, layfolk and members of the Congregation. Although they all exist in manuscript form, each one has been copied by hand so that the actual manuscripts are hardly ever used. I understand that Fr Libermann's successor employed six scribes for the work.
3. Community Journals or Diaries. These cover many of our Missions in Africa, South America and the Islands. Those belonging to the Provinces remain in the Provinces. However, there are many still in our overseas territories and with the rise of indigenous hierarchies problems of ownership crop up. If they are Holy Ghost community journals, are they not the property of the Congregation? All Ordinaries do not agree. The policy we are trying to follow is, to keep the originals and offer photostat copies to the Ordinaries, of what is relevant for them.

Among those I was looking at, the very early ones are the most interesting, like those of St Mary's, Bathurst, dating from 1851 and St Joseph's, Zanzibar, 1860. The first journal of St Mary's starts on 1 January 1851, describes the High Mass, and points out that the community is waiting for the visit of the second Vicar Apostolic of the Two Guineas. It then goes on to describe the training of catechists, the opening of church schools, both industrial and primary, and the treks of individual missionaries. It ends with the erection of the Stations of the Cross on 6 July 1878. This project had taken 12 years to realise and had involved the Superior General, the Vicar Apostolic, the Franciscans and, in the final stage, a special envoy bringing the official authentication, as the author puts it, 'in latin'.

4. Other Collections. These include:
General Bulletin of the Congregation (1857-1982). The official record of the administration and growth of the Congregation. The early numbers (1857—70) are of particular interest for the history of the opening up of Africa. For example they cover in detail the first ten years of the new missions along the East Coast (1860—70). They give in full the reports of Frs Bauer and Horner, including the latter's important journey of 1867 which led to the founding of the first mission on the mainland at Bagamoyo in 1868. It was from Bagamoyo that the push to the interior began. It was from there that Stanley mounted his expedition in search of Livingstone and the White Fathers began their trek to the great lakes.

Notes et Documents Relatifs a l'Histoire de la Congregation du Saint Esprit (1703 1914). A collection of the official documents relating to the official recognition of the Congregation by Bourbon kings and French governments.

Notes et Documents Relatifs a la Vie et a l'Oeuvre du Venerable Pere Francois Marie Paul Libermann (13 vols and 2 Appendices). These cover the whole of his life from 1802—1852. Among other things, quoting his letters and memoranda, they give a description of the beginnings of the revival of the Catholic missions on the West Coast of Africa, 1844—1852. Although it began tragically with the death of five of the original nine missionaries within six months, he was determined to go ahead with his plans which already included the training of catechists and native clergy.

Circular Letters of the Superiors General, 1864 1980; Directories of the Congregation, 1883 1980 (35 in all), and Biographies of Members, 1703- 1961 (5 vols). From the point of view of the archivist and the historian I would think the Directories are the most interesting, for from them it is possible to follow the growth of the communities throughout the world and the distribution of personnel at any given time.

At this stage I suggest we examine the content of the archives in the light of the historical divisions of the development of the Congregation (cf. Catholic Archives, No. 3, 1983, p. 32).

A. Before and during the French Revolution (1703—1802). Unfortunately, there are very few original documents left. The reason is that when the Congregation was suppressed by the Republican Government most of the papers were confiscated and are now in the National Archives in Paris. However, two very precious pieces have been preserved — the writings of our founder, Fr Claude Francois Poullart des Places (1679—1709) and 15 sermons of Fr Jacques Magdeleine Bertout (1753—1832), preached in England between 1795 and 1801.

The writings of Fr Poullart des Places are mostly in the form of retreat notes which when put together give us a very clear picture of the spiritual life of the young Breton nobleman who, as a simple tonsured cleric, founded his Seminary and Society of the Holy Ghost at the age of 24 and died at the age of 30. Also contained in these is the original Seminary Rule written in his own hand. This rule was followed alike by students and members of the Society. As the Society grew it became the basis of the Latin rule so that as far as I know we are the only modern congregation which has its own rule and does not follow any one of the four Great Rules.

Fr Bertout was a rather exceptional man. His life can be divided into three parts: 1753- 1792, during which time he rose to be Assistant to the fifth Superior General; 1792-1802, when he came to England as an emigre priest and worked mostly in Yorkshire; and 1802—1833, when he returned to France, became the sixth Superior General and restored the Congregation after the ravages of the French Revolution. Concerning the first and third of these periods we have considerable information. Of the second we know practically nothing. We do not know where he actually worked, apart from the fact that his biographer says, 'mostly in the County of York'. He also adds that 'the sermons were preached to the congregations which he served' (Manuscript Life, Gen. Archives, 8.A.I.5.). I am striving to find out more about him so, if anyone can help I will be delighted. In France I drew a complete blank. No letter at all remains. He may of course have written to England.

As for his sermons, I have a full set of photostats. The one which I feel is the most important is on 'Frequent Communion' preached on 2nd Sunday after Pentecost (G.A., 8.B.111.14). This subject is rather remarkable for the time, unless we consider that in his rule No.37 Fr Poullart des Places, recommended his students to go to Communion once a week or even more frequently with permission of their spiritual directors.

B. During the Years of Napoleon and the Restoration (1802—1848).

Here the key figure is Fr Bertout. He restored the Congregation, got it recognised by successive governments, reoccupied the Mother House and the other property in France and revived the evangelisation of the overseas territories. It is worth noting that the Holy Ghost Fathers in general were in favour of the emancipation of slaves. All this period is very well documented.

C. Father Libermann and the Missionaries of the Most Pure Heart of Mary (1802-1848). His new Society, founded in 1841-2, had, as its specific aim, the evangelisation of the black race. Starting in Mauritius in 1841, with Blessed Jacques Desire Laval, his missionaries were also working in Vicariate of the Two Guineas which stretched right down the West Coast of Africa as far as Angola, with stations at Goree and Dakar in Senegal, Bathurst in Gambia, and Libreville in Gabon. As the most outstanding I would pick out Mauritius, because of Fr Libermann, Bishop Collier, O.S.B. and Blessed Jacques Laval who made the apostolate to the emancipated slaves such a success.

D. The Holy Ghost Fathers, a Worldwide Missionary Congregation (1848—1960). The date 1848 is very important. In that year the fusion of the two Societies took place, or, to be more precise, the Missionaries of the Most Pure Heart of Mary were suppressed and the members incorporated into the Holy Ghost Fathers. The full title was slightly changed to Congregation of the Holy Ghost and under the Patronage of the Immaculate Heart of Mary. Fr Libermann became Superior General. It was rather a remarkable event and is very well documented. Indeed many canonists have studied it with great interest. Rules and Constitutions were drawn from the Holy Ghost Latin Rule and from Fr Libermann's provisional Rule to give the Constitutions of 1849. This event constituted a kind of new beginning. The territories served by the two Societies were complementary - the Holy Ghost with its missions in the West Indies, French Guiana and the Indian Ocean; the Most Pure Heart of Mary with its developing mission to the East Coast of Africa. The result is that, as far as the archives are concerned, there is in Africa, in the Indian Ocean and in the West Indies absolute continuity since 1841. At the same time they show clearly the steady development and expansion into South America, Papua-New Guinea and finally into Pakistan (cf. Catholic Archives, No. 3, 1983, pp.36-7).

In conclusion, from this vast material I would just like to pick out two outstanding topics.

- i) Holy Ghost Missions and African Exploration. I have already mentioned the help given to Stanley by the mission of Bagamoyo. In the archives there are letters to and from Stanley, Livingstone and almost every outstanding African explorer of the nineteenth century. However, many of our early missionaries became explorers through the progressive foundations they made. An excellent example of this was the expedition undertaken in 1890 by Bishop Roul de Courmont, Fr Alexander Le Roy, and Fr Auguste Gommenginger — an expedition which culminated in the first ascent of Mount Kilimanjaro by a white man and the foundation of the mission of Kilema by Fr Gommenginger. Much more spectacular were the expeditions of Mgr Prosper Augouard in the area of the Congo which opened up the whole of what is now the Central African Republic. The result was that by 1895 he had established a mission 1,375 miles into the interior.
- ii) Use of the Archives to preserve the existence of the Society. At the height of the anti-clerical laws in France the Holy Ghost Fathers were suppressed by the Law of 4 December 1902, although we had been granted legal recognition by the French kings, before and after the Revolution, and by Napoleon. The reason given was that the original Society of the Holy Ghost had ceased to exist in 1848 and had been replaced by the Society of the Most Pure Heart of Mary. The Superior General, Mgr Le Roy, refused to accept this decision, went searching in our archives and in the French National Archives and proved that, on the contrary, the Society of the Most Pure Heart of Mary had been suppressed by Rome and all its members incorporated into the Congregation of the Holy Ghost. The result was that the Conseil d'Etat reversed the decision — and action almost unique in French history. We survived as a legal institution — a position we hold to this day.

May I end by adding that these archives are open to bona fide researchers by appointment.

SOUTHWARK DIOCESAN ARCHIVES

The Rev. Michael Clifton

1. HISTORICAL INTRODUCTION

As originally constituted by the decree setting up the restored hierarchy of England and Wales, the diocese of Southwark consisted of the counties of Kent, Surrey, Sussex, Berkshire, Hampshire, the Isles of Wight and the Channel Islands. The whole area constituted the southern section of the former London District. When the arrangements were discussed in Rome, Wiseman had tried to secure that the Archbishopric of Westminster should control the diocese of Southwark, but he was overruled. However, when the dioceses were set up there was no Ordinary appointed to start with in Southwark and Cardinal Wiseman had to act as administrator.

However, this state of affairs did not last long and in July 1851, Bishop Thomas Grant was consecrated first Bishop of Southwark at the English College in Rome where he was Rector. Bishop Grant ruled the huge diocese from 1851 until his death in Rome in June 1870 towards the close of the 1st Vatican Council. He was a very saintly man by all accounts. The biography by Kate Ramsey, written shortly after his death, is virtually of no use to the historian. It is more of a hagiography. From an archival viewpoint we have a fairly good record. However, there are no copies of Bishop Grant's letters to other persons, only the replies received by him. The Bishop had to undertake most of the correspondence with government departments as Cardinal Wiseman was viewed with disfavour in official circles following the 'Flaminian Gate' pastoral letter.

After Bishop Grant's death from stomach cancer (he was suffering for the last four years of his life), the new Bishop was James Dannell, a very imposing figure judging by his portrait. He was already the diocesan Vicar General and we have a long series of letters from him to Bishop Grant, written while the bishop was in Rome at the Vatican Council, describing what was going on in the diocese. Bishop Dannell saw the need for a local seminary for the diocese and started to collect funds, but his early attempt to found a college at Clapham came to nothing. He too was noted for his holiness and is known to have recited the Stations of the Cross every day of his life. In the archives there is comparatively little material relevant to his episcopate.

Bishop Dannell was succeeded in 1882, after an interregnum of nearly one year, by Fr Robert Coffin CSSR., the provincial of the English Redemptorists. Dr Coffin was a former Anglican vicar of St Mary Magdalene's, Oxford, a member of the Tractarian movement and friend of Newman. He had originally joined the Oratory with Newman but had joined the Redemptorists in 1851. I imagine that he was the personal nomination of Manning. However, after only a few months in office he became very ill and spent most of his episcopate with the nuns at Teignmouth in Devon. Six months before he died in 1885 he secured the appointment of Canon John Butt as Auxiliary Bishop, and Bishop Butt succeeded him as the 4th Bishop of Southwark.

With the accession of Bishop Butt, records were better kept and the first attempt at sorting out the archives was made. Bishop Butt had already had, while at Arundel, the task of going through the papers and books of Canon Tierney, and when he became bishop he saw to the return of some of the material which had been 'borrowed' by that noble Canon for his historical research to its proper home. However, in the process, much interesting material listed by the Historical Manuscripts Commission was lost. I shall refer to the Tierney material later. Meanwhile, Bishop Butt was the first of these bishops to keep a daily diary. In fact, we have his diaries back from the time he was in charge of the mission of Arundel (he succeeded Dr Tierney there). We also have from other sources a detailed account of Bishop Butt's work as a chaplain in the Crimean War.

However, I have passed by an important event in the story of the diocese. In May 1882, the Diocese of Portsmouth was created from the counties of Hants, Berks, the Isle of Wight and the Channel Islands. In fact, the whole of the diocese was growing apace. New missions were appearing thick and fast, and around London the countryside was being swallowed up by urban development. Bishop Butt is best remembered for his work in starting the first seminary for Southwark only at Henfield, later transferred to Wonersh. At this time also was started the Southwark Rescue Society for the care of orphans (now the Southwark Children's Society). The first rector of the seminary was Francis Bourne who succeeded Bishop Butt as 5th Bishop in 1897, having been consecrated as co-adjutor the previous year. Bishop Butt resigned through ill health and died in 1899.

Bishop Bourne spent six years as Bishop of Southwark, and seems to have spent most of his time at the seminary at Wonersh which had many problems to face in the early years. The troubles over the seminary are well documented and a history of the early days at Wonersh was produced by Fr Thomas Hooley, a professor there for a time. This work is entitled A Seminary in the Making. It might also be called a eulogy of Cardinal Bourne.

The next bishop was the well loved (by the people anyway) Bishop Peter Amigo who reigned over us from 1903 to 1949. From the archival point of view he seems to have retained only correspondence on matters which he knew were controversial or of interest to historians. He appointed proper archivists after about 1910. The first was a Fr Cunningham, then later a Fr Rochford and, finally, by far the most impressive, Canon Rory Fletcher, a leading light in the Catholic Record Society in his day and a former Doctor of Medicine. He died at his prayers in retirement in 1944. We owe practically everything that is of value in the archives to him.

Bishop Amigo had a great struggle at the start of his episcopate. He was the personal choice of Bishop Bourne against the names selected by the Chapter. He was a foreigner (Gibraltarian of Spanish descent) and was imported into the diocese from Westminster by Bishop Bourne and made Vicar General over the heads of many other priests. Small wonder he was not too popular at the start. To add to his troubles a serious rift developed with Bishop Bourne. To start with, this concerned the diocesan finances. Bishop Bourne had kept his name on all the deeds so that nothing could be done without his agreement and when the diocese was nearly bankrupted because the financial adviser appointed by Bishop Bourne turned out to be a petty crook who had used diocesan funds to make personal investments in the stock exchange, Bishop Bourne considered his own reputation was at stake and refused to co-operate in the means that Bishop Amigo took to rectify the situation. He had inside help too in his former secretary Canon St John. The good Canon sided with his former employer against Bishop Amigo in a scheme to take over either the whole diocese or at least that part until 1974 the London County Council area. Early letters between the two bishops addressed 'Dear Francis', or 'Dear Peter', were later headed, 'My Lord Bishop', 'Your Eminence'.

The matters between the two bishops had to be taken to Rome on separate occasions, first to sort out the financial matters and then to prevent the Westminster take-over. In both instances Bishop Amigo was the winner. The whole affair is known to the archives as the 'Consistorial Case' and consists of 362 docketts (each dockett might contain 10 letters) filling about eight box files. The Bishop kept a handwritten (later typed) copy of all his own correspondence on this matter and Fr Fletcher meticulously catalogued every single item.

As if this wasn't enough, there was further trouble at the seminary which led to the Rector leaving with half the staff; and then, on top of that, came the Modernist crisis and the sad case of Fr George Tyrrell, S.J., who came under the jurisdiction of Bishop Amigo as living at Storrington with Maud Petre for the last two years of his life. The Bishop was much vilified for refusing to give Tyrrell a Catholic funeral. Again the file is perfectly catalogued by Fr Fletcher and consists of 141 letters or documents including four previously unpublished letters of Fr Tyrrell, plus a series of press cuttings.

By 1914 these troubles had died down to be replaced by the War and once again the Bishop was active this time in helping to place Belgian refugees. There had been a long connection with Belgium dating from the time when St George's was virtually the Embassy Church. After the War, Bishop Amigo found himself once again at the heart of controversy over the Terence McSwiney affair, the Lord Mayor of Cork imprisoned in Brixton as an I.R.A. member and who went on hunger strike. Bishop Amigo was much criticised for allowing a Catholic funeral. The correspondence in the archives dealing with Irish affairs from 1916 to 1926 consists of 182 letters and documents, again beautifully recorded by Fr Fletcher. When that had settled down, there was the Spanish Civil War and the Bishop was notorious for his frank and open support for General Franco.

The second World War saw great tragedy. The Cathedral was destroyed by incendiary bombs, only the walls remaining. It is said that Bishop Amigo never really recovered from this loss but he lived on until September 1949, being quite active until three days before his death. He kept a detailed diary from 1909 until three days before his death. The rest is recent history. He was succeeded by his right hand man, Bishop Cyril Cowderoy who received the title Archbishop in 1965 when the Southern Province was created and, at the same time, Surrey and Sussex were cut off to form the Diocese of Arundel and Brighton. He kept a resident archivist for many years, Fr Percival Styche, a retired priest of Birmingham, but after his death in 1963, the work of the archivist was entrusted to the Chancellor and the chaos mounted. Questions could not be answered because no one knew where anything was and keys to cabinets were lost. It has taken the present archivist, appointed unofficially in May 1982, and officially in May 1983, nearly a year to sort things out and make an inventory.

In 1976 Archbishop Cowderoy was succeeded by Archbishop Bowen, previously Bishop of Arundel and Brighton.

2. WHERE THE ARCHIVES ARE HOUSED AND WHAT THEY COMPRISE

The archives are all kept at Archbishop's House, St George's Road. They are stored in three rooms, two large and one small. Most, but not all, of the material is in box files.

The ordinary archives comprise the following material.

- a) Correspondence of the various bishops.
- b) Parochial files on every single parish in the diocese, with reports of visitations back to 1860 where applicable.
- c) Synodal reports and scrutiny papers, the preparatory papers for ad limina visits, and the visit reports themselves.
- d) Notes on all the priests who have ever served in the diocese giving at least the date of birth, ordination, place of ordination, where they worked and when they died, but often more details.
- e) Copious files not only on St John's seminary, Womersley, but on all the foreign seminaries, St Edmund's, Ware, and also the Hammersmith seminary.
- f) A complete file of every document from every Roman Congregation right back to 1850.
- g) Details, including agenda and some minutes, for nearly every hierarchy conference since 1860, and a few early ones also.
- h) Education files, giving school reports and dating back to 1863. (These occupy about 13 box files but are not catalogued, although they are at least in order.)

- i) Files on every religious house established in the diocese.
- j) A complete set of all the Pastorals and Ad Clera from the beginning. Also, a complete set of the diocesan magazine, the Southwark Record, and its predecessor, The Shield, taking the reader back to around 1900.
- k) The rules of life for every religious congregation in the diocese, both the original ones and the revisions of the last few years.
- l) A complete set of The Catholic Directory and its predecessor, the Laity's Directory, back to 1792. This also includes the rival directories issued in the 1850s by another firm. [We have spares back to 1840 if anyone is interested.]
- m) Files for each of the bishops and also each archbishop of Westminster.
- n) The controversial files on Modernism, the Consistorial Case, Irish Affairs, and the Spanish Civil War.
- o) A large collection of photographs.
- p) Chancery correspondence, but only since about 1950.
- q) A vast number of small files on various Catholic societies, many long since defunct, like the 'Catholic Oddfellows'.
- r) Detailed accounts of the proceedings both at the 1st Vatican Council and at Vatican II (20 files on Vat. II).
- s) 100 files on a large variety of topics, all listed under the heading 'Miscellanea', and 10 of these headed 'Varia'.
- t) A limited amount of financial returns and collection of wills and bequests.
- u) Various collections discussed in 3.

There is no proper classification as yet, but the files are arranged under topic headings where possible. There is a complete inventory which gives the general location. I hope it may prove possible to make a start on classification according to the recommended scheme in the next year. It is proposed to redecorate and extend the shelving in the archive rooms over the next year also.

3. THE COLLECTIONS

The Southwark archives contain several special collections of varying importance. The outstanding one is the Tierney collection.

Canon Tierney, who revised Dodd's History, left his collection to the diocese and, after his demise, his friend Dr Rock took control for a while and, after Dr Rock's death, his papers were added to the collection. The collection comprises 208 items. Many of these are books but some are boxes of letters or notes on various topics. The first nine items are 14th and 15th century manuscripts, including five books of hours. These are followed by some 20 manuscripts of the 16th and 17th centuries, of which the most important are John Southcote's notebook from 1623 to 1637 and the memoirs of Sir William Monson, which gives valuable insights into personalities of the reign of Queen Elizabeth. Then follow printed books, including Guillermus Parisiensis Postilla super Epistolas et Evangelia printed at Basel by Michael Wenssler, c.1478, Jacobus de Voragine Sermones de Tempore per totum Annum printed by Conrad Winters de Homborch, before 1479, Lopez de Ayala Cronica del Rey Pedro de Castillo printed at Seville in 1495, The Golden Legend printed at London in 1508, and St Thomas More The Supplication of the Souls, first edition, 1529. In addition to the printed books there are sets of notes by both Tierney and Rock on various topics. The whole collection has a detailed catalogue meticulously prepared by Canon Fletcher.

There are also what I call the 'unknown collections'. These are books dating from 1580 to Victorian times, including a first edition Rheims New Testament of 1582, a complete Old Testament printed at Douai in 1609 and 1610, a copy of Theatrum Orbis Terrarum printed at Antwerp in 1584, first or second editions of nearly all Cardinal Newman's works, and sets of theological treatises.

The other main collection is that entitled 'St George's Cathedral', containing a vast quantity of booklets, pamphlets, account books, etc. giving a complete picture of the history of the Cathedral up to date. The story was told up to 1950 by Canon Bogan in his work The Great Link. Finally, there are a series of notebooks and typescripts left by the former archivist, Fr Percival Styche. His interest lay mainly in Marian priests.

There is, indeed, much in the Southwark archives to interest the historian but I should think that it would take about twenty years to catalogue properly what we have, let alone incorporate new material. The archives are open to bona fide enquirers who should write to the author, Diocesan Archivist, c/o Archbishop's House, St George's Road, Southwark, London, SE1 6HX.

APPENDIX

THE ARCHIVES OF THE DIOCESE OF SOUTHWARK: ROUGH CLASSIFICATION AND FINDING LIST

a) GENERAL ADMINISTRATION

Code letters where given.

Limited correspondence on all other Seminaries Irish Seminaries: Maynooth, Carlow and others

j) HIERARCHY PAPERS

Minutes and agendas of Hierarchy meetings back to 1864 (some earlier) Minutes of Post-Vatican II commissions (National) Diocesan Committees and Commissions

k) MISCELLANEA

- J 1—114. Various topics
J 111. Files on unclassified topics titled 'Varia'
J 114. Detailed account of proceedings at Vatican II
Ancient (19th century) Societies long defunct
Old Societies (papers circa 1920 to 1939)
Modern Societies
Newman Demographic Survey
Vicar Episcopal for Religious Permanent Deacons
Special Ministers of the Eucharist

l) THE SPECIAL COLLECTIONS

The Tierney-Rock Collection. A most important collection of historical documents, manuscripts (including medieval illuminated manuscripts), books and notes. 208 items, fully catalogued and indexed. A summary index available.

Fr Fletcher Collection. Books, pamphlets and notes on recusant history. Indexed.

Fr Styche Collection. Typed notes on many topics, but mainly Marian priests. Indexed.

St George's Cathedral Collection. Books, letters, account books and papers relating to the building and subsequent history of the Cathedral. The story up to 1950 is told in Canon Bogan, The Great Link.

Historical Collection. Various documents and other items, including a Papal Bull of 1624, letters, polemical pamphlets, etc. Index available.

First Editions. A collection of books both secular and religious, including works by Challoner and Newman.

Assorted Books. A wide selection of books, mainly 17th to 19th centuries, on theological and controversial subjects. Index available.

Directories and Periodicals. The Laity Directory, The Catholic Directory and other directories (from 1792); Pastoralia (an early type of Clergy Review complete); The Rambler (complete); The Shield (magazine of the Southwark Children Society, 1892—1921, complete); Southwark Record (Diocesan magazine, 1921—1964); press cuttings — a wide selection in semi-bound book form.

THE ARCHIVES OF THE ARCHDIOCESE OF HOBART

Shirley King

In 1972 the Archbishop of Hobart appointed a committee to consider means of caring for the diocesan archives. There are no suitable premises in the Diocesan Offices but the University of Tasmania had for some years been accepting responsibility for records of other organisations and it is conveniently situated halfway between the Archbishop's House and the Diocesan Office. The Archbishop decided first to donate the books in the old nineteenth century diocesan library to the University Library. Late in 1973 I was appointed Archivist to the University of Tasmania and, being used to an English county record office which had been designated as Diocesan Record Office by the Anglican bishop, it seemed natural to me for an institution to deposit its records in another institution's archive strong rooms while retaining the separate identity, ownership and control of its own archives.

However, it is not quite the same thing. For one thing the University, unlike a county record office supported by rates to provide a service for all bodies in the county, is an independent institution and its only interest is in the preservation of records for future research. Australia does not have the tradition of local record offices or of the deposit of records for safe-custody in the English sense. Deposits are accepted by the big state government archives but these were originally part of state libraries (indeed many state government records would have been lost without the efforts of state librarians to preserve them) and the emphasis is primarily on historical material available for readers rather than on preserving the unity of the records of a continuing institution, so that large repositories are less suitable for the records of a small institution still needing its records for its own administrative use. It was, therefore, particularly important to have a clearly defined agreement drawn up between the Archbishop and the University.

This agreement was kept quite simple. Briefly, it ensures that the Archdiocesan Archives remain the property of and under the control of the Archbishop and his successors and that the Archbishop is at liberty to make alternative arrangements if circumstances change. In other words, although storage and professional facilities are provided by another institution, the Archdiocesan Archives is still an integral part of the diocesan administration and not part of the University. I find it necessary to stress this point to researchers and to priests and administrators otherwise confusion can arise. Access for members of the public is only by permission of the Archbishop but the Archivist is authorised to deal directly with historical enquirers by post and to provide information of specific parish register entries. Provision is of course made for records to be available for official diocesan business.

The intention originally was to make a dividing line for deposited archives somewhere between 1900 and 1910 but, as is the way of records, register volumes and files tended to span too long periods to allow any fixed division, so to some extent later records may also be deposited and there is a close link with the modern records.

The agreement was signed in 1974 and the first job was to collect and examine the early records from the Diocesan Office. These consisted mainly of correspondence of the bishops, especially the first bishop, Robert William Willson (1842- 1866), and a few earlier papers. The first missionary priest, Fr Philip Connolly, arrived in 1821 and served, under the Vicar-Apostolic of Mauritius, mainly on his own until 1836, but only two draft letters survive from that period. Fr Connolly did keep a rough register of baptisms and a few marriages but under the Tasmanian Births, Marriages and Deaths Act of 1838 this was incorporated into the State Registrar-General's records and the diocese has only a modern transcript. In 1835, Bishop John Bede Polding arrived in Sydney as Vicar-Apostolic of New Holland (Australia) and Van Diemen's Land (now called Tasmania) and sent a priest, Fr James Ambrose Cotham O.S.B., to Tasmania and later his Vicar-General, Fr John Joseph Therry. There are a few records from this period, mainly correspondence between Fr Therry, Bishop Polding and the Colonial Government in Tasmania. In 1842, Sydney was made a metropolitan see and bishops were also appointed to Adelaide and to Hobart. Bishop Willson arrived in Hobart in May 1844 with three priests and from this date the Church became established.

When Bishop Willson arrived the majority of Catholics in Tasmania were convicted felons transported to the penal settlements, those who had completed their term, or the military guards, some of whom remained as settlers. There were only a few free Catholic settlers before the 1850s. The Government paid salaries to the bishop and three or four priests to minister particularly to the convicts. Much of Bishop Willson's correspondence was therefore with government officials, especially about conditions in prisons and asylums. No doubt the bishop had experience of government red tape for he was careful to keep all such official letters and the drafts of his own letters or replies and often also copies in a register volume. Moreover, he took them all (except a register volume) back to England with him when he retired in 1866. They were preserved at Oscott College until returned to Hobart in 1947. Few purely church or personal records have survived. There are two diaries of the memoranda type. One for 1864 indicates the range of his daily work. In the earlier one for 1854, the year he spent in England and Rome, he noted visits to Hardman's in Birmingham to order church plate and furnishings and to Miss Brown's to order vestments. Willson was a friend of the Pugin family and of John Hardman who married his niece but no letters survive from them or members of the Willson family. There are a few letters from friends in England, including Cardinal Wiseman, Thomas Arnold jun., Daniel O'Connell, Bishop Thomas Walsh and J.G. Denison of Newark.

Bishop Willson's successor, Daniel Murphy (1866—1907), did not have the same kind of government correspondence as Tasmania was no longer a penal settlement but a free colony. Before his death Archbishop Murphy destroyed all his records, except the writ creating Hobart a metropolitan see in 1888, two or three circulars from Rome, some printed pastoral letters, and his will. This shocked his successor, Patrick Delany (1907—1926) who reported to Rome that he had found no archives at all, no faculties, not even title deeds to church property. Archbishop Delany attempted to ensure that better records were kept both by the diocese and parishes and he started to keep registers of confirmations in the diocese, numbers enrolled in Catholic schools, marriage validations and dispensations, faculties granted to the diocese, and files of parish visitation notes, applications for and grants of dispensations, clergy records, etc. Not all of these were continued by his successor but this was the beginning of some office series of records which continue separately from the bishop's own records. More recently separate offices were established for diocesan education, welfare, etc.

The older records were not found in any kind of order and had evidently been merely gathered together and put quite haphazardly into boxes or bundles, but, having examined and appraised them, a simple scheme was worked out to arrange and list them. Being mainly bishops' correspondence, it was natural to arrange them bishop by bishop; each bishop's papers being sorted into groups according to subject, correspondent or type, as appropriate, and then into chronological order. Each document or volume is identified by the deposit number, section code letters (based on the bishop's name) and the item number (eg. CA.6/WIL.3). The later series of office records, for example finance and property accounts, marriage dispensations, etc. kept separately from the bishop's records are also given distinctive references (eg. FIN.EDU.) and their arrangement and numbering allows for continuing records to be added. A list has been made of all records, with a description of each series of records, their purpose and the type of information contained. The list of the Willson papers also includes a brief summary of letters. A selective card index of names, places and subjects is in progress.

For parish records I have adapted the system I learnt in the Middlesex County Record Office (now part of the Greater London Record Office) for Anglican parish records. Records are listed in classified sections (distinguished by an alphabetical code letter) to allow for continuing records (eg. A baptismal registers, B marriage registers, H accounts, J property maintenance, L parish council, N parochial societies, S school). Not only is it easy to add a new register or account book but it helps to remind the parish priest that parish records include more than just the registers. In many cases of course there are just headings with no records listed or there are gaps. All a parish's records are listed, both current and non-current, whether deposited or not, and I just asterisk those items on the list which are deposited in the Archives, enabling the parish priest and the archivist to know what records exist and where they are. It also preserves the unity of the records, showing that they are still part of the parish records even if some happen to be kept in the Archdiocesan Archives for safety. Listing may also, hopefully, prevent records from being destroyed or lost before they are deposited. I find, however, that parish copies of the lists tend to be mislaid and it is advisable to send another copy whenever the parish priest changes, together with a reminder of the existence and purpose of the Diocesan Archives. The great distances involved in Tasmania, compared with the average English diocese, unfortunately makes it difficult to visit parishes to list or collect records, so there is much still to do and it is likely to take some years. The Vicar-General and the Archbishop give plenty of support, however, and records have been known to travel to Hobart in the Archbishop's car after visitations.

The biggest problem is the enormous time span of many baptismal registers in country parishes, where one volume may be in use from the beginning of the parish in the 1850s or 1860s right through to 1960 or later and thus should remain in the parish for pre-marriage verification certificates and entries of marriage notifications. The parish priests of two parishes reasonably near to Hobart, tired of genealogical enquiries, have experimentally tried depositing such registers. I have, with the help of two volunteer assistants, made an index of names so that I can quickly answer a pre-marital verification search request by telephone and the priests can then send the certificate. They both delegate me 'as a sort of honorary parish secretary' to enter notifications on their behalf. For country parishes a central record office can, in fact, be an advantage, not only because they are more liable to the risks of bush fires and other hazards, but also because changes in parish boundaries and parish centres often make it difficult to know where a baptismal record for a pre-marriage enquiry should be.

Marriage registers are the duplicates of the State Registrar's marriage registers but in recent years some churches have started keeping additional marriage registers, recording the place of baptism, dispensations granted, etc. but not signed. English archivists may be interested to know that the Hardwick Marriage Act (1753) did not apply to the colony. Signed, official marriage registers were not introduced until after 1838. Very few churches in this diocese keep registers of funerals or burials.

Records of other organisations, for example the Catholic Women's League, are deposited in the same way as parish records.

The strong room is fully air conditioned to control humidity and maintain an even temperature, and the whole building is fumigated quarterly to prevent silverfish (which can be a pest here) eating lacy holes in paper or cloth. Standard library metal shelving is installed with shelves which are very easy to adjust. Boxes are made locally, reasonably low acid, and we share orders with the State Archives to order in bulk. Loose papers in small bundles are put in manilla folders and tied with legal tape. I also make small folders of acid free paper to protect a fragile document or to keep together loose pages of a document or letter and pins or staples are removed. The folders are then put flat into boxes.

Small volumes are also put into boxes for better protection and easier shelving. The boxes are put on the shelves in order of the deposit number and item numbers contained, marked clearly on the outside of the box. I have learnt from experience that any numbering system should be as simple as possible, preferably just a running number, so where I do number within sections I use a letter code (preferably alphabetical) for the section rather than another number. Documents themselves are only numbered with a soft pencil in the corner.

The advantages of sharing archives facilities in this way are obvious. The Archdiocese has the benefit of an air-conditioned, fire resistant archives store, and a professional archivist. The University too has, perhaps, been more ready to provide proper storage for other people's archives in its care than it might just for its own, for it is not very large itself. There are, however, disadvantages, especially using a completely different type of institution which is not primarily a record office. It is inconvenient, in any case, for records to be removed from the administrative centre, as there cannot be as close a relationship with modern current records as there should be, and it undoubtedly causes confusion when people say 'the records are at the University'. Indeed one or two priests have been heard to say, disapprovingly, 'my predecessor gave the parish records away to the University'. Researchers seem to assume that because records have been 'given to the University' they have become public property, open to anyone, whereas of course the records are still the working administrative records of the Archdiocese, and many are confidential. Even sacramental registers contain confidential or personal information, and Tasmania is an island where people know each other's families. I have, therefore, found it necessary to emphasise that the Archdiocesan Archives remain part of the diocesan administration and not the University, and the enquirers are answered on behalf of the Archdiocese or of a parish priest. Copies of replies to parish record enquirers are usually sent to the parish priest. On the whole however, the arrangement seems to work well and I have not so far experienced any problems in serving, as it were, severed masters, although I do have to steer carefully between the interests of the various administrative authorities and the users. Nevertheless, I have no doubt at all that the advantages far outweigh the disadvantages and some such joint archives could be established successfully amongst organisations of a similar nature, such as the smaller religious orders.

I have not said much about the history of the diocese or described the records in detail as Tasmania is rather remote from Britain. For those who do not even know where it is, Tasmania is one of the states of Australia and is the island about the size of Eire just below the bottom corner of the mainland, and its state capital city is Hobart. The Archdiocese of Hobart includes the whole state and is all one diocese with no suffragan dioceses. I can be contacted c/o University Archives, G.P.O. Box 252C, Hobart, Tasmania, Australia, 7001, but the official address for the Archdiocese is Catholic Church Office, G.P.O. 62A, Hobart, Tasmania, Australia, 7001.

THE ARCHIVES AT ST SCHOLASTICA'S ABBEY, TEIGNMOUTH

Dame Mildred Murray Sinclair, O.S.B.

A community dating from 1668 could be expected to house archives rich in 17th and 18th century material. Unfortunately, with us this is not so. A few words, however, on the history of our Community, especially of its last days at Dunkirk, will help to explain this.

By 1662 the Community at Ghent (now at Oulton, Staffs.) had so increased in numbers that, although it had already made a foundation at Boulogne/Pontoise in 1652, it became necessary to make another to relieve the congestion. Dunkirk was chosen because at that time it was an English possession, and Charles II, who was greatly indebted to Lady Abbess Knatchbull of Ghent, made it possible for the nuns to settle there.

The French Revolution found the Community unprepared, and when the town was bombarded by the English, the nuns were in the unenviable position of 'enemy aliens', constantly harassed by gendarmes searching for firearms, etc. On 13 October 1793 the nuns were evicted at an hour's notice, and were allowed to take only what each could carry in a bundle. The Abbess, it is true, took community papers but she was promptly relieved of them. There followed eighteen months imprisonment at Gravelines during which their monastery was burnt down. In 1795 they were released, and returned to England in a state of near destitution.

The outlook for the Community's archives would have been bleak had it not been for an event which took place in 1786. In that year the Pontoise community was dissolved after struggling throughout its history against a mounting tide of debt and, latterly, dearth of vocations. The Abbess with the majority of her nuns joined the Dunkirk community, bringing with her some important MSS, chief among them being Lady Abbess Knatchbull's account of the Foundation at Boulogne — later transferred to Pontoise — and Lady Anne Neville's Diary which contains the history of the Foundations of the monasteries at Brussels, Ghent, Pontoise, Dunkirk and Ypres. Lady Anne Neville was eminently fitted for this task. She was a professed nun of the Ghent monastery who had stayed at Dunkirk on her way to England on business. When she returned to the continent, Ghent, Pontoise and Dunkirk all tried to entice her to their monasteries in a kind of monastic game of 'Come and sit on my chair!' She chose Pontoise where she was elected fourth Abbess in 1666.

The archives for the first period of the history of our Community, 1661—1795, are regrettably few but, even so, they do contain, as well as Lady Anne Neville's Diary, the following records:

Various Authorizations, Indults and Indulgences.

Lady Abbess Neville's 'Duties and Customs'.

Register of the Pontoise Nuns, 1680—1713, and complete Necrology.

Ceremonial for Clothing and Profession. Printed for the Benedictine Nuns at Dunkirk, 1694.

Ceremonial for Clothing and Profession. Printed for the Benedictine Nuns at Pontoise, 1721.

Lady Abbess Neville's Book for Superiors. A small MS volume bound in vellum with white leather strings and, like all the Pontoise books, in excellent condition.

Library List. A copy of some Dunkirk books found in the Bibliotheque de Dunkerque. With copies of all the names of the nuns found in these books. Library Catalogue. 550 titles.

A Rule for Convictresses, (MS.) This is the name by which the school children were called!

Church Inventory and Evaluation of Church Plate.

Correspondence with Government Officials. These concern:

Pensions for the Pontoise Nuns who joined our Community in 1786.

French Law with regard to Houses of Foreign Religious, 1790.

The Treatment of Foreign Religious, 1791.

Several Letters of Compassionate Appeal for relief during the nuns' imprisonment by the Revolutionaries.

Domestic touch — a bill for beer and a receipt for meat from the Dunkirk butcher for the years 1789-1793!

Papers concerning the English Poor Clares of Rouen, Gravelines and Dunkirk.

Complete list of the Gravelines Community.

Original paper (1654) about the blowing up of the town of Gravelines, and the miraculous preservation of the Poor Clare Convent.

Paper as to the Professed and as to Confessors of Poor Clares at Dunkirk.

Miscellaneous MSS.

Lady Abbess Fermor's Jubilee Poem, 23.4.1763. Printed at Dunkirk by E. Laurenz, at the sign of St Ursula, 1763.

There is a framed 'Promise of Prayers for James II' signed by Lady Abbess Caryll and the secretaries to the Chapter, the treatment of which is an example of how not to display cherished documents! For many years it hung in the workroom, a room facing south with windows on three sides, thus catching all the sun. The present archivist fought a losing battle to have it removed as the signatures of the secretaries had quite faded away, and that of the Abbess was barely discernible. It was only while the workroom was being redecorated that she was asked to house it. She is housing it still!

The second stage in the history of our Community, 1795—1863, was spent at Hammersmith where Bishop Douglass, Vicar-Apostolic of the London District, offered the homeless nuns the 'Mary Ward' convent still occupied by three aged Sisters. Owing to a mortgage, the previous Vicar-Apostolic had removed not only the archives but nearly every moveable object from the convent; in fact, there was not even a teacup for the nuns when they arrived! Of the 'Former Establishment', as it was called, all we possess are:

List of Superiors (complete).

List of Superiors and Subjects (incomplete).

Our own archives for the Hammersmith period contain:

a) Monastery.

Abbesses' Diaries. These date from 1795 and, with gaps, continue to the present day. The longest gap is from 1891 to 1927, the Abbacy of L.A. Florin. The diaries contain the record of the more important events in the daily life of the Community. The nineteenth-century Abbesses indulged in much pious reflection. Not so the later ones!

Register. Formerly called the 'Dead Chapter Book'. Contains the names, parentage, date of birth, clothing and profession of each member of the Community from the time of settling at Hammersmith. To which is added, after death, a short account of each sister.

Entry Book. Contains 'The Names of all who have resided in the convent from 1795'. Perhaps the most curious is: 'Mrs Baboon & her Chinese Maid'.

Mass Book. Record of Mass Stipends and the Donors, 1846—1870.

Work Book. Record of money earned by work, 1796—1861.

Benefactors Book. Record of Donations and Donors, 1795—1820.

Letters. Relating to our property at Dunkirk, and unsuccessful claims for compensation.

From the Vicars Apostolic.

Concerning the move to Teignmouth.

Miscellaneous.

Press Cuttings. From publications concerning our Community and Ecclesiastical events. (Our chapel was the parish church until Holy Trinity was built in 1853.)

b) School

Oblations. Of the children, 1796—1869.

Reports. 1836—1870. The children are now called 'The Young Ladies', and no longer 'Convictresses'.

Accounts.

Confraternities. E. de M. Set up under the guidance of Cardinal Wiseman.

In 1863 the Community moved to Teignmouth, and in 1870 the school was given up. The fortunes of the archives have fluctuated according to the competence of the archivists, but now that the importance of monastic archives has been hammered home during the past decade, the amateur archivist tends to preserve more than is necessary, much of it which may be of sentimental value only to the community.

The Teignmouth archives are divided between the Abbess and the Archivist.

The Abbess keeps:

Personal Papers of members of the Community.

The signed Vows of each member.

Indults, Authorisations etc.

Letters — mostly early ones from interesting people!

The Archivist keeps:

Dunkirk and Hammersmith Archives.

Dunkirk Annals (see below).

Pontoise Annals (see below), Brussels Annals.

Register.

Entry Book.

Constitutions, Rule and Ceremonials of progressive dates and editions.

Publications: The Benedictine Nuns of Dunkirk (1958); The Life of Helen Lucretia Cornaro Piscopia. (Books translated by members of the Community are in the Library and no copy is kept by the archivist.) Catholic Record Society, Vol. VI, which contains part of Lady Abbess Neville's Diary.

Correspondence.

At one time the Archivist kept books of special interest to the Community, e.g. those that had the names of the Dunkirk nuns in them, or lives of people connected with us, e.g. 'The Life of Lady Warner' the mother of two of our Dunkirk nuns. These have all been transferred to a special section of the Library for better accommodation.

Photographic records are a comparatively recent but serious development. Formerly, photographing the nuns was forbidden, but if the purpose of this prohibition was to preserve the nuns from vanity, it was a mistake — this aim has frequently been better achieved by the photographs!

Every Teignmouth archivist must pay tribute to Dame Mary English who, in the nineteenth century worked tirelessly to assemble the 'Dunkirk Annals' and the 'Pontoise Annals'. Edmund Bishop researched for her in the British Museum, a friend scoured the Dunkirk Municipal Archives and Library and, for Pontoise, the archives at Versailles, while letters testify to Dame Mary's many inquiries. Most valuable of all, she knew some of the survivors of the nuns professed at Dunkirk, and was able to draw on their memories. She also edited the Brussels Annals at the invitation of Lady Abbess Woollett, although restrictions were laid on her by the latter. Dame Mary always indicated her sources and resisted the temptation to speculate. Unfortunately, she did not live to write up the Pontoise Annals; this was left to her successor whose layout left much to be desired.

At the time when Dame Mary was collecting this material the archivists of many monasteries, who were trying, after the chaos caused by the French Revolution, to salvage what they could of their early history, had to rely solely on correspondence. Today's archivists can count on even greater support through the Catholic Archives Society.

The Teignmouth archives are not open to the public, nor is it permitted to send by post or lend any of its contents. Visitors, however, may consult them on request, and the archivist is always pleased to answer any queries.

A GUIDE TO THE ARCHIVES OF ST ALBAN'S COLLEGE, VALLADOLID, WITH SOME HISTORICAL NOTES

The Rev. Michael E. Williams

THE ARCHIVES

1. Records were kept from the beginning of the College in 1589. There are still extant:

- 1.1 Liber Alumnorum. The Register of students beginning 1 September 1589 and continuing to the present day.
- 1.2 Liber Primi Examinis pro alumnis qui recipiuntur in hoc Collegium. This begins in September 1592 and ends in 1623. It contains the names and various particulars of students, made immediately upon their arrival, together with an account of the process for preventing undesirable people being admitted to the College.

(The Liber Alumnorum up to 1862, incorporating the Liber Primi Examinis was edited by Edwin Henson and printed as C.R.S., Vol. 30 in 1930.)

- 1.3 Books of Account: gastos (expenses) and recibos (income). These begin in 1589 and continue right through to the present, but one important volume is missing. Each volume is numbered.

Gastos 1598-1753 vols 1-5

Gastos 1753-1767 vol. 26

Gastos y Recibos 1589—1652 vol. 6. This is the original first book of accounts which contains both income and expenses for the early years. Additional material for the early years can also be found elsewhere in Series II, L 13.

Recibos 1652-1729 vol. 7.

(Recibos 1729—1767 is missing).

There are also Borradores (rough notes) for these years.

1644-1667 vol.8.

1747-1760 vol.16.

Particular account books, Mass offerings, alms and accounts relating to College farms and other property are found in vols 10, 11, 12, 13, 15, 17, 18, 19, 20, 22, 27 and 28.

A new series begins with the administration of the College by the English secular clergy in 1767 and there are 75 numbered volumes for the years 1767—1911. Since 1911 the account books are extant but not numbered.

The Jesuits were forced to leave hurriedly in 1767 and when Philip Perry the first secular rector arrived in 1768 he found a whole heap of bound and unbound material in the procurator's room. He made an inventory of his findings (Press C, shelf 6). In 1768 the three English Colleges of St Alban, Valladolid, St Gregory, Seville, and St George, Madrid, were united into the one College of St Alban, Valladolid, and this meant that the College now began to acquire materials from these other institutions. Perry was a historian and knew the value of original sources which he both sought from other places and transcribed. He was anxious to preserve his own records and so the archives expanded considerably under him and his successors.

It was in the nineteenth century when John Guest was administering the College that the first serious attempt was made to organise the Archives.

- 3.1 Guest catalogued the MSS and other documents in the archives according to the 25 legajos (bundles) then in existence. A description of these can be found in the Indice de los archivos del Colegio de Ingleses, Valladolid, pp. 1—94.
- 3.2 Circa 1855 Guest made further legajos. Loose papers went to form 11 new legajos which he called Series II (Valladolid). Series I was the already existing 25 legajos. Later he formed another collection of legajos which he called Series III. A description of these new legajos is to be found in the Indice pp. 237—269.
- 3.3 He also put together the materials from St George's College, Madrid. Series I (Madrid) comprised 9 legajos, Series II (Madrid) were books of account. See Indice pp. 277—293.
- 3.4 Later the materials from St Gregory's College, Seville, were gathered together. These were classified:
 - Class 1. 28 legajos
 - Class 2. San Lucar de Barrameda documents
 - Class 3. 6 legajos
 - Class 4. 3 *legajos*Extraordinary legajos nos 1,2,3,4. See Indice pp. 297—369.

As a result of Guest's efforts there was now a record of all the materials in the College Archives. However, as the labour had taken several years, the classification was somewhat complex. In the beginning of the twentieth century the Procurator, Joseph Kelly, reorganised all the legajos into larger divisions: I—VII and A—H. Individual documents within each legajo were numbered and so by reference to the new index one could know in some detail what the Archives contained. Documents could all be referred to in a similar way no matter what their original provenance, e.g. Letra E legajo 6 No. 2.

5. But there still remained the need to ensure the preservation of the Archives for posterity. Loose papers, even if gathered together, are liable to deteriorate with time. Circa 1940 the Rector, Edwin Henson, broke up the existing legajos to form bound volumes. Each volume is bound in leather, a general description and dates are found on the spine, and within each volume there is a table of contents, the individual documents being interleaved with blank pages.
 - 5.1 There are 32 volumes of Madrid papers bound in brown leather. (Some of the Madrid papers were published in 1929 by C.R.S. vol. 29).
 - 5.2 There are 30 volumes of Seville papers bound in blue leather.
 - 5.3 There are 4 volumes bound in green pertaining to San Lucar de Barrameda.
 - 5.4 There are 38 volumes of Valladolid papers prior to 1768, bound in red. Vols 1—20 known as Series I and vols. 1—18 known as Series II. (This nomenclature bears no relation to the old Guest series I or II.)

Another 15 volumes cover the years 1767—1915. These volumes however, do not include the rectors' correspondence. But Henson made typed transcripts of this for the years 1768—1927 and these make up another 17 volumes.

The work is incomplete as Henson was unable to finish binding together all the documents in this way, so some remain with Kelly's old classification.

6. There are several box files of Henson's own papers, many of them unsorted. But there are 26 bound volumes of official correspondence of the rectors covering the years 1915—1974.

PRACTICAL ADVICE TO ANYONE CONSULTING THE ARCHIVES OF THE ENGLISH COLLEGE, VALLADOLID.

If you wish to find materials other than those indicated in 1.1, 1.2, 1.3 above:

- (a) Go first to the Henson-bound volumes. Brown for Madrid, Blue for Seville, Red for Valladolid. On the spine of each volume you will find dates, and inside a detailed table of contents.
- (b) If the bound material does not satisfy, then consult the Indices p.101 and following, where you will find Kelly's catalogue. When you have located the document with Kelly's classification e.g. Letra B, legajo 12, n.4, then go to Fr G. Anstruther's schematic index. Here you will find the exact location of the document in the Archive room. e.g. Letra A Legajo 3, n.1 is in Press B, shelf 1.

CONCLUSION

As can be seen from the foregoing, the present-day researcher owes much to the labours of those who have gone before. In any living institution the documentation is continually being added to and so responsibility for the present is just as much an onus on the archivist as is the preservation of the past. This can present difficulties as to the classification of the materials and so every eighty or ninety years a Perry or Guest or Kelly or Henson comes along and reorganises the collection. There is no comprehensive catalogue to the archives as they are at present. The Indice de los archivos referred to is a bound MS volume compiled by Kelly and comprising Guest's catalogue and Kelly's own new classification. It also includes Kelly's enumerating of all the books of account. Since Henson's work, however, it has ceased to be the sole key to the contents, but it will only cease to be of any use in the rather unlikely event of some archivist in the future completing the task of binding together all the remaining materials.

Although the Archives are mainly concerned with College affairs (staff, students, administration, etc.) they do often treat of political and ecclesiastical affairs both in England and Spain and for many of the documents an ability to read Spanish is necessary. Pending the publication of the History of the College, the best guide to events is to be found in the Introduction to C.R.S. vol. 30. The Archives are kept at the College and any enquiries should be addressed to the Rector, Colegio de Ingleses, Valladolid, Spain.

CARDINAL GASQUET'S PAPERS AT DOWNSIDE

Dominic Bellenger

I. THE DOWNSIDE ARCHIVES

Downside Abbey, Stratton-on-the-Fosse, twelve miles south of Bath, in Somerset, is the home of the English Benedictine community of St Gregory the Great. The monastery, founded originally at Douai in Flanders between the years 1605 and 1607, settled at Downside in 1814 following dispossession during the French Revolution and a period of temporary exile at Acton Burnell Hall in Shropshire. The abbey archives, the most numerous of those preserved in the houses of the English Benedictine Congregation, have, since 1971, been kept in the spacious hexagonal monastic library designed by Francis Pollen. The papers of Cardinal Gasquet form probably the most extensive collection of any single member of the community preserved in the building.

II. CARDINAL GASQUET (1846-1929)

Francis Neil (in religion Dom Aidan) Gasquet was born in London on 5 October 1846, the third son of Dr Raymond Gasquet, a medical practitioner of Provencal stock, and his wife Mary Apollonia, daughter of Thomas Kay of York. Francis Gasquet was educated at the small monastic school at Downside and (having entered the Downside conventus as a novice) at Belmont in Herefordshire, then the English Benedictine Congregation's house of studies. He was ordained priest in 1874. His subsequent career fell into three distinct parts: his years at Downside, his period of full time historical research in London, and his long stay in Rome which culminated in the cardinalate.

He taught history and mathematics at Downside until his election, in 1878, at the early age of thirty-two, as prior. His seven years of rule saw many developments in the community. Great emphasis was placed by him on scholarship, liturgy and monastic observance. The first was reflected in the publication of The Downside Review, which first appeared in 1880. The two latter were symbolised in the beginning of a new monastic church, the core of the present building. Gasquet's efforts were assisted by many of his fellow monks, not least by his immediate predecessor as prior, Dom Bernard Murphy, who had inaugurated an ambitious building programme, but there is little doubt that it was Gasquet himself who made possible what Dom Cuthbert Butler called 'the turning-point in Downside's history'.

Gasquet's great energy was not combined with robust health, and the years of the priorship took their toll. Under doctor's orders he turned from the administration of a developing religious house to what appeared the less demanding labours of historical scholarship. Living in London with a group of research assistants Gasquet began to work his way through the books and manuscripts on monastic history in the British Museum and the Public Record Office. The material he collected was to provide the basis of an apologia both for medieval monasticism, and for a revival of the monastic spirit in the English Benedictine Congregation which had, hitherto, concentrated most of its resources on missionary work. Gasquet's academic reputation (if not that of his most prominent associate, the great liturgical autodidact Edmund Bishop) has not stood the test of time, but in his own milieu it was his prominence as a historian which brought him to the notice of the English public and the ecclesiastical authorities.

His own community and congregation paid him particular honour. He was nominated President General of the English Benedictines in 1899 following the decision to raise Downside, Ampleforth and St Edmund's, Douai, to the rank of abbey. He was made titular abbot of Reading at the same time, being translated to the titular abbacy of St Alban's in 1909. He began to play an important role in the life of the wider church. He was a prominent member of the commission which led to the 'condemnation' of Anglican Orders in 1896, he was president of the Vulgate Revision' Commission, and in 1903 he was widely-canvassed as successor to Cardinal Vaughan as Archbishop of Westminster. In 1914, in Pius X's last consistory, he was made a cardinal. It was the year which was to see the beginning of the First World War; it was also the centenary of St Gregory's establishment at Downside.

His life as a curial cardinal was varied and full. During the Great War he undertook crucial diplomatic work. In 1917 he was appointed Prefect of the Vatican Archives, and in 1919 Librarian of the Holy Roman Church. He died in Rome on 5 April 1929, and his body was taken to Downside where, with his cardinal's hat suspended from the vaulting, he lies buried beneath an impressive, if somewhat ponderous, effigy, and a lighter canopy, both to the designs of Sir Giles Gilbert Scott, who also completed the tower of the abbey church as a more public memorial to the dead cardinal.

III THE PAPERS

Gasquet's many activities are reflected in his papers. Mementoes of Gasquet are to be found in many parts of the Downside complex: there are portraits in the monks' refectory and in the Gasquet Hall in the school; many of the documents used by the cardinal at the consistory which elected Pope Pius XI are preserved in a glass case in the west cloister; many of his notebooks are kept in the Bishop Library, now a special collection on the top floor of the monastery library; and an extensive selection of photographs is preserved in a separate photographic archives room in the monastery. What follows, in section (a) is a provisional list of 'The Gasquet Papers' in the main archives, stored in cupboards on Floor A, the ground floor, of the monastery library, which have been put into some sort of order, and, in section (b) there is a list of various other items in the archives which are directly relevant to the cardinal. The numbers refer to those in the archives accession books.

IV BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTE

(a) THE ARCHIVES

Dom Philip Jebb, the Archivist of Downside, provided an invaluable introduction to 'The Archives of the English Benedictine Congregation kept at St Gregory's, Downside', in The Downside Review, Vol. 93, No. 312, July 1975, pp.208—225.

(b) DOWNSIDE ABBEY

The pages of The Downside Review, especially the 1914 volume which is devoted exclusively to the development of St Gregory's, provide many insights into the history of the community. Dom Norbert Birt's Downside School (London, 1902) and Dom Hubert Van Zeller's Downside By and Large (London, 1954) are good general surveys, but there is, as yet, no comprehensive history.

(c) GASQUET

The fullest, if somewhat hagiographical account, is Shane Leslie's Cardinal Gasquet (London, 1953). Dom Cuthbert Butler's contribution to the D.N.B. (1922-1930), pp. 330—332, is succinct, while Dom David Knowles on 'Cardinal Gasquet as an Historian' in The Historian and Character (Cambridge, 1963), pp. 240—263, provides a critical approach to the cardinal's scholarship. Nigel Abercrombie's Life and Work of Edmund Bishop (London, 1959) contains much of interest.

V RESEARCH POSSIBILITIES

The Gasquet Papers provide a rich quarry of material for the history of the English Catholic community and the Vatican in the period of the cardinal's life. The following represent only some of the potential areas of research:

a) MONASTIC HISTORY

The rediscovery of the contemplative, conventual life in the English Benedictine Congregation, and Gasquet's part in it. The internal history of St Gregory's, Downside.

b) WORLD WAR I

Diplomatic relations between Great Britain and the Holy See. The Vatican's role in peace negotiations.

c) ANGLICAN ORDERS

The decisions and research which led to their condemnation in 1896.

d) SCHOLARSHIP

Gasquet's part in the Vulgate Commission, monastic historiography, the administration of the Vatican Library and Archives.

e) ENGLISH LIFE IN ROME

THE ARCHIVES OF EALING ABBEY, 1896-1947

The Rev. Rene Kollar, O.S.B.

The foundation of the Benedictine monastery in the London suburb of Ealing originated with a dream of Cardinal Vaughan. According to the Cardinal's biographer, '... a year before the foundation-stone of the Cathedral was laid [1894], he had no hesitation in announcing that the English Benedictines would one day keep daily choir in its stalls — although no definite arrangement had been concluded, or even considered'.¹ As in pre-Reformation times, Cardinal Vaughan wished to have a new cathedral staffed by Benedictine monks. Consequently, Vaughan immediately began to correspond with the Abbot President of the English Benedictines, Aidan Gasquet, and the superior of the Downside Benedictines, Edmund Ford. Finally on 17 June 1896, Vaughan authorised Ford to 'open a house at Ealing and take charge of the mission ...'.² But there were certain conditions: the establishment of any school, 'other than a Public Elementary School', was prohibited; the monks must care for the spiritual ministrations of Ealing and live a conventual life; if the foundation failed, the Cardinal agreed to buy back the property at Ealing; and most important, the duty of singing the Divine Office at Westminster. 'One of the principal reasons inducing the Cardinal Archbishop to invite the Benedictines to open a house at Ealing is that they may be sufficiently near to Westminster to contribute to the choral service of the Cathedral'.³

Difficulties and problems soon surfaced, and Cardinal Vaughan was forced to abandon his dream of Benedictine voices in the stalls of Westminster. According to Vaughan, '... apart from the old associations which cluster around the site of Westminster, is it not after all better, and more in accordance with the fitness of things, that the secular clergy should themselves render the Liturgy in the new Cathedral'.⁴ Yet the first Benedictines from Downside had already arrived in Ealing and began to minister to the Roman Catholics of the area. A sense of stability, dedication, and enthusiasm marked their early zeal. Dom Bernard Bulbeck said the first public Mass on 28 March 1897,⁵ and shortly afterwards the care of the parish was entrusted to the care of Dom Gilbert Dolan. In 1902, Dom Sebastian Cave began a school to educate the Roman Catholic youth of the area. By 1915, a fine church greeted the worshippers of Ealing.

Ealing was raised to the rank of a dependent priory in 1916, and still remained a mission of Downside. Dom Wulstan Pearson, O.S.B., later to become the first Bishop of Lancaster in 1924, was appointed the first superior of Ealing Priory. The parish continued to grow, and the school flourished. The Benedictine foundation successfully withstood the hardships of the Great War, the depression, and the rigours of the 1939—1945 War. Even two enemy bombs, which destroyed part of the abbey church, did not weaken the courage of the monks to live a monastic presence in the London environs. In 1947, Ealing was made an independent priory, and Dom Charles Pontifex became the first Prior of the new monastery. Ealing was eventually raised to the rank of an abbey on 26 May 1955. In addition to following the Benedictine Rule, the monks of Ealing Abbey run a successful day-school and staff a thriving urban parish.

Although not large, the archival buildings of Ealing Abbey contain important source-material for the history and spirit of English Roman Catholicism in the twentieth century. In addition to the English Roman Church in general, the collection at Ealing sheds light on the growth and development of the English Congregation during the so-called 'Constitutional Crisis'⁶ and the history of Downside Abbey, the founding abbey. Finally, the life and problems of a growing parish and the educational aims and goals of a Benedictine school during the first four decades of the twentieth century are well documented.

The personal papers of Edmund Ford (1851—1930) form the core of the abbey's archives. When Ford, who was instrumental in the establishment of Ealing, returned there in November 1906, he brought with him his correspondence concerning the early history of the London foundation. Most important are those dealing with the initial establishment of the Benedictine mission in London. Correspondence with Cardinal Vaughan, Abbot President Aidan Gasquet, the President's Council, and Abbot Snow chronicle the intricate beginnings and rationale behind the Ealing foundation. Roman petitions, rescripts, and documents relating to the early years are also catalogued. The possibility of an invitation from Cardinal Vaughan to the French monks of Solemnes to share choir duties with the English monks form an interesting file in the Ford Papers.⁷ The reaction of Aidan Gasquet shows that the English jealously guarded the name and memory of Westminster. Moreover, Ford's large correspondence with individual monks and laymen adds insight into the early life and struggles of Ealing. Chief among this category are: Cuthbert Butler, abbot of Downside from 1906 to 1922, Dom Sebastian Cave (see below), Dom Gilbert Dolan (see below), and a file containing letters of numerous Benedictine monks of Downside. Correspondence with architects, solicitors, convents of nuns in Ealing, and a folio dealing with the acquisition of property and the building of the abbey church round off the Ford Papers.

Dom Gilbert Dolan's letters (1899—1905) chronicle the growing Ealing mission. Written chiefly to Edmund Ford, these reveal the anxieties of a pioneer parish priest. Moreover, the history of the parish is contained in his reports on 'The Mission of St Benedict's' to Downside Abbey, which began in 1899. The growth of this Benedictine parish can also be traced in the Spiritualia Ministeria, the earliest of which is 1897, and the Visitation Returns to the Diocese of Westminster, which began in 1905. The former records the number of parishioners, number of converts, baptisms, and communions for each year.

The Visitation Reports go into minute detail on the nature and description of the liturgical services, the distribution of sacraments, the pastoral care of the faithful, children, sick, and converts. Yearly collection returns and the condition of the church buildings and property are also included. The abbey archives also include the baptismal and marriage registers, which commenced in 1897.

The foundation of the Ealing mission or parish was far from peaceful. Newspaper clipping books (3 volumes) suggest that the Protestant Association was strong in the area, but no evidence exists to show that the Benedictines were targets of abuse. It was a fellow Roman Catholic, however, who caused the monks much concern and embarrassment. The incumbent priest in Ealing, Rev. Richard O'Halloran, refused Archbishop Vaughan's, and later Cardinal Bourne's, orders to surrender his parish to the Benedictines. For over two decades, O'Halloran not only ignored, but inveighed against Vaughan and Bourne. This priest accused the monks of deception and fraud. Fr O'Halloran raised issues about jurisdictional procedures, the rights of parish priests in respect to their bishops, and appealed to the old emotional slogan of 'seculars versus religious'. In his mind, the Benedictine monks were interlopers who had no right in Ealing. The Ealing archives are rich in material concerning this incident: numerous letters from O'Halloran, instructions and orders from Archbishop's House, privately-printed pamphlets from the rebel priest, and a detailed collection of press clippings. The O'Halloran story is an episode in English Church history which needs to be explored.

In comparison to the parish records, material on the school is not as plentiful. The correspondence of its founder and first headmaster, Dom Sebastian Cave (1902—1916) reveals the hopes and trials of a man trying to establish a proper Roman Catholic school. A number of school prospectuses, the earliest being 1908, give the fees, subjects to be studied, and the philosophy of this Benedictine school for boys. The school magazine appeared in 1914, but was suspended during the War and was not published until 1927. This publication records the daily operation of the school in all aspects from studies to games.

After 1922, a scarcity of personal papers exists. With the exception of the collection of one monk, Dom Basil Bolton, little survives to describe the daily operation of the Priory during this period. In respect to the records of the numerous monastic superiors, a few scattered letters are all that remain. However, a substantial collection of the correspondence of Ealing's priors is housed in the archives of the founding abbey, St Gregory's, Downside. Currently, photocopies of the more important papers are being incorporated into the Ealing archives. In the near future, a library of taped interviews with the senior members of the Ealing community and others who were stationed at Ealing in the past will help flesh out this important period which led up to independence.

Finally, a number of other significant items can be found at Ealing Abbey. The library contains a complete holding of The Downside Review, a large collection of Benedictine history, and a substantial number of books in monastic spirituality. A number of pamphlets, pastorals, and instructions from Archbishop's House are also deposited in the archives. A photograph collection, largely uncatalogued, shows the origin, growth, and development of this urban monastery.

Material post-1947 is part of the personal and private archives of the Abbot of Ealing. As with the archives of most religious houses, the archival material is private property and requests for access must be made to the Abbot of Ealing Abbey.

THE ENGLISH FRANCISCAN NUNS AND THEIR ARCHIVES

Alison McCann and Timothy J. McCann

The nuns of the Franciscan Third Order (Regular) are a development of the original Third Order (Secular). The history of the English Franciscan Third Order Nuns began in 1619, when two widows, Lucy Sleaford and Petronella Kemp, received the habit of the Third Order of St Francis, at Brussels, with the intention that they should establish an enclosed English convent there. They were soon joined by other ladies, sent from England by Fr John Gennings, and, in 1621, the convent was formally inaugurated, with seven novices being given the habit in the chapel in the house which had been bought for the community in Buchbere Street, Brussels. Thus began the community which, after sojourns at Brussels, Nieuport and Princenhoff on the Continent, finally came to England in 1794. In England, after staying at Winchester and Taunton, the nuns settled at Goodings in Berkshire until 1972, when they formally amalgamated with the Poor Clares at Arundel.

The convent at Brussels was dedicated to St Elizabeth, and was made subject to the English Province of the Friars Minor. In 1623 Fr Francis Bell, the future martyr, was made chaplain, and served the community for seven years, during which time he edited the book of rules which he had printed for the convent, and which still survives among their records. Two Poor Clares from Gravelines governed the community at first, but in 1626 Catherine Francis Greenbury became the first superior elected by and from among the young community, which had grown to include thirty-four choir nuns. On 1 December 1630 the first Chapter of the Restored English Province of Friars Minor took place in the convent. An outbreak of plague in the summer of 1635 claimed the lives of five nuns and the then chaplain, Fr George Paurett. The community was not to remain in Brussels for long. The site of their house was too small, and allowed the growing community no room for expansion. The cost of living in Brussels was also a problem, being much higher than elsewhere on the Continent.

In 1638 the convent moved to Nieuport, a convent dedicated to Our Lady of the Angels, but the location did not prove a fortunate choice. Within a few years of the move, thirty-seven nuns had died from hardship and unhealthy conditions, and the Civil War in England prevented the arrival of new postulants from home. The convent was also frequently in financial difficulties. Despite this, in 1640, the year in which Mother Margaret Clare West became Superior with the title of Abbess, adjoining buildings were purchased to enlarge the accommodation, and, in 1658, a colony was sent to Paris to start a convent there, which became the Convent of Conceptionists, or Blue Nuns.

In 1662 Princenhoff, the former ducal palace of the Counts of Flanders, in Bruges, was put up for sale, and it was decided that this would provide a more suitable and healthier location for the community. The palace was in a ruinous condition inside and much work was necessary to make it appropriate for the needs of the community. At Princenhoff, however, the nuns were to find a secure and peaceful home for over a hundred years, in a convent dedicated to Our Lady of Dolours. The first fifty years of their residence there, however, were burdened with financial difficulties, in spite of the beneficence of the Howard family, Dukes of Norfolk, and M. d'Ognate, a Flemish gentleman. The establishment of the community at Princenhoff left it owing nearly 32,000 florins. Only gradually, by strict economy, the kindness of benefactors and fellow religious, and of Pope Innocent III, who sent a donation of £200, did the nuns reduce their mountainous debt. Mother Margaret Clare Roper, Abbess from 1700 to 1719, made the removal of debt her chief concern, and, by the time of her death, the house was free.

For the next half-century, the community flourished. By 1770 there were fifty members. In 1772, however, the Imperial Government started to issue decrees to control the running of religious houses, culminating in the detailed regulations of 1781. Two years later, six convents in Bruges were suppressed, and the Abbess, Mother Mary Gertrude Weld, took the precaution of transferring the community's invested funds to England, and selling the church plate and furniture. The French Revolution and the Revolutionary Wars made life for the nuns very uncertain. After various alarms, the nuns finally had to leave Princenhoff in June 1794. Their initial destination was Holland, since they did not think of England as a possible refuge. However, an encouraging message was received from Thomas Weld of Lulworth, the Abbess's cousin, who had discussed the plight of the community with George III. The King had been most concerned, and had told Mr Weld to tell the nuns to come to England and to bring all their vestments, breviaries, and religious artifacts with them, and he would give orders that they would not be confiscated by the customs officials.

Mr Weld, therefore, made haste to find suitable accommodation for the nuns. In August 1794 they landed in England and moved into a temporary home in North Audley Street in London. From there they went to Abbey House in Winchester. Although a fine building, the house was not large enough to house a school, which was therefore established in a house across the road. There was also a right of way over the property, so it proved impossible to establish enclosure. After the community had been at Winchester for a dozen years, Fr Peter Collingridge, the Franciscan Provincial, insisted that they must either build or move.

A more suitable site was found in Taunton Lodge in Somerset, and though much alteration and building was necessary before it fulfilled all the community's needs, the nuns moved to a new home once more in 1808. Once more they were burdened with a great debt; but by 1814 the debt was cleared and the community flourished once again. By 1860 the community numbered sixty, and twelve nuns and four sisters volunteered to go to a new foundation at Woodchester in Gloucestershire. Both the new and old foundations prospered: Woodchester administered an orphanage, while Taunton ran a particularly successful school.

A major change was made in the life of the community in 1953. The monastic buildings at Taunton were by now too large for the needs of the nuns, and the highly successful school made great demands on those members of the community who worked there. It was decided to leave Taunton, and to abandon the school which had been a feature of the community's life since 1621. The nuns decided to return to the contemplative life, and in December 1954 the community moved to a new house at Goodings in Berkshire, which had formerly belonged to the Canonesses Regular of the Holy Sepulchre.

After eighteen years, the community relinquished their last works of an active nature at Goodings, such as the Youth Hostel and catechising the young, and in 1972 the main body of the nuns amalgamated with the Poor Clares, who were established at Cross Bush, near Arundel in West Sussex. Three of the nuns maintained the link with Woodchester, entering the community there, which soon in turn became Poor Clares.¹

Despite their frequent changes of residence, including their hurried departure from Belgium, the community seems to have been able to preserve the major items in their archives. The Book of Clothings dates from 1619; the Book of Professions from 1622; and the Book of the Dead from 1623. The early entries in all three volumes are in the hand of Fr Francis Bell, O.S.F. All three volumes were printed by the Catholic Record Society up to the 1820s.² The Annals of the Order were compiled c.1833, and cover the years from 1619 onwards. From 1833 the Annals were kept up to date until 1972, when the community left Goodings. The constitutions of the house are recorded in six books of Statutes, dating from 1625 to 1722. There are also four books of Ceremonial from the 17th and 18th centuries.

The two bulkiest items in the archives are the two Miscellaneous Volumes, which are interleaved with a wide range of documents dating from between 1626 and 1956. These include many documents concerning the administrative and financial affairs of the house when at Princenhoff. There is a summary account of the expenses of the nuns' journey from Bruges until their establishment at Taunton. Correspondence, petitions, requests for indulgences and notes of significant events relating to the community, all serve to illustrate its history during the 19th and 20th centuries. There are also separate collections of letters from Bishops Collingridge and Burton.

With the amalgamation with the Poor Clares at Arundel, the old books

THE CATHOLIC ARCHIVIST

AND THE CAUSES OF THE SAINTS

Sr Ursula Blake, S.H.C.J.

Before beginning to write this paper, I have been trying to identify you as an audience and have come to the conclusion that perhaps you could be termed 'conservationists of truth'. But, of course, that is not the whole definition, because truth to be lived must be shared like the bluebird in the fairy tale. Mostly you will open your archives for small practical things; at other times for forensic reasons; and for searchers like myself, to shed light on great people or great moments of history where there are the tantalising missing links that you can supply.

We all know that many thousands of people all over the world, every single day, are involved with records to assess the evil in man or woman; but about the goodness in human beings, there is, by comparison, a very small stream. There is the Nobel Peace Prize at Oslo, and the Baptist Templeton Prize (awarded in London last May to Solzhenitsyn). But the only place where heroic goodness is authenticated, by people as the sole object of their professional life, is at the Vatican, by the officials of the Sacred Congregation for the Causes of Saints with — for the last few years — the scholarly and genial Cardinal Pietro Palazzini at their head.

This is of prime importance to the Church as showing the ongoing acceptance, by special members of Christ's mystical body, of the full message of the Incarnation, 'yesterday, today' and while the pilgrim Church endures. Evidently, Pope John Paul II feels this very strongly because he promulgated on 27 February the Apostolic Constitution Divinus Perfectionis Magister of 25 January 1983 which was particularised by two other documents: the Normae from a Commission of the Causes of Saints and the Decretum of Cardinal Palazzini. Apostolic Constitutions (put lower in rank because narrower in application than Encyclicals) have only twice before been written about canonizations: that of Sixtus V in 1588 and that of Paul VI in 1969.

The theological preamble to the new constitution (see L'Osservatore Romano, 27 February 1983) seems at first sight to be just a resume of the dogmas behind Christian sanctity. On closer inspection, however, it is built on three theological principles of Lumen Gentium and the whole atmosphere of Vatican II with its accent on persons in the Church and in the world and their potential for service to Christ's cause whoever they may be.

1. The first principle that the Pope stresses is that sanctity in human beings has its beginning and end in the Holy Spirit and through him. 'Those whom the Father chooses are drawn to follow Christ more closely' — that is why the saints are enabled to be giants striding along the way, achieving the impossible to mere human nature. Vatican II gave many models of the Church; that chosen here is of 'Bride adorned by and for her Bridegroom'.

2. Secondly and throughout, the emphasis is on the Universal Call to Holiness which has also been demonstrated in recent practice by the great variety of candidates who are among the Causes of Saints: a chimney-sweep (Friedhoffen), a Dublin ex-drunkard (Matt Talbot), an officer in the Czar's army (Joseph Kalinowski), a Jewish woman philosopher (Edith Stein), as well as those who already have contributed to thought and charity in the institutional Church — J.H. Newman, Charles de Foucauld, and 'people's saints' like Padre Pio.

In the new statutes the circle of people who may take responsibility in the Causes of Saints has also been widened — and that may interest some of you personally. The postulator who has a key position in a Cause does not have to be a priest any longer. The postulator can now be man or woman, religious or lay, who has the theological, canonical and historical competence for a particular Cause, and has also acquired a working knowledge of the procedure of the Causes of saints. The postulator who takes the Cause from the diocesan to the Roman phase has to have a domicile in Rome. But with the consent of the promoters (adores) of the Cause and that of the bishop concerned, there can be appointed one or more vice-postulators possessing the same expertise.

Another development which touches the non-clerical side of the Church, is that the new Constitution recognises the status of those who are co-operatores externi, who spend perhaps ten years (as I myself have done) writing the legal document called the Positio super vita et super virtutibus servi (aut servae) Dei. These collaborators will each have a guide for a new, more efficient, structure, a collegium relatorum with eight well-prepared priest relatores under a relator generate, who, primus inter pares, will organise the scheme. This comes into effect from October onwards.

This is parallel to the most important structure of all, where six theologians of note and particularly adapted to the Cause, work with the promoter fidei (same name — new task of the old Devil's Advocate) on the assessment of heroic sanctity.

3. The third theological principle on which the Constitution rests is the collegiality of bishops. In the distant past canonisations were made in the local church; then Rome took over in 1234, and the bishop's power, in this matter, seemed to be delegated. Now the Church recognises the right — and, of course, the suitability — of the bishop to be the judge in the first instance. Then, because canonisations are a case of instituting a new cultus in the universal Church, Rome has an overall obligation to organise the structure for canonisations and be kept well-informed about the proceedings in a diocesan Cause. (Before the new norms the authorities in Rome had to have an extensive inquiry into the validity of a Cause before it was permitted to open at diocesan level, thus placing a double burden on those who had their work to do after the Cause came to Rome.)

The structures for the diocesan Cause are now laid out in thirty-four paragraphs of the new Normae. Since these apply equally to the Archbishops of Westminster, Pueblo and Pretoria, as well as the prelatures of the Philippines or Brazil, they need to be, above all, clear and practical.

The third document, the Decretum, is of its nature temporary. It allows the Causes now in the pipe line (our own for Cornelia Connelly is Protocol No. 953) to follow the old regime if they have begun it but always keeping the spirit of the new law of more scientific treatment, more efficiency and less duplication of personnel while respecting variations, linguistic and cultural.

There are two types of Causes: antiquae and recentiores, the former being begun after every living witness of worth is dead. These 'historical' Causes are no longer treated separately; every Cause is treated as 'historical': the Cause cannot be undertaken till at least five years after the death of the servus Dei and all have their positio, however short and simple, while the group recentiores will also have sworn witnesses.

Another change is that the published works are examined first: if these contain anything against faith or morals the Cause will be stopped and the labour of finding and examining the rest avoided. Other reasons for a Cause folding up are: insufficient material to prove heroicity of virtue, or fama sanctitatis, or an unhealthy or even an unauthorised cult which has sprung up and so makes the Cause at least inopportune. (If Cornelia Connelly's remains had been transferred to within the sanctuary our Cause would have been stopped.)

Since some of you, or your friends, may be interested to join the personnel of a diocesan Cause under the new statutes, I will briefly line up the functionaries as listed by the sub-secretary, Monsignor Veraja in his comments on the new legislation:

Actor: the physical or moral person (diocese, parish, order, individual) who promotes the Cause and is responsible for the cost.

Postulator: (very important) — nominated by the Actor and approved by the bishop. He must evaluate the Cause as to the person of the Servant of God, the validity of the fama sanctitatis, the relevance of such a Cause. He is the first collaborator with the bishop and is responsible for administering the funds of the Cause.

Bishop: competent to conduct a diocesan process if he is the Ordinary of the place where the Servant of God died (unless decided otherwise by the Sacred Congregation).

Bishop's Delegate: a priest with special competence in theology and canon law and a thorough knowledge of the Cause.

Promotor Justitiae: the opposite number in a diocesan Cause to the Promotor Fidei. He draws up the questionnaire for witnesses and has to make up any lacunae he observes in the conduct of the Cause or of the documentation.

Notary or Actuary: before whom the depositions of witnesses are legally recorded. A tape recorder may be used if authentication by the bishop is also considered valid by the notary.

Periti in re historica et archivistica: (experts formerly called historical commissioners) have the task of collecting documentation for the Cause and will be called upon to testify ex officio.

As I have been talking, I am sure you have been able to see what a difference to the competence and to the efficiency of the collaborators on any Cause will be the work done at source by the archivists. And in the field of experts I can see that the associates of the Catholic archivists will have a key part to play when the Actors and the Postulators have more new saints to propose to our bishops for the glory of Him who sits on the throne and who Himself says of the Spirit and of the Bride, 'Behold I make all things new'.

A note on the actual work done by S.H.C.J, archivists working on the Cause of Cornelia Connelly:

In 1952 Cardinal Antonelli, Secretary of the Sacred Congregation of Rites warned us, 'You will find it worth starting if you are prepared for hard work, considerable expense and a long wait'. The experience of thirty years has confirmed this.

In the Diocesan Process (1952—68) our archivists worked with the three historical commissioners:

- (i) to collect and put in order all that could be found of material written by, to, or about Cornelia Connelly;
- (ii) to draw up from all this documentation the fifty-six volumes of writings to be submitted to the diocesan tribunal and then to be sent on to Rome.

In Rome to put together the Positio (completed in 1983). This is a documented biography divided into chapters more or less chronologically. Each chapter is divided into sections and then into sub-sections; at the end of each section is carefully selected documentation; a separate volume contains detailed and meticulously checked annotation. The advice of the sub-secretary, Mgr Verago is illuminating:

- (i) Don't identify with Cornelia; forget who you are and simply be a collaborator of the Sacred Congregation of the Causes of Saints.
- (ii) The Cause can proceed only if all doubts are removed.
- (iii) The historical consultants will need not only introductions to a theme but to each document produced for their consideration.

- (iv) Use historical, scientific language, not pious and if possible not spiritual terminology — the latter only in the summarium.
- (v) The contrafigura (protagonist) should stand out as he or she confronts the servus (servae) Dei.

Considerable archivist research went on during the writing of the Positio (especially concerning Mgr Verago's fifth Point) and in fact our main collaborator had been for some years the Society's archivist.

Ed. This is the text of a talk prepared by Sr Ursula for delivery at the Society's A.G.M. in July 1983 and read by Sr Winifred Wickins, S.H.C.J.

THE ARCHIVES OF ST PETER'S COLLEGE, GLASGOW

James M. Lawlor

The archives of St Peter's College, the major seminary of the province of Glasgow, for all intents and purposes lost since 1946, have, over the past three years, regained something of their former organisation and are now yielding significant material. This article is an attempt to describe the development of the College and its archive and to delineate briefly what that archive contains.

In 1869, Charles Eyre, a Yorkshire-man, priest of the Diocese of Hexham and Newcastle, was appointed Vicar Apostolic of the Western District of Scotland. The Church in Glasgow had recently been bitterly divided by tension between the native Scots and the vast population of Irish immigrants. Within a few years Eyre, originally appointed because of his 'national neutrality', had restored unity to the District after decades of disharmony. In an attempt to consolidate the identity of the District, Eyre founded St Peter's College in 1874, thus ensuring a steady flow of native priests educated in the West. The College, situated near the medieval university,¹ immediately became the focus for the spiritual and intellectual life of the District. The first section of the archive, (A) Domestic Archives: 1874—1980, contains a great deal of material relating to the foundation, early administration and the early students and staff of the College.

Only six years after foundation, the College received the magnificent personal library and papers of Dean William Gordon,² a well known historian and bibliophile. His library forms the basis of what is now known as the 'rare book collection'.³ Many other clergymen followed suit, and still do, leaving whole libraries, or papers and documents, to the College. This collection of miscellaneous papers and documents grew to such an extent that it now constitutes sections (C) Catholicism in Glasgow, (D) Catholicism in Scotland and (E) Miscellany.⁴

In 1878, Leo XIII restored the Scottish Hierarchy and Eyre became the first post-Reformation Archbishop of Glasgow. At this point the College became the repository of a part of the Archdiocesan archives.

In 1880, John Lewis Eyre died leaving his title of Count, the family estates and papers and a sum of £40,000 to his son, the Archbishop of Glasgow.⁵ Archbishop Eyre used part of this inheritance to build a new showpiece seminary at Bearsden, which he gifted to the Diocese in 1892. Here the College library and archive continued to flourish. When Eyre himself died in 1902, his own library came to the College and was added to the rare book collection. The family papers were so extensive, however, that they formed a whole section of the archives, now section (B) Eyre family papers.

In 1946, the students were removed to the Mill Hill College in London to allow necessary restoration work to take place in the Bearsden building. While this work was being carried out, a small accident led to the building being completely gutted by fire. Much of the collection was lost as the contemporary registers will testify: what was salvaged and was not of immediate use in the 'working library' was stored in boxes. Around this time the College collection of oil-paintings and some of the more important documents were removed to the Diocesan offices at Park Circus.⁶

When the College found new premises on the Kilmahew Estate, this 'boxed archive' was stored in a small room off the main library. Here it lay almost completely undisturbed for almost forty years. In 1980, the Kilmahew house was proving too large so once again the College moved premises to this smaller house in Newlands. It was during this move that the boxes were once again brought to light. Since that time they have been stored and cared for in a small muniment room, along with the collection of rare books. Some of the more interesting documents and books are on display to our visitors.

Although our collection has been depleted by the vicissitudes of fate, it is nevertheless a valuable and diverse one: one which represents the Catholic heritage of the west of Scotland and indeed parts of the north-east of England: a collection worthy of attention and preservation.

NOTES

1. The major benefactor of the College, the Marquis of Bute, had very definite ideas that the College should be closely linked to the University. This idea will only become effective next year when some students will attend lectures at the University of Glasgow.
2. Born 1808, ordained 1831. Founded the mission at Greenock where he died in 1880.
3. These books have proven to be of significant, and in about ninety cases unique, historical interest. They are currently being examined by the National Library of Scotland in conjunction with the British Library.
4. This miscellany contains correspondence of St John Bosco, St Robert Bellarmine, Catherine de Medici, Luca Ganganelli and others besides.
5. There was some wrangling among the two surviving sons. William Henry Eyre, S.J., rector of Stonyhurst, could not, by the constitution of the Jesuits, receive any property for his own use, thus disqualifying him from the will. William claimed that since he intended to enlarge Stonyhurst by his inheritance, he could receive what was his due. However, the courts disagreed with this point of view. (cf. The Law Times, Vol. 49, p. 259f.)
6. The material from St Peter's is easily recognisable by the College stamp. The papal letters relating to the Eyre family and to the archbishop's appointments are essentially what constitute the material which was removed.

THE ASSOCIATION OF RELIGIOUS ARCHIVISTS OF IRELAND

Your readers have heard nothing further from us since the article written by Fr Leo Layden, C.S.Sp. for Catholic Archives 1982. In it he outlined the origin of the Association in Ireland which came into being within a year of the Catholic Archives Society in England (1979). In fact, some of our pioneer members were already members of your Society and still have affiliations with it. Two of our former archivists, the late Fr Declan O'Sullivan, C.P., St Paul's Retreat, Mount Argus, Dublin, and the late Fr James Murphy, C.M. of the Vincentian Fathers, Dublin, were not only devoted to working on the archives within their own Congregations, but they were also zealous in promoting interest in, and dedication to, the work of arranging and preserving the rich heritage of archives within other religious Congregations. Indeed, our Association owes much to their zeal and inspiration during the limited time they were with us in the beginning and we remember them with gratitude and prayer.

Our Association now seems to be fairly well established in Ireland. Membership to date numbers about sixty religious, small in relation to the number of religious Orders and Congregations in the country as a whole. However, it is hoped that in time more and more religious superiors will come to realise the importance and the value of setting up a suitable repository to house their archives. It may be that in some Congregations there is a misconception regarding the notion of archives, and religious may need to be convinced that they are not simply the dead records of the past but rather the authentic documents created by the very life and activity of members of the Congregation since its foundation.

To quote from a document from the Centre of Research of Religious History in Paris 1969, 'The Archives of Religious Congregations of Women':

It is important to reflect on this notion of archives because sometimes the word 'archives' arouses apprehension and provokes a defensive reaction as if it were a question of violating a secret, or because destructions have been numerous, or because the current administration, poor in personnel and material, cannot weigh itself down with what appears to be dead vestiges of the past.

The archives of a Religious Congregation have importance under a double title: on the one hand they witness to a fact of civilisation and constitute a page of general history while on the other for Christians they preserve the tracing of the action of the living God. They are treasures of the Church and constitute a spiritual nourishment for successive generations of the people of God.

It was in this light that Pope John XXIII wished to renew interest in religious archives so as to give solid assistance to conciliar renewal:

Archives have become particularly important in the post-Vatican II period of history as a source of renewal enabling members of Religious Congregations to keep in touch with their roots, historically and spiritually, ensuring renewal and adaptation within the spirit and history of their Congregations.

There is no Religious Congregation in the Church which has not been affected in a big way by this renewal and the post-Vatican II period will have produced masses of documentation regarding every aspect of our lives as religious, documentation which will possibly be the most important since that of our origins, and which have brought about such revolutionary changes within our Congregations. In fact, Vatican II with its far-reaching effects will remain the dividing line between two very different eras in the Church as well as in our Congregations.

It is encouraging that since then many Societies and Associations of Catholic Archivists have come into being to promote the care and preservation of records and archives and to help archivists in their 'specially ecclesial role'. Here in Ireland our Association has been fortunate in having the professional help of the Archives Department of University College, Dublin, almost from the beginning and we are grateful for their untiring efforts on our behalf. These professionals continue to play an important and continuing role in helping and encouraging the religious archivists, some of whom are new to the work of arranging archives and setting up repositories. In the summer of 1982 the College organised a second short course on the Management of Archives. It was attended by twenty religious and proved to be very stimulating and more adapted to their needs than the first one had been.

At that time some of our members were desirous of doing further archival study on a long-term basis. The Association approached the University about the possibility of a special Evening Course for religious — the one-year Diploma Course is limited to eight students and is not altogether relevant to religious. Professor Donal McCartney of the Archives Department was very interested in the proposal and agreed to put the matter to the College authorities. Negotiations took several months but it was confirmed early in 1983 that a two-year Evening Course for Religious Archivists would begin in the autumn. The Course is now actually under way since 11 October with ten religious participating. There is a three-hour weekly session which includes two lectures and a tutorial. Practical work will be done by the religious on their own archival material and it is hoped that during the two years the group will be able to visit the archives of each religious on the Course, as well as other selected repositories, including the Public Record Office in Belfast.

Our Annual General Meeting is the only get-together of all the members of the Association during the year and it is held on a Saturday in March or April at the Secretariat of the Conference of Major Religious Superiors at Milltown Park, Dublin. For the past two years we have invited Miss Ailsa Holland, Archivist and Lecturer at University College, Dublin, as our guest speaker. Her talks on 'The Archivist's Identity' were very practical and helpful. In the first one she spelled out the responsibilities of the archivist, the extent of his authority, the area for his policy, and his priorities. She said it was up to him to see that nothing is lost which is worthy of preservation, to look for material and to keep regular contact with potential sources of material. Within an institution or congregation it is important for him to initiate a policy of acquisition and to acquire material on a regular basis.

In her second talk Miss Holland summed up, in very clear and precise terms, the archivist's role and gave the religious, as it were, a blue-print for the future. (A copy of her notes is attached.)

Some of our members are also affiliated to The Irish Society for Archives in Dublin. During the year they organise lectures on related topics to which members of the Association are welcome. In October 1982, Mr Peter Moore, a member of the Australian Society of Archivists, and Honorary Archivist to the Dominican Sisters there, gave a talk in which he outlined the origins, development and organisation of the Christian Churches, particularly the Catholic and Anglican Churches, in Australia. He then spoke of the present state of their archival material, particularly religious Orders which have their mother-houses, or at least houses, in Ireland from which religious came to Australia. Many Irish houses will have letters, etc. written from Australia, copies of which were not kept as a rule. The reverse will be true, records in Australian houses will have been sent from Irish institutions without copies necessarily being kept. Thus there is good reason for Irish and Australian religious archivists to keep in touch in order to complement informational coverage of their histories.

Here in Dublin, the Association also has links with The Irish Historical Society and their annual Conference on Irish Ecclesiastical History has a special interest for religious archivists.

I cannot conclude this short report on our activities over the last two years without mentioning the Conference of Major Religious Superiors which gave the first impetus to the Association in Dublin in 1979. To them we are indebted for many things, not least a venue for our meetings at their Secretariat in Milltown Park where we have every facility, including lunch at our Annual General Meeting. In addition, they assume responsibility for duplicating and mailing circulars, etc. to members, all of which is very much appreciated by the Committee of the Association.

Finally, I am happy to say that His Lordship, Dr Thomas Morris, D.D., Archbishop of Cashel & Emly, has accepted the honorary role of first Patron of the Association of Religious Archivists of Ireland, and we look forward to having him with us at our fourth A.G.M. in 1984.

Sr Margaret Mary Altman, D.C.

Ed. Sr Margaret Mary was Secretary of A.R.A.I. from 1979 to 1983. Her successor is Sr Dolores Mulholland, F.C.J., 54 Kenilworth Square, Rathgar, Dublin 6.

THE ARCHIVIST'S IDENTITY

Collector. The archivist must assume responsibility that nothing of archival value is lost in the community and this can easily happen in the name of order and pragmatism or by ignorance and design. Therefore the archivist should be prepared to locate and acquire material in danger of destruction and must make a regular survey of potential sources. It is important to educate people about the value of potential archival material. Be persuasive, perceptive and possessive. The priority in this area is material in danger of destruction.

Custodian. The archivist is also responsible for assessing what material should be preserved permanently and what material can be destroyed without loss to future research work. In general a generous policy of preservation is desirable. The research value of archival material need not be immediately apparent. What is preserved can be later destroyed when the archivist fully recognises its limitations. However, the need for destruction is less likely in a small institution. A complex nucleus of archival material of routine content is of greater research potential than a few important documents.

Creator. The archivist should ensure that a record is made when necessary or desirable. For example, a photograph of occasions, events, members of the community, can be a useful record; likewise tape recordings of experiences of members in the course of their work. This is not a spontaneous record and is not really archival material but such records are a useful supplementary source and often vivid.

Organiser. One of the most central functions of the archivist is the imposition of order on archival material and related sources. This must be done in such a way that documents can be located and retrieved at will but at the same time, the integrity of archival material must be preserved. In short, it is imperative that the nature and meaning of archival material is not distorted in the name of organisation. There is no universal approach to the arrangement and organisation of the archives of an institution. The archivist must identify and employ a system which suits the nature of the material for which he is responsible.

Processor. Closely associated with organisation is the processing of archival material or the production of typescript, finding aids which describe archival material, endorse its organisation and assist in its retrieval and control. These are independent instruments compiled by the archivist. The production of finding aids must be treated as a priority by the archivist. Without these the use and protection of archival material will not be feasible.

Caretaker. Archival material will not withstand the passage of time unless the archivist can provide facilities in which material can be safely and securely stored. The facilities need not be elaborate but should take into consideration protection from fire, water, pollution, theft or disorder.

Conservator. The archivist is also responsible for ensuring that fragile documents do not deteriorate. Although the repair of archival material is a skilled activity requiring specialised training, there are some practical methods the archivist can adopt to avoid deterioration of documents.

Educator. Although the physical protection of archival material is an important responsibility of the archivist, the use of archival material is equally important. Without use, the preservation of archival material is sterile. This is an important policy area where decisions must be made at community level about accessibility. The use of archival material can be active or passive. In passive use, the archivist is the medium through which people learn from and benefit from the information recorded in archival material. In active use, the archivist facilitates and encourages the research work of others. The archivist must also educate the community about the work he does — its scope, limitations and problems and about the distinction between the archivist, the librarian and the historian.

Guardian. When archival material is being used, the archivist is responsible for its safe use. To do this controls are imposed on the researcher and his physical use of the material. The archivist does not control how the researcher uses the information contained in archival material but he can control what the researcher uses where this seems desirable.

Distinguish:

- (1) Archives — records of administration of the congregation which are a spontaneous and natural creation or of people acting in a corporate capacity. It is important to understand the history, work and procedures of the congregation if its archives are to be properly maintained and it is important to recognise what must be preserved because it represents the congregation historically, intrinsically, legally or realistically. Archives are usually kept in self-contained groups (offices, branches, houses) and are arranged as they were maintained originally with some modifications. A list of documents is made for each archival group.
- (2) Papers — papers accumulated or created by an individual in a personal capacity. No two collections of papers will be the same and some will be more important for preservation than others. Collections of papers are usually kept by individual, arranged to reflect the life and interests of the individual and each has its own separate list.
- (3) Printed and photographic material — such material can be maintained, organised and processed as is convenient.
- (4) Copies of archives from other institutions — because these are not original records and are acquired simply to substitute for gaps, they can be treated in a convenient manner. Ideally, one should apply the same approach as in the case of original archives.

(5) Records which are the conscious creation of the archivist can be treated in the same manner as printed and photographic material.

Ailsa Holland

THE MARCH PHILLIPPS DE LISLE ARCHIVES

Tragically these appear to have been destroyed about 1943 and the writer has spent much time and expense over the last twenty years trying to reconstitute them.

As far as the Catholic Archives Society is concerned, the main interest is in the correspondence of Ambrose Lisle March Phillipps de Lisle (1809—1878) with his fellow leaders of the Second Spring. Formerly their letters would have been at Garendon Hall; now — on the whole — it is the letters sent them by Ambrose which have been xeroxed or micro-filmed and which are now located at Quenby Hall.

Garendon was a Cistercian monastery founded in 1133 and suppressed in 1536; a few books of this mitred Abbey have survived as also a few deeds. The property passed to the Earls of Rutland and Dukes of Buckingham before being purchased by Sir Ambrose Phillipps in 1684 who acquired the Grace Dieu Estate about 1690. His daughter Mary married Edward Lisle and Jane, one of their twenty children, married Thomas March.

The Marchs, the Phillipps and the Lisles all appear to have been bibliophiles — and probably therefore letter-writers — but (again sadly) the Garendon library was dispersed in 1943. The writer has been able to recover over 2,000 volumes, partly due to the fact that they contain the family ex libris and partly as a result of references to these books in letters now being recovered in copy form.

The writer began his search by listing all the letters in the Life and Letters of Ambrose Phillipps de Lisle, by E.S. Purcell and completed by Edwin de Lisle (2 vols, 1900). Many of these were only partly quoted — occasionally wrongly transcribed and dated — and a search was begun to trace the appropriate archives and this often produced the letters which Ambrose sent to his correspondents.

An ironic moment occurred when writing to the English College, Rome, as to Ambrose's correspondence with Mgr George Talbot (1806—1886). Purcell states in Vol. I, page 403: 'His (Ambrose) letters have probably been destroyed, but the answers are of interest and are now given in full'. It was lucky that these Talbot letters were quoted in full on pages 404 to 408 as they probably perished at Garendon in 1943 but the Venerable Archivist, Fr Anthony Laird, was able to locate and xerox the three letters of Ambrose!

Garendon Hall was requisitioned in 1943 and it appears that the extensive cupboards in the Billiard Room were emptied and the contents placed on a large bonfire! One hopes that certain papers were salvaged or items on loan retained in other locations but, so far, this theory has not been proven! Due to its size and to vandalism, Garendon was demolished in 1964 and the writer moved to Quenby in 1972.

Except in one case, the writer has always received help and assistance from owners, archivists, librarians, book collectors, book dealers, etc., and he is delighted to have now reached the stage where he can sometimes help others in their research, either by correspondence or by a visit to Quenby at a mutually convenient time and date.

As a non-professional archivist, he is most grateful for any help received and remains — as in the family motto — 'En Bon Espoir'.

The Squire de Lisle

SCOTTISH CATHOLIC ARCHIVES

In an article 'The Scottish Catholic Archives', published in Catholic Archives No.1, 1981, Fr Mark Dilworth, O.S.B., Keeper of the Scottish Catholic Archives, described the main collections housed at Columba House, Edinburgh. The work of Columba House is, of course, on-going, and in his annual reports for 1982 and 1983 Fr Dilworth records important progress on sorting, listing and calendaring the deposited archives, the main thrust of which has been to calendar the pre-1878 holdings and to prepare a summary list for wide circulation and eventual publication. In this, the Keeper has had for two years the assistance of Dr Christine Johnson whose thesis has been published under the title of Developments in the Roman Catholic Church in Scotland, 1789—1829. As well as answering an increased number of enquiries, assisting students on research visits, giving talks, helping with exhibitions, examining archival material, and advising custodians on their records, the Keeper was also involved in a great deal of work over the Papal Visit in May 1982, particularly with regard to the Exhibition arranged by the Heritage Commission and the publication of the illustrated catalogue and brochure.

Accessions reported in 1982 included parish records from Lennox-town, papers of Fr Allan Macdonald (died 1905), and documentation concerning Professor John S. Phillimore (died 1926) and the Distributive movement, while the principal deposit in 1983 was that of the archives of the Eastern District (1828-1878) and archdiocese of St Andrew's and Edinburgh (1878-1929). The collection had been put in order, with a summary list and index, by the Rev. James (later Bishop) Maguire about 1930. Appended to the Keeper's 1983 report is the following important summary of the state of the catalogue:

State of the Catalogues, 15 March 1983

Most of the work over the previous twelve months was done on the central core of the holdings, that is, on the documents which concern the Scottish post-Reformation Church in general, rather than one institution.

Documents are put in bundles of not more than about twenty, numbered, and then calendared or at least listed. Each stage presupposes the one before. The handlist is compiled from the completed list or calendar.

The central core can be divided into five main categories:

1. Blairs Letters (BL). About 50,000 items, 1627—1928. These were in boxes, with an index of writers. Items other than signed letters lacked a guide.

Bundling completed. Numbering done up to 1829. Calendaring done up to 1694.

2. Preshome Letters (PL). About 25,000 items, 1641-1886. These were in boxes, with no systematic guide. They have been divided into four sections:

North-east papers	Bundled, numbered and calendared
Kyle family	Bundled, numbered and listed
Scottish Mission	Bundled, numbered and calendared
Kyle family (not letters)	Bundled, numbered and calendared

3. Archbishop James Beaton Deposit (JB). This collection offered special problems and there was no guide to the contents. The problems and the solutions adopted, with a description of the holdings, have been outlined in an article for the Innes Review.

Bundling, numbering and calendaring completed.

4. Scottish Mission (SM). A new category, taking in documents relevant to the mission and not assignable to a particular category.

Chronological sections up to 1829: bundled, numbered and calendared. Chronological sections after 1829: work continuing. Other sections: in varying states of completeness.

5. Individual Mission Stations (IM). A new category, taking in a mass of disparate material of chiefly local interest. The present list of localities numbers thirty-five and the collection is continually being added to.

The Editor is obliged to Fr Mark Dilworth for permission to publish the above summary and to refer to details mentioned in his annual reports. Enquiries concerning the Scottish Catholic Archives should be addressed to The Keeper, Scottish Catholic Archives, Columba House, 16 Drummond Place, Edinburgh, EH3 6PL.

DRAFT CLAUSES FOR THE GUIDANCE OF A DIOCESE OR RELIGIOUS CONGREGATION IN THE ADMINISTRATION OF ITS ARCHIVES

1. In each diocese, or province of a religious congregation, or independent religious house, an archivist is to be appointed/elected, whose functions are to collect, preserve, classify, list, and make available to bona fide researchers the records of the diocese/congregation (cf. cn. 482—485).
2. The archives remain the property of the diocese/congregation, but appropriate sections of them may be deposited, under conditions clearly specified, on temporary or permanent loan in County Record Offices or other authorised archives repository at the discretion of the Bishop or of the Superior with the consent of his/her Council. The archivist should recommend conditions to be placed on public access to such records, and his/her advice should normally be followed in drawing up and imposing such conditions.
3. Manuscripts, archival material, rare books and other articles associated with the history of the diocese/congregation may not be alienated from its possession without the permission of the appropriate ecclesiastical authority (or authorities) which are recommended first to seek the advice of the historians of the diocese/congregation, of the Catholic Record Society and of the Catholic Archives Society at least (cf. cn. 1290—1298).
4. The Bishop/Superior should not destroy material bearing on sensitive and/or personal issues, lest he/she thereby obliterates evidence that could later be necessary for establishing the truth and silencing false accusations and unfounded suspicions. Such material should be kept apart from the accessible collection. However, matters of conscience marked as such and indicated for destruction by the owner or author may be destroyed at his/her death after they have been examined by the archivist. Such classification does not, however, prevent access to that material by the Bishop/Superior who holds office during that period (cf. cn. 489-490).
5. A time limit on access to material should be decided by the Bishop/Superior relying on information supplied by the archivist. Forty years from the death of an individual or from the date of any administrative act seems a useful guide.
6. Care should be taken to protect the legal copyright of all material in the archives. Microfilms should include a frame making it clear that publication cannot be made without special permission.
7. Good relations should be maintained with local record offices, which should be allowed to make and keep in their archives copies of local material more particularly when the original documents are moved out of the locality; but always with due regard to the protection of copyright.

8. An inventory or catalogue of all items should be kept (cf. cn. 486).

9. Unauthorised access to the archives should be strictly forbidden (cf. cn. 487).

10. As a general rule, no documents should be removed from the archives, and then only with the knowledge or authorisation of Bishop/Superior. Every archive should be provided with reprographic equipment to obviate the need for removing documents.

11. It should be brought to the notice of Superiors and colleagues that the archives receive not only documents but records of all kinds including books, photographic materials, recordings, both sound and visual, portraits, paintings and artefacts.

Ed. These draft clauses have been prepared by a Working Party of the Society appointed at the 1983 A.G.M. and will be discussed at the 1984 A.G.M. at Spode on 29—31 May. Comments will be welcomed and should be sent to the Rev. Anthony Dolan S.T.P., The Presbytery, 17 Nottingham Road, Ilkeston, Derby, DE7 5RF.

CATHOLIC ARCHIVES IN THE U.S.A.

A brief report on Catholic archives in the United States was published in Catholic Archives, No.2, 1982. Archivists with links with, or interest in, the States may care to be reminded that they can keep up to date with developments in the U.S.A. and Canada by subscribing to the Catholic Archives Newsletter which is published twice yearly, in January and July, in the form of duplicated sheets (average 6pp.) by the Archives of the Archdiocese of Boston, 2121 Commonwealth Avenue, Brighton, MA 02135, U.S.A. The U.S. subscription is 2 dollars yearly. The Newsletter is edited by James O'Toole, whose Guide to the Archives of the Archdiocese of Boston won the W.G. Leland Prize awarded in 1983 by the Society of American Archivists.

THE CATHOLIC ARCHIVES SOCIETY CONFERENCE, 1983

The fourth annual Conference was held at Spode House on 12—14 July and was attended by thirty-five religious and professional archivists, the former including the first Anglican archivist member, Sr Isabel Joy from Wantage, and the latter including Miss Shirley King, archivist to the University of Hobart.

On the first evening, 12 July, Sr Winifred Wickins, S.H.C.J. read a paper by Sr Ursula Blake, S.H.C.J. on 'Catholic Archives and the Canonisation of Saints', the text of which is printed in this issue. The following morning, 13 July, Fr Michael Clifton described the Southwark Diocesan Archives, his talk likewise being printed in this issue. The traditional practical session was then given by Mr D.V. Foulkes, Deputy County Archivist of Staffordshire, who brought along an original bundle of papers to demonstrate methods of classifying, cataloguing and storing correspondence, and answered members' questions on various practical archival problems.

During the afternoon of 13 July, members visited Selly Oak Colleges' Library, Birmingham, where Miss F. Williams, the Librarian, spoke briefly about the library itself and then showed members the special collections, allowing them to examine individual books and manuscripts of unique interest. Members were then officially welcomed by Professor Ferguson, President of Selly Oak Colleges, and, after refreshments, Miss Williams kindly introduced the resources of the modern section of the library. The evening session was devoted to discussing a draft prepared by Dom Placid Spearritt, O.S.B. of model clauses relating to archives for possible inclusion in the constitutions of a religious order or diocese. A Working Party was appointed to examine the draft in greater detail and to submit a revised version for discussion in 1984.

The talk on the final morning, 14 July, was given by Fr W. Wilfrid Gandy C.S.Sp. on the General Archives of the Holy Ghost Fathers housed in France. This talk is also printed in this issue. The conference ended with the Society's A.G.M. in which Dr L.A. Parker (retiring Chairman) reviewed the previous year. The Society now had about 170 individual and institutional full members and 90 additional subscribers to Catholic Archives. Further international contacts had been made. News of the activities of the Association of Religious Archivists of Ireland was warmly welcomed and reports of meetings of diocesan archivists indicated gratifying progress in this sphere of the Society's concern. Dr Parker was warmly thanked for steering the Society successfully through its formative years. Fr Francis Edwards S.J. was elected Chairman and Miss Judith Close, Vice-Chairman.

A full report of the Conference appears in CAS Newsletter, Vol. 2, No.2 (Autumn 1983), obtainable from the Hon. Secretary. The 1984 Conference will be held at Spode House, 29-31 May 1984.

EDITORIAL NOTES

The Catholic Archives Society was founded in 1979 to promote the care of all Catholic archives and particularly those of religious Orders and congregations and dioceses in the United Kingdom and Eire. During the last few years there has undoubtedly been more concern shown by congregations and dioceses in their history and in preserving the archives and other historical evidences recording it. Clear indications of this concern are the realisation that the original vocation of a religious congregation, the renewal of which is urged by Vatican II, is recorded principally in its archives, the provisions for the care of archives in rules and constitutions of congregations and in the new code of canon law, the encouragement given to archivists by the Conferences of Major Religious Superiors in both countries, and new appointments of archivists in several dioceses within recent years. The Society can perhaps claim some modest credit for assisting in this process of establishing the value of archives both to the bodies which created them and also to historical research generally.

Another objective of the Society is the attainment by religious archivists of professional standards as much in their own work as in the physical care of the archives. Occasional training seminars have been held to this end.

The Society also seeks to project its work to a wider audience through the yearly periodical Catholic Archives. The editorial policy is to publish articles concerning the archives of religious Orders and congregations, of dioceses, and indeed all significant records relating to the Church principally in the United Kingdom and Eire. By doing so, it is hoped to assist religious archivists by demonstrating how different archives have been created and how they may be properly arranged, classified, listed, indexed and, above all, used. Hopefully, too, the periodical will introduce Catholic archives to historical researchers as an additional, perhaps even unrecognised, source of evidence, and so to encourage the study of the history of the Catholic Church generally.

The Society congratulates the Association of Religious Archivists of Ireland on its excellent work. The Association was formed shortly after our own Society and although it circulates a Newsletter containing articles, it has not yet published a periodical. However, it has kindly encouraged the Society to include articles about Irish Catholic Archives in Catholic Archives, two such articles appearing in this issue.

Grateful thanks are accorded to the archivists, historians and other contributors to this edition. The Society wishes all religious archivists and others actively caring for Catholic archives every success in their work. Finally, the Hon. Editor invites archivists to submit articles for future publication.

THE ROMANCE OF THE ARCHIVIST: A PERSONAL VIEW

Sr Lillian O'Neill F.C.

The Daughters of the Cross were founded in Liege in 1833 by the Venerable Mere Marie Therese Haze. The Congregation, contemplative in spirit, undertakes every kind of apostolic work, teaching, nursing, work with the handicapped and all kinds of social work. It is widely spread in England, Ireland, Belgium, Germany, Italy, Pakistan, India, California, Zaire, Brazil.

I had been thirty years teaching history in Northern Ireland with three years' experience of the 'Troubles' and three of Vatican II and Renewal. From this active field of labour I was transferred to Chelsea in 1970 to prepare myself for literary work and historical research on the origins of the Congregation with a view to updating some of the more ponderous 'Lives' of our Founders which were not exactly our favourite refectory reading. They could not compare, for example, with The Deliverance of Sister Cecilia or The Man who got even with God!

Being a Belgian Congregation, the requisite Archives were kept in the Mother House in Liege, place of our origin and foundation. Thither I repaired in due course to see what I could find out about Sister Aloysia, niece of our Foundress, Mere Marie Therese Haze, as a follow-up to the short lives I had already attempted on this wonderful woman. We had all been captivated by her little niece Henriette who, at the age of eleven, had saved their little school from extinction by taking on the classes left without a teacher when two of the first Daughters of the Cross died from typhoid and overwork. Then one auspicious morning, someone sent me a typed extract from a letter of Sister Aloysia's (as Henriette ultimately became), and I was hooked! It was about a page of typescript, lively, humorous and exciting. 'What a pity', said I, 'that we haven't more of these letters'. Enquiries revealed that there were plenty more in the Archives at Maison Mere.

Aladdin's Cave could have contained no greater treasure than did that small room lined with carefully catalogued files. Little did I think that I would discover therein a close kinship with the people whose letters I read. In my romantic youth I had thought how wonderful it would be if we could really see and speak to people from a bygone age. Foolish and callow creature! How much closer could I get to them than by sharing their thoughts in this little room that seemed full of their personality? Aloysia's letters were the open door back to the early days of the Congregation, and particularly of the English Province.

Her accounts of their journey from Liege to Cheltenham where she made the first English foundation in 1863, not only revealed how much more human were these pioneers than we ever gave them credit for with their bubbling sense of adventure and ready sense of humour, but also gave us first-hand accounts and pictures of Victorian England. Speaking of London she wrote,

The first thing that attracted my attention as we approached this great city was the posters . . . They are the most curious and original things I have ever seen. They are not like those we have, but proper pictures, magnificently framed . . . We crossed one of the finest parts of the city to get to another station and it took us a good hour by carriage . . . we went through Hyde Park and crossed London Bridge which the Reverend Father told us was the finest in the world. It is larger than the whole of our Place St Lambert and has different lanes for pedestrians, carriages and 'trams'.

This was the first of many more rapturous letters. There were vivid pictures of Cheltenham, a city of colleges and students in gowns with colourful hoods and 'mortar boards'. We follow her in her frequent journeys back and forth to Liege — seasick every time; get involved with Sister Cephassie, a young sister given to practical jokes and who was always losing her voice, a grave source of anxiety to Aloysia — and to me. I kept on talking about it to my mystified companions. Alas, she died a few years later with what was probably a T.B. throat. Aloysia returned to Liege for the last time in 1869 and died the following year aged forty-seven. The account of her death I found in another section of the Archives, in the journals of Sister Eleanor, the first historian of the Congregation. I wept, feeling as though she had gone from my life. This was the extraordinary effect the Archives had on me. They gave me a sense of immediacy, of 'now-ness', if I may be permitted the expression.

This was to be my experience also in my next book, the life of an intrepid missionary, Sister Theodorine. The scene in the Archives changed and I was transported to India in the days of the Raj when Sister Theodorine and three companions went to Bombay in 1867. Such a kaleidoscope of shifting events moved before my eyes in her letters and journals — the poverty and suffering of millions of people, her incredible journeys across India from convents on the Bombay side to those in Calcutta, with unreliable 'bearers', brigands, lions, tigers, floods and 'duckings' in swollen rivers. In Theodorine's letters and journals, too, were to be found intimate and personal accounts of events that are often merely statistical if they reach the history books. Nineteenth-century text book histories of India, for example, had little more to say on the subject of the famines that decimated vast areas when the monsoons failed than that the development of the Railway system lessened their fatality by enabling grain to be brought in from other districts. The letters I found in the files on Bombay for the Great Famine of 1879 and the Great Plague of 1899 gave vivid and ghastly accounts of these terrible events. The account of the sisters' work with General Catacre and his heroic Plague Committee in 1899, sent me to the Archives of the Royal Army Museum in Chelsea where I found it fully documented in a Life of the General and generous reference to the heroism of the sisters — one of whom died at her post.

My next assignment was a short work on a German sister who, exiled from her own country during the Kulturkampf, continued Aloysia's work in England. This led me into historical wanderings in the Rhineland and I was to realise what it was like to live in Germany during that period of persecution. And I was there in the crowd to watch the expulsion of the sisters from more than one house! It was like a nineteenth-century version of an ancient Roman triumph. House after house had the same story to tell. Crowds of people keeping vigil at the convent the night before the actual departure; accompanying them to the station next morning, carrying banners, singing hymns as only Germans can sing; waving them off with tears, kneeling for their blessing.

In a drawer in the Archives I found and touched with reverence the forty Iron Crosses awarded to the sisters who had nursed the wounded soldiers in Bismarck's wars of 1867 and 1870 and which the sisters had worn as they were driven out of their country. But in the midst of tragedy, humour would keep breaking out and I read some very funny accounts of the cross-questioning of simple old sisters by pompous Prussian officials.

And all this richness, this wonder, this safe-keeping for future generations, we who use the material, owe to all those true archivists who collect, collate and catalogue and so preserve it. The quiet, ordered existence of our Sister Archivist must have been rudely shattered when this enthusiast breached the portals of her treasure house. However, she avowed she was delighted, for the whole object of her side of the work was to make it available for the researchers. In addition to the Annals, the Journals and letters already mentioned, there were letters from every house since the beginning of the Congregation recounting their day-to-day events, their joys and problems — all documented and filed in classified cabinets. I am never more aware of the Communion of Saints across the passage of the years, in Time and in Eternity, than when I am privileged to work in the Archives. There were registers, too, with the names of all the Daughters of the Cross from Mere Marie Therese herself in 1833 until the most newly professed sister 150 years later. There were exercise books into which scribes had painstakingly copied articles from early newspapers relative to the foundation and development of the Congregation and to its various works.

We may lament that the age of letter-writing is not what it was in those days but scrapbook and 'project' enthusiasts have their contribution to bequeath to the archives, and more wonderful still, 'tapes' recording events are now finding a special niche in the Archives. How wonderful a hundred years hence, for those who will actually hear those voices from the past.

The Archives are kept in the Mother House, rue hors chateau, Liege 4000, Belgium. They are not usually available for general consultation, but queries will always be sympathetically considered.

NOTE

Copies of the following published books on the Congregation are available from Sr Lillian O'Neill, F.C., Carshalton House, Carshalton, Surrey, at £2.00 plus postage: The Resplendent Sign (history of the Founders); Witness to Love (story of Sr Theodrine, foundress of the Indian Missions); Child of Benediction (short life of Sr Aloysia, foundress of the English Mission, £1.00, plus postage); and Heritage (text book history of the Congregation). A further book, Sister Emilie (1820-1859) is to be published shortly.

THE ARCHIVES OF THE IRISH PROVINCE OF
THE CONGREGATION OF THE MISSIONS (VINCENTIANS)
Thomas Davitt. C.M.

The Congregation

In 1625 after many years of effort, a lady of the French nobility, Marguerite de Gondi, together with her husband Philippe-Emmanuel, established a group of priests for the purpose of preaching missions to the thousands of tenants on the several large de Gondi estates. The group consisted of four priests, Vincent de Paul being the superior. The work soon spread beyond the de Gondi estates and the group rapidly increased in numbers. It became known as The Congregation of the Mission, hence C.M. after its members' names. In 1632 it moved its headquarters to the priory of St Lazare in Paris and its members subsequently became known in French as Les Lazaristes.

The Irish Province

In 1638 John Skyddie from Cork joined the Congregation in Paris and from then until Vincent's death in 1660 twenty-two other Irishmen joined, making the Irish the largest nationality in the Congregation after the French. Two Scotsmen and one Jerseyman joined during the same period. In 1646 Vincent sent eight of his community, priests, laybrother and students, to preach missions in Ireland; their work was hindered by the Cromwellian campaign and one of the group, a student named Thady Lee, was killed. Individual members of the Congregation subsequently worked in Ireland, the Scottish Highlands, the Hebrides and Orkney. Up to the French Revolution there was an unbroken Irish presence in the Congregation.

At the outbreak of the Revolution the Third Assistant to the Superior General was Edward Ferris, from Co. Kerry. He had to leave France with the General and they took up temporary residence in Rome. St Patrick's College, Maynooth, was founded in 1795 and staff was being recruited on the Continent. In 1798 Ferris was appointed the first Dean in the College; he later became Professor of Moral Theology. He died in Maynooth in 1809.

Around the time of Catholic Emancipation in Ireland (1829) some students in Maynooth decided that after ordination they would live together as a community and preach parish missions. The Dean of the College, Philip Dowley, who earlier on had had the same idea himself, agreed to be their superior. He was influenced in this by his reading of Ferris's copy of the Rules of the Congregation of the Mission which he found in Maynooth.

In 1833 this group opened a day-school in 34 Usher's Quay, Dublin, which they called St Vincent's Seminary. The following year they purchased a property in Castleknock, Co. Dublin, which they opened the following year as St Vincent's College. After much investigation into reasons for and against such a move they decided to become members of the Congregation of the Mission and in 1839 two of them went to Paris to be officially received; on their return to Castleknock with a French member of the Congregation the other members of the College community began their preparation for reception into the Congregation. But even before 1839 they had, by analogy with the Franciscans and Dominicans, coined for themselves the name Vincentians.

In 1847 they were invited to take charge of a school in Cork, and in 1853 were given a parish in Sheffield; three years later the Irish bishops asked them to take over the staffing of the Irish College in Paris; in 1859 they were given a parish in Lanark. In 1885 they established a house in Australia and in 1919 took over a parish in Peking, with commitments also in rural areas; in 1960 they began a new mission in Nigeria. In 1984 the Irish Province has ten houses in Ireland, nine in England, one in Scotland and three in Nigeria; Australia became a separate province in 1926. At the time of writing the Irish province has 152 members, not including those still in formation.

The Archives

The 1974 General Assembly of the Congregation requested each province not already doing so to organise and maintain provincial archives. In conformity with this, Fr James H. Murphy C.M. was appointed first archivist of the Irish province in 1975. He set about finding out what documentary material had been kept, or had survived, in the office of the Provincial. He put this into some sort of provisional order and was given a room in the newly-established Provincial House, 4 Cabra Road, Dublin 7. His work was facilitated by the facts that he also held the office of Provincial Secretary and had previously spent a period in Rome as a secretary to the Superior General. On several subsequent visits to Rome he was able to summarise or photocopy letters in the archives of the Superior General which were of Irish interest. He also visited most of the houses of the Irish province to ascertain what archival holdings each had, and to copy or summarise some of it. With the establishment of provincial archives much material previously held in individual houses was transferred to the provincial archives.

Fr Murphy was killed in April 1981 and I was appointed archivist. From September 1981 until September 1982 I was doing research in Paris. On my return to Dublin I began to familiarise myself with what was in our archives. From roughly June to December 1983 the Provincial House was in the hands of workmen, with several of the rooms, including the archives room, being destined for a change of use; this meant that for those six months I could not do any work there. At the end of the disruption I acquired a new, bigger and betterequipped archives room and in January 1984 I was able to begin a systematic re-locating of our holdings.

Outline description of our holdings:

- A) Correspondence and other documents from/to the administration of the Irish Province to/from the central administration of the C.M. in Paris (later transferred to Rome). This is in a series of boxes each covering a 25-year period, containing separate holders for each year.
- B) Correspondence and other documents relating to individual members of the Irish province. This is in a series of boxes containing separate holders for almost every deceased member of the Irish Province, arranged alphabetically.
- C) Correspondence and other documents relating to individual houses, or works, of the Irish Province. There is a separate box for each, though a number of houses/works have several boxes because of the amount of material.

The above A), B) and C) was the basic division established by Fr Murphy, and the separation of material into the three categories is now almost completed; the indexing/cataloguing of it which he began will be continued. The three categories are not mutually exclusive; the preponderant element in the letter or document determines its classification.

- D) Other material issued by the central C.M. administration in Paris or Rome for the entire congregation:
 - a) Circular letters of the Superiors General;
 - b) Decrees, and similar documents;
 - c) Rules, directories and similar administrative material.
- E) Material relating to the General Assemblies of the Congregation.
- F) Material relating to the Provincial Assemblies of the Irish Province.
- G) Material relating to the Domestic Assemblies of individual houses of the Irish Province.
- H) Minute Books of meetings of:
 - a) The Provincial and his Council (complete);
 - b) The former Domestic Councils of individual houses (incomplete);
 - c) Student societies in the houses of formation (apparently complete).
- I) Reports of canonical visitations of individual houses (incomplete).
- J) Registers/catalogues/lists of personnel:
 - a) Register of names of persons joining the Irish Province, giving place and date of birth, names of parents, dates of entry, vows and ordination and some other details. (Not always faithfully filled in in the past);

- b) A card-index similar to the above, with much added detail in most cases;
 - c) Register of Irish members of the C.M. before the French Revolution, with as much detail on each as it has been possible to collect (typescript);
 - d) Register of members of C.M. of Irish birth but not of Irish Province in (approximately) the first half of the nineteenth century, with as much detail on each as it has been possible to collect (typescript);
 - e) Catalogue du personnel de la C.M. 1625—1800 (printed, Paris 1911);
 - f) Corrigenda for e); (24 pages of photocopied typescript);
 - g) Notices bibliographiques des écrivains de la C.M. (printed, Paris 1878).
- K) Manuscript accounts of:
- a) Early history of the Province;
 - b) Lives of some early members of the Province;
 - c) Some missions of the early years of the Province.
- L) Manuscript books of sermons and conferences by various priests of the Province, mainly nineteenth century.
- M) Various account, and other financial, books.
- N) Unpublished theses and other studies of C.M. interest, mainly by members of the Province.
- O) C.M. periodicals:
- a) Annates de la Congregation de la Mission. For most of its existence this was a quarterly. It ran from 1834 until 1963. Our archives have a complete run of it, one of only about six complete runs in existence.
 - b) Vincentiana: a multilingual successor to the Annates, appearing six times a year. Complete up to current issue.
 - c) Colloque: The Journal of the Irish Province, appearing twice a year. Complete from first issue in 1979 to current issue.
 - d) Evangelizare: A magazine produced by the students of the Province from 1947 until 1969, usually twice a year. Complete run.
- (All four contain much historical material on the C.M. and individual members, as well as reporting events contemporaneous with each issue, including obituary notices).
- P) Printed books: There is a fairly good collection of books on St Vincent, the history of the C.M., members of the C.M., and allied topics. I am attempting to acquire a copy of each book published by members of

THINGS OLD AND NEW:

THE ARCHIVES OF PRINKNASH ABBEY

Dom Hildebrand Flint O.S.B.

The Benedictines of Caldey was written by Peter Anson to commemorate the Silver Jubilee of the conversion of the Caldey community in 1913. He began work in 1937 and kept in close touch with our founder who was in Canada. On 11 January 1938 he wrote that there was 'a lack of any orderly method in the keeping of archives . . . I fear a vast amount of stuff must have been destroyed at Caldey'.

We know of two occasions when papers were burned before we left the island, and it is alleged that most of the Llanthony archives were involved in the first batch though the registers of baptisms and professions have been preserved. Since very few of the Anglican records are available, it seems reasonable to assume that they were burned as well.

Although our archives still await a full examination and classification, it is clear that there is a lot of information available about the early history of the community, mainly in the form of subsequent letters and diaries in which the writers recall the various events in which they took part, but there are also contemporary photographs, newspaper cuttings and minute books.

The earliest document is a book dated 1895 in which Brother Aelred Carlyle wrote out his idea of a threefold community of 'The English Order of Saint Benedict' (see PAX 345/62) and very full Constitutions for the Oblate Brothers with whom he had been connected for the previous four years. The date given in The Benedictine Yearbook is 1896 but it was not until 1902 that in the words of PAX 3/77 the community 'began to be really firmly welded together'.

We have a number of books (Tosti's Saint Benedict and At the Gates of the Sanctuary for instance) which bear the stamp of The Priory, Isle-of-Dogs, and there are a few photographs taken of groups in those days of 1896—8. The earliest press cuttings about the community date from the time at Guiting in 1898, and there is an exercise book recording the small sums spent there and at Great Titchfield Street. The embryo community then went to Milton Abbas where they started to keep the annals.

After their arrival at Painsthorpe, reports began to appear frequently in the papers; a pamphlet A Benedictine Revival was issued in 1903 and this was followed by a larger one The Benedictines of Caldey Island (easily confused with Anson's title) which was actually written at Painsthorpe before the return to Caldey became possible, and then brought up to date for publishing after the move in 1906. It included much material which had already appeared in PAX from 1904 onwards. We have quite a number of photographs from Painsthorpe, and the first of a continuous series of Visitors' Books was begun there in 1905.

Although the annals are missing between 1903 and 1915, we can refer to the Community Letters written by the Abbot in PAX and to Fasciculi, notes about the community, monastery and neighbourhood. From 1912 there are minutes of the Abbot's Council and chapter meetings. A few of the official letter files have survived, and there is also the Book of Benefactors to which reference can be made. We have, too, a very full set of account books which will yield much information about the farm, quarries and other activities. Several insurance policies give particulars of the vessels owned by the community, the boilers installed in the abbey, tree-planting and the cattle.

From the foregoing it will be apparent that even if there may be some dust among the papers, working in our archives can be fascinating and rewarding for someone with sufficient knowledge of our history to be able to fit facts into their context.

Our aim may differ from that of professional archivists who seem to regard each bundle of documents as an original bundle to be kept as it comes without arrangement; documents have to be traced by a central index. When our classification list was shown to a trained archivist he objected that it was putting the documents into historical categories. That is just what it was intended to do because that is the way we are using them.

Several of those who were received into the Church with the community on Saint Aelred's Day 1913 used to exchange letters in later years, noting anniversaries and reminiscing about those and earlier days. Much of this correspondence was passed to Dom Michael Hanbury when he was writing the memoir of Abbot Aelred which has never been published. In addition, we have nearly all the letters received by our founder during his thirty years in Canada and many of his replies. Peter Anson played a big part in all this correspondence, and from 1950 until his death in 1975 he wrote to Dom Michael more than once each week, mostly with reference to our history. These letters all await indexing.

Dom Michael's weekly letters to his mother have been preserved and they are full of interesting observations about life on Caldey, at Prinknash and at Bigsweir, including two world wars. His diaries for 1911 and 1914 contain little more than brief entries of appointments, but from 1928 to 1982 he conscientiously noted how he was engaged, what the weather was like, and what letters he had received and sent. Reference was made to these diaries recently to check the time spent threshing during the war.

Dom Michael's record of correspondence was probably copied from Father Aelred. Starting in 1929 the latter kept a very full diary. There are thirteen volumes with one page for each day all closely written (the pages are the same size as PAX). Then he typed on quarto sheets (usually one page every day) up to the end of 1952. During his last three years he reverted to the bound books, but entries became spasmodic. In 1937 he had been made chaplain of Vancouver City Gaol, port chaplain, editor of the diocesan paper and warden of a home for the elderly. During the next fourteen years he kept additional diaries. There is for each year a small desk diary used solely for registering correspondence, and a foolscap one in which he recorded interviews with the men in his care, items they needed, family problems, jobs arranged for them. Some of these men or their families later kept in touch with him by letter.

His correspondence for the Canadian years has been bundled and labelled by Dom Michael: it fills fifteen standard archive boxes. There are a further five boxes full of family letters and correspondence with his monastic brethren.

Among Fr Aelred's personal letters are a few from the English Carthusian prior of Miraflores, Dom Edmund Gurdon. He was a cousin of Dom Michael Hanbury with whom he corresponded for over twenty years about religious vocations, spiritual writers, various shrines, the situation in Spain before the Civil War, and on family matters. This led to Dom Michael collecting information about the Gurdon family which is now being used by the College of Heralds to prove a genealogical table. The Carthusian's letters to another cousin, Dame Teresa Pawle, are also in our keeping. Dom Edmund knew Mrs Waterton who presented us with the statue now known as Our Lady of Prinknash.

The Hanbury Collection includes letters from the architects Comper and Fra Jerome (J.C. Hawes). There are many from Gwendolen Greene who sent him also the letters she had received from Algar Thorold. Douglas Woodruff was another cousin, and his letters contain interesting insights on contemporary events. Dom Michael corresponded widely in connection with the history of Prinknash, Dom Augustine Baker, the ramifications of his own family, the life of our founder and the relevance of von Hugel, and he contributed articles on these subjects to various journals. During his thirty-three years as editor of PAX, using his cell as an office, the official correspondence became integrated with his private letters.

We have also been given some letters from Father Vincent McNabb O.P. to his sister, and two box-files of papers belonging to Monsignor Stapleton Barnes concerning the Holy Shroud.

All Frank Broadbent's files on the new abbey and a complete set of drawings are in our keeping; there are twenty large cylinders full of drawings and eight boxes of files. In addition, Father Fabian Binyon took photographs of the details of the actual work which amount to about fifteen hundred transparencies so that there is a very full record of the building.

Something old, something new . . . it may come as a surprise to read that recent accessions include the film schedule of The Garden of Inheritance shown by the BBC in January 1984, and a copy of the plainsong script used at the Calne Festival in June: not much dust on those!

It is to Father Fabian that the credit must go for obtaining a separate archive room. Admittedly it is only 12 feet by 8 feet and already overcrowded, but it is a start.

Chambers' Cyclopaedia in 1753 included the quotation that 'under the emperors the Archivist was an officer of great dignity'. Alas! the days of empire are over. There is in fact no mention of an archivist being appointed until recently. Dom Alberic Styles acted in that capacity while he was Abbot's Secretary, and after his death in 1969 Dom Alban Lotaud acted in the dual capacity. Dom Fabian became archivist in 1979 but in the following year he went to Rome where his duties include the curial archives of our Congregation.

In the Old House the room where the Abbot's Secretary worked was known as the PAX Office, and there were kept some of our archives on the shelves, in one of two filing cabinets or a steel cupboard. There were more in the Cellarer's store which consisted mainly of the effects of deceased brethren but also included a film (of which more anon). In a cupboard on a landing the Carlyle and Upson diaries were kept. Anson's drawings of all the places we had dwelt in and W. Heath Robinson's ideas of how to build the new one were in an oak chest. Dom Mark Milner had locked up all the account books and receipts in the mock minstrels' gallery which had been turned into a dark-room. Dom Michael had an extensive collection of his own. Trunks and suitcases were used to hold photographs and letters and press cuttings.

When in 1972 we moved into the new building there was no special storage for the archives apart from a large cupboard by the abbot's office. The filing cabinets went into the secretary's office and everything else was stacked in a large store by the infirmary together with surplus library books and unwanted furniture. This Black Hole, (so called because it has no windows) is open to anyone, and though Father Alban had labelled all the cases and trunks, the contents became disarranged. Archives was a joke-word.

During 1979, when cells were being rearranged to provide an extra classroom for the students, Father Fabian obtained a suitably secluded room in which to keep the archives of which he was now in charge. He had for some years been collecting items to resuscitate our museum, and had rescued as well some documents which were in danger of destruction. He was now able to assemble these and the cases from the Black Hole in their own store.

Among the items he rescued was a 35mm cine film in a biscuit tin — the one referred to by Peter Wire in last winter's PAX. It was made in July 1920 by Gaumont (later Gaumont-British, and now Rank) and because the camera was cranked by hand the speed is adjustable. In those days most cine work was done with nitrate film which becomes explosive with age, and a few years ago a visitor from the BBC in Cardiff recognised the danger and took our film away to a special vault. When Harlech TV was making the programme They Came to an Island which included Abbot Aelred, they were referred to this vintage film and took it to Rank's to have a safe copy made.

Nobody knew when it might explode and to arrange special cover a snippet was taken to an insurance company where it was left on a desk in ignorance of the danger. Meanwhile the technicians decided to waste no time and made copies. The nitrate sample did explode and started a fire in the insurer's office, so the old film was taken out to the car park and destroyed with the fire brigade standing by. We now have a safe copy of this film which had been made seven years after the Conversion and shows our brethren in 1920.

We have other films which were shot by Abbot Wilfrid to record various activities and celebrations, and Abbey Builders of the Twentieth Century which was made by him about the Goodhart Rendel design in 1939. These are still in use and have not yet been handed over to the archivist.

Six months after he had rejoined us at Prinknash, Father Aelred recorded a short message for the daughter-houses at Farnborough and Pluscarden. A longer talk was recorded specially which gave his impressions of the community he had founded — he described himself as a 'returned empty'. Unfortunately this second tape is a copy and there are some gaps. The only other recording in the archives is a cassette made at a talk by someone who had known Father Aelred in Canada.

Father Fabian not only arranged a room but also handed to his successor a copy of Signum (an information service for religious) which dealt with keeping archives. This led to contacts with the provincial archivists of the Society of the Sacred Heart and the Order of Preachers, and with the Catholic Archives Society. Sister Grace Hammond, Father Bede Bailey and Mr Robin Gard all gave good advice and encouragement as a result of which our County Archivist was consulted. Mr D.J.A. Smith came to look at our archives and made suggestions, he showed us how his Record Office was run and helped us to obtain proper storage boxes. Brother Hildebrand had noticed that the dimensions of the ideal box were very close to those of tomato boxes, so he had promptly invested in a number and was using them when Father Bede O.P. sounded a note of warning: samples were tested at the Gloucestershire Record Office and found to contain acid which would discolour paper and make it brittle. The tomato boxes were passed to the garden to be used for tomatoes and replaced by special boxes stacked on steel racking.

At present, all we have been able to do is to preserve records by saving them from loss or destruction, keeping them in suitable conditions, and controlling access; their arrangement and indexing have yet to be undertaken. Two systems of classification have been worked out and discarded as too academic.

The system finally adopted is based on what we have and it can be expanded to include anything we may get. With an eye to future use of a computer, a three-digit code has been chosen for the main subjects, and each can be extended indefinitely by adding figures or letters: thus

136 is the code for External Relations,

136/4 for Pilgrimages, Jubilees etc.,

136/4/JP2 could be used for the Papal visit when the documents are handed over. The full list is given as an appendix.

Most of the subjects need no explanation. The first documents to be classified were the Broadbent Collection and the boxes are all marked P53 with a distinguishing letter from A to G under one of the discarded systems. Bigsweir and Millichope were additional houses leased temporarily to relieve congestion when the old house at Prinknash was overflowing, but other places had also been considered (116/5), and we were approached by a group which hoped to re-establish a Catholic community at Fountains Abbey. 'The Origines' is the name adopted by those who took part in the Conversion of 1913, and 'Anglicans' denotes those who did not come over. The Catalogue (133) is the official list of the Benedictine Confederation. A sub-section of 138 contains letters which are of interest as autographs of eminent people. The newspaper cuttings include articles expressing different shades of opinion in the Church of England at the beginning of this century.

This is only an interim report. We hope to get down to the business of classification and indexing in the near future, and there will be many interesting tales to tell.

NOTE

This article was first published in PAX, No. 359, Autumn 1984 and is reprinted by kind permission of the author and Hon. Editor.

PAX

Eighty years ago PAX was first published to keep our friends in touch with the community. It also aimed to spread knowledge of the religious life, liturgy and, later, ecumenism. The effort required to produce the magazine has for some time been out of proportion to the effect it can produce in this unliturgical age when liturgy and ecumenism are catered for by special journals.

After the Winter Number 1984, PAX will continue as a simple newsletter published quarterly. An index to the contents of the previous 360 issues is well on the way to completion, and after that the editor hopes to spend more time working on the archives.

THE GLASGOW ARCHDIOCESAN ARCHIVE

Mary McHugh

At present, the task of indexing the Glasgow Archdiocesan Archive is not yet complete. However, sufficient has been carried out to prove of interest to other archivists, and informative for potential researchers. What follows then is in the nature of an interim report indicating some of what the Archive contains in relation to the outline history of the Archdiocese, and demonstrating the organisational and indexing systems adopted.

Outline History

The modern history of the Archdiocese of Glasgow began on 4 March 1878 when, as one of the first acts of his pontificate, Pope Leo XIII issued the Letters Apostolic Ex Supremo Apostolatus Apice restoring the Catholic Hierarchy to Scotland after a lapse of more than three centuries. The restored Archdiocese included within its territory the city of Glasgow, the counties of Dunbartonshire, Lanarkshire, Renfrewshire, and that part of Ayrshire (north of the Lugton Water, flowing into the River Gamock), East Kilpatrick and Baldernock in Stirlingshire, and the islands of Greater and Lesser Cumbrae. However, the Archdiocese did not become a regular ecclesiastical province until 1947—8 with the creation of the two suffragan sees of Paisley, which embraces the old county of Renfrew, and Motherwell comprising the former county of Lanark. The Archdiocese of Glasgow itself is now confined mainly to the city of Glasgow and the former county of Dunbarton.¹ In the course of this transformation, the area of Ayrshire, north of the Lugton Water, was transferred to the diocese of Galloway. As a result, that diocese became geographically unbalanced, with its Cathedral in Dumfries, and the bulk of its Catholic population in Ayrshire some seventy miles distant. When the Cathedral of St Andrew in Dumfries suffered a disastrous fire in 1962, the opportunity was taken to correct this imbalance and the cathedral dignity was transferred to the church of the Good Shepherd in the town of Ayr.²

The first Archbishop of Glasgow in the restored hierarchy, and a man who left a lasting influence on the modern Archdiocese, was Charles Petre Eyre, who was born at York on 17 November 1817, the third son of (Papal) Count John Lewis Eyre by his first wife, Sarah Parker. Eyre came to Glasgow, after serving as Vicar-General of the diocese of Hexham and Newcastle, as early as 1868—9, having been appointed Apostolic Delegate to Scotland on 11 December 1868; consecrated titular Archbishop of Anazarba, 31 January 1869; and appointed Apostolic Administrator of the Western District, 16 April 1869.

First Archbishop of Glasgow in the Restored Hierarchy, 1878—1902

Only a few of the items in the Archive pre-date Eyre's arrival in Glasgow. Among these are the Paisley Papers, reaching back to 1808, which, as their name suggests, deal with the development of Catholicism in the town of Paisley. The Archive also possesses correspondence relating to Highland emigration,crofting, and landlords, between 1816—20; and copies of the papers in a court case brought by Bishop Andrew Scott, who later became coadjutor, and then Vicar Apostolic, of the Western District, against McGavigan, a Protestant printer, and others, also survive, as does some of Scott's general correspondence. Western District papers which remain in Glasgow include some General Correspondence; the Diaries of Bishop John Murdoch, Vicar Apostolic of the Western District from 1853 to 1865; Property Papers; Legal and Financial Accounts; and bound Registers, some containing interesting statistics on the various missions. In general, though, the bulk of the Western District Papers can be found at the Scottish Catholic Archive, Columba House, Edinburgh. Copies of the relevant indexes can be consulted in the Archdiocesan Archive.

When Charles Eyre arrived in Glasgow, one of his first tasks was to heal the rift which had emerged between sections of the native Scots Catholics, and their Irish immigrant brethren, in the Western District. This 'Scoto-Irish' dispute found most notable, or perhaps notorious, expression in the columns of the Free Press newspaper, copies of which are kept at the Mitchell Library, Glasgow, and dissension arose over the appointment of an Irish cleric, Dr James Lynch, as coadjutor to Bishop John Gray in the Western District. The charges were also made by some of the Irish clergy that the affairs of the District were mismanaged, and that Irish priests always received the poorest missions. Relevant material held in the Archive includes a box entitled 'Scoto-Irish Troubles, 1860—9', which contains, among other items, various Memorials stating their case prepared by some of the Irish clergy; and a box containing related items on the 'Apostolic Visitation of 1867', by Archbishop, later Cardinal, Henry Manning, a visit which contributed considerably to a resolution of the dispute. Eyre came to the West partly as a result of Manning's recommendations, but also because George Errington, a former bishop of Plymouth and coadjutor in Westminster, to whom the Glasgow appointment had initially been offered, declined to take it.

Eyre's second principal duty was to prepare the ground for the Restoration of the Catholic Hierarchy to Scotland. Papers relevant to this topic are contained in the box of the same title, and include a draft of the Principal Report made by the Vicars, and Administrator, Apostolic to the Sacred Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith (de Propaganda Fide). The surviving correspondence between the three bishops also highlights the disagreements which arose, mainly between John MacDonald, Vicar Apostolic of the Northern District, and later Bishop of Aberdeen in the restored Hierarchy, and his two colleagues, Archbishop Eyre, and Bishop John Strain, Vicar Apostolic of the Eastern District and subsequently Archbishop of St Andrews and Edinburgh. For some considerable time, MacDonald disputed the need for a territorial hierarchy, preferring instead the continuation of three Vicariates, and asserting that most, if not all, of his clergy thought likewise. MacDonald's misgivings notwithstanding, the Scottish Catholic Hierarchy was restored, and the process was accomplished with surprisingly little Protestant opposition.

Eyre's long tenure of office from 1868 till his death in 1902, a period of thirty-four years, has left a considerable amount of correspondence, much of it concerned with diocesan and hierarchy business, but also some relating to his personal and family affairs. Among the former are Minutes of the Bishops' Meetings from 1870 to 1901, Wet Copy Letter Books beginning in the 1880s, a bundle of letters commencing in 1896, and Education Papers from 1869 to 1901. His personal papers include Sermons, Historical Essays, Diaries from 1871 to 1902, College Notes and Lectures, while other boxes are simply entitled 'Personal' and 'Family' Papers, or 'Financial' Papers. Documents relating to a legal wrangle over his late father's will also survive, and two boxes entitled 'Newcastle Papers' contain items which he brought with him when he left the diocese of Hexham and Newcastle, and which shed light on his life and work there. In addition, on 11 November 1880, on the death of his father, Eyre succeeded to the title of Count of the Lateran Hall and Apostolic Palace.

The chief events of his long episcopate may be summarised as follows: the foundation of deaneries for the Western District in July 1869 and, at the same date, the issue of the Regulations for the District, which were amended from time to time, the last edition being in November 1897. On 13 January 1884, the Cathedral Chapter was erected, while the first Missionary Rectors were appointed in September 1888. Diocesan Synods were held in October 1881, October 1888, and in November 1897, and the records of their proceedings are retained in the Archive, as are papers relating to the national Synod held at Fort Augustus in 1886. In addition, the Minute Books of the Cathedral Chapter from its foundation in 1884 to 2 December 1933, have recently been deposited in the Archive.

Eyre's two most notable achievements as Archbishop however, were the foundation of the Archdiocesan Seminary, St Peter's College, in 1874, and the establishment of a teacher-training college in 1896; events remembered by his former Secretary, and successor as Archbishop, John Aloysius Maguire, in his Sermon at the Month's Mind Mass for his late predecessor. Maguire recalled the building of St Peter's College at a cost of £40,000, and how, at a time when his health was already beginning to finally fail, Archbishop Eyre had encouraged the beginnings of a training college, (Notre Dame — now St Andrew's College, Bearsden), at Dowanhill. The first Sisters, under the leadership of Sr Mary of St Wilfrid (Mary Adela Lescher), came from the Notre Dame congregation at Mount Pleasant, Liverpool. A printed history of the work of Sr Mary of St Wilfrid in Glasgow, written by Sister Dorothy Gillies (Sister John Bosco S.N.D.), from the Notre Dame Archives (British Province), is kept in the Archdiocesan Archive. Documents on the history of St Peter's College contained in the Archive include, in addition to administrative correspondence, details of the College Accounts, Reports on Students, and information regarding the College's various premises over the century. The Archive also contains records of Glasgow students who studied for the priesthood in the Scottish Junior Seminary at Blairs, near Aberdeen, and at senior seminaries in Ireland, Italy, France, Spain and Belgium, including Wexford, the Scots College in Rome, St Sulpice in Paris, and the Royal Scots College in Valladolid.

In spite of his duties as Archbishop, Eyre still found time to write items such as The Children of the Bible, Leaflet Lives of Scottish Saints, Papers on the old Cathedral of Glasgow, and many Pastorals and Statistical Notes on the Church in Scotland, with special reference to his Archdiocese of Glasgow. His best known publication, though, was his History of St Cuthbert, which he wrote while first stationed at St Mary's, Newcastle-on-Tyne from 1843 to 1849 (1849, 3rd edition 1887). A copy of this can be found at Columba House. A few notes, and other materials, such as a printing block from the frontispiece of the book, are the only relevant items available in the Archdiocesan Archive.

The Archdiocese of Glasgow enjoyed a period of remarkable growth, in terms of numbers of clergy, missions, and people, throughout Eyre's rule. When he first arrived in 1869, he had a total of 74 priests at his disposal, to serve (exclusive of stations), 40 permanent missions. By the time of his death in 1902, priests numbered 234; missions 82; and schools, too, were growing in number and quality. Baptisms administered increased from 8,519 in 1867, to 13,414 in 1900, while between 1867 and 1902 the Catholic population of the Western District, and later the Archdiocese, rose by over one hundred thousand. Much of this increase can be attributed to the continued effects of Irish immigration. In administration, he established a Board of Finance to oversee the temporal affairs of the Archdiocese, and he promoted religious inspection of the Catholic Voluntary Schools.³

The year 1902 saw not only Archbishop Eyre's death, but also that of Canon Michael Condon. A native of Craves, Coolcappa, Co. Limerick, Condon was a keen historian of his various parishes in the city of Glasgow and the old county of Argyll, and of the history of Scotland. As a result, his well-kept Diaries provide a valuable insight into the life of a nineteenth-century priest in the West of Scotland. Never one to shirk controversy, he intervened, and comments upon, the Scoto-Irish dispute of the 1860s. Nonetheless, he was more than a controversialist. Indeed, in the opinion of Rev. Bernard Canning, archivist of Paisley diocese, Condon was 'one of the most outstanding Irish-born priests to serve in Scotland'.⁴ In January 1884, he became one of the first Canons of the Cathedral Chapter. He died on 17 June 1902, and is buried in St Peter's cemetery, Dalbeth, in the east end of Glasgow. Three large photograph albums, containing pictures of many nineteenth-century priests, with a short biography of each on the reverse side, as well as early photos of some of the nineteenth-century churches, are also believed to have belonged to Condon, who served as a priest for just less than fifty-seven years, from 1845 to 1902.

A policy to which Eyre was deeply committed involved the breaking-up of over-large missions, like St Patrick's, Anderston, which he regarded as almost constituting dioceses in themselves. Condon, whose last parish was the same St Patrick's, would probably have supported such an assertion, and Eyre's successor, Archbishop Maguire, also appeared to agree. New missions were created at St Luke's, Glasgow, in 1905, and at Carntyne a year later. Also in 1906, a new church was erected at Linwood (now in Paisley diocese); St Peter's College at its new site at New Kilpatrick celebrated the opening of the college chapel; Dairy in Ayrshire (now in Galloway diocese) had a new school opened, while the city itself saw the opening of Nazareth House. In the same year, a new chapel-school opened at Tollcross, to be followed in 1907 by a new mission of St Roch's, Garngad. 1908 saw increasing activity, with two churches being opened at Glenboig, and at Burnbank, Hamilton, (both now in Motherwell diocese). A new church was opened at Dalmuir in 1909, while 1911 saw the opening of the new Home for Working Girls at Barrhead (now in Paisley diocese), the opening of Holy Cross Church, Glasgow, and that of the new chapel of the Little Sisters of the Poor at Garngadhill, Glasgow.

The combination of the Great War from 1914 to 1918 and Archbishop Maguire's illness led to a slowing up in Catholic activities. Maguire's increasing incapacity was a sad decline for a man who had served as Eyre's secretary for over twenty years, had been given charge of St Peter's, Partick, in 1883, and became a very young Vicar General of the Archdiocese, at the age of thirty-four, in 1885. In 1893 he became an equally young Provost of the Cathedral Chapter, and when, a year later, it became necessary to provide Archbishop Eyre with an auxiliary bishop, John Maguire seemed the natural choice. In Eyre's declining years, Maguire had to fulfil many of his public engagements such as the opening of St Saviour's, Govan, in 1900; preaching at the opening of schools at Holy Cross, Glasgow, and Whiterigg, Airdrie (now in Motherwell diocese); and at the opening of the Church of Our Lady of Good Aid, Motherwell, now the Cathedral of that diocese.

By 1912 it had become necessary to provide Maguire himself with a coadjutor-Archbishop, the Right Rev. Donald Mackintosh of St Margaret's, Kinning Park, to assist in administering the diocese. Even so, the bulk of diocesan business increasingly devolved on to the Vicar General, and Diocesan Secretary, Mgr John Canon Ritchie. Some of Ritchie's Personal Papers survive, but the most important of his other documents retained in the Archive concern his intervention in the vigorous educational debate which culminated in the Education (Scotland) Act of 1918. The Archdiocese of Glasgow, alone of the Scottish dioceses, remained reluctant to accept that Act, an opinion which Ritchie certainly shared. It is not clear what was the opinion of an increasingly feeble Archbishop Maguire.

The growing confusion over the running of the Archdiocese was added to by the death, on 8 October 1919, of the coadjutor, Mgr Mackintosh, titular Archbishop of Chersona. Archbishop Maguire himself died just over one year later, on 20 October 1920, and there followed a delay of almost two full years before his successor was appointed. The reason for the delay is not altogether clear, but in the interim, from 12 June 1920 to 21 May 1922, John Toner, Bishop of Dunkeld, who had begun his priestly career in the West of Scotland, served as Apostolic Administrator of the vacant Archdiocese. Two boxes of 'Education Papers — DUNKELD — (Bishop Toner)' remain the Archive. Material relating to the late Archbishop Maguire includes the General Correspondence of his rule, a box labelled 'Personal Papers', and a considerable number of documents on education.

On 21 May 1922, in Rome, Maguire's successor, Donald Mackintosh, (not to be confused with his predecessor of the same name), was consecrated Archbishop of Glasgow by Cajetan de Lai, Cardinal Bishop of Sabina, assisted by Donald Martin, Bishop of Argyll and the Isles, and Henry Grey Graham, Auxiliary Bishop of St Andrews and Edinburgh, and a convert to Catholicism, having first served as a Church of Scotland minister. The confusion over the two Mackintoshes is not helped by the fact that both were natives of Inverness-shire, the Coadjutor of Bohuntine, and the latter of Glasnacardoch.

The second Donald Mackintosh began his task as Archbishop of Glasgow with certain disadvantages. Having served as Vice Rector (1901—13) and then Rector (1913—22) of the Scots College, Rome, virtually since his ordination on 1 November 1900, he lacked personal experience of parish work, and was perhaps less than familiar with the City of Glasgow itself, or with the other industrial towns of the neighbourhood. Even so, Mackintosh quickly began to tackle the detailed work of centralising and organising the finances of the Archdiocese, which in the aftermath of the 1918 Act had been rented to the various ad hoc, and then local, Education Authorities, were finally sold. The various stages of the settlement of the Catholic schools question can be researched by using Archival material which includes more than twenty boxes of Education Papers, and the Minute Books of the Diocesan Education Board from 1918 to 1930. The revenue obtained from the sale of the schools, which contributed to a more stable financial position, also provided for a programme of expansion which included the building of between twenty and thirty new churches.

A concern with education was also reflected in the foundation of a Catholic chaplaincy at Glasgow University, and in the improvements made in religious education provision for prospective male Catholic teachers. A restatement of the whole local ecclesiastical law also greatly occupied Archbishop Mackintosh's attention during what proved to be his last illness. He died at Bearsdon on 8 December 1943, and the panegyric at his funeral was preached by Donald Alphonsus Campbell, Bishop of Argyll and the Isles, who would be his successor as Archbishop of Glasgow.

Donald A. Campbell was the third successive Archbishop in Glasgow to be a native of Inverness-shire. In fact, he came originally from Bohuntine, and was a nephew of the first Donald Mackintosh, the Co-adjutor. Ordained priest at Rome on 3 April 1920, Campbell served first in St Andrew's Cathedral, Glasgow, and St Mary's Cathedral, Aberdeen, before being recalled to his own diocese of Argyll and the Isles, where he served as assistant at Rothesay and Roy Bridge before becoming parish priest at Castlebay on Barra, and later at Daliburgh on South Uist. In 1939 he succeeded another relative, Bishop Donald Martin, as Bishop of Argyll and the Isles, before, in 1945, being translated to the Archdiocese in which his late uncle had served.

Archbishop Campbell had the good fortune to inherit an Archdiocese free from external debt, and he often acknowledged his gratitude for the efforts made by his immediate predecessor. Like Eyre before him, Campbell made clear his desire to create smaller parish units, and, at the same time, to establish the necessary new parishes⁵ in the many large post-war housing estates which were springing up. Thus, between 1945 and 1963, forty-one new parishes were established within the Archdiocese, all with new churches, and thirteen other new churches were built in existing parishes. Fourteen new parishes were also set up in those areas which, after the division of the Archdiocese, in 1948, would form the two new suffragan sees of Paisley and Motherwell. Like his predecessor, John A. Maguire, Archbishop Campbell had a great love for the Virgin Mary, and for Lourdes, and it was perhaps appropriate that the last church he blessed, and also consecrated, only a month before he died in Lourdes, was the church dedicated to the Immaculate Conception, in Maryhill. The Souvenir Booklets for the opening of many of these churches, and for the jubilees of others, are kept in the Archive, as are papers relating to the division of the Archdiocese in 1947—8.

Archbishop Campbell also encouraged the establishment of hospitals in Govan, Clydebank and Langside, and he benefitted the Foreign Missions by allowing the establishment of houses for the Mill Hill Fathers, the Xaverian Fathers, and, for women, the Franciscan Missionaries of Mary, and the Sisters of St Joseph of Cluny. In addition, a new Carmelite Monastery was opened in Kirkintilloch, while the Dominican Monastery of the Perpetual Rosary was set up in Pollokshields. Correspondence relating to these religious Orders and to others, including the Sisters of Mercy, the Marist Brothers and the Society of Jesus, forms part of the Archive.

Education, both lay and clerical, also received the Archbishop's attention. Turnbull Hall, (named after the bishop who had obtained, in 1451, the charter establishing Glasgow University), was developed as the new University Catholic Chaplaincy, and Archbishop Campbell also made available the ground necessary for the building of the new Notre Dame (now St Andrew's) College of Education, at a time when expansion in the schools created a demand for trained Catholic teachers.

In the sphere of clerical education, Campbell's saddest loss as Archbishop was the total destruction by fire of the senior seminary, St Peter's College, Bearsden, in 1946. With the demands, and need, for new churches, the provision of a new college was inevitably a slow process, even though Campbell had firmly declared his intention to erect the Seminary, at the Fifth Diocesan Synod held in Glasgow in 1949. He did live to cut the first sod for the new building at Cardross, near Helensburgh, but died in 1963, three years before it opened. The College later moved again, in 1980, to Newlands in Glasgow. Archbishop Campbell also assisted, in the early 1960s, at the laying of the foundation stone of the new Scots College in Rome, and he was also instrumental in the re-opening of the Royal Scots College in Valladolid, which had initially been closed in the aftermath of the Spanish Civil War. The buildings of St Vincent's College, Langbank, (now used as a Pastoral and Holiday Retreat Centre), given to him by the St Vincent de Paul Society, were eventually used by the Scottish Hierarchy to house boys during their first two years in the Junior Seminary, a function which they fulfilled for just under twenty years. The decision was finally taken to reunite the Junior Seminary on one site, at Blairs College, Aberdeen. Papers relating to Glasgow students at St Vincent's and Blairs, as well as on other aspects of college life, are kept in the Archive.

Campbell's successor as Archbishop was James Donald Scanlan, a native Glaswegian, who was born on 24 January 1899, and reared in the east-end parish of St Mary's, Calton, where his father had a medical practice. After completing his education at St Mungo's Academy, and later at St Aloysius College, he served in the Forces during the Great War, and, after graduating from the Royal Military College, Sandhurst, he received a Commission as a Second Lieutenant in the Highland Light Infantry, a famous Glasgow regiment. After serving, mainly in Egypt, he returned to enter Glasgow University where he studied law, and graduated B.L. in 1923. Nearly fifty years later, as Archbishop, the University conferred on him, in 1967, the degree of Doctor of Divinity.

It is not clear what decided the future Archbishop that the Church, and not law, was to be his chosen vocation. Nor is it clear why he chose to enter St Edmund's College, Ware, to become a priest of the Westminster diocese, rather than to study for a Scottish diocese. Among his classmates at Ware were Ronald, later to be Monsignor, Knox, Catholic chaplain at Oxford and a national figure; and William Brown, who subsequently became, for many years, Catholic chaplain at Glasgow University.

After his ordination in Westminster on 29 June 1929, Scanlan remained there until 1946, when he was appointed coadjutor to the aged Bishop John Toner of Dunkeld. His name, it seems, was on no episcopabile list of the Scottish bishops, nor any terna submitted by the eighty-nine-year-old Bishop Toner or his Chapter. Instead, he was a direct nominee of the Apostolic Delegate, Archbishop Godfrey, who consecrated him on 20 June 1946. Bishop Scanlan thus had to leave his work with the Westminster Marriage Tribunal, and move to Dundee. Nine years later, in 1955, he was translated to the Diocese of Motherwell, only to be moved once more in 1964, to Glasgow, as its Archbishop. In Motherwell he, like Campbell in Glasgow, had ensured the opening of many new churches.

His rule as Archbishop of Glasgow though, began at a time when a public policy of creating new towns and urban development, encouraged an emigration of people from the city, and the Archdiocese, of Glasgow. Those who moved to East Kilbride became part of Motherwell diocese, while others, in Erskine, were now in Paisley diocese. Only the new town of Cumbernauld remained within the Archdiocese. As a result of this movement of population away from the city, Glasgow, within the decade of Archbishop Scanlan's rule, lost the equivalent of twenty parishes. The decay of so many city parishes probably sapped the morale of many of the clergy faced with celebrating Sunday Mass in now virtually empty churches. The number of parishes in Cumbernauld, though, rose from one to four.

During the same decade, from 1964 to 1974, clergy and laity also had to adapt to the changes which followed the Second Vatican Council. Copies of the various Council documents are available in the Archive. In addition, the discussion generated in the aftermath of Vatican II is reflected in the correspondence in the Archive relating to the Scottish Catholic Renewal Movement, and in a petition objecting to the attempted dismissal, by Archbishop Scanlan, of the Glasgow University chaplain, Fr Gerard Hughes S.J.

One of Archbishop Scanlan's most delicate problems occurred on his arrival in the Archdiocese. Bishop James Ward had been Auxiliary to the late Archbishop Campbell, and though the new Archbishop appointed him as Vicar General and parish priest of Holy Cross, Crosshill, thus giving him legal stability in the Archdiocese, the two men were too different in both character and experience to become close friends. Perhaps both of them had expected the Holy See to resolve the difficulty by appointing Bishop Ward to a diocese, and were surprised when this did not happen. Archbishop Scanlan's energies were also engaged in coping with the financial affairs of the Archdiocese, and in contributing to an improvement in community relations and ecumenism.

He retired on 23 April 1974, and later returned to London as chaplain to Tyburn Convent in Marylebone. He had been only three weeks in London when he died on the feast of the Annunciation, 25 March 1976, and is now buried, as are his predecessors, Archbishops Eyre and Campbell, in St Andrew's Cathedral, Glasgow. Among his personal papers kept in the Archive are his collections of photographs and postcards and letters sent from various parts of the world, including one sent to him at Easter 1966, signed by Karol Wotyla, Archbishop of Krakow (now Pope John Paul II).

Outlining the lives and works of Archbishops, though undoubtedly interesting and essential elements in any history, never provides the complete picture. It does, however, provide a structured and logical background against which to place archival material. Other groups, like the Catholic Union, founded soon after Archbishop Eyre came to the Glasgow Archdiocese, must also be considered. In the case of the Catholic Union, its principal aims were to organise the Catholic vote in order to promote Catholic interests and, as Dean Munro urged, to ensure that any Catholic entitled to vote was included on the electoral register.⁶ A substantial collection of material, including Booklets containing statements of the objects, and Constitution, of the Union's Advisory Bureaux (local branches), and Minutes of the meetings of these Bureaux, forms part of the Archive. These, along with much General Correspondence, illuminate not only the Catholic Union's electoral activities, particularly relating to the local education authority elections in the late 1920s and 1930s, but also its attitude, and that of its officials, to the then contemporary issues, like the Spanish Civil War. Some of Dean Munro's Personal Papers also survive. The bulk of the Catholic Union collection begins to taper off from the 1940s onwards, although the organisation still exists.

Other Catholic societies recorded in the Archive include the Catholic Truth Society, the League of the Cross, the Needlework Guild, the Union of Catholic Mothers, the Association for the Propagation of the Faith, and the Young Men's Society. Some correspondence relating to the activities of the Ancient Order of Hibernians also survives, as do records of Parish Missions. The Annual Parish Returns, submitted by each missionary rector or parish priest provide interesting, though not always entirely reliable, statistical data for analysis.

An incomplete set of papers relating to meetings of the Scottish Hierarchy, including Minutes, are kept in the Archive. The Education Papers, too, have suffered some losses, mainly relating to the aftermath of the 1918 Act, as it seems Bishop Toner took many documents with him when he returned to Dundee.

Fresh material, though, has been added to the Archive with the development, throughout the 1970s, of bodies like the Glasgow Archdiocesan Lay Council, the Scottish Lay Apostolate Council, and the Senate/Council of Priests. Correspondence relating to the Lay Councils, and Minutes and Correspondence of the Senate/Council of Priests, form part of the Archive. A much more recent deposit were the records of St Charles Private Hospital, Carstairs, run by the Sisters of Charity for the care of the physically and mentally handicapped, received when the hospital finally closed in 1983. Arrangements now also exist between the Archive and the main Chancery office for the gradual transfer of files and correspondence, and the work of developing the Archive has been encouraged by the present Archbishop, the Most Rev. Thomas Joseph Winning. During his rule the work of systematically organising the Archive has commenced in earnest.

Organisation

The Archdiocesan Archive, therefore, contains some papers relating to the old Lowland District of Scotland; and to the Western District from 1827 to 1878. From 1878 onwards, it provides the principal source of primary research material for the history of the Archdiocese, except that since 1948 the dioceses of Motherwell and Paisley have retained their own records. The Archive is contained within the Archdiocesan Office at 18 Park Circus, Glasgow, and access is obtained by prior arrangement with the Archivist, the Very Rev. Hugh Canon Boyle.

The considerable work involved in organising the Archive was begun in mid-1982, and not until February 1984 were all the various documents, files and ledgers safely boxed and/or shelved. The task of organisation has benefitted greatly from the practical help and advice offered by the staff of the Glasgow University Archive, and the National Register of Archives (Scotland) based at General Register House, Edinburgh. Additional shelving, and bookcases for storing serials like the Innes Review, were purchased within the first eighteen months, and the bookcases also contain a virtually complete set of the St Peter's College magazine Claves Regni. Another almost complete serial held in the Archive is the Clergy Review.

As the material in the Archive becomes more accessible, it is also increasingly useful to researchers, and the number of non-genealogical enquiries is growing. The range of such queries is diverse with topics such as the building date of St Joseph's Primary School, Stepps; a parish history of St Margaret's, Airdrie; the decrees of the Provincial Synod at Fort Augustus in 1886; the Catholic Union in relation to the Spanish Civil War, and elections in Glasgow in the 1930s; and the impact of the Second Vatican Council on Liturgy, having occupied readers' attentions. Canon Condon's Diaries have also been extensively researched. 200 plans and drawings, mainly of churches, including some in the nineteenth century by Pugin, have been restored, and should be available shortly. Bound copies of Flourish, the official Journal of the Archdiocese, for 1979 to 1982, may also be consulted in the Archive.

In the future, it is hoped to make the Archdiocesan Archive more than a Chancery archive by encouraging bodies like the Lay and Youth Councils, to deposit material. In addition, items still held in parishes will be listed, and included under the relevant parish, in the index. The purpose behind such a policy is twofold: to make people, be they clergy or laity, aware of the possibility of making deposits to the Archive rather than perhaps destroying documents, and to make the Archive reflect Catholic life in general.

Indexing

The priority at the moment is to provide an Index to the Archive. The indexing system adopted, used in the Scottish Record Office and in Columba House, divides the material into classes. The class references in use in the Archdiocesan Archive are as follows:

- BS — Books and Serials.
- CD — Clerical and Ecclesiastical Discipline.
- CE — Clerical Education.
- CN — Converts.
- CS — Cemeteries.
- ED — Education Papers.
- FR — Financial Records, including Bank Statements, Life Assurance, and papers relating to meetings of the Finance Board.
- GC — General Correspondence.
- HP — Hierarchy Papers.
- HS — Holy See, correspondence regarding, and with.
- LB — Wet Copy Letter Books.
- LM — Liturgical Books and Manuscripts.
- LO — Lay Organisations.
- MA — Memoranda, various.
- MY — Miscellany.
- PL - Plans.
- PP — Property Papers, including Titles to ownership and Factors Statements.
- PR — Parish Returns, including Baptismal Returns.
- RI — Religious and Charitable Institutions.
- RO — Religious Orders.
- TS — Trusts, Funds and Bequests, including the Quota Fund/Clerical Friendly Society.
- WD — Western District Papers.
- VC — Vatican Council(s).

Within these references, each individual box or file can be sub-numbered. For example, if we take the class reference IP for Individual Papers, then

- IP1 — Mgr Munro's Papers.
- IP2 — Mgr Ritchie's Papers.
- IP3 — Dean Tracey's Papers.
- IP4 — Archbishop Eyre's Papers.

The records relating to each category are then listed by the unit in which they can be found, either in a box, bundle or file, as a single paper, or volume. Thus, if we continue to sub-divide, using IP4 — Archbishop Eyre's Papers, we arrive at the following:

- IP 4 — Archbishop Eyre's Papers.
- 1 — Box of Personal Papers.
 - 2 — Box containing Journals.
 - 3 — Box containing Sermons, including those for special occasions.
 - 4 — Box containing Diaries.
 - 5 — " " Memoranda.
 - 6 — " " Personal Correspondence.
 - 7 — " " items relating to his History of St Cuthbert.
 - 8 — " " Family Papers.
 - 9 — " " Financial Papers.
 - 10 — " " Papers in the legal dispute Eyre v Eyre.
 - 11 — Two Boxes entitled 'Newcastle Papers'.
 - 12 — Box containing Lectures prepared, etc.
 - 13 - " " College Notes.
 - 14 - " " Historical Essays.
 - 15 — " " Miscellaneous Papers I.
 - 16 — " " Miscellaneous Papers II.

Further sub-division(s) enable one to reach the stage of assigning a call number to each document, a process which is demonstrated below, this time using an example from a different category, MY for Miscellany.

Thus, MY4 indicates Folders and Boxes of other papers.

MY4/42 — tells one in which box a particular item may be found.

MY4/42/1 — gives the file in the box, which contains the item, in this case an envelope holding four letters concerning Bishop John Toner; and finally,

MY4/42/1/1 — produces a letter of 16 April 1882, from Archbishop Eyre to Fr Michael Condon, missionary rector of St Laurence's, Greenock, announcing the Rev John Toner's appointment as his assistant when he returns from Valladolid; comments also on Greenock local elections, the Finance Board, and a Mr Cronin at Eaglesham.

MY4/42/1/2 - is a letter of 18 April 1882, from Fr, later Archbishop, John A. Maguire, Eyre's successor, to Fr Condon regarding the appointment of Rev John Toner.

MY4/42/1/3 - a further letter of 19 April 1882, from Archbishop Eyre to Fr Condon about the good qualities and potential displayed by Rev John Toner.

MY4/42/1/4 - letter of 8 May 1901, from Father, later Monsignor John Ritchie, Diocesan Secretary, to Fr Toner, then administrator of St Patrick's, Anderston, appointing him Missionary Rector (MR), at Rutherglen in succession to Bishop Angus Macfarlane. Macfarlane had been consecrated Bishop of Dunkeld, at Dundee, on 1 May 1901.

As the work of indexing the Archive proceeds, additional considerations, such as cross-referencing related material, have to be taken into account. Also, even with what will one day be a comprehensive index, the initial search for a call number to enable one to retrieve document(s), for instance in an MY (Miscellany) category comprising over eighty boxes and folders, remains a fairly slow process. Perhaps in the near future, computers will perform the functions of cross-referencing, and searching for call numbers.

It should be possible to issue an interim index, to file level for every category by 1986, with a detailed document/item index to follow some time thereafter. However, at this stage, projected dates can only be estimates, subject to amendment as indexing continues.

In the meantime, I hope that the index samples and class references, taken in conjunction with the outline history given in this article, prove a useful and interesting first guide to the material available, the methods adopted, and the work in progress, in the Glasgow Archdiocesan Archive.

NOTES

1. The old counties were dispensed with during Scottish Local Government re-organisation in 1975. The territory covered by the Archdiocese of Glasgow, as given in the Scottish Catholic Directory for 1984, includes the City of Glasgow District (except Garthamlock, Craigend, parts of Easterhouse, Baillieston, Cambuslang, Rutherglen and Burnside); Cumbernauld District (except Banton, Kilsyth and Queenzieburn); the Baldernock, Bishopbriggs and Kirkintilloch areas of Strathkelvin District; Bearsden and Milngavie, Clydebank, and Dunbarton District; and the Thorniiebank area of Eastwood District.

3. Much of the background information on Eyre has been obtained from his obituary notice, panegyric, and Month's Mind Sermon, which were published in full in the Western Catholic Calendar for 1903, pp. 100—118. A complete set of these Calendars, from their first issue in 1894, forms part of the Archive, as does an almost complete set of Scottish Catholic Directories, which were first published in 1829. Information on Eyre's successors was also derived from these sources, and due acknowledgment is hereby made of the various unknown authors.

THE ARCHIVES IN THE GENERALATE OF THE DE LA SALLE BROTHERS IN ROME

John Hazell F.S.C.

The archives of the 'curia' of the Institute of the De La Salle Brothers, long known in England by their official name of Brothers of the Christian Schools, are situated in Rome at the generalate in Via Aurelia. This Institute is concerned with educational work with some nine thousand members throughout the free world. Begun in 1680 by Saint Jean-Baptiste de la Salle, it remained almost exclusively French until the mid-nineteenth century, when missionary activity gradually extended its work throughout the world. Some of the Institute's early archival material, understandably, did not survive the French Revolution, but a remarkable amount did. Some of this is now in the various departmental archives in France and in the national archives in Paris. Fortunately, most of the really important material was kept safely in the possession of the Institute during those troublesome years, by Brother Vivien Gaudenne of Rheims until the Brothers were able to function normally again, under Napoleon. The Institute was highly centralised throughout the 18th and 19th centuries till its suppression in France in 1904, and the present archives reflect this administrative structure. There is far more material, for example, concerning houses in the nineteenth century than for those in the twentieth, since all decisions concerning the opening of houses were then taken by the superior general, and hence the relevant correspondence and contracts are held here. There has been a far less consistent policy concerning the archives during this century, with some honourable exceptions, and as early as 1938, Georges Rigault, author of the official history of the Institute, wrote to the superiors, warning them of the great difficulty he would experience in writing the remaining volumes of his work, because of the lack of documentation, and urging them to lay down a more active policy of enriching their archives.

It must be remembered that, as in the case of, for example, the Society of Jesus, the archives in the generalate are neither the 'central archives', nor the 'general archives' of the Institute, but simply the archives of the central administrative body, the general council or 'regime' as it was called until comparatively recently. The procurator general, the bursar general and the postulator general, all have their own archives, as also do some of the other main offices in the generalate such as the missions secretariat, the publications department and the central education office. The personnel office and the 'records room' (documentatheque) house the active records, and their materials naturally find their way eventually (it is hoped) to the archives proper if they are considered worthy of permanent preservation.

The archives are located in the vast generalate building, the main repository being on the first floor in close proximity to the offices of the superior general and his council and to the personnel office. What was originally (1936) thought to be a generous allocation of space (900 cubic metres) has already proved to be insufficient. Fortunately, however, since the policy of sending people to the generalate has changed over the years, and numbers of staff have been drastically reduced, the problem of future archival space is not a serious one, provided the staff are prepared to walk a little. Nearby there is a lift giving access to all four floors of the building and close to the repository we have a small search-room, two store-rooms and a photography room.

Some inexpert rearranging of the materials in the repository without any written record being made of the changes, led in the sixties to a situation where something drastic needed to be done, and a trained archivist from the United States, Brother John Mulhern, was entrusted with the task of finding a solution and of modernising the repository at the same time. His achievement in the years that he worked in Rome was remarkable and in a comparatively short time he and his helpers transformed the main area of the archives, making it a functional and impressive repository (though naturally they could not increase its size). One hopes that the main lines of development laid down by him are being steadily carried forward.

General view of the De La Salle Generalate archives

The main repository has no associated office space and the staff work in the central aisle, which is in fact perfectly adequate, though the best environmental conditions for documents are not exactly the same as those for humans. The shelving arrangement gives room for some nine thousand standard archive boxes (375 by 295 by 90 mm), or some nine hundred linear metres of shelving. This capacity could be increased by a sixth if we put shelving across the side aisles, which are not really necessary and which are already fitted with the upright supports. Unfortunately, the most economical use of the shelving means that the boxes are stored vertically instead of horizontally, providing less support for the documents inside.

The main body of documents falls naturally into four sections: first, those documents concerning the Founder and the origins of the Institute (Group B), the Founder's precursors and contemporaries (Group A), and the eighteenth-century material (Group C), up to the almost complete break of the French Revolution. Second, the records of the central administration of the Institute from 1800 to the present time, and still accruing (Group E). These include the materials concerning the various generalate houses, the general chapters (normally held every ten years), the papers and circular letters of the superior generals and their assistants, the decisions of the 'regime', now called the general council, together with the Minutes of their meetings. Under Group E are also classed materials given in by the four general services of secretary general (Class EH), postulator general (Class EJ), bursar general (Class EK) and procurator general to the Holy See (Class EL). Third, a section (Group G) concerning the personnel of the Institute, those who have died and those who have left (all the records concerning the living members are kept in the personnel office). This group includes some of the canonical annual visit reports, the lists of Brothers by community, the information kept on each Brother (nearly always simply a large single form with his vital statistics and his various changes of community, finishing with the reference to his obituary notice, or with the date of his withdrawing from the Institute). Here are also kept the copies of the novitiate registers and the materials concerning the various chapters of vows. The fourth and last main section (Group N) is that formed by the regional and local histories and documents, of provinces (called 'districts') and houses. This material is arranged by country and town rather than by province, since in many cases arrangement by province would be quite impractical, given the present ordering and the ease with which provinces have in the past divided and coalesced.

The repository contains other groups of materials, arranged artificially by subject rather than governed by the principle of provenance: as, for example, Group H concerning formation, Group J concerning the Missions, Group K concerning education, Group L concerning the spiritual life, Group M concerning the intellectual life of the Brothers. We prefer now, for example, to place materials concerning the missions in the relevant boxes of regional and local documents, and materials on formation in the boxes of the districts that produce it. New materials of this nature are therefore added to Group N, the various series of administrative units (most often a district), according to a standard scheme as follows: 0: historical studies and publications; 1: general documents; 2: provincial chapters; 3: provincial council; 4: circulars and other communications from the provincial or his secretariat; 5: personnel; 6: vocations, formation both initial and continuing; 7: forms of apostolic work, new initiatives, etc.; 8: affiliates, benefactors, alumni; 9: local archives: guides, lists, etc. The material here considered is largely polycopied material distributed within the province — reports and the like. Documents concerning the central administration's dealing with various problems and specific questions that have arisen at local level are naturally kept with the papers of the person concerned who dealt with them and who deposited them along with their other papers. This is an effort to respect the principle of provenance.

It will be apparent that Groups B and C, concerning the period of the foundation up to the French Revolution, form a sort of microcosm of the rest of the archives, since they contain jftl the material for the 17th and 18th centuries and are the equivalent of Groups E, G and N for the period since that time. Readers who would like to know in detail what survives from the Founder, Saint Jean-Baptiste de la Salle, are recommended to consult the Institute series of Cahiers Lasalliens, number 40, both volumes. In the generalate repository we have nearly all of his extant letters, protected in glass for easy viewing (as are also the letters of two other Brothers, Saint Benilde Romancon and Blessed Solomon Le Clercq), and several early and precious documents in his hand: concerning his university career, his permissions to preach and hear confessions in various dioceses of France, the formula of the first vows for life (1694), and the longest document we have of his (eight sides): the memoir on the religious habit. The manuscripts of his works have not survived, since they were nearly all printed in his lifetime. We have the original Bull of approbation granted by Pope Benedict XIII in 1725, and the letters patent for the principal house, Saint-Yon, granted in 1724 (as well as letters patent for other towns). The 1724 letters patent are now known to be the original, though the seal is missing and they are not signed personally by Louis XV. The thieves who some years ago carried off from the exhibition room on the ground floor the Founder's spectacles and the figure of the crucifix he was buried with, left his little office book (or diurnal) which was in the same display case. This, now in the archives, has more than five hundred of its seven hundred pages missing: they were probably removed very early on by Brothers seeking to have a personal souvenir of their Founder. This also probably explains why so many of the proper names have been cut out from the remaining pages. This early section (Groups A, B and C) is now closed, except for those classes concerned with editions of the Founder's works, and the results of present research, studies of his spirituality, and the like.

This early section is, however, only a relatively small part of the archives and there are whole groups that are still actively accruing, from the daily life of the Institute administration. Unfortunately, some series are incomplete because the superiors at provincial level fail to send in the official returns as requested by the central administration. However, the majority are faithful in so doing, and some take an active and personal interest in enriching the generalate archives by sending in documentation on their own country or province, either the originals or photocopies, and on the Founder or the France of his time. The official returns from each province are bound in yearly volumes, except the historical supplements which are allowed to accumulate for twenty-five years and then bound by house, so that the history of individual provinces and the houses within it is easier to consult in the future.

The archives are living, inasmuch as they are consulted and used by many people, both in the current administration for background information for their own government, and in the world of scholarship and research, largely for the history of primary education in nineteenth-century France. The staff provide a service which is much appreciated by those who work in the tiny search-room and those sending in their requests for information by post. Besides this, several practising archivists come to examine our set-up and to discuss archival problems, and there are many visitors to our generalate who ask to see the repository. They are generally welcomed, especially if their arrival is announced beforehand!

A great amount of work still needs to be done. As yet, the research facilities provided for those who come to consult the archives are less than ideal. There is no published Guide and hardly any indexes. The only section for which there is a printed catalogue is Group B, the material on the Founder, his life, writings and the foundation of the Institute. This was done by Brother Leon de Marie Aroz and was published as Cahiers Lasalliens, number 40, volume 2. This has an excellent introduction on the history of the present archives, running to some forty pages. Work needs to progress on the absorbing of a vast quantity of unsorted materials, and on listing, and then the microfilming of the important materials can begin.

The development of more co-ordination between the various services in the generalate, especially between the archives, the personnel office and the records room, the development of a functional, coherent and realistic records management programme, together with a more active Institute Archives Committee, will produce a more effective and useful archives service both for the central administration and for research, not only receiving and preserving past materials and adequately caring for them, but also actively making them available for the searcher in easily usable form and providing research aids of a high standard. Most of this has yet to be done, but, we hope, is being actively pursued.

THE PETRE FAMILY ARCHIVES

Stewart Foster

Whilst reflecting upon his submission to Rome in 1851, Cardinal Manning was reputed to have commented that he had been taught that the Catholic Church had been founded upon Saint Peter, but that he had since realised that, in this country at least, she was built upon Lord Petre! Though perhaps somewhat exaggerated, the Cardinal's observation does indicate the important role assumed by the Petre family in the fortunes and affairs of the post-Reformation Catholic community in England.

Briefly, the family's recusant links with William Petre, who served as deputy to Cromwell at the time of the Dissolution, purchased the Manor of Ingatestone, Essex, in 1539, and who received his knighthood in 1543. Unique in that he acted as Secretary to three successive Tudor monarchs, Petre's religious loyalties were somewhat ambiguous, but his second wife, Lady Anne, was a staunch Papist who harboured St John Paine, a seminary priest martyred at Chelmsford in 1582. Sir John Petre, Sir William's heir, purchased Thorndon, near Brentwood, in 1574, two years after his father's death. He was himself raised to the Barony of Writtle by the impoverished James I in 1613, and it was he who established Thorndon as the family's chief residence.¹ Meanwhile, the many cadet branches of the Petre family were establishing themselves in neighbouring parts of the county.

Of the principal line of the family the most notable members have been the fourth Baron, who died a prisoner in the Tower in 1684, after having been arrested during the Oates Plot; the seventh Lord Petre, who was immortalised by Pope as 'the adventurous Baron' in The Rape of the Lock; and the ninth Lord, who was in the forefront of the movement for Catholic Relief and Emancipation. In more recent times William Joseph, the thirteenth Baron, received Holy Orders, conducted his own rather novel, if not eccentric, school, and became the first Catholic priest to take his seat in the House of Lords since the Reformation. The sixteenth Lord Petre was killed in the First World War, leaving an infant son, the present head of the family. The Thorndon estate was broken up in 1919 and the Petres returned to Ingatestone Hall.²

The Essex Record Office, inaugurated in a basement at County Hall, Chelmsford, in 1938,³ was officially opened in May 1939 under the first County Archivist (1938—69), F.G. Emmison. Through the generosity of Lord Petre, the Record Office was able to count among its initial deposits a sizeable and remarkably complete collection of Petre family documents dating principally from the 16th to 20th centuries. More than forty years later there can be little doubt that the custodianship of this important collection — amongst the finest of its kind in the country — by a County Record Office of unrivalled reputation has greatly benefitted historian and archivist alike, in terms both of its accessibility and the uses to which it has been put for the purposes of research. Moreover, for more than twenty-five years, beginning in 1953, the Essex Record Office enjoyed the benefits of the lease of the North Wing and Long Gallery at Ingatestone Hall, and it was here that it staged a series of highly-acclaimed exhibitions illustrative of the county's history, several of which made extensive use of the family's own archives.⁴

In describing the chief groups of papers in the Petre collection an indispensable aid is F.G. Emmison's Guide to the Essex Record Office (2nd ed. 1969), and the following notes have been extracted from his schema, with a few comments added with regard to the specific Catholic interest of these groupings.⁵

The papers of the Ingatestone Hall estate fall into the following categories:

- a) Manorial (including Court Rolls, 1279—1937)
- b) Title Deeds: these fall into two major groups, those calendared by Canon Kuypers, Lord Petre's Archivist, c.1935, being mostly pre-1500.
- c) Estate
- d) Maps
- e) Official
- f) Legal (including the articles of sequestration of the Petre estates 1645—c.1657)
- g) Financial (including material relating to other Catholic families, mostly connected with trusteeships; these include the families of Howard, Heneage and Walmesley from the eighteenth century and that of Clifford from the nineteenth).

These groups of papers, being so complete, are of special interest to economic and political historians. The extent of Sir William Petre's material gains at the time of the Dissolution makes him one of the best examples of the 'new men' who profitted from association with the Tudor monarchs.

Of greater recusant interest are the groupings listed under the following headings:

- h) Family: (1) Petre, Main Branch:- of special interest is the Bull of Pope Paul IV granting Absolution to Sir William Petre, who had sought confirmation of his purchase of monastic land, including the Manor of Ingatestone. This document is probably unique.⁶ Within this category one can also mention the papers relating to the 4th Lord Petre; the 'Rules' for the chapel at Thorndon, 1741; Alexander Geddes' Essay on the Improvement of the Position of English Catholics, 1791.⁷

- (ii) Petre, Other Branches:- Cranham, from which Sir Edward Petre S.J. originated; Fithelers, which gave to the Church two Vicars Apostolic, uncle and nephew, viz. Bishops Benjamin and Francis Petre.
 - (iii) Radcliffe: As heirs-general to the Radcliffe estates through the marriage of Anna Maria Barbara, daughter of the 3rd Earl of Derwentwater, to the 8th Lord Petre in 1732, the Petres have inherited many of the papers of this now extinct Earldom. The principal items are the letters of the 3rd Earl written to his wife whilst he awaited execution, as well as those written to him by various well-wishers and relatives. This group of papers also includes material relating to the re-interment of the Earl's body at Thorndon in 1874.
 - (iv) Various Families: Stourton, Southcote, Heneage, etc.
- j) Correspondence: the virtual absence of any personal correspondence from the main line of the family represents the major defect in the Petre archives. As a token example of what once might have survived the deposit includes a number of letters by Lady Frances Petre, first wife of the 11th Baron.
 - k) Ecclesiastical: of particular interest are: the Answer by three Regular Orders to the Bishop of Chalcedon's letter to the English Catholic laity (1629); the MSS of Alexander Geddes (mostly poetical); the Thorndon chaplaincy; material relating to the 12th Lord Petre's support for several new missions in nineteenth-century Essex.
 - l) Charity: this includes the Ginge Petre Charity, Ingatestone, founded c.1570 and restored to Catholic purposes in 1835 by Rev. George Last (later Secretary to the Westminster Chapter)⁸; benefactions to Exeter College, Oxford (of which Sir William Petre was regarded as a 'second founder'), and to All Souls and Wadham.
 - m) Miscellaneous: of special interest are Canon Kuypers's transcripts and biographical notes, c.1910—38; the cricket score-books of the Thorndon Park Club, predecessor of The Emeriti, founded by the future 13th Baron, Monsignor William Joseph Petre.

This principal deposit of family papers at the Essex Record Office may be supplemented by reference to a number of other sources that help to shed light upon the Petres' leading position in the post-Reformation Catholic community. Apart from the more obvious locations, such as the Public Record Office and the British Library's Department of Manuscripts,⁹ material relating to the two Petre bishops, for example, may be found in the Westminster Diocesan Archives (Benjamin) and the Lancashire Record Office (Francis). The English Jesuit Archives contain many valuable references to both the chaplains that served the Petres, and those members of the family that entered the Society. Indeed, the list is endless because, as one might expect, the relatively small circle of Catholic aristocrats in penal times tended to practise a high degree of inter-marriage and were further bound to each other through shared patronage of various chaplains.

As a footnote to these supplementary sources, the Catholic parish of Ingatestone itself should be mentioned. Two years ago an important discovery of recusant documents and nineteenth-century family and ecclesiastical papers came to light. Of particular value was a copy of the baptismal register from Thorndon Hall, several notebooks containing the fruits of genealogical research carried out in the last decades of the nineteenth century, as well as a seventeenth-century indenture relating to the confiscated properties of the ill-fated 4th Baron. This should be encouragement enough to other parish priests with recusant pedigrees to search their presbyteries.

Students and scholars of every description are increasingly making use of the riches to be found in the Petre archives.¹⁰ The 12th Lord Petre himself, with the assistance of his sister, the Hon. Mrs Douglas, transcribed and printed the Derwentwater correspondence, subsequently reproduced by Major Skeet,¹¹ and Maude Petre's study of the 9th Lord made use of many family papers, then still kept at Thorndon. Canon Kuypers's historical research on Thorndon was published in the Brentwood Diocesan Magazine (1920—23), but by far the most important original work is Emmison's study of Sir William Petre — in his own words, a task encouraged and made possible by the . . . survival of abundant archives not only of his (Sir William's) public career but also of his domestic affairs'.¹³ Emmison made particularly effective use of the account books of Petre's steward. The second County Archivist (1969—77), K.C. Newton, used a rich variety of manorial and estate documents for his record of the family's early economic progress, The Manor of Writtle, and A.C. Edwards's John Petre (1975), a study of Sir William's son and the first Baron, also made use of 16th- and 17th-century account books to great effect. Moreover, any visitor to the Essex Record Office has only to consult the collection of bound theses to appreciate the extent to which the family's archives have been employed in a wide variety of historical disciplines.

From the viewpoint of Catholic historical research the reader need go no further than the Cumulative Index of the Essex Recusant (vol. 20, 1978) to discover the value of the Petre papers in this specialist field. Furthermore, the closely-knit nature of the Catholic community referred to above renders this collection indispensable to scholars of recusancy.

Amidst the many uses to which such scholars have put the archives of the religious orders and dioceses, there is an equally strong argument in favour of important family collections such as the Petre archives. As John Martin Robinson's recent study of the Howards has shown,¹⁴ to chronicle the fortunes of a leading Catholic family can lead to a different, but equally worthwhile and absorbing, vantage point from which to assess the development of English Catholicism.

NOTES

1. A new Thorndon Hall, a Palladian-style mansion built to the designs of Paine, was completed in 1770. The family vacated it temporarily in 1878 after an extensive fire, but the house was never rebuilt under Petre ownership. Ingatestone Hall, meanwhile, served as the residence of the dowager or married heir, until, during the second half of the eighteenth century, it was let to a series of tenants — the most famous being the Coverdales.
2. A definitive history of the family has yet to appear, but for a general bibliography see the present writer's The Catholic Church in Ingatestone (1982), pp. 125-28.
3. The Record Office moved to new premises in 1964 and is at present in temporary accommodation pending the reopening of the expanded premises in Autumn 1985. The Office receives c.9,000 searchers annually.
4. The 40th anniversary exhibition (1979) featured the history of the Petre family in Essex.

THE ARCHIVES AND PAPERS OF THE SISTERS OF MERCY AT CARYSFORT PARK

Sr Magdalena Frisby

*Remember the past, to live the present, to prepare for the future*T.S. Eliot

The Sisters of Mercy have been working in the fields of education, medical care and pastoral service for 150 years. The Congregation was founded by Mother Catherine McAuley in her native Dublin and has since spread to the five continents. My commitment is to the archives and papers of the Sisters of Mercy in the Dublin diocese — nineteen convents — but in this essay I confine myself to the archives and records of Carysfort Park, the head house.

Contents of the Archives

Documentation concerning Mother Catherine McAuley, the foundress, forms a large portion of the collection — her letters, both those which are archival, that is, written in connection with the administration of the Congregation, and friendly letters to the Sisters; her notes on spiritual matters and the instruction she gave to the Sisters and to novices; the prayers she composed, as well as files on her family and relatives. Copies of the Rule and Constitutions, both manuscript and printed, in English and Italian, some of them corrected and annotated, others illuminated, are strictly archival. So are the documents from Rome, approving the Congregation and the Rule. On the legal side, deeds of property, bonds, receipts, wills and estimates for building work done, are preserved. Accounts of the early days in Baggot Street, even before the foundation of the Congregation, have survived, with data of the cholera epidemic of 1832 and the beginnings of the school and House of Mercy. Finally, in this section, we have manuscript biographies of the foundress, letters describing her death and six files on the cause for her beatification in Rome.

Registers of the Sisters, with biographical notes on each one up to 1971, carry the story up to our own day. Letters, or copies of these, from Sisters who went to make foundations in England, the United States and Australia, form an interesting collection, as do printed extracts dealing with the work of the Sisters in the Crimean War, 1854.

More strictly archival are the Acts of Chapters from 1837 to 1980 — the Chapter is the governing body of the Congregation. Also included are the agenda, minutes and decrees of the Chapters of 1969, 1972, 1976 and 1980. Correspondence with bishops and other dignitaries exists up to 1960. Recent material includes articles on federation, or the union of the Sisters of Mercy, in the United States, Australia, New Zealand and Ireland, and accounts of the Golden Jubilee and centenary of the foundation and of the bicentenary of the birth of Mother McAuley, 1979. Reports of meetings of a national gathering of Sisters, called the Mercy Association, occur in 1972, and even more recent are telegrams of good wishes for, and accounts of, an international gathering of Sisters, called Trocaire '81, which were deposited in the Archives in September 1981.

Arrangement

It is proposed to arrange the material as follows:

A. FOUNDATION

- i. Correspondence of Mother McAuley — (200 letters)
- ii. Meditations, instructions, journals on spiritual matters, prayers of Mother McAuley.
- iii. Accounts of events e.g. new convents, cholera epidemic of 1832.
- iv. Biographies and articles of Mother McAuley, 1843—1865.

B. CONSTITUTIONAL

1. Rule and Constitutions, 1841, 1863, 1926, 1954.
2. General Chapters
 - i. Acts of Chapters 1837-1980.
 - ii. Preliminary documentation 1969—1980.
 - iii. Agenda and minutes 1969—1980.
 - iv. Decrees of Chapters 1969-1980.

C. OFFICIALS

1. Mother General and her Council
 - i. Administration.
 - ii. Correspondence (a) with the Holy See,
(b) with bishops and legal authorities,
(c) with local superiors,
(d) with the Sisters.
 - iii. Visitation.
2. Local Superior
 - i. Administration of houses.
 - ii. Correspondence.
3. Bursar General
 - i. Financial records — including loans, investments, fund-raising.

- ii. Building records e.g. titles.
 - iii. Inventory of property.
- D. SISTERS
- i. Registers containing biographical outlines (6 bound volumes).
 - ii. Draft registers and records.
 - iii. Noviceship registers and records.
 - iv. Indexes to registers.
 - v. Biographies of Sisters who went on foundations.
 - vi. Letters from Sisters in Ireland, Britain, U.S.A., Africa, Australia.
 - vii. Obituaries.
- E. LEGAL DOCUMENTS
- i. Canonical
 - (a) Brief granting indulgences, 1830 (Pius VIII).
 - (b) Approval of Congregation, 1835 (Gregory XVI).
 - (c) Approval of Rule, 1841, (Gregory XVI).
 - (d) Records of union with Arklow and Rathdrum, 1943, and with Athy, 1968.
 - ii. Civil — deeds, bonds, wills, memorials, stocks and shares.
- F. DOCUMENTATION PRIOR TO FORMAL ORGANISATION AS A CONGREGATION, 1832
- i. With the bishop, clergy and Presentation Sisters.
 - ii. Legal and business documents.
- G. THE CAUSE OF MOTHER CATHERINE McAULEY
- i. History 1909-1961.
 - ii. Promotion 1961—1972.
- H. RECORDS OF THE McAULEY FAMILY AND RELATIVES
- I. CELEBRATIONS
- i. Golden Jubilee 1881.
 - ii. Centenary 1931.
 - iii. Bi-centenary of Mother McAuley's birth 1979.
 - iv. Trocaire '81.
- J. NON-WRITTEN MATERIAL
- i. Films
 - (a) 'Kitty's Folly'
 - (b) Sisters of Mercy in Australia.
 - ii. Slides
 - (a) Sisters of Mercy.
 - (b) Works of Mercy.
 - (c) Trocaire'81.

- iii. Photographs and Paintings — convents, schools, hospitals.
- iv. Stereo recording — 'One among Millions'.

K. MATERIAL NOT DIRECTLY RELATED TO THE CONGREGATION.

With this arrangement, I hope to preserve the records in organic relationship to each other, reflecting the activities of the Congregation.

Retrieval

The preparation of a retrieval system will involve making out listing docketts giving the content, character and date of each item, with reference-number of the collection and the document. Descriptive lists will then be made out giving a more detailed summary of each item. This may include cross-references. A table of contents, with an introduction giving the history and background of the collection, will be written and a note on closed material included. Then, indexes will be prepared, in alphabetical order, to persons, places and subjects. A functional chart and chronology of the history of the Congregation will be added. Finally, a descriptive analysis sheet will be made out for photographs, films, maps and plans. Then the material can be opened for study.

Access — Use for Researchers

The improved presentation and accessibility of the archives and papers will be of help to the administration, to the Sisters and to researchers generally. The archives are a vital and essential element of good administration, for a study of old documentation can explain the evolution of policy, and can indicate pitfalls to be avoided in future. It may be necessary to make Mother General aware of this and to offer to do research for her if need be, since the first function of the archives is to serve the administration. The Sisters, also, can get information and inspiration from the archives, though they may need to be enticed to their use, since many, perhaps most, religious tend to give the archives a wide berth. It might be possible, later on, to arrange small exhibitions periodically to arouse interest, or to mount a permanent or semi-permanent exhibition. The Sisters may contribute to the archives, too, for there must be at least some documents safely (or unsafely) squirrelled away in trunks and attics which should be in the archivist's keeping.

Much of the material in the collection would have no great significance for the general historian, but would be of interest to the Sisters. Scholars doing research on the history of the Church in Ireland, on religious life as lived by the Sisters, on Church leaders like Cardinal Cullen, Archbishop Murray or Cardinal Wiseman, or on other aspects, would find data of value here. Researchers in local history or social history would find much to interest them in the records of 150 years of involvement with people in the day-to-day lives. So would those who are researching the accomplishments of women during this period, for the Sisters broke through many of the shackles binding women in the last century. The letters and diaries of Sisters who journeyed to America or Australia, throw light on travel, emigration and life in these continents.

Some Problems — (a) Gaps

The period from 1831 onward is one of great historical importance, involving significant movements in Church and State, but the records pass them by unnoticed. The Tithe War and the Land War are unmentioned in the records of the Sisters of Mercy. The emergence of Sinn Fein, the Easter Rising, the war of independence and the establishment of the Irish Free State made no impact on them. Even the great spate of church-building, the Church coming out of the catacombs after Emancipation — of which the Congregation itself is an aspect — is not recorded. Was it that the early Sisters were so taken up with pastoral work and the pursuit of holiness, that they had no time, or even interest, in these matters?

Even for the work of the Sisters there are several gaps in the records. There is only incidental reference to the visitation of the sick in their homes or in the five hospitals visited, though this was an important facet of the Sisters' work and could form the basis of a social survey. Nothing exists either on the poor who were helped by the convents.

Notably scarce are business records. Apart from the bill of sale of the site in Baggot Street (for £4,000) on 22 June 1824, a journal page of account due to John Keogh for building-work in 1826 and a tender from a builder, T.W. Burchwood, 11 Westland Row, for alterations and additions to the building in 1850, nothing else has survived. A book of receipts for the building of the Mater Hospital, 1860 to 1864, survives, but no record of the purchase of the site. There is also a large business account book, dating from 1891, for Carysfort Park, which was still in use up to a few years ago. It is possible, but improbable, that other records may come to light. The periodic changes of Superiors meant that inevitably much was destroyed. The continuous growth of the schools and convents led to changes in location and to destruction of what to many seemed to be out-dated lumber taking up badly-needed space.

In many of the letters of Mother McAuley, except those to bishops, benefactors, architects and solicitors, the personal and the administrative are inextricably interwoven. What always comes through is the amount of freedom she allowed the Sisters to respond to whatever need is discovered. But not all that was done to answer these needs is recorded. Nowadays, we should be embroiled with the Eastern Health Board, or even with the Gardai, if we attempted to take home orphans. In the early days, an orphanage, like Topsy, 'just grewed'. The same is true of the Houses of Mercy, which became employment agencies — nowadays trades unions would be likely to interfere. The schools are documented, to some degree, as parish priests and the Board of National Education became involved.

(b) A Remedy?

Some of the gaps in the collection might be filled out by gathering the recollections of older Sisters who have spent their lives at work in the schools or orphanages, or on parish work. There is a certain danger that their recollections may contradict facts documented elsewhere, but taken as one person's account of what happened, they are of value, and they will often give a little local colour we cannot find elsewhere. Collecting tape-recordings of such reminiscences and encouraging older Sisters to write accounts of the past will be one of my interests as soon as the archives are arranged, but it will be essential to state that the resulting records are consciously created and to note the state of mind of the Sisters as they wrote or spoke.

THE NEW CODE OF CANON LAW AND ARCHIVES

Peter Ingman LCL

'With the promulgation of the new Code of Canon Law we hope to deepen our understanding of the role of an ecclesiastical archivist'.

The Code of Canon Law was promulgated by Pope John Paul II on 25 January 1983 and came into force on the First Sunday of Advent, 27 November 1983. It replaced the Code of Canon Law promulgated by Pope Benedict XV in 1917, which remained in force until its abrogation by the Code of Pope John Paul II.

In canonical terminology, the Pope has supreme, full, immediate and universal jurisdiction over the Church. He has, therefore, the power to make laws, together with the power to administer and to judge. The Code of Canon Law comes from the Pope in his function as legislator. While all Catholics admit that the Pope's power as lawgiver extends to the universal Church, the Code of Canon Law which we were given in 1983 contains the law for the Latin Church only. The Oriental Catholic Churches are governed by their own Code of Canon Law, which is still in the process of revision. Although we are speaking of the new Code of Canon Law, law itself is not something new in the Church. The necessity for law is, in fact, built into the structure of the Church. Our new Code of Canon Law is the product of a long history of law. Since 1917 the law of the Church has been codified; in other words, all the major legislation governing the life of the Church and its members has been gathered together in one book and set out in the form of a series of short and concise coded sentences (canons), each stating some law. In fact, our present Code contains 1,752 canons. Prior to the Code of 1917, the law of the Church, going back to the earliest days, was to be found scattered through hundreds of separate documents or collections and compilations of documents. The history of canon law is a history of the gathering together from different places and putting into order, papal constitutions, rescripts and laws of all kinds. By the beginning of this century there was such an accumulation of material, scattered through countless official and unofficial collections of documents, that to discover the law on any point was virtually impossible to the ordinary priest or lay person. The volume of documentation was so vast and complex that only a canonist who possessed some of the skill of an archivist would have known where to look to find what the law said.

In order that the law could be set clearly and briefly and be easily accessible to everyone, the format of a Code of laws was introduced for the first time in 1917.

Our present Code groups its 1,752 canons into sections and chapters which deal with similar topics. First of all, where in the Code do we need to look to learn what the Code has to say about archives?

Book II of the Code deals with the People of God. Under this general heading comes a group of canons dealing with the hierarchical constitution of the Church. Within this group there is a further division, so that there is a section entitled 'The Local Church and its internal organisation'. A chapter in this section is devoted to the diocesan curia and it is under the umbrella of the diocesan curia that we find the article entitled The Chancellor, other notaries and archives. The Code, then, places the treatment of archives within the context of the local Church and its curia. In a general canon (469) about the diocesan curia, the Code states, 'The diocesan curia consists of those institutions and persons who give help to the bishop in the government of the whole diocese'. The Code asks archivists to look on their work in this context of co-operation with the bishop. The new Code does not limit itself to speaking about a single archive. In fact, it describes and legislates for four different kinds of archive. I will look at each of these in turn.

In accordance with canon 486, 2, 'In the curia of every diocese an archive is to be established, in a safe place, in which instruments and written documents which concern the spiritual and temporal good of the diocese are to be kept in an ordered way and diligently preserved' The same canon, in 3, requires an inventory or catalogue of the contents of the archive, together with a brief outline of each document, to be made. The duty of keeping the archive of the curia belongs to the chancellor of the diocese (482,1). It is no longer necessary, as it was by the law of the former Code, for the chancellor of the diocese to be a priest. If a lay person is chancellor, either a man or a woman may hold the office. From the nature of its description and the laws concerning it, it is obvious that this first form of archive is for the documents connected with the daily running of a diocese. Very many ecclesiastical acts are bound by the law of the Church to be in writing; usually for their lawfulness, although sometimes (e.g. can. 1111, 2, giving general delegation of the faculty to assist at marriages) their being written or not affects the validity of the act. Among documents relating to the spiritual good of the diocese would be included the acts of a superior, generally a bishop, for the filling of vacant offices in his diocese. The Code also makes it necessary for acts of resignation, transfer or removal from any office to be in writing. The originals or authentic copies of these and many other documents would find a place in the curial archive (Canon 156,189,193, 4,190, 3).

The curial archive is to be kept locked. Only the bishop and the chancellor have the key (Canon 487,1). No unauthorised person can enter it. Under certain conditions a copy of a document may be obtained. This can be given either in written form or as a photostat (Canon 487, 2). The Latin text of this canon has introduced a new expression into the Latin vocabulary, for we meet the phrase documentum photostaticum.

Canon 489 prescribes the establishment of a second archive in the curia of each diocese. This is to be known as the secret archive. The mysterious nature of this archive is somewhat lessened when the canon goes on to say that it should be at least a cabinet or safe, securely locked, and which cannot be removed. Any documents to be kept secret (e.g. Can.1113 — testimony of secret marriage) are to be carefully preserved in this archive. No one except the bishop holds the key to it.

When the see is vacant, the temporary Administrator of the diocese may only open the secret archive in case of genuine necessity. This new canon simplifies the rather solemn procedure demanded by the former Code. When the episcopal see was vacant, in the former law the Vicar Capitular was allowed to open the secret archive only in the presence of two other canons and he looked at any particular document while the two canons stood at his side.

On the whole, the canons (I am speaking again now of the canons of the Code, not the canons of the Chapter) in setting out the legislation on the two forms of curial archive, virtually repeat the legislation of the 1917 Code. This, in its turn, was little more than a summary of the law as given in the constitution Maxima Vigilantia of Pope Benedict XIII, issued on 14 June 1727. This eighteenth-century constitution is one of the principal sources of the ecclesiastical legislation on diocesan archives, and many of its prescriptions remain in force today through their inclusion in the Code of 1983. Other important documents which helped to form canon law on archives were two constitutions of Pope Benedict XIV, in 1741 and 1752, and, more recently, the constitution Etsi Nos of Pope Pius X of 1912. Pope John XXIII issued a motu proprio in 1960, which gave new directives for the ecclesiastical archives of Italy.

Having considered the first two forms of archive to be found in the new Code, we come now to the third. Canon 535, 4 gives the norm: In every parish there is to be an archive. Earlier in the Code, can. 491,1 placed on bishops of dioceses the obligation to ensure that the acts and documents contained in the archives of cathedral churches and parish churches in their territory were carefully preserved. This canon also imposes the duty of drawing up a catalogue of the contents of all these archives. One copy of the catalogue is to be kept in the archive of the church itself, the other is to be sent to and kept in the diocesan archive. Whether this has ever been done in any of our dioceses I do not know; if it were to be done, it would be a very large undertaking.

The next question must be what, if the norms of the Code are to be observed, must be kept in the archives of a parish. For the answer, it is necessary to go to the canons which regulate the organisation of parishes. Can.535 decrees: 'In the parish archive are kept the parish registers, together with the letters of the bishops, and other documents which ought to be kept for the sake either of necessity or usefulness'.

The parish archive is subject to the bishop's inspection at the time of his visitation. The parish priest is given the responsibility of ensuring that the contents of the parish archive do not leave the possession of the parish. A canon of this section (535, 5) prescribes that older parish registers be diligently preserved. This is a general obligation of the universal law. It may be made more specific by particular law from the bishop of the diocese. For example, he may wish to determine that registers of a certain age be kept in a particular manner or place.

Each parish is to have its own register of baptism, marriage and death, and any others which the bishop may order. It is the obligation of the parish priest to see that these registers are accurately filled in and carefully preserved. My own bishop, every so often in his letters to the clergy, reminds them about completing registers in legible handwriting, asks them to use pen and ink and not ball-point, and not to leave gaps in entries. The fact that these directives have to be repeated suggests that it is a never-ending struggle to get priests to comply with them.

What details should go into registers is legislated in a very precise way. An entry in a baptism register, to fulfil the requirements of the new Code (can. 877) has to mention the name of the person baptised, the minister of baptism, the parents and godparents, the place and date of baptism and the place and date of birth. In addition, the entry in the baptism register is to be completed, in the course of time, by further entries noting the confirmation, marriage, adoption, ordination, profession of vows or change of rite of the person.

The well set up parish archive should also, according to the Code, contain an up-to-date inventory of the property belonging to the parish, including any precious goods or items which have artistic or cultural value (Can. 1283, 2 and 3). Legal deeds and titles to ownership have to be kept in proper order in a suitable archive (Can. 1284, 2 and 9). A complete copy of such a catalogue of goods, together with copies of documents of ownership, are to be lodged in the diocesan archive.

So much for the parish archive, which was the third of the forms of archive dealt with in the Code. The fourth form of archive which the Code establishes and regulates is something that is new to the present Code, since it was not specifically mentioned in the former Code. Our new Code, viz. Can. 491, 2, gives to the bishop of a diocese the duty to ensure that there is in the diocese an historical archive and that documents that have historical value are diligently kept and systematically ordered. It is worthy of note that this canon is not phrased in the sense of urging a recommendation or making a request, if circumstances permit. What is involved is a genuine obligation of law. Terse though this new canon is, it lays down what the law sees as essential for the historical archive. First, it makes it an obligation to have such an archive in each diocese; it determines that whatever documents have historical value are to be preserved in it; and finally, that they must be organised according to a system — without specifying that this be chronological or regional or any other particular system.

One of the much praised features of the new canon law is that, while legislating for the basic elements which are common to the whole Church, it leaves freedom to each individual bishop or conference of bishops to make more specific laws to suit the circumstances of the diocese or the country. The fact that the universal law contained in the Code is so brief on the subject of the historical archive does not mean that there is little to say and that all that there is to say is included in the Code. A more proper understanding is that the Code has given the essential obligations; further, more detailed, legislation is to come from the local bishop. Bishops are, through the fulness of the sacrament of orders, lawgivers in the Church. However, we do not expect them to be experts in all the matters for which they give laws; consequently, individual archivists or a society of archivists are in a position to advise a bishop about what might be done to supplement the universal legislation with local legislation, in the area of collecting and preserving items for the historical archive.

Earlier, it was remarked that the Code makes the chancellor of the diocese the keeper of the curial archive; various canons regulate his or her appointment, duties and the qualities required to hold the office. The universal law of the Code does not make any specific provisions regarding the office of the keeper of the historical archive. The diocesan bishop could, if he considered it useful, form his own particular law concerning the appointment of the archivist and assistants, together with their obligations and duties.

If in the matter of archives I have been concerned so far with the diocese, this is a reflection of the Code itself, and does not stem from the bias of a secular priest towards diocesan structures, or from a lack of interest in the religious institutes. In a number of canons on the religious life there is mention of the need for written documents, e.g. in can. 681, regarding a written agreement or pact between a bishop and the superior of a religious institute whose members are undertaking apostolic work in the diocese. However, for religious, there is in the new Code no specific group of canons giving legislation for an archive, similar to that of the diocesan archive.

This can be well explained by a fact alluded to earlier. Especially in the legislation on religious life, the new Code has tried to avoid imposing a uniform and standard pattern on all institutes, since they vary so much in their spirit and their work. It has, therefore, left each institute opportunity to form its own law, within the framework of the universal law. In this way, the superior or governing body of each religious institute, using their existing norms or else adapting the norms given by the Code on the diocesan archive, can issue directives on the archives of the particular institute.

Despite the absence of very detailed canons on the archives of religious institutes, there is a canon which can give an overall approach to the work of a religious archivist within his or her own institute, 578.

Among the general canons on the basics of all forms of consecrated life, there is the canon which states: 'The intention and wishes of founders about the nature, purpose, spirit and character of an institute, together with its healthy traditions, all of which form the patrimony of the institute, are to be faithfully observed by all'. The role of the religious archivist is contained in the canon, for the intention and wishes of a founder or foundress concerning the nature, spirit, purpose and character of the institute will, normally, be found in the papers, documents, letters etc. of the founder and his or her early collaborators. To bring together, preserve and order these sources and other documents illustrating the sound traditions of the institute is within the province of the archivist. Thus the archivist of a religious institute assists in the work of keeping the institute faithful to its founder, as the Code requires it to be.

Something similar could be said of the work of the diocesan archivist, and his or her assistants. One emphasis of the new Code of Canon Law is away from an excessive centralization of the Church in order to bring out the importance of the particular or local Church, which is the diocese. To bring together and preserve and also to make more widely known, all kinds of aspects of the history of a diocese and its personalities, is to help to create a sense of the special nature of this or that local Church, its own spirit and character. Although this is not directly stated in the Code, it is very much in keeping with its respect for the local Church in the setting of the universal Church.

In this country and generally throughout the Church, canon lawyers tend to concentrate on the law relating to matrimony and to judicial procedure, because the bulk of their time as lawyers is spent in dealing in the ecclesiastical tribunals with matrimonial causes, nearly always in relation to nullity of marriage. At the beginning of this year the Holy Father addressed the judges and officials of the Tribunal of the Roman Rota. He told the canon lawyers not to forget that the Code of Canon Law is not limited to the law on their own special province of marriage and court procedure. They must know the whole Code. 'The law which will guide you', he said, 'is the new Code of Canon Law. You must know it perfectly, not only in the procedural and marriage sections, but in its entirety, so that you may have complete knowledge of it'. It is, therefore, in accordance with the wish of the Holy Father to want to discover and to apply what the Code of Canon Law prescribes on that aspect of Church life which is the concern of the ecclesiastical archivist.

In the legislation of the new Code of Canon Law, archivists can see a recognition by the Church of the existence and value of archives and archivists. The restatement of former laws and the formulation of new laws, which together make up the 1983 legislation on archives, serve the purpose common to law in classify these different founts in chronological order of the merging of the congregations or the suppression of the congregations, preserving inside each the classification formerly adopted. In the case of 'fusion' or 'federation' of several congregations forming practically a new congregation, establish 'closed founts' for the former congregations, and begin a new classification, unique, with a cut-off of the date of erection of the new congregation.

Series D: Relations with ecclesiastical authorities:

- 1 D Holy See and Roman Congregations.
 - 1 D 1 Documents emanating from the Sovereign Pontiff.
 - 1 D 2 Documents emanating from the S.C. of Religious.
 - 1 D 3 Documents emanating from the S.C. of Rites or the Pontifical Commission for Divine Worship.
 - 1 D 4 Documents emanating from the Tribunal of the Sacred Penitentiary.
 - 1 D 5 Documents emanating from the S.C. of the Propaganda or for the Evangelization of Peoples.
- 2 D Episcopal Conferences.
- 3 D Nunciatures.
- 4 D Local Bishops.
- 5 D Religious orders of men upon whom the congregation depends (or 'double' order).

Series E: Relationships with unions of religious women and other institutes:

- 1 E Contacts previous to the establishment of the unions of religious women.
- 2 E International union of major superiors of women.
- 3 E Continental unions of major superiors of women.
- 4 E National general unions of major superiors of women.
- 5 E National special unions (nursing and teaching) of major superiors of women.
- 6 E Diocesan unions.
- 7 E Relationships with congregations of the same spiritual family.
- 8 E Relationships with other institutes.
- 9 E Relationships with the federation (if any).

Series F: Relationships with civil authorities:

- 1 F Files concerning the legal status of the congregation.
- 2 F Letters of civil authorities in France.

- 3 R Conferences given to the congregation. Different manuscripts or archives donated or left by will to the congregation.

Series S: Objects and souvenirs:

- 1 S Works formerly employed in the congregation.
 - 1 S 1 Manuscripts.
 - 1 S 2 Publications.

- 2 S Inventories of libraries of the congregation.
- 3 S Photographs with names, place and date.
- 4 S Audio-visual documents.
- 5 S Inventories of souvenirs having the value of museum pieces, with mention of place where they are preserved (and their origin, if known).

NOTE

The above scheme of classification was originally published in The Gazette of Archives (Paris, 1970) and is reprinted by permission of Fr J.I. Dirvin C.M. Although the experience of religious archivists, as evidenced by differing arrangements of archives described in many articles already published in Catholic Archives, is that no single scheme is of general application but that each archive shapes its own order, nevertheless, this 1970 classification, albeit requiring some modification to assimilate changes since Vatican II, still provides a most useful basic framework on which archivists can model their own schemes, as well as offering many valuable ideas for identifying archives and their relationship, to justify its republication. Readers may care also to refer to a simpler 'Scheme of Classification of Archives of Religious Archives', devised by a Working Party of the Society and published in Catholic Archives, No.1, 1981, pp. 40-41.

SCOTTISH CATHOLIC ARCHIVES

In his annual report, t'r Mark Dilworth O.S.B., Keeper of the Scottish Catholic Archives, records the following progress. The original major objective of sorting, listing and calendaring all pre-1978 holdings has been achieved. The work took longer than had been estimated, as some collections for which a list existed were discovered to be inadequately sorted and had to be re-catalogued afresh. Some completed calendars have been summarised for the handlist.

The Eastern District papers (1828—78), deposited in late 1982, have also been calendared. Arrangements are in operation for the reception on deposit of further material which remained at Blairs in 1958, since it forms part of Columba House collections.

A summary list of the more important holdings is contained in Data Sheet 6, part 27, published by the Scottish Records Association. An article on 'Archbishop James Beaton's papers in the Scottish Catholic Archives' by the Keeper is published in the Innes Review.

The Editor is obliged to Fr Mark Dilworth for permission to publish the above extracts from his report. Enquiries concerning Scottish Catholic Archives should be addressed to The Keeper, Scottish Catholic Archives, Columba House, 16 Drummond Place, Edinburgh EH3 BPL.

general — to be the standard against which is judged the work being undertaken at the present time, and to be the force which calls for new activity, towards which legislation has pointed the way.

THE VATICAN LIBRARY AND ARCHIVES

The nominations by Pope John Paul II of Fr Leonard Boyle O.P. as the new Prefect of the Vatican Library and of Fr Joseph Metzler O.M.I. as Prefect of the Vatican Secret Archives were announced in May 1984.

The appointment of Fr Boyle, an Irish Dominican with a distinguished academic, research and teaching career, will be greeted by British and Irish archivists and historians with the greatest pleasure. Medieval historians will know of his editions of texts of William of Pagula, St Raymond de Penafort, John de Friburg and Robert Grosseteste concerning canon law, pastoral care and ecclesiastical education in the 13th and 14th centuries — fourteen of his studies on these subjects were published in 1981. Fr Boyle has also made major contributions to the study of moral theology of the Middle Ages. A trained and experienced palaeographer and familiar with various manuscript sources, he published Survey of the Vatican Archives and of its Medieval Holdings, in 1972 and Bibliography of Medieval Palaeography in 1981, while The Calendar of Entries in the Papal Registers relating to Great Britain and Ireland has been published since 1970 under his general editorship.

Fr Boyle was born at Ballintra, Co. Donegal in 1923. He entered the Irish Province of the Dominican Order in 1943, studied in Cork and Dublin and from 1947 to 1951 at Blackfriars, Oxford, was ordained in 1949, and obtained his Licentiate in Theology in 1951. From 1955 he pursued research in the Vatican Archives and occupied professional posts in Palaeography and Ecclesiastical History in Rome. In 1961 he was appointed visiting Professor and in 1966 Professor of Latin Palaeography and Diplomatic in the Pontifical Institute of Mediaeval Studies in Toronto. In 1983 he was accorded a Doctorate in Sacred Theology.

Fr Joseph Metzler, the new Prefect of the Vatican Secret Archives, is world-famous as a scholar of missionary history and an acknowledged expert in archival matters. He was born in Eckadroth, Germany, in 1921, joined the Oblates of Mary Immaculate, studied at Fulda and the Gregorian University, and was ordained in 1949. He obtained his Doctorate in ecclesiastical history and was appointed Professor of the History of the Missions in the Pope Urban University in Rome in 1958. In 1966 Fr Metzler succeeded Fr N. Kowalsky O.M.I. as archivist of the Archives of the Sacred Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, and published a new catalogue of the archives in 1983. He has written extensively on the history of the Councils and of the Missions, and other specialist archival and historical topics, publishing as many as 143 articles between 1953 and 1977.

NOTE

The above notes are extracted from full biographical notices of the two appointments published in L'Osservatore Romano, cxxiv, 123, 27 May 1984.

THE CATHOLIC ARCHIVES SOCIETY CONFERENCE, 1984

The fifth annual conference, held at Spode House on 29—31 May, was attended by forty-five religious and professional archivists, including Mrs Brenda Hough, archivist of the General Synod of the Church of England, Br Leo T. Ansell C.F.C., archivist of Toowoomba Diocese, Queensland, Australia, and secretary of the non-denominational Church Archivists Society of Australia, and Sr Margaret Mary Altman D.C., until recently Secretary of the Association of Religious Archivists of Ireland.

On the first evening, 29 May, Fr Francis Edwards S.J. (Chairman) welcomed members and gave a slide-talk on the history of Stonyhurst College. The main conference day, 30 May, began with a paper by Fr Peter Ingman LCL, on the new Code of Canon Law, promulgated in June 1983, and archives, the text of which is printed in this issue. This was followed by the Society's AGM. The Chairman reviewed the Society's work and growth in 1983/4, reporting, inter alia, that there were now 200 members (170 last year) and about one hundred institutional and private subscribers to Catholic Archives. In addition to the 1984 edition of the booklet, the first edition of a Directory of Catholic Archives in the U.K. and Eire had been published. A Working Party had drafted 'Draft Clauses for the Guidance of a Diocese or Religious Congregation in the Administration of its Archives' which was published in Catholic Archives, No.4, 1984, and will be considered for formal adoption at the 1985 AGM. The Chairman had attended the national conference of L'Association des Archivistes de l'Eglise de France in Paris in November. He referred also to the work of the Society of Archivists, which had a 'Special Repositories Group', and to a discussion paper 'Towards a national policy for archives', issued by that Society. A meeting of the Northern Group of Diocesan Archivists, attended also by diocesan archivists of Southwark, Clifton, Shrewsbury, Nottingham and Northampton, had been held at Nottingham in October. The officers and Council members were duly elected and thanked for their services.

The afternoon of 30 May was occupied by a visit to Oscott, where Miss Judith Champ showed members the College, its museum, library and archives, which she is cataloguing. In the evening, Fr Michael Williams gave a paper, also published in Catholic Archives, No.4, 1984, on the history of the English College of Valladolid and its archives.

After the conference Mass on 31 May, Sr Maureen McCollum H.H.S. of the Catholic Radio and Television Centre, Hatch End, introduced members to the range and use of audio-visual aids, describing in particular the techniques (and perils) of tape-recording recollections to build up a 'sound archive'. The final session was the customary 'open forum', during which Br Leo Ansell reported in a recent tour of church archives in Australia on behalf of the Australian CAS. The 'Draft Clauses' (see above) document was also discussed, possible arrangements for a 1984 Seminar were mentioned, and the Hon. Editor asked for amendments and additional entries for the next edition of the Directory.

A fuller report of the conference appears in the CAS Newsletter, Vol.2, No.3 (Autumn 1984), obtainable from the Hon. Secretary. The 1985 Conference will be held at Spode on 28-30 May 1985.

THE CHURCH ARCHIVISTS' SOCIETY OF AUSTRALIA

The above Society published last year The Small Archive: A Handbook for Church, Order & School Archivists and Historical Societies, by Winston Maiké B.A., A.R.M.A. and Leo J. Ansell C.F.C.

The handbook is written for the 'one-person archive' and attempts to answer basic needs. The contents include: Where to Start; Method for Arranging and Describing a Collection; Indexing and Finding Aids; Storage and Protection; Conservation; Users and Access; Identification and Description Problems; Disposal and Appraisal; Copyright; Relations with other Bodies; Archival Ethics; Disasters and Conservation Supplies; Samples of Key Forms; The Small Museum; Bibliography & Index. Octavo, 152 pp.

The book is obtainable from Br L.J. Ansell C.F.C., Church Archivists' Society, P.O. Box 756. Toowoomba, Queensland, Australia 4350. The price is 9.95 Australian dollars and the postage from the U.K. is 2 dollars by surface mail and 8 dollars by airmail, and from the U.S.A. it is 2 dollars and 7 dollars respectively.

EDITORIAL NOTES

One of the first decisions of the Society after its establishment in 1979 was to publish a yearly periodical containing descriptions of the archives of religious orders, congregations, dioceses, parishes, families and individual persons, and other documentary sources, relating to the Roman Catholic Church in the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland. The long term objective of Catholic Archives, the first issue of which was published in 1981, was to record the character, content, arrangement, accessibility, and use of such archives for the benefit of all those concerned for their care and scholarly use. Such an ambitious aim could clearly be achieved only in stages, and with the publication of this, the sixth, edition of the booklet it may be useful to question whether some of the shorter term objectives are being attained.

A primary concern of both the Society and the periodical has been to emphasise the importance of the archives of a congregation, diocese or other institution, not simply as recording notable events in its history but as enshrining its original ideals and their subsequent evolution. Within recent years this has surely been better understood and in consequence the vocational nature of the archivist's work more respected.

The Society has been strengthened by the enrolment of numerous congregations and dioceses among its members and it has also been greatly encouraged by the support of the Conferences of Major Religious Superiors and of Bishops in both Britain and Ireland. But, with all the encouragement they may receive from their own congregations or dioceses, archivists usually have to work very much on their own. By publishing articles by experienced archivists in charge of long-established archives and also descriptions of how 'novice' archivists have tackled the initially daunting task of collecting hitherto scattered archives and of sorting, arranging and storing them, and by printing classification schemes and notes on archive principles and practices, Catholic Archives has sought to inform, support and hearten religious archivists in their vocational work.

It is probably impossible to discover whether the periodical is achieving another goal, that of drawing scholarly attention to the wealth of primary historical evidence in the archives of many religious congregations, dioceses, and other Catholic institutions. One test for the claim that these may contain information of value beyond the specific vocational concerns of the religious bodies themselves and bearing upon the social, educational, moral and political issues of the countries where they worked, would be the number of enquiries received by religious archivists. Comments by religious archivists in this context would be welcomed.

The Society is deeply grateful to the learned archivists and historians who have contributed articles in this issue. The periodical is not exclusively Roman Catholic and it is especially gratifying to publish a talk given by Mrs Brenda Hough, archivist to the General Synod of the Church of England, on the archives in her care at Church House, Westminster. The Hon. Editor would be glad to receive articles for publication in 1987 and beyond.

CHAOS AND UNPALATABLE TRUTHS .

The Rev. Bede Bailey O.P.

The BBC and ITV companies appear to have a different policy towards their enormous quantity of material. An article in The Listener that recently came my way suggested that ITV wanted to keep as much as possible whereas the BBC had a more wary eye on the cost. The writer of the piece was arguing that a very great deal of television material is of great archival interest.

The same question must be asked of records, even if the collection is tiny in comparison with those of the TV companies. What should we keep? What space is available? Is there any chance of having a permanent home?

One of the effects of trying to keep the details' is that the despised cupboards on stairs, and brown-paper parcels in drawers, once more show their use, with the almost certain result, unless one is very methodical, that items are hard to find. Yet it is greatly preferable not to be able to find what we know we have than to leave those archival waifs and strays that have survived to the mercy of the tidiers-up.

So my policy has been to try and gather together all that is relevant to the history, the strange story, of the English Dominicans, and the Scots as well. I suspect that much has gone on to the bonfire or into the waste bin, even though archives are fashionable for the moment. It is perhaps inevitable.

Since a large proportion of our archives came down the Great North Road to the ferry at Lyminster, there have been some notable additions to the collection. ¹

Perhaps one of the more interesting additions are to do with the Guild of St Joseph and St Dominic, started at Ditchling at the end of the Great War by Hilary Pepler and Eric Gill. These papers, so I understand, have never been seen by the authors of the various books on Gill. But now the present members of the Guild have generously allowed all their records to be photo-copied; they have now become twenty-five or more bound volumes of letters, accounts, minute-books, lists of publications, records of the week to week activities of the Guild. Added to these is the collection of papers most generously given by Hilary Pepler's children. So this is a collection that is at any rate complementary to what is to be found in a variety of libraries in America. It is tempting to exaggerate, but the Ditchling papers seem to me to be a real 'family archive'.

We have also received, through the generosity of the donor, an extensive collection of letters, photo-copies, photographs, published books and articles and of comment concerning John Gray, the 1890's aesthete and poet, who later became Canon John Gray of the archdiocese of St Andrew's and Edinburgh, and of his guide and mentor, Andre' Sebastian Raffalovich. They both became members of the Third Order of St Dominic, and the province became their heir. With the collection held elsewhere in our province, this amounts perhaps to the collection of the Gray-Raffalovich papers, carefully gathered over the last thirty years. They are full of the strangeness, unexpectedness, of human life.

We have received all, or almost all, of the papers left by Victor White, the Dominican theologian who collaborated with Dr C. G. Jung. He died in 1961 and now is almost forgotten. Yet he was a pathfinder among theologians, a christener of psychology, a highly valued member of that Zurich group; and all the time within the context of his theological expertise. These papers could, I suspect, show the development of the young convert, coming to our novitiate from the English College at Valladolid, his introduction to wider-ranging theological potential at Hawkesyard, Oxford and Louvain until he became a master figure of his later years.

Father Victor was a serious scholar. So are others to be found on our shelves. So it must be with all comparable collections, I am sure. And yet I read recently, in a review of Dr Edward Norman's book, The English Catholic Church in the Nineteenth Century, that a competent history of the next period in England, up to Vatican II 'would largely be a humdrum tale of humdrum men, with few minds worth going into.' That is an astounding statement; I would have thought that a visit to the writer's own cemetery would have produced several names whose owners were not at all humdrum, and whose minds should not be treated dismissively. Someone else said to me recently that in his opinion the 1920's and 1930's were 'a golden age'. And even the humdrum are interesting. One of the purposes of our Society should be to make impossible such an odd statement.

I have visited the house and store-room of Mr John Bevan, the bookseller, high up and far away in the lanes of the Hereford-Monmouthshire border. Among many fascinating items, most of them, I believe, from libraries of various religious houses, I found the Downside Review of Summer-Autumn 1959. It included an article by our Kenelm Foster, and so was precious to me. Later I found it also printed Professor H. P. R. Finberg's The Catholic Historian and his Theme, which seems to me to have great relevance to an archivist in my limited and confined context. There too was Professor Cobb's The Police and the People, French Popular Protest 1789—1820.

Professor Cobb wrote of 'his inordinate love of detail', and how he refuses to listen to the warnings of those who prefer a less exacting view. He considers himself to be a 'human' historian, 'concerned to write about ordinary people', and certainly not a sociologist or an economist. 'I am writing about people, not about movements: about attitudes, prejudices and mentalities, not about thought.' He thinks his subject is chaotic, and perhaps that he writes chaotically. But he does not mean to worry. He is, he says, a local historian, not a national one; and he is impressionistic rather than exhaustive.

I found myself wondering what relevance this has for an archivist of a religious order. There must, surely, be a muddling of the historian and of the collector of records, the archivist. The fact that we collect papers belonging to people with whom we have lived, have been our friends, must influence the religious archivist. I must confess that I have never destroyed any, perhaps unexpected, evidence. Professor Stubbs urged the historian 'to rest content with nothing less than the attainable maximum of truth', though he should root his work 'on nothing less sacred than that highest justice which is found in the deep-sympathy with erring and straying man.'

This brings us to a point of decision. Professor Finberg quoted Lord Acton: history 'undermines respect, . . . teaches disrespect'. History, the great man taught, is an 'iconoclast . . . not a teacher of reverence. The feet of many men, valued by divines, crumble to pieces in the contact with history.' I confess that I wonder how true, nowadays at least, that judgement is. I have never found myself thinking less of individuals I have known when, say, characteristics of weakness unexpectedly may appear. In fact, rather the contrary; the 'victim' appears more as a real person.

In 1896 Tablets there is a great to-do about Purcell's Life of Manning. Issue after issue condemns not only the author but also the cardinal's executors for allowing the author to have the material, and, in particular, the letters. It was thought to have been an outrage that anyone was allowed to see them. A year or two later, when Purcell died, he was presented to Tablet readers as the one-time editor of a defunct newspaper, the Westminster Gazette, and as 'the author of a life of Cardinal Manning', four or five lines in all. Nowadays, however, Purcell's two volumes are treated as a prime source for understanding Manning's life, especially with the sad fate of the Manning archive. 'The complaint against Purcell', wrote Finberg, 'was not that he suppressed or distorted facts, but that he published too many of them.'

We should leave it to others to tear up and bum. 'The intellectual virtues', wrote von Hugel, ' . . . candour, moral courage, intellectual honesty, scrupulous accuracy, endless docility to facts . . . : these and many other cognate qualities bear upon them the impress of God and His Christ.' The writing of history may be a hazardous affair; but as far as possible we should make it possible to judge truthfully and in the round.

THE ARCHIVES OF THE EASTERN DISTRICT OF SCOTLAND (1829-1878) AND OF THE ARCHDIOCESE OF ST ANDREWS AND EDINBURGH,
1878-1928

Christine Johnson

From 1732 until 1829 the Scottish Mission was divided into two Vicariates, the Lowland and the Highland. In 1829 these two Vicariates gave way to three: Northern, Western and Eastern. With this new arrangement the old Lowland District was divided roughly into two. The Northern District (centre Aberdeen) acquired part of the old Highland District, while the Eastern District lost Glasgow and the Clyde area to the new Western District. The centre for the Eastern District was Edinburgh, the residence of the Vicar Apostolic of the former Lowland District. In 1878 the Eastern District was itself divided when the Hierarchy was restored. Edinburgh became the centre for the Archdiocese of St Andrews and Edinburgh, the Dundee-Perth area became the diocese of Dunkeld, and Dumfries and Galloway became the diocese of Galloway.

The vast majority of the surviving Lowland District archives found their way over the years to Preshome and then to Blairs College, both in the north-east of Scotland, before being deposited finally in the Scottish Catholic Archives in Edinburgh. From the time of the consecration as bishop of Andrew Carruthers, the Eastern District began to accumulate in Edinburgh. When the hierarchy was restored the then bishop of the Eastern District, John Strain, became the first archbishop of St Andrews and Edinburgh, staying on in the same house, and accumulating his archives as before, thus ensuring a continuity throughout this major transition of much of the documentation of the period. Subsequent archbishops continued to add to the archdiocesan archives. Although on the death of a prelate his papers would generally be sorted and some at least destroyed, the remainder over the years reached such proportions that they could no longer be easily housed in the archbishop's residence. In 1930 the new archbishop, Andrew Joseph MacDonald, gave permission for the entire collection to be removed to the archdiocesan offices. The task of dealing with the documents fell to James Maguire, later coadjutor-bishop of Dunkeld. Maguire sorted through the documents, arranged them, and compiled an index which was, in his own words, '... an attempt at some kind of order'. This index allowed the documents to be utilised by scholars over the following fifty years. The archdiocesan offices were not designed to accommodate research students and so in 1982 it was decided to remove the collection to the Scottish Catholic Archives where the Lowland District papers were already housed and where a pleasant reading room was provided for researchers.

The collection of documents which was thus deposited presented a number of problems to the cataloguer. In the first place, Maguire had to some unknown extent imposed an artificial arrangement on them. In the second place, not all the documents had in fact been arranged and indexed, and, in the third place, they were unsatisfactorily stored. The last problem was easily solved by removing documents from unwieldy letter books and dusty folders and placing them, flattened out, into manageable bundles which could be stored in dust-proof boxes. The other problems were more complex. It was decided, in spite of the limitations so imposed, to adhere as far as possible to Maguire's arrangement of documents so that his index could still be used. In the event, some re-arrangement proved to be essential. Maguire's arrangement was as follows:

- A—G: letters, etc., pertaining to the period of each bishop or archbishop in turn from Bishop Carruthers (d. 1852) to Archbishop James Smith (d. 1928).
- H: 'Miscellaneous things of all periods.'
- K: 'Diaries, various lists of students, etc.'
- M: 'Chiefly Money Matters, Statistics, etc.'
- Q: 'Chiefly monetary affairs pertaining to Hierarchy in a tin box marked Q'
- R: 'Education all times down to 1921'
- Y: 'Chiefly Wills, Executives, etc.'
- X: Papers relating to Ratisbon and to the Scots foundations in France; letters written by Bp Hay d. 1811; Manuscripts of Bp Geddes d. 1799; letters from Lord Bute 1880-95; etc.

In addition to the above, there was a large number of lawyers'communications and various miscellaneous items which had not been listed by Maguire. It can be seen from the above list that 'X' was a totally miscellaneous collection of documents. 'A'—'G' on the other hand were more systematically arranged with descriptive notes about them in the index, and provided a working basis for a workable catalogue arranged as follows:

- ED 1: Bp Andrew Carruthers [1770—1852] papers and his period as bishop [1833-1852].
- ED 2: Bp James Gillis [1802—1864] papers and his period as bishop [1852—1864],
- ED 3: John Strain [1810—1883] papers and his period as bishop and archbishop [1864-1883].
- ED 4: Abp William Smith [1819—1892] papers and his period as archbishop [1885-1892],
- ED 5: Abp Angus MacDonald [1844—1900] papers and his period as archbishop [1892-1900],
- ED 6: Abp James Smith [1841—1928] and his period as archbishop [1900—1928].
- ED 7: General mission matters.
- ED 8: Colleges and students.
- ED 5: Education: schools and teacher training.

- ED 10: Printed pastorals, circulars, synods, etc.
- ED 11: Individual mission stations.
- ED 12: Finances, trust funds.

Within this general arrangement it is possible to pick out items of particular interest and to give some idea of the general content of each category.

ED 1: This category can be subdivided as follows:

- a) Bp Carruthers' papers and letters addressed to him.
- b) Papers of individual priests of the Carruthers period and before.
- c) Papers belonging to the pre-1829 period which must have been left at Cathedral House, Edinburgh and were later added to the Eastern District archives.

Of particular interest is Bishop Geddes: 'Some account of the state of the Catholic Religion in Scotland during the years 1745, 1746, 1747'. This is the original draft with additions and alterations completed by Geddes in Aberdeen in 1794.

ED 2—6: These categories have many common features. Each consists mainly of letters to the particular bishop or archbishop, including personal letters dating sometimes from well before his consecration as well as letters received during his term of office. Letters are divided into sub-sections: from Scottish bishops, from non-Scottish bishops, from the rectors of the different colleges and so on, and may deal with problems of individual mission stations of the various religious houses. Some topics of correspondence may carry forward from one category to the next while others are specific to one particular category. The following are of interest:

ED 2: Letters from various architects: Augustus Welby Pugin, Edward Welby Pugin, James Gillespie Graham and J. A. Hansom.

ED 3: Documents about the dispute with Dunkeld. When the Hierarchy was restored in 1878 and Dunkeld was made into a separate diocese, about ten years of disputation ensued. Dunkeld claimed that it had been allocated a high proportion of mission stations which were encumbered by large debts, debts which it was forced to shoulder with no help from the archdiocese of Edinburgh. This the bishop of Dunkeld considered to be unfair. He also considered to be unfair the division of the old Eastern District funds among the new dioceses. Rome was consulted; John Bewick, later Bishop of Hexham and Newcastle, was appointed arbiter; but still the dispute dragged on until 1888.

ED 4: Of particular interest are the papers concerning the first Provincial Council, held at Fort Augustus in 1886. Also included is the correspondence concerning the tercentenary of Mary Queen of Scots and opinions regarding the case for her beatification. Among Archbishop William Smith's personal papers is a draft of part of his famous work on the Pentateuch.

ED 5: Archbishop Angus MacDonald was originally consecrated Bishop of Argyll and the Isles in 1878. In 1892 he was translated to the archdiocese of St Andrews and Edinburgh. Maguire appended the following comment to his index of MacDonald's papers: 'Anything directly affecting Argyll and the Isles which I came across was forwarded to Bp Martin with the concurrence of Abp McD. OSB.' Bishop Martin was the bishop of Argyll in 1930. Among the remaining documents are papers dealing with pilgrimages to Iona, Lourdes and Rome; material on the foundation and early years of the Catholic Truth Society of Scotland; and further correspondence about the cause for beatification of Queen Mary.

ED 6: Archbishop James Smith was rector at Blairs College before being consecrated Bishop of Dunkeld in 1890. He was translated to the archdiocese in 1900. Of his papers Maguire notes:

Under this letter F are to be found correspondence etc. pertaining to J. A. Smith . . . What was found pertaining to Dunkeld was put in boxes, sent to Bp Toner. He and Canon McCurragh went through such papers, retaining anything of importance and destroying the rest

Some of the correspondence here is previous to his ordination, just a fraction retained. Much of his correspondence pertaining to the 80's was bundled together and a request on the end 'please burn'. This was done.

In spite of this pruning of Smith's papers, ED 6 is one of the largest categories. It includes correspondence regarding war chaplains, the foundation of Holy Cross Academy, the pilgrimage to Rome, the problem of the Ancient Order of Hibernians, Catholic representation at the coronations of 1902 and 1911, and Monsignor Brown's Apostolic Visitation of Scotland.

ED 7: General documents and correspondence brought together from the Maguire categories H—Y and covering all periods from the 1820's to about 1920. Included are proof copies of the Scottish Proprium and Roman documents. There is also a large correspondence from Lord Bute regarding his proposal of a Roman Catholic college attached to St Andrews University; his wish for a full choir and public recitation of the Office daily at Oban Cathedral; his work on Scottish Saints, etc.

ED 8: Documents of all periods relating to the colleges. These consist of general correspondence from the various rectors, lists of students, administration of burses and accounts. Among the earlier material are papers dealing with the recovery of Mission property in France after the Napoleonic wars, and others dealing with Bishop Gillis's negotiations with the Bavarian government regarding the Scots monastery at Ratisbon.

- ED 9: Education — all periods. Documents include Education Bills, Poor Board cases, the Poor School Committee, Government grants to schools and the take-over of Catholic schools by the State.
- ED 10: Patorals, circulars and other printed material.
- ED 11: Mission Stations, 1841 -1949. This section is divided into two parts:
a) Mission returns made at the request of the hierarchy, including inventories, mission statistics and statements of accounts.
b) Papers relating to individual mission stations; mainly lawyers' correspondence and other letters regarding money and property.
- ED 12: Finances and Trust Funds, all periods. Documents include account books, priests' wills and executry, papers about the division of the common funds with the restoration of the hierarchy, and letters from solicitors.

Of the above twelve categories, ED 1—6 consist mainly (with the possible exception of ED 1) of letters to the various bishops and archbishops. ED 7—12 contain lawyers' letters, legal and other documents, etc., which relate on the whole to particular topics rather than to particular people. This arrangement follows where practicable Maguire's index. It does pose a few problems for the researcher. For instance, James Smith was a student during Gillis's episcopacy, a professor at Blairs during William Smith's time as Archbishop, and Bishop of Dunkeld while Angus MacDonald was Archbishop, and letters to him span all these years, covering topics which are also referred to under the appropriate bishop or archbishop. In other words, there is a large chronological overlap. But if the researcher is prepared to spend some time reading catalogues he will discover a remarkably full documentation of the history not only of the Eastern District of Scotland but also of the first forty years of the Archdiocese of St Andrews and Edinburgh. I hope the above account will also give some indication of the history of the Archives themselves, and of how they have come to the state in which they are now to be found in the Scottish Catholic Archives.

TWO ANTIQUARIAN MONKS: THE PAPERS OF DOM BEDE CAMM AND DOM ETHELBERT HORNE
AT DOWNSIDE

Dominic Aidan Bellenger O.S.B.

In the first half of the present century the monastic community of St Gregory's, Downside, experienced a great age of scholarship. Some of its monks — Dom Cuthbert Butler, Dom John Chapman, Dom Hugh Connolly, Cardinal Aidan Gasquet and Dom David Knowles among them — had a European reputation. There were many others during this period who are less well-known now but who, among their contemporaries, were names to be reckoned with. The two antiquarian monks — Bede Camm and Ethelbert Home — who form the subject of this second article on personal collections in the Downside Archives come into this latter category. ¹

DOM BEDE CAMM'S PAPERS

1 Biographical Note

Reginald Camm was born at Sunbury Park, Middlesex, on 26 December 1864. He was educated at Westminster School and Keble College, Oxford, where he graduated with second class honours in the Divinity Schools in 1887. He studied for the Anglican ministry at Cuddesdon, was ordained priest by Bishop Thorold of Rochester in 1888, and served as curate at the church of St Agnes, Kennington, until 1890. In that year he was received into the Catholic Church at Maredsous Abbey in Belgium. He was clothed with the Benedictine habit, taking Bede as his religious name, in 1890 and was professed on 8 December 1891. He made his solemn vows on 25 December 1894. As a monk he pursued further theological studies at St Anselmo in Rome and was ordained priest in the Lateran Basilica by Cardinal Parrocchi on 9 March 1895. He resided at Erdington Abbey, Birmingham, from 1895 to 1912.

In 1913 he prepared the Anglican monks of Caldey and nuns of St Bride's, Milford Haven, for their reception into the Catholic Church. In June 1913 he was appointed Novice Master at Caldey by the Holy See. On 21 September 1913 he was affiliated to Downside and renewed his profession before Abbot Cuthbert Butler. In 1913—1914 he toured England lecturing and preaching to raise funds for Caldey and for Tyburn Convent in London.

With the advent of war he became a military chaplain. He went to Glasgow as a chaplain to a hospital for the wounded in August 1915 and to Egypt in December 1915. He remained there until he was demobilised in the spring of 1919.

In the Michaelmas Term of 1919 he went to Cambridge as Master of Benet House. He held this office until ill-health forced his retirement in June 1931. In 1919 he had proceeded to the degree of Master of Arts at Cambridge, and in 1922 he was elected F.S.A. He returned to Downside in 1931 and spent his final months at a nursing home at Clifton. He died at Clifton on 8 September 1942 and was buried at Downside.

Dom Bede was a popular and learned writer on the English Martyrs and monastic history. He was also an expert on rood-screens and relics of the saints.

Dom Bede Camm [1864-1942]
by Aidan Savage

He was a prolific author of devotional, historical and antiquarian works. His principal writings were: A Benedictine Martyr in England (1897), In the Brave Days of Old (1900), A Day in the Cloister (1900), Blessed Sebastian Newdigate (1900), Lives of the English Martyrs (Vol. I 1904, Vol. II 1905), Tyburn Conferences (1906), Rood-Screens and Rood-Lofts (with F. Bligh Bond, 1909), Birthday Book of the English Martyrs (1909), Heroes of the Faith (1909), William Cardinal Allen (1909), Forgotten Shrines (1910), Pilgrim Paths in Latin Lands (1923), and Good Fruit of Tyburn Tree (1929). He was editor of the 'St Nicholas Series' from 1908 to 1909. Dom Bede's portrait, in pencil, by Aidan Savage, is at Benet House, Cambridge.

II The Papers

Camm's many activities are represented in his collection which includes much historical material as well as personal correspondence. For the sake of convenience I have divided the collection, which is kept in cupboards on Floor B of the Monastery Library, into two main areas — personal and historical.

A Personal

General Correspondence. Seven boxes. Boxes 1—6 have correspondents filed alphabetically (A—B, C, D—E, F, G, H). Box 7 has files from I—M and many unsorted correspondents. Most date from c. 1910—1925. There are virtually no copies of Camm's own letters. His correspondents included R. H. Benson, Cardinals Gasquet and Raphael Merry del Val (in connection with a controversy between Camm and Father Vincent McNabb, O.P.), Fathers C.C.Martindale, S.J. and J. H. Pollen, S. J. There is a preponderance of clerical and academic correspondents but the collection also includes letters from soldiers who had been ministered to by Camm during the Great War.

Large box containing commonplace books, notebooks, etc., dating from his Cuddesdon days. The notebooks include 3 volumes of MS notes on the Rule of St Benedict.

1 box containing diaries, 1886—1918 (incomplete).

1 box containing a file on Caldey and a file on St Bride's, Milford Haven. MS and printed material.

1 box containing paper cuttings.

2 albums and a small box of photographs — personal and historical.

(In the Librarian's Room at the monastery library there is a collection of many volumes of postcards mounted in albums by Camm and mainly topographical in interest).

3 envelopes. One contains Camm's MS memoir of Thomas Wilkinson, Bishop of Hexham and Newcastle, and letters from the bishop. The second has MS memoirs of Dom Wilfrid Wallace of Erdington also by Camm. The third contains a small bundle of letters from Aymer Vallance, the antiquarian writer.

B Historical

4 boxes of files on the English Martyrs arranged in alphabetical order (Cardinal Allen — John Duckett, Queen Elizabeth — Napier, Padley — Purshall, Rambler — Wright). (Accession Numbers, 2008-2010).

6 small boxes of material on Martyrs (mainly English):

1. Letters from J.H.Pollen, S.J. MS Hymns to Thomas of Canterbury.
2. Harrington, Relics, Sawston.
3. Oliver Plunkett. John Roberts.
4. Various Papers and Notes.
5. Benedictine Martyrs. Challoner MSS at Oscott (transcripts).
6. Index to 'Footprints of English Martyrs' (MS).

1 box Papers concerned with the English Martyrs (mainly transcripts of MSS), (Accession Number 1906).

1 volume MS transcript of 'A true reporte of the death and martyrdom of M. Campion Jesuite . . . 1581 (B.M. Cat. 1370 a. 38).

Annotated Copy of Camm's Birthday Book (1909). Title page and dedication page illustrated by Rev. Mother Marie de St Pierre, Superioress of Tyburn Convent and Foundress of the Congregation of the Religious Adorers of the Sacred Heart (Accession Number 1349).

Bound volume of photographs, correspondence and offprints by Camm and others on Devonshire Screens and Rood-lofts.

Portfolio of original drawings of Trawsfynnid, the birthplace of John Roberts, by W. Aloysius Johnson (1926).

2 small boxes of miscellaneous material. I MSS — II Mainly printed (includes files on medieval embroidery).

DOM ETHELBERT'S PAPERS

I Biographical Note

Percy Home was born at Egham, Surrey, on 10 November 1858. He was educated at Reading School and was a convert to Catholicism. He was clothed as a novice for Downside at Belmont on 28 November 1880, taking Ethelbert as his religious name. He was professed on 15 December 1881 and made his solemn vows on 25 January 1885. He was ordained priest at Downside on 13 January 1889. He worked in the school for a short time, but his principal apostolate was in the village; he was Parish Priest of Stratton-on-the-Fosse from 1891 to 1940. He was on the local District Council for twenty-five years and chaired the Education Committee for thirty-three years. In his capacity as monastic Custodian of the Relics he augmented the already considerable collection of relics at Downside. He amassed a unique collection of hour glasses. He served as Claustal Prior of Downside from 1929 to 1933 and was made Cathedral Prior of Norwich in 1934. In 1939, he became titular Abbot of Glastonbury. He died on 3 November 1952, the feast of St Vigor, patron Saint of Stratton, and is buried in the monastic cemetery at Downside.

Abbot Home's reputation as an archaeologist and an antiquary was considerable. He joined the Somerset Archaeological Society in 1886 and was its president from July 1940 to July 1942. He served as Vice-President from 1942 to 1952. In 1924, he was elected F.S.A., and served on the Council of the Society of Antiquaries in 1930. He was Vice-President of the Bath Archaeological Society and President of the Glastonbury Antiquarian Society. As an archaeologist, he was particularly concerned with excavations at Glastonbury Abbey during the 1920's. As an antiquary, he is best known for his work on scratch dials on which he published a major study — one of many books on folklore, antiquity and local history which he published. He was also known as an authority on natural history. (For further biographical information see Fasti Gregoriani (MS Downside Abbey); Proceedings of the Somerset Archaeological and Natural History Society 97 (1952), pp. 193-194, and The Antiquaries Journal 33 (1953), p.273. There is a portrait in oils of Dom Ethelbert by Aidan Savage in the Downside Archives Room and he was the subject of one of Dom Hubert van Zeller's 'Family Portraits'.

II The Papers

Dom Ethelbert's papers, kept in two cupboards on Floor A of the Downside Abbey Library, reflect his wide range of interests. They include substantial documentation of the half century of his incumbency at Stratton where the church with its rood-screen and 'liturgical' ostrich eggs formed the centre of a whole range of church-based activities. They also include information on the controversies surrounding the excavations at Glastonbury and an interesting collection of letters from the scholarly Dean Armitage Robinson of Wells. What follows is a summary list under subject headings:

(A) Antiquarian and Archaeological Interests

1 box of drawings, plans, etc., (Antiquarian, archaeological, genealogical).

1 box of annotated copies of his published works on Scratch Dials, Low Side Windows and Holy Wells. This box also contains MS of his work on Somerset Dovecotes, and reviews of his writings on Scratch Dials. Many of these volumes include photographs by Dom Ethelbert.

2 boxes of MS writings. One (mainly antiquarian) includes subjects as diverse as 'The Vested Crucifix', 'The Crown of Thorns' and 'Altar Stones'. The other has the texts of his W.E.A. Lectures (mainly on Local History and Folklore) and his Catechism of Christian Doctrine.

3 boxes on Glastonbury Abbey excavations. Two contain correspondence, reports, newspaper cuttings, etc., principally for the period 1926—1951. The controversy surrounding the 'psychic archaeology' of F. Bligh Bond is well documented.

2 boxes of notes, photographs, authentications, correspondence, etc., on relics of the Saints.

1 folder (illustrated) on St Thomas of Hereford whose head is enshrined at Downside.

1 box of notes, correspondence, etc., on the martyrs and relics (taken from Spolia of Dom Julian Stonor).

An envelope of photographs and correspondence on medieval embroidered vestments at Downside, and similar examples elsewhere. (Accession Number 1963).
Box of MS Drawings, etc., of Keynsham Roman Villa, by Dr Arthur Bullied.

(B) Monastic Papers

2 boxes. One contains mainly MS items including Home's Notes on the Reform of the E.B.C. Constitutions (1947) and notes on Archbishop Ullathorne on the Monastic Life (taken in 1886). The other (3094) contains mainly printed 'Pamphlets, Notices, Decrees, etc.' (c. 1900).

(C) Parish Papers

4 boxes of letters, cuttings, bills, notices, etc. covering every aspect of parish life. They include Home's MS memoirs of his work as a Parish Priest. Subscription Book for Dom Ethelbert's Golden Jubilee Fund (1939).

(D) Personal Papers and Individual Correspondents

1 box of Family and Personal Papers.

1 box of Appointment Diaries.

1 box containing bundle of letters from J. A. Robinson, Dean of Wells, to Dom Ethelbert.

2 boxes concerning Cardinal Gasquet. One contains letters from and about the Cardinal including several from Shane Leslie, the Cardinal's biographer. The other contains MS hymns in wrapper addressed to the Cardinal.

1 box containing Journal (MS) of Aidan Savage, Painter, 1916—1931.

(E) Other Items

2 boxes of miscellaneous material including one with papers collected principally by F. J. Baigent, the Winchester antiquary, including numerous newspaper cuttings.

1 box of printed Downside School Examination results, c. 1890—1900.

THE ARCHIVES OF THE DOMINICAN SISTERS OF THE ENGLISH CONGREGATION OF ST CATHERINE OF SIENA

Sr Mary Crispin O.P.

ORIGIN

The present Congregation was formed in 1929 by the amalgamation of five Congregations of Dominican Third Order Sisters.

- i) The Congregation of St Catherine of Siena was founded at Coventry by Mother Margaret Hallahan in 1845, after she had received an invitation in 1841 from the Rev. William Bernard Ullathorne, to assist in the Catholic mission there;
- ii) The Congregation of St Rose of Lima was founded at Stroud, Gloucestershire, by Mother Mary Teresa Matthews in 1857;
- iii) At the invitation of the Dominican Fathers, a further group of Third Order Sisters was established by Mother Rose Corbett at Leicester in 1875;
- iv) The Congregation of the Holy Rosary was founded in Flanders about 1871 by Mother Catherine Philip Bathurst and transferred to Harrow in Middlesex in 1880 at the invitation of Cardinal Manning;
- v) The French Congregation of Our Lady of Grace at Chatillon-Sous-Bogneau was invited by Cardinal Vaughan to send sisters to his diocese, and Mother Cecilia Marshall established a community in London in 1896. After official separation from the French congregation in 1912, the London house in Portobello Road became the Mother House of the new Congregation of St Vincent Ferrer.

With the help and encouragement of the English Prior-Provincial, Very Rev. Bede Jarrett O.P., these five groups of sisters were united into one Congregation in 1929 under the title of the Dominican Sisters of the English Congregation of St Catherine of Siena. The longest established convent, which happened to be the one at Stone in Staffordshire, was designated the Mother House.

Mother Margaret Hallahan was born in London in 1802. By 1811 she had been admitted to an orphanage for destitute girls but after a short period became a servant girl working for an English Catholic family who settled in Bruges in 1826. In 1829 Margaret tried her vocation at the English convent there, but she did not stay very long. She became a Dominican Tertiary in 1835 and in her spare time gave herself to works of apostolic charity. Because of her great reputation in the apostolic field, in 1841 she was invited by Father Ullathorne to help in his work at Coventry. When Father Ullathorne was consecrated Vicar Apostolic of the Western District, a small group of professed Dominican Sisters, under the leadership of Mother Margaret, transferred to Clifton in 1846 in order to remain under the Bishop's direction. Here the first convent was built. Mother Margaret founded five convents and these formed a Congregation directly under the jurisdiction of the Master General of the Order of Preachers who appointed Bishop Ullathorne to be his Vicar with regard to the newly established Congregation, in 1859. Mother Margaret died at Stone in 1868.

Mother Mary Teresa Matthews was born on 17 November 1815, the eldest daughter of a mill-owner resident at Wooton-under-Edge in Gloucestershire, and christened Elizabeth. After her father's death, which distressed her considerably, she was invited by a friend of the family, Edwin Bucknall, to join his wife and family in Stroud, Gloucestershire. While she was there curiosity compelled her to enquire about the Catholic Church. The Bucknalls at that time belonged to a non-Catholic sect and she was left free to follow her own family's practices. In 1850 she was received into the Church by Father Honorius C. P., the parish priest of the mission at Woodchester. There was no Catholic Church at Stroud at that time. Elizabeth soon became acquainted with a Mrs D. Sandys, a widow and great benefactress of the Catholics in Stroud, who had just opened a small school for Catholic children in the London Road and needed help with the work. She had collected around her several ladies dedicated to visiting the sick and the poor and to giving religious instruction. Within a short time Elizabeth asked to join this group of apostolic workers who later became Dominican Tertiaries. Elizabeth felt herself further drawn towards conventual religious life and so applied for admission to the Second Order of Dominican Nuns at Hurst Green (later removed to Carisbrooke) but she was not accepted by them. This led her to consider approaching Mother Margaret Hallahan who had recently established a community of Dominican Sisters in the Clifton diocese; but the Dominican Fathers recommended her to wait. This she did and continued to work with Mrs Sandys and her group.

On 2 February 1857 Elizabeth was clothed in the Dominican habit and in November of that year her companions also received the habit. The Bishop of Clifton appointed Father Dominic Aylward O.P., Prior of Woodchester, to be their director, and under his guidance the conventual tertiaries made their canonical novitiate. (They did not wear the habit openly until 1859). Not long after this, Mrs Sandys decided that she was not called to the religious life and so she withdrew from the group; ill health dictated that she should live abroad and on 21 June 1878 she died. Soon the original group broke up and Elizabeth, who was by then nominated the sister in charge, found herself almost alone, although Sister Rose Corbett remained. However, others joined them and in 1863 a creche for children of the poor was organized. Within the next few years a small boarding school was started, then an orphanage and work school. The premises were enlarged and the new building was begun in 1867. These years were dogged by poverty and innumerable difficulties.

Elizabeth, now known as Mother Mary Teresa Matthews, always had a deep desire to recite the Divine Office in choir and this was realised in 1871 when on the feast of the Most Holy Trinity the community recited all the Canonical Hours. Between 1866 and 1884 three daughter houses were established and the first General Chapter of the Congregation of St Rose of Lima was convened in 1889, when Mother Mary Teresa was elected the first Prioress General. The Congregation was finally approved by Rome in 1896. Mother Mary Teresa died at Stroud in 1905.

Mother Rose Corbett. We have very little documentation concerning Elizabeth Corbett, later known as Sister Rose Corbett. All that we can be sure of is that in 1855, as a young woman, she was sent by the Rev. Bernard Morewood O. P. to help Mrs Sandys in her newly opened Catholic School in London Road, Stroud, Gloucestershire, where she met the future Mother Mary Teresa Matthews. In November 1857 Elizabeth was clothed in the Dominican habit at Stroud and given the name of Sister Rose. When in 1866 the Rev. Dominic Aylward O. P. requested help from the Sisters at Stroud for his mission in Kentish Town, London, Sister Rose with five other choir sisters, two lay-sisters and a postulant were sent to give assistance. Sister Rose was appointed to be in charge of the London community. This foundation, however, did not succeed and in 1868 several of the sisters returned to Stroud while Sister Rose and three companions decided to accept an invitation from the Dominican Fathers to teach in the parish schools of St Patrick's and Holy Cross in Leicester. This necessitated official separation from the Stroud community. Thus a new group of Dominican Sisters was formed in Leicester in 1875. From this foundation three daughter houses were established; at Bridlington in 1895, and at Leyburn and Redcar in 1896. This group of Sisters, though never officially designated a Congregation, chose as its patron our Lady, Help of Christians.

Mother Catherine Philip Bathurst, the youngest daughter of Sir James Bathurst K.C.B., was born at Wookey in Somerset in 1825 and christened Catherine Anne. She became a Catholic when she was twenty-five years old and soon after her reception met Pere Lacordaire O.P., and also Dr John Henry (later Cardinal) Newman. She entered religious life with the Dominican Sisters at Stone in 1861 but ill-health soon obliged her to leave. Later, as a Dominican Tertiary, she met a Miss Dunford and, under the guidance of the Dominican Fathers, they visited the sick and the poor of Kentish Town and gave religious instruction. By 1868 she, Miss Dunford and two young friends formed a Tertiary group in Belgium and with the permission of Mgr Bracq, Bishop of Ghent, founded a convent for Tertiaries who wanted to live a full religious life in community. This community was affiliated to the Order of Preachers.

Cardinal Manning, a personal friend of many years standing, asked her to make a foundation in England. Some of her Sisters arrived at Harrow, Middlesex, in 1878 and the novitiate was transferred there in 1880. From this foundation issued five daughter houses; at Kilburn 1881, Watford 1883, Shoreham 1886 (transferred to Bognor 1896), Sale near Manchester 1891—1897 and at Beccles 1897. This new Congregation, under the patronage of Our Lady of the Holy Rosary, was erected in 1890, the house at Harrow being named its Mother House, and Mother Catherine Philip Bathurst was elected its first Prioress General. She died in 1907.

Mother Mary Cecilia Marshall was born at Brighton in 1851. Her mother belonged to a recusant family who had never lost 'the faith', and later in life her father, an architect, embraced the Catholic religion.

While still a young woman, Elizabeth Lucy Marshall, who later became Mother Mary Cecilia Marshall, joined the Dominican Tertiary community at Clichy in France in 1876 — this community was from Chatillon-Sous-Bogneau. A month after making perpetual profession, Sister Mary Cecilia was sent to be Superior of a small group of Sisters at Mirecourt. After several years, and successive appointments as Superior, Mother Mary Cecilia Marshall was sent, in 1896, to make a foundation in London at the request of Cardinal Vaughan. By 1910 it was obvious that separation from the French Congregation was desirable, although the Deed of Separation was not signed until 1912. Several daughter houses were established from this foundation and the London House in Portobello Road, W 10, became the Mother House of yet another Congregation of Dominican Sisters, under the patronage of St Vincent Ferrer.

Each of these Congregations, some of Pontifical Right and others not, continued to establish daughter houses. Those that flourished were incorporated at the amalgamation in 1929. Since then further foundations and closures have been made.

The surviving archives of these original Congregations form a large part of the present Congregation's archive deposit. Among them are collections associated with some eminent nineteenth century Churchmen and Churchwomen including Archbishop William Bernard Ullathorne O. S. B., Cardinal John Henry Newman, Mother Margaret Hallahan, Mother Francis Raphael Drane and Mother Catherine Philip Bathurst.

CONTENT

The actual papers which comprise the bulk of our archives are the natural products of the foundations and the life of the Congregation, viz:

- i) the involvement and particular role of Bishop Ullathorne with the Sisters of the Stone Congregation;
- ii) the lives of the foundresses;
- iii) the life and work of Mother Francis Raphael Drane — an historian, author and hagiographer in her own right;
- iv) the correspondence of Mother Margaret Hallahan and Mother Catherine Philip Bathurst with Cardinal Newman, with particular reference to the Achilli trial;
- v) the deliberate deposit of some of Bishop Ullathorne's papers which would help Mother Francis Raphael Drane in writing a biography of the Bishop.

The standard items within the archives include:

- i) correspondence relating to foundations and life of the Congregations,
- ii) information about buildings, property and apostolic works,
- iii) details concerning finance,
- iv) business journals,
- v) books of Constitutions,
- vi) particulars of postulants,
- vii) books of Professions,
- viii) books of Ceremonial and customs,
- ix) Annals,
- x) various registers,
- xi) papers of appointments of Prioresses,
- xii) reports of Prioresses,
- xiii) ordinances of Prioresses General,
- xiv) letters and circulars from Prioresses General,
- xv) communications from Masters General and Priors Provincial of the Order of Preachers.
- xvi) Acts, ordinances and recommendations of General Chapters,
- xvii) minute books of General and house councils,
- xviii) some minutes of community chapters.

Besides these there are other papers, not directly connected with the Congregation but with people who have been involved in its history. At present in the Generalate archives at Stone are preserved the archives relating to the Congregation as such and of those houses and works which have been closed. Additional material relating to Mother Margaret Hallahan has also been collected at Stone since 1936 when her cause for Beatification was introduced.

In addition to the standard items mentioned above, other significant deposits are:

- i) The Mother Margaret Hallahan Papers which include:
 - a) biographical material,
 - b) letters written by her, 1851-1868,
 - c) spiritual instructions and prayers, 1847—1867,
 - d) administrative documents regarding the life and work of Mother Margaret, 1847-1868.
- ii) The Mother Francis Raphael Drane Papers which include:
 - a) biographical material,
 - b) personal papers, 1833-1893,
 - c) spiritual instructions, 1855—1877,

- d) letters written by Mother Francis Raphael, 1868—1894,
 - e) literary works,
 - f) collections of literary resource material made by Mother Francis Raphael Drane.
- iii) The Ullathorne Papers which include:
- a) books, pamphlets and other works written by Ullathorne, both published and unpublished,
 - b) sermons, conferences, Retreat notes on spiritual subjects,
 - c) some ecclesiastical and diocesan documents,
 - d) official documents relating to the 'Stone' Congregation,
 - e) some family papers.
- iv) The J. H. Newman Papers which include:
- a) letters written by John Henry Newman,
 - b) a manuscript narrative on relations between Newman and Mother Margaret,
 - c) a drawing and a photograph of Newman,
 - d) a scrapbook of reminiscences of John Henry Newman by a Dominican Sister,
 - e) there is also a considerable amount of other Newman material incorporated in some of the other collections already mentioned.
- v) A deposit of miscellaneous items:
- a) St John of the Cross Spiritual Works, 1703 (Spanish),
 - b) 'S.M.D.' D.O.M. Orationi Devotissimi etc., compiled by a Dominican Sister. 1627 Ms., Latin,
 - c) Illuminated Book of Hours. 15th? century, incomplete, (pages cut out) presented by Philip Howard, 1895,
 - d) Blessed Henry Suso, extracts concerning his penances. 16th? century Ms., Latin,
 - e) Vita et Miracula S.P. Dominici etc., Augustino Galamino O.P. Mag. Gen. Antwerp 18th? century, Latin,
 - f) Mother Jubilarian Thompson of Brussels — Masses and Sequences. 1728 Ms., Latin,
 - g) Dialogue, St Catherine of Siena. Brescia, 1496, Italian,
 - h) Writings of Mother Isabella Howard between 1884 and 1904,
 - i) Writings of Mother Imelda Poole (successor to Mother Margaret Hallahan), 1868-1881,
 - j) Ms. letters, 1853—1944, of eminent Ecclesiastics and Religious,
 - k) An account of the persecution of Brazilian Sisters, by Makrina Mieczslawska, Abbess, 1845,
 - l) Dominican Sister's translation of Ms. account of German Dominican Mysticism and St Mechtilde (origin unknown),

- m) ? Thomas Bailey — London 1665 — sketch of an English Martyr, from the Life and Death of John Fisher, Bishop of Rochester,
- n) Sister Mary Winifred, translation of the Spiritual Instructions of John Tauler, Ms. copy by Mother Imelda Poole,
- o) Rev. J.B. de Bay, 1798 Journal. Ms. copy by M. Imelda Poole,
- p) Sister Helen Hicks, 1921, The Way of the Cross (devotions), typescript,
- q) Some miscellaneous papers of historical interest.

Items of particular interest are Mother Margaret's series of letters containing her manifestations of conscience to both Bishop Ullathorne and Rev. Austin Maltus O. P., chaplain to the Sisters at Stone; Ullathorne's letters from Vatican I which make interesting reading in the wake of Vatican II; and J.H.Newman's letters to Mother Catherine Philip Bathurst, which are a delight.

SIGNIFICANCE

The period of history covered by our archives is primarily from 1841 to the present time. Much of this material pertains to religious life in the English Midlands, but foundations in Flanders and France from which some of our communities originated, add a further dimension to our expression of Dominican life. However, the bulk of the information concerns English nineteenth-century ecclesiastical history. Indirectly, through the apostolic works carried on, information can be gleaned about some aspects of social history, particularly with regard to education, nursing and pastoral care. There are also some interesting facts about the first foundation of Dominican Sisters in Australia in 1883, who came originally from the 'Stone' Congregation. The deposits of original manuscripts of books by both Bishop Ullathorne and Mother Francis Raphael Drane are unique.

ORGANISATION

From the beginning of the 'Stone' Congregation a chapter on The Archivist' has always been included in our Constitutions. There is a Congregational Archivist and a common system of archive organisation. The Congregational filing system provides the Generalate and each house with a letter code.

Material relating to the five original congregations is kept in the Mother House at Stone in Staffordshire, together with the archives of houses which have been closed, and all the archives of the present Congregation relating to Generalate business. The special deposits already mentioned are also kept in the Generalate archives. Each local house stores its own post-1929 archives.

All these are kept in metal cupboards which contain large archive, acid-free cardboard boxes. Inside these are wallet files containing loose documents. Bound books are stored loose on appropriate shelves in the cupboards in association with related files or boxes.

Wallet files are listed in accordance with the thirty-three headings given in the Directory to our Constitutions (1981). Subdivisions of these file headings accommodate the needs of individual houses. Each document is numbered chronologically (as far as possible) and carries the file number and letter code of the house.

Since 1980 the Generalate and each house has a 'Descriptive List' of all the archives it holds which will be fully catalogued in due course. Ultimately, the Generalate will have a comprehensive catalogue of all the documents deposited in all our archives but this will take time.

To assist the local archivists in the organisation and retention of documents, a small hand-made booklet has been compiled called 'Simple Guide Lines for the keeping of local Archives'.

The archives relating to Generalate business and some of the special deposits already mentioned are filed under a different system established many years ago and continued, since it is adequate for its purpose.

Copies of catalogues of the Special Collections are held by the Secretary General at Stone, the Royal Commission on Historical Manuscripts, and the Hon. Editor of the Catholic Archives Society.

ACCESS

Access to our archives is of necessity limited, but written application to:

Sister Mary Crispin O.P.,

will ensure that some arrangements will be made to assist an enquirer. Limited photo-copying is provided by the Archivist, the laws of copyright always being respected.

THE COLLECTOR: A LOOK AT BENEDICTINE ARCHIVES
THROUGH THE EYES 'JF BRO. BENET WELDON, 1674-1713

Dom Geoffrey Scott O.S.B.

For the archivists of religious orders here, what I have to tell is a cautionary tale of how dangerous it can be, and how easy it is, for the detached neutrality of the archivist to be transformed into the coloured bias of the involved historian. Benet Weldon's archival collection is a good example of how the archive of a religious order, as Fr Bede Bailey told us some years ago,¹ is a mixture of family, administrative and personal material, 'inextricably interwoven'. If we were to take the 1981 'Scheme of classification for Archives of Religious Orders'² as the basic guide for the holdings of a religious order, we would find that Weldon's collections include many of the types of material listed here — histories, lists, acta, house archives, financial and legal records, relations with bishops, ceremonials, but we would be unable to escape from acknowledging that all these are subsumed under, and collected together into, Number IX of the 'Scheme', the 'Personal Papers of Individual Religious'. In this paper, we are essentially discussing the personal records of Bro. Benet Weldon.

Ralph (in religion Benet) Weldon was born of royalist gentry stock at Swanscombe, Kent, in 1674. He became a Catholic in 1687, was clothed at the English Benedictine House of St Edmund's, Paris, in November 1690, and professed there two years later. He died in Paris in 1713.³ One doubts whether Weldon was the most suitable candidate to act as the English Benedictines' official annalist. He was physically weak and tells us he 'could never admit the drop of woman's milk . . . so I was nursed up with strong Spanish wines . . . and Naples biscuits.' ⁴ His most serious weakness, however, perhaps often a strength to archivists, was an extreme scrupulosity which prevented him from being ordained, encouraged an instability which led him from 1694 to attempt to live in stricter monasteries like La Trappe, and which caused him to be persecuted by his contemporaries in St Edmund's, Paris. I mention all this because it was to affect his historical writing.

After a lengthy stay in England to sort out his dead brother's affairs, Weldon had returned to Paris in the middle of 1700 where he was again subjected to teasing and to bouts of scrupulosity, seeking refuge in the interpretation of his dreams. At this stage, there was still no evidence that he was interested in archive work, but he had already become intimate by this time with his future patron, Bernard Gregson, then in his first term of office as President of the English Benedictines (1697—1701). Weldon acted as 'intermediary', and sent reports to Gregson regarding the state of St Edmund's, Paris.⁵ But this role, adopted by a character like Weldon, soon turned him into a disgruntled spy. Gregson's successor, Augustine Howard (1701—05), refused to tolerate such behaviour, and he ordered that all Weldon's letters be collected, sealed up, and that their author be forbidden to write any more. The Prior in Paris was, however, to treat Weldon gently. ⁶

In the autumn of 1704, Weldon was notified in a dream 'that I had a great deal of work there (in St Edmund's, Paris) to do by writing things in order, to which much extraordinary paper should be given me, which is verified in my Collections concerning the history of King James II, and these Collections, (the "Memorials"). And I own it that from a child, I know the life I am to lead'.⁷ This is the first intimation from Weldon of his future career as an archivist, but there is some suggestion that he was already moving towards this role even before the dream. Firstly, it must be remembered that he had been educated for two years at Pontlevoy near Blois by the Maurists.⁸ The Maurist Benedictines were already famous for their scientific research, especially that developed by Mabillon, and Weldon was to pay frequent tribute in his own work to the tradition of Maurist learning. He was also to number a few Maurist scholars among his intimate friends. Secondly, in his brief visit to England in 1700, his appetite for painstaking archival detective work had already been whetted in looking up family records to prove his murdered brother's will was a forgery. ⁹

WELDON AS LIBRARIAN AND HIS 'JAMES II'

The third, and perhaps the most important influence steering him towards archive work was the order made by the President at the 1692 Visitation of St Edmund's that a studious librarian be appointed whose task was to compile as quickly as possible an accurate library catalogue in order to prevent books being stolen or dispersed on the English mission. ¹⁰ Archive administration at this time in the majority of religious communities was undoubtedly the responsibility of the librarian, as in many instances it still is. From the name of the donor and date inscribed on the register which became the library catalogue, it seems that Weldon began compiling the catalogue only from 1699. ¹¹ It remains one of the earliest library catalogues of English Catholic religious communities which we possess and, although completed by Weldon in 1702, it was to be constantly added to until the French Revolution. It lists some six thousand works in seven subsidiary catalogues, and a 'Hell' section as well as a list of manuscripts were appended.

Weldon's first task of compiling a comprehensive library catalogue led him quite naturally into his first real archival work, the 'Course and Rough first draught of the History of England's late most Holy and most glorious Royal Confessor and Defender of the True Faith, James II', which was written mostly between May and August 1706. ¹² This is the first example that we see of him building up a scrap-book, a method he was to employ in his later works. His collecting magpie instinct was sharpened by his experience of exhaustively cataloguing the library as well as by his natural scrupulosity which persuaded him to include certain documents the relevance of which might be uncertain.

Why did Weldon set about drawing up this draft for a royal biography? It was performed firstly out of genuine devotion to the exiled James II who had been laid to rest in the Benedictines' church in Paris in September 1701. Weldon had believed himself cured from gangrene in February 1705 thanks to the prayers of this saintly monarch. He had been finally encouraged to begin gathering material for the biography by the prior of St Edmund's, Joseph Johnston (1705—10), a fervent Jacobite who had brought Weldon into the Church in 1687. Johnston doubtless knew that this sad subject of his was best kept stable and protected from his tormentors by keeping him busy with literary work. Weldon informs us that the work was written under the watchful eye of Johnston, who wrote the introduction, and it was destined to enhance the community's library.^{1 3}

Weldon's book was primarily an archival collection laced with his own historical opinions. As such it is the exemplar for all his later literary collections. Acting as an honest archivist, Weldon tried firstly, although not always wholly successfully, to remain neutral in regard to the material he was amassing. While he compared his labour to that of a bee making honey, he admitted that the reader of the work would have to be just as selective in the face of the evidence presented to him. For Weldon admitted, as any collector might, the difficulty of pulling together the whole bulk of the material to exhibit a rounded and comprehensive picture. An archival collection often remains incomplete, and Weldon admitted:

Indeed this collection does not follow the exact order that I could have wished, by reason I had not at the same time together the Books out of which I compiled it. Hence many things are become Marginal affairs, which naturally challenge their place in the Body of this Compilation, and other things follow at the end as I could light on them.

Here, and further on, when he insists 'I am not able to write everything . . . I only go a-gleaning',¹⁴ we have an admission of his honesty born of his scrupulosity, and an acknowledgement that his work was essentially incomplete, always open to additional information, but useful as a tool for researchers into the king's life.

Not surprisingly, then, both in his 'James II' and his later works, archival material was continually inserted after the bulk of the project had been completed. Thus, although 'James II' was completed by August 1706, it nevertheless opened with a prediction by a priest in Canada sent to Prior Johnston in 1707 by the Franciscan Bonaventure Eyston prophesying that the king would reign for only four years. In the sheaf of documents at the end of 'James II' there is one of 1708, a Jacobite broadsheet of 1711, and this section of documents is introduced by the words, 'An Addition of many things coming into my hands too late'.^{1 5}

Weldon's 'James II' vividly illustrates the naivete of the immature historian and the innocence of the unskilled archivist. But his later works also show that he was less susceptible to his earlier weaknesses, Much of his 'James II' is derivative. He leaned heavily on the contemporary French Gazette for tying together his chronological narrative. But he was anxious to use oral evidence as much as possible and often indicated the source of his information, which was usually a monk of his community, by the words, 'I had this from his own mouth', or 'the observations of Fr N.' or 'I saw in Fr N's hand'. When the Queen Dowager Catherine of Braganza left England in the spring of 1692, for instance, Weldon believed:

'Twas high time for her Majesty to leave England, the king not being there. For a gun of the bigger size was shot from off the Thames, and struck the window of a place she much used to frequent; but it pleased God that she was not there, and so escaped. This I heard from our late Lay-Brother, Br. Thomas Brabant who, much frequenting her Palace, could not be misinformed of such a thing. '6

Weldon, with his first-hand knowledge of the monastery library, could effortlessly direct his readers to two published biographies of the king, 'as you have 'em in your library, for that I am not able to write here everything.'¹⁷ He acknowledged books loaned to him for his work from the Minims' library in Paris which had a fine historical collection. He was also aware that the bulk of James' II's papers had been bequeathed to the Scots College in Paris.¹⁸

Weldon's own inclinations and the nature of the evidence which came his way inevitably coloured his collection and gave it a certain tone. Thus the historian was to take over from the archivist. King James was portrayed as a saint, and a forceful attack was made by Weldon on Anglican jurors by painstakingly copying out contemporary lampoons demonstrating their hypocrisy and opportunism. Doubtless the clearest example of our collector's use or abuse of the primary sources he interleaved through his work can be seen in his method of dealing with James II's promise of religious toleration to all his subjects in 1692. Such generosity went against the grain for Weldon, and he immediately followed the printed Declaration of Toleration with a long paper by an English Benedictine casuist which sought to justify the king's action by using the parable of the weeds growing among the wheat until the harvest.¹⁹

What light does Weldon's 'James II' throw on Benedictine archives? Weldon firmly believed that the destinies of the Benedictines and the royal family were intertwined and repeatedly pointed out their debt to each other. Inevitably, then, Benedictine archival material was incorporated into the work. We have an account of the 1685 General Chapter, the story of the king's attempt to solve the dispute between the bishops and regulars over missionary jurisdiction, a thorny problem of the day, and finally Weldon had bound into the volume a number of Jacobite poems written by monks.²⁰ The inclusion of a copy of the letter of resignation to the Pope from the Benedictine Vicar Apostolic of the Western District in 1688, Philip Michael Ellis, was not without point, for in it Ellis asked that a monk should succeed him as bishop, and to support this, he catalogued English Benedictine privileges, showing at the same time the monks' key involvement in the conversion of England.²¹ But not all Benedictine material which found its way into this work was related to James II. The final section turns into a scrap-book of miscellaneous items, including various epitaphs and obituary notices. What, we ask, was happening to his steady historical account? In this section we have, as he told us, stray items which had fallen into his hands too late to be included in the main text. But I think we can discern a further reason. Interleaved in this section are three mortuary bills of Benedictine martyrs of the 1640's, St Ambrose Barlow (1641), St Alban Roe (1642), and Blessed Philip Powel (1646).²² Nearly seventy years old, they were clearly to Weldon's eyes precious items and he explains why he included them: 'Least these three things should be lost, I got them fixed here'. In other words, he not only appreciated the danger of primary sources being destroyed, but had also by this time become convinced that such documents were, in the first decade of the eighteenth century, best preserved in book-form. Neatly expressed here was the first example of a method we see lying behind his greatest archival collection, the 'Memorials', to which we now turn.

THE MEMORIALS'

Weldon began the 'Memorials' on the evening of Trinity Sunday, mid-June 1707 and had the collection finished by 7 November, except for some additions. It was thus completed a year after his 'James II', to which there are clear parallels, for both open with a prayer to Wisdom, both have the form of a scrap-book, and both follow a chronological scheme; although the 'Memorials', using the four-yearly General Chapters as its plan, is closer to the structure of annals.

The nature of this work is explicitly described by Weldon in his Dedication where he speaks of himself as a Collector, what perhaps we might call an archivist. Although he believed himself of 'small capacity' for the task, he had been urged to collect English Benedictine material by his patron and protector, Bernard Gregson (President 1697—1701, 1705—10). Gregson had been pleased with Weldon's 'poor efforts' in gathering material which was 'Authentic & worthy of belief concerning . . . James II', and Weldon therefore decided to continue using the method he had adopted in that collection,

. . . finding myself as yet too young, too raw & inexperienced, to set up in Formal Author. Besides that to have written a downright formal History adorn'd with a formal proper stile," would have been a thing of such long date by reason of often reviewing it, correcting it, & repolishing it, that I apprehended I could not have got it done in any reasonable time. Hence I took the resolution of gathering faithfully together all that seemed to me able to help a better head and pen than mine whensoever any such would have the heart to compose in forme the History of our Congregation.

Here, he was acknowledging the first task of an archivist, and he went on to insist, somewhat disingenuously, as we shall see, that the only fault in a collection composed of authentic documents which must speak for themselves, was in some misplacing which he felt was inevitable: 'Conventual Duty interrupting me surrounded with a world of papers sorted into different bundles, so that no wonder if now & then I forgot a little, which forgetfulness is so inconsiderate that a judicious Reader will never make account of it.' Here speaks the busy archivist of a religious order in sentiments you will understand.

The strong assertion of his honesty and neutrality which Weldon also includes in his Dedication, points to the context in which he composed his 'Memorials'. Persecution against him reached new heights during 1707, and he was particularly scandalised by the disobedience and irregular behaviour of some members of his community. Their example was to turn his pen poisonous towards the end of the 'Memorials' which describes his own times, and it is these enemies whom he fears might condemn parts of his 'Memorials' as written to favour his own cause. Fortunately, his opponents were also those who were a cause of grave concern to the President on his visitations to St Edmund's, and Gregson, following in the footsteps of Prior Joseph Johnston, now took Weldon under his wing. Gregson agreed to send Weldon any papers that came into his possession while he visited the monasteries and the mission in England. It was these insertions of original documents which were to make Weldon's 'Memorials' a unique source for the history of the English Benedictine Congregation. It is certain that unless they had been incorporated into his volumes, they would have been irretrievably lost. For Weldon himself, such documents were parts of a larger mosaic which would help to vindicate in the future Gregson's stated aim of 'purifying' the Congregation. With Gregson's encouragement, then, Weldon got down to work, spending, according to the nineteenth-century annalist, Athanasius Allanson, some fifteen to sixteen hours a day reading and writing, hardly ever attending conventual recreation or mixing with the brethren, with some of whom he was not on the best of terms.²³ Coming to the end of the completed 'Memorials', Weldon believed he was justified in admitting:

This collection is an extract of a world of Papers and I have preserved the Chapter Acts from the first to the last, [he did not in fact have access to all the Acta] and I have been most conscientiously sincere and faithful in the trust reposed in me. I have exposed what I found of commendable, and of the blameable things I have found, but, God be thanked, the Disorders are but few when one considers this history of one Hundred years. These are the worst doings of our House [i.e. the scandals of the early years of the 18th century at St Edmund's, Paris], and the only ugly ones²⁴

These were words which echoed what he had said at the beginning of his labours, ²⁵ when he gave a list of printed works he recommended and went on to insist: 'I love thorough-work in whatever I undertake, & look wherever I surmise there may be anything to the purpose, nothing being more odious, ridiculous and absurd than to patch up anyhow & slobber over a Design or Work'. Of books, he recommended Clement Reyner's and Augustine Baker's Apostolate in Anglia (Douai 1626), Edward Mayhew's Trophaea (Rheims 1619,1625), William Clarke's A replie unto a certain libell set foorth by Fa. Parsons (1603), all of which were readily available in the library he knew so well. By his side, he also had a manuscript history of the English Benedictines called the 'Chronology', written by the monk, Philip Michael Ellis, in the 1680's which is now lost. Weldon admitted that this history contained some inaccuracies.

The use of such sources brings us to the question of the nature of Weldon's archival collection. We can divide his materials into four groups. Firstly, there are primary sources, both printed and manuscript; secondly, there are Weldon's own transcripts of original material; and thirdly, his transcription of published material. Finally, interwoven amongst all these, is his own narrative which more or less holds the complete collection together.

For archivists, of course, the preservation of primary sources was the greatest favour Weldon performed on behalf of the English monks. President Gregson was the key figure here because he had his fingers on the wide variety of documents relating to the Congregation found in different repositories. In December 1706, Gregson arrived in Paris from London where he usually lived, to begin his visitation of the continental monasteries. From this journey, undertaken in wartime, Gregson transmitted to Weldon a copy of Ellis's 'Chronology', material relating to St Edmund's which came originally from England but was found by him at Lambspring, the English monastery near Hildesheim, the 'Memorials' of Dieulouard, the English priory in Lorraine, and other material relating to this monastery, the house of Gregson's profession, which the President laboriously transcribed in his own hand. Amongst the Dieulouard material were the monastery's original Annals written by Clement Reyner between 1606 and 1609.²⁶ On 31 May 1707, Gregson wrote to Weldon from Dieulouard, recommending that he settle down in his monastery at Paris, and push any intention of moving off to Dieulouard out of his mind. To encourage him to do so, Gregson promised to send documents to him from Dieulouard and to perform the same task when he reached Lambspring.

Some of these documents are to be found interleaved throughout Weldon's narrative, but original documents are to be found in bulk appended to the end of the two original volumes of the 'Memorials' ²⁷ and were presumably material which Weldon acquired later and could not therefore include in the main body of his collection. Undoubtedly, there is much here from the President's own archives. We find, for instance, large numbers of letters from the early Presidents at the time of the Congregations's formation in 1619, when the Anglo-Spanish monks joined those affiliated to Westminster Abbey. Thus, Presidents such as Leander Jones (1619—21, 1633—35), Rudesind Barlow (1621—29), and Sigebert Bagshaw (1629—33) are well represented. Some of these are original copies or are letters sent by the Presidents to priors of monasteries whence Weldon collected them. It is likely that Weldon included in his collection some of the original documents which had been published in Reyner's Apostolatus in 1626, a book which set out to trace the continuity of the revived seventeenth-century Congregation with its medieval forbear.²⁸ Specifically Congregational material such as copies of papal bulls and briefs, correspondence with Propaganda, legal cases, and petitions to the French Crown also probably represent part of the President's archive sent by Gregson to Weldon. There is, finally, in its correct chronological position, a full compendium of documents relating to Bishop Richard Smith's jurisdictional controversies with the Regulars in the 1630's.²⁹

Unfortunately, Weldon rarely reveals the specific source of his primary materials but when this source was St Edmund's, Paris, we are left with some clues. Firstly, original evidence relating to the foundation of the monastery must have been preserved at Paris. Many of the printed broadsheets bear the written inscription Benedictinorum Anglorum Sancti Edmundi, Parisiis, not in Weldon's hand, and therefore must have been taken by him from the house archives or perhaps from the library. There are also runs of personal papers of Paris monks, and a great deal of oral evidence collected from Fr Laurence Woolfe who died in 1697 and who was able to offer information on a wide spectrum of details, from life at the Court of James II to the current bread prices in Paris.³⁰ It was St Edmund's finally, which provided our collector with material common to any monastic archive: Chapter Acta, accounts, wills, obit notices, ceremonial and liturgical notes, and the bureaucratic impedimenta relating to benefices. Sometimes Weldon's zeal for preservation went too far. He headed a stray Maurist profession formula: 'A copy which may give help on occasion', and attached to a letter of President Sherburne (1681—91) are the words: 'I place this here signed by him to honour my Collection with his handwriting and show how he worked for us'.³¹ Included also are the inevitable strays and curios: broadsheets about an apparition in Staffordshire in 1657, the account of an incorrupt body dug up in Clerkenwell in 1704, and Weldon's own holograph of the 'Adventures of Prince Charles, eldest son of the King of Tartary'; this prince had visited St Edmund's.³²

Original source material from the other English monasteries is scarcer in Weldon than that from Paris, although it is likely that some of it originated from St Gregory's, Douai, which held the Congregational archives,³³ and we have already seen Gregson transferring material from Dieulouard and Lambspring. Interspersed among the pages of transcript which Weldon copied from the English Benedictine nuns at Cambrai and Paris and which he received in October 1707, were a number of letters which spanned the history of Cambrai up until that time.³⁴ But by far the greatest volume of primary material from a conventual source came from the short-lived monastery at St Malo. This had been surrendered in 1669 when much of its archive seems to have been deposited at St Edmund's, Paris, a community to which a number of its monks were assimilated. In contrast, papers which Weldon managed to accumulate from the English Benedictine mission are, unfortunately, and perhaps predictably, scarce, and for these, Weldon was again dependent on the good services of President Gregson, or on missionaries retiring back to the monastery and bringing their papers with them.³⁵ Besides some rather eclectic material which included printed broadsheets and a manuscript summary of the penal laws,³⁶ Weldon seems to have set out to compile deliberately a miscellaneous dossier of papers relating to Maurus Corker, the spiritual director of the poet Dryden and the fellow-prisoner of Oliver Plunkett during the Popish Plot. Corker, who was well-known for his Anglo-Gallican views, had been abbot of Lambspring between 1690 and 1695, and had returned to the mission, dying there in 1715. Thus Weldon collected various pieces of published material and put them with Corker's original letters from the mission.³⁷

Moving away from primary sources, one discovers that much of Weldon's 'Memorials' are composed of transcripts in his own hand. While we cannot always know why he was forced to copy original documents, we can often confidently guess the reason in some cases. Ellis's 'Chronology' and John Townson's manuscript history of Lambspring, written in 1692, were both available to him, but were too bulky and detailed to include in his collection in toto. Ellis's work was especially useful for its eulogies of great English Benedictines like Gabriel Gifford, Archbishop of Rheims, and the spiritual director, Augustine Baker.³⁸ Furthermore, some documents were not in a satisfactory state to be included in the 'Memorials', and he had to transcribe material written in a poor hand or heavily scored; bulky documents he felt were best summarised. At one point he noted that in dealing with a 'tedious' legal issue, he had decided to exclude a batch of documents so as not to 'cram this Collection with such Dissertations'.³⁹

Formal records of the Congregation, especially the acta of the quadriennial General Chapters, were among the most voluminous of the records transcribed, and these were part of his chronological scheme. He knew of the acta of the first General Chapter (1625), but had been unable to find its minutes, although he did have that Chapter's Definitions, which included a ban on the use of tobacco, which pleased him.⁴⁰ He apologised that since the Paris volume of Chapter acta only dated from 1633 and was therefore incomplete, he had been forced to transcribe material from other sources.⁴¹ One of these was his own monastery's archive, from where he also wrote out St Edmund's Mass Obligations, its Calendar and its Customary.⁴² Finally, Weldon was grateful for the loan of documents specifically for transcription. He was therefore loaned material from 'our Gregorian archives' in Douai, and sometimes gave in the margin its archival reference there. Among institutions and persons prepared to loan papers we must mention the Benedictine nuns at Cambrai and Paris who, being well-trained archivists, were very careful to insist that such documents were returned once they had been transcribed. It is almost certain that his transcriptions of Augustine Baker's works came from these sources; Weldon abridged Baker's Life of Gertrude More, nun of Cambrai, and edited Baker's Treatise on the English Mission for his 'Memorials'.⁴³

The substantial amount of published material inserted into the 'Memorials', and usually transcribed, is not very surprising when we remember his familiarity with the library at Paris. He was able on a number of occasions to give the actual shelf and number of the book,⁴⁴ and was to be heavily dependent on the library, for instance, for information about the sufferings of the Benedictine martyrs. Often, however, he preferred to direct his reader to a book to save time and space, but occasionally he slipped up. Having transcribed a two-page document of 1612, he then added in the margin: 'This is in the Apostolatus which, had I realised, I would have saved myself the labour of copying it from our Author of Douay [i.e. Ellis],'⁴⁵ But one cannot question either his patience or determination. I suspect that he transcribed the full sixty pages of Antony Batt's Short Treatise touching the Confraternitie (1639) because it was a duodecimo volume and thus too small to incorporate into his work. The other labour of love was the complete transcription of Rudesind Barlow's Epistola Presidis (Douai 1628), an octavo volume dealing with the monks' dispute with the Vicars Apostolic. With its clear logic and tight legal argument, he most likely believed the work would not be given justice if merely summarised.⁴⁶

In concluding our survey of Weldon's 'Memorials', we must mention his own interconnecting narrative. It is this which transforms him from an archivist into a historian, and because it relates more to the content than to the form of his work, I shall pass over it briefly. It is found largely in three areas of the 'Memorials': in the Introduction, where he sketches in the history of Benedictinism; in the autobiographical sections; and, finally, in the extended treatment given to the difficulties in the conventual life at St Edmund's. In this last, he tried to justify his own conduct, and most of it, coming at the end of the 'Memorials', is written in a more crabbed hand. Beyond these areas, there is the occasional digression and accompanying apology for being distracted from his 'chronological intent and purpose'.⁴⁷ He was often enthusiastic about giving his own opinion in the margin; my favourite is his comment on the squabble between Bishop Richard Smith and the Regulars, next to which he writes in large letters 'O Sad!'.⁴⁸

THE CHRONOLOGICAL NOTES'

Having finished the 'Memorials', Weldon, however, had not yet finished his Herculean labours. In 1709, he summarised the whole history of the English Benedictine Congregation in a slim manuscript volume which he entitled 'Chronological Notes', which was a distillation of his magnum opus, the 'Memorials', being largely the historical narrative of that work, to which a collection of documents were appended.⁴⁹ He was manifestly dissatisfied with this first draft and produced another, 'revised and augmented' in 1711 which had a more chronological treatment.⁵⁰ Weldon's manuscript ends appropriately with the death of his faithful patron, Bernard Gregson, on 27 January 1711, and perhaps his death prompted Weldon to draw up this draft.

On the title page of the 'Chronological Notes', Weldon admitted to using the archives of the four monasteries of monks 'where are preserved the Authentical Acts and Original Deeds'. Occasionally, he transcribed archival material already found in the 'Memorials'⁵¹ and published material already used in that collection.⁵² Having a number of drafts of the 'Chronological Notes' is invaluable both for the historian and the archivist since it allows them to see how Weldon shaped and defined his material, and gives more opportunity to reach his sources. In Gilbert Dolan's published 'Chronological Notes' (1881), which used the 1709 and 1713 drafts of Weldon, the reader is always told, for instance, when Weldon is dependent on the Benedictine archives at Douai; these references are omitted from the 1711 draft, presumably because they were considered as unimportant.⁵³ Similarly, the 1711 draft cuts out all the English translations of epitaphs, etc., which are found in the Dolan edition.⁵⁴ However, sources taken from the monasteries are identifiable in all the drafts, even if not given a provenance,⁵⁵ and Weldon sometimes admits his own frustration at the loss of valuable archives through the carelessness or design of the brethren;

After the death of this R[everend] F[ather] [Rudesind Barlow], a Bishop sent to the Fathers of Douay to offer them a very convenient establishment if they would give him his writings, wch. being sought for, were found destroyed, by I know not whom or why, but that in the most Holiest Societies there is and always will be some unhappily disposed Creature, & no wonder seeing we find the Devil of a Judas in a Society of only 12 Men, headed by nothing less than God himself.⁵⁶

The 'Chronological Notes' are important for extra pieces of evidence which Weldon did not include in his larger 'Memorials'. Whilst both these compilations used Augustine Baker's 'Treatise on the Mission', and material on Baker from the Benedictine nuns,⁵⁷ only the 'Chronological Notes' gives details, taken from the monk Serenus Cressy's 'Life' of Baker, of Baker searching some of the most important archives in England for documents relating to the history of the English Benedictines and of his consulting famous antiquaries like William Camden, John Selden and Robert Cotton. This research by Baker was a labour after Weldon's own heart, and it resulted in the publication of the Apostolatus, mentioned earlier. The 1711 edition of the 'Chronological Notes', however, omits to inform the reader that these 'old manuscripts . . . taken from the monasteries at their Suppression, now enrich the archives of St Gregory's at Douay'.⁵⁸ Nevertheless, the 1711 draft, as the revised and expanded version, gives far more detail on the death of James II in 1701, and concludes with an account of the cures which took place at the royal resting place. These are not in the earlier draft, for Weldon was only able to catch sight of these 'depositions' when they were officially placed in the monastery archives at Paris between 1709 and 1711.⁵⁹

THE LATER HISTORY OF WELDON'S 'COLLECTIONS'

Despite Weldon's own manuscript ending in January 1711, there are a number of other entries in the 1709 version of the 'Chronological Notes' which take the collection down to April 1712. Weldon was to die the next year, on 23 November 1713, after having been suffocated in his locked room, where he had lit 'a pan of charcoal not well kindled'.⁶⁰ How, then, do we explain the third manuscript of the 'Chronological Notes' transcribed by another hand in 1713?⁶¹ It is almost certain that this was produced following a decree of General Chapter in the summer of 1713 which ordered the prior of Paris or the Visitor there to appoint someone to examine and correct the book (which, was not specified) written by Benet Weldon.⁶² Someone, presumably, had forced his way into Weldon's cell, while he was still alive, and had been horrified to discover the vituperative attacks made in writing by Weldon on his contemporaries, and had demanded that they be excised or corrected. The 1713 draft was part of this revision, presumably, and the discomfort felt at Weldon's arrows might also well explain why there are some curious gaps in the pagination of the 'Memorials', where seventy pages of documents or historical narration have been removed.⁶³ Whatever the reason behind this, the General Chapter of 1717 acknowledged the need to continue Weldon's work, and appointed Edward Chorley as Historiographicus Congregationis, taking, at the same time, sufficient care that he did not withdraw himself from the normal life of the Congregation in pursuing his work. Chorley was given authority to inspect and collect all Congregational archives by visits to the monasteries, and to supervise, with superiors' consent, the appointment of conventual archivists.⁶⁴

Chorley, unfortunately, died the following year and, as far as I know, never began an archival collection. His premature death and the apparent failure to appoint a successor ensured that Weldon's collection remained the most important continuous Congregational archive, despite the eccentricities of its compiler. The next we hear of his 'Memorials' is in 1742 when a retired monk of Paris, William Hewlett, began compiling the annals of the monastery. In this, he tells us, he was indebted to Weldon's 'indefatigable Pen . . . for all the Materials' of his 'Little Treatise', which he took from the 'Memorials'.⁶⁵ Hewlett had been Cellarer of the monastery when Weldon was still alive and had an intimate knowledge of the tensions within the community which so absorbed Weldon. Hewlett was the first to tamper with Weldon's original manuscript; notes of his throughout the margins of the 'Memorials' show him trying to balance Weldon's extreme opinions and correct his half-truths, especially in regard to the monastery's finances.⁶⁶

of reference especially when, through loss and neglect, original documents had disappeared elsewhere. In 1784, for instance, Thomas Welch, chaplain to the Cambrai nuns, wrote to President Augustine Walker for the original copy of the grant of some property the nuns possessed. Being a monk of Paris, Welch remembered seeing it 'in one of the volumes of Bennet Weldon, or in an old port folio'. Walker accordingly looked through 'Weldon's two huge volumes', but without success.⁶⁷ Six years later, the 'Memorials' had been taken to England. In November 1790, Prior Henry Parker of Paris was desperate to find authentic papers regarding the settlement of the monastery at St Malo on the Congregation, in the hope this would give the monks larger pensions from the revolutionary government. He searched the President's room for Weldon's 'Memoires', but could not find them there nor anywhere in the house. Parker was then told the work had been taken to London and he therefore hoped 'there is no harm done in its being there'.⁶⁸ The reason why the volumes were taken to London, apparently by Bede Bennet, the Procurator of the South Province, is unknown. But it is possible they were taken to be consulted during the crucial General Chapter in London during the summer of 1789, when the Congregation was beginning to strengthen its defences against the first attacks of the French government on religious. Here, Weldon's documents would be invaluable in establishing the legal claims to property in France and in proving the Congregation's privileges there. Quite miraculously, therefore, the two volumes survived the destruction of the monasteries, their archives and libraries during the Revolution, and fittingly provided a point of continuity between the old order in France and the new establishment in England.

In England, the 'Memorials' remained part of the President's archive. Bede Brewer, President from 1799 to 1822, found the extracts relating to Lambspring in them 'of great service' in his difficult visitation of Lambspring in 1801 when he collided with the abbot. Brewer noticed 'several original papers, particularly respecting St Malo's in the collection';⁶⁹ and some marginal notes by Brewer are to be found in the 'Memorials' relating to Lambspring's history.⁷⁰ It seems that Brewer kept Weldon with him at Woolton, near Liverpool, where he was a missionary from 1781 until 1818. This would account for the extraordinary inclusion of the will of Edmund Pennington, which was unwittingly bound into the last section of the 'Memorials'. Pennington, a Benedictine missionary at Liverpool, died in June 1794; his will is dated 16 May of the same year.⁷¹ Perhaps the manuscript was re-bound at about this time. After Brewer's death, the 'Memorials' appear to have been taken to Ampleforth, his house of profession. The secular priest and historian, John Kirk, whose interest in collecting original documents relating to English Catholic history puts him alongside Weldon, noted around 1820 that the 'original folio' manuscript was at Ampleforth.⁷²

During the nineteenth century, with the massive destruction of its monasteries behind it, the English Benedictine Congregation began the gigantic task of rebuilding its conventual life. The preservation of the Weldon manuscripts allowed the Congregation to trace its roots from the seventeenth century with some accuracy, confidence and pride. Weldon's own emphasis on the revived Congregation being the full beneficiary and descendant of medieval English Benedictinism made his work an essential reference point in the preliminary discussions surrounding the appointment of titular abbots to the ancient English abbeys, which was allowed by Rome in 1818. Thus the great labour of transcribing the whole of the 'Memorials' was completed in the spring of 1837 in an atmosphere charged with the conviction of the imminent return of the monastic estates. In this copy, the title page reads:

This copy of Dom Ralph Weldon's 'Memoires' was written expressly to be presented to the Library of St Mary's, Glastonbury Abbey when next restored. An ancient Silver Chalice and Paten was to be the reward of the 'Transcriber' for the use of the above named Abbey, March 22, 1837.⁷³

Despite that restoration not occurring, the work of consolidation continued. In 1842, Athanasius Allanson was appointed the Congregation's official annalist, and took his place in line of descent from Weldon. He had the 'Memorials' before him as he compiled his fourteen volumes and, like others earlier, added the occasional note in the margin of Weldon's collection in his shaky and distinctive hand. Although Allanson transcribed rather than collected primary sources like Weldon, there are some similarities between them. Both authors sought out sources and were sometimes frustrated, both works were copied by other scribes and added to by later marginal commentators, and both authors included an element of reflection and evaluation in their annals.⁷⁴

Late nineteenth-century England approached archives with all the strengths and weaknesses of a Gradgrind. Wealth, increased literacy and pride of empire and nation helped to produce the great explosion of published runs of archives such as the Calendars of State Papers, the Rolls Series and the Reports of the Historical Manuscripts Commission. The English Catholic community shared in this determination to conserve the past, and in this period of heightened historical awareness, Weldon was to be for the first time seen, in print. The Gregorian monk, Gilbert Dolan, edited in 1881 a conflated version of Weldon's 'Chronological Notes', using the 1709 and 1713 manuscripts, which was published by the Cambrai nuns, by that time settled at Stanbrook, at the request of the Benedictine Bishop Ullathorne. In this book, Weldon's text forms a backdrop to an extended preface of Dolan who was determined to carve out a niche for the English Benedictines in this period when Catholics were themselves beginning to share in the 'newly-awakened spirit of enquiry and research'. Dolan's edition was to be the monks' answer to Foley's Records of the Society of Jesus (1875—83), and Dolan drew his inspiration from Canon Tierney's edition of Dodd's Church History, which appeared between 1839 and 1843.

Dolan had known but had not used the 'Memorials'. His work, however, was to make Weldon accessible to a wider readership, but at the cost of implying that the 'Chronological Notes' was, more or less, the entire complement of Weldon's work. Dolan wrote at a time which allowed him to follow in the footsteps of Weldon as a historiographer of the Congregation. But the nineteenth century was to see the destruction of the old Congregation which Weldon had known, with its priories and missionary provinces dependent on the President. What emerged in its place were independent abbeys, practically autonomous. One result of this change was the development of strong house loyalties and respect for the individual monastery's history and tradition, to the extent that a particular monastery was often made to appear as having always been independent, with only the very loosest connection with the Congregation.

An unpleasant aspect of this growing autonomy was something a rivalry between the monasteries within the Congregation. Weldon was not to escape this, we must presume that by the mid-nineteenth century, Weldon's 'Memorials' had been returned to his community which by that time had vacated its property in Paris and was living in the old conventual buildings at Douai left by the St Gregory's community which had by then become established at Downside. Sometime about 1850, the volumes were loaned to Ampleforth to help Allanson draw up his annals, and while there, his amanuensis wrote at the front of the second volume: Sancti Laurentii, Apud Amplefordiam. When the volumes were at last returned to the St Edmund's community at Douai, the offensive inscription was crossed out and replaced with the words 'inserted without authority'.⁷⁵ Nevertheless, all acknowledged the usefulness of Weldon as a quarry for histories of the individual monasteries, and this ensured that his collection was to be continually ransacked for original sources rather than being appreciated as a general archive collection for the history of the Congregation as a whole. In this process it was inevitable that Weldon's collection of primary source material was cut away from his interwoven commentary, so that Weldon was exposed with all his faults and personal foibles as an eccentric and a crank, his historical accuracy suspect. He became 'poor Weldon', 'a poor creature', 'the little imp' in the eyes of the liturgist and historian Edmund Bishop who, like Dolan, sharpened his criticism on the anvil of the 'Chronological Notes' rather than the 'Memorials', which he scarcely knew. Bishop was to be ably answered by Stephen Marron, a member of Weldon's own community, whose knowledge of the 'Memorials' was unsurpassed, but the tradition of doubting Weldon's accuracy and decrying his prejudices continued to prevail.⁷⁶

What of old Weldon now? The 'Memorials' have acquired a new dress since 1976, when its leaves were de-acidified, repaired and treated with pure French silk, and the two-volume original was divided into six for easier use. The work has been of great value in the last few years to Dr David Rogers and Mr Antony Allison who are working on a bibliography of the Counter-Reformation. They have both been grateful to Weldon's archival sensitivity because they have found among the 'Memorials' some of the rarest pieces of printing, no longer found in libraries among printed books.

THE ARCHIVES AT CHURCH HOUSE, WESTMINSTER

Brenda Hough

Thank you for inviting me to come and talk to you.¹ I so much enjoyed getting to know some of you last year, and of course more of you in the last two days, and it is good now to have an opportunity to tell you something about my life at Church House and the joys and sorrows of being an archivist in the Church of England.

You will forgive me if I begin by talking a little not about the records of the General Synod as such, but about archive arrangements in the Church of England as a whole. From what I have heard at these Conferences, and read in Catholic Archives, I have discovered that there are a number of ways in which arrangements for our records differ from those you make. A few of your structures were unfamiliar to me; and though the Church of England is, in one sense, the church of every Englishman, perhaps I am not offending you if I guess that some of you may find our archives set-up a little strange and perhaps sometimes confusing. Much of our system has, like Topsy, just 'grewed', and some confusion is felt even by members of the Church of England: so I hope that those of you who are already experts in Anglican ways will bear with me if I briefly outline the situation. It should, I hope, make it easier for you to see the part my own office has to play in the overall picture.

Firstly, the records of the parish and diocese. One of the better things about that ambivalent animal, an established church, is that the state throughout has taken some measure of interest in the well-being of Church of England records, particularly what I might call 'local' records, those of the parish and diocese. This came about, of course, because the Anglican parish administration was also the earliest form of local government. In the late 1590's, Queen Elizabeth decreed that parish registers were henceforth to be kept on parchment, and copies made of the paper registers back to the beginning of her reign — probably the only reason that so many early registers have survived. 380 years later, when alarm became widespread at the lack of proper provision for records in some parishes, we were able to write into the law of the land the Parochial Registers and Records Measure 1978, which aims to persuade each parish to take greater care of its documents. The burden of responsibility for reviewing progress under the Measure has largely been shouldered by the county record offices, where most parish records (and, usually from a later date, diocesan records) are now kept. The Church of England is enormously grateful for the help given in this way: I should like to put on record to the county record office staff here that the service you provide — one we should be quite unable to provide ourselves — is always remembered and appreciated.

Then there are the archives of what we call the 'voluntary sector' of the Church of England. Anglicans, for good or ill, have often been great individualists; and at some stages of our history it seems that no self-respecting churchman could let his days on earth pass without founding some society or movement to forward his charitable concerns, or give voice to his particular views on some matter of controversy. From the seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries, so often thought of as a dead period for the Church of England, we have the great missionary societies — the New England Company; the Society for the Propagation of Christian Knowledge; and the United Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, where I myself spent four happy years before moving to Church House. By the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, the reforming movement represented by such figures as John Wesley was well under way, and we see the growth of the major evangelical organisations — the Sunday School movement, the Bible Society, the Church Missionary Society. The records of these bodies are often very extensive and important, for the early history of the countries where the missionary work took place, for example, or for the social history of the problems which the society was formed to combat. Victoria's reign saw the full surge of educational and philanthropic movements. This was the period when fervour for the rescue of bodies from poverty and souls from depravity was at its height — and sometimes, it seems, more concerned with totting up heads than with the quality of physical or spiritual help provided. I mean the kind of good works and gospelising embodied in Mrs Pardiggle in Bleak House. Some of you will know Professor Owen Chadwick's splendid work The Victorian Church, but I am sure you can enjoy it again even if you remember his description of one such evangelist about his missionary business:

Stevenson Blackwood travelled by train from Aberdeen to London. While waiting a quarter of an hour at Aberdeen he visited the quay, gave tracts to the dockers and fishermen, and preached aboard a collier. In the ticket queue he gave a woman a book. Between Aberdeen and Perth he persuaded a drunken man to kneel down in the carriage and pray with him. At Edinburgh he gave a lady a tract as she got out and in exchange she gave him a sermon by Spurgeon. Between Edinburgh and Newark he got a snoring man to read a tract in his waking moment. After Newark he distributed books to two new gentlemen. Finally he spent the last hour in composing an address. ²

Societies dating from this period run into scores, if not hundreds. From the archival point of view, these organisations have material of very great value, often quite out of proportion to the range of present-day work undertaken. You will find at the furthest extreme a society with perhaps one desk and a single part-time member of staff, but with two rooms packed to the ceiling with historical papers of the first importance. One of the most interesting parts of my work, when other pressures allow, is to visit societies such as these and try to help usually by making a rough list of the archives, and by suggesting inexpensive ways of improving the housing given to them. Sometimes the best course is to find a home for the archives in an established record office. If the society is a local one, the county record offices once again often provide a solution. The libraries of the two Archbishops — that is, the Borthwick Institute at York, and Lambeth Palace Library' for the Archbishop of Canterbury — have taken in many of the voluntary sector records. In cases of extreme difficulty I have taken in small collections myself: last year, for example, the British Records Association asked if Church House would accept the archives of the Church Patronage Trust, consisting mostly of eighteenth and nineteenth century legal documents. Patronage, in the Church of England, is the system whereby a named individual or corporate body has the right to appoint the priest to a parish. These days the right is exercised only after consultation and consideration of the wider needs of an area, but amongst the Church Patronage Trust papers is an impressive document conveying the patronage of an Oxfordshire parish as part of a marriage settlement.

I turn now to the central record-keeping bodies of the Church of England, the category in which my own employer is included. These are mostly of much more recent origin than either the voluntary organisations, or the authorities which produced the parish and diocesan records; though the Church Commissioners (dating from 1948) is an amalgamation of two much older bodies, the nineteenth-century Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and the eighteenth-century Queen Anne's Bounty. The Commissioners are the financial wizards of the Church of England. Queen Anne's Bounty was set up to augment the stipends of poor clergy; the Ecclesiastical Commissioners is in part to enable the building of the many new churches needed in our cities with the urban population explosion of the Industrial Revolution. From these early functions has developed the wide range of the Commissioners' present-day activities — maintaining churches and clergy houses; conducting the intricate business of parish boundary adjustment; coping with the questions of redundant churches; and most fundamental of all, the payment and pensioning of the clergy. These days the Commissioners are to a considerable extent directed on policy matters by the General Synod, but their administration and records are kept separately. The archives are enormous. They are primarily geared to heavy office use of the files, but also provide important material for scholarship, notably in the field of economic history (because of the financial and land tenure archives) and for local historians (because of the many hundreds of maps, and detailed notes from parishes through the centuries). Finding one's way in such a mass of material is not easy, but the Commissioners' Records Officer, David Armstrong, despite constant pressure from his work of record management, is always pleased to help the researcher.

The other major central record-keeping bodies, those not mainly concerned with property and finance, have been what you might call the Anglican talking-shops. The Convocations of Canterbury and York, Reformation bodies which fell out of effective use with the troubles of the seventeenth century, were revived in the later decades of the nineteenth, and became the first national bodies for discussing and formulating the received opinion and policy of the Church of England's clergy. With social change came growing pressure for a greater say by the laity, and the history of the central Church of England administration in the twentieth century is largely a history of increased lay involvement. The Church Assembly, from 1920, first established an Anglican 'Parliament', with Houses of Bishops, Clergy and laity, each constitutionally able to hold the wilder notions of other houses in some kind of check. Matters of doctrine, however, and of liturgy, were firmly retained by the Convocations and were primarily in episcopal care. But with the coming of the General Synod in 1970, an equal say has been given to each of the three houses on all matters of Anglican concern. The Upper and Lower Houses of the Convocations have for most purposes been absorbed into the Synod's House of Bishops and House of Clergy. No change of importance can be introduced without large majorities in both those houses, and in the House of Laity; and highly controversial matters such as the introduction of our new Alternative Service Book in 1980, or, more recently, the possibility of a change in our marriage discipline, must also be referred for discussion and approval (or rejection) at the diocesan and deanery synods, which in turn take note of parish opinion.

How does my employer, the General Synod, function? The tiered system which I mentioned just now determines its membership. Each parish church elects a few of its members to the Deanery Synod, which represents anything from ten parishes to forty or more, and meets four times a year or so to discuss matters referred to it by the next layer up, the Diocesan Synod. Deanery Synod members elect both the Diocesan and the General Synod members. The General Synod is elected for a five-year term; it meets three times a year for three or four days on each occasion — usually in Westminster, but in most summers at York. Its procedures are akin to that other legislating and discussing body on the far side of Parliament Square. The Synod works through a printed agenda, discussing papers which have been circulated in advance. There is provision for private members' motions; and a regular session something akin to Prime Minister's question time is one of the livelier parts of the Synod's proceedings. Once the debates have been held, any recommendations passed need to be put into effect — perhaps by setting up a Commission or Working Group to look more closely into a given problem; or by the drafting of legislation which must then go to Parliament for further consideration and ratification. To prepare the papers which are discussed in Synod, and to carry out Synod's decisions, is the work of the Boards and Councils at Church House. These specialise in areas of the Church's concern such as Education or Social Responsibility. The Boards bear much the same relationship to Synod as the civil service departments do to Parliament. It is their records which are my main concern: in effect, I am the archivist of the Anglican Civil Service.

How, then, was the Archives Centre set up? By the mid-1970's, Church House had an accumulation of some fifty years' papers: most of it the archive of the Synod's predecessor, the Church Assembly. The size of this collection was causing a major storage problem, and there was also pressure from outside researchers to come and make use of the earlier papers. Some departments, of course, had already organised excellent registry systems for themselves; but others had either contrived to lose many of their archives or, at the other extreme, had kept every receipt and acknowledgment note since their foundation. I was appointed in July 1977 to fulfil two main responsibilities firstly, to organise a record service for the departments in Church House; and secondly, to make available for research use all records not classified as confidential. The assets were a large basement area, some 129 feet by 30, which could easily be made secure and fire-proof; and, on the ground floor, a rather curious office space which had at some time been divided into an upper and lower area connected by a small staircase (probably, we think, for use as a shop with storage above). This room serves reasonably well as an archives office with a small searchroom in the upper area. The disadvantages were that much alteration and improvement was needed on both basement and ground floor level. The office area was in use as a paint store (fairly easily rectified); the basement, less simple to deal with, was a warren of small rooms, most of them already stuffed with archives of assorted merit, along with faded photographs of church worthies, everyone's spare publications for half a century past, and the usual jumble of broken and antiquated furniture which such an area inevitably attracts. For my first eighteen months in Church House the contents of these storage rooms had to be swathed in thick protective polythene, whilst walls were demolished around them, painting and lighting put to rights, and a smoke detector and ventilation system installed. Anyone who is thinking of fitting ventilation, take warning! The trunking through which the fresh air is drawn is of giant proportions. My carefully thought-out schemes for wall shelving all had to be abandoned, and at one stage it seemed to me that the basement would be so full of metal pipes that there would be no room left for any papers.

We were working on a tight budget, mostly on grants generously provided by the Pilgrim and Radcliffe Trustees, and every inch of the existing shelving had to be re-used. There was just enough money left at the end to fit one precious block of mobile shelving, the kind which slides along on runners so that only one tunnel is needed for a whole block. This kind of shelving is inevitably more expensive per foot than the fixed type, but I do recommend it to any archivist who is faced with the problem of supplying shelving for a new storage room. Almost twice as many records can be stored in a block of mobile shelving as in the same area fitted with static units; and in church archives, where almost all of us are compelled to make the best of limited accommodation and funds, every space-saving device is valuable. It has the added advantage of encouraging tidiness, since boxes or volumes which jut out can play havoc with the machinery.

The possibility of the Thames flooding was a constant anxiety during my early days; now, mercifully, relieved by the completion of the Thames barrier. To cope with possible minor floods, from burst pipes and so on, we aim to keep the lowest papers a few inches above floor level — a simple enough arrangement which I expect most of you use yourselves if there is any risk. The biggest worry these days is the difficulty of keeping the humidity as static as we should like. The ventilation system circulates the air effectively enough but cannot control the degree of moisture drawn in; variations in humidity, as you know, can damage the structure of paper, especially the modern machine-made paper used in most offices. We take humidity readings every day (a simple hygrometer costs only a few pounds). If the air is too damp, there is not much to be done about it; but if the air is too dry (mostly the case in centrally-heated buildings) improvements can be made by introducing a container of water which can evaporate.

Whilst all the building alterations were under way, the number of files I could work on at one time was limited, so most of my listing during those months concentrated on small self-contained collections which warranted detailed attention. Several of the Boards and Councils had inherited the archives of nineteenth-century organisations whose work they later absorbed, and this material is much sought after by historians in the fields of social science or political history. I am thinking of such organisations as the Church of England Purity Society, or the White Cross League, active against prostitution; or pressure groups like the Church Defence Institution — one of several groups at the time concerned with defending (or sometimes opposing) the Church of England's links with the State.

Much of my time was spent in getting to know the staff of Church House, some 180 men and women, clerical and lay. You will know already how important it is for an archivist to have a good relationship with his or her colleagues. When an organisation has not had an archivist before, hard-pressed administrators are bound to wonder what extra work will be wished upon them. Looking back I am profoundly grateful for those first months, although at the time I felt frustrated and eager for the action, as I saw it, to begin. Conversations held then, when all I could do was talk to my fellows about how a record service could help the department's work, have borne great fruit ever since. I was able to allay suspicions about what new complications I might impose on the filing systems. I reassured them that files which ought to be kept confidential wouldn't be opened to the public without their approval. Above all, I was able to make friends with one or two in every department. All staff, of course, are important: the senior policy-makers because they are in a position to introduce improvements, such as the regular transfer to Archives of files as they pass out of office currency: the office juniors, because often it is ultimately they who have to go through the files and weed out the duplicates and ephemeral material. At Church House I try to have one person in each Board or Council who acts as a 'liaison archivist'. He (or she) undertakes to chivvy each officer when it is time for files to be passed over, and ideally keeps an eye on office stationery — making sure, for instance, that only non-rusting staples and paperclips are used on papers which will be kept permanently.

Nowadays, I try to meet all new secretaries who come to work with us, and persuade them that files transferred to Archives are not lost for ever, but can easily be recalled if necessary — and can, in fact, sometimes be found more quickly than if kept in the office in overcrowded filing cabinets. I try to show them how to produce a 'transfer list'. These lists give a very brief description of the files being handed over, drawn up in whatever way fits in best with the office procedures. Lists are identified by the date of deposit. When the files arrive, all we have to do immediately is put them into archive boxes and mark which files have gone into which box. The departments can easily identify any papers they need to have back for reference and we (if the system works well!) can equally easily find them. They are also asked to indicate if any files include material which should be kept closed from public view. We do not have a single closure rule: material from one department is so different from that in another that it seemed best to judge each Board's needs individually. Personal files, such as applications for training for the priesthood, are of course kept confidential for at least a hundred years. Otherwise, we try not to impose a longer rule than thirty years — the time set for the public records. Some heads of departments would like their material to be open to the public at once, with the laudable aim of destroying any image of the Church of England as a devious wielder of political power: but the wise archivist resists such excesses of enthusiasm, if only because it takes longer than that to get records into a publicly usable condition.

We spend a good deal of time retrieving files for departments and in searching through the papers to find information for them. In an administration such as ours, funded from the pockets of ordinary churchgoers, it is very important for the archives office to be seen as a time-and-trouble-saver for other staff, and not just as a luxury service for historical researchers who may have no other connection with the church. But, of course, our eventual aim is to provide the kind of finding aid which will smooth the path of the researcher as well as satisfy departmental needs. Therefore, as time allows, we move on to much more detailed 'archival' listings. These lists aim to reproduce the structure of the administration rather than the way the papers were kept when still in the office. For example, papers may have come to us from two or three different staff members of a Board or Council. From the researcher's point of view this distinction is of little importance, so (although we could still trace the source if needed) we put all the papers together to form one body of material, the archive, if you like, of a given Committee or Working Party. It is then easy to spot duplicated material, and to discover any gaps in series such as numbered reports while there is still a chance to chase up copies elsewhere.

As youH realise, listing of this kind is a time-consuming business, and it is only in the last three years, with extra staffing, that much of it has been possible. If the system of transfer lists followed by more detailed lists at a later stage seems unnecessarily complicated, I should perhaps point out that at our busiest we may lake in as many as 100 feet of new files in a single month — the equivalent of 300 archive boxes: so the only way to cope is to deal with the material in easy stages. At present, we still end up with lists of a fairly general kind; even basic documents such as minutes are not listed individually. So, in the future, we shall need to explore the possibility of lists with much more detail than those we have now. A very few classes of material have already been treated in this way. The Board for Mission and Unity, for instance, has important material relating to the experimental Church of South India. Detail of this material was asked for by a senior churchman last year, so an archive trainee who was with lists at the time spent several days listing that material document by document. But I am now beginning to think of putting our lists into a micro-computer. In that way much of the labour of cross-referencing and indexing would be taken from us, and we could add in extra detail to any list as time allowed. It would also simplify the process of adding new material as it is taken over from the transfer lists, which can present something of a problem at the moment. The cost of a computer is now just about within the range of a small archives office, and such aids will without doubt have a place in record work in the future — though they are much too often thought of as the answer to every problem.

I hope I haven't bored you with too much detail of our listing methods, but it seemed to me the kind of information which archivists find useful to exchange with one another. Perhaps, for the same reason, you will like to hear a little more about the kind of work we tackle day by day, other than accessioning and listing and retrieving files and information for departments. 'We', by the way, is one full-time member of staff (me); my splendid helper Dr Patricia Kelvin, a self-employed historian/archivist who spends between two and three days a week on listing projects; and, for the present, a team of young unemployed graduates two days a week, paid for by the Government under the MSC's Community Programme. These teams need to have a minimum of three members, but if any of you were in a position to take on this number of people, I do recommend the scheme as an excellent way of making inroads into backlogs of unsorted material — and, incidentally, of helping a little with the problem of unemployment. You do need to get the right team, however, and to allow a good deal of time for supervision.

Much of our time is spent looking after researchers and enquiries by post and telephone. There are on average two to three external visitors a day, eight or ten phone calls, and perhaps three letters to be answered. Some of the visitors and phone callers are quickly made happy — perhaps with information from one of our old clerical directories, or with the address of the record office where they will find the papers of the society they are looking for. Others, as you will realise from your own experience, can take a very long time, and involve a good deal of research or photocopying. The letters almost always take a longish time. Many are from genealogists who assume (wrongly, as you know) that we have the parish registers of the Church of England. Quite often they fondly hope that we shall be able to supply a central index of all the baptisms, marriages and burials from Elizabeth on! All one can do in such cases is give the address of the right county record office to get in touch with, or make any other helpful suggestions that come to mind. Needless to say, I often grudge the time (perhaps 25 per cent of my working week) that goes in this way. But it is surely important to do a good public relations job. An archivist may be the only official representative of a Christian organisation that the letter-writer ever comes into contact with; and in that sense the care we can show is, if you like, part of our mission as believers.

At least life is very seldom dull. I looked through the log we keep of enquiries that come our way, and in the couple of weeks before this Conference discovered we had given information on subjects ranging from Anglican conceptions of Imperial German aggression prior to World War I; through the history of an English church in Canton, China; to the burial place of a seventeenth-century highwayman.

It is not easy to pick out particular groups of papers in the archives which you might like to know about. There are, for instance, few collected papers of individual church leaders. We could not produce for a researcher ten boxes which could be called the papers of, say, Archbishop William Temple. There is fascinating material available for Temple, but to read it would mean looking through several classes of papers of which I will mention three: the transcripts of debates for speeches he made in the Church Assembly; discussion in the Council for Education (as it was then named) in the years leading up to the 1944 Act; and a batch of letters to a head deaconess in Yorkshire in the 1930's, full of wise and loving advice on the role women had to play in working for the Church. This dispersal, if you like, of an individual's papers is inevitable if one is trying to retain the structure of administration which led to the papers being created and if we had tried to help one group of researchers by arranging our papers on the basis of personal involvement, it would have been next to impossible for another researcher to reconstruct the patterns of administration, so the gain would have been illusory. Once again, a micro-computer should help us to bring together source materials of this kind.

Themes are rather easier to pursue than individuals, largely because particular problems tend to have been made the responsibility of a group of some kind — a Sub-Committee or Working Party, perhaps — the papers of which will in any case be kept as an archive group. Future students wishing, for example, to study the relationship between our two churches in the years since Vatican II will find the discussions set out in the papers of the Churches' Unity Commission and, to a lesser extent, in those of the Churches' Council for Covenanting. These are not strictly Church of England papers, but the groups happened to be serviced from Church House and so the archives stayed there when the work was brought to a conclusion. We look after them on behalf of all the participating and observing churches. There would of course be many sources of information on ecumenical relations (as indeed on William Temple) other than those available in Church House: in all the instances I have cited, the material mentioned refers only to the individual or group in so far as their activity meshes into the work of the General Synod.

One group of papers of the first importance, at present separately maintained but due to join the Synod's records later this year, is the archive of the National Society. This body, as many of you will know, was the founder of the 'National School', that symbol of universal primary education whose name you still see cut into the stonework of many an older school building in English villages. Dating from the years before Victoria came to the throne, the archives include individual files on many thousands of schools; and we greatly look forward to continuing the welcome to educational researchers which has always been extended while the records were with the Society itself.

I thought I might conclude my talk to you by mentioning a few of the problems and irritations which I meet in my work. I suspect some of them may be your difficulties too, and we might be able to suggest solutions to one another — and if not, a mutual grumble is usually a valuable therapy. We meet a lot of papers in the course of a year which are not strictly the General Synod's — in particular, papers brought back to Church House by staff sitting on national or inter-church groups. Such papers can take up a great deal of space, and ought really to be taken care of by the parent body. If the organisation is a quango, then presumably the Public Records Acts will take care of the archives: but sometimes we know that other, more private organisations have no proper arrangements for keeping sets of their papers, and that if we discard our copies, the record may be lost. How far are archivists justified in using expensive time and space to become their brothers' keepers?

A related problem is the question of which papers are rightly the property of an individual staff member, and which belong to his or her employer. Should he, when he leaves Church House, take away for his own use papers such as evidence he has presented to external Commissions on which he has served? Not in my view, but sometimes he thinks so. More difficult, what about personal letters he has written to friends and acquaintances collecting information for papers he was writing for use by his Board or Council? Even more difficult in the case of a Chairman of a Commission or Working Group, who is usually a distinguished academic or civil servant, possibly a member of General Synod but certainly not an employee. His correspondents no doubt think of themselves as writing to Canon X or Professor Y — and yet comments they make may have a significant influence on the deliberations, and it would be a loss not to have them recorded in the archives. I am sure there are no hard and fast rules in these cases, and can only reiterate what I said before about the value of keeping up good relations with as many of one's colleagues as possible.

A third problem: when a number of staff members all have copies of the same paper, there is of course no need to keep every duplicate. But when they have written notes and comments on the paper, does it become a different kind of archive? We can't tell whether this staff member might be Archbishop of Canterbury in thirty years' time! Finally — and bearing in mind that an accidental ringing of the fire alarm in Church House sends out into the street not only the entire staff of the General Synod, but several hundred civil servants including two Ombudsmen and, spasmodically, the boffins of the Channel Tunnel — how does one persuade a visiting workman not to light up a cigarette under the smoke detectors?

THE DUKE OF NORFOLK'S ARCHIVES AT ARUNDEL CASTLE

John Martin Robinson

The archives of the Duke of Norfolk are one of the largest accumulations of the kind in the United Kingdom. They comprise hundreds of thousands of documents dating from the thirteenth century to the present day and reflect the important role played by the Duke's ancestors in the political, religious and economic affairs of the country over a period of many centuries, as well as an enormous quantity of material relating to the administration of their estates in several counties. The collection is one of the most complete of its kind, but it is not just a museum piece; the papers are still used in the administration of Arundel Castle and estate. As well as the archives stored at the Castle, there are also two loan deposits of archives in Yorkshire; the papers relating to the Sheffield estate are on loan to the City Library there and the archives from Carlton Towers (the Duke's other seat) are on loan to Hull University Library. The great majority of the family papers, however, including all the personal papers and the southern estate papers, are stored at Arundel Castle where they fill six muniment rooms. As the family has remained Catholic, with one or two exceptions, since the Reformation, this large archive collection is obviously of prime importance to students of Catholic history.

The collection is made up of a number of different groups, including papers relating to other families but brought into the Norfolk collection by marriage. Perhaps the most interesting of these are the Aylward Papers for the period from 1672 to 1717. John Aylward, the maternal grandfather of the 10th Duke of Norfolk, was a Catholic merchant from County Waterford who conducted a successful business in London, Malaga and St Malo exporting and importing baize, herrings, stockings, lemons and wine. His correspondence is remarkably complete and gives a unique picture of the business life of a prosperous late seventeenth-century Catholic.

Other collections include inventories and valuations from 1641 down to the present. These are particularly useful for throwing light on the contents of the Catholic chapels in the Duke's various houses in the eighteenth century. The 9th Duke, for instance, who died in 1777, maintained large chapels at Worksop Manor (his house near Sheffield) and at Arundel Castle, both with splendid plate and vestments. Connected with the inventories are the collections of testamentary records and legal papers which run from the fifteenth century up to the present. The earliest will is that of Edmund Lenthall, grandson of Richard, Earl of Arundel, which is dated 1447. The Acts of Parliament include those of 1605, 1688 and 1714, all of which affected Popish recusants and the presentation to benefices on their estates.

Another important assemblage is that of the records relating to the Fitzalan Chapel at Arundel, which date from the thirteenth to the twentieth centuries. The Fitzalan Chapel is the east end of the parish church and was rebuilt as a collegiate establishment in 1380 by the 4th Earl of Arundel. When Henry VIII abolished chantries, the college property, including the chapel, was bought back by the Earl of Arundel for 1,000 marks and it has continued to be the private Catholic burial place of the Earls of Arundel and Dukes of Norfolk ever since. These archives include some rolls of medieval accounts which are of double interest because the chapel was an important music centre in the fifteenth century, and some of the rolls are re-used fragments of medieval polyphony, still with the the lines of music on their backs.

The estate records, which form the bulk of the archive collection, include maps and plans from the seventeenth century onwards, accounts, rentals, and administrative papers from the thirteenth to the twentieth century, and a huge collection of manorial court rolls from the thirteenth century up to the eighteenth century. The specifically Catholic interest amongst this large complex of material had often to be deduced from between the lines. For instance, just before Titus Oates' Plot, the 7th Duke of Norfolk vested all his estates in the hands of friendly Protestant trustees — just in case And this arrangement continued for the rest of his lifetime and that of his successor the 8th Duke throughout the late seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries.

The most interesting Catholic archival material at Arundel is to be found in the collection of Howard family papers and correspondence which runs from the sixteenth to the twentieth century. A particular treasure is the original manuscript life of St Philip Howard, Earl of Arundel, which was written at the beginning of the seventeenth century by a Jesuit chaplain in the household of the Earl's widow, and which gives a graphic account of his 'conversion', his imprisonment for his Faith and death in the Tower of London. Another touching relic is the series of little account books for the children of Lord Thomas Howard of Worksop, brother of the 7th Duke, who were smuggled out of the country to safety at the time of the 'Glorious Revolution' in 1688 and were brought up by their nurse in France till it was deemed safe for them to come back to London. The correspondence includes some letters from Cardinal Philip Howard (Almoner to Catherine of Braganza) though most of his letters are in the Bodleian Library at Oxford, and some of the letters of the eighteenth and nineteenth century chaplains at Arundel, of whom Canon Tierney was the best known.

After the Emancipation Act in 1829, there is a dramatic increase in the quantity of Catholic material preserved, as the 19th-century Dukes of Norfolk played a prominent role in Catholic affairs, building churches, supporting Catholic charities and schools, charring committees, conducting relations between the English Government and the Vatican. The resulting correspondence includes letters from most of the leading Catholic figures of the day, including Cardinal Newman, Fr Faber of the London Oratory, and Wilfrid Ward. The 15th Duke, who inherited in 1860 and died in 1917, kept nearly all his correspondence which is bound up in bundles by the month and stored in boxes in chronological order. It includes a microcosm of the Catholic history of the period and throws much light on nineteenth century Catholic life, especially education, Irish affairs and Anglo-papal relations because, until the establishment of a British Minister at Rome during the First World War, there was no official British diplomatic representative at the Vatican and so the government had to channel its views discreetly through the Duke of Norfolk and Cardinal Rampolla.

Not to be underestimated is the Catholic 'ephemera', forgotten speeches, old newspaper cuttings and printed pamphlets. Partly because of its transient character, material of this sort often tends to be destroyed, and much of the Arundel Catholic 'ephemera' is therefore unique. The clou of this part of the collection is the 'Pro and Anti-Popery' section of the library. This includes a cross-section of everything published on the religious controversy in the reign of James II from 1683 to 1688. These pamphlets are bound into 58 volumes and comprise nearly 500 items, with titles like 'A Discourse against Transubstantiation', 'Transubstantiation Defended and Prov'd', 'A short Discourse upon . . . Religion By the Duke of Buckingham', 'A Reply to the answer of the Man of No Name to His Grace the Duke of Buckingham's Paper on Religion'.

OF KINGSTON, ONTARIO, 1826-1976

The Rev. Brian J. Price

A young Scottish priest, the Reverend Alexander MacDonell, and his poor flock came out to this land at the beginning of the nineteenth century. In the wild and far-flung region of Upper Canada for which he had responsibility as a Vicar General of the Diocese of Quebec, he found only two churches and three priests. He strove diligently to establish new churches, obtain priests from Ireland and Scotland, and establish schools and schoolmasters in all parts of the province. He was accustomed to travelling about two thousand miles a year by any means available. This he continued to do until he was well into his seventies. Many times he crossed the Atlantic for the purpose of recruiting new settlers, clergy and financial support for his territory.

In 1819, Alexander MacDonell was consecrated a bishop and in 1826 became the first bishop of the first diocese established in the British Empire since the time of the Reformation. It was as bishop of Kingston that he returned to the British Isles for the last time. In a memorial written by him, he states that he left behind him seventy-seven churches and over one hundred priests. Bishop MacDonell died in Scotland in January of 1840.

Fortunately, a large amount of historical material from these early years has been preserved in the form of letters, bills, receipts, various documents, both civil and ecclesiastical, as well as a number of letter books, pictures, books, a few pieces of furniture and other memorabilia.

From the time of bishop James Cleary, in the 1880's, many attempts have been made to have a comprehensive and authoritative history of the diocese written but none of these attempts met with noteworthy success. Aside from the time involved and the magnitude of the project, one notable drawback has always been the fact that the archives of the Archdiocese had never been catalogued. Most of the material had been loosely grouped and stuffed into envelopes. The entire collection was stored in a steel filing cabinet in the vault off the Archbishop's office on the second floor of the Archbishop's residence.

In the summer of 1968, the author served as a Deacon in the Cathedral parish. Part of the time was to be spent in the work on the archives in response to a request from the Queen's University for access to the material for research purposes. That summer, most of the approximately 3,300 books in the library on the fourth floor of the Archbishop's residence were catalogued.

After the ordination of the author in May of 1969, the appointment as archivist was made official. Work was begun to unfold and sort through the letters and other documents preparatory to cataloguing. The Dominion Archives in Ottawa have asked to microfilm the collection when it will be ready.

The material in the archives consists of the following:

- I CORRESPONDENCE: Here are to found letters, bills, receipts, documents, both civil and ecclesiastical, circular letters, pastoral letters, sermons, etc. We are extremely fortunate that a large amount of personal correspondence of the first four bishops of Kingston has been preserved. We have a fair amount of material relating to Bishop MacDonell's dealings with the Colonial Office of the British Government in bringing out settlers to Canada and providing for them once they arrived here. There is material on the various internal troubles that plagued every bishop up to our own time. Also there is a good selection of material relating to the relations between the Church and the newly emerging nation of Canada as is to be seen in the file of the correspondence between Sir John A. Macdonald and Bishop Horan.
- II LETTER BOOKS: The Letter Books contain hand-written duplicates of all outgoing correspondence of the Bishops of Kingston up to the end of the reign of Bishop O'Brien in 1897.
- III SPECIAL COLLECTIONS: Grouped here would be the material relating to the various religious orders, Regiopolis College, various other institutions, the Separate School Question, etc.
- IV MISCELLANEOUS: In this will be grouped the rather extensive picture collection, blueprints, bound newspapers plus reference to furniture and other memorabilia.
- V THE LIBRARY: In addition to the three thousand volume collection, the Library also contains books of special interest kept in the vault, ledgers, account books, etc.

THE CATALOGUE: Cataloguing the archives has been done by a system of letters and numbers. The material has first been grouped into units comprised of the administration of each bishop. Thus we have the following units:

- A THE MOST REVEREND ALEXANDER MACDONELL (17607-1840): Vicar General of Quebec for Upper Canada (1807); Titular Bishop of Rhesina and Auxiliary to Quebec (1819); first Bishop of Kingston (1826-1840). The material covers the years c. 1800 to 1839.
- B THE MOST REVEREND REMIGIUS GAULIN (1787-1857); Titular Bishop of Tobraca and Coadjutor to the Bishop of Kingston (1833—1840); second Bishop of Kingston (1840—1857); the material relates only to those years 1840 1843 at which time Bishop Phelan became Apostolic Administrator and de facto Bishop due to the poor health of Bishop Gaulin.
- C THE MOST REVEREND PATRICK PHELAN (1795-1857); Titular Bishop of Carrhae and Coadjutor to the Bishop of Kingston (1843); Apostolic Administrator of Kingston (1843—1857); third Bishop of Kingston (8 May ~6 June 1857); the material covers the years 1843—1857.

- D THE MOST REVEREND JOHN EDWARD HORAN (1817-1875); Titular Bishop of Chrysopolis (1874—1875); fourth Bishop of Kingston (1858—1874); the material covers the years from 1858 to 1874 though there is little material to be found between 1870 and 1874.
- E THE MOST REVEREND JOHN O'BRIEN (1832-1879); fifth Bishop of Kingston (1875- 1879). Because of the relatively short reign of Bishop O'Brien there is very little material relating to this period.
- F THE MOST REVEREND JAMES VINCENT CLEARY (1828-1898); sixth Bishop of Kingston (1880—1889); first Archbishop of Kingston 1889—1898). The material covers the years of his reign but becomes very sparse after 1892.
- G THE MOST REVEREND CHARLES HUGH GAUTHIER (1843—1922); second Archbishop of Kingston (1899—1910); second Archbishop of Ottawa (1910- 1922); the material covers the period from 1898 to 1910.
- H THE MOST REVEREND MICHAEL JOSEPH SPRATT (1854—1938); third Archbishop of Kingston (1911—1938). The material covers the period from 1911 to 1928 at which time Archbishop O'Brien became the Coadjutor and Apostolic Administrator of the Archdiocese due to the poor health of Archbishop Spratt.
- I THE MOST REVEREND MICHAEL JOSEPH O'BRIEN (1874-1943); third Bishop of Peterborough (1913 -1929); Titular of Amorio; Coadjutor to the Archbishop of Kingston and Apostolic Administrator of the Archdiocese 1929-1938); fourth Archbishop of Kingston (1938—1943). The material covers the years 1929- 1943.
- J THE MOST REVEREND JOSEPH ANTHONY O'SULLIVAN (1886-1972); Bishop of Charlottetown (1931—1944); fifth Archbishop of Kingston (1944-1966); Titular Archbishop of Maraguaia (1966- 1972). The material covers the period from 1944 to 1966.
- K THE MOST REVEREND JOSEPH LAWRENCE WILHELM (1909—); Auxiliary Bishop of Calgary (1936—1966); sixth Archbishop of Kingston (1967- 1982).
- L THE MOST REVEREND FRANCIS JOHN SPENCE (1926-) Auxiliary Bishop to Cardinal Roy for the Canadian Armed Forces (1967—1982); Bishop of Charlottetown, P. E. I. (1970 -1982); Ordinary for the Military Vicariate (1982 —); seventh Archbishop of Kingston (1982 —).

THE CORRESPONDENCE (I) is further subdivided in the following manner:

- C Correspondence to and from various individuals, parishes, organizations, departments, etc. This is further catalogued by the authors of the letters being arranged in alphabetical order and the letters of each author arranged chronologically.

- BD Business and Commercial documents which include bills, receipts, promissory notes, etc. These are grouped under various headings and arranged in chronological order.
- CD Civil Documents which relate to the relationship between Church and State, legal matters, etc. Where applicable, these are grouped under various headings, e.g., wills, powers of attorney, etc., and arranged chronologically.
- CL Circular Letters including pastoral addresses, etc. These are grouped according to place of origin and arranged chronologically.
- ED Ecclesiastical Documents: Diocesan. These would include petitions, establishment of parishes, statistics on parishes, etc., These too, would be grouped under various headings such as Parish Records, Clergy, etc., and arranged chronologically.
- ER Ecclesiastical Documents: Roman. These would include documents addressed to Rome from Canada as well as documents originating in Rome and arranged chronologically.
- S Sermons There are only small numbers of sermons that have survived and most of these are undated.

The Correspondence has been placed in legal-size file folders and filed in vertical transfer cases. The Archives is located in a fireproof vault off the office of the Archbishop on the second floor of the residence at 279 Johnson Street.

At the present moment, only the correspondence has been catalogued and that only from 1800 to 1898. The cut-off date in use at the present time is a period of sixty years because of the nature of some of the material as well as the fact that living persons would be involved. In actual fact, the period of restriction begins at the end of Archbishop Gauthier's reign in 1910. Those wishing access to the Archives are asked to contact the archivist beforehand, and present some proof of scholarly intent. Due to the historical value of this collection, access is somewhat limited until cataloguing is completed and the whole collection is microfilmed.

This article was originally delivered as a paper to the Canadian Catholic History Society at Queen's University in 1972. It was subsequently published by the Society and by the Kingston Historical Society in Historic Kingston.

ARCHIVE NOTES FOR THE CONGREGATION OF THE SISTERS OF THE HOLY CHILD JESUS

Sr Winifred Wickins S.H.C.J.

At a meeting of the archivists of our Congregation in the Autumn of 1984 we drew up the following notes, partly to clarify our position, and partly to circulate to the provinces and so 'educate' about archives and archivists. We are printing them in response to a request from some of our members facing situations similar to our own.

A WHAT CONSTITUTES AN ARCHIVE

Records are papers (and other media of recorded information) which are drawn up in the course of business by any continuing organization, are kept for reference and are of use in conducting that business. Archives are a specialized section of the records: those which, having passed out of currency, have been appraised and selected with a view to exploiting their use in research, or at any rate are actually held by an archives office because they are seen as valuable in a research context. (Archives Administration, Michael Cook).

B MATERIALS ESSENTIAL FOR THE BUILDING UP OF ARCHIVES IN RELIGIOUS CONGREGATIONS

1. All records of administration created in the offices of the general and provincial secretaries.
 - a) minutes of Council meetings;
 - b) visitation reports;
 - c) general letters from the superior general and the provincial superiors to members of the Congregation;
 - d) community lists;
 - e) correspondence with: ecclesiastics; lawyers; superiors general/provincial/area/local.
2. Legal documents: Baptismal, birth and death certificates; vow formulae; property deeds and correspondence; building plans; wills; civil and ecclesiastical contracts.
3. Chapters: lists of delegates; minutes; preparation and post-chapter papers; materials that report not just the decisions taken but also covering group discussions and minority suggestions.
4. Committees and Commissions: composition; objectives; minutes; reports to the Congregation.
5. House and Sacristy Journals or Diaries: These are an important source of history and care should be taken to ensure that they are maintained and preserved.

6. House Annals/Reports.
7. Necrologies.
8. Biographical Materials: Memoirs and letters etc.
9. Constitutions: various drafts, all materials showing development.
10. Government: lists of superiors and councils; records of experiments in administration.
11. Customs and Ceremonials.
12. Newsletters.
13. Publications and reviews by members of the Congregation.
14. Apostolic work/works not already covered.
15. Records of any public business in which the Congregation has been involved.

C THE WORK OF THE ARCHIVIST

1. CARE OF THE ARCHIVES

- a) Administrative Organization. Records primarily belong to and are the responsibility of the creative organization and will be kept by that organization so long as they are of current use or likely to be needed for reference in the foreseeable future. Most will then be destroyed: appraisal for retention should ideally be the joint work of the organization and the archivist who should be able to assess the research value in a wider context.

Some congregations have left their past and current business records in a bank or with a solicitor. If this remains the policy, then it is desirable that the archivist should know of such deposits.

- b) The archivist should

- (i) store and preserve the archives in the best and safest ways possible according to the facilities available;
- (ii) facilitate the finding and using of archives by appropriate arranging, listing and indexing;
- (iii) protect the integrity and confidentiality of the archives.

All members of the Congregation should be assured of this; as a safeguard, all researchers should communicate directly with the archivist and access to the archives should be through and, if necessary, in the presence of the archivist.

2. THE ARCHIVIST AND THE CONGREGATION

Often members of a congregation need clarification as to the nature and purpose of archives, and information and encouragement as to their own responsibility and contribution.

- a) Generalate and Provincial Administrations should be:

- (i) sent a list of essential archives material (see B above);
- (ii) asked to provide a contact person for the archivist on their councils;

- (iii) and for a yearly meeting between the administrative secretaries and archivists for transfer of materials - at such a meeting arrangements could also be made for the transfer of backlog material;
 - (iv) asked to include the names of archivists on the mailing lists from all offices;
 - (v) sent an annual report from the archivist.
- b) Local Communities be asked:
- (i) to ensure the maintenance of house diaries/journals/sacristy journals/annals;
 - (ii) when houses are closed or changed to send all but their current material to the archives (this is specially relevant now changes are frequent);
 - (iii) to send to the archivist complete lists of any material retained in the local house.
- c) Committees and Commissions be requested to send copies of their records to the provincial archivist.
- d) Individual Sisters will
- (i) be kept in touch by e.g. articles in the provincial newsletter;
 - (ii) when on individual missions, especially those geographically far away from any community, be asked to send information about themselves and their work;
 - (iii) all be encouraged to send accounts of their own activities and those of other Sisters, particularly any references, for example, in local or parish papers.

3. THE ARCHIVIST AS CREATOR

Our archivists should not only be passive receivers but also active seekers to fill in lacunae and to ensure material for the future. They will do this:

- (i) by encouraging the groups a,b,c,d, above;
- (ii) by deliberately seeking to fill in obvious lacunae;
- (iii) by encouraging and facilitating research students whose work will then enrich the Congregation's archives.

4. TRAINING OF ARCHIVISTS

Whenever possible, archivists should receive some kind of professional training; post-graduate courses are offered in the universities of Aberystwyth, Liverpool and London. There is always need for on-going education by any short courses or lectures available and by contact with other archivists. Wherever possible archivists in religious congregations should make contact with local record offices and local professional archivists. In this way they will receive professional help and advice, they will see their own work in a wider setting, and they will be helped to keep in touch with new developments and ideas.

THE CATHOLIC ARCHIVES SOCIETY CONFERENCE, 1985

The sixth annual conference, held at Spode on 28—30 May, although attended by only thirty-six religious and professional archivists but happily including some new members and a welcome visitor, Bro. Tony James from Norcia Abbey in Western Australia, proved to be an instructive and enjoyable meeting.

On the first evening, 28 May, Fr P. Demmison (Archivist of the Birmingham Archdiocese) gave a slide talk on the history of Oscott College, which the Society visited during the 1984 conference. The next morning, 29 May, Dom Geoffrey Scott, O. S. B. of Douai Abbey, read the paper on the 'Benedictine Archives through the eyes of Bro. Benet Weldon (1674—1713)' published in this issue. This was followed by a masterly talk by Mr. D. S. Porter of the Bodleian Library, who led members through the minefield of copyright law, and left them impressed with the need for caution both in copying and allowing the copying of documents and printed material. (Members may care to refer to Mr Porter's article on copyright in the Society of Archivist's Journal, Vol.6, No.8, 1981). The traditional afternoon excursion was a guided tour of St Chad's Cathedral, Birmingham, under the expert direction of the Administrator, Fr M. Stewart.

This year the AGM was held in the evening, on 29 May, when the Chairman (Fr Francis Edwards, S. J.) and officers made their reports, and were thanked for their work, and elections were held for the ensuing year. The ecumenical spirit within the Society was gratified by the presence of Mrs Brenda Hough (Archivist of the General Synod of the Church of England), who, on 30 May, described the archives under her charge at Church House, Westminster, and whose ready advice on practical archive matters of classification and storage was much appreciated. (Mrs. Hough's talk is also printed in this issue).

The final 'open forum' session was unusually productive. A full report on the conference and AGM appears in the Society's Newsletter. The 1986 conference will be held at Swanwick, near Alfreton, Derbyshire, on 26—28 May 1986.

This is a very brief resume of the collection of archival material at Arundel, as it relates to Catholic history. I will end with a few words about the archives today. Up to the Second World War the Duke of Norfolk's archives were kept in London, in the Muniment Room at Norfolk House in St James's Square. When it was sold (and demolished) in 1938, the archives were packed up in wooden crates and brought down to Arundel. With the outbreak of war and the requisitioning of the castle by the army it was impossible to sort them out. The old librarian, R. C. Wilton, died in 1947 before anything could be done. In 1956 the late Duke of Norfolk invited Dr Francis Steer, then the county archivist, to take on the job of archivist at Arundel. In the succeeding years the archives have been re-sorted and housed and a series of printed catalogues produced. This work was not completed by the time of Dr Steer's death in 1978, but is being slowly continued. The archives are available for consultation by accredited scholars on written appointment.

EDITORIAL NOTES

One sometimes wonders who reads editorial notes and what purpose they serve. Regular subscribers will surely find the familiar message repeated each year in different words a little tedious. It cannot be helped. The notes are not intended to say anything new; nor do they chronicle the Society's activities (the Newsletter does that); still less do they advance personal views, which would be presumptuous. Even so, for the benefit of anyone seeing Catholic Archives for the first time, a brief note about the Society and its periodical may be helpful.

The Society was founded in 1979 to promote the care of all Catholic archives and particularly those of religious orders, congregations and dioceses in the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland. This it tries to do by holding an annual conference, arranging training seminars, promoting meetings of archivists, circulating a Newsletter, printing a Directory of Catholic Archives (a new edition will appear soon), and by publishing this yearly periodical.

The main purpose of Catholic Archives, of which this is the seventh edition, is to publish descriptions of the archives of religious orders, congregations, dioceses, and indeed of any institution, family or person, which relate to the history of the Church in the two countries. By doing so, it serves other objectives: to bring to scholarly notice a wealth of hitherto largely inaccessible and little-known original documentary evidence; to show by the example of the work of experienced archivists how novice archivists can set about the task of collecting, arranging and preserving archives; and, similarly, to show anyone interested in the Church's history how and where to look for relevant archives and sources.

All these objectives are surely fulfilled in this edition. But underlying all the articles is the evident commitment of all contributors to the value of preserving archives, not simply because they are essential for reference purposes, nor even mainly because they are often the only surviving record of past events, but, more significantly, because they enshrine the inspirations of faith which have prompted men and women down the ages to devote their lives to the service of God and their fellow-men. Archives in this sense are vital to a living Church, and archive work is truly vocational.

The present edition contains an unusually wide variety of articles. To refer to all contributors would be impossible in these brief notes, and it can be invidious to mention some and not others. Notwithstanding, all members will be delighted to read the article by the President of the Society. It is pleasing, too, to include another article on an Australian archive. Four articles on the archives of women's religious congregations will hopefully remove any possible lingering suspicion of editorial male chauvinism. A common theme in several articles is the problem of finding and collecting archives, while at the sophisticated end of the market the versatility, and other virtues, of computers and word processors is well demonstrated.

For the benefit of members, the constitution of the Society, approved at the AGM on 29 May 1985, is printed, as is the customary brief notice of last year's annual conference. The Society thanks all authors who have contributed to this issue and wishes them every success in their work. The Hon. Editor solicits articles for 1988 and beyond.

THE ARCHIVES OF THE VENERABLE ENGLISH COLLEGE IN ROME

The Rev. Charles Briggs and Brendan Whelan

In this short piece we hope to describe the general structure and contents of the archives with brief notes concerning their use.

The Venerable English College was established as a seminary for the training of priests in 1579 although the building had housed a hospice for English pilgrims to Rome since 1362. Hence there has been an English presence on this site for over six hundred years making the College the oldest British institution abroad. Forty-four of the students from the College were martyred for the faith in England between the years 1581 and 1678 and their letters are often to be found in the archives. So these archives are of the utmost importance for anybody who wishes to follow the history of the Catholic Church in England and her relations in Rome from the middle of the fourteenth century until the present day.

In 1773 Cardinal Andrea Corsini became the Cardinal Protector of the English College and in that year commenced his arrangement of the existing archives of the College. It was not the first attempt to catalogue the papers of the English College; for example there exists in the archives a volume compiled in the years 1630—31 (with later additions in 1695) which was an attempt to compile a list (in alphabetical and chronological order) of the papers and books of the College. However, Corsini's system of classification is by and large the one that is in use today. Corsini divided the collection into three general sections, namely: Membrane (scrolls), Libri (bound books) and Scritture (unbound papers). As more diverse material has been added to the archives so the rough boundaries outlined by Corsini have been extended; photographs, for example, are to be found under the classification P.

The Membrane section contains some of the earliest material in the archives, dealing as it does with scrolls. The oldest parchment scroll is dated 1280, and from this date one can trace through 445 scrolls the history of the Hospice and of the College itself. The earlier material in this section pertains to the gradual acquisition by the Hospice of property around it in the Via Monserrato and also the title and property deeds relating to the other English Hospice in Rome, that of St Edmund's in Trastevere. This building was acquired by the Hospice in the Via Monserrato in 1464 and as late as 1664 students from the College said Mass in the chapel of the Hospice, although the Hospice building itself was closed down after the Protestant Reformation in England when the pilgrim traffic diminished. Aside from the property and title deeds this section also houses the parchment documents of a later period, namely Papal Briefs and Bulls. These are on the whole from the 16th and 17th centuries and contain amongst other things the Bull Quoniam Divinas Bonitati, the foundation Bull whereby the English College was established by Pope Gregory XIII. In this section are various documents illustrating the progressive endowment of the new College. More recent documents in this section refer not to the College itself, but rather to a particular person. For example, in this section is to be found the Papal Brief conferring on Cardinal Heard the title of Cardinal Protector.

The Libri section of the archives was intended originally to contain only bound manuscripts relating to the financial and administrative nature of the College. However, it now contains many recently transferred rare and valuable books, which until a few years ago were still housed in the library. It is in this section that the famous Liber Ruber is kept. This list (now in its sixth volume) is a register of all the students who have studied in the College. The first name to appear is that of Ralph Sherwin (canonised in 1970) and so the list continues until the present day. The Liber Ruber is not merely a list of the students of the College but it also contains such details as place of birth, names of parents, education, progress through the College, reception of Minor and Major orders, and in some cases life after leaving the College (this is especially true if the subject was made a bishop). The Liber Ruber is, therefore, an important source book for those engaged upon historical research, especially that of a biographical nature. Also to be found in this section are account books from both the College and the two summer villas, the first (until 1919) being at Monte Porzio and the second since that date at Palazzola. Also amongst the Libri are the scripts of the famous plays the college students performed in the seventeenth century, and the diaries of former students. Amongst the rare manuscripts to be found in this section is one of about 1590 entitled 'The Lamentable Fall of Anthony Tyrrell', written in the hand of no less a personage than Father Robert Parsons. There is also a mid-fifteenth-century manuscript, belonging to the old Hospice, which is an anthology of John Lydgate's poems, and a sixteenth-century Greek manuscript which contains two unpublished sermons of St John Chrysostom.

The largest section and possibly the most important for those engaged in historical research is that entitled Scrittura. This is divided into two parts containing in total some 130 'volumes'. The first 50 of these are pre-1800 papers and are still arranged as they were by Cardinal Corsini. Most are legal documents concerning lawsuits over college property; however, there are letters from many important personages in the history of the Church. For example, there are letters from St Robert Bellarmine, St Charles Borromeo, and Robert Parsons. In this section are also to be found the Responsa which were questionnaires compiled by students of the College between 1598 and 1686.

The remaining 80 'volumes' date from the closure of the College during the French occupation of Rome (1798-1818). When the College re-opened in 1818 it was no longer under Jesuit control, but instead it was run by members of the English secular clergy — a system that prevails to this day. This radical change is reflected in the contents of the documents to be found in this section. The rectors of the English College in the early part of the nineteenth century acted as agents for the bishops of England in Rome, so the bulk of this material consists of material from the bishops to the rectors of the College. It is, therefore, possible to trace the process toward the restoration of the hierarchy in 1850. Especial mention must be made here of two important collections of letters. The first are those of Cardinal Wiseman, who was one of the first students to enter the College in 1818 and who was later the rector. The other collection of letters are those of Mgr George Talbot (1818–1886), the pro-protector of the College, a member of the Anticamera Segreta of Pius IX and close confidant of Wiseman, Manning, Faber and Pio Nono. There are also some sixteen letters from Talbot's fellow-convert Cardinal Newman.

As we mentioned earlier the sections outlined by Corsini have had to be extended, and so a new section P has been formed. In this all items which cannot be accommodated in the three existing sections have been placed. For example, we find in this section the plans of the College, photographs of the College, medals, coins, recusant chalices and other items. Also, although it is kept separately, P contains the Vatican II material. It is divided into two parts, the first 'A' contains the printed and bound documents issued by the Council, and 'B' the working-notes of the bishops and the press-releases issued at the time by the Vatican Press Office.

In this short piece we have tried to give the reader some idea of the contents and the structure of the archives of the English College. We would like to point out, however, that the archives of the College are not public archives, they are the property of the English College run on a part-time basis by students of the College. They can be visited personally at some mutually arranged time between the months of October and January and March and May. If you wish to visit the archives would you please bring a letter of recommendation with you. If you wish to write to the archivist concerning some reference or point of information, please bear in mind that whilst they will endeavour to help to the best of their ability they are unable to embark upon lengthy research due to constrictions of time.

NOTES

Father Charles Briggs B.D., S.T.L. is a final-year student of the English College and a priest of the Archdiocese of Southwark, studying Church History at the Pontifical Gregorian University, currently writing a thesis on Mgr George Talbot. Brendal Whelan B.A. is a student of the Faculty of Theology at the Pontifical Gregorian University, an Oxford history graduate and Senior Archivist of the College.

A summary catalogue of the archives is given in Appendix I of Michael E. Williams The Venerable English College, Rome: A History, 1579–1979.

LOCATING CATHOLIC ARCHIVES : A PERSONAL QUEST

John D. Hicks

Most articles in this journal give valuable information about specific archive collections and are an indispensable source for the scholar looking for papers, such as those of The Mill Hill Missionaries (No.2, 1982), Bishop Roskell of Nottingham (No.3, 1983), or the Petrie family (No.5, 1985), for example. However, if one is looking more widely, Catholic archives can become something of a treasure hunt and the location of sources can be so complex a matter as almost to become the quest itself.

I became interested in an early nineteenth-century Catholic institution, the one-time reformatory at Market Weighton (East Riding), that has survived for over one hundred and thirty years. In that time it had been in lay hands, then conducted by two successive Orders and is now back where it started, more or less. Finding the sources for my story was a good deal more complicated than the story itself.

The institution was first built as a training establishment to provide masters for Catholic Poor Schools just before the time that the Hon. Charles Langdale was beginning to set up the national Catholic Poor School Committee in 1847. As its use was restricted to training masters for employment in Yorkshire it seems that the national plan could have made it seem parochial and it may never have operated. The early reports of the Committee are available on microfiche and provide no mention of Market Weighton. The empty building was offered by Bishop Briggs of Beverley to a local committee as a reformatory for boys. This opened in August 1856 and was run by a Captain Bryan Stapleton before being handed over first to the Rosminians (1857-1912) and then the De La Salle Order in 1912. From being the Yorkshire Catholic Reformatory for Boys, the name changed to St William's School in 1907; it later became an approved school and its present Principal is one of the De La Salle Brothers of what is now a Community Home under the auspices of the Catholic Child Welfare Society.

I started this project by contacting the present Principal who most fortunately has a great interest in the history of the institution. He had rescued from near loss most of the registers, a minute-book and other lesser items and they provided a basis for future research. However, one item was a 'history' of the institution, almost certainly written by a former Director of the Reformatory in his dotage, which has been shown to be largely worthless in certain essential points. This one document, preserved over the years in two archives, has caused more trouble than would have been thought possible.

A lucky chance find in local newspaper files produced the date when the buildings were being erected (1846) and the name of the architect employed, which in turn led to the first discovery of a collection of material in Sheffield Public Libraries connected with Charles Hadfield, the Catholic architect, and his various partners. Hadfield had first produced a 'Design for a College', dated 27 June 1842, but it was a later design of his that was finally used. Bishop Briggs of Beverley was involved in the original building and his papers needed to be examined in the Diocesan Archives at Leeds where both letters and plans survived.

At this stage it became clear that the erection of the first building involved an old Catholic family of impeccable pedigree and some complexity. Gradually, over a period of months, I realised that the (Sir) Edward Vavasour who established the original building and may have given the site, was brother of the Hon. Charles Langdale, who was the first chairman of the reformatory and chairman of much else in the English Catholic world, and also brother of the 18th Baron Stourton, and then the story began to come together. The final days of Edward Vavasour were described graphically in his brother's papers in the Hull University Library but, otherwise, the Langdale material was a great disappointment. Family wills and settlements were available from various sources and were as clear and succinct as always. The Vavasour family has been less lucky in the survival of papers and the meagre collection in the City of Leeds archives tended to produce confusion rather than anything else, although just one item, showing his dislike of doctors and lawyers, suddenly gave Edward Vavasour a human face.

The reformatory was established as a result of local pressures, as revealed in the county press which showed the lead taken by certain Catholic gentry following an abortive attempt to start a reformatory for the whole of Yorkshire on non-religious lines which suddenly became an exclusively Anglican project leaving the Catholics to fend for themselves. The papers of the Constable-Maxwell family and others were located (in the Hull University Library), but no mention of the reformatory was found. The story has then to be followed in the reformatory committee's minute-book until a fuller picture can be seen with the advent of the Rosminians. Their records were put into good order by the late Father Waters IC and adequately housed at Derryswood, but since that time some papers have become scattered. Permission was readily granted to examine their collection where much was found. The most exciting item was a daily record of life in the first few years of the reformatory under its first Rosminian Director, Father Caccia. One minor difficulty was that he wrote additional private letters to his Superior in Italian. Later Directors were more considerate. The Derryswood search for Rosminian involvement in reformatory work led to other papers at Ratcliffe and Grace Dieu. A further visit had to be made to Mount St Bernard's Monastery where the archivist produced evidence of early reformatory directors paying each other visits of inspection.

The buildings were substantially extended between 1858 and 1860 by John Bownas and William Atkinson of York (successors to John Carr) but a search of the deposited papers in the York Art Gallery produced nothing about Market Weighton and our best record of this work survives in a contemporary colour-wash elevation at Derryswood, some plans in the Diocesan Archives at Leeds and the much altered buildings themselves.

For many years the old-established firm of solicitors, Gray's of York, looked after the legal affairs of many Catholics including the reformatory, and they were able to produce a few files covering the period when the Rosminians were about to withdraw. This source also had valuable letters from the Bishop of Middlesbrough of which no trace remains in that diocesan archive.

The trail was getting warmer. Loose ends are always the problem. Who was the first director, Captain Bryan Stapleton, who does not appear on published pedigrees? Were some Franciscans in occupation shortly after the building was completed, as suggested in the 'history'? A Franciscan archivist stated that his Order could not have been involved at the dates given. The Oblates of Mary Immaculate were close at hand at Everingham from 1847, according to Hagerty (Northern Catholic History, No.18) and it may well be that Everingham has been confused with Market Weighton. What was the reason for that strange report written by Captain Mark Sykes of Sledmere in 1912? His papers were located in the Hull University library.

Rare treats came on occasion like the cooking in the guest-house at Mount St Bernard's, or meeting shortly before his death a Rosminian Brother who had known, at Market Weighton, Director Castellano, who had been appointed to the reformatory in 1866 and only retired from the position in 1906. I spent an enjoyable time with an old boy of the approved school who remembered many staff whose only other record is on salary returns from the 1930s.

The whole story is about as complete as I shall make it and the quest is over. If all the papers had been stored at Market Weighton and left in the house by successive occupants, then the task would have been much easier but a good deal less interesting.

The location of the archives today

The materials found at Market Weighton are now all deposited in the Humberside County Record Office in Beverley. This collection includes the registers of admission, after-care report books, minute-book, health records, copy of a Stourton family settlement and a scrap book. Many of these items are on restricted access. The register of admissions covering c.1875-79 has still to be located, otherwise the run is complete.

The Fathers of Charity have their main archive at Derryswood and it includes several boxes on farming at Market Weighton as well as the daily diary of events for the first few years, many letters, and a drawing of the 1858 extensions. In addition, the Fathers have other reformatory material at their houses in the Midlands. All these items are the private property of the Order.

The Brynmor Jones Library of Hull University has a large collection of the papers of local Catholic gentry in the archive department. For a full account, see J.A. Williams, Catholic Archives, No.3, (1983).

The plans of the buildings, a 'Design for a College', and letters to Bishop Briggs are all to be seen in the Leeds Diocesan Archives (see G.T. Bradley, Catholic Archives, No.2, [1982]).

The annual reports of the Catholic Poor School Committee, 1848–1901, are available on 71 microfiche published by EP Microform, East Ardsley, Wakefield.

The De La Salle Order has surprisingly little material. The most interesting is an annual report for the year 1913, printed by the boys at the school, and the only one known to survive at the main archive of the Brothers in Rome. The author of part of this report had access to Vavasour family papers that can no longer be located and includes fascinating information about Sir Edward Vavasour that, alas, cannot be verified.

The papers of Charles Hadfield, architect, are in the archives department of the Sheffield Public Libraries.

Publications

Very little material on individual reformatories has ever gone into publication. The Catholic historian, Bernard Elliott, has published numerous articles on the reformatory at Mount St Bernard's, the most accessible being in Recusant History, Vol.15, pp.15–22, and no less a writer than Charles Dickens wrote in Household Words (25 April, 1857) an article 'Charnwood', which includes a description of this same reformatory. Yesterday's Naughty Children, by Joan Rimmer (in print at £2.78, incl. postage, from Neil Richardson, 375 Chorley Road, Swinton, Manchester M27 2AY), includes a section on the Catholic Clarence reformatory training ship among much other interesting material.

However, Reformatory on the Moor, the story of the Yorkshire Catholic Reformatory, St William's School and the St William's Community Home 1856–1986 (by the writer of this article) is to be published by St William's School in the Spring of 1987.

In conclusion, there is still much material to be located and evidence to be gleaned, and I would be most grateful to hear of other discoveries or of other workers involved in this field of research.

NOTE

A sketch of St William's School, Market Weighton, and a short account of a visit in 1934 appears in Peter F. Anson's The Caravan Pilgrim (Heath Cranton, 1938), pp.49–54.

THE ARCHIVES OF THE ANGLO-HIBERNIAN PROVINCE OF LA SAINTE UNION

Sr Mary de Sales Ward

The Congregation

The Congregation of La Sainte Union was founded in 1826 in the diocese of Cambrai in France by a young priest, Fr Jean Baptiste Debrabant. When he arrived in his parish in Douai he found the nucleus of a religious congregation ready to hand — a small group of young women catechists and with them he set to work to restore the Catholic faith to the youth of the country. The means they chose was Christian Education. The title the Abbé Debrabant gave the Congregation, 'La Sainte Union des Sacrés Coeurs de Jesus et Marie' was an expression of his own devotion to the Sacred Hearts and a symbol of the spirit he wished to embody in his new foundation.

The Congregation soon spread rapidly and many schools were opened throughout northern France and Belgium. Parish schools predominated but there were also boarding and day schools for girls of secondary age and preparatory schools for boys. Among the admirers of Father Debrabant's work for education were the English Benedictines in Douai. There were close links between them and their brethren in England. In Bath they had for a long time been prominent in the work of restoration of the Catholic faith in the city. When, in 1858, the parish school was in need of Sisters, Father Debrabant was asked to send some members of his young Congregation. So the first foundation of La Sainte Union in the Province took place in England. In a very short time a novitiate was opened in London (1861), at a ceremony presided over by Cardinal Wiseman and the publicity given to this event led to the first foundation of a house in Ireland, at Banagher (1863). Further foundations followed in rapid succession: Erith (Kent) 1879, Southampton (Hampshire) 1880, a second house in London 1886, Herne Bay (Kent) 1898, Grays & Tilbury (Essex) 1899. Throughout this period the Congregation was administered from the Mother House in Douai, contact being maintained by means of an abundance of letters and by periodic visits from Fr Debrabant and from the Sisters he had chosen as Councillors. The house in Douai was the main repository of the records of these early years.

However, as the century was drawing to a close, there were ominous signs of the Government's hostility, which was to lead to the large-scale expulsions of religious congregations from France. Fr Debrabant had, it seems, foreseen this. One day, towards the end of his life (he died in 1880), he told the Sisters: 'The day will come when your houses will be taken from you and you will lose everything'. Already in 1902 the prophecy began to come true. In one year over eighty of the La Sainte Union schools in France were closed. The Sisters were driven out and the Mother House in Douai was sold by public auction. By 1912 the last three French houses had to be abandoned. The Mother House moved to Tournai, Belgium, where it remained until 1959, when it was transferred to Rome.

It had always been the wish of the Founder that our Congregation should spread its work for Christian education far and wide. 'Go to America', he had said to the Sisters on more than one occasion. So, well before the expulsion of the Sisters from France, foundations had been made in: Argentina (1884), USA (1886), West Indies (1890). Some of the French Sisters took refuge in England, bringing their students with them in: Canterbury (1882–1886), Dover (1903–1922).

With this massive dispersal, decentralisation of administration became an urgent necessity and separate Provinces were established in 1907. The houses in England and Ireland were formed into the Anglo-Hibernian Province, the residence of the first Provincial being at Highgate Road, London. Close contact was still maintained with the Superior General and her Council in Tournai by means of letters and regular official visitations. Direct links between the provinces tended to be confined to General Chapters, except where provinces were jointly engaged in a mission overseas. Many of the Sisters, who were involved in the Argentine, USA, and West Indies foundations, came from England and Ireland. So it is that many of their letters have been preserved in the archives of the Anglo-Hibernian Province.

The Province Archives

When in 1982 I was asked to take charge of the Province archives, I realised I was embarking on a voyage of discovery. Although succeeding provincials and their secretaries had conscientiously preserved the records they felt were important for the future, there had been no real attempt to assemble all the material in one place. So that was my first task. Two previous experiences have proved useful: I had been in Rome in the 1970s when the last of the Generalate archives were being brought there from Tournai and I had been involved in the discussion about their reorganisation. In 1980, when Southampton was about to celebrate the centenary of its foundation, I was faced with the task of preparing a short history. But this was no small undertaking, as there had been three major foundations in Southampton in the course of the century. However, my researches into the restoration of the Church in the area during the nineteenth century, and the part played by La Sainte Union in it was a most rewarding experience. This too in spite of completely inadequate time and the discovery that many of our valuable records had been destroyed in the Blitz of 1942. Generous and enthusiastic assistance from the Generalate in Rome, from a local historian, from the local Records Office, and from past pupils and staff, ensured that the work was finished on time.

Much of my time over the past three years has been spent in simply collecting, arranging and listing. The bulk of the material is now at last housed in Bath, adjoining the provincial house in the city, where the Province came to birth. The space I have been allotted is already proving inadequate but, at least, I can see how it can be enlarged.

We still have a long way to go. In June of this year we produced the first catalogue of our present holdings in the hope that each community in the Province will be stimulated to a greater awareness of the value of our archives, and the part they can play in bringing them to life. But there are thirty-one communities in the Province, which stretches from the extreme north of Scotland to north Wales, to many counties of England, as well as Ireland. In recent years the Province has started other missions overseas, notably in Tanzania and in West Germany. Communication is, therefore, a first priority. I get some generous voluntary help from some of the Sisters, with translations of French correspondence (of which there is an abundance from the early years), and from some local researchers. Within the past few months I have had one or two lovely surprises. In one case, a Sister hunting up information about the house in Dover at the time of the expulsions, made contact with a priest-historian, who took a great interest, visited the house (now privately owned by non-Catholics), interviewed one aged local resident and, in short, provided me with a brief history of La Sainte Union Anglo-French joint mission during the first twenty years of this century, complete with photographs, sketch maps, etc. Now I have had a warm invitation to visit the house and property.

Since Vatican II our way of life has changed considerably. Communities are now smaller and the work of the Sisters more diversified. We have come a long way from the centralised government of the foundation years. Our archives have, therefore, an essential role to play in keeping us in touch with the roots of our spirituality.

In the archives' office we welcome enquiries from interested researchers and we shall be happy to give help where possible, but until the work of collecting backlog material and processing it is complete, the archives will have to remain closed to visitors.

THE GENERALATE ARCHIVES OF THE SISTERS SERVANTS OF MARY : A PERSONAL ACCOUNT

Sr Agnes Hypher O.S.M.

My introduction to the use of archives was certainly practical and utilitarian, not to mention a little dramatic and unexpected. For this reason it may be of interest and even encouragement for those who, like myself, find themselves in field of archives without any previous training. This encounter led me eventually to our Generalate Archives in Rome which had been assembled a few years previously, in 1969.

ST JOSEPH'S PRIORY, DORKING, SURREY, 1887-1974

It all began when I found myself the 'legal' next of kin to the late Alexander Charles Loughnan and his wife Angela, née Countess Mecati (an honour which enhanced the situation not a little). Alexander Loughnan, a retired banker, had been partly responsible for the foundation of the Priory in 1887 and was the brother of the second Mother General, Mother Antonia Loughnan.

This foundation was made possible in 1889 with the purchase of a house in Dorking. The apostolate initially envisaged seems to have been similar to that of Arundel, for the school and parish at Dorking were also under the patronage of the Norfolk family. It was at the urgent request of the parish priest, and financially helped by Mr Loughnan, S.M. Antonia's brother, that the boarding school was established at the same time.¹

As it happened, 'Loughnan' was a household name for me since my association with the convent not only included my two years as a boarder, 1937 to 1945, but also I had the benefit of the reminiscences of my aunt who had been among the first pupils. By the time I returned to St Joseph's Priory as a sister in 1974 many changes had taken place which necessitated the closure of the Boarding and Day Schools and the Convent to be set up in the house which had been the Junior School. Among other gifts which he had made to the Order, Alexander Loughnan had built a chapel for the Servite Sisters adjoining the Convent and later he constructed a vault under the altar. This was for his wife and himself, but since it was not in existence at the time of her death, she was interred initially in the parish cemetery until this could be arranged. By 1974, with the Convent no longer in use, it became my privilege to procure a final resting-place for them. It was at this point, on my last tour of the empty Convent that I discovered the historic archives. They had been forgotten and remained half-hidden on the floor of a dark cupboard. They contained Alexander Loughnan's legal papers, together with ecclesiastical communications, recommendations and other artefacts. This made my task much easier, since I already knew that Alexander Loughnan was a generous, warm-hearted man who would not have considered re-selling his 'plot' in the Catholic part of the cemetery back to the Council. Being in possession of the original documents, it was possible for me to prove this and make the necessary arrangements. Although I could have hoped that my introduction to archives had been on a happier note, the Loughnans became instrumental in my future involvement in the archives of the Order, thus becoming benefactors twice over.

THE GENERALATE ARCHIVES OF THE SERVITE SISTERS, 1851-1980

Eventually, my opportunity to work with archives came in 1980, when the Generalate Team was preparing for the General Chapter. By this time our archives in Rome were well established and it only remained for me to organise the material of the previous twelve years of the out-going Prioress General, Sister Annuntiata Duval O.S.M. It was her one-time Assistant, the late Sister Antonia Varese, who gave me her personal and graphic account of the gathering and transferring of the archives which I quote here.

The Congregation began in the tiny village of Cuves in France with the little community led by Marie Guyot about the year 1842, until 1849 when she was succeeded by Mother Philomena Morel. From the beginning the sisters had wished to belong to the Servite Order and this was accomplished in 1864, by which time the sisters were living in England owing to troubles in France. Records dating from 1861 were incomplete. There were no reliable records of sisters who did not remain in the Congregation. Before leaving the Congregation for Paris, Mother St John (Soeur Jean Vannier) told Sister Paul Blanc that she had burnt everything. This included valuable letters relating to Cuves and Marie Guyot. In 1871, Suffolk Lodge, Stamford Hill, London, was purchased and presumably documents would have been transferred from West Grinstead to London. In the early days at St Mary's, in 1875, fire broke out in a building adjacent to the present chapter house. This was the second disaster that befell the archives. During the beginning of the twentieth century archives had accumulated which referred to France, Belgium and Gratzan (later to be Austria) as well as England, and to the beginnings in America. All these were to be found in different corners of St Mary's Priory. Books were stored in cupboards on the ground floor and letters and material of that nature in trunks in the attics. Access to these documents had not been permitted, only Superiors penetrated from time to time, although it is true that Sister Enid Williamson was granted very extraordinary permission to look into documentation for some research which Mother Bernarda had asked her to undertake.

When Mother Annuntiata Duval was elected Prioress General in August 1969, she decided that the Generalate should be established in Louvain after more than a hundred years in England, ninety-eight of which having been at St Mary's. It became imperative to remove archival material to the new Generalate. In December 1968 initial investigations were made. At this stage the primary distinction was made between those archives pertaining to the Congregation as a whole and material relevant to the English Province, destined to be left behind. This was almost an impossible task since until the formal erection of Provinces in 1938 the Congregation had virtually been one administration, England, France and Belgium being regarded as one.

The material found in trunks and tin boxes ranged from official documents at Holy See and diocesan levels to accounts, personal letters in great quantity from Mother Philomena Morel, Mother Antonia Loughnan and other foundation sisters, together with papers of a social nature, reports and functions, programmes and other items. All these were sorted and the trunk re-packed ready for shipping. On 2 January 1970, Sister Antonia, travelling to Belgium, took the nucleus of the archives with her. Anxiously, she stood on the deck by the railings and watched the precious freight being hoisted and swung from quayside to hold, but within hours the archives were safely in Louvain. After the disaster of two fires, much thought was devoted to their preservation. Eventually, a strong office cupboard with a safe lock was procured and placed on the ground floor, near enough to a window for rescue in an emergency!

LOUVAIN, 1970-1975

During the five years in Louvain, the archives were organised as a matter of immediate urgency since, in the light of updating the Congregation and renewal, return to our sources meant that archival material was required for reference and research. By January 1973 the work had begun on deciphering Mother Philomena's letters, a painstaking work since these were written in minute handwriting on both sides of thin paper and often crossways as well. Some were in English, some in French and others in both.

Work on the Constitutions was in progress and required reference to original documents, also we had been urged to train a canonist, an historian and an expert on spirituality from within the Congregation. During these years, wider research was undertaken and extensive visits made to archives and libraries in Rome and France in order to verify the authenticity of some documents while questioning others.

ROME, 1974

In July 1974, previous to leaving for the General Chapter, the contents of the Generalate were transferred to the new headquarters in Rome, Via Ferruccio. It was then decided to work on the letters of the first three Mothers General. It was made possible for student sisters to use the archival material now made available to the Congregation, while the Commissions for the Constitutions required insight into the personality and charism of Mother Philomena and her aim for the Congregation. Several booklets on the origins of the Congregation and its spirit were written while Sister Enid Williamson wrote 'The Nature of the Congregation of Servite Sisters according to its Constitutional Writing' (2 vols) (Rome: Pont. Universitas Gregoriana, 1979) for her Doctorate in Canon Law.

RESEARCHERS

A learner-archivist in Rome will find that not only are there many archivists near at hand ready to give advice and assistance but also that the city stationers stock an abundance of archives office material. The Medical Mission Sisters gave me invaluable help and constant encouragement while the Servite Friars at the Marianum and San Marcello spent much time explaining their holdings.

It was heartening to find a steady line of researchers to the Generalate, in what could have been a lonely occupation. Apart from the Servite Fathers and Sisters studying in Rome, enquiries came from Congregations whose history linked with ours. Strangely enough, it was the Sisters of Our Lady of the Mission, whose Foundress was one of the first members of the Sisters of Calvary in Cuves, of whom the least documentation existed owing to fire.

From England came an enquiry from a senior lecturer in Education requiring information about the growth of Catholic Poor Schools in London and of the work of the Sisters of Compassion in the 1850s in Dunne's Passage and Charles Street, Drury Lane. As he remarked, 'very little is known from first-hand sources of what it meant to go into and teach in a Catholic Poor School in detail but the Oratorian School of Compassion seems to be an exception, hence my interest in completing the picture as far as possible'. Sister Paul Blanc, in her Life of Sister M. Philomena Juliana O.S.M. had given much insight into the life and work of the sisters.

Perhaps the research which gave me most pleasure was for a Mrs Lewis of Nettlestone, Isle of Wight. In compiling her family tree, she found great difficulty in tracing a Pauline Feser whom she knew had entered a Congregation which had some connection with Arundel. It became more complicated since she had transferred from a Congregation in Germany to a different one in England, not to mention that there was more than one community in Arundel. Fortunately, Sister Pia, Pauline Feser, lived at a time when sisters were encouraged to write their autobiography, thus making it possible to furnish Mrs Lewis with a wealth of information concerning Sister Pia's family and relations in Germany.

If a final word is indicated, I think it would be regarding the apparent nomadic tendencies of our archives. I would like to suggest that it is due to a growing awareness of Internationality and the mutual support of other Congregations, coupled with the general movement of the Pilgrim Church and the restlessness of the wider world.

REFLECTIONS ON THE ARCHIVES OF THE SISTERS OF OUR LADY OF THE MISSIONS

Sr Mary Angela Molloy RNDM

My earliest impressions of archives — impressions which have remained with me until quite recently — are that archives are very important, rather sacred if not secret, that they belong to the distant past and are somewhat dusty and shrouded in mystery! These impressions date back to my novitiate days in Hastings where the archives of the Congregation of Our Lady of the Missions were then stored. We novices sometimes heard reference being made to important documents contained in the archives and we instinctively knew that this hallowed spot was out of bounds for us lesser mortals!

My first real contact with archives came in 1983 when I had the good fortune to attend the Congress of the 'Association des Archivistes de l'Eglise de France' which was held in Paris and had as its theme: 'Identité et responsabilité de celui qui a la charge d'un service d'archives ecclésiastique ou religieuses'. This congress gave me many helpful insights into the role of an archivist and the true significance of archives. Here are a few key phrases which remain with me and continue to give meaning and a real sense of worthwhileness to my work as archivist. Archives are for 'the instruction of future generations', a 'witness to the truth', a 'source of life', the 'patrimony of humanity', and a 'prolongation of the Incarnation'. The last phrase calls to mind an extract from an allocution addressed to archivists by Pope Paul VI on 26 September 1963 and repeated by Pope John Paul II on 18 October 1980 on the occasion of the official opening of new premises for the Vatican Secret Archives:

. . . our pieces of paper are echoes and traces of the passage of the Lord Jesus in the world. Therefore, treating these papers with reverence means, on reflection, treating Christ with reverence . . . and preserving for ourselves and those who come after us the history of the transitus Domini in the world.

Before describing the contents and organisation of the archives of the Congregation of Our Lady of the Missions it might be helpful to give a brief outline of the history of the congregation. It was founded in Lyon, France, in 1861 by Euphrasia Barbier, known in religion as Marie du Coeur de Jesus. For her, mission meant sharing in the mission of the Trinity in the spirit of Mary, hence the title 'Our Lady of the Missions'. The congregation is both contemplative and apostolic in character. Its aim is education, in the widest sense of the term, especially in Third World countries. Particular emphasis is put on improving the condition of women and children wherever they are disadvantaged socially, spiritually or materially. The sisters help them to improve the quality of their lives and to become agents of their own development and liberation. Only three years after the foundation of the congregation, the first group of missionaries was sent to establish a school for the poor in Napier, New Zealand. Now, after 125 years, the congregation has spread to sixteen countries and is responsible for 156 missions with a wide variety of apostolates according to local needs.

Australia	—	15 missions	Bangladesh	—	10 missions
Britain	—	20 "	Burma	—	7 "
Canada	—	14 "	France	—	5 "
India	—	16 "	Ireland	—	2 "
Italy	—	2 "	Kenya	—	7 "
New Zealand	—	34 "	Papua New Guinea	—	4 "
Peru	—	4 "	Samoa	—	5 "
Senegal	—	2 "	Vietnam	—	9 "

Owing to the political situation in France in the latter part of the last century, the Generalate of the congregation was transferred to England and with it came the archives which were housed first in Deal and later in Hastings. In 1968 the Generalate was on the move again, this time to Rome. The archives followed in 1974. One would have thought that having reached the 'Eternal City' this would be the end of 'archival wandering', but such was not the case. As the rooms occupied by the Generalate were only rented and had to be vacated, the year 1983 found the Sisters of Our Lady of the Missions house-hunting — a task not to be envied I can assure you, even in the Eternal City, or perhaps I should say 'especially in the Eternal City'! Finally, a new home was found and the work of packing our archival holdings and having them transported from one end of the city to the other fell to me just a few weeks after my appointment as archivist. This was my first 'concrete' contact with archives. Needless to say, my impressions then were very different from those of my novitiate days when the sacred, almost secret, archives were all but wrapt in mystery! No mystery here but several months of back-breaking labour, labelling, packing, unpacking, sorting and anguishing lest any, even the tiniest item, of the precious collection should be lost or damaged in the process. I should add here that it was necessary to purchase extra cabinets to contain some of the documents previously kept in spacious wall-cupboards. These cabinets, four in number, took some time to be delivered as might be expected in a city where not only the traffic but also most business matters move slowly, very slowly at times!

Eventually, I was able to begin re-organising the archives in their new location — two rooms each about 17 ft by 15 ft and an annexe for photographs and storage. While adapting to our new premises, my one aim was to preserve the original order and arrangement of our holdings according to archival principles.

Our archives are organised under four main headings or categories.

- I Personnel — This includes - registers of novices
 - registers of superiors
 - dossiers of superiors general and other persons connected with the history of the congregation
 - registers of vows
 - formulae of perpetual vows
 - registers of wills and dowries
 - registers of sisters who went on foreign missions
 - registers of formation personnel
 - biographies of deceased sisters
 - birth certificates
 - dossiers for deceased sisters and sisters who have left the congregation
 - photographs

- II General Administration — This includes
 - decrees and rescripts from the Holy See
 - reports to the Holy See
 - documentation and statutes of general chapters and enlarged general council assemblies
 - circular letters and decrees of superiors general
 - reports of general visitations
 - journals of voyages
 - chronicles of early foundations
 - congregational statistics
 - generalate publications
 - copies of constitutions, ceremonials, directories, office books, manuals of prayer proper to the congregation
 - account books
 - building plans
 - tape recordings and photographs

- III Provincial Administration — This contains
 - documentation and acts of provincial chapters
 - proces verbaux of local community meetings
 - property deeds and other civil documents
 - files of provincial administration
 - local community files
 - publications re missions, provinces and local houses
 - house chronicles

IV Foundress

Writings of the Foundress and works connected with her come under four headings:

1. Writings of Euphrasie Barbier
 - a) Correspondence
 - letters to the Sisters of Our Lady of the Missions (1,963)
 - letters to priests, bishops, cardinals (494)
 - letters to members of her family (130)
 - letters written in her name, many of which have insertions in her handwriting (456)
 - b) Other manuscripts
 - personal spiritual notes (30)
 - personal notebooks (4)
 - retreat reflections and other spiritual notes (2)
 - preparatory texts for the Directory (2)
 - notes of her conferences made by her novices (61)
2. Biographies of Euphrasie Barbier (6)
3. Studies on the spirituality of Euphrasie Barbier (3)
4. Documents relating to the process of beatification of Euphrasie Barbier (7 volumes)

Much work has been done over the years to make material accessible to members of the congregation and to bona fide research students. The latter have access to documents which pre-date 1912. The letters of the Foundress have been translated into English and circulated to the congregation in the English-speaking world. Treatises on the spirituality of Euphrasie Barbier have been circulated in four languages — English, French, Spanish and Italian. Here, in the archives, there is a system of finding aids to facilitate research. These consist of four sets of index cards. The first set refers to personnel of the congregation and contains an alphabetical and a chronological index. The second set of cards is a chronological index which gives a summary of documents and indicates their position in the archives. The third index is for proper names. It is filed alphabetically and gives dates and summaries of documents in which the name of a person or place connected with the history of the congregation appears. (This set is not yet complete.) Lastly, a subject or topic index on a punched card system deals with a number of topics treated in the writings of the Foundress.

Attitudes towards archives are very important. These can range from opposition and varying degrees of indifference to enthusiastic interest and appreciation. The Congregation of Our Lady of the Missions is very fortunate in that its Foundress belonged to the latter category, as is evident from her writings. In her report to the first General Chapter of the congregation in August 1867 she refers to the decree for the canonical erection of the congregation 'as contained in the Archives Register, page 1'. Later on, when writing to the community in Christchurch, New Zealand, while forwarding to them a copy of the decrees from the Holy See for the canonical erection of the three missions — Napier, Christchurch and Nelson, she writes,

I am sending you a copy of the canonical decree of foundation of our three convents. Please study these documents and keep them carefully in your Archives Register. Our sisters in the other two convents of the New Zealand Province will do likewise and I shall take the original to Rome and then keep it in the Motherhouse in the General-ate Archives, as is required. In the same way, you will keep this letter which, if needs be, will authenticate these documents; a copy of it will be kept in the convent Archives and in those of the Province and it will indicate where the documents are to be found . . .

(Letters of Euphrasie Barbier, 8 August 1873)

The writings of Euphrasie Barbier not only contain factual information regarding business or legal matters which are very important in their own right, they have a much wider scope. They reveal the mystery of a person whose life and mission have traced a footprint of Christ on our planet and it is thanks to our archives that the Sisters of Our Lady of the Missions have come to know this person more intimately and to identify with her more closely. In response to the call of the Church in recent years, they have been able to 'return to their sources' and be renewed in the spirit of Euphrasie Barbier so that they can continue to trace a footprint of Christ in today's world. Perhaps my first intuition regarding archives was not too far wide of the mark after all — archives are important, they are sacred and they conceal a great mystery, the mystery of the Transitus Domini in our world.

The archives are housed at Casa Generalizia, Suore di Nostra Signora delle Missioni, Via di Bravetta 628, 00164 Rome, Italy. They are not generally open to the public but may be consulted by bona fide students on application to the Archivist at the above address.

Nous voudrez bien prendre connaissance de ces copies, puis les garder soigneusement dans votre livre d'Archives, ainsi que le feront nos Sœurs des deux autres monastères de cette province de St. Zélande, pendant que je porterai l'original à Rome, puis le garderai à la Maison - mère, dans les Archives du Général, comme cela doit être. Veuillez de la même manière, garder cette présente lettre, qui au besoin, fera foi de ces documents, dont nous garderez copie, dans les Archives du Monastère, & à cette de la province et vous indiquera, où les trouver.

Grès pressis aujourd'hui, il ne me reste que le temps de vous encourager à demeurer fidèle à vivre sous la St^e Obéissance, dans la plus douce et la plus délicate charité, paix et dévotion de St. J. Jésus - Christ et de Marie notre très St^e Mère, en qui je demeure Votre chère fille, votre Mère toute affectionnée.

LETTER OF EUPHRASIA BARBIER, 8 AUGUST 1873 (quoted on p.26)

THE LANCASHIRE RECORD OFFICE AND ROMAN CATHOLIC RECORDS ¹

The Rt Rev. B.C. Foley

The Lancashire Record Office was established in 1940 in small premises in County Hall, Preston. Twenty years later it was moved to larger rooms at the Sessions House, Preston. On 15 July 1975 the present building in Bow Lane, Preston, was opened. It comes as something of a surprise to realise how comparatively recent has been the creation of county record offices all over the country, and how rapidly they have grown into such an important and highly organised service.

My task is to say something of the records held by the Lancashire Record Office which relate to the Catholic past. I feel very inadequate to do this, having only recently been able to visit the Office regularly. I would like to thank Mr Kenneth Hall, the County Archivist, and his staff, and in particular Mr A. Jenkins, the Deputy County Archivist, for the great help given me in compiling this short account of Catholic sources. Those mentioned here relate only to post-Reformation times. I thought the best method to follow would be simply to set out lists of documents which are representative and cover the chief categories.² I have summarised these under five headings, as follows:

- A Catholic Sources in General, divided into five groups, viz.
 - i) Documents in the Kenyon MSS
 - ii) Similar documents not in the Kenyon MSS
 - iii) Transcripts of documents held elsewhere
 - iv) Documents of the Clerk of the Peace, e.g. Quarter Sessions
 - v) Documents in Church of England records
- B Catholic Sources in Civil War, 'Popish Plot', Jacobite Rebellion MSS
- C Catholic Sources in Family Muniments
- D Diocesan Records of the three Roman Catholic Dioceses of the North West (Liverpool, Lancaster and Salford)
- E Parochial Records of the three North West Dioceses

A Catholic Sources in General

- i) Documents in the Kenyon MSS (ref. DDKe 7/1-39)

Roger Kenyon, Clerk of the Peace (1663-1698), was granted by royal patent in 1680 the office of receiver general of the revenues arising from the forfeitures of popish recusants in Lancashire (DDKe 7/7) and the majority of the papers refer to his activities in the period from 1679 to 1686. They include lists of papists dated 1591, 1675, 1679 (including a petition of about three thousand papists and their Protestant sureties, ref. DDKe 7/5), 1682, and several undated lists. There are also Privy Council orders, briefs, legal papers, notes, memoranda, and other papers, c.1679–1747. Document DDKe 7/38 is a letter from Thomas Stanley and E. Towneley to ‘Your Lordship’ asking for orders to surprise the papists who have sent away their horses, and stating ‘the most effectually method for reducing the Numbers of papists we conceive will be by putting the Act for Sunday Shillings in execution constantly everwhere’, with a note that ‘old Roger Kenion got so much by managing the Convictions of the Roman Catholicks that he redeem’d a Mortgage of 15 hundred pounds upon his Estate’, early or mid-18th century. Document DDKe 7/39 contains instructions to Commissioners to enquire into recusants’ lands in the East Riding of Yorkshire, mid-18th century.

ii) Similar Documents not in the Kenyon MSS

Seven miscellaneous documents, including a list of ‘obstinate recusants’ in the Hundred of Leyland, 1592 (DDF 2438/44); a printed report concerning the trial of five Jesuits, 1679 (DDB1.30/27); and a printed royal proclamation for putting the laws against papists into operation, 1722 (DDX 19/5). Other documents are referred to in Materials for History, No.8, and A Handlist for Genealogical Sources, 1978, both issued by the Lancashire Record Office, and by consulting the index to the Guide to the Lancashire Record Office, under such terms as Papists, Roman Catholics, etc.³

iii) Transcripts of Documents held elsewhere

These include a list of nine people keeping recusant schoolmasters, 1592 (original in the P.R.O.); recusant returns for Garstang and Poulton, 1610 (original in the Cheshire Record Office, ref. EDC.5/19–20; L.R.O. ref. P.120/1–2); and ‘A Songe of four preistes that suffered death at Lancaster, to the tune of “Daintie come thou to me”’ (original in B.M.Add. MSS. 15225, f.30 seq. 803756). There are also transcripts of the registers of thirty-eight parishes compiled by J.P. Smith for the Catholic Record Society (DDX/241); transcripts and catalogues of MSS. at Ushaw re the Vicars Apostolic of the Northern District; and transcripts of the Rutter/Bannister MSS. and other papers (listed in the Guide).

iv) Documents of the Clerk of the Peace – Quarter Sessions

The chief material in this category are the Quarter Sessions rolls. The only Elizabethan rolls are for the years 1591–2 and 1601 and these years, together with 1602–1608, have been edited by Professor James Tait in the Chetham Society, Vol. 77. Professor Tait noted the comparative lack of reference to recusancy. A little later, we are told, there is more, as in the following example, cited in ‘Some records of Roman Catholicism in Lancashire’ in the Yt is ordered by the Lord Harvey in open Courte That the Justices of the Peace in everie their division within this Countie shall take a speciall care to suppress all such alehouses where the goodman of the house or his wiffe be recusantes: And also to be carefull no piper, fidler or other Minstrell in their divisions being recusantes shall passe to sing or make rimes upon a paine of £10 upon everie Justice being herein delinquente, 27 March 1626 (QSB 1/4[13]).

The 1966 report states that as the seventeenth century passed Quarter Sessions material becomes more valuable for recusancy. The Gunpowder and other 'Plots' made papists more and more unpopular, and the proliferation of Acts against them are to be found registered at Quarter Sessions. The Cromwell Privy Council is stated as being seen as especially intent on rooting out papistry. Several entries are cited, such as one of 1655 instructing Justices to seek out priests and Jesuits (QSP. 120/14), another of 1678/9 accusing papists of arson (QSP.495/16), and a third of 1677/8 where depositions are made against individuals (QSP.513/14). For the important years of the 1670s and the 1680s, there are some registers of recusants, e.g. QDV 5 and 6. Following the second Relief Act of 1791 and later Acts, there are the usual returns of chapels, priests and (later) schools. From all this and the many administrative papers filed with the Quarter Sessions material, it is clear that the Lancashire records, 'though more scanty than elsewhere, are nevertheless of the greatest interest to those searching for Roman Catholic sources'. With regard to the Assize Rolls, these are in the Public Record Office, but are said to be very deficient for Lancashire.

v) Documents in Church of England Records

The whole of Lancashire from the Reformation was within the jurisdiction of the Diocese of Chester, south of the River Ribble being within the Archdeaconry of Chester and north of the same river within the Archdeaconry of Richmond. As recusancy was until 1581 an ecclesiastical offence, it is necessary to search Act Books of the Archdeacon's Court (to which presentments were made), or Churchwardens' Books, or other church documents up to that time. For Lancashire south of the Ribble, most of the Church of England diocesan and archdeaconry records are at the Cheshire Record Office. However, the Lancashire Record Office holds probate documents which include numbers of wills providing information of a family and personal kind. Many of these wills are of Roman Catholics and some bear witness to the religious belief of their makers. One, of Sir William Barlow of Barlow Hall, for instance, proved at Chester on 5 July 1620, states '... I die a true and perfecte recusante catholike' (L.R.O. Report for 1966, p.28).

In addition to wills, a valuable source of information about recusants is said to be the Bishops' Transcripts of parish registers, which are sometimes accompanied by lists of papists residing in parishes. One quoted in the Report for 1966 has such a list for Halsall for 1674 (DRB 2/25). Lancashire north of the Ribble, as well as Westmorland and a strip of Cumberland, is represented by the records of the five western deaneries of the Archdeaconry of Richmond, which are largely held at Preston, while the three eastern deaneries are represented by material held at Leeds. This vast and quasi-diocesan archdeaconry from the Reformation until 1836 fell entirely within the Diocese of Chester. Among the various groups of papers are the Comperta Books (the name possibly deriving from comparuit) which represent the years 1677–1796 (DRCh 1–3 and ARR 15/134).⁴ These reproduce the presentments made by the churchwardens of each parish with details of how each cause was concluded. Amongst the presentments for various years and parishes there are lists of those called before the court (which might for example sit at Preston or Lancaster parish churches) for non-attendance at their appropriate parish church. The format for such entries, which might cite a large number of names, is generally as follows: ‘officium domini . . . contra’ followed by names and ending variously with ‘pre (sentantur) for papists’, or sometimes ‘for Papists and Quakers’; occasionally is added some such formula as ‘pro non adeundo ecclesiam’. Comparable material for the eastern deaneries in Yorkshire may contain similar presentments.

B Catholic Sources in Civil War, ‘Popish Plot’, Jacobite Rebellion MSS.

There are many documents showing the troubles of papists seen as potential enemies of the State and allies of the Stuart Pretenders. Of particular interest are thirty-seven documents catalogued as DDKe 8/1–37, dating from 1684 to 1695. These include Roger Kenyon’s notes on an inquisition at Warrington into lands given for the maintenance of Jesuits, Franciscan friars, and secular priests by Lord Molineux, Thomas Eccleston, William Standish, Sir Nicholas Sherburne, William Dicconson, Sir William Gerard and Thomas Gerard, c. 4 May 1693 (DDKe 8/3); descriptions of the searching of Crosby Hall and the arrests of Mr Blundell, Sir William Gerard, Bartholomew Walmsley and Philip Lancton, 1694 (DDKe 8/4); and copy proceedings of the trial at Manchester and Lancaster Assizes of Sir Roland Stanley, Sir Thomas Clifton, William Dicconson, William Blundell and Philip Lancton, accused of plotting a rebellion, 1694, and related papers (DDKe 8/6–36).

The Office is particularly rich in documentation regarding the Civil War, ‘Popish Plots’ and the Jacobites, and other documents which are referred to in the pamphlet Materials for History, No.8, which supplies a short list of significant documents with their references. For example, reactions to the Popish Plot in Manchester are illustrated in QSP 495/1, and reactions in Burnley to James II’s victory at Killiecrankie in 1685 are in DDT0 Q15.

C Catholic Sources in Family Muniments

Very many papers of Catholic families and individuals are deposited in the Lancashire Record Office. As is well known, many families, not only the nobility, gentry and yeomen (as was common elsewhere), held to the old religion but in Lancashire the ordinary people did so too, and this was not just in the Pyldes but throughout the County generally. Some of the papers of Catholic families are extensive but only a handful can be mentioned here. The Guide, of course, gives notices of all those deposited before 1977.

i) Blundell Family of Little Crosby. The family papers are described in a catalogue of the Blundell of Crosby MSS. Among recusancy papers (DDB1 30/1–29)⁵ is an indictment of William Blundell for harbouring Robert Woodroffe, alias Witheroofe, of Burnley, seminary priest, 1590 (DDB1 30/1); a writ of outlawry against William Blundell, 1599 (DDB1 30/1); papers concerning recusancy fines, compositions, sequestration, and estate re-purchase, 1595–1660; Blundell the Jesuit's Letter of Intelligence . . . taken about him when he was Apprehended at Lambeth, 1679 (DDB1 30/27, printed); and letters and opinions of James Taylor of Leigh concerning the enrolment of Roman Catholic wills and deeds, 1795 (DDB1 30/19).

There are other papers relating to this branch of the Blundell family's troubles with the law over its recusancy, such as a document in which William Blundell's recusancy fines were reduced in 1631 (DDB1 30/7) and the search of Crosby Hall in 1674, referred to above (DDKe 8/4). Of later times are the following two papers: a printed letter from Henry Blundell on the religious quarrels in Liverpool, 1783 (DDSc 19/30), and one on Masses at Ince for Henry Blundell, 1807 (DDIn 49/39). Other branches of the Blundells are also well documented in the Office, where may also be consulted The Great Diurnal of Nicholas Blundell of Little Crosby (printed in The Record Society of Lancashire and Cheshire, Vols 110, 112, and 114) and Cavalier Letters of William Blundell to his Friends, 1620–1698, edited by M. Blundell (London, 1933) and Crosby Records: A Cavalier's Note Book . . . of William Blundell . . . 1642, edited by T.E. Gibson (London, 1880).

ii) Towneley Family. The papers of this important family are mostly elsewhere, but among those in the Office are a Recusancy Roll, 1595 (DDTo H/4/3); a book containing dates of the recusancy of Richard Towneley, 1613; and a document re arms discovered at Towneley Hall, 1641 (QSB 1/257/27).

iii) Molyneux Family. Many documents including e.g. a complaint against Lord M's recusancy, 1667 (DDM 11/20).

iv) Clifton Family. An extensive series of documents (DDCl), see the Guide.

v) Dicconson Family, especially concerning Edward Dicconson, Bishop of the Northern District. These are scattered among several sets of papers. The most noteworthy is the so-called Dicconson Diary (RCWb 5, comprising four volumes of 1400 pp). The Diary was kept by Edward Dicconson when on the mission from the Vicars Apostolic to have seculars placed in charge of the English College, Rome. Much other material is added, some copied by Dicconson when Vice-President of Douai. Kirk speaks of 'much curious material here'. For the papers of the Dicconson family in general, see the index to the Guide, under Dicconson of Wrightington.

vi) Coghlan Papers (RCBu 14/1—154). These are letters almost entirely to the Catholic printer, J.P. Coghlan (1731—1800). Fifty-two are from Bishop G. Hay of the Lowland District. There are none, however, from Bishop Challoner.

vii) Benison, Fenwick, Butler, West Papers. These represent the most extensive collection of parish papers in the North. They are being catalogued by the Lancashire Record Office for the Historical Manuscripts Commission. They contain many striking documents, such as the spiritual will of Ann Fenwick of Hornby, 1775 (RCHy 2/1/61) and papers concerned with her fight for her inheritance.

This is a fraction of the great number of family papers of interest to Catholic historians in the Lancashire Record Office, and they are being continually added to by new accessions. One of the more recent accessions are letters of Archbishop Whiteside when a student in Rome in 1880—1884, in which he describes Monte Porzio, the Albans and Campagna, as well as the City itself.

In Lancashire, as elsewhere, very full information on Roman Catholic families is contained in the register rolls of returns of Papists' estates made after the 1715 Act, which are among the Quarter Sessions records and extend to 1788. The name and places of estates enrolled up to 1717 have been edited by R. Sharpe France for the Record Society of Lancashire and Cheshire, Vols 98, 108 and 117 Lancashire Papists' Estates.⁶ Among the families included in the registers are quite a number not listed in Estcourt & Payne's The English Catholic Non-jurors of 1715.⁷

D. Diocesan Records of the three Roman Catholic Dioceses of the North West (Liverpool, Lancaster and Salford)

The Hierarchy of England and Wales has recommended dioceses and parishes to deposit suitable material on permanent loan in local record offices. The following seems to be the present position regarding the three North West dioceses:

i) Liverpool Diocesan Records. A considerable amount of material has been deposited in the Lancashire Record Office, among which are:

- a) Lancashire District Records (pre-1850), including Bishop Brown's correspondence, 1840–1850; diary, 1840–1850; pastoral and financial records; status missionis, etc.
- b) Bishops' Letter Books and those of Secretaries, including those of Bishop Goss, 1855–1872, and his secretaries, 1855–1867; Bishop O'Reilly and Bishop Whiteside, 1877–1915; and Bishop Whiteside, 1915–1920. Also, letter books of secretaries, 1887–1892, and of Messrs Watts and Carr, and Cookson.
- c) Northern District Records, including correspondence, 1711–1840; pastoral letters, 1784–1840; various visitation returns before 1850; and West Derby Hundred minutes and accounts.
- d) Lancashire Secular Clergy Fund Papers. These are voluminous, ample enough for a full history to be compiled from its origin, though the papers are scattered and not yet catalogued. There is much information in such individual papers as those of John Barrow of Claughton.

ii) Lancaster Diocesan Records (filed under Liverpool). Little of the diocesan papers has yet been deposited. The reason for this is that only the papers of the first Bishop, Wulstan Pearson OSB, would as yet fall within the accepted time limit of fifty years and Bishop Pearson's papers were removed on his death to one of the Benedictine houses. A few diocesan documents of an official nature have been deposited, including those concerning appointments to the See of Lancaster, letters (35) from Ronald Knox to Bishop Flynn concerning his translation of the Bible. (Bishop Flynn was chairman of the Bishops' Committee for that work.)

iii) Salford Diocesan Records. There are no significant groups of diocesan records of the Salford Diocese in the Lancashire Record Office. One deposit comprising Bishop Casartelli's scrap books and a set of parish register returns of the 1940s–1960s has recently been made.

E. Parochial Records of the three North West Dioceses

i) Liverpool Parishes. (Each parish has its own reference.) It is not possible to state exactly how many parishes have deposited their registers and papers but an up-to-date number could be obtained from the Lancashire Record Office, and it would seem that many registers, school log books, papers concerning charities, family papers with parish notices, etc. are now deposited. There are also numerous miscellaneous records, such as the Orrell deeds, and papers of other families, such as the Byrom, Houghton, Tyrer and Clayton families, the Peter Latham papers, etc., and others which give information on local and parochial matters. Bishop Goss's historical notes on parishes are available for consultation. On the whole, however, there do not seem to be many, if any, notable parish collections; some are said to be slender; a great deal has perished. (List in the Lancashire Record Office.)

ii) Lancaster Parishes. (Each parish has its own reference.) Of the 110 parishes in the Lancaster Diocese, 36 are in Cumbria and so will not have deposited their papers in the Lancashire Record Office. Of those in North Lancashire, 41 parishes have now deposited their older registers and records. Some of these have extensive and rich material, e.g. Hornby, Claughton, Fernyhalgh, and the Preston parishes of St Joseph, St Augustine's, English Martyrs, and St Wilfrid's & St Mary's (in microfilm from Farm Street). The richest is that of Hornby which includes the Thomas West SJ Papers, and those of the Bennison, Fenwick and Butler families, which are at present being expertly catalogued by the Office. In addition to the parish material, there are the Broughton Charitable Society Papers (DDX 830), many Clergy Fund Papers (RCCF), the First Catholic Charitable Society Papers (DDX 830/4/4), and the Convent of the SHCJ Papers (DDX 1462). The Lancaster Diocesan parish deposits thus include more than those of local interest and are extensive. (List in the Lancashire Record Office.)

iii) Salford Parishes (Each parish has its own reference.) A number of registers have been deposited but few other parish records are to be found in the Lancashire Record Office.

I should like to emphasise once more that what has been set down here is but a very inadequate indication of the riches of the sources for Roman Catholic history to be found in the Lancashire Record Office. It is essential that anyone starting research there should procure the Guide to the Lancashire Record Office and, above all, seek the guidance of the expert staff. It would be well, too, to familiarise oneself with the catalogues, with the publications of The Chetham Society and of the various antiquarian societies, and with the numerous publications on Catholic history here. These will all be found on the shelves of the very fine Search Room. The Lancashire Record Office building is very splendid indeed and is at present being extended. Being comparatively recently erected, it has been able to incorporate the most up-to-date equipment and machinery for microfilm reading, and other techniques.

Few will remember the beginnings of the county record offices, so perhaps I may be permitted a very few words about the old Essex Record Office of the Thirties. It is not easy to realise the advances which have been made during the fifty years or so of the existence of local offices. Conditions were in the beginning spartan and facilities meagre. Accommodation at Chelmsford had been grudgingly granted, it was said, in a few small rooms at the Sessions House, I think. The Reading Room was tiny and would hardly hold half a dozen. There was a small but highly expert staff presided over by Mr F.G. Emmison and his Assistant, Miss Hilda Grieve. Much is owed to those pioneers. They made the study of county records fashionable so that the county record offices took their place alongside the great central repositories. Cataloguing had already begun when I first used to visit the Essex Office, notably of Quarter Sessions Rolls. Texts of palaeography were being planned and readers taught how to transcribe documents. The staff interested themselves in one's enquiries and I recall being continually put onto such recondite sources as 'Bridge Books' and 'Manorial Court Rolls', whose existence I should otherwise not have discovered.

At every visit there was the thrill of some discovery which 'made the drudgery divine'. There were sometimes the ipsissima verba taken down in court by a notary with the offence and penalty set out in a legal anglo-latin jargon at first difficult to unravel. I still recall the excitement of coming one day across a presentment of two brothers in 1577 (unusually in the Quarter sessions for until 1581 the offence of recusancy was an ecclesiastical one) which ran as follows:

'... singlemen and keep a shop and occupy the science of a tailor . . . they are papists and enemies of the gosbell.' George Bynkes is summoned because 'on a tyme he was reasoning verie earnestlie with one Thomas Cochet . . . he said that after the bread and wine was by a priest consecrated it was the verie bodye fleshe and blood of Christ. Whye said ye seyd Cooke, then we are wronge taughte. Marye soe you are, quoth he and yt I will prove by good authors for the true religion is at Roome. But what manner of religion we have here in England I know not for ye preachers nowe doe preache there own inventions and phantazies and therefore I will not belive anie of them'. On another occasion George Bynkes was stated to have declared: 'God made but one commandment and that was that we should love our neighbour as ourselfe, secondarilie that the Masse ys good and confiteor ys good and that he wylle belive as long as he liveth . . . the images are good and ought to stand in the churche to put men in remembrance that such saints there were, and that the crosses in the churches and in the highwayes ought to stand to put men in remembrance that Christ died upon the cross'. George Bynkes appeared at the court and far from whittling down these words he is put down as saying that he states that 'he desireth to be called by the name of papist'.

Such items are seldom found other than in county record offices.

Fifty years ago even such places as the venue of the Historical MSS Commission in Chancery Lane were quite primitive and would elicit unfavourable comment from overseas visitors. That great institution, The Victoria County History series was produced under difficulties; meetings sometimes would take place like those of the early Christians 'from house to house'. How different now is the position accorded to the preservation and study of archives in today's splendidly appointed county record offices. The Lancashire Record Office exemplifies this advance. It is large and well-equipped and is being at present further extended. It is clearly accepted as an integral part of those services needed by the County. It has a wide influence and impact throughout the County on its schools and universities and the public generally. Liverpool University, for instance, in conjunction with the County record office at Preston, and its own Record Office and Local History Department, has courses in Local History, Religious History Workshops, etc. One group at the University has recently brought out a book The Management of Information Archives, which is all about 'computer-based retrieval' systems and other new methods which sound rather unnerving. The book, however, is not just concerned with new methods for professional archivists; it sets out to show that archives are not just an interesting part of our inheritance but essential to society if it is to learn from the past.

The Church, too, in its new Code of Canon Law goes to some length to enact that archives must be kept and it is with this in mind that I would like to make one last observation. Intensive study has been made since the opening of the records at the Public Record Office into Catholic post-Reformation history mainly by distinguished members of the religious orders and many lay Catholics using the resources of the great central repositories. As a result, the great figures and issues of the past have been described; the religious orders themselves, the martyrs, and recently the seminary priests, have all received expert attention.

There remain, however, many individuals and groups, not yet known, whose names deserve to be rescued from oblivion. With regard to individuals, it is striking how many turn up in family muniments now deposited in county archives. In Lancashire, for instance, there are extensive family papers for such people as the Benisons and Fenwicks (Ann Fenwick was the heiress who fought for the inheritance she had forfeited as a papist). There is P.J. Coghlan, Catholic printer and publisher and great benefactor of the religious communities abroad. There is a vast collection of papers of Thos West SJ, historian of the Lake District. And many others too numerous to mention. And there is one group, only partially studied, numbers of whose letters are found among family papers. This group is that of the female religious whose flight overseas from the middle of the reign of Elizabeth I has yet to be fully explored.

What an extraordinarily heroic phenomenon it was! Coming initially mainly from the great county families which had remained faithful to the Church, there went forth into exile a multitude of young women, at first to join the older religious order, like the Brigittines, the Poor Clares, the Carmelites, the Benedictines, the Augustinians, then later to set up their own communities. Those who at first fled to the Continent, (quite often two and three from a family) were of high descent and great fortune and prospects. They were the flower of the womanhood of the land. The lists are full of the greatest names of England — the Waldegraves, Petres, Gages, Mannock, Dormers, de Traffords, Wiseman, and so many others. They came from every county and later from every class of society. That they should have made such a renunciation, have left home and family to live in the anonymity of exile in a foreign land amid strangers with different speech and ways, was a thing unprecedented. It was a movement later paralleled in France in the late eighteenth century after a period of unbelief when a new generation of nuns was raised up. Montalembert, in his Monks of the West, speaks of all this, comparing these movements to that of the earlier 'Anglo-Saxon Maids' who peopled religious houses long ago. It is of such individuals and groups that study remains to be made and it is in the county record offices chiefly that, amid family papers, knowledge of them will be found.

My last word must be one of gratitude and admiration for the work being done by the staff of the Lancashire Record Office and for their assistance in the preparation of this short account of Catholic sources to be found there.

THE DIARIES OF LAURA DE LISLE

Bernard Elliott

One of the most important Catholic laymen in the nineteenth century was Ambrose Lisle Phillipps (later Ambrose Phillipps de Lisle). Born in 1809, the son of Charles March Phillipps, M.P. for North Leicestershire, he became a Catholic at the age of fifteen and played no small part in the development of Catholicism in the Midlands. In 1833 he married Laura Clifford, a member of an old recusant family, the Cliffords of Chudleigh in Devon. From 1840 Laura kept a diary and the diaries dating from 1840 to 1896 are still extant at Quenby Hall in Leicestershire, now the chief seat of the family. Naturally, they constitute a great source of information on Catholic affairs in the nineteenth century, as the following extracts show.

The de Lisles and the Oxford Movement

Most traditional Catholics took little notice of the Oxford Movement but this was not the case with Ambrose and Laura de Lisle. They realised that it might be good for Catholicism if they could get in touch with the Movement and the following extracts from the diaries give an account of how they met its leaders.

1842 18 October, Tuesday Ambrose, Dr. Gentili, Amo,¹ Everard,² and I went in pony carriage to Oxford. Spent our first evening with Mr Ward having seen Mr Bloxham on our first arrival.

19, Wednesday Feast of St. Frideswide, Patron of Oxford. We visited Oriel and Christ Church. Went to Mr Newman, who received us most kindly — walked about various colleges, All Souls, Magdalen, Balliol etc. all day long. Drank tea in Mr Ward's room and met there Mr Lockhart.

20, Thursday Lovely bright day but cold. At 9 we breakfasted in Exeter College with the Rev. J.B. Morris. At 11 we went to Christ College to see Dr. Pusey who received us most kindly and with whom we remained nearly two hours. The boys held their dinner at 2 after which we drove in the pony carriage to Littlemore. Arrived while the service was going on. Mr Dalgairns gone to Oxford so that we did not see the inside of the Monastery. Littlemore is that Anglican church where a cross is put up over the altar. Ambrose, Dr Gentili and I dined at 5 with Mr Bloxham in Magdalen College. Dr Gentili spent all evening in Balliol with Mr Ward.

Visitors to Gracedieu

Gracedieu received many important nineteenth-century figures:

1850 17 October — Mr and Mrs and Florence Nightingale arrived to stay and after luncheon we all walked to the chapel of Dolours. Lord Fielding spoke at length to Florence Nightingale.

19 October — The Nightingales left Gracedieu about 11 for Rempstone in Nottinghamshire.

1851: 21 June, Wednesday — Mr H. Wilberforce and Mr Manning called at 8 from the Warren. ³

26 June, Thursday, — Extremely hot day — Mr Manning said mass here at 8, and then breakfasted.

The de Lisles at the Great Exhibition in 1851.

1851 18 August, Monday — A beautiful day. Fr Sisk said mass at 8½. Ambrose and I, two boys and three eldest girls ⁴ left for London to see the Great Exhibition.

19, Tuesday — London. Beautiful bright day. We went to the Jesuit church for Mass at 10 after which we walked to the "Exhibition of the Industry of all nations" and remained there till it closed. 57059 persons admitted, £2781-16-0d taken at the door. Temperature 10 o'clock 57, 12 o'clock 65, 2 o'clock 69, 4 o'clock 70, 6 o'clock 69. Mean Temperature 66. We walked home to the hotel. I went with the boys and 3 girls to Astley's at 9. Saw Mageppa and Mr. Battoy's horses.

20, Wednesday — London — Beautiful bright day. Very hot. We went to the Jesuits' church 10 o'clock mass, after which we walked to the Exhibition and saw the remainder of it. 44,567 persons admitted, £2218-18-0d taken at the door. At 5 we left and walked to St Barnabas's church. Candlesticks and one cross on the altar. Rood skreen, lectern, stained glass in every window. Most Catholic in its appearance.

21, Thursday — London — Very fine hot day. We called at Dolman's at 10 and there we met Dr. Maguire. We then drove to the palace at Westminster where we went all over (having a ticket from Mr Barry) except the House of Lords for which he could not give us leave. I went with the children to the zoological gardens, the docks and Julien's band.

22, Friday — I called at 9 with Mina and Alice on Mr Toynbee, dentist, who says that he must see Alice again. It was settled that the boys should return home and we stay in London another night. Ambrose, I and the three eldest girls drove to Fulham where we saw Mr Ryder. Then to Clapham and saw the Redemptorist church and Hammersmith Benedictine convent where we had tea with Lady Bedingfield. We all went to Mme Tussaud's wax works in the evening.

23, Saturday — I called on Mr Toynbee with Mina and Alice at 9 We got to Euston station at 9½, had to wait till 11½ when one half of the people started by train. We went on second half at 12. Got to Loughborough at 5½.

The de Lisles at Nevill Holt

This extract from Laura's diary is most interesting, for the Nevills of Nevill Holt, near Market Harborough, were one of the oldest recusant families in Leicestershire, and by 1851 they were almost at the end of their residence at Nevill Holt, for in 1868 they left their ancestral home. So, it was most appropriate that the de Lisles, who were to take their place as Leicestershire's leading Catholic family should come to Nevill Holt to hear Mass.

1851 24 October, Friday — Ambrose, Mina and Alice and I left at 10 for Launde Abbey. Stopped 2 hours at Leicester when we went by Loughborough. Found at Launde Mr Simpson.

25, Saturday — Launde Abbey

26, Sunday — Launde Abbey. Beautiful bright morning. Ambrose, Mina, Alice and I set off at 9 for Nevill Holt where we got at 10½. Low Mass, English prayers, and sermon at 11 by Mr Dent of Hinckley.⁵ Found in the house William Nevill.⁶ and his two sisters from Leamington and their nieces, Laetitia and Charlotte Nevill. The house had been done up in excellent taste in hope that Mr Nevill was coming to live there. We then returned to Launde Abbey, where we spent the rest of the week.

31, Friday — Ambrose, Mina, Alice and I left Launde at 10. Stopped for luncheon at Queniborough with Charles and Elizabeth Phillipps, who had arrived from East Bourne the day before. Reached Garendon at 4½.

Alice presented at Court

1857 12 June, Tuesday — Ambrose, Alice and I left Coalville at 8.35 for London. Stayed at Almond's Hotel, 7, Clifford Street. Alice and I saw Mrs Capper about her court dress.

14 June, Tuesday — London — Fine morning. Henry called while Alice and I were dressing for court. Alice and I went to the drawing room, Buckingham palace, where I presented her. We all then dined at 6 at Mr Packe's and went with them to Covent Garden Theatre.

DIGGING A BIOGRAPHY FROM THE ARCHIVAL MINES

The Rev. Thomas Boland

The diocese of Brisbane was created in 1859 to coincide with the founding of the colony of Queensland. It became an archdiocese in 1887. From the beginning till 1986 there have been five bishops:

James Quinn	1859—1881
Robert Dunne	1882—1917
James Duhig	1917—1965
Patrick Mary O'Donnell	1965—1973
Francis Roberts Rush	1973—

The diocesan archives, like the history of the diocese itself, is dominated by the affairs of Archbishop Duhig. James Quinn was a pioneer who administered his vast see, the entire colony of Queensland, from the saddle as much as from the desk. The survival of any documentation was due to the persistence of his secretary, eventually his successor, Robert Dunne. The latter has left several shelves of letter books, in which are meticulously preserved details of his pastoral and financial administration and much of his personal correspondence. Neither of these two believed in any canonical position to challenge his own; so there were no officials or agencies to leave deposits to the archives.

Patrick Mary O'Donnell was the model of a modern metropolitan. He established all the right post-Conciliar committees, belonged to others in the Australian hierarchy and shuffled the proper papers to his suffragans. His successor manages the new style with expertise. As yet little of this new flood of paper has washed into the archives. This is just as well, since the space in between the first two and the last is filled by the mare magnum of the trackless navigations of James Duhig.

His episcopate covers forty-eight years of our diocesan history. In fact, as coadjutor he added five more years to his long involvement, and he had assisted unofficially for some years before that from the neighbouring see of Rockhampton, of which he was bishop from 1905. His episcopal career spanned 60 of our 127 years.

His attitude to paper work was ambivalent. He appreciated the need for it, but his restless energy and broad concept of episcopal functions made it almost impossible for him to document his activities. Much of his pastoral and his unending building work — over five-hundred church structures — was by word of mouth. His senior priests tried to restrain him by appointing secretaries, but it was not till his latter years that he had one, the late Fr Frank Douglas, who could introduce discipline into his wayward adventures. Fortunately, he was more amenable to the attentions of his two long-serving stenographers, who were effectively secretaries. They persisted with letters and rescued documents from casual loss. Their work produced results in the mid-twenties, and from the mid-thirties it produced the material of comprehensive archives.

James Duhig, Archbishop of Brisbane, 1917–1965
Bust by Daphne May

Oddly, he destroyed nothing deliberately. In this he was unlike his colleague, Daniel Mannix of Melbourne, who rarely put pen to paper and destroyed most incoming correspondence. He read an ecclesiastical biography of which he did not approve. He determined that no one would do likewise to him. The result has been the impoverishment of Australian history, as well as of diocesan management, and the deterioration of Mannix's good repute. Several biographies have been written and a plethora of articles and monographs on his role in Australian affairs. None has done him justice and some have been defamatory. He has eliminated the possibility of restoring the balance.

James Duhig had no doubt that someone would want to write his biography, or that his doings were significant in the history of Church and State. From the time his young stenographers established their sway carbons of every letter he wrote were preserved, ecclesiastical, civil, financial, personal. He kept crank letters, questing letters, congratulatory and condolence letters, school concert programmes, plane, theatre and lottery tickets. His correspondence came from every continent, every Church, every class. His interests included mining — in the jungles of the Pacific, the fastnesses of North Queensland, the Central Australian deserts — oil exploration, forestry development, pioneer aviation, automobile and film industries, art, politics, ecumenism and a host of minor topics. He read widely and devoured newspapers in several languages. He exerted a magnetic charm which induced people in all these fields to write to him.

The result was an accumulation of papers that overflowed any attempts at confinement. The eroding effect of his own haphazard style was intensified by the canonical scrupulosity of his successor. Archbishop O'Donnell personally gathered the tens of thousands of letters and files, stuffed them in over a hundred tea chests and carried them up two flights of stairs to an attic. There he locked them up for eight years under the prescribed two locks. He entrusted the keys to neither the chancellor, the archivist, nor anyone else. Archbishop Rush delivered them from exile, but subsequent moves have accelerated the rate of destruction. However, they have been preserved from the flames so beloved of some 'professional archivists', and they await proper processes of selection, registration and cataloguing. In this it is intended that due weight will be given to historical, pastoral and theological interests as well as to canonical and bureaucratic.

In the meantime they have been made usable by retrieving and expanding the secretaries' filing system. This was a task of years, since Archbishop O'Donnell had mixed up the papers almost inextricably. File, business, chronology were all abandoned in the hasty process of clearing the putative scandals out of the range of uncanonical vision. I commenced research for the biography Dr Duhig intended in 1976. It became evident immediately that nothing was possible till some order was established. Fr Douglas was Chancellor and took over the care of the documents, which could not yet be called archives. The sorting he did largely himself, with help from myself and latterly of a part-time worker. The present archivist, Fr Denis Martin, has brought the initial process to a tidy conclusion. Though files and part-files kept turning up till quite recently, I decided in 1981 that it was time to start writing. It was then that the true historical wealth of the archives became evident to me. Archbishop Duhig's proliferation of material, his secretaries' preservation of it, the quasi-miraculous survival of the bulk of it ; all these left me with a story so well documented that it could have been written from these sources alone and still be unchallenged for authenticity — whatever the use I have made of them. It was necessary to consult other archives, ecclesiastical and civil, in Australia and overseas. These proved valuable; but they were essential only for the period before the Brisbane Archives collection of Duhig material began.

As the files grew and were ordered in cabinets and rows and rows of boxes, the general outline of a Life emerged. He was known as James the Builder, and at times his construction was a significant contribution to the economy of the city. One Queensland historian referred to him as 'an Edwardian Man of Property'. The Forsythian implications were inaccurate as well as unjust; but he was a man of properties. He bought endlessly and in large blocks. He sold part of his purchases to finance his building and the expansion of the diocese. For this reason the letters of solicitors, estate agents and would-be vendors make up the largest portion of his archives.

They are followed by the statements and prolific correspondence of the twelve banks with which he dealt, and the despairing — at times, minatory — rates notices of a variety of City and Shire Councils. Some businessmen sought to flatter him by saying he was a financier manqué. The evidence suggests that the latter element should be stressed. This very correspondence, especially with bank managers who should have known better, is evidence of the extraordinary charm that could smile his way out of impossible situations.

One shelf is devoted to the work intended to cap all his building activity and be the heart of his pastoral and spiritual ministry, the projected Holy Name Cathedral. It was to have been the largest built since the Reformation. English readers will appreciate that he maintained a sympathetic interest in Archbishop Downey's grand design for Liverpool. Fr Martindale SJ, collected for him among his friends. The Depression of the Thirties frustrated his plans, but the smallest fund-raising children's function is recorded along with some appeals of a simoniacal theology not heard since Tetzels preached the St Peter's Indulgence.

In all these matters he displayed a fine lack of concern for not only the niceties but also the solid realities of Canon Law. Not surprisingly, one of the major collections is of letters to and from the Apostolic Delegation. A look into the much smaller Roman file reveals an urbane romanità. He knew how the Old Boy network operates and how to pull discreetly on the right strings. The Overseas Bishops files, too, reveal the virtuosity of a fine hand that was Irish by birth, Australian by upbringing, but Italian by training.

Files on Australian Church affairs are not correspondingly large. Throughout most of his episcopate the bishops did not act usually as a national hierarchy. From 1918 there were Archepiscopal and later simple Episcopal Conferences; but they did most of their business unofficially in an attempt to circumvent the dominance of the Apostolic Delegate. Duhig was, for a time, Secretary, but he was frequently remiss in keeping even the Minutes. In the last years of his life he participated in the various meetings but took little real interest in the business. Nevertheless, his files proved a useful source on some disputed affairs, especially on the results of the Labour Party ruptures of the 1950s.

A number of boxes testify to his interest in some national and political matters. Irish and Italian letters are sufficiently numerous and meaty to correct the disturbed balance caused by the concentration on Archbishop Mannix in the one instance and to provide a corrective for current views of Fascism in Australia in another. In party political affairs there is plenty of material to demonstrate his close involvement in politics without being — like some of his colleagues — committed to any one party.

His political attitude was one aspect of his view of community leadership. He believed in the patronage system of an earlier age. Boxes on Art, Business Ventures and clientela matters revealed an attitude to public concerns characteristic of the community as much as of himself. Each section on its own seemed merely eccentric, even esoteric. Together they were a major source of social history.

Several cabinets contain the meagre pastoral correspondence to and from the 115 parishes, the 140 schools, the 43 religious congregations, the various societies and sodalities. Only three agencies have been in existence long enough to be substantially represented, those of Missions, Migration and Catholic Education. Since there were only two religious orders in the diocese before his time and one society, and since few have been added since (though a plethora of agencies), these sources, too, tell a story of the Duhig pastoral and spiritual care.

One more collection deserves mention, the Miscellaneous A—Z. Most of these would have been destroyed by the bureaucratic archivist. Some undoubtedly will be in the interests of space. Yet they provide most useful guidance for the meaning of the official correspondence. There are personal letters about poverty, patronage, administrative insensitivity, political discrimination, spiritual problems, a variety of interest. They paint a picture of James Duhig as a universal man, but they also form a rich source of material for the study of many religious and political concerns.

Australian ecclesiastical archives are only now being organised on a professional basis. The Brisbane Roman Catholic Archdiocesan Archives offer an opportunity for decisions which can help to establish principles for preservation policy. These principles must be relevant to the purpose of Church activities and Church archives. These are not the same as those of the Civil Service and business houses.

NOTE

Fr Thomas Boland's biography of Archbishop Sir James Duhig is being published this spring by the University of Queensland Press and will be available overseas about the middle of this year. The cost is to be 40 dollars (Aust.) for hardback and 17.50 dollars for paperback.

NOTES

1. Amo – Laura's pet name for her eldest son, Ambrose Charles. Born in 1834 and educated at Oscott, then the leading Catholic public school, his chief claim to fame is that he did much to revive the Quorn Hunt.
2. Everard – Laura's second son. He too was educated at Oscott and after school joined the army of the East India Company, where he became involved in the Indian Mutiny, winning a V.C. at the siege of Delhi.
3. The Warren was a house belonging to the de Lisles not far from Gracedieu.
4. The three eldest girls were Philomena (always called Mina), Alice and Winifred. All three made profitable marriages. Mina married Sir Frederick Weld, one of the Welds of Lulworth Castle. Alice married Arthur Strutt, second son of Lord Belper, and Winifred married Lord Howard of Glossop, the brother of the Duke of Norfolk.
5. The Rev. Francis Aloysius Dent was a Dominican priest who lived at their house in Hinckley.
6. William Nevill was the brother of Charles Nevill, then the head of the Nevill family.

MY ROAD TO PORTSMOUTH ARCHIVEDOM

The Rev. Francis Isherwood

It used to be said that the Portsmouth Diocesan Archives were all destroyed during the War, when, on 10 January 1941, Bishop's House, Portsmouth, was destroyed by enemy action, and the Cathedral was severely damaged. It is true that six members of the lay staff were killed, and that it was thought that all that remained of the archives were a couple of books, but, for the purpose of this report, we are pleased to say that in the last two years this has been disproved.

As the war-scarred debris fell back to earth, it was collected and, after summary drying, was placed into boxes, where it lay, disorganised and undisturbed, for over forty years. The contents of these boxes have now been cleaned, sorted and catalogued, and form part of the story of the re-birth of the Portsmouth Archives.

My particular story begins in 1970 when I was appointed to the Island of Jersey, a far-flung corner of the diocese, some 120 miles from Portsmouth. One of my tasks was taking over the editorship of the Jersey Catholic Record, a monthly publication, which, I was to find, needed a lot of filling!

In its early years, the Island magazine had, in fact, contained a series of articles of an historical nature, but with the death of a particular contributor, these articles ceased and the content became more general. Early in 1971, however, some copy arrived on the editorial desk with a heading proclaiming the forthcoming centenary celebrations of one of the Island's country parish churches. As for the article, it contained little more than general news of the event and how the parishioners were going to celebrate. I remember that that month not much had come in, in the way of copy, and I would need to find more material to keep the readers happy. As it turned out, this was to have a great influence on what happened later. A visit to the presbytery's library revealed that the centenary in question was no more than the laying of the foundation stone! While I was there, and with the parish priest's permission, I rooted through the library, and after a short time, was heading back to town with a bundle of papers which were to be used as the basis of an article, and at the same time, become the first acquisition for the archives.

The publication of the article was received with interest. Would I consider doing a series on all the parishes? And that was just the beginning. With the help of the Société Jersiaise (the Island's Museum) and others, information started trickling in, sometimes from unexpected quarters. The most important event though was a phone call from a member of the Société. He had an old map, showing the site of the first Catholic church to be built in Jersey since the Reformation. Would I care to go and have a look at it? Although it was known that the church had existed until 1840, its location and subsequent history were shrouded in mystery. I went and traced the area of the map in question, and armed with my camera, decided to photograph the old church. But this was not to be. The building had been demolished the week beforehand! What is more, nobody seemed to know anything about it.

This obvious disappointment was the start of a real race against time. If more records were not to be lost, it was imperative that every effort be made to collect and publish our church histories before it was too late. There is always a distinct possibility of a curate being moved on to another parish before his scheming reaches fruition. With this in mind it was necessary to seek the agreement, and what is more important, the financial backing of the Island's parishes to bring out a set of church history booklets to speed up the publication of the material available. It must be said that although enthusiasm was somewhat lacking in some quarters at the time, persistence won the day, and such has been the subsequent demand that the initial print run could easily have been doubled!

Apart from the parish histories, there was also place for the religious orders, French emigré clergy, and a multitude of papal Bulls and other documents affecting the Church in the Channel Islands. Where the originals of these documents were in French, Jersey French, or Latin, they were translated and made ready for publication. At last the Jersey Church History Series took shape, consisting of eight booklets, published between 1971 and 1974. Added to this, the Jersey Catholic Record produced a booklet on the emigré clergy who came to the Portsmouth diocese as a result of the French Revolution (3,000 priests and 5 bishops were to pass through Jersey alone!), as well as continuing regular articles in the monthly magazine. It is worth noting here that since the Channel Islands do not form part of England, but are self-governing, there is no obligation for publications to be lodged at the British Museum or several of the universities. It was therefore with a sense of pride that we received a subscription from the Bodleian Library. No mean feat for a church magazine!

In 1976 it was time to say goodbye to Jersey and head south-east for a seven-year appointment to Portsmouth's sister diocese in the north-west province of Cameroon (West Africa). Although outside the scope of this article, let it just be said that the work of establishing a diocesan archives in the tropics was not without its difficulties! It is, however, satisfying to note that the very meagre accomplishments then are now being used as a basis for further study and amplification.

Having returned to the UK in 1983, the year after the diocese of of Portsmouth celebrated the centenary of its formation, I assumed (among other things!) the role of Information Officer and Archivist. The obvious place to start was in Jersey, but there I found that the archives I had collected were no longer where I had left them. They had been 'borrowed'. I eventually managed to locate the archives box at the other end of the Island, but found to my dismay that some important contents were missing. This would appear to be not an unknown way of making acquisitions! I am happy to be able to say that our present archives are lodged in a building fitted with a burglar alarm. My return coincided with the promulgation of the new Code of Canon Law. The section dealing with Archives is to be found in Canon 491, para. 2: 'The Diocesan Bishop is to ensure that there is an historical archive in the Diocese, and that documents which have an historical value are carefully kept and systematically filed'.

As mentioned above, it was generally believed that all the Portsmouth archives were destroyed during the War. They did get blown up, but as they fluttered back to earth, they were collected, and after a summary drying out, bundled into cardboard boxes where they were moved hither and thither until eventually finding their way into a diocesan store room. How many hours were to be spent unravelling, smoothing, dusting, repairing, collating and cataloguing the contents of those boxes is not recorded. What we do know is that now we have a fairly comprehensive documentation going back to the foundation of the diocese in 1882. A few years ago, and again not generally known, was the acquisition from Southwark of letters written to Bishop Grant from what is now the Portsmouth Diocese. Bishop Grant was a prolific letter-writer and hoarder of incoming mail. We have him to thank for our insight into the life of the Church after the restoration of the hierarchy. Just recently, another hoard came to light while clearing out a basement room in Bishop's House. Although badly damaged by waterlogging, it was possible, after slow drying, to save a fair proportion of these records.

Information storage

As the existence of the Archives became better known, material started coming in from the parishes, and serious consideration had to be given to a comprehensive indexing system and storage.

Creating an index was an experience in itself. With no example to go on, I set about defining the different sections. The parish section was easy enough. Since the diocese was divided geographically into parishes, it was possible to create subdivisions within each parish section to cope with religious institutions, old Mass centres or chapels of ease. The remaining material was sometimes more difficult to define, and often needed cross-referencing. Basically, it fell into three main categories: diocesan groups, and items of national or diocesan interest. These last two groups were to expand as new material came to light. With hindsight, a re-indexing would inevitably result in a refinement and a different classification.

With the index as a guide, every item was coded, and noted on a card index prior to being stored in box files. The next step was to transfer all the information into a 'Text Editor' (an electronic typewriter with television screen and 'floppy disk capacity' which meant that the information could be stored on disk, and updated as more items became available). In May 1985 this information was used to produce a couple of booklets which were sent to all the parishes in the diocese to inform them about the archives and invite them to send in more material. Such has been the response that these booklets are now hopelessly incomplete.

Other major acquisitions include a vellum bound book 'Acta et Gesta 1882-1910', the Bishop's Day Book from 1882-1910, handwritten, first in Latin, then in English. It was retrieved from a presbytery in Portsmouth. How it got there, no questions asked! Within its covers we now have a comprehensive log book of the early years of the Diocese.

Throwing light on subsequent history are copies of Pastoral Letters, especially those for Rosary Sundays, which chronicle the setting-up of new missions and the opening of churches.

Apart from specifically diocesan archives, there are also personal collections of the first Bishop of Portsmouth, John 'the Magnificent' Vertue, a man of taste, a collector extraordinary. His correspondence is, of course, of diocesan interest. What is also of interest are his photos, taken when he was a military chaplain in Malta, the contemporary church catalogues he obtained, his collection of fine art etchings, as well as his invitation to various social functions.

His successor, Bishop Cahill, has left us a variety of invoices from the beginning of the century, some of them with embossed headings, showing how life (by some) was lived, at the beginning of the century.

From the Isle of Wight, a collection of account books belonging to a Mr Heneage (his wife was later to found churches at Newport and Cowes) and dating from 1771 to 1786, contain a newspaper cutting of the 1785 Budget. Then, as now, it was unpopular. The reason this time was the introduction of the new window tax. More relevant to the life of the Church following the Second Relief Act of 1792, are two certificates, dated 1793 and 1796, for Newport and Cowes, registering the buildings as places of worship.

The Cowes box contains century-old newspaper cuttings of a dynamite scare and the subsequent court case involving a French lady who was accused of being involved in terrorism. The substance found in her bag and then under consideration was later found to be modelling clay. Plus ca change . . . !

The latest acquisition of note is a notebook written in 1808, being the text of an address delivered in Reading by a Dr Valpy, a rather xenophobic Englishman of Jersey descent, and a Church of England clergyman. It is of interest, not only because it gives details about the presence of French emigré clergy, but also because the theme of his address was that of Catholic Emancipation.

I am very aware of the privileged position I hold, having spoken to archivists from other dioceses, who lack the space and resources they need to carry out their work effectively. By a strange quirk of fate I hold the position of Financial Administrator of the diocese, and as such, do not have to plead my cause with the Finance Department! As Diocesan Secretary I also run the diocesan Offices, and so am able to make use of its facilities. The other side of the coin is that diocesan archive material is instantly available, and is in fact used in the day to day running of the diocese. This 'marriage' has proved to be a very valuable asset to the Offices, and also means that information received today can be channelled into its proper place, and will undoubtedly be used as archive material tomorrow.

A word may be said here about the use of 'computers' in archive work. I have already mentioned the use of a 'Text Editor', a glorified typewriter. The computer, however, although also capable of being used to type text (such as this article) can sort out information and print it out alphabetically or chronologically. This has proved extremely useful in producing lists of clergy and historical items as required from random entries.

A combination of these facilities aided the publication, in April 1986, of a series of seventeen deanery parish and personnel data bases, together with an alphabetical index of places mentioned. These booklets contain a 'potted history' of each parish, references to published material relating to the parish, (including published Introductions to selected Missions in the Catholic Record Society Series, by Archbishop King, Canon Scantlebury and Joseph Hansom), lists of the clergy who have worked therein, and dates of available parish registers. This exercise has highlighted the fact that some of our earlier registers, in some cases those published by the Catholic Record Society, appear to have been mislaid, and need to be found. Linked with this is the work of establishing an alphabetical list of the clergy who have worked in the area now covered by the Diocese, which with other information collected, will be used for the compilation of a National List of clergy working in England and Wales, 1800-1914.

The Diocesan Archive does not operate in a vacuum. It has much to offer local history societies and record offices. Apart from supplying information, a working relationship can prove most beneficial for the acquisition of new insights into our history. Although we have been in existence but a short time, students from the local Portsmouth Polytechnic or local parish historians have already made use of our material and have contributed in their own way to the understanding of our past.

Another important part of the Diocesan Offices is the Deeds Room, separate from the archives, housing the history of diocesan properties, some of the deeds being penned in a bygone age. There is one section of the Diocese, however, which is not recorded. Because of the special status of our 'overseas' parishes, the Channel Islands' Deeds are housed, not in Portsmouth, but in the Royal Courts of Guernsey and Jersey. Such are the legal intricacies, that in Jersey, Portsmouth Diocese's interests are represented by a group known by the grandiose title of 'Fidei-Commis(saires) de l'Eglise Apostolique Catholique Romaine'.

Let us end by saying that the Portsmouth Diocesan Archives are alive and kicking. The material coming in is both plentiful and varied, and it is now a matter of routine to allot catalogue numbers and boxes. The initial brain work and setting-up has been done, and our existence has been noted. Now we are having to think about the more practical and recommended way of keeping archives. We have to confess that we are not yet equipped solely with acid-free boxes, brass paper clips and binding tape! On the positive side, we can say that a start has been made, and that there is every hope that our experience will be of use to others faced with the awesome task of creating a bit of order out of chaos.

NOTE

Quotations are drawn from diaries and journals kept in the La Retraite Archives at La Retraite, Clapham Park, London, SW12. They were used to prepare an exhibition marking '75 years of retreats in the diocese and 60 years at Harborne Hall' displayed during jubilee celebrations in December 1985. Photocopied material is from the same source. The archives are not generally open to the public but enquiries may be addressed to the Archivist.

FROM THE ARCHIVES OF THE RETREAT HOUSE AT HARBORNE HALL, BIRMINGHAM

Those who work in retreats at Harborne Hall are the inheritors of a charism and a tradition dating back to Vannes in Brittany in the seventeenth century. Seeing the fruitfulness of the house of retreats for men in the same city, 'some ladies', led by Mlle Catherine de Francheville, 'joined together to form a community in which they would consecrate themselves to this work, and help the people whom Providence would send, to benefit from the retreats'. (From the rule of the community of the daughters of the Blessed Virgin for women's retreats founded in the city of Vannes, 1703.)

The story of the foundation of this work of retreats in the Birmingham Diocese begins in 1909. It is found in the manuscript diary entitled 'Journal of the Convent of the Retreat of the Sacred Heart, Great Malvern'. This diary recording 'A few preliminaries to the English foundation' traces the great efforts made to bring the work of retreats for women to this area by the Religious of the Society of the Sacred Heart from Bruges.

1909, 11 September. The Superior General, M. St. Benoit Labre, and two other religious visited four bishops in the North of England.

They went to the Bishop of Shrewsbury . . . to ask whether he would have them in his diocese. After consulting his Canons, he said he would, but must naturally have a voice in the spot decided upon. They went to New Brighton, and liked it very much, but the Bishop did not wish them to go there. They also went to Liverpool, the Bishop refused them because 'Les Dames de Cenacle' were there; to Manchester . . . to Leeds . . . where they received candid or polite refusals; and lastly to Warrington which they didn't like or think suitable.

They returned to Bruges on 20 September 'very pleased with England and the English, but feeling that the North of England was not likely to want us'.

But they were undeterred, and 23 to 30 October found them in England again, trying Kenilworth, Leamington and Birmingham. Here the bishop gave them 'a hearty welcome into his diocese' and told them to 'try Little Malvern' from where they had received an invitation. Little Malvern seemed unsuitable for retreats, but the Ursulines in Great Malvern offered them a house. 'There were pros and cons' but they returned to Bruges after a third visit on 21 March 'with the impression that all now pointed to Great Malvern'. The lease was signed in July and 'two days were spent at Malvern taking measurements and many in the shops in Birmingham buying furniture'.

1910, 28 September. The first detachment of five left for England, and under the protection of St Michael arrived at Malvern at 2.30 on 29 September. 'Glibert, a Fleming had been there for some days, making mattresses . . . the Superior wouldn't condemn her Lady Boarders to the penance of an English mattress . . . They had to go out to borrow cups before they could make a cup of tea'. So they began to settle and to welcome all sorts of people: French girls wanting to learn English, Catholic and Protestant neighbours, a little girl to be prepared for Holy Communion. The first Mass was celebrated on 22 October. The chapel and house were blessed by the bishop on 8 November.

The work of retreats had a modest beginning: a one-day retreat for a French girl; a two-day retreat for someone staying in the house. There is first mention of M. St. Paul, who would later play a great part in the spiritual work of the house, renewing her vows on 8 December.

1911, 11 August. 'Our first popular retreat began. 12 girls from Malvern, Upton, Worcester, and Birmingham'. They were kept busy; four talks from the priest, 'pictures' from M. St Jean (were these 'Moral pictures' which featured for over a hundred years in the Breton retreats?); rosary in the garden, examen in the chapel, way of the cross, morning and evening prayers, reading at meals, half an hour's singing, and two hours' recreation ('games with Mothers'); and all the rest of the time, silence.

By the end of 1911 and beginning of 1912, several references are made to 'a retreat house in Birmingham'. In spite of being in contact with some fifty girls through Children of Mary, English lessons, choir practices, and catechism classes, Malvern was not a suitable place as a centre. By 14 March 1912 there was news of a house, and on 20 March two of the community visited Thirlmere, Wheeley's Road, 'where they took measurements and drew plans of all the rooms, and garden and stable and thought everything most suitable'. They then visited a girls' club between 8.30 p.m. and 9.40 p.m. where they 'spoke to the girls of the proposed house and invited them to make a retreat; 33 of 35 present raised their hands to come'. On 12 May the lease arrived, and on 15 May the Archbishop's consent.

On 24 June they made measurements for cubicles and found they could take thirty-three retreatants.

When visiting the office of the Water Rate to see if we could have the water turned on, Mother Superior protested against paying 4 guineas a year rate for a house we would occupy at most six weeks of the year. Three officials came one after the other to listen to the improbable story told by Catholic Nuns of how, for the sake of giving poor working girls a few days holiday, they were going to take a house with a rent of £70. Poor things, but was it likely they would believe it? 'Well, they are lucky girls' was all they could mutter under their breath — and to us: 'If we find your story true, we will try and make some arrangement'.

By 19 July came 'News that the big dormitory at Thirlmere is finished'; by 25 July 'All the places are now filled for the first retreat, that is 29'. M. St Paul went to Birmingham for the first retreat, and returned to Malvern on 6 August, saying, 'the retreat given by Father Hart S.J. had been a great success'. The second retreat was given by Fr Joseph Rickaby to twenty-five girls from Friday to Tuesday; 'All very successful', and on Wednesday Fr Rickaby gave a day's recollection to about twenty-five Catholic Women's League members, 'so that a great many more people saw and heard our work'.

What sort of girls were coming? Among those attending the first retreat were a housekeeper to priest; a dressmaker; a clerk; housemaids; girls living at home; factory workers; machinists; a cook; a girl from St John's Home, Gravelly Hill; a girl working in a dairy. In addition, the second retreat welcomed a corset-maker; a laundry maid; a girl working in a warehouse; a hospital nurse; a head Clerk. Some had 'tried their Vocation' in various convents, others are noted as entering later; one 'a 3 days old convert made her first communion during the retreat, Engaged to a Catholic.'

Retreats were also progressing in Malvern; twelve young women aged between 19 and 47 came to a private retreat given by M. St Paul. In December twenty girls came: 'they were for the most part very poor, and many of them couldn't afford even the 3/- which we asked for this retreat'.

From July 1914 some of the community remained in Thirlmere (until now they had commuted to Birmingham when necessary), but small numbers became a problem. Several priests gave their services for nothing, or returned their stipend, saying they would come whenever they were wanted. In March 1914 two religious toured the parishes of Birmingham in a friend's car 'to try to arouse the clergy with regard to retreats in general, and childrens retreats in particular'. This bore fruit, more than was manageable — eighty-eight children turned up. In this year too, permission came from the Archbishop for retreats for boys, and the religious themselves began giving the children's retreats.

From retreat lists and diary notes it is evident that retreatants were more varied: teachers, mothers, nurses, men including miners from Cannock 'who sang at Mass and Benediction so nicely'. Concerts and socials were held to raise money for the support of the work. The balance paid to the house after one of these was £1.16s.7d.

Cuttings from the Children of Mary magazine The Child of Mary, from Stella Maris, the Oratory Magazine, The Universe and The Tablet gave publicity and accounts of the activities of the Retreat House. There is not space here to quote from them. Neither was there space in the retreat house. For several boys' and men's retreats, cubicles and washing facilities had to be removed, and beds placed in the corridors and bathrooms. Wartime conditions were affecting the retreats; others had to be cancelled 'because the lads are too busy working overtime for the War'. The cold, increased by wartime shortages, interrupted the work.

We shall have no more retreats until March. Retreatants cannot face the severe climate of the retreat house.

Ash Wednesday March 8th 1916 No ashes. March 9th No coal — only promises not kept. 10th Went out to look for coal . . . got a promise of 1cwt for tomorrow. Hundreds of women and children waiting at the Wharf, and the weather is bitter. March 11th. Snow again falling fast; the 18th day. Still no coal, so sent to borrow from Dr Wilson . . . He most kindly let us fetch all we wanted . . . our first retreat this year begins with 13 girls.

A Midlands retreats committee organised the retreats for men and boys at Oscott and Wheeley Road, but they had problems: 'They owe £8'. Articles by Fr Plater S.J. encouraged attendance at retreats and support and solidarity for the committee.

However, the house and grounds were too small, and the twenty-minute walk to the Oratory was physically demanding on religious who had not robust health and who worked very hard long hours. After much house-hunting, without much encouragement from the local clergy, they moved to a cold draughty house on the Hagley Road, the only advantage being its nearness to the Oratory. In spite of difficulties, of great variations in numbers of retreatants, of priests letting them down at the last minute, the religious struggled on. The house in Hagley Road proved unsuitable; they were refused a house they liked 'because the agent is a rabid Protestant and would not let us have it'. In July 1919 they were offered Penryn for three years at a rent of £250. To get a quick answer ('letters take too long') from the Superior General, one religious set off for Bruges at 6.00 p.m. one Wednesday evening with no money except for £5 which someone had lent her, no luggage, wearing her old shoes, and getting her train and passport 'by a series of miracles'. She returned at 3.00 a.m. on Saturday morning with the message, 'Take Penryn. I have great confidence that you will do great things for God and his glory there'.

A third volume of the journal tells us of the move to Penryn. The Bank Holiday retreatants left Hagley Road between 8.00 a.m. and 9.00 a.m. The Pickfords men arrived at 9.30 by which time 'the whole house was in an upheaval'. It took from Wednesday to Friday to move, and the first retreat at Penryn began on the Saturday evening. Penryn stood in an interesting part of Birmingham, for Catholics. The road opposite had been known as Mass House Lane 'where until recently a farm provided shelter for priests and a Mass place during times of persecution'.

Funds continued to be difficult. A retreatant paid between 5/6 and 10/- for a weekend; occasional donations and gifts were a godsend. Fetes, bazaars and concerts brought in a little money which allowed the community 'to extend their work of conducting retreats among poorer people'. Fr C.C. Martindale S.J., whose name appears frequently from now on in the pages of the diary, set up a fund for donations to support the work, writing about it in

The Tablet in October 1921. All this was in spite of a great demand for places on some retreats. Men were willing to 'sleep in the bathroom or the stokehole' if only they would be allowed to come. In 1924 there were 140 more retreats than in 1923.

From now on it was a question of buying Penryn, which belonged to a group of trustees for a branch of the Chamberlain family. Problems required solutions, badly-needed alterations could not be done under the present lease and there seemed no answer.

Negotiations over the lease were still going on, when, on 9 May 1925, a friend phoned to say that Harborne Hall was for sale, and freehold. But they had to hurry; someone else was after the Hall. (It turned out later to be Anglican Deaconesses.) So the acquisition became a race for the Hall which 'was in a perfect state of repair'. The offer was accepted on Saturday, 23 May 'Just in time'. The Deaconesses offered more on Monday morning. 'Too late'. Thirty-four acres of land went with the Hall, but the religious were advised 'there should be no difficulty in letting the land, but we want to sell if possible to lessen our debt'. They came into possession of Harborne Hall on 29 September, the anniversary of the English foundation.

Retreats continued at Penryn with the usual ups and downs, while religious sorted rubbish, upholstered furniture, cleaned Harborne Hall; '4½ tons of coal arrived, and was thrown down in the lane'. The last retreat at Penryn took place on Saturday 31 October, to Sunday, 1 November: 'A very nice retreat; just enough beds; no books, no harmonium'.

Retreats at Harborne Hall, 1936

The Retreat House was officially opened on 16 November 1925. A message from the Pope in a letter from Fr Martindale S.J. was read: 'I had an interview with His Holiness . . . especially about retreats for working men including miners. His face lit up. He raised hands high and said, "that is an exquisite work of spiritual charity".'

A gymnasium was immediately turned into a dormitory, the rooms in the Hall being used as a residence for ladies and students; thus bringing a more stable source of income. The first retreat took place on 28 November, but there was not enough room. 'We wish we could see our way to building at once.' A piece of land was sold and the foundation of the new building laid in 'a piercing wind' on 9 March 1926. The building was held up by lack of wood due to the General Strike, but was open by the August Retreat 1926.

Many groups by now are making annual retreats: the Catholic Evidence Guild, retreats for men organised by the SVP, 'poor men paying from 1/- to 5/- each'; 'mothers who could not afford to pay much'; Girl Guides, Brownies, Boy Scouts, parish groups; Knights of St Columba; Vincentians; Catholic Young Men's Society.

Much encouragement was received from Archbishop Williams. When opening a bazaar in September 1930 he said: 'The value of a retreat is its spiritual force, and the work of the Community is a purely spiritual one . . . It is the quiet day or weekend, . . . that gives you the necessary fuel, not only for your own spiritual life, but for the work among your fellowmen.'

The diaries continue; and so do the retreats. In 1939 the men moved to a retreat house for men opened by the Jesuits nearby. The 1939-1945 war caused a break, partly because of air raids, but also because many of the community from Belgium and France found refuge here. Retreats began again in the 1950s and by selling more land, retreat bedrooms were built, the chapel was enlarged, and another conference room was added. Today the work continues; with a more ecumenical flavour perhaps, but still with this heartfelt desire: 'to make it possible for all to benefit from these retreats, and to provide the conditions in which the retreatant' withdrawn for a time from the noise of the world, and the cares of everyday life, truly listens to God "speaking to the heart".' (Rule of 1703.)

THE BOYS COUNTRY WORK SOCIETY

There are many interesting aspects of early ecumenism in the Prinknash archives. In one letter alone, I found out recently that in 1913 a society existed called the Boys Country Work Society. The purpose of this society was to procure farm work for unemployed town boys from poor families and to send them to live on a farm in the country. When a boy was thus employed an agreement was signed that the lad must attend the church or chapel of his own religious allegiance. Indeed, the society took the trouble to place every boy near the church of his own faith.

In 1913 the chairman of the society was a leading Anglican, Lord Shaftesbury. A Nonconformist was one of the vice-presidents. It is recorded that Cardinal Bourne displayed practical interest in the Boys Country Work Society and spoke at one of its meetings.

If any reader is interested, I can supply the reference. I wonder if and where any archives of the Society survive.

THE SMALL ARCHIVE'S COMPANION by Leo J. Ansell C.F.C.

In 1984 The Church Archivists' Society of Australia published The Small Archive, a handbook for church, order and school archivists by Winston Maike and Leo J. Ansell, which proved to be popular with members. Now, Bro. Leo Ansell, who is President of the Society, has prepared a new manual, The Small Archive's Companion, also for those in charge of small archives — churches, religious orders, parishes, schools, historical societies. The book is to be in A5 size, about three hundred pages in length, and will cover both familiar ground and also such less discussed matters as planning, archival housekeeping, public relations, help to family historians, writing histories, publicity, artefacts and museums. It will have a glossary, practical appendices, a bibliography and, of course, illustrations. The manual is to be published in June and copies may be ordered now from Bro. Leo Ansell C.F.C., Church Archivists' Society, P.O. Box 756, Toowoomba, Queensland 4350. The price for the U.K. is 15 Australian dollars, plus 8 dollars for postage by SAL (about three weeks delivery). Cheques should be drawn on an Australian bank and be in Australian dollars, but English currency is acceptable and travels as safely as cheques.

CATHOLIC ARCHIVES SOCIETY CONSTITUTION

NAME

1. The Society shall be called the Catholic Archives Society.

OBJECTS

2. (1) The Catholic Archives Society is concerned with the records and archives of the Roman Catholic Dioceses and their predecessors and of the Roman Catholic Foundations in England and Wales, in Scotland and in Ireland.
(2) The Society's object is to promote the care and preservation of the aforementioned records and archives in order that
 - a) they might be of greater administrative service to the Dioceses and religious authorities and other bodies;
 - b) they might be accessible for academic research and other cultural purposes.
- (3) To attain its object the Society shall promote appropriate activities and in particular the following:
 - a) the identification and listing of the aforementioned records and archives;
 - b) the provision of technical advice to members and the exchange of information;
 - c) the promotion of training opportunities where appropriate;
 - d) the arrangement of an annual conference/seminar;
 - e) the publication of information.

ANNUAL GENERAL MEETING

3. There shall be an annual General Meeting of the Society.

MEMBERSHIP

4. Membership is open to all who are interested in the Society's objectives as set out above.

SUBSCRIPTION

5. There shall be an annual subscription to the Society, the rate of which shall be determined from time to time by the Annual General Meeting of the Society.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF THE SOCIETY

6. The affairs of the Society shall be conducted by an executive committee which shall consist of the following officers: Chairman, Vice-Chairman, Secretary, Treasurer and Editor. All such officers shall be honorary. Each officer shall be elected for one year at the Annual General Meeting and shall be eligible for re-election.

COUNCIL

7. A council of the Society shall be appointed to assist and advise the Society in carrying out its objectives. The council shall consist of the aforementioned honorary officers ex officio and four other members representing different interests of the Society, who shall be elected at the Annual General Meeting.
The elected members of the council shall each serve a term of three years and may be re-elected.
The retiring Chairman becomes automatically a member of the council for the following year.
If officials are absent from the AGM and no indication is received beforehand personally or by letter to the Chairman or Secretary of their willingness to be re-elected, it will be assumed that they do not seek re-election.
8. The council shall have power to appoint sub-committees and to co-opt not more than two other members for the purpose of carrying out specific projects.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION

9. Amendments to the Constituion shall be made at the Annual General Meeting.

THE CATHOLIC ARCHIVES SOCIETY CONFERENCE, 1986

The seventh annual conference, held at the Hayes Conference Centre, Swanwick (Derbyshire), on 26–28 May, was attended by fifty-five religious and professional archivists, a larger number than on any previous conference.

His Lordship Bishop B.C. Foley, President, opened the proceedings on Monday evening, 26 May, by introducing His Lordship Bishop James McGuinness of Nottingham who welcomed the Society into his diocese. Sr Mary Leonora Major, M.M.M. then described the Central Archives of the Medical Mission Sisters. The next morning, 27 May, Miss Mary Finch, formerly County Archivist of Lincolnshire, spoke with delightful humour of the work of the professional archivist in county record offices, her talk being full of practical advice. She was followed by Dom Mark Dilworth, O.S.B., Keeper of the Scottish Catholic Archives, who outlined the archives in his charge at Columba House, Edinburgh, described the progress on cataloguing, and emphasised the need to be alert to rescue any archives at risk. During the afternoon, members visited the Derbyshire Record Office at Matlock, where Miss Joan Sinar, County Archivist, kindly gave up her Bank Holiday leave to guide two large parties in turn over the present Record Office, occupying cramped quarters in the County Council building, formerly Matlock Hydro, and the future Office in the exciting conversion of the former Ernest Bailey Grammar School. After tea, members were able to attend short meetings on diocesan and religious archives respectively.

The Society's AGM was held on Tuesday evening, 27 May, at which the Chairman (Fr Francis Edwards, S.J.) reported on the year's activities, the officers made their reports and were thanked for their work. Fr Edwards was congratulated on his appointment as Archivist to the Society of Jesus in Rome, and in his place Miss Judith Close was elected Chairman for 1987. Members observed a two-minute silence in tribute to Sr Josephine Murray S.N.D. and Sr Thelma Haines S.S.C.J., two active founder members who died during the year.

On Wednesday morning, 28 May, Bishop Foley gave a paper describing Catholic archives in the Lancashire Record Office and recalled his personal experience as a researcher in the Essex and Lancashire Record Offices. (A shortened version of the paper is published in this edition.) The conference concluded with a lively 'open forum' during which Fr Ventham C.M. spoke of his work in collecting archives at Walsingham, about which there is a short account in the Walsingham Newsletter for May 1986, and Fr Francis Isherwood described his work in collecting, arranging and publishing lists of the Portsmouth diocesan and parish archives. His mastery and use of the computer in his work encouraged members to ask for a full session on the computer in archival work at next year's Conference. Fr David Lannon, Archivist of Salford Diocese, spoke also on the value of the computer.

A full report of the Conference appears in the CAS Newsletter, No.7, Autumn 1986. The 1987 Conference will also be held at Swanwick, on 25–27 May 1987.

EDITORIAL NOTES

The Catholic Archives Society was founded in 1979 but as its formation was actively promoted for at least a year before, it is now some ten years old, in conception if not in birth. Its main objects were and are to promote the care and use of the archives of the Roman Catholic Church in the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland. Even though this is essentially a secondary role, the Society may claim a little credit for a better recognition of the value of religious archives, for appointments of archivists even, for improved facilities, standards and training, and, through Catholic Archives, for a wider appreciation of the character and content of religious archives.

Many religious archivists new to their duties or in relatively new congregations are dismayed by the paucity of actual documents and often have to rely for information on secondary sources when investigating the origins of their congregation. Then; a few photographs and cuttings are found, later, some accounts, diaries, letters, a house journal maybe, and so the archives slowly come to light. But the difficulties of finding the archives, collecting them together, finding accommodation, acquiring professional skills, justifying expenditure, and so on, can be very demoralising.

Several articles published previously have borne witness not only to the struggles of the founders of congregations as revealed in the archives but also to the perseverance of the archivists who have made the historians' work possible. Vatican II urged religious orders to examine their present vocational work in the light of the inspiration of their founders. This alone gave immediate status to the archives. Now, happily, if courage momentarily fails, religious archivists can remind themselves of the essential meaning and worth, of archives and of the vocational nature of their work by referring to the litany of phrases quoted by Sr Mary Angela Molloy in her article on the archives of the Sisters of Our Lady of the Missions in the 1987 edition, and particularly to the words of Pope Paul VI in 1963, repeated by Pope John Paul II in 1980:

. . . our pieces of paper are echoes and traces of the passage of the Lord Jesus in the world. Therefore, treating these papers with reverence means, on reflection, treating Christ with reverence . . . and preserving for ourselves and those who come after us the history of the transitus Domini in the world.

Although it is important to publish articles about major archives, it is also useful to describe those of relatively new congregations, especially when the experiences of the contributing archivists may be valuable to others in like circumstances. It is equally gratifying to publish research based on new-found archives, not least if it tells a story deriving from seemingly trivial material or on the chance survival of the papers. The present edition includes all three such articles. It is hoped, too, that the articles will encourage historians to look at Catholic archives as a potential source of original information for their research, whether ecclesiastical or secular. If so, the promoters of the Society will consider that their presumptuous efforts ten years ago were in some measure justified.

The contributors of the articles in this edition are warmly thanked for their hard work and generosity and, as ever, the Honorary Editor solicits copy for 1989 and beyond.

A SURVEY OF SOURCES FOR INFORMATION ON THE EIGHTY-FIVE MARTYRS

The Rev. Roland Connelly

The beatification by Pope John Paul II of another Eighty-five Martyrs has provoked a remarkable surge of interest among English Catholics and much has been written in the Catholic Press and elsewhere to ensure that reliable information is readily available to all. For most people, such outline accounts are sufficient, but for those who wish to know more and especially for those who desire a firmer historical base for their devotion and appreciation, a few simple signposts towards the more fruitful libraries and archives may be of some value. Experienced researchers in recusant history, of course, need no such guidance and each might well offer a different approach. This simplified survey of sources is not intended for them but is rather a gentle reassurance for non-specialists that the Cause of these Martyrs is firmly based on historical fact and the scholarly interpretation of contemporary documents.

It should, however, be acknowledged at once that the 16th and 17th centuries are not periods of history that are well-documented. It was not an age for prolific writing and with the passage of the years much of what was written has been lost or destroyed. Gaps in continuity appear fairly frequently in official records and personal papers have fared little better.

These factors, of course, also have their effect on Catholic records of the Martyrs, but, in addition, conditions of life for a persecuted people militate against the keeping of copious records. A man in danger for his life is not disposed to commit himself to Writing. Prudence and common sense demand caution; only essential information is conveyed in letters and papers. Word of mouth was a much safer method of communication and, if letters had to be written, then they were brief, frequently anonymous, non-committal and full of hidden meanings. Every care would be taken to avoid any detail which could be used as evidence against the writer or his friends, and, if the risk were taken of including such information, then the letter would be destroyed as soon as it was read.

Such conditions of secrecy were not required within the community of the Catholic exiles on the Continent. Visitors and refugees from England brought over much first-hand information about the Martyrs to the seminaries at Douai, Rheims and Rome. Sometimes they brought smuggled documents; more usually they just talked of what they had seen and heard. In the safety of exile, all could be written down and carefully preserved. Papers were printed and circulated; books were written. A valuable series of archives was inaugurated and many eye-witness accounts of martyrdom were included.

The Catholics of the time understood very well that a martyr is a martyr because of the manner and purpose of his death and these accounts therefore paid great attention to the details, often gruesome, of the deaths of the martyrs and said very little about their lives. Such treatment is perfectly valid and fully theological but it is disappointing for the modern researcher who wants to know more about the life and character of those who suffered so bravely for their faith. Sometimes this imbalance of information gives the impression that the biography of the martyr begins as he ascends the scaffold.

In all these circumstances then, it is surprising that today we have so much sound documentary evidence about the Martyrs. No doubt much more awaits discovery in various secret places and much work remains to be done in co-ordinating and assessing the various accounts of a very complicated people at a very complicated time. The modern researcher should have no fears of failure but should be ready to encounter the frustrations of many lacunae.

THE DOCUMENTS OF THE CAUSE

Much valuable work has been accomplished in recent years by the Vice-Postulator of the Cause of the Martyrs. Building on the researches of his learned predecessors and working with scholarly assistants, he has produced a detailed dossier of information about the Eighty-five Martyrs. The evidence and arguments of this dossier are the basis for the beatification of these Martyrs. The case was formally presented by Cardinal Basil Hume to the Sacred Congregation for the Causes of the Saints and this Sacred Congregation accepted after due deliberation that 'the cause, fact and constancy of martyrdom had been fully proved.' They were accordingly declared to be 'Blessed' by Pope John Paul II on 22 November 1987.

This dossier prepared by the Vice-Postulator of the Cause has been printed for limited circulation. Technically, in canonical terms, it is a positio. Its full title is 'Cause of Beatification and Canonisation of the Venerable Servants of God, George Haydock, priest and Companions put to death in England Wales and Scotland in defence of the Catholic Faith (1584-1679)'. Copies have been distributed to all the Catholic Bishops of England and Wales and should be available for consultation by researchers in most Diocesan Archives.

It should be stressed that this document (positio) is a most impressive work of scholarship and shows the results of extended and intensive academic research of the highest quality. Every fact is fully supported by contemporary evidence either by direct quotation from the original document or from authenticated copies. No attempt is made to cover up or fill in the inevitable gaps in information, and the assistance of other scholars, Catholic and non-Catholic is acknowledged.

Unlike the similar document on the Forty Martyrs, this one is written in English. It has been prepared in seven volumes and consists of 2,738 pages of typescript. In due time, there is no doubt that it will be recognised as a standard work of reference for all who seek further information about the Eighty-five Martyrs.

Again, some students may well be satisfied by what they find in the positio; others will wish to go further either by following up the references or by launching out independently. For the latter, the following simplified synopsis of sources may be of assistance.

A. GOVERNMENT SOURCES

First, there is much valuable information about the Martyrs to be sought in the Public Record Office. Such papers and records, written from the official State point of view are often hostile to Catholics, or at least neutral, and are therefore possessed of special worth in the Catholic cause.

The following Government records are useful for the ardent Catholic researcher.

1. RECORDS OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL

From 1540 onwards, the Privy Council kept its own registers and most of the minutes of its meetings have been preserved. These are prime sources for information about the Government's policy and action against the Catholics.

2. CHANCERY RECORDS

The Chancellor was in effect the King's private secretary and confidential adviser, and the Chancery Rolls therefore contain much information about the King's attitude to Catholics and his actions against them.

3. EXCHEQUER RECORDS

Twice a year, the Sheriffs and other officers of the Crown were obliged to present their financial reports to the Exchequer. These reports frequently refer to the fines and confiscations imposed on individual Catholics. Of particular value are the Recusant Rolls and the Tower Bills for Catholic prisoners.

4. STATE PAPERS

From the time of Henry VIII, the Secretary of State was the centre of the Crown's administrative organisation and all domestic and foreign business passed through his hands. It should be noted however that not all State Papers are in the Public Record Office; many have been kept by the families of some of the Secretaries of State, e.g. the very important Cecil papers are at Hatfield House; the Lansdowne papers and the Harleian papers are in the British Library.

B. LAW REPORTS are disappointing and provide little information about the Martyrs.

1. COURT OF THE KING'S BENCH

This was the Crown's personal court and its records are today in the Coram Rege Rolls in the Public Record Office. Only Father George Haydock of the Eighty-five Martyrs was tried in this court.

2. COUNTY ASSIZES

Of the Eighty-five Martyrs, thirty-eight were tried at the County Assizes but many of the trial records have been lost or accidentally destroyed. What little remains is in the Public Record Office, London.

3. NEWGATE SESSIONS

The county of Middlesex and the city of London had no County Assizes and nineteen of the present Martyrs were tried at the Newgate Sessions in London. Unfortunately, most of the London records were destroyed in the Great Fire of 1666 and the Middlesex records are incomplete.

4. GREAT SESSIONS OF WALES

Only two of the Martyrs were tried in Wales. The trial records for Blessed Charles Meehan are in the National Library of Wales at Aberystwyth, Dyfed, but the records for Blessed William Davies are missing.

5. THE COUNCIL OF THE NORTH

According to Rachel R. Reid, (The King's Council of the North, 1921) this Council was in practice 'the supreme court of justice north of the Trent, exercising the whole of the Crown's criminal and equitable jurisdiction with its ecclesiastical jurisdiction to boot' (page 285). During most of the reign of Queen Elizabeth it exercised in the northern counties a jurisdiction which 'substantially duplicated and occasionally conflicted with' that of the Assize Judges. Of the 24 Martyrs who were tried at York, 15 appeared before the Council of the North and the other 9 before the Assize Judges. It would seem that all the records of the Council of the North were kept in St Mary's Tower outside the city walls and all perished in the Parliamentary bombardment of 1644. The Assize records are fragmented and contain no information about the Martyrs.

C. PARISH REGISTERS

Information from Parish Registers is also very limited. There were no Catholic parish registers prior to 1657 and only in the middle of the eighteenth century did they become common. Some Church of England registers date from 1538 and many from 1598. Of necessity, Catholic names are frequently recorded in Anglican registers of baptism, marriage and burials, and this may cause some confusion unless it is remembered that co-operative Anglican clergymen frequently recorded Catholic baptisms in their own registers and that of necessity Catholics had to present themselves at the Church of England for legal marriage and be presented for burial.

D. UNIVERSITY RECORDS

At least thirteen of the Eighty-five Martyrs were members of Oxford University and another four were members of Cambridge University. Information about the Catholic undergraduates is plentiful in university and college records but their subsequent careers cannot always be traced because the Oath of Supremacy of 1559 obliged many Catholics to leave university before taking a degree.

These university records are readily accessible in most reference libraries in the books Register of the University of Oxford, by Boase and Clark, and for Cambridge in The Book of Matriculations and Degrees, by J. A. Venn.

E. CATHOLIC SOURCES

These consists of the many letters and papers written by or about the Martyrs, and also various reports on the state of the Mission which were sent to ecclesiastical authorities in Rheims or Rome. Some of these accounts have been lost; the remainder are scattered in several different archives today.

F. SEMINARY RECORDS

From the establishment of the English College, Douai, in 1568, careful records were kept of all students preparing for the priesthood. This practice inaugurated by Cardinal William Allen, the first President, was followed in the other English seminaries on the Continent: Rome 1579, Valladolid 1589, and Seville 1592.

The archives of the English College, Seville, were confiscated by the State in 1773 and have unfortunately disappeared, but the registers of the other seminaries have been published by the Catholic Record Society in volumes X and XI for the Doai Diaries, in volumes XXXVII and XL for the Venerable English College, Rome, and in volume XXX for the English College, Valladolid.

Jesuit records have been carefully preserved in Rome, Stonyhurst and Farm Street, and Brother Henry Foley used them extensively in his Records of the English Province SJ (published 1877-1883).

G. CATALOGUES OF MARTYRS

These are lists of the names of those people who were regarded by the Catholics of their own time as true martyrs. They were compiled from the accounts of eye-witnesses and are powerful testimony to the immediate honour that was shown to those who died for their faith. This recognition of martyrdom by popular acclaim still plays an important part in the formal acceptance of the Universal Church and the name of each of the Eighty-five Martyrs is included in most of these Catalogues.

The earliest known Catalogue of Martyrs is that of Dr Nicholas Sanders and is dated for 1585. At least eighteen such Catalogues were in print by 1630. Most are still in manuscript form but John Gerard's Catalogue of about 1594 has been published by the Catholic Record Society in volume V.

THE COLLECTION AND PRESERVATION OF DOCUMENTS AND INFORMATION

The collection and preservation of State documents is the responsibility of the State and all archivists and historians are aware of the success and failure of the Government officers engaged in this important work.

For Catholic papers and writings however, there was no comparable system. The organisation and structures of the Church in England were in disarray for most of the martyr period. In the early days, the lack of bishops and the practical absence of authority prevented the appointment of any responsible officer to safeguard the archives. It was left to individuals to do what they could on their own initiative and the result is that much has been lost and what has been preserved has to be sought in various places.

CARDINAL WILLIAM ALLEN (1532-1594)

Cardinal William Allen as Prefect of the English Mission and President of the Douai College did what he could to collect together relevant historical documents but his efforts were limited by the exigencies of other responsibilities. His original collection was augmented by his successors as President of Douai and by members of staff through the years.

This collection of historical papers is now in the archives of the Archbishop of Westminster at Our Lady of Victories, Kensington, London W8 6AF.

THE CHALCEDON CATALOGUE (1628)

This is perhaps the most valuable of all the Catalogues of Martyrs. It was compiled by Richard Smith (1568—1655), Bishop of Chalcedon and the second Vicar Apostolic of England, and was submitted to the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda in 1628 in response to a direct request from Pope Urban VIII for information about the English Martyrs.

The importance of the Chalcedon Catalogue is the authenticity of its detail. Bishop Smith was helped in his research by his Notary Apostolic, Father William Harewell, who had produced his own Catalogue, known as the Paris Catalogue, a few months earlier. Together they not only investigated all the known Catholic sources of information but also they had access to law reports which have subsequently been lost. As all sources are quoted, Bishop Smith's work establishes the fact that of the Eighty-five Martyrs, 11 are mentioned in the Newgate Prison Register, 18 in the York Assize Register and 4 in other County Assize Registers.

The Chalcedon Catalogue can therefore give for each Martyr who suffered between 1570 and 1616 not only his place of birth but also the charge on which he was condemned and the place and date of his execution.

A copy of the Chalcedon Catalogue is in the Archives of Westminster at Our Lady of Victories, Kensington, London W8 6AF.

THE GRENE COLLECTIONS

Father Christopher Grene SJ (1629—1697) spent thirty-three of his life at the English College, Rome, where on his own initiative he devoted himself to the collection of documents about the Martyrs. His major work was to make careful and accurate copies of the originals, and Father John Morris SJ (1826—1893) has maintained that Father Grene did 'more than any other man to save the records of their sufferings from perishing and to transmit to us materials for the history of the time of persecution in England' (Troubles of our Catholic Forefathers, III, p.3).

Father Grene produced ten volumes of these Collectanea and distinguished each by a different letter of the alphabet. Some of his work has been lost, but most has survived and, although somewhat rearranged, is now preserved in three archives.

In the Archives of Stonyhurst College, Blackburn, Lancashire BB65 9PZ, are Collections lettered B, C, M, N, and P. These include letters and papers addressed to Father Robert Persons SJ in Spain, 1588—1594; transcripts of contemporary papers on the English Martyrs and in Collection P two volumes of more than 600 ff., consisting chiefly of the letters and other writings of Father Robert Persons SJ, as well as some letters of Father (Saint) Robert Southwell SJ and Father Henry Garnett SJ.

Collection E is in the possession of Oscott College, Sutton Coldfield, West Midlands, B73 5AA, and consists of six papers by different writers from the end of the sixteenth century. Two papers are general accounts of the persecution in England, one is an account of the execution of Mary, Queen of Scots in 1587, and three refer to the persecution in the north of England and especially in York.

Collection F is at the Venerable English College, Rome, and is made up of sixteen documents. Some are written in different hands and some are printed. The documents numbered 1, 2 and 3 are of particular interest because, although of unknown authorship, they are probably the oldest. They are dated respectively for about 1588, sometime in the 1590s, and probably 1595.

BISHOP RICHARD CHALLONER

Another important collector of historical information was Bishop Richard Challoner (1691—1781), but unlike Father Grene he was also a writer. He spent twenty-six years at the English College, Douai, and for his last ten years there was Vice-President. During this time he used the extensive Douai Records to compile his own Catalogue of Martyrs.

He returned to the English Mission in 1730 and became in 1740 Coadjutor Bishop to Bishop Benjamin Petre the Vicar Apostolic of London. He succeeded as Vicar Apostolic in 1758.

Bishop Challoner published his Memoirs of the Missionary Priests in 1741—2 and his work remains a classic to this day. He was a meticulous scholar, always careful to check his references and quote his sources and his book was so popular that there were fourteen editions or reprints between 1803 and 1879. Much new information about the Martyrs has come to light since the time when he was writing but these fruits of more modern research are additions to his information rather than corrections and he still enjoys a high reputation for historical accuracy.

In his own preface to Part II of the Memoirs, Bishop Challoner acknowledges that much of his information has come from the Archives of the English College, Douai, and from the Archives of the Jesuit College at St Omers, as well as from the records of the English Benedictines and the English Franciscans formerly at Douai. He pays tribute also to Mr Cuthbert Constable, M.D. of Burton Constable near Hull, who provided him with 'useful books and manuscripts'.

The Memoirs of the Missionary Priests was written in London by a busy bishop, but Father Alban Butler was commissioned to search the overseas archives for the requisite documents and then copy them for the Bishop's use. These transcripts are now in the Archives of the Birmingham Archdiocese at Cathedral House, Queensway, Birmingham, B4 6EU.

VICE-POSTULATOR OF THE CAUSES

Reference has already been made to the importance of the positio produced by the Vice-Postulator of the Causes of the Eighty-five Martyrs and accepted by the Sacred Congregation for the Causes of Saints in 1987.

In fact, the formal process of enquiry into the Causes of the English Martyrs began shortly after the Restoration of the Hierarchy in 1850. Petitions were presented to Rome by the third Synod of Westminster in 1859 and again by the Synod of Westminster in 1866. Both petitions were refused as they were not made in proper canonical form.

From such experiences it became evident that if the Causes of the Martyrs were to prosper in Rome, then a scholarly organiser was required in England. What was needed was a man of experience and ability, a man familiar with Canon Law and the intricacies of the Roman Curia, a historian with a special enthusiasm for the Martyrs. Such a man presented himself in the person of Father John Morris SJ (1826—1893) and in 1874, with the permission of the Jesuit authorities, he was officially appointed to be the first Vice-Postulator of the Causes.

Father Morris was a convert with all the enthusiasm of a convert of his day. He had become a Catholic while still an undergraduate at Cambridge University in 1846. Ordained for the Diocese of Northampton in 1849, he became a canon of the Diocese in 1852. The following year he was appointed Vice-Rector of the Venerable English College, Rome, where he gained experience in Roman ways. By 1861 he was a priest of the Westminster Archdiocese and served first as Cardinal Nicholas Wiseman's personal secretary and then performed the same duties for Cardinal Henry Edward Manning. In 1867, Canon John Morris became a Jesuit.

During all these years of his priesthood, Father Morris maintained his great interest in the Cause of the Martyrs and, despite the demands of his exacting ecclesiastical responsibilities, he continued his study and research. His earlier work has been described by Joseph Gillow:

In the Cause of the English Martyrs, he addressed a statement to Cardinal Wiseman before the Second Council of Westminster, May 12, 1855; documents prepared by him were embodied in the petition of the Third Council of Westminster, July 16, 1859; he drafted a new petition to Rome from the English Hierarchy, January 19, 1871 (Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics, Vol. V, p.129).

And to all this must be added Father Morris's writings, the most important of which were the three series of The Troubles of our Catholic Forefathers, which began publication in 1872.

From 1874, Father Morris worked in a part-time capacity as Vice-Postulator of the Causes, but in 1886 he suffered a breakdown in health and his Jesuit Superiors released him for full-time work. In 1890 he became the leader of the team of writers based at Farm Street, but Oratorians, Benedictines, Redemptorists, secular priests and laymen were involved as well as Jesuits. The Cause of the Martyrs benefited considerably from the researches of such eminent scholars as Father J.H. Pollen SJ, Brother Henry Foley SJ, Joseph Gillow, Father T.E. Bridgett C.Ss.R., Dom Bede Camm OSB, Father E.H. Burton, and J.S. Hansom.

Father Morris' historical papers and transcripts are in the Archives of the Vice-Postulator for the Cause of the English and Welsh Martyrs, at 114 Mount Street, London, W1Y 6AH. In the same Archives are the papers of his successors, Father J.H. Pollen SJ, who was Vice-Postulator from 1900 until 1923, and Father C.H. Newdigate SJ, who was Vice-Postulator from 1923 until 1937.

THE CATHOLIC RECORD SOCIETY

In 1855 Lord Acton and some of his friends attempted the foundation of a Lingard Club with the purpose of publishing a catalogue of documents of interest for English Catholic history, but the project failed to gain support.

It was not until 1904 that a further attempt was made when Archbishop Francis Bourne of Westminster presided over a gathering of Catholic scholars and founded the Catholic Record Society. The Society's objects were stated to be 'the transcribing, printing, indexing and distributing to its members, of the Catholic Registers of Baptism, Marriages and Deaths and other old records of the Faith, chiefly personal and genealogical, since the Reformation in England and Wales.'

In 1952, a new constitution was adopted and the aim of the Society was now defined as 'the advancement of education in connection with the history of Roman Catholicism in England and Wales since the Reformation.'

With such terms of reference it will be noted that there is ample opportunity for the publication of original documents as well as writings on the Martyrs and other aspects of Catholic history, and in fact the subject of the Martyrs is extensively covered in the annual volume of records and in the journal of research, entitled Recusant History.

The Catholic Record Society also states that although it 'directs its main efforts to making historical materials available in print, it also helps researchers in a number of other ways, especially by offering the use of its own rich collection of books, manuscripts, microfilms, indexes and slides', now housed by courtesy of the Society of Jesus in its library at 114 Mount Street, London, W1Y 6AH.

CONCLUSION

This survey makes no pretence to be precise or comprehensive. It can serve only as a broad outline of what is available and where it is situated. Some archives of value and importance have not been mentioned and specialists on the history of the Martyrs might deplore some of the omissions, but even this very generalised survey of sources should suffice to convince the hesitant that our knowledge of the Martyrs is based on sound historical research and if doubts should still persist, then the original documents in their various archives await inspection.

Note: Fr Connelly is the author of The Eighty-Five Martyrs, published by McCrimmons, Great Wakering, Essex, 1987, containing a short biography of each of the martyrs, available through C.T.S. and other bookshops, price £4.75p.

THE GENERAL ARCHIVES OF THE MARIST FATHERS

The Rev. Anthony Ward, SM.

The congregation of the Marist Fathers, officially known as the Society of Mary, is one of a number of religious groups resulting from a sequence of acts of foundation that date, according to one's viewpoint, to the years 1812 or 1816. On 23 July, 1816, a group of companions from the major seminary of St Irenaeus in Lyons made their way up to the prominent Marian shrine of Fourviere and there made a solemn pledge to found the Society of Mary, which was conceived as a multi-branched entity open to priests, men and women lay religious and lay people.

In 1836 the Society of Mary received its canonical approbation as a congregation of pontifical right, but the name had in its canonical sense been restricted by Rome to the branch of priests, otherwise known as Marist Fathers. The canonical nature of relations between them, the flourishing branch of teaching brothers now known as Marist Brothers of the Schools, and the branches of the Marist Sisters and the Third Order of Mary remained ambiguous for some years. The same was to be true of the congregation now known as the Missionary Sisters of the Society of Mary, who in the course of the latter half of the century emerged in complex fashion, initially as a Third Order Regular for the Missions of Oceania. All these are now independent congregations of pontifical right, bound together by a common origin and history, and common spiritual tradition. They possess their own centres of administration at various levels and maintain their own archives.

Development of the Marist General Archives

From their formal establishment as a religious congregation on 24 September 1836, the Marist Fathers have maintained a general archive. For the first half-century the superior general operated out of the city of Lyons, which with the neighbouring episcopal seat of Belley represented one of the twin locations of the first foundations. In 1880 the Marist Fathers shared the fate of other religious congregations in France, and for a time the archives were harboured by lay benefactors. When, after some easier years, the religious discrimination intensified at the beginning of this century, the general archives were despatched to the house of Differt in Belgium. The administration remained in Lyons in scattered apartments on the hillside of Fourviere, its activities giving rise to a new fund of documents which were sent by rail from Lyons to Differt in early August 1914. Some were lost in the flames of a railway carriage at Longwy en route. During the War the general archives suffered no loss. In 1922 the General Administration established itself at Moncalieri on the outskirts of Turin, taking with it current papers. A part no longer urgently needed for consultation was despatched to the house at Via Cernaia, Rome, surviving with very minor losses another railway fire on the way.

In 1925 the present general house at Via A. Poerio 63, on the hill of Monteverde Vecchio, was built and included a locale for the archives, the various elements of which were transported without loss from Differt, Moncalieri and Via Cernaia, and given a first organisation by the competent efforts of Father Henri Beaune. The Second World War brought no losses. From 1950 Father Louis Schwehr began a second process of organisation in modern metal furnishings and endowed the general archives with their present shape.

In the process of this vast work, some mistakes of policy were made in the amalgamation of fonds but the steps were recorded with care and no insuperable problems resulted. Two further sections were reunited from Lyons in the 1950s and 1960s, one of the archives of the procurator for the missions of Oceania at Lyons, the other a trunk containing very significant materials forming part of the archives of the bursar general which had been forgotten in an attic in the city since 1880. In the 1970s a small section of pre-1898 materials from the archives of the procurator for the missions at Sydney was also annexed.

Recent Organisation

In the mid-1950s, interest in the history and spirituality of the Marists prompted the first published scientific researches. Critical editions of the Fathers' Constitutions appeared in 1955. The twelve years that followed were given to the preparation of an exemplary and exhaustive edition in four ample volumes of documentation on the history of the Marist Fathers to September 1836, Origines Maristes. At that point the rush of activity connected with the renewal called for by the Council caused a reorientation in the activity of personnel assigned to duties in this area. While the archives continued to be administered with high competence, and critical research undertaken, the immediate demands of a spiritual assimilation of material at grass roots level had to be given considerable priority. The chief protagonist in all these efforts was Father Jean Coste, for much of the period 1955—1982 archivist general, principal editor of all the critical publications, and a scholar of first rank with noted contributions prior to this work in Septuagint textual study and, concomitant with it, in medieval Roman topography.

A change of incumbent coincided with the preparation of major renovations in the house which necessarily encompassed the archives. One major problem was damp in the otherwise very pleasant semi-basement location. The decision taken was to change location and construct a new locale in a large library at first-floor level. To cope with problems of weight, a heavily reinforced floor had to be introduced and other adaptations made. The work was recently completed, the result being a compact depository area with considerably increased storage capacity (1000 linear metres), together with a pleasant and spacious consultation room.

Classification and Arrangement

There is nothing revolutionary or exceptional in the classification scheme of the Marist general archives. One major block covers the various departments of the central government, the acts of the various legislative and consultative bodies within the congregation, and its dealings with the Roman Curia, dioceses, and other religious congregations and orders. A second covers by province, region and house the establishments of the Society around the world and their activities insofar as they involve the general administration. Finally, a third section consists in the individual files on Marist novices and religious.

All these sections are organised by a combination of decimal classification and code letters, the subdivisions repeating themselves as far as the nature of the material permits. The first section is arranged by a six-figure scheme alone, 000.000 to 999.999, the second by a geographical code (e.g. A for Anglia, or ONC — Oceania, Nova Caledonia for the mission of New Caledonia) followed by a repeated five-figure numerical scheme (e.g. 52.018), and the third section is arranged alphabetically by name of person within certain categories, such as Professi Clerici, Non Professi, Egressi, Episcopi. At times the more developed scheme is a little a priori, but on the whole it works quite adequately. A problem arises with expansion and at some stage it may be necessary to add either an umbrella scheme, of which with necessary intercalations the current scheme would supply the subdivisions, or to add a system of parallel pragmatic codes of less obvious mnemonic value but easily processed by computer.

The Oceania Material

Probably the most significant, and certainly the most frequently consulted part of the archives consists in correspondence sent to either the superior general or the various mission procurators at Lyons, Paris, London, Sydney and elsewhere from the island territories of the Pacific evangelized by the Marist family. Although all branches of the latter have been involved in the common enterprise, naturally only material from members of our congregation is held in this major subdivision of the second section referred to above. The territories involved include the present states of Fiji, New Zealand, New Caledonia, Samoa (Western and American), Solomons, Tonga, Vanuatu, Wallis-Fortuna, and the Bougainville province of Papua-New Guinea.

In an area where colonial Western presence was often slow to establish itself in organised fashion, where colonial administrations were at minimum staff levels, or where for one reason or another colonial officialdom might be suspected of a certain bias, the value of this correspondence is very high indeed. We find an interest shown in it by linguists, anthropologists and ethnologists, philatelists, geologists and meteorologists, historians of the colonial powers, of particular events, of commerce and shipping, all this apart from its value for directly ecclesiastical history.'

One of the problems is how to make it suitably accessible. The writings of St Peter Chanel, protomartyr of Oceania, were published in critical edition in 1960, and extracts of correspondence have been published by the Marist Missionary Sisters. Some transcriptions of important material have been made recently. Some microfilming has been done, and though at the moment it covers only a part of the holdings, it is hoped to carry this forward in collaboration with university institutions in the next few years. A persistent underlying problem is the lack of anything approaching comprehensive indexing, which tends to make the kind of consultation that is usually necessary, with quick cross-checking and comparison, very cumbersome. Traditional access risks damage to materials often in a delicate state, and moreover the conditions in which they were penned in their cramped nineteenth-century French script and the vicissitudes of their journeyings make rapid skimming more or less impossible.

There are additional problems. With a view to edification, and the solicitation of support for the missionary effort, many of the letters were published, but nearly always in edited and not rarely in 'improved' form. Some of the published letters have no obvious manuscript equivalent, which may mean that the original was lost, that authorship was re-ascribed for publication, or a fictitious letter compiled from composite sources.

The preservation of archives in the Pacific territories themselves cannot be said to have been accorded special priority by the first generations of missionaries, and it is an area that today presents considerable preservation problems, even for the archival services of the governments. In the last decade especially, Fr Theo Cook has been responsible for rescuing materials and setting up depositories for the various diocesan and Marist jurisdictions that are the modern successors of the old prefectures and vicariates apostolic. There was no alternative to a thorough simultaneous programme of microfilming, and copies of these films are available in the general archives, of which they represent the partial but indispensable complement. Father Cook is due to succeed as archivist general in 1988, an appointment which should ensure cohesion of effort with regard to the Oceania material, and carry forward the programme in other sectors.

In the meantime, a beginning has been made in the production of computerized indexes, which is the only hope for tackling the question of safe and increased access within a reasonable space of time. We are watching with interest the development of commercially available automatic precis programmes and techniques for digitalization of video-images and the reading of typed and printed material. In the next years, this area of activity will have to be given close consideration. The pressures are not merely conservational, since political, religious and cultural developments in the Pacific show that the good of the peoples of the Pacific and the young churches established there requires that open facilities be available as a matter of urgency to the resource material on their complex histories.

The Mayet Writings

The Marist archives house one particular item which is of capital importance for the history of the Society.

In the October of 1837, Gabriel-Claude Mayet, a young priest of the diocese of Lyons took a concrete step towards the implementation of advice given to him by the Cure d'Ars in 1832 and entered the Society of Mary as a postulant. Some six weeks later he met in person Father Jean-Claude Colin, founder and first general of the Marist Fathers, and was so taken by the impression that the encounter made upon him that he made extensive notes of the advice he received at the time. Further contacts led him to make further jottings until the point where the idea dawned upon him that these notes of Father Colin's remarks might be of interest to others among the brethren. From that moment, Mayet revamped his enterprises, procured himself other notebooks, and set himself to make his notes no longer for purely personal consumption, mixed with his own spiritual journal, but for a wider potential audience. This in turn led to a wider selection and great bulk of material recorded.

For some years Mayet had been dogged by a malady of the throat, which became a cause for great concern in the early summer of 1839. A year's convalescence with his family gave him the leisure that germinated the idea of reshaping his enterprise of notes yet again. He prepared a scheme covering a whole series of stout notebooks, recopied material already collected and laid himself ready to become a chronicler of the words and deeds of Father Colin on a considerable scale. Even the redistribution of material already gathered required recourse to friends as assistant copyists. On his return to community he was practically mute and remained so for the rest of his life. An experimental two years as studies supervisor in a small boarding-school revealed the practical impossibility for him of exercising any pastoral functions and left him with complete leisure to dedicate to his self-appointed task as chronicler.

Mayet established around himself what can only be described as a veritable industry, with copyists, reports from third persons, consultations, revisions, amplifications, commentaries, verifications of fact. The result was a series of initially nine volumes and then supplements, concentrating on the Society and its founder, with other notebooks on the side for the assembling of parallels from the history of other founders, for the gathering of biographical materials on various admired confreres within the Society, and suchlike. Upon the resignation of Father Colin in 1854, Mayet considered that his own principal mission was complete, though he continued to revise and have recopied his acquired materials. Much of his effort in this later period was directed towards biographical studies, and he published several, and prepared others in manuscript including one of his close friend and former fellow-Marist, St Peter Julian Eymard, who had become the Founder of the Congregation of the Blessed Sacrament Fathers.

Mayet's material is at times uneven, and strewn with banal or lengthy excursus on various points of piety. Yet it must be said that over a short period of time he trained himself to be a most reliable noter of Colin's remarks and an astute and accurate observer not only of his strengths but of his weaknesses, reported in confidential sections of the Memoirs with a candour, integrity and lack of either bias or sensationalism that is deeply impressive. On the question of accuracy there are a number of comparisons possible with surviving documents which he heard merely read or independent transcriptions of conversations or discourses. All cases examined show Mayet displaying considerable fidelity to his oral source and missing little of substance.

All in all, the Mayet manuscripts are a vast quarry of lively and accurate historical material concerning the central government of the Society and covering the crucial period of the generalate of the founder, a period for which other written sources in terms of acts of the central administration are meagre. They have been extensively drawn upon in critical edition to provide anecdotal material on the period prior to 1836 and make up the major part of one volume of the work Origines Maristes, and have provided the material for two other stout volumes on the words and deeds of Father Colin entitled in French Entretiens Spirituels de Jean-Claude Colin and Quelques Souvenirs sur Jean-Claude Colin, and translated into English as A Founder Speaks and A Founder Acts.

Apart from internal Marist history, the Mayet writings report much material echoing as it were blow by blow contemporary events, penned as they often were a few minutes after recreation conversations. They also incorporate lengthy private reporting of various Marists on their participation in, say, negotiations with the Roman Curia in the heat of an 1842 summer, in pastoral preaching in Lyons in the 1840s, the events of the 1848 uprisings in that city. Substantial material on the bishops and administrations of the two dioceses of Lyons and Belley is also to be found there.

The three volumes mentioned above as drawing on Mayet represent only a fraction of the historically useful material, as is clearly demonstrated by an exhaustive systematic index prepared in the late 'fifties by Father Gaston Lessard. This index is now being computerized and plans are under way to undertake a critical transcription of the entire Mayet material on a computer word-processing program.

Further Materials Indexed

The shocks of the anticlerical outbreaks in France in the early 1880s and 1900s and the subsequent movements of the general administration provoked a certain limited measure of decentralization. In the 1880s and 1890s this led to formal division of provinces which once again reduced the administrative dependence on the general administration and the process was carried further with national provinces and vice-provinces in the years between the Wars. Thus, the most ample coverage is concentrated largely on the fifty-year period from the approbation in 1836, though for Oceania the dependence on the administration and thus the bulk and quality of documentation continues for some areas at least until the First World War and even after.

There remain other prime sources for the Society's general history and that of its development in France. The Mayet material is joined by some 600 extant letters of Jean-Claude Colin, of which the critical transcription on to computer word-processing program is well advanced and will permit extensive new indexing to replace the partial traditional card-indexes that already exist.

Other material, such as the minutes of the general council (where these exist) already have traditional indexes, while many documents have only schematic guides or none at all. The profession records have been computerized, and the 'obediences' or postings, are soon to be also. The overall cumulative result is that, despite the present gaps, it is becoming possible to do computer-based searching of considerable quantities of material by proper names, dates, and other terms chosen at random. This holds out great promise for future research, the more so as the general administration is committed to further transcription and indexing programmes.

Subsidiary Library

Because of the concentration on a congregational level over many years on the mission territory of Western Oceania, it is not surprising there has been gathered a considerable quantity of published material whether produced by the Society itself, by the other Marist congregations, by their individual members, or by others. This, together with a good collection of material on the historical context of our origins and early development in France, is constituted as a subsidiary library. Insofar as finances and circumstances allow, this material is backed up with current purchases that serve better to shape coherent support collections. All these publications are classified according to a modern system and their catalogue is on computer database.

Among such book materials, an almost complete collection of the publications of the mission presses in the various vicariates are of especial interest, not least to those studying the languages of the region.

Pages Library

The Society received in 1841 an ample private library collected by Monsieur l'abbé Etienne Pages, dean of the state theological faculty in Lyons. These books stem in large part from various private and semi-public libraries in the Lyons area before the Revolution, and treat of ecclesiastical subjects, with extensive additional sections on topics such as secular history and travel. Unfortunately, in the course of its voyagings (which paralleled those of the general archives) further sections on natural history, medicine, mathematics and physics were lost. Pages was a moral theologian with a fanatical interest in the question of usury, and as would be expected gave considerable attention to this in his acquisition of books and pamphlets. This library (currently 12,000 vols) is enormous interest for a range of topics connected with research appropriate to the materials of the main archival deposits, and is consulted steadily in its own right for areas such as the anthropology of travel, the history of patristic studies, general history of thought, of moral theology, and by those preparing scholarly bibliographies, as well as for its bindings.

Special British Interest

Apart from the question of colonial history, there is a largely unexplored fund of material concerning early Marist contacts in London in the 1840s, prior to the establishment of a Marist community at Spitalfields in the East End in 1850. Additionally, of course, there is material documenting the Marist Fathers' activities in England — from the early years of this century, especially in the field of education. A stronger presence, of course, was developed in Ireland already from the 1860s, including the Catholic University School in Dublin. Note that from 1889 to 1952 there was a single Anglo-Irish province, preceded by a vice-province of England, Ireland and America, from 1876 and an Anglo-Irish vice-province from 1879. Prior to 1876 Marist houses in the British Isles were attached to the Paris Province.

Advice and Consultation Facilities

The Marist Fathers are fortunate in having either among the archives personnel or among collaborators within the city a considerable resource of linguists, practised historians, people who know well especially the Pacific territories mentioned above, and others with lengthy experience of the actual archival materials and their arrangement. Moreover, there is an increasing network of scholars in a range of fields who have based research at least in part on these materials, and with whom contact is maintained.

While clearly the staff cannot undertake researchers' work for them, they accord scholarly hospitality and facilitation of research a high priority. Advice is willingly given on the shaping of research projects and their feasibility from the point of view of likely yield of relevant materials. Obviously, this kind of personal service provided makes it essential for intending researchers to make clear arrangements well in advance of a proposed visit — i.e. weeks beforehand rather than minutes — and to wait for confirmation replies. In restricted circumstances it is possible to consider granting small study burses to support cost of research.

Experimental programmes of short 'research apprenticeships' for small groups of postgraduate students have been arranged with various university institutions, and are likely to be developed for the future.

It goes without saying that access to the archives is subject to the sole restrictions that the research project is scholarly and that the researcher undertakes to respect conventional regulations.

The postal address of the archives is: Archivista, Via A. Poeri 63, 00152 ROMA, Italy, and the telephone number (Italian time 8.30 — 12.30 a.m., 4.00-7.00 p.m.) is Rome 58.99.041.

The other Marist congregations maintain their historical archives at the following addresses:

Marist Brothers: Fratelli Maristi, Piazzala M. Ghampagnat 2, 00144 Rome, Italy.

Marist Sisters: Soeurs Maristes, 'Bon Repos', 01300 Belley, France.

Marist Missionary Sisters: Suore Missionarie della Societa di Maria, Via Cassia 1243, 00189 Rome, Italy.

THE CORRESPONDENCE OF GUIDO GEZELLE: ITS VALUE FOR THE HISTORY OF THE CHURCH IN ENGLAND

Piet Couttenier

1. The correspondence of the nineteenth-century Flemish poet and priest Guido Gezelle (1830—1899) comprising some ten thousand letters, mostly written to Gezelle, represents an important source for the history of Catholicism in England and, especially for the investigation of the relation between the Church in England and Flanders, or Belgium, it constitutes one of the records which cannot be overlooked.

The archives, first in private possession, then from 1930 preserved in the birth-house of Gezelle (Rolleweg, Bruges), which was adapted as a museum, and now lodged in the city library of Bruges ('Biekorf', Kuiperstraat 3), have frequently been used by several critics and researchers of the life and work of Gezelle, notably his first biographers, C. Gezelle, nephew of the poet, and A. Walgrave,¹ and the editorial team of the first (partly) critical and complete edition (1930—1939) of the work of Gezelle, the so-called Jubileumuitgave. However, only a part of the correspondence was included: the great bulk was left undiscussed. Only in the 1960s, when a new society for the investigation and promotion of the work, the Guido Gezelle-Genootschap (1961), was founded, was interest in the correspondence aroused. Christine D'haen drew up a first inventory.² Meanwhile, at the University of Antwerp (U.F.S.I.A.), the Centre for the Study of G. Gezelle (founded in 1966 by R.F. Lissens, dir., J. Boets) started with a systematic processing of the archives by microfilm copies.³ Starting from this base, four students at the University of Ghent (A. Deprez) worked on an edition of the letters written in English.⁴

2. The importance of the Gezelle correspondence for the Church in England is connected with historical and biographical coincidences. The life and work of Gezelle were closely bound with important developments of Catholicism in England. By a conjunction of circumstances you can, as it were, follow in it the ups and downs of the 'anglophilia' in Flanders between 1850 and 1900. In the meantime, the letters do provide us with different facts about the situation of Catholicism in England.

The spectacular revival of Catholicism in England (1829—1850) caused an intense interaction between England and the Continent (France, Belgium, Germany and Italy), further increased after the restoration of the hierarchy in 1850, which accelerated a revolution already started. The revival involved a great need for schools for the growing Catholic population and, hence, a promotion campaign from 1840 onwards of especially French and Flemish schools providing a fashionable Catholic and 'French' education on the Continent. The Continent also supplied the great need of priests, seminaries, schools and convents. Flemish Orders founded convents or schools (to mention two of them where our priest Gezelle was known or visited: the Xaverians at Clapham and the Deaf and Dumb Institute of Boston Spa), and numerous (Flemish) priests left their homeland to go on mission in their second country. ⁵ Flemish priests such as Canon P. Benoit (Manchester), P. de Blon (id.) and L. Maes (Westbury) worked as intermediaries or promoting agents for new recruits. In this way an intense correspondence came about between Flanders and England. In England several important priests developed a keen interest for continental countries, e.g. G. Spencer, Cardinal N. Wiseman, Th. Grant (Southwark), W. Turner (Salford), many of them correspondents of Gezelle. On the other side, in Belgium, and especially in the diocese of Bruges, ⁶ some leading priests and dignitaries showed an anglophilia which spread very rapidly among young Catholics including Guido Gezelle, already a student in Bruges in the 1840s, Mgr Malou, Felix de Bethune (later Secretary of the Bruges diocese and intimate friend of Gezelle), D. De Haerne (founder of Boston Spa) and Mgr Faict. Also in Louvain and Brussels (abbe Donnet), English-minded priests were working for the 'Crusade' of England.

In this context of an anglophilian movement on the Continent, reaching its high point between 1840 and 1870, we have to place the activities (and the 'English' correspondence) of Gezelle as priest (ordained in 1854), as teacher and leader of the English boys at the minor seminary of Roulers (1854—1860), as director of the English College and vice-rector of the Anglo-Belgian Seminary at Bruges (1860—1865), as curate and as chaplain of the English Convent at Bruges (1865—1899). And, as a covering element and a thread running through his life, we should mention especially his overwhelming and idealistic desire to 'conquer' England (and the world) himself. This hope inspired his life (and that of many others), and likewise his work as artist, as he was deeply influenced by the English spirit, the way of thinking and literature of that time — he was acquainted with the works of Faber, Moore, Burns, Keble, Neale, Newman and others, and his own famous translation of Hiawatha, written by the American poet H. Longfellow.

3. The priestly career of Guido Gezelle had a rather modest character. In spite of his uncommon capacities, he never occupied an important ecclesiastical place or held a high office in the education field. In fact, all records about Gezelle are only important because of his exceptional qualities as poet. That does not alter the fact that his English correspondence contains many pithy details for anyone interested in the daily life of nineteenth-century Catholic England.

The number of letters of important people in the English ecclesiastical hierarchy is limited. Only during his time as vice-rector of the Anglo-Belgian Seminary at Bruges did he write directly to dignitaries in England responsible for the interchange of students and priests between England and Flanders. We know that Gezelle had a close friendship and affiliation with Cardinal Wiseman. Their first contact dates back to 1858; Wiseman visited Gezelle in Bruges in 1862, 1863 and 1864. Nevertheless, only few letters of Wiseman to Gezelle are known and few of these are significant. The special interest of Gezelle's English correspondence should rather be looked for in the letters of and to Gezelle as teacher, and in the second place in letters of artists (such as J. Weale), working in the spirit of the Gothic revival of Christian Art, and then of English middle-class citizens, for whom Gezelle was responsible as parish-curate in Bruges (1865—1870) and later on, in Courtrai (1872-1899). In particular, the letters of students of Gezelle, old students, parents of students (mostly staying in England) and parishioners of Gezelle provide us with a direct and unsuspected lively insight in the daily life, beliefs, problems and emotions of the average English Catholic in the middle of the nineteenth century. We also get, almost accidentally, information on the progress of religion in the different dioceses, the character of small Catholic communities, relations with Anglican churches, and the differences between Catholics and Protestants, as well as information on churches, description of cults, devotions, and traditions of Catholic life. There are also letters of old students of Gezelle, continuing their studies in their homeland, telling their old teacher about educational life in England and noticing the differences in atmosphere and character of education from that in Flanders. Casually, we get facts about the organisation of such institutes as Mill Hill, St Cuthbert's College (Ushaw), Old Hall (St Edmund's, London), St John's Institute (Manchester) and Oscott (St Mary's).

4. We have to mention once more two elements of special importance in the life of Guido Gezelle: his vocation for England and his visits to his 'land of freedom'. Gezelle cherished an extreme enthusiasm for the English world. In a letter of 10 October 1861 his phlegmatic English friend and convert, Joseph Algar, old colleague of Roulers, warns Gezelle about an excessive 'anglomania'. The word is not exaggerated. Gezelle — reading English daily and speaking it very well — lived in a very special affinity with what a critic once called, his mythical homeland.

For outsiders, it sounds very strange that he could never fulfil his wish to go on the mission to England and to leave Belgium 'not however for a few weeks but for a life' (in a letter of 17 October 1862). In innumerable letters we read invitations from priests (English and Flemish), summoning Gezelle to join them in the conversion of the great country: 'Your heart is in England' (18.7. 1862) they write, again and again. In this matter, the most interesting letters come from Salford (P. Benoit) in 1855, Westminster (Crombleholme) in the same year, Southwark (Mgr Grant) in 1857 and, in a last attempt, Westminster (by Wiseman himself) in 1864. Other letters from the Oblates of St Charles, Bayswater, London (C. Robinson), Mill Hill and from Oscott (F. Searle) contain similar invitations.

In spite of all these efforts and of his own repeated demands to his bishop (expressing his own 'besoin irresistible' to devote his life to the mission of England, as he put it in a letter to Mgr Malou (28 September 1857), he was kept in Flanders for educational, political and ecclesiastical tasks. During his life he could make only six short visits to England (from 1861 to 1899, the last one in company of his bishop, G. Waffelaert, to Clapham and Haywards Heath). In 1863 he supplied for John Butt, vicar of Arundel and chaplain of the duchess of Norfolk at Arundel Castle. From there Gezelle wrote some interesting letters, one of them to his old student and (for the Church 'lost') friend, E. Van Oye. (See Appendix I, letter of September 1863.)

5. Undoubtedly, the most interesting period in the life of Gezelle and the most important one for his relations with England, is the time of his teaching profession, first in Roulers (1854—1860) and later on in Bruges (1860—1865). From 1848 onwards the minor seminary of Roulers opened a special course for English pupils. In 1849 a division of philosophy was started giving students the possibility of a direct preparation for an ecclesiastical career. This made Roulers popular with English Catholics, increased by the nomination in 1849 of the Oxford convert, Joseph Algar. Additionally, from 1851, English candidate-missionaries were sent to Roulers from the Salford diocese. Propaganda was stimulated by the English-minded Superior, J. Faict. In 1854 the young priest Gezelle was made responsible for the English and Irish boys at Roulers. He became their confessor, duty-master and spiritual leader. The 'English lads' — a small group with inner rules and rather eccentric, 'wild' habits for the other residents in the college — also found in Gezelle an extremely devoted and scrupulous father. The relationship between them became familiar and confidential. This was even emphasized by the special character of the educational principles demanding a personal relation between leader and pupil, and furthermore, devoutness, personality-training, strong virtue, obedience and honesty.

Special attention, too, was paid to a sort of hidden spiritual training, organized by confraternity in the spirit of F.W. Faber. The correspondence which originated around this relation was very intimate. The special interest of the letters of English boys to 'father Gezelle' (and vice versa) lies in this character and they give a surprising insight into the pious character of Catholic education in the nineteenth century, especially of English boys in continental institutes. Letters from the boys, or from thankful mothers, are always very personal, although they may contain trifles or details. Of special interest for the English situation are also letters of cherished English students leaving for England or on vacation at home telling their leader of open-hearted scenes of daily life in Catholic families. We also read letters of young convert Catholic boys returning home to a Protestant family and writing about their difficulties.

6. The correspondence of Gezelle also contains many echoes of the mission-work of England. Gezelle, inspired with a zealous proselytizing spirit (conformable to his time and entourage), stimulated the propaganda for the missions among his students at the minor seminary of Roulers. Especially England, next America and the North, were favourite regions, as they were convinced that the conversion of England was tantamount to conquering the world. With great enthusiasm, which caused even criticism with some of his superiors, Gezelle tried to convince the boys to join in the great work of the evangelization of England. He conducted correspondence with clergymen in England asking them for suitable missionaries and wrote to agents abroad in order to stimulate contacts. Reading the letters, especially to Gezelle, in the period 1855 to 1865 we get an idea of the 'mission-atmosphere' in a Belgian seminary: the propaganda, the resistance and difficulties with parents, the idealistic fervour of the young boys pondering their vocation, and finally the actions of the superiors to control fevered enthusiasm. From England we get information and news from seminaries as St Saviour's Retreat (Broadway) and St Joseph's Retreat (Highgate Hill, London), its staff and schooling programme. Gezelle corresponds, too, with different Orders asking for priests or with old students working in convents in London, Liverpool, Manchester, Glasgow, Dublin and many other places. Of great interest are the letters of W.J. Crombleholme, to mention one of Gezelle's old students. In 1858 working in St Anne's, Ashton-under-Lyne, he writes Gezelle in some personal letters about his 'great work ... in the Lord's vineyard', his projects, ambitions and first (small) results. We also refer to a series of letters (written in Dutch in this case) of a young recruit and protege of Gezelle, Jan Deneve (who died as a Passionist in the new convent Retreat of St Mungo's, Glasgow), arriving as novice at St Joseph's Retreat, London, and writing his leader about his confrontation with a strange, Protestant city (indifferent to Te bon Dieu) and witnessing his first sight of English Catholics and (for instance) their striking devotional behaviour in church. Other letters of old students and missionaries in England are interesting for their detailed picture they give of missions (see Appendix 2: letter of Alphonse Devos—who died as bishop in Mongolia, 1888—working in the mission of Melton Mowbray, 1864).

This correspondence with the missionary world of England increased still more after Gezelle's appointment as director of the English College in Bruges (1860), and as vice-rector (1861—1865) of the Anglo-Belgian Seminary in the same city. The college lasted only six months, but the experiment for an independent English minor seminary on the Continent—ending in misunderstanding and disorder—throws light on the typical character of the English educational system. The English Seminary of Bruges⁷ (founded in 1859 by the English convert baron and maecenas, John Sutton, and till 1873 assuring missionary-schooling to English and Belgian students) had a more durable, though uncertain, existence. In this period, Gezelle, giving himself fully to his cherished case, viz. providing valuable missionaries, writes to English clergymen involved with the matter, e.g. his predecessor Dr Leadbitter,⁸ and to some important members of the English ecclesiastical hierarchy (Wiseman, Grant, Searle, Robinson) on matters of organisation and recruiting. Several items are under discussion: enlistment, advice from Wiseman, financial support from English dioceses, problems of discipline, order of the day, difficulties with failures, etc.

7. The 'English correspondence' of Gezelle after 1865 has a totally different character. No more responsible in educational matters nor for the mission-work in England, Gezelle's working field changes completely. Leaving aside the very last months of his life, being chaplain of the English Convent (or 'Dames Anglaises') of Bruges and returning to his former occupation of confessor, spiritual leader and religious teacher,⁹ from 1865 to 1899, his activities shift to another world: as vicar at Bruges he becomes responsible for the parishioners of St Walburga, among whom were many Englishmen. He gets to know some refugee English families (writing to vicar Gezelle — on visits abroad — about Catholic life in England), and gets involved, too, in their spiritual, emotional and (even) financial problems. From this time also date his contacts with A. Robinson, who founded an orphanage at Bruges (St Vincent's), and with artists living in the old town. With one of them, the historian and art-lover, J. Weale, he even founded an 'English-inspired' weekly, Rond den Heerd, in which Gezelle wrote much about Catholic traditions in England. Out of his friendship with the family of J. Weale, there arose a fairly extensive correspondence with special accents on the cultural and spiritual background of this English art historian and of his family.¹⁰ As a whole, these letters show the privileged position Gezelle was placed in to have such a deep understanding of the English Catholic world. His correspondence can amply prove this statement.

Letter from Guido Gezelle to his old pupil E. Van Oye, from Arundel, Sussex, (September 1863).

Catholic Chapel, Arundel, Sussex.

My dearest child!

I did not mean the phrase God will prevail etc. in the sense you took it. I mean and I continue in the same persuasion that God will in his kindness prevail in bringing you to some better state than you are in now. I cannot see how you will ever be a good doctor, not on account of the state of doctor, but on account of your own disposition, see how you have succeeded till now, you are not the man for that sublime but most arduous and dangerous vocation into which people in the country you inhabit are thrown so to say without any consideration. The doctorship seems to be made for the men or boys, not the boys for the Drship. enough of that, the rest to God and the B.V.M.

I am in the very place where 'Ethel' lives, at the residence of the duchess of Norfolk, the mother of the child for whom Ethel's book was written. I have dined with Ethel, spoken to her, heard her speak. I know the houses where the real children lived that are described by Faber; I know the history of Ethel's book. O this is a place! a catholic duchess in England is something indeed! I enclose a little sprig of a Wellingtonia Gigantea, planted by Father Faber's own hand in the Park, where Ethell [sic] used to play and plays still, where I have seen her play with her sisters Philippa, Lady Mary. Lady Ethel they call her here. Lady Mina the eldest is now a carmelite nun in Paris; she has left the world in the most brilliant shape I ever saw it, she has left a palace, a mother like a queen, a province of a garden, the see [r. sea] at sight from her window, she has left all for Jesus. Dear Lady Mina as the poor call her here. Her portrait is in every poor cottage.

Do take care of your eyes and try to keep a good deal of yourself to consecrate to God when the time comes.

The Doctor was exceedingly proud when I told him of you.

The little sisters have gone to Edinburgh since you saw them: go and see them at Louvain. The little flemish sister, sr. Madeleine, I saw depart without a tear, laughing at the Dr. who was crying abundantly out of his old eyes, poor fellow. They have a Polish soldier now. The little protestant is a catholic.

I am the pastor here for another week, then I come back to Bruges for a years emprisonment to come back to England, I hope. Do not say where I am, it is not necessary.

Do you know any one who has a vocation to be a carmelite monk in England under Father Herman, the convert Jew, the great pianist. He is my great friend and he asked me for a flemish novice. How beautifully he plays the harmonium in his little [sic] improvised church! His mount Carmel, mein[e] kleine Karmel, wie er sagt. He speaks french, Engl., spanish, german, has a great number of splendid young fellows that come to hear him preach, play and to confess their sins to him. He will take novice[s] even without latin, he will teach them himself he says, the novice master is a lovely Spaniard, the next father is a beautiful young Maltese who hears confession in Maltese (a kind of Arabic), he will even receive one who has not the full consent of his parents. I am perfectly sure after a year you would be happy here and a thousand times happier when a priest, playing singing preaching etc. under such a man as Herman for the glory of God and the reconversion of England.

Adress of Father Herman

God bless you pray for me

APPENDIX 2

Letter from Alphonse Devos to Gezelle, from his mission in Melton Mowbray, England, March (?) 1864.

Dear Mr Gezelle,

I experienced what you told me one day that when we are in England and have a mission to ourselves we have hardly any time to think of Belgium. I have had plenty of business these last seven or eight weeks in my dear poor little mission of Melton Mowbray. The congregation is small and poor, but the town is a pretty fine old catholic place, anciently called Medeltune, Meltone, and afterwards Melton Mowbray from a baron who during the reign of Henry the first assumed the name of Mowbray. The country is hilly and the town is pleasantly seated in an open vale 15 miles N.E. of Leicester and more than hundred miles N.N.W. of London. A railway joins the Midland Railway at Syston junction, and the Great Northern at Peterborough by Stamford.

In olden times Melton Mowbray was provided with all kinds of religious institutions of which we meet almost at every step ancient-catholic remainings. The protestant church formerly dedicated to the Bl. Virgin I think, at least it was called St. Mary, is one of the largest and handsomest in the Country of Leicester. The porch at the West end has a fine doorway with ogic [read-, ogival] arch, two niches — empty niches — on each side, two ornamented windows and four singular openings in the wall rather low and which had gratings and shutters; they have recently been glazed. It appears they were confessional windows for the lepers who passed through the town on their way to Burton Lazars, a hospital founded in 1135 by Roger de Mowbray under the care of Augustinians and which had a very celebrated well for the cure of diseased.

The other places of worship are new buildings, among others, the chapel of the independants, the chapel of the Wesleyan Methodists, — of the primitive methodists, — of the Calvinistic Baptists and perhaps some others which I do not know. There is none like Our Catholic chapel of St. John the Baptist. It was built, from a design by Pugin, by a rich convert of Eastwill, Mr Exton — (Eastwill is a place about 7 miles from Melton). Unfortunately the Congregation is small and poor and they have had these last seven years rather an old priest who did not take great care of things and who moreover has not left his bed for the last two years. So that the chapel and sacristy was a complete ruin(e) with damp, dust and mould. The house was in no better state. The old man had no house-keeper: an old woman came every day to prepare his meals and make his bed, and when I came first to Melton the house was in such a destitute state that I had no bed to sleep on. A kind of sack filled with something like wool did for the purpose. There was plenty of broken jugs, broken basins, broken plates etc. It was rather amusing for the first start. Another job was to find out the Catholics: they are not many, but they are so scattered about in the country and neighbouring villages that it takes you sometimes half a day to call on one family; and then it is very fortunate if you find them at home. Some time ago I walked seven miles up the hills and down the vales, through rather unpleasant weather, for I was caught by hail and rain on the way, and when I came to the house the children were at school and father and mother were out at work. They were the only Catholics of the village. There are many villages about Melton without any Catholics: I could not tell how many, because I do not know the limits of my parish; in fact there are no limits I think. On one side I have a neighbour not far off: Eastwill 7 miles and Ratcliffcollege 10 miles [;] but on the other sides Nottingham 20 miles and Stamford 24 I believe. I have made a list of the Catholics I found out: I expect more than 60 for their Easterduties: there are many I cannot rely on; however there are several who seem well disposed, only they want rousing. How different those people are to what we are used to in Belgium. I called on several whom I know not attending the church for 12 or 15 years; they were most kind, and tell you strait-of [read: straight-off]: I have been a wicked man; — I have not been as I should; — I have neglected my duties these last 10 years etc. — Some of my Irish are very good particularly during the winter when they have no money. One of them said some time ago: I will tell you, Your Reverence, Irishmen are best when they are poor. And the reason he gave was that as soon as they had some money, it was used for drinking. There are a good many converts among our Catholics; but they were not made lately: Melton Mowbray is known for its bigotry and when the Catholic chapel was first built the priest was often insulted and laughed at in the street; I have met nothing as yet. Several protestants attend our chapel regularly: I hope they will come over some day. I recommend especially one to your prayers: she is an oldish lady, pretty well of, living at 3 miles from Melton. I went several times to give her instruction; she has no objection against the Cath[olic] relig[i]on she says, and still she cannot determine herself to come over: may Alm[ighty] God's grace help her!

I recommend also several others who were once members of the Church and who left it, most of them in consequence of mixt marriages, which are a pest for a congregation. When we have been sometime in England we can see how great the effects are, and how abundant the grace of the sacr[amen]t of Matrimony.

Since I am here I have had all kind of business in repairing the chapel and the house: carpenter, painter etc. The vestments were in a dreadful state, stained and torn and mouldy: a good cath[olic] woman was mending them and was whole week at it. There is no black vestment: would you be so kind as to order one at Grosse's: I cannot afford anything expensif [sic], I want many things and can but expect little from my poor Catholics. I would be exceedingly obliged to you if you could find some good person who can do something towards it. I know you have many calls of this kind, but that only proves that they know your charity.

Order also a set of Altarcards, if you please. You might send these things by De Kiere Emile; this good gentleman promised to come and see me on his way to the North: I should say his time will be soon up. I will be exceedingly pleased if he comes.

I would have liked to write some time ago but I had no time. I have had so much work in the church, and much running about to make them come to their duties and besides my sermons require a pretty long preparation. They must not be grand but I have two every Sunday and this week they expect a sermon almost every day. I try to get out as well as I can: I wish I had studied more English.

I hope the old friends are getting on very well: the Theological Club MM Bonte, Pycke and Smith. I have no time left to write to them now: this letter I have begun four days ago.

Mr. Moore is at Oscott College.

How is Mr. Martens getting on?

Would you be so kind as to ask Molhant about the medale and scapular he promised me. — And send me the little books of the Sacre Coeur, if they were sent to the college.

My kind regards to the Rector and friends.

Sincerely yours in the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary Alph. Devos.

Pray for me dear Mr. Gezelle and for my mission.

THE ARCHIVES OF THE DIOCESE OF CORK AND ROSS, IRELAND

Sister M. Angela Bolster

In 1964, by a strange concatenation of events, I became official historian of the Diocese of Cork and Ross. In response to my immediate request for access to the diocesan archives, Bishop Cornelius Lucey (1954—1980) explained:

We have no archives; this is because we had no bishop's residence in the diocese until my predecessor [Dr Daniel Cohalan, 1916—1954] built this house [now the Diocesan Office] in 1930. Prior to that time, the bishops of Cork lived in various places. When they died, their papers were either destroyed or became family possessions . . .'

Twenty years and two published volumes of diocesan history later, Bishop Michael Murphy asked me 'to establish our diocesan archives. I'll show you what we have.' What we had was similar to, if not worse than, the descriptions of archival origins which have appeared in this journal since its inception: a big room into which one had literally to phase oneself and there be confronted with a phantasmagoria of junk comprising crazy shelving, dirty envelopes, bulging cartons, books which disintegrated upon touch, a plethora of now unidentifiable photographs and an angry colony of spiders, moths et al., which disputed the termination of an uninterrupted reign of more than half a century in 'our diocesan archives'. Still, like all junk, this unlikely heap had its own special nuggets; and since it is my good fortune — as Vice-Postulator for the Cause for Beatification of Catherine McAuley — to visit Rome quite frequently, my pursuit of research there for diocesan history has enabled me to fill in many gaps in our archives with microfilmed material from Propaganda Fide.

PURPOSE-BUILT ARCHIVE

While I knuckled into the task of clearing the big room, Bishop Murphy had the basement of the Diocesan Office transformed into a modern purpose-built archive area which meets all the archival demands of the experts in that it is fireproof, damp-proof, rust-proof, etc. It is fitted with dehumidifiers and temperature-control gauges; and in addition to the usual manual-controlled type of fire-extinguisher, it has suspension-extinguishers on the ceilings, each fitted with a piston which goes into action once the temperature gets too high. The main archive room is fitted with mobile shelving which affords about forty thousand cubic feet of space which would be impossible with wall shelving. In this room also we have a large ten-drawer map and plan chest and we are on the look out for a display cabinet. The second archive area, fitted with wall shelving constitutes the Reading Room; and we have also an area designated 'Secret Archive'. To my knowledge, ours is the first purpose-built archive in Ireland, and I'm happy to report that our architect has got other contracts because of it. I might also add that while this archive was a-building, I was beavering away upstairs and, knowing little of possible danger, I did not take necessary precautions, with the result that I contracted a nasal fungus which has kept me under medical supervision since October 1986 and which eventually entailed surgery. So, archivists beware!

THE ARCHIVES

The main source material in our archives falls into the following categories, of which those marked with an asterisk will be given fuller attention subsequently in this article: Roman documents*, episcopal correspondence*, Synodal Statutes and Relationes Status, the Diocesan Chapter, Parish Returns*, diocesan boundary matters, Ordination Lists, Dimissorial Letters, notices of permissions granted to parish priests to administer Confirmation, diocesan appointments and necrologists; Pastorals*, Parish Registers*, old account and rent books. We have files on every religious order/congregation in the diocese and copies of Rules and Constitutions for all except two. There are files on education at all levels (not yet fully sorted or arranged); similarly with legal and financial files and those coming under the heading of 'Secret Archive'. Then there are files on hierarchy meetings and their associated commissions; likewise our own diocesan commissions*. We have maps, plans, photographs, estimates and costings of new churches which continue to be a pastoral priority for developing areas in the outer city. Artifacts, episcopal memorabilia and relics form part of our 'store'; as do newspaper cuttings and what I like to term miscellanea*. Finally, and very importantly, we have a constantly growing section on our Diocesan Mission in Peru which was initiated by Bishop Cornelius Lucey in 1964 and of which our present bishop, Dr Michael Murphy, was first superior. It was he who directed the mission towards the particular pastoral pattern which has developed. He was a builder of churches, schools and clinics and his experience in Peru of the importance of parish Sisters has translated itself into many new pastoral ventures in his diocese of Cork and Ross.

Roman Documents

These include decrees and rescripts from the Holy See on such matters as episcopal and coadjutorial appointments; indulgences and jubilee proclamations; seminaries, religious houses — including important documentation on the approval of the Rule of the Presentation Sisters; secularizations and dispensations; the Peru Mission since its inception and — in particular for my own congregation — the acceptance of Peruvian subjects, the establishment of a Novitiate in Trujillo and, more recently, a House of Formation in Lima. This file also includes correspondence from the Apostolic Nuncio and an as yet incomplete dossier of Roman replies and remarks on the Relationes Status of the various bishops.

Episcopal Correspondence

BISHOP JOHN BUTLER, 1763-1786. Insofar as actual letters (as against microfilms) are concerned, this correspondence begins with Bishop Butler for whom we have just two letters, each a letter of appointment. That dated 1775 is interesting in that it measures 18½" x 12" and contains three letters in one: a) an appeal from parishioners of St Finbarr's for the appointment of Rev. E. Synan as their pastor; b) Butler's reply giving as his only objection to this appointment (a speech defect Fr Synan retained after an illness he contracted in pursuit of his pastoral ministry — however the bishop would willingly appoint a 'coadjutor' who would preach instead of Fr Synan, if the parishioners would subsidise this arrangement); c) the affirmative response of the parishioners. John Butler ruled as bishop for twenty-three years: a time when Catholics were gradually emerging into public affairs. Within three years of his accession he had three chapels built, that of St Finbarr's (1766) being the first post-penal church to be constructed in the diocese. Bishop Butler was involved in most of the matters then pertaining to Church and State; he took the Oath of Allegiance in Cork in 1775, supported the Catholic Committee, but he was pro-British in his affiliations and was less than supportive of Nano Nagle whom he felt should seek permission from the Protestant Bishop for the introduction of the Ursulines into Cork! In January 1786 Butler inherited the title of Baron of Dunboyne, in default of male heir. His subsequent resignation and apostacy has obliterated much of the actual good he did during his 23-year episcopate. He was reconciled to the Church before he died and the Dunboyne Institute in Maynooth is a lasting monument to his beneficence to continuing generations of students.

FRANCIS MOYLAN, 1787—1815. Translated to Cork from Kerry on 3 June 1787, following the defection of Butler, Moylan's education and his pastoral and episcopal career involved him in the great historical occurrences and controversies of the period 1775 to 1815. He had been appointed Bishop of Ardfert-Aghadoe (Kerry) on 10 April 1775. His correspondence (on microfilm and already edited)² and letters in the diocesan archives (not hitherto published) range over subjects like Defenderism and the Riot Acts, the proceedings of the Catholic Committee, the Volunteers, the Catholic Relief Bills and Orde's Proposals; the establishment of Maynooth (1795) and the student riots there. Moylan, a supporter of the status quo, had little sympathy with the United Irishmen and for a while he supported Pitt on the Legislative Union. However, Vetoism brought out the bishop's latent nationalism and in his closing years Vetoism and Catholic Emancipation loom large in his correspondence. He was principal spokesperson for the hierarchy in this particular area.

Moylan's correspondence also reveals more than a modicum of 'ecclesiastical politics' and the extent to which Church affairs were referred to certain influential laymen; in particular Viscount Kenmare. By 1810 Moylan was 'the Grand Old Man' of Irish politico-ecclesiastical diplomacy; he was the first Bishop of Cork to envision a seminary for the diocese and perhaps his greatest achievement in church building was St Mary's Cathedral which was dedicated on 22 August 1808 and which was the venue on 20 May 1814 for a vociferous anti-Veto meeting following the Quarantotti Rescript approving such a measure. In 1812 he had purchased a site near the Cathedral where he opened St Mary's College in the following year: thus the beginnings of Farranferris Seminary, 1887, which celebrated its centenary last year. As a young curate in St Mary's, Moyland befriended and encouraged Nano Nagle in her work and, as bishop, he brought the Christian Brothers to Cork in 1813, following negotiations with Edmund Ignatius Rice. Our collection of letters gives little airing to these momentous events. Similar lacunae occur in the correspondence of Bishops Murphy, O'Callaghan and Lucey.

JOHN MURPHY, 1815-1847. In the main, Bishop Murphy's letters cover the same ground as those of Dr Moylan on the Veto, in the context of which Dr Murphy with Archbishop Daniel Murray of Dublin were envoys of the Irish Hierarchy in its dealings with Rome. Dr Murphy was also agent for the hierarchy in investigating Irish Burses and the administration of ecclesiastical property in France, as attested to by a 25-page unsigned document in our archives. The National Education System (1831) occupies much of the Murphy correspondence; as do the foreign missions and the Great Famine. We have a record in his own handwriting of all marriages performed by him during the Jubilee Year (1842) in Cork's main churches: Cathedral, St Finbarr's, St Patrick's and SS Peter and Paul's. Also, in his handwriting, we have an incomplete memorandum on the procedure to be followed in episcopal elections.

Following his own election as bishop, he studied Irish in order to be more pastorally effective, and like his immediate predecessors, he was an enthusiastic builder of churches — fifteen in all. When recommending ways and means of raising funds among the farming community for rural churches, he signed himself 'your attached Bishop' in his letters Ad Clerum. An Essay on Ecclesiastical Finance, published in 1834 by a former parish priest of the diocese evoked a heated response from the Irish bishops, who wrote it off as 'stuffed with abominable propositions . . . a farrago of impudent scurrility and wretched sophistry'. Bishop Murphy's response was less heated but contained severe criticism of his renegade cleric. Among the most interesting letters from the bishop is his excommunication 'with bell, book and candle' of those who made a mockery of the annual pilgrimage to Gougane Barra ³ by drunken orgies and by bringing along sick cattle to be 'dipped' in the Holy Well there for remedial purposes!

Apart from conventual sources, little correspondence remains of Bishop Murphy's success in bringing the Sisters of Charity to Cork on 13 November 1836 and the Sisters of Mercy on 6 July 1837. One of the greatest bibliophiles of his time, he was known as 'the bishop who liked books and nuns'! For all that, his treatment of the Regular clergy (microfilm) was harsh; in fact, most religious communities found him a hard nut to crack. A member of the Murphy brewery family, he had less than disdain for the total abstinence crusade launched with tremendous success in the diocese by Father Theobald Matthew! All such to the contrary, Bishop Murphy has a place in history as a great patron of learning; he encouraged local Schools of Gaelic Poetry and our archives contain some excellently scripted MSS which were executed in response to his expressed wish to preserve such material for posterity.

WILLIAM DELANY, 1847—1886. This is our most comprehensive episcopal file to date, containing 151 letters of general correspondence, 15 on the establishment of the Diocesan Chapter de novo and 15 pastorals. Topics dealt with in the Delany correspondence are Famine relief, education at all levels: Primary (1831), Intermediate (1878), the Queen's ('Godless') Colleges (opened, 1845), endowed schools, Catholic Industrial Schools and Model Schools which he thoroughly abhorred. The evils of the Poor Law System and of Landlordism are also here; likewise the Disestablishment of the Church of Ireland, the tithe question and tenant right.

There are very many letters concerning boundary matters relating to the diocese of Ross: a very disputatious topic at synodal meetings of the Province of Cashel.⁴ In fact, the Ross question has festered since as far back as the Synod of Rathbreasail in 1111! Bishop Delany had strong opinions on clerical non-involvement in politics, on the opening of shops on holydays of obligation and he was a vigorous proponent for the appointment of chaplains to the Irish Catholic Regiments in the Crimean War; the ratio for Protestant as against Catholic chaplains to the forces left much to be desired. Sisters of Mercy from his diocese were an important feature of the military nursing done in the hospitals of Scutari and, more particularly, of Balaclava.

Bishop Delany's pastorals deal with revolutions in Europe (1848), and the fate of the Holy Father; concern for the poor; exhortation to prayers and the Eucharist, education and subscriptions for the Diocesan Seminary; Fenianism, concerning which he mentioned in 1867 that 'all is reasonably quiet here — allowing for some Fenian madness'.

Five new communities of Sisters came into the diocese during the Delany episcopate; as did the Society of African Missions in 1878. Of the Sisters, one was a community of Discalced Carmelites under Mother Gabriella de Mousset (1873) who claimed to have been professed by Francois of Sussex in the Basilica of Loreto and who for a decade caused more disruption than any bishop of Cork has had to suffer. The convent was closed by order of the bishop in 1884. My 'discovery' of this Carmelite foundation came from some very old receipts dated 1875 and made out to the foundress. These aroused my curiosity and subsequent research revealed a most intriguing story . . .

THOMAS ALPHONSUS O'CALLAGHAN OP, 1886-1916. There is little variety in Bishop O'Callaghan's extant letters, some of which carry references to current politics, to the Plan of Campaign, Anti-Parnellism and the Great War, regarding which his Lenten Pastoral of 1915 quotes Pope Benedict XV as describing it as 'the darkest and saddest hour in all human history'. The remainder of the correspondence deals with parish debts and glebe loans and a reminder that 'Church collections are allowed only under specific conditions'. There is a fairly comprehensive folder of letters indicating unforeseen problems for both diocese and African Mission Father through the actions of Father Joseph Zimmerman as executor of the will of a Cork diocesan priest. There were other problems for the bishop in the chaplaincy dispute between the Daughters of Charity in Dunmanway and the local parish priest.

A letter from Rome on 22 January 1911 acknowledged O'Callaghan's Relatio, praised his administration of the diocese and directed that the Acta of his Visitation Returns be lodged in the Archives. They are not extant, but we do possess a valuable set of parish returns from the 1890s. I continue to hope that some day, somewhere more of his correspondence will come to light. He was the first of the more modern bishops to set his sights on the north side of the city for a permanent episcopal residence and he lived for a time in a portion of Farranferris Seminary still referred to as 'the Palace'. It was during his episcopate that the Little Sisters of the Assumption, the Bon Secour Sisters and the Poor Clare Colettines came to Cork.

DANIEL COHALAN (1916-1952), CORNELIUS LUCEY (1952-1980). I have not yet compiled a full inventory of this correspondence, but that of the former is more comprehensive and very much politically orientated, especially for the first fifteen years of the Cohalan episcopate. Bishop Cohalan had a habit of writing replies on the back of letters received; his response was then issued by his secretary who invariably began by saying, 'The Bishop wishes me to say . . .'

Exclusive of official correspondence which was typed in duplicate, the bulk of Dr Lucey's extant letters are handwritten; those written to his priests in Peru are very special indeed. Most of his incoming mail was carefully replaced in the delivery envelopes, on many of which one finds such cryptic statements as: 'Answered; said Yes . . . Answered; said NO.' Our archives contain a number of valuable addresses delivered by Dr Lucey during the various sessions of Vatican Council II, when he was appointed spokesperson for the hierarchy: Loquar pro Episcopis Hiberniae. We are fortunate in having the handwritten originals — with glosses — as well as the typed versions of these documents. We have, in addition, handwritten statements on sociological topics dating from his years as professor in Maynooth and covering also the years of his tenure as Bishop of Cork.

Relationes Status and Synodal Statutes

Our earliest Relatio Status is dated 1778 and belongs to the episcopate of Bishop Butler; it is a short but very important document and is on microfilm. To Dr Butler also are accredited the first Synodal Statutes of the diocese which he issued in 1768; these were subsequently enlarged upon and printed by Bishop Moylan in 1814. So far, I have come upon only two of Moylan's Relationes. The same is true for Bishop Murphy, whose Synodal Statutes more than compensate for the absence of Relationes. We have both Relationes and Statutes from the episcopate of Bishop Delany; and for both of these bishops we have an important collection of Deanery Conferences. Bishop O'Callaghan's printed Statutes of 1896 replaced the earlier Butler/Moylan ones, while Bishops Cohalan and Lucey added their own to this collection. Our present bishop, Dr Michael Murphy, prefers to issue 'Directives' rather than Statutes. In addition to the foregoing, we have several volumes of Maynooth Statutes; these constitute a valuable section in our archives.

Pastorals

Our collection of pastorals dates from Bishop Moylan's episcopate (1787—1815). Unless I discover Vatican equivalents of others, Moylan's collection is confined temporarily to three. We have 19 from the episcopate of Bishop Delany and 10 from that of Bishop O'Callaghan; and there are pastorals — Lenten and otherwise — for every year of Bishop Cohalan's episcopate except for the year in which he died (1952). We have handwritten originals and typed equivalents of virtually all of Bishop Cohalan's published pastorals. Comparatively few of Dr Lucey's originals have been preserved. Fortunately, we have an almost complete set of his Lenten Pastorals which were published each year in the Diocesan Magazine, The Fold, which he established in 1954. The pastorals and statements of Bishop Michael Murphy form an important growing archive in our overall collection.

Parish Registers

The keeping of parish registers was begun by Bishop Richard Walsh (1748—1763) and the first entry in both marriage and baptismal registers for St Mary's is 10 July 1748. These early records of the older Cork churches are apparently transcriptions from private notebooks kept by vicars, or, as we call them today, curates. Such a system can give but indifferent returns. Hence, baptisms performed by Father Daniel Hickey from 1 June to 12 July 1762 are missing 'because I lost my notebook'. In the same way, baptisms of Father Michael Falvey are missing from August to December 1763, 'as my Registry [sfc] was taken out of my pocket in the Cornmarket'. From the early registers of St Mary's it emerges that baptisms were mostly administered in private houses, though references also occur to the Bishop's House as location. In these penal times, location depended on the selection of areas of greatest safety.

After 1750 baptisms were recorded as having been performed in capella or in capella parochiali; and sponsors were recorded as Susceptores de sacre fonte, Sponsores or Patrini. Taking St Mary's as exemplifying all parishes, the early registers are an important and interesting extant index of old Cork families and a guide to place-names, many of which are now extinct.

In all, we have 66 parishes in Cork and 11 in Ross; the Cork total includes many new parishes created by Bishop Lucey and an ongoing number for the present episcopate. For these new parishes the task of computerization of the registers is virtually negligible. The older parishes have been entrusted to a Co-Operative Society in Bandon who have government funding as a Youth Employment Agency (however long that funding will last!), and while they produce very good results, the pace of delivery is disappointing. Naturally, in view of the many quests for genealogical information that come our way, we are agitating for a more regular output.

Parish Returns

Under this heading come responses from all parish priests to annual questionnaires from the bishops, together with Visitation Returns, which together constitute an important source of religious, educational, social and statistical history for the years returned. Some few of these returns date back to Bishop Delany's time (1847—86); there are some special ones for the years 1889 to 1891, when Dr Thomas A. O'Callaghan was bishop. I term them 'special' because they are more comprehensive than those issued by his predecessor and they give otherwise unavailable data as to when churches were opened, consecrated, etc., and the dates on which early titulars were assigned to these older churches. The Parish Return format was less comprehensive under Bishops Cohalan and Lucey (1916—1980), but these too had — and have — their own importance. Three years ago Bishop Michael Murphy introduced what is by far the most comprehensive questionnaire to date; fortunately this won't become archival for some time to come.

Libri Ordinandorum

Our existing files for these begin at 1833 and generally speaking, there is a curriculum vitae for every priest ordained. Some entries are more comprehensive than others and I am endeavouring to fill gaps with information gleaned from Catholic registers and directories; while for the pre-1833 period, such parish registers as I have had occasion to consult, have enabled me to compile a new typed file in which I hope to have, at least, the names of parish priests from as far back as possible.

Under Bishop O'Callaghan, diocesan changes (clerical appointments) were first entered systematically into a special register. These entries begin in 1887 and continue, virtually unbroken, to the present time; the only difference being that successive bishops had their own 'whims' where this exercise was concerned. Thus we have different registers and even loose pages, and sometimes the local newspaper is our only source of catching up with appointments! Furthermore — and unaccountably — an unusual system obtained in this diocese, in that on the death of a priest, a line was drawn through his name and his various appointments. Thus, the task of compiling a typed necrology is a MUST, which I tackle from time to time and which is both slow and frustrating. At least I have insisted that the old system be discontinued.

To this section also belong: Dimissorial Letters, notices of faculties given to parish priests to administer the Sacrament of Confirmation and of Regulars being appointed to parish or to pastoral commissions within the diocese. Here, too, is an old Fraternity Fund file, a file on Foundation Masses and a collection of Death Certificates.

Hierarchical and Diocesan Commissions, Appointments, etc.

These are fairly 'young' files but their scope is an indication of things to come for future archivists. In this respect there is one particular aspect of our own diocesan administration which will constitute an ongoing source of episcopal pronouncements. This is Bishop Murphy's appointment (September 1987) of a priest to work full-time as Director of Communications. The appointment is the first of its kind at diocesan level in this country.

Miscellanea

This most interesting section contains, inter alia:

- a) A set of Notebooks compiled by a young clerical student during his years in Maynooth. Michael A. Murphy's aim was to write a diocesan history but he died within a few years of his ordination. Some of his notebooks contain biographical data on some parish priests; also some humorous verses culled from —of all places — the Diocesan Registers!
- b) The Account and Rent-Books already mentioned which complement the Parish Registers in their value as a street directory of places that have since been re-named or bulldozed out of existence in the name of progress.
- c) Old Receipts, of which hundreds littered the place when I began sorting; and having learned from experts that ten years is the limit beyond which it is unnecessary to keep such items, I proceeded on an all-out policy of destruction. I am now convinced that some benevolent providence urged me to look more benignly on the older receipts, and in so doing I unravelled two important items of history. The first discovery referred to the Carmelite foundation of 1873 already noted. Prior to my discovery, information on the Cork Carmelites was confined to a few references in copies of the old Catholic Registry (forerunner to the present Catholic Directory), but local historians had never succeeded in getting beyond that point. Furthermore, no Carmelite community in this country or in England had any account of 'Cork Carmelites' in their annals.

A second discovery through old receipts had direct implications on ownership of the convent attached to the South Infirmary of this city, where our Sisters were first admitted as visitors c. 1839/40 before the death of Catherine McAuley. From 'visitors' they eventually became members of the nursing staff and a convent built for them in 1903 was believed to have been the gift of Countess Alice Murphy who was benefactress to many other religious congregations in the city. In the absence of records — as against oral tradition — our Superior General asked me if the Diocesan Archives contained any deed which might throw light on the subject for her. The 'light' was as follows: For the years 1903 to 1905 I found receipts from builders acknowledging money received from Bishop Thomas A. O'Callaghan 'for building the Convent of the Sisters at the South Infirmary'. On each receipt the bishop had written the name of the bequest from which he had taken this money. A further search showed that by this bequest the bishop was to receive annually the sum of £100 'for whatever charity he considers most deserving'. Finally, I found the will of Countess Murphy. She had the chapel built for the South Infirmary and she arranged also for the chaplain's salary, but there was no mention of the convent. Bishop Murphy was more than happy to discover that he had hitherto unknown diocesan claims; his advice was that I should go ahead and delve for other possibilities! So, old receipts can be quite valuable.

- d) A very large strongly-bound volume entitled Summary of Documents which is a catalogue of Roman and P.R.O. references to Ireland for the years 1066-1800.
- e) A typescript Annals of the Diocese, the work of Dean Dominick Murphy, Vicar-General of the Diocese (1847—53). This is more a minute book than a full historical account, but it contains much data not otherwise available and it complements the deanery conferences held during his years of writing.
- f) An Index of Townlands. This handwritten ledger-style book contains the names of every townland in every parish of every Irish diocese. The writer remains anonymous. Complementary to this is an unbound dossier, pencil-written, giving the etymological derivations of the parish townlands in our own diocese, and which is as fascinating as it is historically valuable.

This is the extent to which I have arranged some of the material in our archives; there are still many cartons and tin trunks to be attended to. However, a beginning has been made and what has been sorted augurs well for what is yet to come. So far, no material has come in from any of our parishes, but this is not from any lack of goodwill or interest and I know that when I address the various deanery conferences any material available will be generously forthcoming.

Enquiries concerning the archives may be sent to the Diocesan Archivist, Diocesan Office, Bishop's House, Redemption Road, Cork.

BOOK REVIEW

Archivo Historico Diocesano De Albacete: Inventario y Microfilm.

Volumen 1. Seccion Parroquias, 1490—1900. Antonio Diaz Garcia, 1985.

The Diocese of Albacete (Spain) was established in 1950, when an Archive was set up to house documents collected by the Bishop at his visitations. In 1975, a new archivist was appointed to collect parish material earlier than the present century, to make an inventory, and to arrange and microfilm the documents. This volume of 533 pages lists in great detail some 3,300 individual items, mostly books, but some bundles also, is the fruit of ten years of his devoted work.

The inventory is arranged in three sections: Geographical, pp.1—145; Chronological, pp.147—384; and by Topics, pp.385—533. Each parish collection is described under four headings: sacramental records; fabric, juridical and pastoral; finance; and confraternities, sodalities, feasts, etc. Each parish has a three-letter code and each document is individually numbered under this code and is also given a separate number in the diocesan inventory.

The volume, which thus describes and identifies each parish document in the diocesan archive, is an impressive work. While its value as a working tool is obviously restricted to Albacete Diocese, it may well serve as a model for other diocesan archivists to emulate, and perhaps to copy.

A copy of the book is held by the Editor who will be pleased to send it on loan to any diocesan archivist interested.

THE SHARPE PAPERS : MORE HALL,
PRINKNASH ABBEY, AND FATHER SHARPE

Donald A. Withey

On the edge of the Cotswolds, at Cashes Green, Randwick, to the north-west of Stroud, is More Hall Convent, a house of hospitality for the frail and elderly. Today the visitor sees a bright modern home, with old and new buildings tastefully blended, and set in attractive grounds. Little is known of the origins of More Hall, except that there was a house there in 1449. This house was replaced or reconstructed in 1582, the date being recorded on the headstone of a side window.

More Hall is a fine Tudor house built of Cotswold stone. Parts are of two storeys, others of three, in each case with gabled attics. There are stone mullioned windows with drip-moulds, and the diagonal chimney-stacks are arranged in clusters with their angles turned towards each other. During the nineteenth century the building became very dilapidated and neglected. From at least 1839 it was divided into two residences which were let, surprisingly, to farm labourers and their families. ¹

From October 1901 to April 1905, More Hall was the location of St Mark's Home for Boys. This Home had been founded by the Rev. the Hon. James Adderley, well known as a preacher and as an advocate of socialism and social reform. During his time as priest-in-charge of Berkeley Chapel, a stronghold of Anglo-Catholicism, he became a good friend of a small community founded by Aelred Carlyle in 1896. The two brothers used to attend Berkeley Chapel for Sung Mass on Sundays during the brief period in 1898 when they resided in the Cowley Fathers' house in Great Titchfield Street. Adderley was vicar of St Mark's Church, Marylebone, from 1901 to 1904, and he presumably named the Home after his church. St Mark's Home was in the charge of a Miss Wright. Four years later, 'owing to difficulties connected with house tenure',² it was decided to move the Home to Small Heath, Birmingham. Adderley had himself moved to Birmingham the previous year, and was vicar of Saltley from 1904 to 1911. In April 1905 Miss Wright took twelve boys from More Hall to an address in St Oswald's Road, Small Heath.

Here they occupied a house next to a similar institution, St Benet's Home for Boys. The latter had been founded by Bro. Austin Green and Bro. Bede Vetch who were monks of Painsthorpe Abbey in Yorkshire. This was the Anglican Benedictine community, founded by Benjamin Fearnley Carlyle in a house on the Isle of Dogs in 1896, which had served the Sung Mass at Berkeley Chapel. After a number of moves, the community settled at Painsthorpe Hall in 1902. By 1904 the monks were beginning to outgrow their accommodation, and it was decided to make a second foundation and to devote the new foundation to active work, namely a home for boys in need of care. Abbot Carlyle and his companions had carried out a similar apostolate from their house on the Isle of Dogs during the years 1896 to 1898. With the help of the Rev. C.N. Long, vicar of St Aidan's Church, Small Heath, the use of a house in Whitmore Road was obtained, and here St Benet's Boys' Home was founded on 20 September 1904. In 1905 the Home was moved to a more suitable house in St Oswald's Road. The association of the Home with Painsthorpe was short-lived. The Home passed into lay control in 1905, Bro. Austin having relinquished his monastic status (he died of pneumonia at the age of twenty-eight on 11 February 1905) and Bro. Bede having left the community. The two houses were then merged under Miss Wright with the title of St Mark's and St Benet's Home for Boys.³ The subsequent history of the Painsthorpe Benedictine monks is of some interest. They were settled on the island of Caldey, near Tenby, in 1906. In 1913 they joined the Roman Catholic Church as a community and in 1928 moved to their present home at Prinknash.⁴

The story now reverts to More Hall and to a closer link between it and Prinknash Abbey. From 1906 the parliamentary electoral register gives only one entry for More Hall, namely the Rev. Charles Heriry Sharpe. Sharpe was born about 1859 at his family's home at Longhope Manor, Gloucester. He was a student at Hertford College, Oxford, taking his B.A. degree in 1883, and after being ordained deacon in the Church of England in 1884, served his title at St Helen's, Ryde, where he remained after his ordination as priest in 1885. Two years later he became curate at St Mary's, Southampton, then Acting Chaplain to the Forces at Aldershot 1890 to 1893, and Diocesan Missioner, Diocese of Gloucester, 1893 to 1912. During his years as a priest he moved from an Evangelical to a High Church position. He lived a very active life, conducting missions and retreats throughout Great Britain. At the same time, this well known missionary led the life of a contemplative monk in the privacy of his own home. A friend of Robert Meux Benson, founder of the Cowley Fathers, and also of Abbot Carlyle, he was a strong supporter of attempts to revive monastic life in the Church of England. He first visited Caldey several years before the community joined the Roman Catholic Church, and remained friendly with them after the conversion.

His interest in monastic life led him to found a small brotherhood at More Hall, known as The Evangelist Brothers of the Common Life. The brotherhood was in existence from 1912 to 1916. Like Sharpe himself, the brotherhood (usually known as the E.B.C.L.) combined a monastic life with the conducting of missions in parishes. Sharpe had been inspired to some extent by the example of the Brethren of the Common Life, a community founded by Geert de Groots at Deventer in Gelderland in 1340. Groote's brothers took no vows, and they neither asked for nor received alms. They cultivated the interior life and worked for their upkeep. Their work was to travel round preaching repentance, drawing men to God in an age of great laxity, and combating the widespread ignorance of Christian teaching by setting up schools all over Germany and the Netherlands. Sharpe's brothers followed these ideals of missionising wherever it was needed, but he adopted the Benedictine Rule in order to give them a modified monastic way of life. In a letter to an enquirer, Sharpe described their life as follows:

We aim at the Religious Life, perhaps especially for Laymen, 3 months probationship before novitiate, 2 years novitiate before Profession, Life vows not before 30, — though exceptions may be made for exceptional circumstances. We rise at 5.45 a.m., all the seven 'Hours' are said during the day, and Compline — the last service — is at 9 p.m. Professed can give themselves to lives of prayer, or prayer and study, or to mission and parochial work. 5

Sharpe gave a fuller account of his view of the religious life in an article in the More Hall Magazine in 1912.⁶ This magazine, which replaced a monthly newsletter called Current Events,⁷ first appeared in May 1912 and ran through nineteen numbers until it came to an end for financial reasons in October 1916. Its circulation grew to nearly five-hundred. The Magazine was sub-titled 'The Quarterly Review, Messenger and Journal of the E.B.C.L.', and each number had three distinct sections: articles of general interest, articles on spiritual matters, and notices and reports concerning the brotherhood. There are occasional references to missions which the brothers had conducted in various places in London and the South West. A very memorable mission is reported in the fourth issue: 'A Visit to St Columba's Church, Kingsland Road, N.E. By one of the E.B.C.L.' — an enthusiastic account running to twelve pages.

A particularly valuable feature of the magazine for the historian is the series of eight photographs of various parts of More Hall as it was in the time of the brotherhood. It is known that the Hall was in a poor, dilapidated condition when Sharpe acquired it, and the photographs show how extensive was his refurbishment of the house. He must have devoted large sums of his own money to this task.

The first twelve numbers of the More Hall Magazine contain in the section headed 'Journal Letter' the beginnings of an account of the foundation of the More Hall Brotherhood. Sharpe sets this out in a leisurely, rambling way, and it is disappointing to find that the articles tell us very little in precise detail about the setting up of the brotherhood, and nothing at all of its subsequent history. In fact, the series came to an end without reaching the foundation, and we are left with tantalisingly little information about the brothers.

Sharpe related that he had had strong religious instincts from an early age due to his upbringing. A 'conversion experience' as a deacon first turned him towards mission work, and this was followed by the chance discovery of a life of Pere Lacordaire, which impressed him with its account of the latter's prowess as a preacher and the advantage to a missionary of belonging to a religious order. These experiences took place in the Isle of Wight. Before moving on to a curacy at St Mary's, Southampton, he spent Lent in London. On the advice of a friend, he attended the courses of special preachers in London churches, knowing that he would probably never have such an opportunity again. He was greatly impressed by each of the three preachers whose talks he attended: Fr Stanton, Canon Body, and Fr Ignatius. Their cumulative effect was to show him how to reconcile 'conversion' with sacramental religion.

He owed much to his rector, Canon Wilberforce, and to the evangelical spirit which prevailed at St Mary's, Southampton. He found the Keswick Convention of 1887 inspiring, especially the (non-sacramental) confessing of sins and the spiritual direction offered. He seems to have been disedified, however, by the absence of talks on the Holy Eucharist, due (he was told) to the controversy they would have aroused. More impressive still was a visit to Llanthony where he experienced the religious life for the first time at this Benedictine monastery established by Fr Ignatius. As the idea of the religious life began to grow on him, he felt irresistibly that he must begin to live it in some way. When Canon Wilberforce offered him the use of a house for his residence, he removed carpets and furniture to make the rooms as bare as possible and turned one of the rooms into an oratory where he could chant the hours of the Divine Office. Soon after this, taking the first celebration of Holy Communion on Easter Day, 'he felt strongly led to ask God if He would allow him to lead the dedicated life and for his sake to renounce property and marriage. He felt this offering was drawn out of him and there and then accepted.'

When the resolution of Archdeacon Farrar in Convocation for encouraging the formation of brotherhoods in the Church of England was accepted in 1889, Sharpe recorded his feelings thus: 'I felt that the vision which for so long had been before me was now coming nearer and taking a more tangible shape.' Now followed a rather strange episode. Sharpe wrote a letter of support to The Guardian in which he outlined his ideals concerning the monastic life and its revival in the Church of England. To his disappointment, the letter was returned the following day by the editor.⁸ He had written the letter on 14 July 1889. On 21 July he had to preach in the absence of Canon Wilberforce. He took the letter with him into the pulpit. After preaching on the texts for the day, the 5th Sunday after Trinity, texts which seemed particularly relevant to the idea of religious community life for mission work, he went on after a brief hesitation to read out his rejected letter. This left him downcast and dispirited. He had preached too long: the choir left the church at the end of the sermon, thus robbing the congregation of the choral celebration of Holy Communion. Afterwards, amidst general gloom in the sacristy, a young man came in to see him and asked to borrow the manuscript. This man was the acting editor of a provincial newspaper, and he sent Sharpe a letter supporting his views on the foundation of brotherhoods in the Church of England. In his reply, Sharpe declared that a monastic order was needed to prevent the Church being torn to pieces by the contending parties within it, especially if disestablishment took place.

The acting editor printed an article on this in his paper, The Hampshire Advertiser, and many other papers reported and discussed it, both in London and in provincial and colonial papers. It became the current topic of various meetings, including the Winchester Diocesan Conference. The Newberry House Magazine asked him to write an article on it and The Ecclesiastical Gazette offered a prize for the best essay on the subject.

The Guardian dealt with it in a leading article, declaring,

Again, the Rev. C.H. Sharpe in The Newberry House Magazine describes with attractive enthusiasm a scheme of itinerant missionaries, almost identical with the original plan of the Franciscans. They are to go out 'two by two', begging their way if need be, preaching the gospel, and returning to their 'cloister' for occasional rest and retirement.

The article in The Newberry House Magazine led to some criticism in certain periodicals and newspapers, and Sharpe was asked to speak on the subject in various places. One such meeting, in Norwich in June 1890, was to be of importance to him. Fr Maturin of the Cowley Fathers spoke first, and made some good-humoured criticisms of Sharpe's article without realising that the author was present. This incident led, happily, to friendship and collaboration with Fr Maturin.

Not surprisingly, Sharpe submitted an essay on Brotherhoods to The Ecclesiastical Gazette and won the prize of ten guineas. By now his rector, Canon Wilberforce, had become interested and had written to Archbishop Benson on the subject, as a result of which the two men were invited to Addington Park. Sharpe arrived to find that Wilberforce had not appeared and to his consternation he had to speak to Benson without his rector's support. There were some penetrating questions and Sharpe became awkward and confused. However, Wilberforce turned up while they were walking in the garden, perceived from Sharpe's face how things were going, and saved the situation with his customary assurance and persuasiveness, winning the Archbishop's keen interest.

After dinner, there was a long and amiable conversation, mainly between Benson and Sharpe, the latter's confidence now fully restored. The following day, Benson gave him a memorandum on the discussion, part of which Sharpe quoted. The Archbishop indicated that he could not sanction any initiative immediately, but that this was not to be regarded as a check but as a guidance to further consideration and prayer. Sharpe described this document as 'strangely prophetic', but from this point we are left in the dark about subsequent developments as this instalment of the narrative, in the More Hall Magazine, no. 12 (mid-June 1915), was the last. The following issues contained no historical material and the magazine closed after no.19 (mid-October 1916). The War had led to a great increase in the price of paper, and in addition the magazine had always been subsidised with the rent (£100) received annually in respect of a house which belonged as a life interest 'to one of us'. The War had taken away the tenant and the house was now unlet.

Probably another reason for the discontinuance of the magazine was the folding up of the brotherhood which occurred in 1916. What the precise circumstances were will probably never be known. Wartime conditions, including conscription, presumably caused problems. No doubt the brotherhood lacked stability: numerous Anglican communities have failed to survive for more than a few years. Perhaps a significant number of brothers left, either because they lacked a vocation, or because they felt called to join the Roman Catholic Church. It is possible that the 'conversion' of the Caldey community on 5 March 1913 had an influence on the More Hall brotherhood. It is known that two of Sharpe's brothers joined the Caldey community, Joseph Woodford in 1910 and Maurus Gater in 1912. On 1 March 1913 Abbot Aelred Carlyle wrote in a letter to Sharpe: 'your two late brothers, Woodford and Gater, are heart and soul with the community'.⁹ Both became Catholics along with the majority of the community at Caldey. In the letter to Bishop Gore dated 19 February 1913 which was the preliminary to the Conversion, Woodford signed as a monk in simple vows and Gater signed as a novice.¹⁰ The latter did not take vows, joined the Forces and was killed in the War of 1914—18, but Fr Joseph went with the Caldey community to Prinknash in 1928 and moved to Farnborough Abbey when Prinknash took over this house from the Solesmes monks in 1947. Fr Joseph was known to a wide circle of Catholics as the Master of Oblates for Prinknash and Farnborough. He died in 1955.

Apart from these two names, little is known of the membership of Sharpe's community at More Hall. The More Hall Magazine is unhelpful on this score, but perhaps Sharpe wanted to maintain some privacy for the brothers. There is a mention of a Bro. Hampton in no.2 (July 1912): he was in charge of the More Hall Literature Stall at a Sale of Work in Northgate Mansions, Gloucester, on 6 June. In the same issue Sharpe reported the accession of two oblates to the community. The first, not named, was 'an old Gloucester Cathedral chorister and afterwards a master at Handsworth Grammar School'; the second was a man named Ernest V. Alderdice. It may be deduced that they were intern oblates (there is no record of Sharpe receiving any laymen as extern oblates) as he remarked that Alderdice 'lives . . . in a separate department of the house where possible . . .' ¹¹ Nothing more can be gleaned from the magazine. Leonaj[^] Green published a description of the 'monastery' in his book Dream Comrades and referred to 'a little bearded man in the habit of a lay-brother' who opened the door to him and also to brothers working at the printing press. Ronald Knox stayed at More Hall for three weeks during August 1914 and recorded that there was a lay brother who looked after his wants.¹³ A photograph of Sharpe and his community in 1914 was in existence in 1983 but has since disappeared.

Leonard Green, and the reviewer of Dream Comrades, as well as Ronald Knox, all bore witness to the kindness of Fr Sharpe. He was always willing, it would seem, to show visitors around his monastery if they seriously desired to learn something of the life lived by his band of brothers. Leonard Green's romanticised account of the house and grounds conveys clearly an atmosphere of peace, prayer and work. Knox also remarked on this atmosphere. He described it as 'a beautiful country house, the centre of a religious community and an admirable place for retreats'. He had arranged to make up a reading party with some undergraduate friends, but because of enlistment the others did not arrive and Knox therefore used the time for an individual retreat:

. . . I lived in complete solitude (apart from the presence of a lay brother who looked after my wants) corresponding with my friends and devoting my prayers on their behalf. About six hours of the day I spent over my devotions; for the rest I was writing or taking long, lonely walks through the path-ridden woods that crown those admirable hills.

The friendly interest taken by Fr Sharpe in Abbot Aelred Carlyle and his monks has already been noted. From time to time rumours circulated that the Anglican Benedictine community, which had moved in 1906 to the Island of Caldey, was 'going over to Rome'. Each time the rumours proved to be false, but in 1913 after much heart-searching and discussion, matters came to a head. Before official recognition within the Church of England could be considered, the community was required to abandon certain practices which it maintained were 'vital to our conception of the Catholic Faith'. The abbot and twenty-six of his community therefore signed a letter stating that they could not accept these preliminary requirements which were 'so decisive that we are forced to act upon what we believe to be God's Will for us'. On 5 March the Bishop of the Roman Catholic diocese of Menevia, Monsignor Francis Mostyn, received the abbot and twenty-two members of his community into the Roman Catholic Church.¹⁴

The Abbot had issued an official announcement of the action they had decided to take on 26 February. It was quickly taken up by the press. The Daily Express carried a graphic report on 28 February, having sent a reporter to pick up (and embellish) as much picturesque material as possible. On the same day the Church Times carried a leading article and an editorial on the subject, both highly critical of Carlyle's action. Sharpe was most concerned at the news. The following morning he sent a telegram to Carlyle: 'Church Times seems unfair if I can do anything please tell me'. While not unsympathetic towards Carlyle, he showed particular concern for those members of the community who had not decided to join the Roman Catholic Church. He sent a second telegram the same day: 'Please let any not following you come to More Hall and continue their life there without a break until things settled'.¹⁵ Thus began a campaign by Sharpe to attract to More Hall what has often been referred to as the 'remnant'. He persevered with his efforts for some two months.

Sharpe may not have known in the first instance how many of the community at Caldey had not 'gone over' to Rome, namely eleven. Carlyle wrote to Sharpe on 1 March in reply to the first telegram (and perhaps to the second also) sent that day:

Thank you so much for your kind thought and sympathy. Yes, the Church Times has printed a most vindictive and unfair attack, but it really is not so bad as I expected . . . I think it is best to let things alone . . . I am sending you herewith a copy of the whole correspondence which has been the means of revealing God's Will to us.

Carlyle did not respond specifically to the offer of a home at More Hall for the monks who had remained in the Church of England. In fact nine had already made their separate departures: the remaining two became Catholic by mid-April.

Sharpe must, however, have been encouraged to continue with his plan by a letter he received from the Rev. Stanley Monnington, a priest at Clapham, offering to join the 'remnant' at More Hall, together with another unnamed priest, if they could be of assistance. Sharpe then drafted a lengthy letter taking up seven pages of manuscript to the Church Times. This was published on 7 March. In it Sharpe intimated to . . . my recent Caldey brethren who have not at present any definite plan before them, that I should be very pleased to welcome them to our Community House at More Hall if they would like a quiet place in which to continue their life while they look around them, and until they clearly see their way and come to some conclusion as to their future course. One of the brethren has already decided to make our home his for the present, and there may be others . . . who might like to do the same.

The brother in question was Raymund Weekes, an intern oblate, who had signed the letter to Bishop Gore but had not followed the others in joining the Roman Catholic Church. It is known that Weekes was still at More Hall in mid-April, ¹⁶ but there is no information available of how long he remained with Sharpe.

Sharpe next directed his efforts towards Fr Denys Prideaux, an intern oblate, who had been Warden of the Guest House at Caldey. He wrote to him at Cowley offering the use of More Hall:

If you see your way to continuing the Benedictine Life at More Hall, there it is, and it might become its permanent property. It is mine absolutely to give or bequeath . . . Why not now come and try things out. Weekes is coming on Tuesday.

He renewed his offer in a further letter on 13 March and outlined his hopes for a community with a Benedictine nucleus of oblate students, writers and preachers, the Benedictine principles to be specially recast for this proposed brotherhood. Fr Denys' replies, if any, are not extant. In fact, the 'loyal remnant' (Fr Denys and two others) were not lacking in offers of accommodation from well-wishers.

Lord Halifax offered Painsthorpe Hall and the Cowley Fathers suggested Mailing Abbey which was vacant.¹⁷ Properties near Tenby and in Cheshire were also proposed. One offer was eventually accepted: the Abbey House at Pershore which had been given to Caldey Abbey in 1910 by its owner, Henry Wise. It had remained empty because the community was not numerous enough to man another foundation. After the 'conversion', the property was returned to the donor, who considered that it belonged to the 'loyal remnant'.

At this time, Sharpe was also trying a third approach in his sustained attempt to bring the 'remnant' to More Hall. The Rev. A. Blaker wrote to him on 7 March giving the name of Dom Anselm Mardon as the one who might be able to rally the 'remnant' together to resume the Benedictine life in a new community and conveying the announcement by Henry Wise that Pershore belonged to those who had remained Anglicans. On 8 March Sharpe received a letter from Anselm in response to the letter in the Church Times. He told Sharpe that he felt incapable of organising a new community himself, but would like to be put in touch with others who were interested. He also mentioned that Lord Halifax had offered a house in Cheshire. Sharpe thereupon wrote to Anselm on 11 March, offering him More Hall for the formation of a new community on Benedictine lines but adapted to contemporary needs. Sharpe even offered himself as a member of this proposed community.

Sharpe next approached Lord Halifax. In a letter of 14 March he gave his arguments in favour of More Hall being taken over by the 'remnant'. He and his brothers would become intern oblates under Anselm. He enclosed for Halifax a copy of the More Hall Magazine and pointed out the facilities available, especially the good chapel, the fine library, and the printing department. Two days later he wrote both to Halifax and to Anselm proposing a conference of the 'remnant' and others having an interest in their future, at More Hall. This suggestion was not taken up. Halifax replied to Sharpe that it was useless to attempt anything until it was known for certain who had not followed Carlyle into the Roman Catholic Church. He enclosed a letter from Anselm dated 17 March explaining the impossibility of reconstituting an Anglican monastic community. Two potential recruits, Bro. David Tugwell and Bro. Augustine Hurlstone-Jones, seemed likely to join the Roman Catholic Church, leaving only Anselm himself and three former oblates. 'Personally, I feel quite incapable, now that I have lost the support of the priests who left Caldey with me, of attempting to continue to carry on our life.' He stressed that he needed to find suitable employment, and employment which would permit him to continue with his office and other observances. Anselm had joined Caldey in 1907 and was the only fully professed monk not to 'go over' to Rome.

Sharpe did not give up his efforts yet. On 24 March he wrote again to Halifax, hoping perhaps that Halifax might be able to persuade Anselm to take up the offer of More Hall. Characteristically, he enclosed copies of letters he had written to Anselm and to Denys. On the same day he wrote to Anselm offering him money for his fare and free lodging at More Hall if only he would give it a trial for a few months. He stressed how much he wanted to save Anselm's vocation and how his example would have heartened others. Anselm replied on 28 March: he was grateful to Sharpe, but the situation was hopeless; there was no 'remnant' left, and Anselm himself was looking for work. '. . . personally, without the help of the others I feel quite unable to take upon myself the responsibility of attempting any kind of revival of our life.'

Letters written by Sharpe during April show that he was still trying to bring together a 'remnant' at More Hall, still urging that a conference be called, and still pressing his views on Lord Halifax (and enclosing yet again copies of various letters). No further letters are extant, but Sharpe presumably abandoned his campaign when in September 1913 Dom Anselm Mardon, Fr Denys Prideaux and another who had been an intern oblate at Caldey, Bro. Charles Hutson, took up residence at Pershore. Anselm returned to Caldey on 1 September 1915, was received into the Roman Catholic Church, entered the novitiate, and shortly afterwards took simple vows. He left the community in 1919. The two monks at Pershore persisted in their monastic vocation, and after many vicissitudes the community grew into the well known monastery of Nashdom.

Meanwhile, as we have seen, Sharpe's brotherhood seems to have folded up during 1916. A factor in this may have been developments in Sharpe's own convictions, because in 1917 he joined the Roman Catholic Church, becoming very friendly with Bishop Burton of Clifton and Abbot Cuthbert Butler of Downside. He did not become a Catholic priest, but Bishop Burton gave him minor orders and allowed him to continue to be known as 'Father' Sharpe. Thereafter he lived the life of a recluse, devoting himself to prayer and study. He had built a chapel on the north-west corner of More Hall for the brotherhood and he continued a lone monastic life. Despite this way of life, however, he seems to have endeared himself to the inhabitants of the neighbourhood and to have been noted for his scholarship if the obituary notices in local newspapers are to be trusted.¹⁸

When the Catholic monks of Caldey moved to their new home at Prinknash Park in 1928, he was able to resume his friendship with the community. On 1 March 1932 he was visited by the Prior, Dom Benedict Stuart, who was accompanied by Dom Joseph Woodford and Dom Dyfrig Rushton. According to Abbot Dyfrig,¹⁹ Sharpe discussed the possibility of bequeathing More Hall and the library to Prinknash Priory. The Prior demurred at the offer of More Hall, but expressed interest in the library. Sharpe was apparently displeased with this response, and in the end left neither the Hall nor the library to Prinknash. The same night he suffered a stroke, from which he did not recover. He was nursed by the 'Blue Nuns' at Clifton and died on 11 March. In his will he left More Hall and its furniture to the 'Blue Nuns' and, after certain bequests, the residue of his estate was left in trust for the maintenance of students for the Roman Catholic priesthood.²⁰ Sharpe's library was presumably disposed of under the final provision as noted above. It was a valuable library, and there was some regret at Prinknash that it did not come to them. Among many items they would have liked to have inherited was Migne's Patrologia. Many of these books were acquired by Downside Abbey, about fifty books being purchased on 30 July 1932 and about forty others at various times down to 1934. It is believed that some of these books went to Worth Priory which was founded from Downside in 1933, including the Migne.²¹

From 1932 until 1968 the Sisters of the Temple, a French nursing order founded at Dorat, Haute-Vienne, in 1858 and known popularly as the 'Blue Nuns', conducted a nursing home for ladies at More Hall. They made various internal alterations and it is not always easy to envisage the rooms as they were during the occupancy by Fr Sharpe's brotherhood. On 22 August 1968 More Hall was taken over by the Benedictine Sisters of Our Lady of Grace and Compassion and made into a home for the elderly and frail. More Hall is one of twenty-four such houses organised by these sisters. They are a new and developing order, established in 1959 when Bishop Cyril Cowderoy of Southwark invited Mary Garson and her small band of lay helpers to form a Congregation with a lay branch. Miss Garson had founded the first 'House of Hospitality', as each of their houses is called, in Brighton in 1954. She was then an educational psychologist, and was appalled to find on visiting a house in Brighton a partially-sighted lady in her seventies trying to look after two bed-ridden friends, all in dreadful conditions. The congregation has grown rapidly and in addition to their houses in England, they work in India and Sri Lanka.

In 1978 they adopted the Benedictine Rule. Fr Sharpe would surely have approved of the way in which they combine a full monastic life, with sung Divine Office and time for lectio divina and personal prayer, with their busy and active apostolate of conducting houses of hospitality. Their life reflects in many ways his own ideals of monastic life combined with active work. Further alterations have been made to the house at More Hall as well as additions. The accession of Mother Mary Garson's sisters to the Benedictine family provides us with yet one more link between More Hall and Prinknash Park. Naturally enough, the older community has assisted the newer in such ways as giving talks on the Rule of St Benedict, and helping with liturgical music. The Master of Oblates has helped the sisters to establish their own extern oblates, an activity to which the sisters attach considerable importance because the work of their congregation is conceived fundamentally as carried on with lay helpers and associates.

At the end of 1982 the 'Blue Nuns' from Bristol brought to Prinknash a packet of papers which had accompanied them when they left More Hall. These were the letters and cuttings which Sharpe had kept, which form the basis of this account and provided the motive to investigate the history of More Hall.

THE CORPUS CHRISTI CARMELITES

The Sisters now known as Corpus Christi Carmelites, emerged from a little group of three women who came together in a rented house at 134 New Walk, Leicester, in September 1908. They were a mother and two daughters. One of the daughters, Clare Ellerker, was the inspirer and leader. She had been accepted by Bishop Brindle of Nottingham into his diocese to undertake some educational and social work.

Clare was born at Handsworth in Birmingham in October 1875 and was baptized in St Mary's Church of England, Handsworth, in January 1876. As a small child she one day heard a conversation between her father and a visitor, one of whom said,

As a child I learned the Bible well. I do not believe nowadays in what it says, but I do think that these Catholics and people like Newman are in a way sensible. They take Our Lord's words literally when he says 'This is my Body'. And that is what Catholics believe — that God is really there in everyone of their churches.

The little girl noted this and decided that when she grew up she would belong to the church which had God in it. She later consulted the Bible until she found the relevant text and she then announced to her startled family that she wished to become a Catholic. They were able to keep the burning problem in hand until she was about fourteen, when she confided in a friend of the family who was a Catholic. This friend got the advice of a solicitor as to the legal position of a minor in the situation. She was told that if the girl left home and was supporting herself she would be outside her father's jurisdiction. When she now announced her intention of going out as a domestic servant, her father rather than face the prospect of the disruption which this would cause in the family and the further unpleasantness which would ensue if he got a court order to compel her to return, allowed Clare to go to a Catholic school. She was taught by the Assumption Sisters at Kensington and at the age of sixteen-and-a-half was received into the Church by Fr Hugh Pope at the Oratory, Birmingham. The family name was Perrins, but Clare got her name legally changed to that of Ellerker, a Catholic ancestor on her mother's side of the family, one member of the Ellerkers, a Yorkshire family, had taken part in the Pilgrimage of Grace.

Clare continued her education and as an extern student of St Andrew's University was awarded a Diploma which gave her the title of L.L.A. (Lady Literate of Arts). She taught for some time at the Assumption College, Kensington, as well as at the school run by the Servite Sisters at Dorking, Surrey. She later also taught at St Mary's, Hampstead.

In 1903 she became Head Mistress of the Catholic College at Olton, Birmingham, run by the Sisters of Our Lady of Compassion. She entered their Novitiate at St Denis, France, in 1906 and was for some time a novice there. By mutual agreement, it would seem, it was decided that she was not suited to their way of life. Hence, in 1908, we find her approaching Bishop Brindle of Nottingham with a suggestion that she would like to do some apostolic work in his diocese. Dr Brindle asked her to come to Leicester to open a Secondary School as there was no such Catholic School in the town. It was understood that this was to be undertaken by a group of Religious women living in community.

Some years previously Miss Ellerker's mother and two sisters had also been received into the Church. One sister was already a member of the Congregation of the Sisters of St Paul of Chartres at Selly Park, Birmingham. The father had apparently now left the family. The first three who were to begin this adventure in Holy Cross Parish, Leicester, were Clare, her mother and sister, Ethel. They very soon came under the care of the parish priest, Fr Vincent McNabb. He was protector, supporter, friend and spiritual adviser of the group for the next six years. After a few months some others had come to join the little group.

In January 1909 they opened a school at 8 West Walk. It was not confined to any age group as whole families came (aged six to sixteen), and it was non-denominational. Clare and all that first group were converts. From the beginning they had for their particular aim the reunion of Christendom.

They also began to take an active part in the life of Holy Cross and surrounding parishes. They had religious instruction classes for intending converts as well as children. They visited prisons and hospitals. A member of the Community was on the executive of the Health Council, the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, and the Catholic Social Guild. She also held office on the Board of Guardians. The sisters sat up at night with the sick and the dying.

It should be stated before all this account of activities, that they were being formed in the religious life under the spiritual direction of Fr Vincent McNabb, who also introduced them to the recitation of the Divine Office. Their spirituality was Dominican in character — prayer always as a foundation whose natural fruit was apostolic work. They had a regular way of life with set times for community prayer and silence. They were officially a Chapter of the Third Order of St Dominic — Dominican Oblates of the Blessed Sacrament. They lived in community and after some years assumed a religious habit — the black and white of the Dominicans. Many years were to elapse before they were accepted by the Church as Third Order Regular Sisters with the three vows. They took private vows and had ceremonies of Reception and Profession, with a training time as postulants and novices.

One of their great works was providing retreats, first for women and girls, later for men and boys. Their first venture into a retreat for boys caused some little confusion and worry. Having arranged for Fr Bede Jarrett OP to come, the Sisters, as the date drew near, thought 'supposing only a few turn up and this is such a noted preacher'. They wrote and asked him for how many did he think it was worth his while to turn up — and the reply came back, 'One, I could not come for less than one!' In fact, they had a record attendance.

Another work undertaken under the auspices of the Catholic Missionary Fathers, whose head was Fr Herbert Vaughan, was known as the Motor Missions. If a Mission was to be preached in a particular area in any part of the country, a band of women under Miss Anstice Baker would prepare the ground for the Missionaries. They would visit the area beforehand, put out posters announcing the Mission, and visit each in the town or village inviting the people to attend the lectures. The Sisters were privileged to be invited to take part in this work. They helped in Missions at East Dereham, Wymondham, Baldock, Stevenage, Pershore, Tenterden, Fowey, Sea View, Treorchy, and Church Stretton, the last-named at the outbreak of the First World War.

The talks were usually attended by some of the Protestants in the area and the visiting team were everywhere received with courtesy. Motor Mission is a literal description. The chapel was the inside of a motor vehicle and van. The chapel car was drawn up in a field and there each morning the priests said their Mass.

From 1916 to 1919 the Sisters had a house at 47 Parkhill, London which was largely used for retreat work. They also had a small foundation at Rothley, Leicester, where they conducted a school and evangelised the local district, helping and encouraging many lapsed to return to the practice of their religion.

Another mission, undertaken at Aylestone, Leicester, was on the lines of the Motor Mission. Two Sisters visited this area and found numbers of people who had lapsed and children not baptized. These were brought on Sundays to be baptized at Holy Cross. The Sisters had the great joy of preparing a room over a bakery for the first Mass to be said in Aylestone since the Reformation, attended by forty-one people.

In 1919 Archbishop Dowling OP, Port of Spain, Trinidad, asked the Corpus Christi Sisters to go there to undertake some apostolic work. Three went in 1919. Their first work there was the care of the elderly in a hospice. That work is still being carried on by the Sisters on the same site. In 1920 three further pioneers took up missionary work in Duluth, Minnesota. They were engaged in parish work and later they had a home for delinquent girls. Further foundations were made in both the U.S.A. and Trinidad, as well as other West Indian Islands. The original Leicester foundation had engaged in new works as the needs arose, e.g. accommodation for students and clubs for working girls.

Through the years the Sisters had sought canonical status — as religious with three public vows. All avenues were closed however. They were a group of Tertiaries living in community known as the Corpus Christi Chapter — using a modified form of the Dominican Constitutions. Their position, particularly in the U.S.A., was becoming somewhat outdated. Other similar groups who were engaged in pastoral activities had been recognised by the Church as religious. Therefore, when the opportunity arose of being thus recognised, the Sisters were pleased to accept. An invitation was received in 1926 from the Carmelite Fathers in Chicago to affiliate with that Congregation as Third Order Regular with the special mission to propagate the Little Way of St Therese. The Congregation had wanted to form such a group and they found in the Corpus Christi Sisters the foundations for such a work — people who were already striving to live a life of prayer and union with God and had also a particular devotion to St Therese. The foundress was herself very committed to the Little Way and had communicated it to her religious family. An indication of the wishes of the Sisters and the necessary Rule Books and existing Constitutions were submitted to the Generalate at Rome in March 1927 and on the Feast of St Simon Stock, 16 May 1927, the Corpus Christi Sisters were formally affiliated to the Carmelite Order with the title of Corpus Christi Carmelites.

In 1929 the Sisters in Trinidad and the U.S.A. made their first vows as Religious and Corpus Christi Carmelites. The Leicester house had to be given up in 1927 and the remaining Sisters transferred to Trinidad. There was no house of Corpus Christi Carmelites in England until 1952 when a Children's Home was opened in Kirby Muxloe, Leicester, and a novitiate house at Shorne, Kent, in 1954.

The final formalities of affiliation, such as deciding on the location of the Mother House and getting the approval of the Sacred Congregation of Religious, were not completed until 1929, but the Sisters were still amazed at the ease by which they became fully fledged Religious and Carmelites after all the strivings and disappointments of the years. 'After years of trial and waiting — twenty years for some of us — God has placed the seal of His Church on our dear Corpus Christi' (from Mother Foundress's letter, 11 February 1929).

The Congregation had previously consisted of American and English Sisters only but in 1927 the Trinidad houses began to accept the local girls, first as a type of lay Sister called Oblates of St Therese but now all the Sisters belong to the one group. The position at present is that the West Indian Sisters are filling the needs in other countries especially in England.

This then is an account of the beginnings, the early birth pangs of a religious group, and the realization of a dream of a woman of whom it was said that she was sixty years ahead of her time. Her ideas did not accord with the existing pattern of religious life. She was therefore a misfit in the Congregation which she first joined and a thorn in the side of some bishops and priests. Her approach to active apostolic work was also forward-looking. She and her Sisters were prepared to go anywhere and do any work that would serve the people of God. The questions they were asked were, 'If you are not Religious, what are you? If you are Religious, why are you doing these things?'

The inspirer of this work and the Foundress was known as Mother Mary of the Blessed Sacrament — affectionately called 'Little Mother'. She died in 1949.

The facts related in this account have been taken from letters, chronicles, early minute books and some primary source material from the notes of one of the pioneer Sisters.

THE ARCHIVES

When I was appointed Regional Archivist in 1979, I had no predecessor. On the principle that 'work begun is half done', or that one must begin somewhere, I got an envelope and in it I put a pamphlet which had been written by Fr Aloysius Mullins on our Congregation, one of our little vocation leaflets, and I think a photograph. I listed the contents on the envelope. I should have kept this as an archive. Unfortunately, I had not yet heard of the Catholic Archives Society, and had not learned that a good archivist does not destroy but preserves.

However, in time I accumulated some more material — circular letters, copies of our Mother Foundress's first letters to Bishop Brindle, and some of our early chronicles. I have found myself playing the part of detective, historian and archivist in turn. I had to dig and search, and go to record offices, etc. to try to find information about the life of our Foundress and other material. There was not one central place where any reasonable amount of information was stored. Our Mother House had been moved on three separate occasions, perhaps that accounted for the confusion.

After a few years, I was asked to consider myself General Archivist. Our Mother House is now in Trinidad so most of the records are kept there. I have spent six weeks there trying to get some order into the material. This task is by no means finished. I was fortunate in that I had a predecessor in that area. One of our older English sisters who had been in Trinidad for many years had a sense of history and accumulated quite a lot of useful information and papers. The collection here at present comprises early foundational documents, notes on Mother Foundress's life, some of the books written by her, and circular letters of subsequent Superiors General. These items are arranged in acid-free cardboard boxes, with a catalogue of contents listed on the cover. As we are such a small group and of comparatively recent foundation, the contents are small. Moreover, the material is not all together in one place. There is a lot of the material proper to the general archives at the Mother House. The Archivist resides here and wings are expensive. The position, therefore, is that the archives are at present only at the halfway stage.

THE CORRESPONDENCE OF

MARGARET PHILLIPPS DE LISLE AND W.E. GLADSTONE

Bernard Elliott

Margaret Phillipps de Lisle was born on 31 May 1855, the seventh daughter and fifteenth child of Ambrose and Laura Phillipps de Lisle. Ambrose was born in 1809, while Laura was born in Germany two years later. Ambrose was a convert, being received into the Church by Fr Macdonnell at Loughborough in 1825. But Laura was a born Catholic, a member of the old Catholic family of the Cliffords of Ugbrook, Devon. Ambrose and Laura were married in 1833 and in 1834 their first child, Ambrose Charles, was born and in 1860 their last child, also a boy, Gerard, was born, and between these two boys they had seven other boys and seven daughters.

Margaret was educated first at home by private tutors and then at the age of thirteen she was sent to continue her education at the Ursuline Convent at Boulogne. There she remained for the next three years and then she returned home to assist her parents. She was a brilliant scholar and a considerable theologian and corresponded with many eminent people, such as Newman, Manning and W.E. Gladstone. She began her correspondence with Gladstone in March 1878 and over the next five years letters were regularly exchanged by them and, though Gladstone became Prime Minister in 1880 and so was greatly concerned with matters of great moment, he always answered her letters courteously.

The first letter in the correspondence was written on 19 February 1878 when Margaret informed Gladstone that her father was still very seriously ill with gangrene in the foot. She also said that Ambrose valued Gladstone's friendship most highly. The next day Gladstone replied that he hoped that Ambrose would continue to improve. On 22 February Margaret again wrote to Gladstone: 'Your kind and beautiful letter gave my father much pleasure'. Then Margaret referred to the election of the new Pope, hoping that he might do much to promote the great work of reunion, for which Ambrose had striven throughout his life. Then Margaret said that she would give Gladstone a report every few days but did not expect him to answer each letter, since he had so much to do. Margaret's next letter followed on 27 February in which she stated that on the previous evening Ambrose had spoken to various members of his family giving all of them appropriate advice. He also prayed especially for Gladstone, asking the latter's pardon for any misunderstanding that may have occurred between the two in discussing Church matters. On 4 March Gladstone replied to the effect that in a long course of years no misunderstanding had ever occurred between them and Gladstone added, 'May the Almighty in all his care and love be with you all at this juncture'. The next day, 5 March, Margaret wrote that her father had died on 4 March: 'To-day about 9.30 he entered, I trust, into the peace of God, never more to be broken or taken from him.' Gladstone replied on 6 March:

Even I, who knew him only as it were from afar, have a feeling of the loss and void which follows the removal of something so difficult to match. [Gladstone finished by saying:] I cherish the hope that he may have learned the news of the peace in the east before he passed into a deeper peace.

A week later, on 12 March, Margaret gave Gladstone news of her father's funeral: 'On Saturday last his earthly remains were laid to rest in the Church of the Monastery he founded and loved so well.' She then went on to say how her father had hoped and prayed that Gladstone would one day be led to see and embrace the Truth: 'So I implore him to pray earnestly for light and if I should be admitted into the Divine Presence I will continuously beg of God to grant him the greatest of blessings — True Faith.'

Gladstone replied to Margaret's letter on the next day, 13 March, and the reply contained Gladstone's view of the Church of England: 'I do not optimise about the Church of England. Long and dispassionate reflection have shown me that it is not difficult to make good various and serious charges against her.' Then Gladstone went on to say how, in his opinion, what are called conversions and the strife connected with them have tended very largely to the profit of scepticism, unbelief and indifference. He ended this long letter as follows:

Proselytism in any direction has not for me the charm that it might once have had and my prayer is that the tendency of the little I can say or do may be to build up in their most holy faith those who believe in Christ.

In her reply, on 18 March 1878, Margaret thanked Gladstone for stating so courteously his views of the Church of England, and then went on to say: 'As a Catholic I cannot of course share it but I think that I can understand it.' Then Margaret informed him that a few days ago her mother had received from the President of the A.P.U.C. a copy of resolutions passed at their last meeting expressing condolence with her and their own regret at the great loss sustained by all who work for and desire the reunion of Christendom. Margaret ended her letter by expressing the hope that Gladstone would continue to share with her the friendship which Gladstone had with her father. Gladstone did not reply until 12 April and then it was very short: 'In much haste many thanks.'

Margaret's next letter was written on 8 June, St William's Day, in which she informed Gladstone that Mass had been offered for him in various places. Then she gave Gladstone news that North Leicestershire was in the throes of an election, but though she was as strong a Liberal as ever she would refrain on this occasion from working for the Liberals. Gladstone does not seem to have answered Margaret's announcement that she was abstaining from politics for a while, for her next letter was written on 24 August when she informed Gladstone that she was sending him a short sketch of Ambrose's life and that they were thinking of having a longer life written later on. On 27 August Gladstone acknowledged receipt of the sketch and was glad to hear that a longer life was planned, since Ambrose's life formed a sensible portion of the religious history of this country at a most interesting and critical period.

Margaret continued the correspondence on 2 December in a letter in which she first congratulated Gladstone upon the influence he had exerted to modify the Government's policy in regard to the Treaty of Berlin. Then she reminded Gladstone that, though he had renounced the title of the leader of the Liberal party, yet he still had the power and the duty to lead it so that the country could again become united under his banner. Then she criticized Gladstone for an article which he had written in the October Contemporary in which he had stated that the French writer Montalembert died in mental resistance to the decree of papal infallibility passed at the Vatican Council. According to Margaret, however, a few days before his death Montalembert stated that he would accept the dogma if the Council should decree it. So, Margaret argued that it was a case of mental admission rather than mental resistance.

Within a few days of receiving Margaret's letter, Gladstone replied in which he thanked her for her kind words about the Treaty of Berlin. Then he stood by his previous statement in regard to Montalembert's attitude to papal infallibility, though he wrote that he would be glad to have the opportunity to discuss the matter with her. On 10 December Margaret replied. She thanked Gladstone for his kindness in suggesting that they might meet to discuss various matters, but she felt that the opportunity was remote, since she now went so little to London. Then she returned to the question of Montalembert and reiterated what she had written in her previous letter that Montalembert had not at any time the remotest intention of resistance or rebellion against the Holy See. On 30 December Gladstone replied, thanking her for her letter, wishing her a happy New Year, but not pursuing the question of Montalembert any further.

On 27 April 1879 Margaret wrote from Biarritz, informing Gladstone that she wished to lay before him a family matter of importance in which she would like to have the benefit of his opinion. Then she said how pleased she was to learn that he had consented to contest Mid Lothian. Gladstone replied on 1 May by postcard, asking Margaret to write at once and fully and her letter would have his prompt and most willing attention.

On 5 May Margaret wrote a long letter to him laying before him the family matter of great importance. Her sister, Alice, had married Arthur Strutt, the second son of Lord Belper and a Protestant, but he had agreed to leave the religious upbringing of any children of the marriage to Alice and upon the strength of this undertaking Alice obtained the dispensation necessary for the marriage. In 1874, Alice gave birth to a boy, Edward, whereupon Lord Belper informed Arthur that the boy had to be brought up as a Protestant, threatening to disinherit him if he did not comply. So Arthur reneged on his word and Edward was baptized as a Protestant. But after a few months Arthur had second thoughts on the matter and allowed a Catholic priest to baptize the boy. And when a daughter was born in the following year she too was baptized as a Catholic. When, however, Lord Belper heard of his grandchildren being baptized as Catholics, he was furious and once more threatened to disinherit Arthur unless he made a will insisting that the children should be brought up as Protestants. Accordingly, Arthur made a will to that effect. But once more Arthur began to have second thoughts on the matter, when he was suddenly killed in February 1876 by falling into a wheel at his factory at Belper. At once Edward's two guardians took care of the boy insisting that the terms of Arthur's will should be carried out and that the two children should be brought up as Protestants. But Alice maintained that Arthur's will did not represent his real wishes at the time of his death and that the guardians were in equity bound to regard his wishes rather than the mere statement of a will which he had intended to change. But the guardians stated their intention of making the boy a ward in Chancery so as to obtain the necessary power to enforce the carrying out of the will. Moreover, the guardians had forbidden Alice to take the boy with her to church or to teach him Catholic doctrine. Consequently, Alice had taken the boy to Spain and Margaret stated that it would be of great use to Alice if she could quote Gladstone's opinion in her favour. On 12 May 1879, he replied. He stated that this particular question was one of a very delicate and complex character and he had consulted several eminent lawyers, as a result of which he suggested that Alice should point out to the Court the possibility of her husband's change of mind over the will which might make the Court direct that the boy should be brought up as a Catholic. On 14 May Margaret replied in a letter written from San Sebastian in which she stated that she was sending Gladstone's letter to her brother-in-law, Lord Edward Howard, for his perusal. On 24 May Margaret wrote another letter to Gladstone in which she stressed once more that Arthur Strutt was intending to alter his will but that death prevented him from doing so. In this letter Margaret referred to the elevation of John Henry Newman to the cardinalate hoping that it would prove the means of bringing his old Church for which he always felt so much love nearer if only by one step to the Church he felt it his most sacred duty to adhere.

A further letter to Gladstone followed on 5 June, written also from San Sebastian. It seems that Lord Howard had an interview with the guardians in the hope that they would agree to the children being brought up as Catholics, but the guardians took the view that nothing had occurred since the making of the will to invalidate it in any way. Accordingly, Alice would have to stay abroad for the present, beyond the jurisdiction of the English courts and that she could return to England when Edward was fourteen when he could choose his own religion. In conclusion, Margaret renewed her expression of gratitude to Gladstone for all that he had done. On 4 August 1879, Margaret wrote another letter to Gladstone in which she spoke of the great debt which Ambrose owed to the Evangelical school of the Church of England: 'His earliest religious training was given him by an uncle of Evangelical tendencies who died young, but Ambrose never ceased to consider him a saint.' Another Evangelical cleric who exercised considerable influence upon Ambrose was Bishop Ryder. Ambrose, however, did not rest content with Evangelical teaching but 'hastened on his journey to the Eternal City.' On 14 September Gladstone replied:

My correspondence always in hopeless arrears is now brought to a head by a start for the continent. On Wednesday I hope to reach the Tegernsee to spend a few days with Dr Dollinger, Lord Aston and his family; thence to the Dolomite country and afterwards to Venice. [Then Gladstone referred to the difficulties facing Alice] I am truly sorry that this controversy continues with its painful accompaniments and consequences.

Margaret next wrote to Gladstone on Christmas Eve 1879 in which she stated that she was sending him Fr Tondini's book on the Supremacy of St Peter. She hoped that she could count upon his great influence to further the work of peace in religious matters as well as in things political. Then she congratulated him upon the speeches he had lately made in Scotland. On 27 December Gladstone replied from Hawarden. Fr Tondini's book had arrived and he had read part of it but he was reluctant to argue with Margaret about it, telling her that when he had the happiness of meeting a man like Ambrose, little did he care for the secondary matters in which they might not have the same point of view. He concluded this letter as follows: 'Do not suppose I presume to take it upon me to condemn proselytism, but my sympathies do not lie in that direction. May we all make some little way to the work of knowing Christ.'

Margaret replied on 29 December and informed Gladstone that she was sending him a photograph of Ambrose: 'As you know, my father had older friends than you but not one I think whom he loved more dearly or admired more.' Next day Gladstone wrote back: 'I accept the photograph most thankfully. Fr Tondini's translation will not hold water for a moment: a school-boy who held to it would be in great danger.' On New Year's Day 1880, Margaret replied. She regretted that Fr Tondini was guilty of inaccuracy of translation and then she confided to Gladstone the great debt which she owed him:

When you came here in 1874, I was passing through a stage of infidelity and was first roused to a sense of its folly by the strong impression made upon me by your intense religious earnestness. You spoke too in glowing terms of Newman and that was my first practical introduction to his writings which God has designed to use as His chief instrument in confirming my faith.

On 3 January 1880 another letter from Margaret followed. She thanked him heartily for the copy of his Glasgow address which had arrived that morning. Once more she thanked Gladstone for having been instrumental in saving her wavering faith.

In April 1880 there was a general election and Margaret's letter to Gladstone written on 13 March contains references to it. She hoped that he would not prove obdurate when the time came for him to resume the place which was obviously his. Margaret told him that she was striving to enlighten many of her neighbours, though she admitted that the country gentry were hopeless. Nevertheless, in her opinion, the contest in North Leicestershire would be close. But Margaret confided in Gladstone that she had her difficulties, since her brother Ambrose Charles, was a rabid Tory, 'Having started in life as a radical, he now shows all the proverbial bitterness of an apostate.'

The next letter in the series was written on 4 November 1880 by Margaret who informed Gladstone that her brother Ambrose Charles was marrying Lady Violet Sandys, whose family were Liberals. Unfortunately, the lady was far from rich and Ambrose Charles had only £2,000 a year for his personal use. It would seem therefore that Gracedieu might have to be sold. So Margaret asked Gladstone's opinion whether he thought that Ambrose Charles should sell at once or wait. The next day Gladstone replied to Margaret's letter to the effect that land would not depreciate in value despite the agricultural depression and therefore Ambrose Charles should wait before selling Gracedieu.

On 6 November Margaret replied thanking Gladstone for his prompt reply and on 27 November she wrote another letter in which she stated that she was sending him a book written by Abbe Martin on Anglican Ritualism. She also mentioned that she and her sister Winifred had come up to London for their brother's wedding and that they had ventured to call at Downing Street in the hope of finding them at home, but unfortunately they were out.

On 7 December 1880, Margaret wrote another long letter to Gladstone in which she referred to his pamphlet The Vatican Decrees, which Gladstone had written in 1874, and in which Gladstone had urged his fellow Roman Catholic citizens to oppose the decree of papal infallibility. According to Margaret,

Ambrose had begged Gladstone not to publish it but, when Lord Acton had advised its publication, Ambrose had withdrawn his opposition to the pamphlet. One good effect of the pamphlet was to force the Catholic prelates of England to solemnly repudiate the exaggerated views of papal infallibility. On 12 December Gladstone answered Margaret. According to him, Ambrose had never opposed the pamphlet and Gladstone had never solicited Acton's approval of it. At the Reformation, Gladstone wrote, an anti-papal clause was inserted into the Litany, which showed how much the reformers were acting against the Pope, little realizing that they were severing the Church in England from the Western Church at large.

On Christmas Eve 1880, Margaret wrote her reply in which she thanked Gladstone for his explanation of the part taken by Ambrose with regard to the publication of Gladstone's pamphlet and acknowledged the fact that she had been in error over the matter. Then she mentioned the difficulties with which Gladstone had to deal, especially in regard to Ireland: 'The remedy you are preparing for Ireland seems to be sorely needed and I suppose will be as fully opposed.' A few days later, on 28 December, Margaret sent her best wishes to Gladstone on his 71st birthday, hoping that God would preserve him in health for many years to come.

In the early part of 1881 Margaret went to stay with her sister Winifred at Glossop Hall, the home of Lord Edward Howard, whom Winifred had married, though he was some thirty years older than she was. From there on 4 March Margaret wrote to Gladstone: 'To-morrow is my father's third anniversary. You will not forget to say some short prayer for him. Myself, I pray rather to him than for him.'

The correspondence ceased for a while in the summer of 1881, for during that time Margaret went on pilgrimage to Lourdes. So, when she wrote to Gladstone on 23 August she stated that she was sending him a little rosary of Pyrenean blood-stone which she had bought at Lourdes: 'I think if you went to Lourdes you would not fail to be struck by the amount of evidence to be found there of both physical and spiritual cures.' On 1 September Margaret sent Gladstone another letter in which she thanked him for accepting the rosary and then on 25 November she sent him another letter in which she referred to the outcome of the negotiations about the education of Arthur Strutt's children. At long last the guardians had agreed that they should be brought up as Catholics and for the time being they were to remain in Spain with their mother.

On 9 May 1882 Margaret wrote to Gladstone congratulating him on his efforts to improve the Irish situation, to which Gladstone replied on 31 May: 'I can assure that I am not unhopeful about my work in Ireland.'

On 2 June 1882, Margaret wrote to Gladstone about a course of lectures to be given by Fr Hyacinthe Loyson, on Catholic Reform. She asked him not to give any encouragement to this priest who favoured bringing up children as atheists rather than ultramontanes. Gladstone was too busy at this time to reply personally, so his private secretary, E.W. Hamilton, replied on 6 June to the effect that pressure of business prevented Gladstone from paying any attention to Fr Hyacinthe's visit to London.

On 8 June Margaret replied, thanking Gladstone of his intention not to notice Fr Loyson's visit, as the latter was utterly unworthy of all sympathy whatsoever. On 18 June Gladstone replied: 'It is now a relief to me that official cares keep me outside the precinct of religious controversies.' But Gladstone added that he thought Fr Loyson was a very serious and loyal soul. Then Gladstone referred to a book that he was reading, The Reminiscences of Rev. T. Mozley, in which there was much about Cardinal Newman which had never appeared before.

When Margaret replied on 6 July, she wrote that she had recently acquired the Reminiscences and was eagerly reading it: 'I know few things more interesting than the Catholic revival in the Church of England and can quite agree with you that the hand of God was there.'

On 17 September 1882, Margaret wrote to Gladstone congratulating him on the outcome of the Egyptian campaign and the last letter from her in this correspondence was written on 29 December 1882. In this Margaret expressed the opinion which most people in Victorian Britain thought of Gladstone: 'You have done throughout good service to God's cause by word and example and you have upheld reverence for religion so that you have stemmed the rising tide of unbelief.' Then Margaret went on to say that the last time she had seen Cardinal Newman he was eloquent upon what Gladstone had done for religion by his constant profession of faith, so rare among English statesmen.

The last letter in the correspondence was written by Gladstone on New Year's Day 1883 from Hawarden Castle: 'In haste inevitable from great and constant pressure. Had I my free choice I would abjure from henceforth until my dying day in every sphere of thought and action every thing polemical.'

Gladstone's letters to Margaret are to be found in the British Museum Add. MSS. 44456—44481 and three other letters are also to be found in the archives of the Flintshire Record Office. Margaret's letters to Gladstone were at one time kept in the archives of Mill Hill Convent, London, but have now been transferred to the archives of the Squire de Lisle at Quenby Hall, Leicestershire.

THE CENTRAL ARCHIVES OF THE SOCIETY OF CATHOLIC MEDICAL MISSIONARIES
Sr Mary Leonora Major

I believe we should approach our work with archives as being right at the centre of things. In these archives we can expect to find thoughts, ideas, achievements and failures of the past. We can trace our roots and what these roots are made of. This is the place where the vision of our sisters and brothers can be found, food for fresh insights savoured, and ongoing vision continue to be kindled.

All of us in one way or another have reflected on the roots of our mission, whether that be a religious congregation, local government or whatever, and know that a fresh stimulus can be given to our thinking and work through going back to our beginnings. It is in this atmosphere of freshness, new life emerging from the old that I share with you today.

Mother Anna Dengel, an Austrian by birth, was the foundress of our Society. It was founded in 1925 with the help of an American Holy Cross priest, Fr Michael Mathis. However, the person who gave the impetus to the Society was a Scottish woman, Doctor Agnes McLaren. Agnes was born in Edinburgh in 1837 and died in 1913. Both Agnes and Anna were pioneers in mission and medicine. They never met in person, only through letters, but were united by a special bond — their vision and their commitment to the Cause of Women.

Agnes McLaren became a doctor at the age of forty, being the first woman to study medicine in Montpellier in France. She became a Catholic at the age of sixty, and having heard of the great health needs of the women of India, went there when she was seventy to see those needs for herself. Agnes had come to know a Fr Dominic Wagner, a Mill Hill priest. He had been Prefect Apostolic in Rawalpindi, India (now Pakistan) for twenty-six years and in all of that time had never seen the face of a Mohammedan woman. Because of purdah, the women of India were not allowed to be seen by a man other than a close relative. In those days, doctors in India were nearly all men which meant that women and children were virtually without medical care. With the help of Fr Wagner, Agnes founded St Catherine's hospital for women and children in Rawalpindi, Pakistan. She would have liked a religious congregation to take charge of the work but at that time Canon Law did not allow religious to engage in obstetrics and surgery, so, although Agnes found a congregation of sisters willing to allow their young sisters to study medicine, Canon Law forbade them to do this.

Dr McLaren made five journeys to Rome trying to obtain permission for religious women to practise medicine. Meanwhile, she offered a scholarship to any young woman who would study medicine with the express purpose of going to India.

The young woman who answered this call was our foundress, Anna Dengel. Anna was born in the Tyrol, Austria, and studied medicine in Cork, Ireland. For a while she practised in Clay Cross in Derbyshire, and after about one year went to India to fulfil her promise to Agnes McLaren.

But it was not only a promise to Agnes that had brought her thus far. For many years Anna had shared a common concern with her for the suffering of women. She felt she had always had a missionary vocation and had, in fact, studied several languages to prepare for her future work.

After working for four years among the people in India, Anna Dengel realised that what was needed was a group of dedicated women, perhaps sisters, to care for the health needs of the Indian people. Several lay women doctors had gone to India to work but the lack of a suitable social environment made it very hard for them to persevere and they returned home. Anna Dengel had felt the call to religious life herself but how was she to reconcile this with her great desire to work in the medical mission field?

To cut a long story short, our Society was canonically erected in 1925 as a community with a public mission oath and private vows. The Church called us a 'Holy Experiment'. Mother Dengel, desiring our Society to become a fully-fledged Religious Congregation in the Church continued the dialogue with Rome that Agnes McLaren had initiated. Then in 1936, the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide issued an instruction encouraging religious women to study and practise medicine in its full scope. In 1941 we became a fully-fledged religious congregation with public vows and in 1959 received the Decree of Praise, Papal Approval. We now work in Asia, Africa, Latin America, North America and Europe. At present we are 692 professed sisters, 63 of whom are in temporary vows. We also have 25 candidates, the majority of whom have their origin in the Third World.

Perhaps if we take a moment to dissect the name of our Congregation word by word you will understand somewhat more of our charism and of the vision which nourishes our life and mission.

Sisters' word indicates that we are religious women. But also, beneath that word, lies a deeper sense which is integral to our charism. It means that we are 'women for women'. From the pre-foundation days until the present, one of the primary concerns has always been the emancipation of women. Certainly, Mother Anna Dengel felt for the plight of women and in her early writings she continually refers to the 'raising up of womankind.' So, whether it is the Muslim women who are enslaved by purdah to whom Anna Dengel addressed her energies in the early days, or later awarenesses and movements, one of our primary focuses has been women. (Just a special word to the men — though our primary focus was women, we have always taken care of men, too!)

Mission^{anc* wor^} emanates from a world vision and a sense that the world is one. Although the actual content of the apostolate has taken different forms in different epochs, there has always been a marked effort to live our internationality and to link peoples together across the globe; to link peoples together in their suffering and in their efforts to form a just society. We do not want people to feel that they are only the object of our care but that they become the subjects of their own future. We are presently sharing life and mission in twenty-one nations of the world and we are of twenty-one different nationalities.

Medical^{anc* wor^} this term does not, in fact, communicate the full extent of our work.

50 per cent of our sisters are involved in direct health care but life experience has taught us that what we are really talking about is healing. Healing the enslavements of women and healing injustices that leave three out of four people on our earth in a situation of bare survival. In most areas health care serves as an entry point, but if we listen to reality it leads us deeper and deeper into the lives of people and encourages us to ask the question 'What is the real cause of suffering?' and then to respond accordingly.

Our archives and record management are set up and used in such a way as to help us touch into the different epochs in our history. Thus, for us, archives facilitate our being able to observe the growth and development of our 'corporate person'. If we would put this in medical terms we could even refer to:

- a) The Pre-natal Period — before we were born as a society — the many factors which influenced our foundress.

— our ancestors — people like Agnes McLaren and Monsignor Wagner.

— the reality of the time — the events, understanding of mission, church.

- b) The Birth Process. What was the actual content of foundation and the early years?
- c) Later Growth and Development. How has it evolved?

Our Society marks its history by epochs which correspond to the period of time between General Chapters.

System: The system we use is the subject-numeric one and I keep it as simple as possible.

Inventory: An inventory is kept of our holdings and updated as necessary. The files in the Secretariate are set up as far as possible in the same record groups as are in the archives and there is a good rapport between other departments and myself.

Mother Anna Dengel

Two areas of Mother Dengel's papers have been archivally arranged:

1. The many talks that she gave, mainly to our novices and professed sisters. Articles that Mother wrote for various magazines, especially in the early years of our Society.
2. Awards and Degrees given to Mother Dengel. There are twenty awards listed and more to be added. We possess the awards themselves and the scrolls that go with them.

There is a great wealth of Correspondence of Mother Dengel: with ecclesiastics, our sisters, and with other Congregations, men and women, friends and benefactors.

Emerging from the many and varied papers surrounding Anna Dengel's life and work, I see three distinct but overlapping areas taking shape:

Mother Dengel — personal, e.g. early childhood, study years, medical school, early years in Pakistan, etc.

History of our Society.

History of Medical Missions.

Under Medical Mission History some of you may be interested to know that we have a file on the Wurzburg Institute, a Catholic Medical Mission Institute in Bavaria. It was founded in 1922 by a Fr Christopher Becker, a Salvatorian priest, and a great friend of Mother Dengel.

This section also contains 'Recommendations by mission bishops for medical mission work', dated 1910.

Apropos of letters from priests and bishops, we have in our Society History files hundreds of letters from bishops and priests in every continent asking us to send some of our sisters to their dioceses. These letters are arranged geographically and from a brief perusal I'm certain that they contain a vast amount of historical information as to the various types of medical needs in different countries. The letters date from the late 1920s, perhaps earlier.

As I mentioned earlier, Dr Agnes McLaren is one of our ancestors. Most of the material we have on her and some of her Associates has been archivally arranged and a Preliminary Inventory is available for this very interesting group of records.

It includes:

Biographies of Agnes McLaren.

The Annual Reports of the London Committee from 1913 to 1965.

(The London Committee were a support group of women in England who raised funds to open a hospital in Rawalpindi and recruit women doctors to care for women and children especially. In fact, a 16-bed hospital, St Catherine's, was opened in 1908 and run by the Franciscan Missionaries of Mary. Agnes McLaren was the founder of this work along with Fr Dominic Wagner, the Dutch Mill Hill priest whom I mentioned earlier.)

The Correspondence of Monsignor Wagner with Agnes McLaren and others from 1900 onwards.

Among Agnes McLaren's associates were:

Antoinette Margot who was one of the most remarkable lay women in the United States. She was a friend of Clara Barton who was one of the founding members of the American Red Cross. This folder contains the Red Cross Insignia used in the Franco-Prussian War and some letters picked up on the Battle of Worth battlefield in 1869.

Dr Margaret Lamont. Another of Agnes' friends was a great and well-known advocate of Medical Mission Service. She was a medical officer in countries like China, Egypt, Mesopotamia and we have several of her writings about these different countries.

CHRONICLES

From 1925 to 1969 each house kept a chronicle and sent a six-monthly resume to the Generalate. So, in many instances we have both the chronicle and the resumes for a given house/hospital. They are marvellous sources for research, especially the early ones.

In 1969 it was decided to replace the chronicle summary with an Annual Report from each District (geographical area). This report is sent to the Central Communications Department who put it together in the form of two bulletins and this is shared with the whole Society.

The Annual Report reflects the major events of the country in any area of life, gives community statistics, gives evaluations of projects in the light of goals, reflects the direction of new involvements, life-style of sisters, relationships and contacts with the environment, and so is a valuable area for research.

Our hospitals also send yearly reports to the Secretariat which I subsequently receive. These are available from 1926 onwards depending on when an involvement began.

PUBLIC RELATIONS

A magazine or newsletter to which people subscribe is sent out from some of our houses.

We have the Medical Missionary magazines that were published in the United States from 1927 onwards, in England from 1947 onwards, in Holland from 1949 onwards, and in Germany from 1966 onwards.

NEWSLETTERS

Newsletters for internal sharing come to us from many Districts of the Society in several parts of the world. These provide a lot of local colour.

FILES AND TAPE CASSETTES

We have four old films — the last one being made in 1953; tape cassettes of interviews with some of the very early members of our Society made in 1974 as we made preparations to celebrate our 50th birthday; an internal video-cassette made in 1975 in honour of our 50th birthday; and a video-cassette made by the Austrian TV in 1985 in honour of our 60th birthday. The script is in German but an English translation will be made.

PHOTOS

Our archives house many albums and pockets of photos from all over the world including several historic ones of the early days and of Anna Dengel before the Society was founded.

We also have the old lantern slides that were used by Anna Dengel while she was giving talks in the United States. And yes, we also have the old projector to show them on!

The Secretariat has a Kardex on which all relevant information on our sisters is kept. It is an old system but on looking for a more efficient one we found that it was not possible to buy anything better — the next step would be a computer. For several reasons we now have a computer. For those of you who may be interested, the software programmes that we have so far are: a word processor programme, an accounts programme, and several data base management programmes.

We purchased a basic data base management programme called D-Base and with the help of a consultant have so far developed two programmes, one to hold our Kardex files and to also do our membership and address list, i.e. our Directory. And the second one which will eventually index our archives or anything else we want to cross-reference. The second programme is a 'limited scope context retrieval system', limited in the sense that each record can have up to fourteen lines only. This was bought through RGS Consultants.

At the present time all of our documents and archival material are on paper. It is remotely possible that we might move into microfilming of some materials at a later date but for the moment this is neither economically nor practically feasible. At present we have one sister working on the basic research related to the history of our Society. In her work she traces the history of persons, trends and themes as related to our growth and development. The extensive bibliography and references which are being catalogued as she works will be put into the computer and thus be available with easy access for future research.

Our holdings include a goodly number of theses, articles and books written by our own sisters. These are mainly on health, hospitals and their management, medicine, mission, scripture and liturgy.

From Mother Dengel's documentation there is a wealth of uncatalogued material, articles and some books of a very wide variety including: women, health, medicine, healing, theology of healing, ecumenism, communism, mission, etc. And in addition to this, we have a resource library which contextualises the different moments of our history. This consists of books, background material of articles, etc., by which we are able to place our own history in the context of the world around us.

Archives Policies: We have written archive policies for researchers and these are adhered to. They were updated in consultation with our Superior General and Assistant General in 1985.

Signing Out Register: Anything taken from the archives for research or reference is entered into a book with the date and description of the material taken, plus the name of the person borrowing it. This not only helps to keep track of where material is but indicates the reference/research value of a given document.

What kind of challenge does the Central Archivist of an International Congregation face?

I should mention that our first archivist had put the archives on their feet, given them a very good start. She had designed the Record Groups and some of the series and sub-series. Sister had also prepared a general inventory and sorted a tremendous amount of material, archivally arranging some. The plan was that sister would train me into the work but because of sickness this became impossible.

So, one of the first challenges was facing it all on my own — this enormous amount of unclassified material and the variety of its content. I can still remember that awesome feeling of 'What shall I tackle first?' I'm sure that feeling is known to quite a number of you here, too! But once I had decided what to do, the day-to-day work, which now and again included archival requests, helped me to become familiar with the contents and, equally important in my opinion, I began to get the feel of what 'our archives' were all about. In the early days of my work I had many questions. I had taken a very good Archives Administration and Record Management Course, but no course has all the answers. It was a real comfort, therefore, to know that I had people behind me like Miss Joan Gibbs and Miss Elizabeth Poyser who have been an invaluable help and support for me. From them I gained in archival knowledge and in the gift of friendship.

One of my responsibilities is to be able to guide our District and Sector Superiors who need to know what they should keep archivally and what may be destroyed and when.

Each Hospital/Clinic/House has its own file: for example, under Sector Africa there is a separate file for each involvement we have in that continent. There are preliminary inventories available for about twenty such involvements, mainly from the hospitals from which we have withdrawn. A tremendous amount of work waits to be done but internal research is not too difficult because of each 'house' being treated as a 'case file'. These files contain a wealth of interesting historical information about the countries in which we work as well as about the history of our own sisters and the healing mission in which they are involved. When we withdraw from a hospital, other involvement or a house, the material that is considered archival for the Central Level is sent to me.

It might be fitting at this point to explain briefly that from 1967 we have moved from a centralised mode of government with a hierarchical structure to a participative model with organic structure. Consequently, we have accepted interdependence as one of the basic principles and so the autonomy which is often characteristic of the Provincial level in other Religious Congregations is not so clearly marked in our own Society. Each continent or sub-continent is designated as a Sector. Within the Sectors there are Districts which correspond to countries or regional clusters. The Districts and Sectors have their own way of keeping records and thus in time develop their own archives. However, one of my roles as Central Archivist is to keep the lines of communication open with the Sectors and Districts so that exchange of material can take place when indicated.

Our first archivist was appointed in 1969. In that same year she prepared an Archives Management Book which was sent to each house of the Society. This has been a wonderful guide over the years.

We find that our sisters are becoming much more conscious of their place in our history and are keen to know how they can help to preserve this. Their questions in this field sometimes reveal the need for more clarity, so as time goes on the formulation of new policies and guidelines is worked out. This is done with the help of the Central Level. Eventually, an updated Archives Management Book will be prepared.

I have mentioned that we are a relatively new Congregation. Our foundress, Mother Anna Dengel, died in 1980, in fact I was present at her death. Much material came to the archives after that date. So our archives are in their early stages and there is still much to be done. It is obvious then, that my work is not only the maintenance of existing records and adding to classified material but primarily continuing to organize and set up the whole system. From this you can probably see that one of my immediate challenges is trying to find the best way to incorporate into the existing Record Group outline all the new material that has come to me from Mother Dengel's documents plus the existing unclassified material. I realise that new Record Groups with their series and sub-series may need to be created, also that a good system of cross-referencing needs to be devised so that researchers can be helped efficiently and as fully as possible.

Another delicate challenge was how to tell sisters in a nice way that an archives department is not a community dumping-ground for 'no longer needed' material! The answer, of course, is experience, diplomacy and mutual help and understanding, but that does not happen overnight. It is very important, also, not to discourage people from sending material even if they do not have time to weed it beforehand.

I think it is important to break the heaviness that lots of steel files bring to a room. I do this with some posters, a mobile, etc. Among other things I have a little Austrian crystal hanging in the window. When the sun catches it and reflects the colours of the rainbow on my walls and work it reminds me that God is present in everything — even the old papers, because they reflect the hard work, prayer, play, the sheer commitment of so many of our sisters and brothers.

Although our archives are not open to the public at this stage, I would be willing to answer any enquiries. They should be addressed to: Sister Mary Leonora Major, Central Archives, Medical Mission Sisters, 41 Chatsworth Gardens, Acton, London, W3 9LP (Tel: 01-992 6444).

THE ASSOCIATION OF CATHOLIC DIOCESAN ARCHIVISTS: A REPORT FROM AMERICA

The Association of Catholic Diocesan Archivists (ACDA) was established in 1982 and is committed to the active promotion of professionalism in the management of diocesan archives in the United States. The main goals of the ACDA are to:

- 1) work for the establishment of an archival program in every diocese, as outlined in the Bicentennial Document on Ecclesiastical Archives issued by the National Conference of Catholic Bishops, and to assist bishops and chancellors in the development of such programs;
- 2) promote a regular system of education and training programs including both basic archival training for newly appointed archivists, and continuing education for those who are further advanced in the field;
- 3) provide a channel for personal contact, communication, and information for all diocesan archivists;
- 4) develop guidelines for the management of diocesan archives according to professional standards and in a unified way;
- 5) provide a forum for discussion and action in technical matters that are unique to the administration of diocesan archives;
- 6) promote contact and co-operation between diocesan archivists and others in the archival profession, both nationally and regionally; and
- 7) to represent diocesan archivists before organizations such as the NCCB, the Canon Law Society, ecclesiastical archivists in other countries, as well as researchers and the Catholic public; and to raise the consciousness of others as to the necessity and value of diocesan archives.

The ACDA meets annually in conjunction with the larger Society of American Archivists' meeting. During these meetings members make formal presentations on topics as Records Management for Diocesan Archives. At the 1986 meeting, the ACDA toured the Chicago Archdiocesan Archives and Records Center and in 1987 the group hopes to tour both the Records Center for the Diocese of Brooklyn and the New York Archdiocesan Archives.

Activities sponsored by the ACDA thus far have included a workshop specially designed for diocesan archivists and reprinting and distributing David Gray's manual Records Management for Parishes and Schools, originally written for the Diocese of Bismarck, North Dakota. In 1985, the ACDA Bulletin, the Association's bi-yearly newsletter made its debut.

Projects in the planning stages include a survey of diocesan archives to study how the ACDA can best attain its goals and serve its membership which now numbers over one hundred persons; a manual on establishing and managing a diocesan archival program; and a bibliographic guide to the holdings in all diocesan archives in the United States.

The current and third president of the ACDA is Rev. Harry M. Culkin, Archivist for the Diocese of Brooklyn, New York. For further information about the ACDA, please write Ms. Elizabeth Yakel, Association of Catholic Diocesan Archivists, Newsletter Editor, 1234 Washington Blvd., Detroit, MI 48226 (U.S.A.)

THE CATHOLIC ARCHIVES SOCIETY CONFERENCE, 1987

The eighth annual conference, held at the Hayes Conference Centre, Swanwick (Derbyshire), on 25—27 May, was attended by forty-one religious and professional archivists, including several new members.

After the customary introduction by the Chairman (Miss Judith Close), the Rt Rev. Mgr Cummins, Vicar-General of Nottingham Diocese, welcomed the Society to the Diocese, referring particularly to the valuable work of Fr Anthony Dolan, Archivist, and Mrs L. Loewenthal, on the Nottingham archives. In the evening (25 May), Mr Leo Warren gave an absorbing talk on 'Processions, Guilds and Bazaars', covering many aspects of Catholic religious, parish and social life in Lancashire in Victorian times, and stimulating many members to recall memories of similar, if later, experiences.

The next morning (26 May), Fr Michael Sharratt, Librarian, Ushaw College, spoke informally about the preservation and ordering of the Lisbon College Archives (described in Catholic Archives, No.1, 1981) transferred to Ushaw in 1973. This was followed by a joint talk and demonstration by Fr Francis Isherwood (Portsmouth) and Fr David Lannon (Salford) on the use of computers in archives. The conference's expedition this year was to inspect the Nottingham diocesan archives and to visit the Cathedral. Members spent part of the evening in groups discussing computer applications, religious archives and research, diocesan archives, and parish records.

After the conference Mass on 27 May, there was a useful 'open forum', including reports from the discussion groups, notes about diocesan publications on the Eighty-five Martyrs, and various notes and queries. The conference was concluded by the AGM, at which the Chairman (Miss Judith Close) reviewed the previous year's activities, referring in particular to the successful one-day seminar on 25 April. The Chairman, Vice-Chairman, Secretary, Editor, and the Council members were all re-elected, and Sr Patricia Moran was elected Treasurer in place of Sr Winifred Wickins, who was generously thanked for her hard work. Members were saddened by the death of Sr Grace Hammond RHCJ on 11 May and prayed in thanks for her work, not least as a founder member and first Secretary of the Society.

A full report of the conference is given in CAS Newsletter, No.8, Autumn 1987. The 1988 conference will be held at High Leigh Conference Centre, Hoddesdon (Herts.), on 30 May to 1 June.

EDITORIAL NOTES

Ever fearful lest the journal should depart from its original concept or be mistaken for simply an historical periodical, the patient reader is gently reminded that Catholic Archives is primarily concerned with describing the archives of the Roman Catholic Church in all their diversity, and with promoting the objectives of the Society itself, namely the care and use of such archives, both to the organisations which created them and to historical research generally.

In the past the archives of the Church have perhaps been regarded as of interest only to historians of the Church itself, and their potential relevance to the history of education, welfare, health services and other topics, let alone national themes, has largely been ignored by scholars. Historians 'worth their salt', it is said, will always find their sources. But, even if this were true, all archivists in charge of documents kept as historical evidence surely have a duty to publicise them, and to encourage research. If Catholic archives have been and still are neglected by researchers, it is even more important for religious archivists to be outward-looking. They could, perhaps, circulate lists of their archives more widely, publish articles, attend conferences, and the like.

The views that Catholic archives provide relevant, even essential, evidence in many fields of research and that Catholic archivists should play a more active role than heretofore emerge from several articles in this issue. Both Dr Susan O'Brien and Professor Donal McCartney show how historians have almost totally neglected the contribution of women's religious congregations in the history of education, welfare, social and cultural life. It is by no means fair, however, to blame historians. They cannot work without tools, and it is the job of archivists to provide these. Professor McCartney, reflecting on the respective roles of the administrator, the archivist and the historian, emphasises that the work of the individual archivist is critical. Such recognition by an eminent historian should encourage religious archivists beavering away on their own, though Dr O'Brien's broad research spanning differing religious congregations reminds them that they live not in separate little boxes but in a wide historical world. In 1981, Dom Mark Dilworth wrote that 'the fundamental role of the Scottish Archives was to show that the historiography of Scotland is incomplete unless our Church is seen as a constant factor', and now he suggests that the Church 'must have a presence and play a part in all constructive human activities', and he sees Columba House as 'spear-heading the Church's involvement in one area of the cultural and academic scene'.

In November 1987, Fr Dolan, our Vice-Chairman, presented the Pope with copies of Catholic Archives. In response the Pope conveyed his cordial thanks and wished 'to encourage the work being done by the Society in preserving documents and in making the history of the Church in the United Kingdom more widely known', and he gave members of the Society his apostolic blessing.

The Memorandum on Parish Records submitted by the Society to the Bishops' Conference in November 1988 and the very encouraging response are published for the record. All the contributors to this issue are warmly thanked, and similar articles are earnestly solicited for future editions.

THE ARCHIVES OF THE ARCHDIOCESE OF DUBLIN

David C. Sheehy

From Tudor times to the relaxation of the penal laws in the latter half of the eighteenth century, anyone holding the office of Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin had to possess courage in abundance, exercise discretion, and, on occasion be fleet of foot. In the wake of the Reformation in Ireland and with the later turbulent upheavals of the Cromwellian and Williamite eras Catholic episcopal organisation in Ireland suffered severe disruption. For an archbishop or bishop, keeping records was a difficult if not a dangerous undertaking.

During spasmodic periods of persecution in the 17th and early 18th centuries, bishops, living on the run, understandably destroyed such papers as they possessed to protect themselves and those sheltering them. On occasion, episcopal papers themselves were the object of searches by government agents and commercial priest-hunters so as to aid the prosecution of their creators under the penal code. In 1713, for example, the then Archbishop of Dublin, Edmund Byrne, was ordered by the Lords Justice and Council to be apprehended and committed to jail and his papers to be sealed up and sent to the Council offices. An agent's search was shortly thereafter reported thus:

The messenger went to Byrne, the cooper's, in Francis Street, to search for the Titular Archbishop Byrne's papers and upon his going into the house found Byrne, the Cooper lying by the fireside in the gout. The messenger searched the whole house but found no papers except some old accounts of Hoops & Barrells and having enquired of the Cooper when the Titular Archbishop was in his house, he was positively affirmed he was not within his house these seven years past.¹

The priest catcher was nothing if not persistent and Byrne was finally caught and arrested five years later. However, when the trial was held the following year the prosecution case was allowed to fall for lack of evidence, even though Byrne's identity as Dublin's so-called 'Titular Archbishop' was known to the authorities. The easing of international tension had dampened down another temporary 'popish' scare. With the penal laws being increasingly resorted to only as measures of popular control in times of crisis, the authorities were often embarrassed as in the above instance by the activities of opportunistic priest-hunters who for personal gain sought to implement the penal code much too vigorously for official liking.

Catholic prelates and their flock in Dublin, were, in the eighteenth century generally tolerated. Indeed, so safe a haven was Dublin for Catholic bishops that early in the century a number of country bishops sought temporary refuge there when threatened with persecution in their native dioceses. Tolerated though Roman Catholic archbishops of Dublin in the eighteenth century may have been, the fact that they continued to believe they were potentially under threat militated against the survival of archival records which might otherwise prove incriminating. In addition to losses induced by penal restriction, other factors leading to the loss of episcopal papers would have included natural disasters (such as fire, flooding, etc.) and the passing of those papers into family hands on the death of an archbishop.

In all, Dublin Diocesan Archives holds no more than 150 items covering the reigns of twelve archbishops from 1800 to 1770. Few originals survive, the remainder being Roman-authenticated copies of the eighteenth century and transcripts. Two charters are the sole inheritance from the period prior to 1600. By contrast, the nineteenth century is marked by the steady accumulation of archival material reflecting the increasing confidence and assertiveness of the Roman Catholic Church in Dublin and throughout Ireland. With a permanent administrative base sited at Archbishop's House at Drumcondra in 1890, this trend continued into this century. Indeed, the rate of record creation has sharply increased since 1940. The result has been the creation over time of a diocesan archive of major significance for the study of ecclesiastical and secular history in Ireland.

The holdings of the Archives can be divided up according to a number of record series: diocesan chapter records; archiepiscopal papers, papers of bishops; records of the Irish Hierarchy; papers of priests and laity; and records of colleges, institutions and organisations, both secular and clerical. This article will mainly be concerned with describing the papers of successive archbishops.

Records of the Diocesan Chapter

Diocesan Chapter records date back to the early eighteenth century and are the oldest diocesan records of a systematic nature to have survived. They are preserved in bound volume format. The first volume, titled Liber Decanatus /, contains records of Chapter business as first set down by the Rev. Denis Byrne in 1729, when Dean of the Chapter. Volume II begins in the year 1770 and brings the records down to 1862. Additional records kept by the Chapter's secretary and treasurer are also preserved.

Episcopal Papers

JOHN CARPENTER, 1770-1786. John Carpenter was the first archbishop who felt free to keep records on a consistent basis, though, with enforcement not always matching enactment in the latter stages of the penal era, it may even have been safe for his immediate predecessors to have done so had they but realised it. In any event, it is thanks to Carpenter that the earliest diocesan records of a systematic character, those relating to the Metropolitan Chapter, have survived.

Carpenter's correspondence and other material has been preserved in bound volume format. A letterbook contains copies, in his own elegant hand, of the archbishop's correspondence with the Holy See, with Irish and foreign bishops and with priests and laymen (1770—83), in addition to copies of letters of his predecessors, transcribed by Carpenter for reference purposes. These letters cover such subjects as episcopal appointments in Ireland, Irish colleges abroad, disorders in the dioceses of Armagh and Dromore, the dissolution of the Jesuits in Ireland, the Test Oath of 1774, clandestine marriages and the feasts of Irish saints.

Carpenter's papers reflect the caution and uncertainty of an administration not quite sure how safe it was to operate openly in its contemporary environment. For example, it was standard practice in the 17th and 18th centuries for the Papal Nuncio, then resident in Brussels, to retain the originals of Roman documents sending copies only to the bishops in Ireland. Even in Carpenter's time almost all the letters from Rome and even from the Nuncio remain only in the form of transcripts in the archbishop's hand. It seems to have been his practice not to retain the originals. The same applies as already noted to key documents inherited from his predecessors.

As an instance of his caution. Carpenter, in a letter to the Nuncio dated May 1772, sets out the danger of sending a report on his schools to the Holy See, and in a letter dated May 1776 he warns the new Nuncio to address him as a private person — as Dr Carpenter living in Usher's Island (Dublin).²

On his death in 1786, Carpenter's letters, though not his Register, passed into the hands of his nearest relatives, the Lee family. So also did the bulk of the papers of his successor, Dr Troy, who was also related to the Lees. It wasn't until the end of the last century that all this valuable material was returned to diocesan custody. In the case of one important item, that, unfortunately, was not to be the end of the story. Carpenter's volume of instructions and admonitions to his clergy and laity and various notes, all in manuscript and bound in one volume, disappeared from the Diocesan Archives during the 1950s and its whereabouts is unknown.³

JOHN TROY, 1786-1823. The deposit left by Archbishop John Troy is modest in size but wide-ranging in content. Again largely preserved in bound volume format, Troy's papers touch on such topics as Defenderism, the Catholic Committee, Catholic Relief Bills, the United Irishmen, the Rebellion of 1798, sectarian outrages, Irish colleges abroad and the foundation of St Patrick's College, Maynooth. Troy's important correspondence with the Holy See, in particular, sheds much light on such issues as relations between the Catholic Church and the civil power in Ireland, the education and training of priests, doctrinal error, devotional practices and Gallicanism. Further elaboration of these and other issues can be found in Troy's letters to and from his agent in Rome, Dr Luke Concannon OP. Indeed, a notable feature of Troy's papers is the survival of copies of some of Troy's replies to letters received. Correspondence files in collections of private papers usually consist only of incoming letters.

DANIEL MURRAY, 1823-1852. Though the papers of Archbishop Daniel Murray are more numerous than those of his two immediate predecessors combined, it is the considered opinion of Mary Purcell, who listed them, that they do not represent the full record of his episcopate. However, they do illuminate an administration marked by self-effacing endeavour and by notable achievements in the areas of education, public health and missionary activity. The picture that emerges from Murray's correspondence is of a mass of people, in the lower socio-economic strata, struggling to survive in the face of endemic poverty, disease and squalid living conditions in the city of Dublin. Particularly striking are the letters associated with the Great Famine (1845—52). These contain heart-rending accounts of the horrific impact of the famine on rural parts of the south and west of Ireland, and document the archbishop's role as a raiser and distributor of funds from all over the world for famine-relief through the ecclesiastical network.

A notable feature of the Murray Papers are the Visitation Returns for parishes and schools. These were submitted every five years or so and on the basis of the information they contained, or lack of it, the archbishop would decide to visit the more problematic parishes. Rural parishes in the archdiocese predominate in this category as city parishes could be kept under the close scrutiny of the archbishop. On occasion, such as at the onset of the Great Famine, for instance, Murray would request speedy reports from parish priests on conditions in their localities and on the basis of these and other reports he was able to divert relief funds to the hardest hit parts of his diocese, or, as tended to be more the case, to other dioceses in Ireland.

PAUL CULLEN, 1852-1878. Cardinal Paul Cullen, who made such an impact upon Church and State affairs in Ireland and elsewhere, in the middle decades of the nineteenth century, is represented by a large collection. His papers have 'suffered the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune' as has been detailed elsewhere.⁴ The vast majority of his papers have survived, however, even if some of them have had to be repatriated to Dublin this century from as far away as Australia! Of course, those papers relating to his career at the Irish College, Rome, are to be found in the College archives in Rome.

The material in Dublin consists of papers from Cullen's archiepiscopal administrations in Armagh (1849—1852) and Dublin (1852—1878). Amongst the latter are important documentation relating to the famous O'Keefe law case (1869—1876), notes and memoranda from the First Vatican Council (1870), and correspondence delineating the establishment of John Henry Newman's Catholic University of Ireland and its administration by his successor as Rector,

Dr Bartholomew Woodlock. Other topics of interest which feature in the Cullen Papers include the Irish battalion in the papal service (1860), Cullen's family and background, Irish colleges abroad, and the Fenians. Cullen's correspondence with Propaganda Fide shows his influence with regard to the appointments of bishops in Ireland and throughout the British Empire, whilst the letters from Dr Tobias Kirby, the long-time Rector of the Irish College in Rome, indicate that the Cardinal was kept abreast of the latest happenings in the Eternal City.

Printed copies of Cullen's pastoral letters, manuscript drafts of sermons and six damp-press copy letterbooks containing copies of outgoing letters (1855—1878) round off an impressive collection.

EDWARD McCABE, 1878-1885. Cardinal Edward McCabe by contrast with his illustrious predecessors and successors is represented by a modest collection. His administration was short and undistinguished, but his papers allow researchers to follow the continuities in policy from the reign of Paul Cullen in whose shadow McCabe dwelt.

WILLIAM WALSH, 1885-1921. Like his predecessor but one, William Walsh has left a very substantial deposit of records. Walsh's administration, spanning the eras of Parnell and de Valera, is the longest in Dublin's diocesan history since that of Dr Troy. Besides a correspondence of over forty thousand items, the Walsh collection encompasses Visitation Returns, accounts, a good set of Relationes Status, printed copies of pastoral letters, a set of pamphlets reflecting the archbishop's wide range of interests, Walsh's published works and literary materials. In addition, the Walsh Papers contain materials associated with the promotion of the Causes of the Irish Martyrs and records of the Dublin Commission established under the Irish Universities Act of 1908 (1908—1911).

BYRNE TO McNAMARA, 1921-1987. Edward Byrne (1921-1940), John Charles McQuaid (1940-1972), and the late Drs Dermot Ryan (1972-1984) and Kevin McNamara (1984—1987), have all left increasingly larger collections reflecting the growth of the Dublin archdiocese, both in structural terms and in terms of prestige and influence, and the attendant, expanded and increasingly more sophisticated bureaucracy.

In summary, the Archives to date, holds the papers of ten archbishops between 1770 and 1987 and some scattered remnants of their predecessors. These collections are divided into three classes: general correspondence files, records generated by the diocesan bureaucracy, and private office material. The largest class, the correspondence files, have traditionally been arranged chronologically and under fixed headings such as bishops, priests, laity, colleges, etc. Amongst the papers of twentieth-century archbishops, file titling reflects the detailed interaction between the Diocese and the newly established State, and the more recent flowering of diocesan bureaucracy to undertake specialist tasks.

The remaining series of records held by Dublin Diocesan Archives may be briefly described:

Papers of Bishops

Besides the papers of archbishops, the Archives is home to a small number of collections or parts of collections of bishops, whether auxiliaries of the Dublin archdiocese, other Irish bishops, or Irish-born bishops in missionary fields. These include papers of Dr Nicholas Donnelly (1880—1920),⁵ auxiliary bishop of Dublin and historian, of Dr Patrick Moran (1866—1874), Bishop of Ossory and later Cardinal Archbishop of Sydney, and some letters of Dr Edward O'Dwyer (1888-1913), Bishop of Limerick.

Papers of Priests and Laity

There are deposits from eight priests of the diocese, half of whom served as secretaries to archbishops. In the case of the latter, their papers directly complement those of their masters. Particularly important are the papers of Archdeacon John Hamilton (1823—1860) who served as secretary to Archbishop Murray. Hamilton effectively administered the diocese during Murray's frequent absences and, as a consequence, series of correspondence are interwoven amongst his papers and those of his archbishop.

A small number of collections of lay persons include the papers of an Irish-born officer in the British Army in India in the nineteenth century.

Records of the Irish Hierarchy

The pre-eminence of the Archbishop of Dublin amongst his episcopal peers in Ireland in the nineteenth century is illustrated by the presence of two volumes of minutes of meetings of the Irish Hierarchy. The first volume, entitled Meetings of Bishops, is not strictly a minute book but contains agendas of meetings, lists formal resolutions and gives summaries of decisions taken at meetings held between 1829 and 1849. The second, more orthodox volume, entitled Acta Conventuum Episcoporum Hiberniae, contains minutes of meetings held in 1882 only.

Colleges, Institutions and Organisations

A myriad of collections of varied provenance come under the above heading. The Woodlock Papers, for example, include both the correspondence of Dr Bartholomew Woodlock as Rector of the Catholic University (1861—1879), in succession to John Henry Newman, and a portion of the administrative records of the diocesan seminary, Holy Cross College, Clonliffe (1859—1954), as well as the records of the O'Brien Institute (1885—1950), an orphanage for boys administered by the Christian Brothers, under the patronage of the Archbishop of Dublin.

Finally, there is a collection of records entitled 'Catholic Proceedings'. This collection is an amalgam of the surviving records of three nineteenth-century lay Catholic political organisations: The Catholic Board, the Catholic Association, and the Loyal National Repeal Association. These records consist of the records of the secretaries of these respective associations with which Daniel O'Connell, the champion of Irish Catholic agitation during the first half of the nineteenth century, was so closely associated. The last of the secretaries, T.M. Ray, handed them over to the O'Connell family who much later presented them to Archbishop Walsh for safe keeping.

The varied holdings of Dublin Diocesan Archives are of interest to a wide range of researchers. The major task at present is to catalogue and list all this material so as to make it available to researchers. Enquiries concerning the Archives may be sent to the Diocesan Archivist, Archbishop's House, Drumcondra, Dublin 9.

ORIGINS AND EARLY HISTORY OF THE CONGREGATION OF THE DAUGHTERS OF THE HOLY GHOST

Sister Anne Marie Davies DHG

The Congregation of the Daughters of the Holy Ghost had its beginnings within the context of the Breton Missions of the 17th and 18th centuries which were aimed at instructing in the Faith the people in remote rural areas.

Jean Leuduger (1649—1722) whom we look upon as our Founder, had for a few years been a co-worker of the great missionary, Father Julien Maunoir SJ, and on his death in 1683 succeeded him as 'Apostolic Missioner' in the eastern part of Brittany.

The two nineteenth-century biographers of Jean Leuduger, l'Abbe Tresvaux¹ and Sigismund Ropartz,² claim to have based their account on the Vie manuscrite written in 1723 by one of Jean Leuduger's fellow missionaries. Unfortunately, this first-hand document has disappeared without trace.

L'Abbe Tresvaux writes:

Monsieur Leuduger lived only for God and for his neighbour. And it is to his love for the poor that the diocese (of Saint-Brieuc) is indebted for a congregation of charitable Sisters known in Brittany by the name of 'Daughters of the Holy Ghost'. It was in 1706, during the episcopacy of Mgr Fretat de Boissieux that this useful society had its beginnings.

The earliest document extant concerning the foundation of our very first community is an act of purchase, dated 23 February 1712.³ It records that 'Jean Leuduger, prestre, Docteur en Theologie et Scolastique de l'eglise-Cathedrale de Saint-Brieuc' with money given by an anonymous benefactor purchases a little house in the Legue (the port of Plerin)

... to be owned by Marie Balavenne and Renee Burel, and after their death by the women appointed by the parish priest of Plerin . . . with responsibility for the education of little girls and for the care of the poor, the sick . . .

The wording clearly indicates Jean Leuduger's intention of laying the foundations of a charitable society which would outlast the initial core group formed by Marie Balavenne and Renee Burel.

Who were these two women destined in the order of Providence to be the first of a long line of Daughters of the Holy Ghost?

Marie Balavenne (1666—1743) was a widow. Of her early life nothing is known for certain other than that her mother died ten days after Marie's birth. In 1692 Marie married a widower with five children, (it was not unusual in those times for a woman to devote herself in this way). After his death in 1697, Marie continued to care, single-handed, for the three youngest children, until they became of age. Very likely, she also made regular visits to the poor and the sick in her neighbourhood. The petition of 1733 asking for the approval of the Bishop of Saint-Brieuc for the little group of Soeurs de la Charite de Plerin states that Marie Balavenne had 'devoted herself to instructing children and caring for the poor and the sick since her youth'.⁶

La Maison de la Charité, in The Légue (Plérin), 1712

Renee Buret (1682—1720), whose family was related to that of Jean Leuduger, was the youngest of the five children of parents who owned a small farm. Renee had entertained the idea of joining the Ursulines in Saint-Brieuc; instead, and at the suggestion, perhaps, of Jean Leuduger, she became the companion of Marie Balavenne in her life of prayer and works of mercy.

According to the oral tradition of the Congregation it was on 8 December 1706 that Marie and Renee consecrated themselves to God and undertook to serve Him in the person of the poor. In 1710 they were joined by Charlotte Corbel, aged twenty-one, while another young woman came to help Renee in the schoolroom.

Jean Leuduger wanted them to live by the spiritual doctrine of Father Louis Lallement SJ which had so strongly marked his own life. In this he was ably supported by Rene Allenou de la Ville-Angevin (1687—1753), himself a past pupil of the Jesuits, to whom Jean increasingly entrusted the direction of the little group of Sisters.

These were times when death, whether from natural causes, epidemic, famine, or war, came as unexpectedly as it came frequently. So it was not uncommon for people to make their last will and testament at what might now be considered an early age. Renee made hers at Pentecost 1718, Marie in December of the same year.

Renee, as her signature and the whole tenor of her will⁴ indicate, enjoyed the benefit of having received a certain education and a comfortable inheritance. These she placed at the service of those whom she looked upon as her Sisters.

I, Renee Burel, at present in perfect health, yet knowing that there is nothing more certain than death and nothing more uncertain than the hour of it, and wanting to set my conscience at rest, to settle my spiritual and temporal affairs . . . have declared what follows as my last Will and Testament . . . Firstly, I give my soul to God, my Creator, and my body to holy ground, to be interred in the cemetery of Plerin at the spot chosen by those whom God has given me as companions in caring for the poor and in keeping the little school . . .

Secondly, I will that after my death an octave of Masses be celebrated by the parish priest and the other priests of Plerin to pray God for the repose of my soul . . .

Fourthly, for the maintenance and upkeep of our little House and for the public good . . . I bequeath each and every item of my furniture and furnishings . . . for the use of the women who live at present in the said House, and for the use of those who, subsequently, may be received in to the said House by the parish priest, acting with the approval of the Bishop of Saint-Brieuc, and who living together in obedience to their own Superiors, devote themselves to the service of the poor and to keeping schools for little girls . . .

Fifthly, I bequeath from the total estate I inherited from my father and mother . . . 20 bushels of wheat, Saint-Brieuc measure, payable each year on the feast of Saint Michael in perpetuity . . . for the sustenance of the said women . . . and should it happen that through death or some other accident there be no women to carry on this work, I hereby empower the parish priest of Plerin to oblige my heirs to hand over the said 20 bushels to be distributed to the poor or to be stored as an investment to increase the income of the said House . . . I do not want any of the appurtenances of the said House to be sold, given away or otherwise disposed of, should the House remain empty for a few years; rather, I want them all preserved so as to further the carrying out of the laudable intentions of the devout women whom it may please God to raise up in support of the work.

Marie Balavenne's will ' reveals a woman more aware of what she had received than of what she had to bequeath — precious little, in fact, merely items of clothing and of household linen, etc., which, she pointed out, were for the most part already well used. She recognizes that for some years now she has been unable to earn her keep, and that having no income or possessions she is much indebted to Renee Burel and . . . (other names missing as the Ms. is very worn here) but for whose care she might have wanted for the necessities of life . . . that for 12 years now she has been provided for in the said House, where she has enjoyed complete freedom to work for the salvation of her soul and to attend to good works . . .

Anxious to repay her Sisters, in so far as she is able, for their kindness to her she makes over to them the following items . . . ; while acknowledging that it is not an adequate repayment of all that she owes them, she begs them to be satisfied with it and, what is more, humbly entreats them by the love existing between them to raise a small sum for intercession to be made to God for the repose of her soul and to defray the expenses of her funeral . . .

Renee died in June 1720, at the relatively early age of thirty-eight. In the margin of the entry of her death in the Plerin parish register someone wrote: 'L'une des Soeurs de cette paroisse, Granum Sinapis'. Marie lived until 1743 and witnessed the growth of this mustard seed.

In the year following Renee's death a young woman who had tried her vocation in Carmel and had been obliged to leave because her physical constitution was too frail for the rigours of the Carmelite way of life, knocked at the door of the little House in the Legue. Her name was Marie Allenou de Grandchamp, she was related to Monsieur Rene Allenou, now parish priest of Plerin. Her arrival, followed soon after by that of Louise Desbois, brought the numerical strength of the little group of Sisters to four. They numbered just eight when, in 1729, they received a request from Claude Toussaint Marot, Comte de la Garaye, to send some Sisters to help him in his charitable work at Taden in the neighbouring diocese of Saint-Malo. Soeur Marie Allenou and Soeur Louise Desbois were sent there in response to this appeal.

In 1733 Monsieur Allenou, who after the death of Jean Leuduger in 1722 had succeeded him as director of the 'Soeurs de la Charite de Plerin' (as they were then known), decided that it was time to set their society on a sound juridical basis. In March 1733 he had a document drawn up before the 'Notaires Royaux et Apostolique de Saint Brieuc, Filly et Perrier'.⁶

It was a three-fold request addressed to Monseigneur Louis Francois Vivet de Montclus, Bishop of Saint-Brieuc, asking him to approve:

the stated sources of income and the possessions on which the Maison et Ecole Charitable de Plerin depended;

the appointment of persons associated with it;

the establishment of a novitiate.

Under the second heading we read:

May it please you, Monseigneur, to appoint and approve as 'principale Maitresse' of the said school, the worthy woman Marie Balavenne who since her youth has devoted herself to this activity and to the care of the sick, to the great benefit of the parish; and may it please you to appoint as her companions and assistants in running the school and in caring for the sick

the worthy woman	Charlotte Corbel
Demoiselles	Marie et Ste Angelique Allenou
the worthy women	Louise Desbois
	Marguerite Quemar
	Janne Silvestre
	Mathurien Le Barbier
	Marguerite Battas
	Mauricette Majol

all of whom have distinguished themselves in carrying out these works of charity both in this diocese and in that of Saint-Malo.

In his reply the Bishop wrote:

. . . desirous of promoting, in so far as with us lies, and of ensuring the education of girls and the relief of the poor in our Diocese . . . We hereby authorize and ratify the above-mentioned 'Contrat de Fondation' . . . We approve as 'principale Mattresse' the worthy woman, Marie Balavenne to whom we have given, and do give, as companions to support her in the education of young girls and the care of the sick in the said parish of Plerin [Names as above] . . . trusting, as we do, in their zeal and their ability to carry out this service. . . . We authorize the said 'demoiselles et filles' to select other women for training/formation by them . . .

Given at Saint-Brieuc in our Episcopal Palace on 24th April 1733

Between 1729 and 1778, communities were established in each of the then existing dioceses of Brittany: Saint-Brieuc, Saint-Malo, Nantes, Vannes, and Quimper. As the various acts of foundation indicate, these communities were established in response to appeals from members of the nobility and of the Parlement de Bretagne who were anxious to make provision for the spiritual and temporal needs of their tenants, (the Parlement having refused to implement the Royal Edict of 1698 requiring the establishment of a school in every parish and the levying of a tax to pay the teachers' salaries).

A petition addressed to the Chancelier De Maupeou by 'les Soeurs de la Maison de Charite de Quimper pour obtenir des Lettres Patentes' affords a brief description of the way in which most of these eighteenth-century foundations were made, and states the link between them and the 'Mere-Maison' in Plerin:

The Filles des Ecoles Charitables are under the jurisdiction of the Bishops; they serve the needs of the people free of charge . . . This, Monseigneur, is how, until now, their establishments have been made: Members of the nobility, zealous for the relief of the poor who are sick and for the instruction of their children, call the Sisters into their respective parishes, addressing a request to the Bishop of Saint-Brieuc in whose diocese their 'Mere-Maison' is situated. The nobleman provides them with a dwelling and a yearly pension of 50 ecus per Sister. The number of Sisters sent from Plerin, where they are trained in pharmacy as well as in teaching, is usually three . . . ⁸

Once the little society had received the formal approval of the Church and its growth seemed assured, Monsieur Allenou, yielding to a call to work in the missions overseas, left in May 1741 for Canada where a fellow-countryman, Henri Marie du Breil de Pontbriand, had just been appointed Bishop of Quebec.

His departure was felt as a great loss by the Sisters in Plerin. He did not forget them, however, and as the letters he addressed to them testify, he continued to take a fatherly interest in their life and work.

The long letter which he addressed to them on the octave day of All Saints 1748 is of particular interest as being his spiritual testament to his 'Very dear daughters in Jesus Christ'. After exhorting them to gratitude to God for their calling and to fidelity in the practice of what was enjoined on them by their Rule, he continues:

Love the poor and the sick, ease their suffering in every way you can for they are the living image of Christ in his suffering .

Give of yourselves without reserve in instructing the children entrusted to your care for the sake of Jesus Christ . . . make them perfect in his holy love so that they may enkindle the fire of this love in all the homes of your parish.

But in order to do this — you yourselves must burn with the same holy love. ⁹

Words that re-echo the very first ones of their Rule:

Since they must be filled with love in order to fulfil their obligations, the women who are received into this House shall honour as perfectly as they can the Three Adorable Persons of the Blessed Trinity, but they shall have a special devotion to the Third who is the Holy Spirit, the love of the Father and of the Son . . . 'o

When the French Revolution erupted in 1789 Soeur Catherine Briand was the Superior General of the seventy-one Sisters which the Congregation then numbered. All of them were to suffer, in one way or another, from the anti-clericalism and hatred of the Revolutionaries: they were expelled from their Houses, they were imprisoned, and their possessions were confiscated.

Before being expelled, along with her community, from the 'Mere-Maison' of Plerin, Soeur Catherine read out to those enforcing the expulsion order a formal protest, the text of which is now in the Archives Departementales of the Cotes-du-Nord. In it Soeur Catherine reaffirmed:

. . . our main House here in Plerin and all our other Houses established in the former province of Brittany are Houses of Charity in which our Sisters . . . strive every day to relieve the suffering of the poor and the destitute . . .

and she challenged:

Article 2 of the law of 18th August 1792 suppressing all religious congregations grants formal exception to charitable establishments such as ours. Sheer humanity and compassion for the sufferings of the poor . . . provide an even stronger argument in favour of our being allowed to continue.

And so the order that drives us out of our House has no tives other than the enforcement of the law and concern for the public good. Whatever these motives may be, we must perforce comply with the order. We declare however, that we leave our House only because we are forced to do so. We leave under protest and invoking our rights . . .

At Plerin, 15th January 1793.

Signed Catherine Briand
 Marie Quintin
 Perrine Keraoult 11

Sadly, twenty-two Sisters took leave of their Superior and of each other before dispersing; the House became the property of the Mayor of Plerin. It was restored to the Sisters in 1800. Elsewhere, the House from which the Sisters were expelled remained irretrievably lost to them.

When at length it became possible for Religious to reassemble, only 25 of the 71 Sisters the Congregation numbered in 1789 found their way back to the 'Mere-Maison' at Plerin in 1800. Not a few had died during the intervening years, one of them, imprisoned at Nantes; others remained in the homes where they had been sheltered during those years and continued their charitable works from there.

The tree sprung from the 'Granum Sinapis' had bled yet it had remained standing and its still vigorous sap would produce fresh growth in the new era that was dawning for the Congregation and for the Church in France.

The Legue, c.1800

NOTES

Our oral tradition. Among the Sisters who reassembled after the Revolution there were one or two who had lived in community with Marie Allenou who, had lived with Marie Balavenne for more than twenty years. It is on the recollections of these Sisters that our oral tradition is based and it is incorporated in the history of the Congregation prepared by Soeur Marie-Julie Pouliquen. ¹² Her untimely death in 1860 prevented the publication of her work but her valuable manuscript was made available to l'Abbe Lemerrier who, in 1888, published the Notice sur la Congregation des Filles du Saint Esprit. ¹³

The Rule of Taden. Relying on the oral tradition, Sr Marie-Julie Pouliquen affirms that in the year 1706, the year in which Marie Balavenne and Renee Burel consecrated themselves to God, they received a Rule drawn up for them by Jean Leuduger and approved by the then Bishop of Saint-Brieuc, Mgr Fretat de Boissieux. Unfortunately, this primitive text has been lost to us. The oldest version of our Rule still extant is the one known as the 'Rule of Taden' because it is a copy, made in 1729 for the Sisters who were going to the new foundation at Taden, of the 'Reglemens de la Maison de Plerin', a text which, in its final form is the work of Monsieur Rene Allenou who in his 'Lettre—testament spirituel' (1748) wrote: 'These are the last instructions of your Father, of him who drew up your Rule . . .'

The title 'Filles du Saint Esprit'. It is impossible to state categorically just when this title was given to the 'Soeurs de la Charite de Plerin'. Its first appearance in a written document is at the time of the foundation of the Maison de Charite in St Pol de Leon (1747) where it seems to be used as a matter of course: '. . . all these conditions have been accepted by Soeur Marie Allenou, Superior of the Filles du Saint Esprit de Plerin'. The title appears in other acts of foundation, e.g. those of Quimper 1749, Plouaret 1766, and Anel 1768.

The General Archive of the Congregation is held at the Mother House in Saint-Brieuc. The Archive of the English Province is held at Northampton. It is not open to public inspection but the archivist is willing to respond to enquiries. These should be addressed to Sister Anne Marie Davies at The Provincial House, 103 Harlestone Road, Northampton NN5 7AQ.

THE STONYHURST ARCHIVES

The Rev. F.J. Turner SJ.

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

The origin of many of our manuscripts is obscure, for we do not know where they came from and why they arrived at Stonyhurst. Until comparatively recently, records were often kept inexactly or not at all; there are tantalising gaps due to physical causes, human frailty or sheer lack of interest. For the purposes of history and arrangement, it will be convenient to begin with the year 1794. In this year the College, founded by Robert Persons on the Continent, came after many vicissitudes to its present home. The Society of Jesus had already suffered the blow of suppression; the school had been forced to move from St Omers to Bruges, and then once again to Liege, and now to the north of England. Much was lost by confiscation, much by the hurried migration under the threat of the advancing Revolutionary armies. The wonder is that so much survived. Even that part of the library which was brought from the Continent was housed in a building uninhabited for forty years and in many places no longer weatherproof. The first call was for the accommodation not merely of a body of ecclesiastics who could no longer call themselves Jesuits, but of a number of boys of different ages who had loyally followed the College in its uprooting.

CONTENTS OF THE ARCHIVES

The year 1794 is also a dividing line in the contents of the archives. Before this date we find 1) a collection of medieval manuscripts brought over from the Continent or acquired by gift; 2) a number of very important documents of the recusancy period, concerning Jesuits, secular priests and laymen; 3) documents surviving from the time of the Shireburns who had built and lived in Stonyhurst; and 4) a precious but all too small group of documents relating to the College in its days on the Continent. After 1794 are 5) documents concerning the period leading up to Emancipation; 6) documents connected with the history and administration of the school (an ever-growing number); and 7) a miscellaneous collection, irritating and fascinating, but where the archivist, egged on by the desire to 'clear up', must remind himself that what are the trifles of today are the historical evidence for the future.

For the practical purposes of those engaged in research, the list in the 1st, 2nd and 3rd Reports of the Historical Manuscripts Commission, even though published a century ago, is a useful guide. This has been recently checked and a new edition is being prepared in which it is hoped that fuller references will be given. Meanwhile, the original edition remains substantially reliable, and will normally give the information desired. This does not include documents concerned with the College during the last hundred years.

It will be convenient to group the manuscripts under the headings given above.

1. Medieval manuscripts. These number just over eighty. The late Dr Neil Kerr had catalogued them with descriptive notes just before his death, but his text for this volume of English Medieval Manuscripts has been checked and revised by Mr Alan Piper of Durham University. The greater number of these are service books, e.g. missals, breviaries and books of hours, together with a few devotional works. Among these may be mentioned a York missal of the fourteenth century which belonged to the church of Tatham in Lancashire, and a missal coming from Liege of 1472 which has the prayer for the feast of the Blessed Charlemagne. Among the devotional works we have a manuscript of the Abbey of the Holy Ghost and an Exposition of Haymon on the Gospels and Epistles, De Tempore, of the late thirteenth century, which belonged to Whalley Abbey, only four miles away, and which was presumably rescued at the suppression. The best known of our early manuscripts is the eighth-century Gospel of St John from the tomb of St Cuthbert at Durham, and now on long loan to the British Library. There are also some historical manuscripts, most notably the first volume of Froissart's Chronicle, which was presented by the 8th Lord Arundell of Wardour.

It is possible to obtain microfilms of the smaller items but this has to be done by the John Rylands Library at Manchester. The charge made by the Rylands is very reasonable, but it is necessary to insure the manuscripts, and nowadays such charges are heavy. It is often better to visit the Library personally. It is easy to obtain permission to photograph a few pages, provided a flash is not used.

2. Recusancy. This comprises perhaps the most notable part of the archives. The best known and most quoted collection are the seven volumes marked 'Anglia'. The first five volumes contain letters and documents from 1580 to 1680, arranged in chronological order, the last two are later additions to the same period, and carry on the collection for another hundred years; the last document is dated 1785. Originally, the series consisted of nine volumes, but in 1921, volumes 8 and 9 were exchanged with Westminster Archives for a volume known as 'Greene's Collectanea B'. However, in 1960, a photocopy was taken of these two volumes, but the result is not so successful as it would have been had the photography been undertaken later.

This collection contains important letters, especially from the Jesuits who were working on the English mission, for instance, Frs Persons, Walpole, Gerard, Blount, Holtby and William Weston, as well as those from such important figures as Cardinal Allen, the Archpriest Blackwell, and Richard Verstegan.

Another important series is known as 'Grene's Collectanea'. Fr Christopher Grene was English Penitentiary both at Rome and Loreto at the end of the seventeenth century. He set about making a collection or at least a transcript of all the documents in which he could find references to the English martyrs. In this way a copy has often been preserved of documents which would otherwise have been lost. Sometimes we find in the 'Anglia' series the original of which he has made a copy. The volumes he listed as A to P, that is the last letter that is recorded. The volumes later became scattered; some, such as A, seem to have been divided up by Grene himself. The volumes under some letters have either ceased to exist to be again divided. At Stonyhurst are the Volumes B, C, M, N, P.

As these documents, both 'Anglia' and the 'Collectanea' are very frail, a xerox or photocopy was taken of all of them some years ago, and kept in the archives at 114 Mount Street, London. Therefore, anyone who wants copies of either the 'Anglia' or 'Collectanea' documents should apply to the Province Archivist at that address.

However, very many of these documents have been printed either in the CRS volumes or in Foley's Records of the Society of Jesus. Another group has been published by Fr J.H. Pollen in Acts of the English Martyrs, a very valuable collection now unhappily out of print, and the autobiographies of John Gerard and William Weston have been published by Fr Philip Caraman. ¹

3. Shireburn Documents. Numerically the greater part of these, consisting largely of legal documents, such as indentures, conveyances and legal papers of apparently unending disputes have been deposited at the Lancashire Record Office at Preston. We have retained those which have a particular interest for the College or locality, such as the charities of the Shireburns, the foundation of an almshouse (now rebuilt and flourishing), the local school (still a Primary School for Hurst Green), some account books and inventories.

4. Documents connected with the College during its time on the Continent. A11 this material has been worked over carefully. It forms the basis of Fr Chadwick's book, From St. Omers to Stonyhurst, but it may be of interest to pick out certain items. First, a transcript of the St Omers 'Custom Book', or as we might call it nowadays, Rule Book. The original was lost when the Louvain library was bombed, and this is therefore the only known copy. One item is of especial value; at St Omers, music played an important part, and at the front of this Customs Book is a list of the instruments and something is said of their use and grouping. A recent request for a copy of this document relating to music came from Yale. It is probably well known to historians of music in England. Another item is the manuscript version of a number of plays performed by the boys, and there are also a few playbills. There is a considerable collection of Latin verse, some of this is for formal occasions, such as the greeting of important people, but much has every mark of being composed for pleasure. On the scholastic side the three subjects of music, drama and classics formed the basis of the curriculum. There are also the account books, some of which have been acquired comparatively recently. These supplied much of the information for Fr Holt's volume, A Biographical Dictionary of the St Omers and Bruges Colleges, published as number 69 in the CRS series. Lastly, under this heading may be mentioned transcripts and microfilms from the Royal Archives at Brussels. On the suppression of the Society many books and papers were carried off by the civil authorities; much was undoubtedly lost, but a certain amount made its way to the archives in Brussels. There are five volumes of transcripts made about a hundred years ago and written in a clear and easily legible hand. About twenty years ago they were in many cases compared with the originals, and where necessary corrected.

5. Documents from the first relaxation of the Penal Laws up to Emancipation.

Three collections call for notice: (a), a collection of letters and other documents by Fr John Thorpe. Fr Thorpe was for some time Minister of the English College at Rome, and later Penitentiary at St Peter's. These are supplemented by (b), a collection of Excerpts made by Fr Thomas Glover who was stationed in Rome, which have a bearing on the restoration of the Society of Jesus. When the ex-Jesuits settled at Stonyhurst the College received papal approbation by a rescript of Pius VI in 1796. Stonyhurst thus became a rallying point for the surviving priests. This resulted in (c), a collection of letters which concerned both Stonyhurst and the men whose hopes were raised by the oral restitution of the Society in 1803 and the formal restoration in 1814. After Emancipation, the headquarters of the newly reconstituted province was moved to London.

6. Documents concerned with the history of Stonyhurst. Much of this matter necessarily has a rather narrow application, but in this ever growing collection there is not a little of wider interest. First, we can trace the many difficulties which beset the growth of the school, its shifting fortunes and uncertainties. A careful examination will disabuse the enquirer of the notion that Stonyhurst was a school predominantly for the sons of the Catholic country gentry. Early in the nineteenth century a Prefect of Studies began a report with the words, 'Since the majority of you are going to enter upon a career in commerce . . .'. The Journals and 'Logs' show how difficult it was for Catholics to rid themselves of the atmosphere of penal days. Much of this evidence has recently been collected in a duplicated volume by the Senior History Master, Mr Thomas Muir. Another book, but printed, and based on this evidence is The Stone Phoenix by Mr Andrew Henderson.² It is written in a lighter style and includes the more amusing incidents but it depends on careful study of the sources. Throughout penal times, but increasingly in the nineteenth century, Catholics were faced with the problem of what we should now call Tertiary Education. Of necessity during the 17th and 18th centuries higher education was almost confined to those who were studying for the priesthood. But with the opening of schools in England and exclusion from the universities the problem became acute. At Stonyhurst an attempt was made to solve it by establishing a post-school course for those known as 'Lay Philosophers'. Fortunately, these 'Philosophers' themselves kept an official Diary which, equally fortunately, has been preserved. It is on this manuscript evidence that a book has recently been published by Henry Sire with the title The Gentlemen Philosophers.³

7. Miscellaneous. Here we have an amorphous, exotic and wayward monster; it straggles beyond system or category; it has something of the air of an Old Curiosity Shop, where junk and objects of value jostle one another, and last year's junk becomes tomorrow's jewel. How did we acquire a book of recipes and an envelope with scraps of paper on which are written remedies for diseases? There was published in the school Magazine about a hundred years ago an article entitled 'Rummaging in our Archives'; it could have gone on for many an issue. Here you will find an entry, 'News of the Battle of Waterloo, boys turned out of schools', an account book with the entry 'Rat Account'. Apparently 1'd was paid for each rat caught, the price of a pint of beer — in a bumper year there were over a thousand rats. Hair-cutting cost again 1.'sd and the whole school was trimmed at one go. There are writers who are sensitive, and writers, sometimes in high places, who are philistines. As FrThorpe would have described it. it is a 'farrago', but the byways are often more refreshing than the motorways.

Anyone who wishes to consult or ask about the archives should write to The Archivist, Stonyhurst College, Blackburn BB6 9PZ. Yes, write, please, and not telephone.

NOTKS

Much of this article is based on one written by Fr Turner, the College Archivist, for North West Catholic History. Vol. 12. 1985. It has, however, been amplified by including more examples. Though the Stonyhurst archives and library are closely connected both physically and for working purposes, so that one supplements the other, it seems best to keep the two departments separate.

10,000 NUNS: WORKING IN CONVENT ARCHIVES

Susan O'Brien

This is an important occasion for me and I am grateful for the invitation to occupy the 'user's slot' in the programme and talk to you about my work.

My research is into active, apostolic congregations of women working in England in the nineteenth century. Obviously, this is a huge subject and I will try and explain how I started, how it has developed over the past four years, and where it is going in the immediate future. It might be helpful to state at the outset that, because it is post-doctoral research, there are no deadlines apart from self-imposed ones and that the work has to be fitted in around a full-time lecturing job and, consequently, proceeds fairly slowly. The intention is to write up the findings and interpretation in a series of articles over the next few years for publication in academic journals and the first of these will appear in the autumn.¹ Eventually, I hope these will form the basis for a history of nineteenth-century female congregations.

The brief I was given for this paper focussed my mind not so much on the history of any particular congregation or aspect of nineteenth-century female religious life, but rather on the underlying reasons for undertaking the research in the first place and the stages and processes involved to date. Three questions, then, form the basis of what follows:

- A. What is the state of the history of women's religious congregations in England?
- B. How does a historian, who is working from the 'outside' (i.e. not as a religious) find his or her way into the subject and into the archives?
- C. What particular aspects and questions am I concerned with at present and what kinds of archival materials am I using to find answers?

A. Let me begin with some bold statements about the state of our knowledge about active women's congregations since their establishment in England. Women religious have been, and still are, invisible to the historian's eye. This may come as a surprise to those whose archive shelves are groaning under the weight of biographies and memoirs telling of the lives and activities of Victorian women religious, or with institutional histories written at various points since the later nineteenth century. But this is essentially family history and it has been perfectly possible for congregations and their friends to have written, collectively, an enormous amount without this in turn having impinged on the knowledge and understanding which the outside community of scholars has.

So far it has not even impinged on those who have published histories of the Catholic Church in the nineteenth century, let alone those concerned with women's history, the history of education, or of welfare work.

Women religious were a vital work-force to the newly established Catholic Church in England. Without them one of the primary policies of the bishops — the provision of a separate schooling system — could never have been carried out. Nor could the Church so easily have sustained a separate identity for its people 'without the provision of a whole set of other services and institutions (e.g. asylums, orphanages, homes for the elderly, a wide range of health care, industrial schools, reformatories, hostels) most of which were established and staffed by women's religious congregations at a minimum cost to the Catholic community. Nineteenth-century Catholicism would have been something quite different without the infrastructure provided by women religious. Yet nowhere have I encountered an historical interpretation which puts the sisters at the heart of the experience of nineteenth-century English Catholicism.²

If the sisters are not visible, other than as shadows, in the history of their own institution, perhaps it is less than surprising that they are invisible also to social historians. You may search in vain in the many recent histories of girls' education to find a mention of the convent boarding- and day-schools which flourished.³ The same is true of recent work on female philanthropy and welfare work. We are not entitled to view such omissions as a conspiracy. The separatist tradition of the Church goes a long way towards explaining this state of affairs. If the historians are not themselves Catholic, if the historians of the Catholic Church do not offer them suggestive research material, if they do not regularly come across references to archival material, they turn to other sources. Moreover, for those women's historians interested in the ways women developed greater autonomy, Catholicism is perceived as unrewarding territory.

Despite what I have said, there is one aspect of nineteenth-century conventual history which has attracted the attention of several scholars and resulted in a number of specialist studies — that of anti-convent sentiment/fantasies and the attempt to legislate in Parliament for convent inspection.⁵ Such has been the impact of this line of enquiry that the editors of a recent collection of essays on the Irish in Britain noted: 'It was the nuns, rather than the Irish who were, if the thrust of recent research is to be believed, the most unpopular single group in Victorian England.'

Only more specialised studies closely based in archival materials can provide a corrective to the state of our present historical understanding. Although there are recent and scholarly works by sisters, it is unlikely that any member of a congregation would attempt a work which went outside her own congregation. I believe that it would be useful, in the first instance, to have a work of synthesis on nineteenth-century congregations, something which could establish a framework and draw out the patterns. Such studies exist for France and for the United States, and there are slighter studies now published on Quebec and Ireland, ⁷ I suspect that not until there is a history which provides an overview and analysis of the scene as a whole, will other historians, whose interests may be education, nursing, or single women, or the Irish in Britain, feel able to integrate the activities and experience of women religious into their study. That, at least, is the philosophy and rationale behind my work.

B. But how does an interested historian who is not a religious get to know about the congregations and their archives? I can only give a personal answer to this question and reveal the less than elegant processes of my research. Published scholarship has the effect of making research and its outcomes appear inevitable, tidy, and coherent but I suspect my experience of groping towards a new subject, in which accident played a large part, is not uncommon.

I am a social historian whose particular interest is in religion and the dynamics of the relationships between people, Church structures and the larger society. My other major interest has been in the relations between the sexes and in women's experiences in particular. The route I travelled to get to nineteenth-century nuns was circuitous and tells a good deal about how 'invisible' the subject was to me too.

For three years I taught history at La Sainte Union College in Southamton, and during the last two years there I was hunting for a research subject that brought together my interests. A number of false starts were made, with leads that petered out. It wasn't until several years later, when I had left LSU, that I realised the subject had been literally under my nose. What actually led me to realise that this was 'my' subject was more by way of revelation than rational historical deduction! It came on a family holiday to Kent in late March 1984. We spent a good deal of the time huddled around the fire taking refuge against the cold, reading old magazines left in the cottage. In desperation my husband went out to a second-hand bookshop and returned with a present for me — The Life of Cornelia Connelly, 1809–1897. I stayed up all night until the last page was turned. Why had I never heard of this remarkable woman? What more was there to know about the Society of the Holy Child Jesus? What had historians had to say about nineteenth-century sisters? Back at college, a library computer search revealed that, as far as the computer's history data base was concerned, nuns did not exist.

But how could one find out more? In September 1984 I wrote to the Provincial of the Society of the Holy Child Jesus to ask whether they had any materials on their foundress and, if so, could I come and look at them? With hindsight I know how naive this question must have seemed to a congregation which had spent years gathering all the available evidence on their Foundress for her Beatification Cause and had just put together a three-volume Positio. But the Society was generous and did not make me feel my ignorance. Instead,

I was made welcome. The archivist, Sister Winifred Wickens, gave of her expertise but was also wise enough to let me grow into the materials in my own way. In that archive, and talking to Sr Winifred over several visits, I groped towards seeing just how big and important a subject this was. The archivist, for this historian, was vital to the success of the undertaking. I look back with awed astonishment on the fact that my tentative initial foray should have been to a congregation whose archives were already highly organised, open to scholars, and whose archivist was Treasurer of the Catholic Archives Society. After all, the chances of hitting the bull's-eye first time were at least 90 to 1 against. . .!

In the space of about nine months my research focus developed from Cornelius Connelly and the Society to women's active congregations in nineteenth-century England more generally. This happened as I began to try and place the Holy Child in a chronology of women's congregations working in this country, to see it in perspective. I wanted to know how many other congregations there were already by 1846 (the date of the Society's foundation), how many were native to England, how many and which were from France, Belgium, Ireland, and how and when did they come to England. These were only basic questions, but there were no basic answers in readily available form. A letter to the Catholic Record Society enquiring if they knew of such a chronology produced a reply saying how useful it would be if I were to produce one. Gradually, using such compilations as John Murphy's Terra Incognita, Francesca Steele's Convents of Great Britain, Peter Anson, and various directories, I began to do so. The list comprised date and place of foundation, name of founder, date of first English house if from abroad, geographical location in the nineteenth century and the works undertaken by the congregation.

All this work, which is a continuing process, was necessary before I could begin to make a selection of congregations for more detailed study. Because there were some ninety congregations in existence in the nineteenth century I needed to have rudimentary information about them all before I could draw up criteria for selecting a few. In the first instance, I decided to concentrate on English congregations — a pragmatic decision which also made good historical sense. From the relatively small group which this left I chose five on the basis of date of foundation, size, geographical spread, and nature of apostolate. I was fortunate in being able to use Sr Winifred as a referee to vouch for my serious intentions, but I was nonetheless fearful of receiving a 'rejection' from these congregations. In the event, I once again struck gold in the archivists and archives of the Sisters of the Cross and Passion, the Institute of the Blessed Virgin Mary, and the Poor Servants of the Mother of God. (Two of the five congregations did not feel able to grant my request for access but, fortunately for me, I was already well under way by the time this happened. It did not deter me as it might had it happened at the outset.) With Sr Winifred's encouragement, I joined this Society and the two conferences which I have attended have proved invaluable to the progress of my work.

When I look back on the last few years and the process sketched out above, what stands out clearly is the fact that I started out in ignorance and the archivists were my teachers. They not only made the archives intelligible but they gave me invaluable insights into their own congregation, and into the way in which the congregation sees its own past. Not only is each archive different but, as I learned, the charism of each congregation is unique and a 'tangible intangible'. Perhaps archivists have imbibed the charism in large doses by virtue of their closeness to origins, I don't know. But it came to me initially and unconsciously via the archivist.

C. Finally, I want to say something about the way in which I approach and use the archival materials. Before I get to an archive I make it my business to have read whatever published material is available on the congregation, either in my own collection or at the Catholic Central Library, or perhaps from the congregation itself. Usually, I ask the archivist if I may first make a preliminary visit of a day or two, to be followed by a longer visit. The purpose of the preliminary visit is twofold. On one level it is about people. I want to establish a good working relationship with the archivist who, in turn, needs to know that she can trust me not only with the actual materials, but also with the history of the congregation. These are, after all, family papers. The other object is for me to assess how much material there is and its nature and type. Obviously, this is made much easier where the archives have been listed, but even where this is not the case I can use my knowledge of the typical categories in an interrogation of the archivist! By now, although I am open to what the archive has to offer, I have a number of specific questions in mind when I start. These questions have arisen out of immersion in the total holdings of a few archives and provide a way of moving forward systematically. They should not be seen as a definitive list or a closed approach.

Here is what I am interested in at the moment and the materials I use in the archives:

1. Who were the sisters? This requires one to deal with large numbers of individuals about whom very little is recorded. The aim is to build a profile of nineteenth-century women religious as a group. The approach is, therefore, statistical and requires a large sample — I am using about five thousand. The major sources are the registers of all types — postulants, novices, professed sisters; individual vows; necrologies or obituaries; convent annals. The amount of information varies enormously from congregation to congregation, as does the extent to which records were compiled in a systematic way. At one extreme I have found the highly organised card index system of the Society of the Sacred Heart which includes every woman who took first vows in the English Province. At the other extreme there might only be a series of lists, often overlapping and with omissions, from which a register has to be 'reconstructed'.

Within these sources there is usually a certain minimum of information — name of parents, date of birth, place of birth, of baptism, of entry into the convent, of vows, and of death. From this it is possible to work out how old women were when they entered and whether the age of entry changed over time or between congregations; what proportion were converts and in which period; what proportion left before clothing and before and after final profession; the life-expectancy of sisters compared with women outside the convent; the ethnic composition of the congregation at various periods; whether there are links between particular parishes, priests and convents for recruitment. However, it is also possible from even this rather limited data to look for kin relationships within congregations — sisters, nieces, cousins, aunts (although there were always more relationships than a name search reveals).

From all this information a fascinating picture begins to build up and can be augmented in the fuller records by information about educational level, dowry, employment before entering. The more notable or senior members, and often the earliest sisters, are often quite carefully recorded, but the great number are more anonymous. All the information available is extracted on to a form I have devised for the purpose and later will be put on to disc and thus form a data-base. During the next year I would expect to write an article — 'Who were the nuns?', based on this research.

2. Another area of interest, and one which is quite different, is that of the relationships between superiors and local priests, and between a superior and a bishop. In many cases, congregations were introduced to England or to a particular diocese by an individual priest or bishop. What were his expectations? How did they compare with the expectations of the superior? How did the subsequent development of the congregation match and mesh with those of the diocese? What images and ideas did the men of the Church have about women religious and how far did these accord with, or conflict, with the realities?

Correspondence is by far the most useful single source for exploring these questions, and not all of the relevant material is in convent archives. Much of this material needs to be 'de-coded' because the relationship between the sisters and the men of the Church was unequal and often complex. A good illustration is the correspondence from Father Gaudentius Rossi CP to Mother Mary Joseph Prout (foundress of the Cross and Passion Sisters) in the 1850s. The congregation has only eight letters written by Mother Prout and, as a consequence, the large number of letters written to her, mostly from Father Rossi, form a crucial element of the archive. Rossi's letters are often highly critical of her conduct and leadership but, given the other evidence about the history and development of the congregation, cannot be simply taken at face value. They need to be read with the same degree of critical awareness that historians would bring to any correspondence and I would like to illustrate this by sharing with you one of Rossi's letters and then to contextualise and interpret it. (Omitted here but see Note 8.

3. The internal relations, daily life and ethos of a convent or congregation constitute a further rich area for research. What kind of leadership did superiors provide? Under what conditions did the sisters live and work? How were decisions made and communicated? What were the relationships with laity? Basic sources here in addition to the superiors' correspondence are the constitutions, the custom books (and the ways in which these were amended over the years); the annals; individual reminiscences and biographies; and the records of the work which the sisters undertook. There are also those materials which reflect the spiritual life of the congregation — retreat notes, records of special services or prayers, the spiritual reading of the sisters. This is a research area where almost all sources are grist to the mill but, alas, one rarely gets anything directly generated by the ordinary sisters. As I work in the archives and occasionally spend time with older sisters I cannot help wishing that more had been done by way of oral history with the oldest sisters over the past ten years. Perhaps some of you will be inspired to develop such a project and add immeasurably to the archive in this way. ⁹

D. The future of the research. This is a research project which stretches out ahead as far as I dare to look and there is far more than can be managed by any one person. I have been very fortunate in obtaining a Nuffield Foundation Research Grant which provides for staffing replacement and thus enables me to spend the twelve months from July 1988 full-time on archival research and writing. During this period it is my intention not only to explore the archives of several more English congregations, but to move on to a number whose mother house was originally in France, Belgium and Ireland.

Editorial note:

This article is an abbreviated version of a talk given at the annual conference of the Society in May 1988. Dr Susan O'Brien is Senior Lecturer in History, The College of St Paul and St Mary, The Park, Cheltenham, Glos. GL50 2RH. She is able to act as a supervisor for M.Phil, and Ph.D. research degrees on any aspect of the history of women's congregations. Students would be registered with the Council for National Academic Awards, and geographical location does not matter, provided arrangements can be made for regular supervision.

THE HISTORIAN AND THE ARCHIVIST

Donal McCartney

One thing is very evident about nineteenth-century Irish society — that is the pervasiveness of religion. In few centuries in the modern era did organised religion play so large a part in the life of the nation as it did then. The most tangible evidence of this was to be seen in the great expansion that took place in the building of churches, schools, diocesan colleges, seminaries, hospitals, convents, monasteries, orphanages, asylums and other institutions. During Dr Murray's term as Archbishop of Dublin (1823—52), ninety-seven new churches were built in the archdiocese alone. The Catholic Directory claimed in 1844 that within the previous thirty years 900 Catholic churches had been built or restored throughout the country. This activity continued under Murray's successor, Dr Cullen (1852—78). With this expansion in buildings the number of nuns and clergy also dramatically increased. Nuns multiplied eightfold between 1841 and 1901 despite a halving of the population in the same period.

Take the number of convents alone that were established. Even the bare statistics hint at a phenomenal growth and development in a relatively short span changing the architectural face of the Irish urban landscape. At the beginning of the nineteenth century there were eleven convents. By 1851 there were eighty-nine. A period of explosive growth begins from mid-century. In the decade following 1851 the number of nunneries nearly doubled to 161. Twenty years later, by 1881, another hundred had been established bringing the number to 260. By 1921 the expanding number had reached 430. In independent and partitioned Ireland the rate of increase continued to quicken until by 1985 there were 882 — that is nearly ten times more than that in 1851. The number of religious orders for women had increased from 6 in 1800 to 35 by 1900.

This meant a most impressive number of nuns — many of whom came from the same families, so that it is almost possible to talk about ruling religious dynasties. Take, for example, the family of the famous controversialist, Fr James Maher P.P. of Carlow-Graigie. During one of those periodic anti-Catholic outbursts in nineteenth-century England a parliamentary Bill was introduced into the House of Lords in the 1850s which proposed to send inspectors into convents because of a rumour that persons were being detained there against their will. Fr Maher gallantly defended the convents and their inmates against the charges. In this spirited defence, Fr Maher admitted that two of his own sisters, eighteen of his nieces and a large number of other near relatives were nuns (in Ireland, England and America). Maher belonged to a particularly influential religious dynasty in the diocese of Kildare and Leighlin — his nephew was Archbishop Paul Cullen, Ireland's first Cardinal, whose nephew in turn was Archbishop Moran, Australia's first Cardinal. Or take the local and perhaps more normal case of James Ryan of Ryan Brothers, Cloth Merchants of Patrick Street, Limerick. He was a good-living man who had the reputation of having brought the Christian Brothers to Limerick, and of hosting a French emigre priest, and the famous Fr Thayer who collected funds to bring the Ursulines to Boston. Ryan had four daughters, three of them joined the Ursulines in Boston. The fourth sister was married to a William Querk, a Dublin merchant. Mrs Querk (or Anne Ryan) was left a widow in her thirties with four children. She had helped to bring the Ursulines to Limerick and she later joined them and became Mother Ursula. Two of her daughters joined her and the third joined her aunts in Boston. Her only son became a Jesuit. All eight (four sisters and the four children of one of them) had ended up in religion. And this was not uncommon in Irish families. It is this sort of sociological development that accounts for the tremendous growth of convents in the 19th and 20th centuries. Think, then, of nearly nine hundred nunneries alone in Ireland today, each of them generating its own archives. Here we have an extremely rich collection of source material for the religious, cultural and social history of Ireland.

Now that organised religion is coming to have less influence on society, historians and others are becoming more aware of its significance for the recent past. And as they do, there is one group of commentators (not to call them enemies of Irish Catholicism) who totally and irrationally exaggerate the evils done to Irish society by bishops, in particular, and by religion generally. Sometimes, even those who might be called friends of Irish Catholicism completely underestimate or trivialise the benefits that the Church and religion have conferred on the Irish people. All — friend and foe alike — are agreed about the huge importance of the role that religion has played. It is in this setting, and in either case, whether hostile or friendly, that the need for the religious archivist who has preserved the record of the detailed and fuller picture becomes all the more obvious. It is also in this setting that the need for the historian, armed with the sources provided by the archivist, to probe beneath the superficial and the sensational, becomes all the more urgent.

Three main categories of person are concerned with the kind of document that is produced in an institution such as a convent. These are the Administrator, the Archivist and the Historian.

Whether he or she is a public servant in central or local government, or a secretary of a semi-state body, or public institution, or of a private commercial or industrial concern, or a religious superior — the administrator is always tempted to get rid of those non-current records which are considered to be of no further use or value for present and future administrative needs. And where storage is a real problem the temptation is to destroy those records altogether where no alternative suggests itself. Where the decision is left entirely in the hands of the administrator the sacredness of the documents does not necessarily enter into consideration. Only the trained archivist (not even the historian, much less the administrator) is competent to advise on record-appraisal and selection for survival. And the archivist should be involved at all stages, advising on records-management while the documents are still current, and looking after them when transferred to his care.

The archivist's main function is to care for the non-current files and records and to index, list, describe the archive in his care so that retrieval of information becomes easy. To do his job properly he has to assert his independence (of the historian and the administrator); he has to draw attention to himself and his importance (by exhibitions, etc.); he has to advise on records management; he has to seek out records relating to his particular archive (Rome, diocesan, missionary, educational, charitable, sociological, etc.) and he has to interest the historian in his work (A.R.A.I. could, for example, provide a register of religious archives for Irish History Departments in the universities, or for U.C.D.'s Archives Department) and University History Departments, for example, could provide for the A.R.A.I. a list of graduate researchers using this material, or researching copies that could benefit from the use of religious archival material.

What the historian greatly appreciates on his visit to the archivist is to be presented with a good descriptive list of the material in the particular archive. Such lists are available for some of the collections in the U.C.D. Archives Department. A glance through a finding-aid where each item is described (including individual letters) will tell immediately whether it is necessary to plough through a box of correspondence. Where the archive is relatively small, or the number of archivists relatively abundant, such descriptive lists are easier to make. The very rich Dublin Diocesan Archive presents a different problem. Here you are dealing with literally thousands of letters in, say, the Cullen or Walsh papers. And although the categories to date into which such a mass of letters is divided — Bishops, More Important Priests, Priests and Nuns, and Laity, and boxed in individual years — is a very useful one, it will be some time yet before each individual letter is indexed and described. Meanwhile, the historian working on a theme like education, has to work his way through all of the correspondence so as not to miss anything of importance.

The historian of nineteenth-century Irish Catholicism to date has concentrated, like, for example, Emmet Larkin, on ecclesiastical power-play (just as historians in the past concentrated their efforts on kings, and diplomats and politicians and generals, and on the exercise of military, diplomatic and political power). As secular historians have now turned much of their energies over to the investigation of social, economic and cultural as distinct from political history, so too the religious historian must give more and more of his attention to the sociological and cultural aspects of the history of religion in Ireland: to the kind of person who joined the religious life, to the kind of life that was led, to the work that was done at local and regional level, to the practices that were followed and beliefs that were held and taught, to the impact that was made.

to the manuals that were studied, to the regulations that were imposed, to the prayers that were said. In this kind of history of religion on the ground and in the inner life of an individual the much-prized letter from Rome, however sensational it may appear, is of far less value and significance than the well-thumbed copy of the Imitation of Christ, or the old disintegrating Catechism that was once used in the school, or the once much-loved holy picture with its long-forgotten prayer on the reverse side.

The folk-park and folk-museum have become a part of our social history. The preservation of an old convent, with its old library, its old pictures on the walls and its old statues, its material remains of old scapulars and medals and other objects on the sideboard, would be every bit as valuable to the historian's work and to the community's heritage.

But as we all know, there are historians and historians; and all of them with an increasing interest in the Religious Archives. At a period in history when secular women appear to have had little recognition on record kept of them, nuns did exercise a great deal of authority in hospitals, schools, orphanages, etc. They had an outlet for talents and energies and careers that seem to have been denied to their wedded and secular sisters. Even the modern feminist, therefore, sees virtues in the nun and tends to regard her as a nineteenth-century feminist prototype — abjuring men and male company, devoted to her career, and caring for her less well-off sisters and their children and attending to the miseries created in and by a man-ordained society. And what's more, at a time when secular women are largely invisible in history because of the absence of records dealing with them, the convents have locked away in their archives, records of their activities and of the girls they catered for. Much of the history of women in nineteenth-century Irish society is in the Religious Archives and in the care of the religious archivist. Even from the standpoint of secular history, the religious archivist controls a precious source, and bears in consequence a tremendous responsibility.

How much of all this should be made available to the general public? Should there be open access? Take, for example, the question of confidentiality which arose at a conference of the Dublin Commissioners appointed under the Irish Universities Act 1908:

Chief Baron Palles: I don't think the Commission has any intention at present of publishing anything you say here, so that you can speak confidentially to us, and perhaps that will enable us to know your mind and a great deal more . . .

Mr Starkie: I am glad my remarks are not going to be published — I don't think the Chair of Education in Trinity College is very valuable. We have Professor Culverwell lecturing probably 500 students in the year in circumstances which don't make the instruction very valuable; it is more like a public meeting, and I think people go there for curiosity — I think the advantage to the students is very problematical.

. . . when the Chief Baron asked me how many Professors of Pedagogy I would like to have, that is another matter — the fewer, the better from my point of view.

. . . The reason for that opinion is perhaps because the Professors of Pedagogy I have met were very little use.

The confidential comments were printed in a Government paper only two years later for anyone in Trinity College, Dublin or University College, Dublin to have a good sneer at. My prying eye has now been reading the comments. I am not interested in researching it and keeping it to myself. I have just broadcast the matter to you and that's what the historian does.

Confidentiality is a very real problem. There is every reason why convent or private documents should be kept from — on the one hand — the sensationalist, from the journalist who wants to sensationalise or exaggerate or relate a story out of context; and on the other hand the publicist, for example the feminist who merely wants to use the material, again out of context for his/her own special and controversial end. It is sometimes difficult to distinguish the bona fide historian, interested only in establishing the historical truth, from others interested in sensationalism or propaganda. But the effort is worth making.

The fuller the records, the more they are bound to reveal the human side of the convent — the power struggles, the avarice, the personality clashes, the pettiness, the prejudices, the dislikes, the jealousies, the coldness, the cruelties, the sins that are part of all human nature. These can be no worse than what is revealed, in, for example, the correspondence of nineteenth-century Irish bishops. We must not create the impression that monasteries and convents will not bear the light of day. Convent records will also reveal what the irreligious and cynical Voltaire appreciated:

Perhaps there is nothing grander on earth [he wrote] than the sacrifice that the weaker sex make of beauty and youth, often of high birth and fortune, to comfort and console in the hospitals the mass of human misery, the view of which is so humiliating to human pride, and revolting to natural delicacy. The people separated from the Church of Rome have but imperfectly imitated a charity so generous.

What I am suggesting is that there is a great deal in the Religious Archives to be proud of; that they have nothing to hide or be ashamed of. And in any case if the complaints levelled against a religious institution are big enough, or if the scandal alleged against an individual religious is serious enough, you may be quite certain that correspondence and reports associated with the allegations will have ended up on the bishop's desk or in Rome and consequently are, or will become, accessible to researchers in these archives. So why not make the full picture available in the first instance in the particular institution's archives since they can't be hidden from view for ever?

It is a commonplace that saints are not easy to live with. Martyrs could be even more difficult than saints. Take an example I have come across in Sr Dominick Kelly's History of the Sligo Ursulines. Sr Marianne Moloney at twenty-three, after three years in the convent, wished to leave the Sisters of Charity in Dublin and join the Ursulines in Waterford where she felt seclusion would be greater and more to her liking. For this she had the approval of her spiritual adviser. The annalist described her as of 'a cavilling turn of mind.' 'She would argue upon the rules and discuss every order of obedience' and gave 'a good deal of trouble.' Permission to leave for another Order 'was readily given' (gasp of relief in the annalist's pen can be almost heard!) — thus forestalling the dismissal that 'would have been inevitable had she not entirely changed her conduct (of which her unbending character gave little hope)'. One can hardly believe that Mother M. Aikenhead was writing about the same person in her perhaps suspiciously immediate response to a request from the Ursuline Superior in Waterford for a report on Sr Moloney's character. Mother Aikenhead wrote that the Sister had consulted an enlightened ecclesiastic by whose advice she had been guided in the entire affair. Since her entry she had been considered a person of sense and talent. 'She has always been exact in the observances, seemed addicted to prayer, spiritual reading, etc. And in regard to her temper, I have heard those who were in constant intercourse with her (in our Novitiate) remark hers was imperturbable.'

I suppose there is nobody more infuriating to the Mistress of Novices than the unbending character who is always imperturbable, talented, addicted to prayer and exact in the observances, while questioning their reasonableness and function. On the other hand, Mother Aikenhead may well have been one of those Superiors who had learned how to be economical with the truth. She may well have sincerely believed that the spiritual level of both convents could be raised by the departure of an individual from one institution to another. Whatever the real situation was, Miss Moloney did not last long in the Ursulines in Waterford either. There, her conduct was described as 'very unsatisfactory and may injure the novitiate.' It was decided that she should not continue her novitiate, but that she might remain until she could obtain admittance into some other convent. She desired and 'demanded' to be admitted to the Ursulines in Ennis to continue her novitiate. After hearing the pros and cons, the Ennis Chapter, by a majority in a secret vote, agreed to give her a trial. She paid £500 dowry and the expenses of her novitiate £40 p.a. Here she was eventually professed and ten years later her name headed the list of pioneers selected for the missions in Demerara, British Guiana, where she died after three years in dire poverty and hardship. The local doctor wrote to the bishop: 'These ladies are not ill, they are starving.' Let's hope that the spirited Miss Moloney had found at last the seclusion she had looked for, in her white martyrdom in South America.

Let me try to summarise what I've been saying. The history of religion in 19th and 20th century Ireland is receiving ever more attention from the historians. The archives of religious institutions will have a central role to play in this development and will come more and more into demand. It is being recognised that these archives are a very important source not only for the history of individual institutions or for the history of religion in the narrow sense, or even for the history of women in Irish society, but they are also an invaluable source for the general social and cultural history of Ireland.

The three classes of person immediately interested in the Religious Archives are the Administrator, the Archivist and the Historian. And while each has to be independent of the other, the three have a common interest in co-operating closely together to make sure that the best possible care and the best possible use is made of these collections.

Confidentiality is, of course, a difficult and sensitive issue. Administrator, Archivist and Historian should talk more to each other about the matter and between them draw up the regulations governing their use. My feeling is the fuller the record and the easier the access to it, and the more honesty, openness and truth, the better it will be all round and for all concerned.

The work of the individual religious archivist and of the Association of Religious Archivists is critical and essential. I congratulate each of you and your Association on the work that has been done and is being done. And I can only encourage you to even greater efforts in the future.

BUILDING FOR THE FUTURE:
REFLECTIONS OF A DIOCESAN ARCHIVIST

The Rev. Anthony Dolan

Last September (1987) at the Society's Council meeting, we began to make plans for this year's (1988) Conference. We agreed to ask Canon Robert Carson, who had recently acquired a couple of rooms for archive use in the Pope John Paul Centre, Middlesbrough, to share with us his thoughts on how he envisaged the development of the premises.

Unfortunately, several months after agreeing to give this talk, Canon Carson died rather unexpectedly. At fairly short notice, it was decided that I should fill the gap left by his death.

This bit of background is important because it will determine the tone of this talk. I envisage this paper as providing an opportunity for us to share ideas. It will not be a case of me providing you with a blueprint along the lines such as: this is what we in Nottingham have done, are doing, plan to do, and the rest of you would be well advised to follow our example! I shall be putting forward some ideas in the hope that you, in return, will suggest some ideas to us.

Recently, I decided to do a bit of checking. I discovered that, of the 116 parishes which currently make up the Diocese of Nottingham, no less than 52 were listed in the 1888 edition of the Catholic Directory, in other words, they are more than one hundred years old.

From this I conclude that half the parishes of the Diocese have, should have, did have (before they were lost, mislaid, sold, given away, destroyed, or pinched by us) some records of considerable historical interest. In fact, at the present time, we hold registers and other documents which we have collected from thirty-three parishes, not all of which parishes are, however, more than one hundred years old.

We are talking about building for the future. Building work, if it is to endure, must be systematic. It must also be well-planned and carefully executed, otherwise it will not last. It is perhaps not inappropriate that we ask ourselves in this context certain basic questions, viz.:

- A. For what kind of future are we trying to build?
- B. What are we trying to build?
- C. How are we going about building it?

A. For what kind of future are we trying to build?

We can sometimes get the impression — at least our Assistant Archivist not infrequently does — that our raison d'etre, our main purpose in life, is to create a heaven on earth for ancestor-hunters. But this is not — or should not be — our purpose. If it happens as a by-product of our work, well and good; something is achieved by way of fostering goodwill.

I would suggest that we are trying to build in such a way that:

- i) the relevant material we hold is readily available to those individuals and organisations who have the right, the need, or the permission to see and make use of it; and
- ii) we know where other potential archive material is, who is responsible for it, and what is likely to happen to it when whoever is currently responsible ceases to be so or loses interest.

B. What are we trying to build?

The cynic might suggest that we are trying to build a vast collection of correspondence, since answering letters takes up a disproportionate amount of the time I spend on archive work.

We are, I would suggest, trying to build a collection of appropriate documents and artefacts and a system of interchanges of information regarding other relevant documents and artefacts which we do hold, and to do this for the purposes I have indicated.

It seems to me that we have a tremendous responsibility in this regard. Archivists are the custodians of the future, insofar as they preserve the records of the past and make them available for generations to come. We have a responsibility to ensure that 'things' do not get lost, damaged, destroyed, or end up in the wrong hands. If we take the Incarnation seriously, then we have a sacred task. As is stated in the memorandum of our recent Working Party, the material we hold 'can be seen as a record of God's grace in action in the local community'.

C. How are we going about our building work?

I would suggest six ways:

1. By agitating from time to time for more adequate premises and/or equipment.
2. By a process of education.
3. By public relations exercises.
4. By sheer hard and often monotonous work.
5. By collecting (deliberately or accidentally).
6. By seeking information concerning the present whereabouts of documents and artefacts.

1. By agitating from time to time for more adequate premises and/or equipment. One has to be a little careful about this — not too often and then with a toothpick rather than a sledgehammer. One might suggest to one's superior: 'I've just visited the archives of the Sisters of Y (or the Diocese of Z). I thought ours were good but you should see what they've got in the way of . . .'. Occasionally, one might have to say: 'I know you're the boss, but it becomes increasingly difficult to work under these conditions'. We have to let our superiors know we are content but not complacent. (Don't forget: it's also important to get around the bursar or financial secretary — it takes a very strong-minded superior to stand up to a resolute bursar!)

2. By a process of education.

Who needs to be educated?

a) We do. This is true, whether we are trained archivists or amateurs.

No one has ever finished learning.

b) Our Superiors (Provincials, Abbots, Bishops)

In some cases, including our own, this may hardly be necessary; in others, it may be so. Not all of you may be as fortunate in this regard as we are.

c) The clergy.

It is a fact that most of the parish clergy in this country are so burdened with administrative work that they cannot be blamed for not showing much interest in old books, letters, etc. If they haven't the time, the inclination, or the energy to care for such things, they need to be pointed in the direction of those of us who have at least the inclination, if not always the time or the energy.

There is one parish in my own diocese where, in the late 1960s, the incoming parish priest had a bonfire of old books including some valuable records from the early nineteenth century or before. Clearly, he needed educating if he wasn't already beyond it!

I am glad to say things are improving. More and more, priests are tending to contact me to ask what they should do with items of historical interest which they find in their parishes. My usual response is: 'don't do anything at all until I've been over to see them.' This approach seems to pay off.

I sometimes think I would like to be in the position where, when a priest dies in office, I'm called in before the undertaker or, at any rate, before the funeral. For all sorts of things can disappear during an interregnum. Once I had a lucky stroke in this regard. We received the usual notification of the death of a parish priest in one of the older parishes and were asked to let the priest-in-charge know whether we proposed to attend the funeral. I rang up and said: 'I will come to the funeral, concelebrate, stay for lunch and then clean out the presbytery.' I did all of this! Some three-and-a-half years later, the successor to that parish priest rang me to ask for a copy of the plan of the church drains; it was one of the items we had 'removed' when his predecessor died. Had we not done so, it might have disappeared anyway.

In another parish, I called in to see the priest. (His predecessor had given me quite a lot of documents including some registers from the late eighteenth century.) I was on my way to a meeting and almost missed it since, every time I stood up to go, he offered me another register. What archivist can resist a temptation like that?

But things are not always as easy as this. In November 1981 I suggested to one parish priest that he ought to close his death register and give it to me for the archives. Even though the book was only half full, it had been in use for a century and was in poor physical condition. The hint was not taken nor was an identical suggestion made by the Bishop when he came on Visitation. I tried several more times and, eventually got the register in October 1986, four years and eleven months after my initial request! Sometimes tact and patience are called for!

d) Religious.

Several congregations of religious sisters have been founded in the Diocese of Nottingham and/or long-established in it. Some of these, e.g. the Sisters of St Joseph of Peace, the Corpus Christi Carmelites, the Presentation Sisters, have made use of the material in our archives and, in one case, have contributed to our secondary sources. Mount St Bernard Abbey gave us a copy of a quite unique record, the video of the exhumation (part of the preliminaries to beatification) of the body of Fr Cyprian Tansi.

There is sometimes a problem regarding parishes run by religious communities as to how much material there belongs to the institute and how much to the Diocese. I think I know the theoretical solution but I haven't quite resolved the practical aspect. Perhaps tact and patience are called for here too.

e) Laity.

One of the benefits of the relatively new sport of ancestor-chasing has been that more and more people are acquiring a sense of history. Part of this sense of history is an awareness that today is the basis of tomorrow, that the records we keep, the artefacts we preserve, will provide the material for future generations of historians, sociologists, genealogists, etc.

But how do WE go about educating the laity with a view to building for the future?

Over the years we have used various methods. These have included:

- i) Writing articles for our diocesan year book under headings such as: 'The Church in Lincolnshire'-a briefoutline'(1983),'The Mansfield Deanery' (1984), 'A load of old rubbish' (1984),'Leicester Deanery 'A" (1986). and 'The Buxton Deanery' (1987).

ii) Giving talks on archival matters to groups such as: Ilkeston Catholic Ladies' Group, an antiquarian circle, and Junior classes at St Thomas' Primary School, Ilkeston.

iii) Preaching 'historical' sermons, for example: St Mary's, Glossop: parish centenary (1982), Our Lady's. Bulwell: church golden jubilee (1985), and Ashbourne: church centenary (1988).

Occasionally, an off-the-cuff remark produces an unexpected reaction. At a Knights of St Columba meeting in March 1988, I said, rather facetiously in reply to a question, that —as archivist — I have jurisdiction throughout the diocese. Some weeks later, one of those present at that meeting rang me and offered me the minute book of the now-defunct Nottingham branch of the Catholic Transport Guild!

3. By public relations exercises.

This, although it can be rather time-consuming, I believe to be very important. It can be done in a number of ways, for example:

i) by replying in a friendly way to people who write to us, especially if they are non-Catholics chasing their suspected Catholic ancestors;

ii) by asking people who seek information from us for personal, professional or parish reasons to let us know if they come across anything interesting and/or to send us a copy (for which we offer to pay but - so far — have never been asked to do so!) of whatever they may happen to produce. This approach has brought in, among other things, some useful details on earlier Bishops of Nottingham, as well as an article on a priest of the diocese who later joined the Redemptorists.

iii) by contacting local record offices and keeping them up-to-date with details of registers we have acquired from their area.

4. By sheer hard and often monotonous work.

This is where our Assistant Archivist comes into her own. Without her unremitting, systematic expenditure of thoughtful energy, our archives would be in a state of primeval chaos. She acts as a kind of demiurge. Over the past nine years, she has filled many shoe boxes with meticulously written index cards. I couldn't begin to guess the number of files whose contents she has sorted, stamped and listed. Future historians will owe her a very great debt.

As yet, we have no possibility of cross-indexing. This is one reason why we are hoping — in the not too distant future and with the help of a suitable database — to put at least some of these records on computer.

5. By collecting (deliberately or accidentally)

Since I last gave a paper to this Conference (1982), we have collected quite a number of documents and artefacts. In April 1988 we removed from Cathedral House two boxes containing untold treasures. Although we have listed the contents of these boxes, we have not yet had time to study them.

The closure of St Hugh's College, Tollerton, two years ago has resulted in our acquiring more than thirty volumes of Catholic Record Society publications and various other reference books. (We keep a lookout for books to add to our library, something we believe to be very important.)

Quite a number of parish histories have come our way as have registers from a further nineteen parishes. A series of invaluable scrapbooks on a wide range of subjects was left to us by a parishioner of St Joseph's, Sutton-in-Ashfield, who died in 1986. This remarkable collection includes five volumes of press-cuttings on the progress of Vatican II.

We have also been given half-a-dozen mitres but, as yet, we have no croziers to go with them!

I have already told you how, by accident, we acquired the minutes of the Catholic Transport Guild. An even more remarkable thing happened at the beginning of 1986.

I had written to a certain priest asking if he knew the whereabouts of some early registers from a parish where he had once served. He didn't but — for good measure — sent me a baptismal register (beginning in 1843) from another parish he had left fifteen years earlier! The man concerned has since died and I hate to think what might have happened to that register had I not got hold of it in time.

A few months ago, I was contacted by someone who had been involved in the beginnings of our diocesan catechetical commission and was given a lot of documentation on the origins of this body.

6. By seeking information concerning the present whereabouts of documents and artefacts.

But what of the future?

I have already mentioned the hope that we will shortly begin to put some of our records on computer.

As I said earlier, we need to know where various potential archive records are likely to be. It is not necessary that we have everything ourselves even if we had space to store it and time to list it.

Looking to the future, in April 1988 I sent out a questionnaire to thirteen diocesan departments/commissions, e.g. Liturgy, Justice & Peace, Tribunal, Cathedral Chapter. Four simple questions were asked:

Who keeps the records?

Where are they kept?

What records are kept?

Date of earliest record?

The results were quite interesting but the information needs updating.

One needs also to expand this search for information. I have already made an attempt at this by getting some of the older priests to identify people and places on old photographs. It would be useful to ask older priests, religious and lay people to record their recollections on tape if they are unable or unwilling to commit these to writing, but we have no plans to do this at present.

As an archivist — but not as a parish priest! — I lament the demise of the practice (which seems to have been fairly widespread) whereby each parish priest was required to fill in a detailed questionnaire prior to the bishop's official Visitation. We have quite a number of these and they make interesting, and occasionally entertaining, reading. For example, in reply to the request 'Give the names, occupations and addresses of eight principal Catholics', the priest at All Saints, Glossop, wrote in the 1890s, 'There are not eight!' Some of the questions asked — even many years ago — have a quite contemporary ring. Priests in Hexham & Newcastle were asked (no date given) 'Is care taken at all times to exclude profane music?'

What I am proposing to do (hopefully in the autumn of this year if the Bishop approves) is to write to all headteachers and to parish priests of at least the older parishes asking them to supply me with information about potential archive material they hold. (See note below.) I don't know what my chances of getting replies are, but the exercise would be interesting and, hopefully, useful.

That, in essence, concludes what I have to say. I would emphasise once again that I welcome any ideas you may have which might help us develop or correct ours.

Editorial note

This article is the text of a paper read by Fr A.P. Dolan, Archivist of the Diocese of Nottingham, Vice-Chairman of the Society, at the annual conference at High Leigh Conference Centre, Hoddesdon, on 31 May 1988. Fr Dolan also circulated copies of a questionnaire on parish records with an associated circular letter to parish priests, and a questionnaire on school records with an associated circular letter to headteachers. Copies of these may be obtained from Fr Dolan, whose address is The Presbytery, Our Lady & St Thomas of Hereford, 17 Nottingham Road, Ilkeston, Derbyshire, DE7 5RF.

NEVER THROW AWAY OLD RECEIPTS! : AN ELUSIVE CORK CARMEL, 1873-1884

Sister M. Angela Bolster

INTRODUCTION

My first awareness of the existence of Carmelite nuns in Cork in the late nineteenth century came from certain items in the Diocesan Archives which I here present by kind favour of Bishop Michael Murphy. They include a) a letter from Bishop Thomas Furlong of Ferns, 20 December 1872; b) an entry in Dean Dominick Murphy's Typescript Annals of the Diocese, 9 March 1873; c) a Relatio Status or Five-year Report on his diocese by Bishop William Delany, 1875; d) a set of receipts indicating sums of money accredited to Mother Gabriella, Carmelite Convent, Cork, 1875 to 1879; e) chaplaincy appointments in an old Register of Clerical Changes dating from 1833.

Extra-diocesan sources brought me in touch with many members of the Order of Discalced Carmelites in this country and in Rome; hence my indebtedness to Father Phelim Monaghan and the Carmelite Sisters in Loughrea, to the Carmelite Prioresses in Tallow and New Ross and, most particularly, to Sister Teresa O'Shea, OCD, of the Malahide Carmel, whose knowledge of Carmelite history is laced with the lively good humour of the contemplative which makes her a refreshing and inspiring mentor. From Rome, Father Charles Newell, OCD, supplied me with valuable data from the Generalate Archives, while my own personal researches in Propaganda Fide uncovered some important letters from within the Cork Carmelite community and which I here present by kind permission of the Archivist. Finally, an important clue as to the dispersal of the Carmelites came from the files of The Cork Examiner.

MADAME DE MOUSSET

In one simple sentence Dean Dominick Murphy recorded the establishment of a Carmelite monastery in Cork in the closing decade of Bishop William Delany's episcopate. Under date 9 March 1873 he wrote: 'On this day the Bishop installed the Carmelite Nuns in their temporary convent, 1 Morrison Quay, in this city.' The convent occupied the corner house once used as a coal-store by Abraham Sutton & Co., who had leased it from Messrs Beamish and Crawford. John Nicholas Murphy of Clifton listed this house as among the contemporary convents of the United Kingdom (1876). The foundress was Madame de Mousset (Mussy), in religion Mother Gabriella, who claimed to have been professed 'by a certain Francois de Sussex, Bishop and Canon of the Basilica of Loreto': thus Bishop Thomas Alphonsus O'Callaghan to the Superior General of the Discalced Carmelites on 18 December 1886. This claim has not been substantiated, and Mother Gabriella's own correspondence indicates that she was not at all sure of the canonical status of her community with the Discalced Carmelite family. It would appear that she 'wanted continental interpretation of certain usages enforced in the — to her — terra incognita of Cork.'

Though Bishop Delany introduced five Sisterhoods into Cork between 1867 and 1875, there is no extant correspondence relating to the Carmelites of Morrison's Quay. However, Bishop Furlong, who apparently knew the Foundress, wrote the following on 20 December 1873 in response to a query from Dr Delany:

. . . MmedeMussy's [si'c] contemplated institute is to be of the same family [as the Carmelites of New Ross], but not of the same branch of it. Hers will be, I understand, of the 3rd Order of Carmelites whose special object will be the adoration of the Blessed Sacrament for the purpose of thanksgiving. The idea, I believe, was originally suggested by the well-known Jewish convert, Father Hermann, who became a Carmelite Friar . . .

Mme de Mussy seems to be a very suitable, devoted and energetic person very anxious to carry out the Carmelite Rule exactly, as in my conversation with her she always referred to the Reformed Carmel as her model. The Carmelite Convents in Dublin have a high character for the piety of the nuns and the strict and regular observances maintained in them. How far such austerity is practicable with the constitutions which young ladies bring nowadays into religion, will be for your Lordship to determine . . . But Cork is a fruitful soil, and the mustard seed planted there will soon grow into a mighty tree. From my heart I congratulate you, my dear Lord, on presiding over a city which numbers within its circuit so many and such magnificent religious institutes . . .

The Ladies [Mme de Mussy and companions] means I do not know

In this letter Bishop Furlong touched on the main reefs — status and finance upon which the Cork Carmel floundered. The convert-Jew referred to was German-born Hermann Cohen, a musical child prodigy, later a brilliant pianist, pupil and protege of Franz Listz and not unknown to Georges Sand. Like Ratisbonne, the Blessed Sacrament brought him to conversion (during Benediction) and he became a Carmelite Friar in France in 1847. He established a Carmelite Monastery in Kensington at the request of Cardinal Wiseman in 1862 and remained there until 1867. During the Franco-Prussian War he was assigned to minister to French prisoners-of-war in Spandau Prison where he contracted smallpox and died in 1871.

CHEQUES AND CHAPLAINS

Bishop Delany's Relatio of 1875 lists nine different Sisterhoods, making a total of fifteen convents housing 281 Sisters, not including the Little Sisters of the Poor who were introduced later that year. There were twelve Carmelites in the Morrison's Quay Convent 'devoting their lives to adoration of the Blessed Sacrament'. Eighteen receipts dating from 1875 to 1879 suggest that the foundress/ superior sent out questing letters. The extant receipts came from Banking Institutes (now obsolete) in Boston, Philadelphia San Francisco and Nevada and were paid into the National Bank and the Bank of Ireland. They amount to a total of £1,562.2.10 paid over a period of twenty-three months. Time came when Bishop Delany vetoed this practice.

Chaplaincy appointments to the Carmelites indicate Bishop Delany's consideration for the nuns; a fact endorsed by a Papal Rescript of 1873 allowing them the privilege of Christmas Midnight Mass in their own private oratory which he had already secured for other communities in his diocese.

1872—1873: The first chaplain was the Abbe Louis Bertrand de Metz who died in the Mercy Home on 5 December 1905 and 'who came to Cork to act as chaplain to a community of Carmelite Nuns about the year 1872'.

1876—1877: Rev. Thomas Magnier (he was appointed Parish Priest of Dunmanway in 1907 and was murdered there by the Auxiliaries in December 1920).

1878 Rev. Patrick Tracy

1879 Rev. Laurence Cummins

1880 Rev. D. O'Mahony, who apparently served for four years

1884 Rev. J. Lane

By the time of Fr O'Mahony's appointment, nemesis was already threatening the convent.

CRACKS IN THE CLOISTER!

Correspondence to hand leaves no doubt but that money was among the major factors which drew down on Mme de Mousset the full weight of Bishop Delany's anger. By 1879 the patronage she claimed to enjoy from Lady Londonderry, Countess Kenmare and Countess O'Hagan had been withdrawn; nor does she appear to have got any further aid from America. Then there was the recurring query — even from within the community — as to the canonical status of the community. This was compounded by Mme de Mousset's failure to appreciate the problems entailed in integrating continental customs within an alien and insular culture. Her letter of 5 May 1881 to the Carmelite Superior General in Rome reveals a build-up of misunderstandings, misrepresentations and even of mischievous innuendos. The foundress had quite a reservoir of intemperate language which she directed against the Superior General, against the Bishop and his clergy, and against a postulant, Blanche Brett who, in turn, lodged her own complaint at Rome against the Cork Carmel.

Mme de Mousset refers to Blanche as an English Protestant convert, formerly a Dame de la Sainte Union . . . today a primary teacher, who was a nun here as a postulant, was expelled from the Carmel for drunkenness . . . She refuses to admit that her mother was mad and had written to us during her postulate more than twenty letters of nonsense. This ex-postulant has affirmed that she would avenge her service . . . and is doing so under the cloak of zeal for the House of God and our conversion!

It appears that Blanche sent Mme de Mousset an insulting telegram and created a scene at the convent door proclaiming to all 'that there were here Sisters in mortal sin . . . Our Sisters were terrified and the passers-by in the street amazed witnesses.'

For all her self-righteousness, Gabriella de Mousset was guilty of ill-treating her postulants. From the evidence of Mary Burke (about whom more later), we learn that she retained subjects for three years, and one postulant for seven years without giving them the religious habit. She then dismissed them, saying they had no vocation. In retaliation, they threatened to take action against her 'for taking their time and for ill-treatment', and 'they went to my Lord Bishop Delany at different times, making the above complaints . . . as did the chaplain [spiritual director?], Pere Bertrand.' Why did Bishop Delany fail to heed these ominous signs that all was not well on Morrison's Quay? Why also — astute man that he was — did he accept Mme de Mousset into his diocese without verifying her references?

CANONICAL STATUS

Mother Gabriella insisted that her community belonged to the Dis-calced Carmelites of the Order of St Elias and that Bishop Delany's jurisdiction over them did not alter that fact. She also maintained that they were a 2nd Order: 'We have never called our convent the 3rd Order of Carmel' and she cited letters in support of her claims; letters which nobody saw. By 1884 her thinking was hopelessly muddled, as evidenced by the following statements: 'we had no idea whether we belonged to the 2nd Order or not' . . . 'it was very true to say we are members of the 3rd Order living in enclosure'. . . 'but, we are not a Secular 3rd Order living in community.' Factually, she was correct in her final statement. I have it on good authority that the Third Order Secular did not exist in Ireland at that time.

She was also correct in explaining why she and her Sisters took simple and not solemn vows, the latter 'not being not at all possible either in France or in England or Ireland . . . countries which are far from protecting the religious vows of Sisters'. On the other hand, she was incorrect in claiming papal as against episcopal enclosure. The former applied only to those who took solemn vows. Despite her efforts to vindicate herself, Gabriella de Mousset became increasingly suspect in Rome and in Cork; and not solely on canonical grounds.

THE SACRISTAN

The prescription of a Sacristan for enclosed nuns dates back to a Motu Proprio of Gregory XIII in 1572, in pursuance of which, St Teresa in her Alcala Constitutions of 1581 stipulated that the Sisters should have 'outside the enclosure a Sacristan (priest or cleric) or some out-servant, to lock and bolt the outside door of the Church and the principal door of the Convent'. Implementation of this prescription varied. It was literally observed in France, but in Ireland the extern sacristan was never a priest or cleric. Bishop Delany strongly disapproved of the sacristan in Morrison's Quay and he arranged for a rota of priests to perform the duties involved, much to the fury of Mme de Mousset.

Our insistence on having a Sacristan is annoying the Bishop of Cork [she wrote]. Consequently, having had more than 184 priests who were either mad or drunk (her favourite epithets) to fulfil the priestly functions, to administer the Sacrament of the Sick, say Mass, give Benediction etc., we think that for such priests a man is necessary who, by his age, his strength, his piety, could continue the duties of the sanctuary.

She appealed to the Superior General in Rome 'to implore the Bishop of Cork, not on the basis of jurisdiction, but on that of morals, not to refuse to allow the Carmelites to follow their constitutions' on 'this matter of the sacristan. Bishop Delany's reply to Rome showed that he had no other option but to dismiss the sacristan.

EPISCOPAL ULTIMATUM

On 24 September 1884, Bishop Delany justified his closure of the Morrison's Quay Convent on 1 June:

My Vicar General, Dean Neville, has learned from the Carmelite General in Rome that neither authorization nor sanction has been given to Mme de Mousset for establishing a convent of that Order.

He listed three specific areas of dissatisfaction:

A certain layman, whom she called Sacristan, was too familiar in visiting and delayed too long during the day, not without scandal from within and without. Mme de Mousset collected large sums of money in this country and in America, all of which she kept for her own use. She dismissed Sisters arbitrarily without reference to, or approval from me.

Under such circumstances and following repeated and ineffective admonitions, the Bishop gave Mme de Mousset notice to quit; he forbade her to sign any more cheques or to contact any of the Irish Carmelite Monasteries. The indomitable lady made one last daring effort to obtain money in Cork, but in this too she failed.

THE CORK EXAMINER

Under date Thursday, 3 July 1884, we read that

The Carmelite Community of No.1, Morrison's Quay, Cork, beg in haste to state that their chapel is closed by order of the Right Reverend Dr. Delany, Lord Bishop of the diocese, and they would earnestly appeal to the charity of their numerous friends and associates to help them in paying the debts of the convent amounting to more than £376 (which were nearly all contracted by the expenses of the chapel), as also to help them to open their next convent, which will probably be in Ireland; otherwise, certainly in France, where several of the religious are expected, but do not intend to go until the end of September, nor before all arrangements will be made for the Irish Sisters and all debts paid.

The immediate sequel to the foregoing was an editorial explanation on the following day to the effect that

We find that the paragraph referring to the above which appeared in yesterday's issue was inserted without diocesan authority. We are informed that no collection can be made in this diocese for any religious purpose without the special permission of the Bishop; and from a circular letter read on last Sunday in all the Churches of the city, we perceive that the only collection at present authorised by his Lordship is that for the new Diocesan Seminary.

THE CASE OF MARY BURKE

There had to be victims of Mme de Mousset's conduct. Two letters from Mary Burke (May, September 1884) written to Rome from No.8 Marlboro Street, tell that 'on receiving those orders from his Lordship, Mme de Mousset obliged me to leave the convent and I am now thrown on the world.' Mary Burke entered the Cork Carmel in January 1874, was received on 26 April and then made a year's novitiate. 'The first six months I spent under the direction of Mother Teresa from the Carmelite Convent in Fulham in England . . . the remaining six I continued under the direction of Mme de Mousset.' After canonical examination, Bishop Delany professed her in a public ceremony in May 1875. Mary Burke never doubted the validity of her profession and lived 'for ten years without meat, observing the Rule and cloister of Carmel. I never breathed the air, for we have no garden attached to our convent.'

She had one plea for the Bishop and one complaint against him:

As my Lord Bishop Delany made a mistake in professing me at the word of Mme de Mousset without having first seen her papers signed by ecclesiastical authority . . . is not His Lordship bound to place me in a convent where I can preserve my vocation and my vows, as I firmly believe my vows binding before God and my conscience?'

Bishop Delany, she said, had been aware, at least for three years, that the Morrison's Quay Convent was not duly founded; she considered it his duty 'to have communicated the same to me years ago.'

For his part, Bishop Delany regarded Mary Burke as 'a holy and virtuous woman who believes that her vows, taken in good faith, are valid.' However, the information imparted to Dean Neville (quoted above) was what counted: The foundation was invalid and consequently the Superior General refused to decide on Mary Burke's religious life, 'past, present or future'. And here all sources of information on the nineteenth-century Cork Carmel peter out. There is no record in Propaganda as to Rome's response to Dean Neville.

DISPERSAL

Dr Thomas Alphonsus O'Callaghan succeeded Bishop Delany in 1886. By then, all traces of the Morrison's Quay community were gone, so much so, that he addressed himself on the matter to Reverend Jerome Grotti (later Cardinal) who was Procurator General at the time of the foundation. We have no extant reply to this letter. My efforts to identify Blanche de Brett have been unavailing, likewise my efforts to verify the fact of Mme de Mousset's profession. Nor is there any verification that the novice mistress from Fulham ever came to Cork! The annals of Fulham are now in the Carmelite Monastery of Bridge Lane, London, and have been examined.

At the very least therefore, the Cork Carmel was an unorthodox foundation, and Gabriella de Mousset, at best, an adventuress. For all that, those who entered that monastery did so in good faith and though they departed as mysteriously as they came, the spiritual leaven of the 'Discalced Decade' cannot be lightly dismissed. This happened to be a decade during which privileged altars were accorded to many churches and convent chapels in the diocese; a decade which saw a tremendous growth in devotion to the Sacred Heart, in consequence of which Cork's main Confraternity of the Sacred Heart was aggregated to that of Santa Maria della Pace in Rome in 1877.

THE SCOTTISH CATHOLIC ARCHIVES:
FOUR YEARS OF DEVELOPMENT, 1984-1988

The Rev. Mark Dilworth OSB

In the porch of Columba House, where the archives are housed, a plaque informs the visitor that in 1958 the Columba Trust provided funds to establish the premises 'as a repository for Scottish Catholic records and as a centre for historical research'. This article aims at outlining the progress in these twin areas over the four years from March 1984 to March 1988. ¹

Perhaps the most important matter to record is the continued accession of material. It has been our experience that a major deposit is never made completely and cleanly at one go. The central part is first transferred, which gives the donor more space and leads to the exhumation of other sections relegated to some cupboard or attic. In a few cases, sections have been discovered in chapel-houses (presbyteries) some miles distant. It is most encouraging to know that dismembered collections are being brought together again in Columba House, even though piecemeal transfer sometimes upsets our cataloguing. Of course, it is our general policy to respect provenance and to keep separate deposits separate.

During these four years we have received deposits from Argyll, Blairs, Buckie and Edinburgh containing archival material of all three pre-1878 vicariates and the national seminary of Blairs, and even of the pre-1827 national core collection. The Buckie deposit contained minutes of the mission administrators' meetings from 1701 and a more or less complete run of the procurator's accounts from 1707. The archdiocese of Edinburgh has, very sensibly in my view, decided to avoid needless duplication of resources in Edinburgh by depositing all but its more recent files in this national institution. ² No material comes to the national archives automatically or as of right. There has been, however, a steady trickle of smaller deposits from parishes, societies and other bodies and of compilations made by individuals. These included further files on the Papal Visit to Scotland; files of the Catholic Truth Society, Edinburgh; papers of the Grail in Scotland; files of the Lay Apostolate Council; extensive transcripts from Propaganda archives. Ordering additional shelving or metal cabinets is almost an annual event. All the same, given the present rate of change and the amount of material at risk, one can hardly be complacent.

Hand in hand with the acceptance of material for safe-keeping goes the sorting and cataloguing of it for the benefit of researchers. The time-lag between receiving older material and making a calendar available has been kept to a minimum. Modern material has a lower priority and is listed in a less detailed way, and in any case there is a general thirty-year closure before access is allowed.

Some difficulty was offered by accumulations of material either of secondary importance or not directly relevant to the purposes of Columba House. There were also a large number of lesser deposits or collections, too small to be given their own specific coding. Four categories have been created to contain this miscellaneous material: GD (Gifts & Deposits: original documents), GC (Gift Collections), GP (Gift Photocopies: documents in other repositories), HC (House Collections: put together by us). A large collection of photographs and illustrations was also catalogued.

Two interrelated projects came to completion in 1987—88. Once the pre-1878 holdings had been calendared, each section was checked and a summary handlist put on word-processor. The print-outs, reduced to A5 size, have been distributed free to academic institutions, particularly those with students researching in Scottish history. (A few are available at cost price.) Word-processing, of course, makes it possible not only to make corrections but also to add new accessions. The calendars themselves have been put on micro-fiche by Messrs Chadwyck-Healey, Cambridge, and are available commercially. Photocopies of the calendars are also held by the Historical Manuscript Commission, London.

A word should be said on printed publications, which fall roughly into two categories: the reference library, and items which belong to the archival collections because of their relevance to the Scottish Catholic Church. The latter have grown considerably, mainly by transfer of nineteenth-century periodicals and pamphlets from Drygrange seminary. The reference library has also grown, both by gifts from individuals or institutions and by purchase, and some gaps have been filled. Two necessary activities have gone on, though neither is complete: making a card-catalogue of authors and binding periodicals and damaged books.

Ordinary library shelving is not suitable for sizeable collections of slender booklets and pamphlets. These have, therefore, been put according to category in archival boxes, where they can be quickly located. As the sorting of printed matter continued, items of no relevance to Columba House collected at each end of the scale. Ephemera (anything from concert programmes to steamer timetables) were presented to the National Library of Scotland for its embryo collection of such things. Old and rare books were taken to the National Library and will eventually become a long-term deposit there, parallel to other deposits made by the Scottish Catholic Church.

Columba House has three storeys and its potential is still far from fully realised. Two more rooms have been equipped for storage purposes. The Columba Trust, which administers the finances of Columba House, has also made benefactions from its own funds. Not only has it provided a photocopier but it has installed period furniture in the vestibule and reading-room to match the Georgian architecture. The most notable progress, however, concerns personnel. Dr Christine Johnson, who has catalogued the pre-1878 holdings, left to work in Edinburgh's medical archives. In her place Miss Mary McHugh worked two days a week. Then, in early 1988, Dr Johnson returned to Columba House to take up the newly-created post of Deputy Keeper, full-time and permanent.

This account of the progress made by Columba House as an archival centre can fittingly end with two recent events. In May 1984, to celebrate the silver jubilee of its official opening, a reception was held in Columba House. Representatives of archives and other academic institutions in Scotland met Cardinal Gray and the Columba Trustees and saw the work being done in the archives. In October 1986, Dr Athol L. Murray, Keeper of the Records of Scotland, on behalf of the Scottish Record Office, handed over to the Scottish Catholic Church the Liber Ruber, a pre-Reformation cartulary of Glasgow diocese, since legal evidence of its provenance and ownership had come to light. At a pleasant little ceremony in Register House, the Archbishop of Glasgow accepted it, handed over in return a receipt dated 1798, and the Liber Ruber joined its companion volumes from medieval Glasgow in the holdings of the Scottish Catholic Archives. The news media gave good coverage to both events.

Use made of Columba House

The foregoing describes the efforts made and the developments in Columba House. Readers using the facilities have averaged about forty each year and fell roughly into three classes: established scholars, persons following some private line of research (e.g. their parish history), and research students. Sadly, in the present economic climate, the last group has declined. Four theses based in part on our holdings, have been accepted, and three of them published, the subjects being the Grand Tour and the Great Rebellion, Alexander Geddes (biblical scholar), Alexander MacDonell (Bishop in Ontario) and Thomas Nicolson (first vicar-apostolic in Scotland). The archives also provided material for an edition of A.W. Pugin's letters and the Historical Manuscripts Commission's Papers of British Churchmen 1780—1940. The number of queries dealt with, on a wide variety of subjects and made by letter, telephone or personal visit, has risen to an average of about two hundred a year.

Visitors to Columba House are welcomed, and indeed visits are encouraged (but by appointment, please!). Individuals and groups have been shown over the premises and introduced to the resources, and a talk on the history of the archives is available for groups. Its length varies according to our visitors' desires and staying-power! We have been particularly pleased by visits from newly-appointed church archivists wanting to see an establishment in working order, and from scholars exploring the possibilities and resources for some field of research. Sometimes, too, when the mountain cannot come to Mohammed, we go to see the books or papers in a religious house or presbytery and either give advice or offer safekeeping for them in Columba House. In fact, rescue work has been an important role of Columba House in our rapidly changing society.

One particularly interesting development has been the increased use made of Columba House's resources, as distinct from the archival holdings. The reference library is adequate in many areas, and in some aspects of Scottish history is very good. The collection of photographs and illustrations is miscellaneous but undeniably useful. Authors, editors, graphics artists and mounters of exhibitions have used these resources, as have compilers of radio and television programmes. Occasionally we are asked to advise on the correct portrayal of some religious aspect in a literary publication, for instance the confession and communion scene in Schiller's Maria Stuart at the 1987 Edinburgh Festival.

Parish records are not kept here and we therefore cannot do much for genealogy seekers. Columba House has, however, acted as liaison for the Scottish Record Office in its project of ingathering and photocopying Catholic parish registers prior to 1855 (when public registration of births, deaths and marriages became compulsory). Although the project is now officially completed, additional registers have continued to come to light and have been processed. This role of liaison is encouraged by the Catholic Press Office, which sometimes directs queries from the media to Columba House, and we can be called on for comment as well as for information. Press releases and interviews for press and radio were supplied on the occasion of the fourth centenary of the Blessed George Douglas' death in September 1987 and his beatification two months later.

Columba House carries on what could be called public professional liaison with institutions and bodies concerned with Scottish history and culture. Items were lent for exhibition: 'French Connections' in the Royal Museum of Scotland in 1985, and 'The Stuarts in Scotland' in the National Library in 1987. Lectures were given on our holdings: in 1984 to the Canon John Gray symposium, and on the archives of the medieval diocese of Glasgow to the Friends of Glasgow Cathedral. Articles based largely on Columba House holdings and resources were supplied for two inter-denominational projects in Church history: one on the sources of post-Reformation Scottish Catholic history, the other on Catholic worship.³ Interviews were given for Radio Forth's ambitious series on Church history, God's Scotland. The role of Roman Catholic adviser was undertaken, and articles written, for a forthcoming publication by a Church of Scotland institution: the Dictionary of Scottish Church History and Theology.

This summary report on the Scottish Catholic Archives over a four-year period leads me to reflect on the role of Columba House. Its primary purposes of keeping our Church's records, cataloguing them and making them available to researchers, remain unchanged. Making available our other resources and the expertise gained by experience is simply an extension of that role. In these days of conscious public relations, co-operation with other bodies and a certain amount of 'high profile' are inevitable. Being used by and for the media is perhaps merely the partial filling of a vacuum. But active involvement in Scottish historiography and cultural activities is something deeper. In an earlier issue of this journal I wrote that the fundamental role of the Scottish Catholic Archives was to show that the historiography of Scotland is incomplete unless our Church is seen as a constant factor.⁴ I would now go further. The Church must have a presence and play a part in all constructive human activities. I see Columba House as spear-heading the Church's involvement in one area of the cultural and academic scene.

UPHOLLAND COLLEGE ARCHIVES

J.A. Hilton

Upholland College is a magnificent building in picturesque grounds overlooking the Pennine moors and the Lancashire coastal plain. Its contribution to the formation of the secular clergy of the Liverpool and Lancaster dioceses has been described in detail.¹

St Joseph's College, Upholland, was founded in 1883 as the senior seminary for the diocese of Liverpool, and in 1920 the junior seminary, St Edward's (formerly in Liverpool), was amalgamated with it. The College founded the parish of St Teresa's, Upholland, and provides a chaplain for the neighbouring Carmelite convent. In 1975/6, the senior seminary was transferred to Ushaw, and Upholland became the junior seminary for the Northern Province. The College buildings were shared with the Upholland Northern Institute for adult Christian education, and made available as a conference centre. In 1987 the junior seminary closed, but the College will continue to provide a home for Liverpool diocesan junior students who will study in local schools: St Peter's High School, Orrell, and St John Rigby Sixth Form College. Upholland College still houses the Gradwell Library, a collection of theology, some dating from penal times. As a result of these most recent changes, the College archives have been catalogued, but there remains a mass of uncatalogued photographic material.²

The most important records, covering the history of the College from its origins before 1883 up to 1940, are stored in box files.³ These include a file on the vocations crisis of 1892. Important or sensitive materials for the period after 1940 remain part of the College's working archives, and have not been catalogued.

In addition to these files, and a couple of boxes of miscellaneous papers,⁴ there is a considerable amount of material kept in note-books.⁵ Much of this consists of lists and financial accounts, but there are one or two items of a formal biographical and autobiographical nature.⁶ It is, however, the day-to-day material, such as the dean's and the censor's diaries, the diaries of individual priests, and a collection of Christmas pantomime scripts, that provides the best informal evidence for the history of clerical life over the last hundred years.⁷

Access to the archives is obtainable with the permission of the Director, Upholland College, Skelmersdale, Lancashire, WN8 0PZ. Photocopying facilities and residential accommodation are available from the Upholland Northern Institute.

MEMORANDUM ON PARISH RECORDS TO THE
BISHOPS' CONFERENCE OF ENGLAND AND WALES, AND RESPONSE, NOVEMBER 1988

Prepared by a Working Party of the Catholic Archives Society, November 1987

The Catholic Archives Society would like to offer the following observations on the question of the preservation of parish registers. Canon Law lays down requirements for the care of parish registers in particular, but these observations also apply to other records which should be preserved on account of their administrative and historical importance.

1. The 1983 Code of Canon Law (cn. 535) requires that certain registers be kept in every parish, concerning baptisms, marriages, confirmations, deaths and any other records required by local law. This places on the parish the burden of providing suitable secure storage facilities. The danger of damage by fire, flood, theft, and similar hazards is obvious. Parish priests generally are aware of these factors and provide safe custody of their registers.
2. Apart from this requirement of Canon Law, such registers need to be kept for the following reasons. From a theological point of view, they can be seen as a record of God's grace in action in the local community. They are needed for the purpose of church administration. From a historical point of view, they can be of great interest and use in documenting the part played by the local church in the life of the community and are of increasing interest to people tracing their family tree.
3. Older registers can deteriorate through age and can more easily be damaged by use. As new registers are brought into use, the storage of the older registers becomes more of a problem if, for example, the safe can no longer hold them all. The Code of Canon Law (cn. 535, t 5) prescribes explicitly that older parish registers be preserved diligently.
4. For these reasons, several bishops have already arranged for such registers to be placed in the safekeeping of either a diocesan archive or a local record office. The Society is happy to commend this practice. Such storage can help the physical preservation of the registers. The practice of making copies of the registers first and then using these copies (e.g. photocopies, microfiche, microfilm, transcripts) rather than the originals for subsequent administrative purposes can prevent further damage.
5. Once these registers have been removed from the parish, the question of their accessibility arises more acutely. Although such registers contain confidential material, the Church - for the reasons quoted in paragraph two — has a long-standing positive tradition of allowing access wherever possible. The early work of the Catholic Records Society is transcribing registers and the publication of numerous parish histories bear witness to this. The Working Party recommends that all registers so deposited be made freely accessible after the lapse of one hundred years from the date of the individual entry. This is in line with official practice on census returns in England and Wales.

6. Of the various methods of copying records, we would recommend microfiche and microfilm for the following reasons. They are more durable, easier to store, use and copy, and are difficult to tamper with.

7. The question now arises how such copies might be made. Dioceses could make or commission their own. Some local record offices might be willing to do this for a diocese. The Genealogical Society of Utah (an offshoot of the Mormon Church) would probably welcome an invitation to carry out this work. For further observations on this last possibility, we refer to the Appendix to this Memorandum. No matter which method is chosen, we would stress the vital importance of the diocese maintaining copyright and controlling conditions of access.

This Memorandum was submitted to the Bishops' Conference in November 1988. The Bishops' response is recorded in the following Conference minutes:

BISHOPS' CONFERENCE OF ENGLAND AND WALES
November 1988 Meeting

Parish Records and Microfiche

- a) The Bishops' Conference commends the practice of entrusting older parish records and registers to an established church archive or local record office for safe keeping.
- b) The Conference endorses the recommendation of the Catholic Archives Society that these old registers be made freely accessible after a lapse of one hundred years.
- c) The Conference also endorses the Society's recommendation that these registers be microfilmed but leaves to each diocese the decision about accepting the offer made by the Genealogical Society of Utah.

THE CATHOLIC ARCHIVES SOCIETY CONFERENCE, 1988

The ninth annual conference, held at the High Leigh Centre, Hoddesden (Herts), on 30 May - 1 June, attracted sixty-one members, the largest attendance so far, and two new members were enrolled.

The conference was opened by the Chairman (Miss Judith Close) on the evening of 30 May, after which Dr Susan O'Brien spoke about her research in the archives of women's religious congregations, the text of which is printed in this issue.

A lively talk by Fr Anthony Dolan (Vice-Chairman) on his experiences as a diocesan archivist opened the proceedings of the conference's only full day, 31 May. (This talk is also printed in this issue.) Mrs J. Segal (Conservationist, Bodleian Library) then spoke on the conservation of books and papers and gave many useful tips on handling, storage and simple repairs. The spiritual highlight of the conference was the Mass at midday, concelebrated by Bishop James O'Brien, who welcomed members to his diocese, and eight priests. The customary afternoon expedition this year was to St Alban's Abbey, where members were welcomed by the archivist, given a guided tour, and treated handsomely to tea. During the evening, members saw a video on archive listing prepared by the Liverpool Archives Unit, and then divided into discussion groups led by Fr Wilfrid Gandy on library back-up for archive work, Fr Frank Bulliant on the use of Vatican archives, Frs Frank Isherwood and David Lannon on the use of computers, while diocesan archivists had their own small meeting.

After Mass on 1 June, there was a useful exchange of various views in the traditional 'open forum', and this was followed by the annual general meeting. The Chairman (Miss Judith Close) reviewed the previous year's events, which included, inter alia, an increase of membership to 212 (apart from over one hundred separate subscribers to the journal), meetings of diocesan archivists in both the north and the south, the preparation of a memorandum on parish records for submission to the Bishops' Conference, and the honour of two members, Fr Francis Edwards SJ (former Chairman) and Fr Anthony Dolan (Vice-Chairman), being presented to Pope John Paul II on the occasion of the beatification of the Eighty-five Martyrs in November 1987, at which Fr Dolan gave the Pope copies of Catholic Archives in a specially prepared box. The officers then gave their reports and were duly thanked for their work, especially Sr Rosemary Bayne (Conference organiser), and elections were held. The President (Bishop B.C. Foley) graced a very successful conference with his presence, and final plaudits were accorded by Dr Leslie Parker (first Chairman).

A full report of the conference is given in CAS Newsletter, No. 10, Autumn 1988. The 1989 conference will be held at Upholland Conference Centre, Skelmersdale (Lanes), from 30 May to 1 June.

EDITORIAL NOTES

Last year the Society completed its tenth year and this is the tenth edition of Catholic Archives. Ten years pass only too quickly in personal experience, but it is surely remarkable that a society largely of clergy, religious and laymen mostly with numerous other duties to perform should have grown so fast in so short a time.

The Society's first concern remains the preservation of all archives registering the mission of the Church in every aspect of life. That archives are needed for a record of the work of each order, congregation, diocese, lay organisation and so on is well understood now, but the Society urges that such archives should also be used to make the Church's role in the world at large better known to those outside the Church. It is too soon for some archives to be opened for research, but this is another of the Society's aims.

Church archivists work very much in isolation and their archives, despite superficial similarities, are often quite distinctive. The Society, even after ten years, remains largely a self-help body. True, it offers the novice archivist the service of experienced archivists, it has suggested model classifications, and it arranges conferences and occasional training seminars. However, for anyone faced on their own with the unfamiliar task of dealing with archives the knowledge of how others have coped in similar circumstances can be invaluable. Catholic Archives has previously published many articles recording the experiences of archivists relatively new to the work, and this tenth edition includes similar articles. Not every action by church archivists may satisfy the purist, even less probably the archivists themselves in hindsight, but what is surely important is that action is taken to preserve the archives, arrange them sensibly, store them carefully, list them clearly, and let their contents be known.

The present edition contains a wide range of articles. Sr M. Gregory discusses the earlier records of the Bar Convent, Mr Bogan describes the history and present state of an important parish archive, and Fr Smith corrects a once prevalent notion that little had survived of the Plymouth diocesan archives. Dom Aidan Bellenger then shows the value of architectural drawings, and Sr Marguerite, our Secretary, records her work on the Prinknash archives, especially on the papers of Aelred Carlyle. There are also two contributions from the New World. Sr M.H. Muldrey of New Orleans writes about her research on the Mercy archives and Mother Austin Carroll, and Mr Foulkes reviews Church archives in Mexico and gives a valuable model for the arrangement of a modern religious archive. The Society itself and Catholic Archives is open to all Church archivists, not only Catholics, and it is pleasing to publish Mr Refausse's account of the archives of the Church of Ireland, and Mrs Seton's report on a meeting of archivists from all Churches in London in 1989 which will surely lead to fruitful co-operation in the future. Lastly, the Hon. Editor, conscious of the lack of reference to lay societies, offers a preliminary list of those active between 1870 and 1970.

All contributors are very warmly thanked for their articles. An index to Nos 1-10 is being compiled by Dom Richard Jones and will be circulated when ready.

THE 17th AND 18th CENTURY ARCHIVES OF THE BAR CONVENT, YORK

Sister M. Gregory, IBVM

We are fortunate in our archives. The contents, rich in themselves, are further enriched by their ordering, for they were classified, catalogued and professionally arranged by the late Dr Norah Gurney, Director of the Borthwick Institute. The rather formidable array of uniform boxes with their non-committal labels (School, Community, Bills, Correspondence, etc.) suggests little of the wealth of human interest within. But the student or casual visitor, if armed with the Handlist and possessed of plenty of time, can peer into the past and build up a picture of a small, courageous community battling its way through years of poverty, persecution and chilling isolation.

Chronologically, the oldest item, and for the Community the most valuable is the Breve Relation, a bound manuscript life of Mary Ward, written in French shortly after her death in 1645, and almost certainly the work of Mary Poyntz, the youngest member of the first companions.

The origin of the Bar Convent is indicated by the letter, dated 1686, of Thomas Gascoigne to Frances Bedingfield, assigning money for the foundation of three houses, one to be in York. A small house with a garden was duly purchased for £450 and the community (some members recently released from prison on the accession of James II) moved in. But the reign of the Catholic king was very short, and the community soon found itself in trouble. One of the most poignant papers in the archives is the faded, damp-stained, almost illegible letter written by Frances Bedingfield from the Ousebridge Gaol in 1694, begging the Archbishop of York to procure the 'releasement' of herself and her niece Dorothy Paston-Bedingfield from their horrible imprisonment.

I know your Grace is full of mercie and pittie that you can't but think a prison must go hard with one who wants but 2 years of 80 years old, besides being so weak and infirms [she writes]. We have lived in this town at least 8 years, and I am sure none will say other but we have carried ourselves in quiet and civilly and always under great submission to the Lord Mair and Alderman . . .

The archives do not reveal how the 'releasement' took place, but it was almost certainly not through the intervention of Archbishop Sharp.

Though it survived the storms of persecution, the Bar Convent was not a legal entity and could not possess property. So we find a collection of wills by which each Superior bequeathed the property to her successor, thus ensuring continuity of possession to the Institute.

Of the personal life of each nun the archives tell virtually nothing for the first hundred years; only the yellowed sheets on which their vows were written and the brief necrologies compiled after their deaths indicate their lives of almost anonymous fidelity.

The account books, which abound in number, are perhaps the best source of information and human interest. The earliest dates from 1730, when Dorothy Paston-Bedingfield was Superior. She opens her accounting by detailing certain commitments, and writing below them 'All paid long agoe', with a proud flourish of the pen. The items faithfully recorded month by month illustrate much of the personal and social history of the period. The chimney-sweeps mentioned must surely have been, to our shame, little sweeping boys. Glaziers, coopers and 'bricklairs', who all received small wages, are easily identifiable. But who were the 'basket women' who were paid a pittance every month? Were they, perhaps, women who did the nuns' shopping? Turf was evidently the chief fuel, though 'cole' was very occasionally purchased. As to diet, there are some mentions of butcher's meat, and we find entries for ale, 'bear' and even (occasionally) 'coffey'; but the item 'split peas' appears so often as to suggest a very simple table. Very little seems to have been spent on the community's health. 'To ye apothecaries shopp' is a fairly uncommon entry, and 'for a pr of spectacles' is, I think, a unique item in Dorothy Paston-Bedingfield's accounts.

With these scant remarks, we hurry through the book to the years when Mother Hester Conyers was Superior, and financial instability clearly threatened the community, for 'spent above ye income . . .' appears at the bottom of many a page. But we note with pride that never a month passes without an entry 'To ye Poore', however small the sum may be. The disaster of crippling debt was averted, however, by the advent of Elizabeth Stanfield to the noviciate in 1727. Deeds of property attest to the modest fortune she brought to the convent, and illustrate also the tortuous methods resorted to by Catholics for securing an inheritance.

Times became more prosperous and we find more cheerful reading in the papers dealing with Mother Ann Aspinall's rebuilding of the property in the 1760s and subsequently. There is a licence for her to 'build a new front wall to her house' provided it has no bow windows, and a hand-written list gives the names of those who contributed to the project — above all, presumably, to the building and furnishing of the chapel, but that is not mentioned for security reasons, as penal laws still prevailed. The list of donors is headed by the names of the Catholic nobility and gentry -- Lord Petre, Lady Dowager Arundell, Lady Stourton, Lady Gerard and William Constable of Everingham. But contributions are also recorded from the widow of a York upholsterer and undertaker, a schoolmaster and a retired draper. It is clear that the chapel played a significant part in the life of the local Catholic community.

Unfortunately, no architect's plans have survived from this eighteenth-century activity, but there is a homely little note-book, covered in contemporary wallpaper, which records that Mother Aspinal 'took £300 out of the red purse' to pay Thomas Atkinson, the architect. With a copy of the 1791 Act of Parliament, repealing the penal laws against Catholic places of worship, and the licence granted to the chapel, for the sum of £1.12 in the same year, the history of the chapel in the eighteenth century ends on a happy note.

In the secular sphere, human touches are provided by a black exercise book misleadingly called 'Anecdotes of the Convent', begun by Mother Davies in 1735 and continued to 1777 by her successors in the office of procuratrix. It is really a bursar's journal of purchases, repairs, additions and adaptations. The torrent of entries provides a fragmented but vivid peep-show into community life two hundred and fifty years ago. Much care was lavished on the chapel, and we read of '2 little images for ye niches of ye Tabernacle', 'the Chapel candlesticks new gilt, 1741', 'a crimson cord and tassel for ye chapel lamp', and many other embellishments. For the nuns, economy is a dominant note. 'Madam Paston's chimney-board' is made into 'a table for ye day scholars', a screen is fashioned from an old pulpit at the cost of 6s6d, one of the old school benches becomes 'a cheese shelf', and a 'tynn case to put candle ends into' is provided. Chairs are constantly recovered or 'new-bottomed' and beds given 'new sacking bottoms'. The old tapestry taken from one room is made into 'carpits' for another. Bed quilts are made out of old gowns or 'vamp'd up old raggs'. The nearest thing to a new quilt is described as 'one side new check, the other old sheet'.

Very properly, the pupils fared better. For 'the misses rooms' there are purchases of new bed hangings, new bolsters, new testers and new ticks to be filled with feathers purchased from Lincolnshire at 9s6d a stone. There are chests of drawers for 'the high rooms' and 'a sett of peggs for ye Misses to hang their cloaths on'. In addition to 'muggs', Mother Davies bought the children new Delph tea-porringers at St Luke's fair, and there were teacups with handles and 'a China tea-pott' for them, although tea was an expensive luxury. For their recreation, there was a cribbage board, 'a swing to rock in', and a copy of Robinson Crusoe. The picture is rounded off by mention of '2 new books for ye Shepherdesses' and 'a new black bagg for ye King's hair', which seems to refer to school plays.

Visitors, quaintly described as 'strangers' are provided with a set of coffee cups and 'a mahoggany tea-tray'. A rather surprising entry is 'an ugly carpit in ye parlor'. Was this an unappreciated gift, or had Mother Davies not been consulted over so important a purchase? In the kitchen quarters the list of accessions includes a jack for the stove, '2 flatt irons, 5d', 'a Chocolat Mill', a new bucket for the well and innumerable 'tubbs' for the brewery, scullery and kitchen.

Out of doors, Mother Davies relates that the 'little garden' is turned into 'a garden of more profit than asparagus was'. The strawberry bed is dug up in 'ye great garden' and half of it is planted with raspberries. The garden walks are 'gravelled with rubbage' and 'Rose Mary set against all ye Butteresses in ye Garden Wall'. The 'Dogg Kennell' is 'new roofed for ye young Whelp' and the 'Hogg sty' several times improved.

Second only to the 'Anecdotes' is a shabby little manuscript book which looks as if it had spent much of its active life on a corner of the kitchen table. It is dated 1753 and contains remedies for all sorts of ailments ('nervis pills', eye ointment and 'receipt for ye kings evil') mixed artlessly with recipes for ginger-bread, Shrewsbury cakes, orange pudding, seed cake and 'plumb' wine. The dog-eared pages evoke pictures of the kitchen sisters expending much time and energy in preparation for a feast, as 'beat em for about an hour' is the injunction following at least one list of ingredients.

It is disappointing that prior to 1800 the school is poorly documented. Perhaps this is partly explained by the fact that it was a criminal offence, severely punishable, to run a Catholic school. But immediately upon arrival the community established a boarding-school 'for young ladies of Roman Catholick families', and in 1699 a day-school for local girls was opened. A manuscript list of 'Young Ladies from 1710 to 1877' repays careful study. Since this was for long the only English school for Catholic girls, it is not surprising to find in its register the names of nearly all the Catholic gentry. There are Arundels, Bedingfields, Constables, Cliffords, Tempests, Scropes, Talbots, Welds, Vava-sours, and many others. Only towards the end of the eighteenth century are there entries that suggest an invasion by the daughters of rich middle-class merchants from Liverpool, Leeds, Sheffield and the West Indies. French girls coming over from Paris in the last decade of the century must surely have been sent by anxious parents seeking a refuge for their daughters from the French Revolution. The records give neither the age of each pupil upon entry, nor the date when she left. It is therefore impossible to build up a picture of age-range or an accurate assessment of numbers in the school at any one time. An interesting clue, however, is to be found in the early account book already mentioned. From 1736 monthly returns had to be made to the local authorities of the number of Catholics in every household, and so at the bottom of each page there is a note 'we are in family —'. Subtracting the total accounted for by the community, the one maid and old Lady Hungate (who seems to have been a 'parlour boarder') we are left with the probable number of children — usually between 28 and 30, up to about 1760.

There are no school reports belonging to this period, and no mention of the curriculum. A tiny glimpse is given us by a bill from Joseph Halfpenny for 'Attendance in drawing 1782—1783'. He had nineteen pupils and charged them at the rate of 10s6d for twelve lessons, with extra for materials. His bill for 1782—3 amounted to £50.6.6½. For the rest of our information we have to turn to the bound volumes of 'Copies of the Young Ladies' Bills'. The earliest is dated 1761 to 1773. It tells us little of pedagogy but is full of personal and social information. Washing, music, drawing and dancing were extras, and so were such luxuries as 'a fire in her room' and 'sugar for breakfast'. Every imaginable garment is mentioned, from cotton mitts to tuckers, from clogs to muslin aprons. The ubiquity of 'stays' and 'stays a-mending' suggests that tight-lacing was common long before the Victorian era. That life had its lighter side we see from such entries as 'spending money', 'for a Valentine' and 'hire of a chair' which evoke a picture of a 'young lady' setting off in a sedan-chair for a concert — or even a dance — in the Assembly Rooms.

Most poignant is the bill for Mary Clifton of Lytham, Dec. 21st 1766 to May 29th 1767, where a whole sad story is spelt out in the laconic lines of a single page. The first entries are fairly standard, and even cheerful. She has 'cambrick for ruffles', 'hair cutting, pomatum and combd' and 'a scarlet cloak'. But 'a fire in her bed-chamber' together with 'tea, sugar, chocolate, wine and biskets' suggest special care. These entries are followed by the ominous 'To ye Doctor', 'To the Surgeon', 'The apothecaries bills' and 'To Mr Spencer for attendance'. Our worst fears are realised when we read the charges for wax candles, 'a fine crape burial suite', a coffin, church fees, 'under bearers' and a velvet pall. The illness must have been short as the final entry is 'for a nurse for a week's attendance and board'. The child was almost certainly buried in York as there is mention of 'wine and biskets for the funeral'. The Convent had no cemetery at that time, so perhaps the little girl was laid to rest in the chancel or churchyard of Holy Trinity, Micklegate, beside Mother Cecily Cornwallis and other nuns who had lived and died in the Bar Convent.

Thus a whole microcosm of human endeavour, with its strife and calm, joy and sorrow, life and death, is reflected in these archives.

The archives are available for consultation, by arrangement with the archivist.

THE ARCHIVAL HERITAGE OF DR MILNER AND ARCHBISHOP KING OF ST PETER'S PARISH, WINCHESTER

Peter Paul Bogan

St Peter's, Winchester, claims to be one of the first post-Reformation parishes in England. It was founded by a layman, Roger Corham, in the late 1600s. Mass was said in a room of his house in St Peter Street where he installed a resident priest. Between 1733 and 1744, a growing congregation having become too large for the old Mass room, the Rev. Mr Shaw converted his garden shed into a makeshift and highly illegal chapel. In 1792, Dr John Milner replaced this with the first ecclesiastical building of the Gothic Revival. In the same year this chapel became the first Catholic church in England to be consecrated since the sixteenth century.

Dr Milner, later Bishop of Castabala and Vicar Apostolic of the Midland District, was the first of the two eminent scholars and historians who became bishops after serving Winchester as parish priest. The other was

Dr John Milner [1747-1826]

Archbishop John Henry King, Bishop of Portsmouth from 1941 until his death in 1965. John Henry King came to Winchester in 1923 to succeed the aged Provost Luke Gunning. Canon Gunning served the parish for fourteen years as curate, and forty-one as parish priest. In 1923 he had been bedridden for some time and he died the following year.

Fr King's Report in 1930

In 1930, the then Fr King wrote an account of his discoveries in his first year in Winchester. The following is extracted from this report.

It is not surprising that, with its history and age, the Mission of Winton should boast of some treasures. Some were known to all and sundry but others were waiting to be discovered. Canon Gunning, no doubt, had known of them, but he, in his heyday, kept things to himself and when he broke down was incapable of handing on the knowledge of them.

During his lifetime I found a box under his bed which, upon examination, yielded up several articles for Service, a small silver thurible and boat, a ciborium, pyx, monstrance and an altar stone of slate set in a frame of wood. When shewn the thurible he began, 'Now let me see, at what bazaar did I buy that?' Upon being asked if the altar stone came from the same bazaar, he answered sharply that it was 'Dr Milner's' but would say no more. Three other altar stones in slate, but of a cruder design, were found on the floor of the Glory Hole, my irreverent name for the big room on the First Floor, facing the street, known to my predecessors as the Library and Drawing Room but which I found in the condition of a well stocked lumber room. Some carved oak panels in linenfold pattern were found in the loft over the Sacristy, Whence they came from no one knows.

The old XV century embroidery on a Green and Violet Vestment and some more on another reposing in the housekeeper's box has now been restored and mounted on new material so as to provide a full High Mass Set both in red and white and a cope. The question arises whether all or any of this work has any connection with the red cope mentioned as being in the Sacristy in Milner's time. This cope was intact in 1845 for it was exhibited in that year by Dr Picquot (P.P., 1845/48) at a Meeting of the British Association. The Processional Cross mentioned by Milner was in evidence but it was broken across the upright. We managed to patch it up for the stone laying (of the new Church, 1925) and then Mr Walters (F.A. Walters, the architect) took it in hand and had it thoroughly renovated. Milner's green paint was removed, missing side figures and other items replaced, and it was a worthy rival to Cardinal Bourne's cross on the opening day (the new church, 15 July 1926).

A number of manuscript sermons and other written documents were found in various parts of the Glory Hole, collected together and now repose in a Deed box in the Attic. Some of the more important have been transcribed, especially Milner's Account of the Establishment down to his own day, written in 1803. But the Glory Hole paled into insignificance for its finds when another Klondyke was found in the White House. (A Georgian House left to the Parish by William Meader, Milner's right hand man and a great benefactor. It now serves as the Convent of the Phillipini Sisters and is part of the Parish complex.) The tenants went abroad at the end of 1924. The room on the left of the front door, dining room then and now, (in 1989 it is the Sisters' Parlour) was reserved by the Canon. I knew it was full, but of what? Virginia creeper had overgrown the windows and one could not move about the room for broken furniture, boxes, etc. It was impossible to make an investigation without annoyance to the tenants so nothing was done until they were ordered abroad for a change.

During the short, bleak days of January my investigation proceeded. After removing crowds of old vestments, boxes of clothes, books belonging to a former curate, school models, tables, old chairs, etc. during which an old skull wrapped in brown paper came to light, at length I came to the books, books everywhere. The walls and floor were literally papered with books. They were white with mildew and many soft as pulp. For many days I worked through them with my pipe of strong baccy constantly going to keep down the stench and oil stoves burning to help conquer the damp, unhealthy atmosphere. All were moved, partially cleaned — if they could stand it — and a rough catalogue in pencil made. Then I separated the more important ones and conveyed them to the Presbytery, to the utter despair of the household!

After a thorough examination of the owners' marks and names in the books, their history as a Collection began to dawn on me. See a full statement set out by me which proves, I think, without a doubt, that the Library began with the collected books of the Founder, Roger Corham, and his contemporary local priests (17 c.), was added to by successive priests of Winton and received, from time to time, large additions from other sources, e.g. Twyford School, Highbridge. There is still much to be done in identifying many names of original owners, beyond what I have done, as well as the task of discovering the authors of many anonymous books of the Penal Days. In so far as I have succeeded in this direction I have found the Catholic Record Society's Volumes and Gillow's History of English Catholics invaluable. I have made a complete Book Catalogue as well as a Card Index of these books besides sundry Note Books and jottings as my discoveries proceeded.

In 1925 the tenants gave up the lease of the White House. Father King then retrieved the furniture which included:

A beautiful Chippendale Hall Table, a Folding table of Spanish mahogany, in attic, unrepaired, a reclining chair and a Chippendale arm chair in a woeful state which afterwards sold for £29.

The Monument erected by the French priests in 1793 was also in the dining room, in fragments and warped. (This was erected in the King's House by the French clergy as a mark of their gratitude to George III and transferred to Milner's Chapel when they left. It is now in the North Porch of St Peter's.)

The Kitchen and Larder produced such strange food as : a Chippendale commode; Four heavily carved bed posts; a marble mantelpiece; a 'Shrine' of St Swithun, a lawn mower. Two heavy oak doors were found in the basement, probably from the old Peterhouse. These are now sold. (Peterhouse, built between 1670 and 1690, was pulled down and a still existing block built in 1826. No. 9 was the presbytery until 1924.)

Towards the end of 1927 the roof of the School required urgent attention. Over 31000 tiles had to be replaced. For this and other work a sum of nearly £600 had to be found. In view of the existing debt of £5780 on the Church it was inexpedient to appeal to the Congregation. Accordingly, and with episcopal consent, I had to part with some of the Presbytery valuables. To raise the money I parted with the furniture, the chief piece being the grand Chippendale bookcase, to the intense sorrow of us all, and from this source realised £220. Then I turned to the old books. I had previously, in March 1927, sold the illuminated Book of Hours for £375, which with the old chair mentioned above enabled me to wipe £400 off the debt. I now sent for the Purchaser of this MSS, Messrs Myers of Old Bond Street. The head of the Firm came down, went through all the books and finally gave me £250 for some 150 works. These were mainly books of general literature; the Penal Day works are still intact.

When Archbishop King died in 1965, the great library in the Presbytery in Jewry Street was sold. By then it included the Cahill/Virtue Collection rescued from the Cathedral at Portsmouth after the destruction of Bishop's House in the bombing.

The Restoration of Milner's Chapel and the Preservation of the Archives

In 1984, Fr Nicholas France, who had become parish priest the year before, invited me to become parish archivist. Like Archbishop King sixty years before, he was about to undertake a comprehensive rebuilding programme. I found a jumble of papers and assorted objects, most of them in what I believe to be the original tin box under Canon Gunning's bed. Being a very amateur archivist, I summoned help from professionals. Miss Gillian Rushton, the City Archivist, went through everything with me, sorting and labelling, and soon all our precious papers were safely housed in standard Hampshire Record Office boxes. They were then, somewhat less safely, lodged in a spare wardrobe in the presbytery. Soon, even this haven was threatened because the house was about to be turned into the Parish Centre and the new Peterhouse was nearing completion. Fearful of the fate of the archives in the imminent chaos, I lodged them all with the County Record Office. The archivists, who had been anxious to examine them for years, were delighted. They catalogued them and put everything of importance on to microfiche, made available to researchers.

In 1987, Fr France's programme was crowned by the painstaking restoration of Milner's Chapel. The former gallery behind the site of the altar became the parish archive room. I reclaimed the seventeen boxes from the County Record Office and moved in. It is not surprising, as Archbishop King had said in 1930, that so historic a parish should boast of some treasures. What is astonishing is that so much has survived. St Peter's must possess one of the most complete archives of any Catholic parish in the country. For this we are deeply in debt to Archbishop King himself and to those who appreciated his immense contribution to the post-Reformation history of Hampshire, especially Mgr Provost Mullarkey, who was parish priest from 1941 until 1977, having previously been Bishop King's curate. His label with its fierce admonition that 'Under no circumstances allow any person to take a volume from this library' has become part of the archives and still stands guard over the books. Archbishop King was one of the Catholic Record Society's earliest members and contributors, and later he became President of the Society. It is not surprising that we have a complete set of CRS volumes, dating back to the first issue of 1905, which deals with the Winchester registers.

Surviving from the sale of the great library in the 1960s are works dealing with Catholic and local history, both medieval and post-Reformation. Milner's works are well represented but some of the books are in very poor condition. They may be among those rescued by Archbishop King from the 'Glory Hole'. There is a collection of breviaries and devotional works, some of which belonged to the French priest refugees in the late eighteenth century. But the two greatest treasures are not kept on the shelves. The first is one of the few known original copies of St Edmund Campion's Decem Rationes. In the Ten Reasons, published by the Catholic Library in 1914, it is stated that there were then only three copies known to exist at that time, 'two belonging to the late Marquis of Bute', one of which he had presented to Stonyhurst. 'Canon Gunning of Winchester is the happy owner of a third copy'. The second book is what appears to be a first edition of De Ratione Conscribendi Epistolis, by Erasmus.

The Archives

The papers are in their seventeen archive boxes, stored along the width of the gallery which has been ventilated to maintain an optimum temperature. I have examined them in detail and refined the Record Office catalogue. It is clear that many of the papers merit expert attention, especially the residue of the collection Archbishop King found in 1924. These include sermons -- not notes, but complete and lengthy sermons -- from 1726 to 1916, and theological and liturgical papers written by the French emigre clergy, volumes of notes on philosophy, logic, physics, ethics, etc., possibly from the same source, and a book of manuscript church music.

The parish records start with a small notebook in which the Rev. Mr Berry first registered baptisms, marriages and burials in 1721. It was a courageous act for those times and the book could easily be slipped inconspicuously among others in case of a search. One notable baptism recorded in 1721 is that of the future Catholic historian, John Lingard, whose father was Dr Milner's clerk of works. The earliest confirmation lists are from 1749. Bishop Challoner's Visitation in 1741, when he was Coadjutor to Bishop Petre, is not recorded but we know from his notes that the dates were October 24th, 25th and 26th, that he confirmed 100, and that there was a congregation of 300 with 230 communicants. One wonders how they all fitted into the little converted garden shed.

From Milner's day we have his 'Account of the Establishment' to 1803, the year he became Bishop and left for the Midlands, his list of the parishioners, c.1800, Mass lists (some of these Masses are still said), his household accounts, details of the building and upkeep of his chapel, including wage sheets, and details concerning our pre-Reformation burial ground, St James, re-used for burials since Nicholas Tichborne in 1589, the freehold of which was obtained by the parish in 1800. There is also a letter written to Milner by William Cobbett in 1824.

There is a mass of correspondence relating to his parish property, leases, receipts, lists and notes. There is a letter on paper 'taken from his own desk' by St Pius X and written to Canon Gunning's sister, a nun, congratulating her on her golden jubilee in 1909, watermarked with a very good picture of a smiling Pope. Three copy medieval manuscripts in Latin have yet to be deciphered. They are in a fragile state. There are numerous pamphlets and copies of documents, including 'Condemnation d'Olivier Plunket, primat titulaire et archeve de Dublin . . . et de Edward Fitzharris, pour crime de haute traison a Westminster Hall 15/25 Juin, 1681', from the Este Archives, Modena.

Fr Ignatius Collingridge, parish priest, with a short break when his brother, Canon Peter, stood in for him, from 1848 until 1883, was a noted controversialist, and there is much evidence of his efforts in this direction, as well as his tussles with the Prison Authorities (Winchester Prison) and with the Military. There are papers relating to the two communities of nuns who took refuge in the City in 1795: the Benedictines, who remained until 1857, and the Franciscan Poor Clares, who left for Taunton in 1808. The Record Office catalogue runs to twenty-six pages but does not cover all the material we have now collected together.

Archbishop King's Notes

Along with the Milner papers, the most valuable part of the whole archive may prove to be the boxes of Archbishop King's voluminous and precisely researched notes and manuscripts, including transcripts made by him or for him of such documents as the Sister Elizabeth Sanders letter, and the notes for his many papers, written or read, or lectures given by him at various times, including theological and historical papers. There is a bundle of manuscript notebooks of transcripts from the Milton House manuscripts, of the registers of Hendred, and of the transfer of jurisdiction over the Channel Islands from Coutances to Salisbury and Winchester. Some of this material has been published, e.g. Volumes I and II of Hampshire and the Faith, but it will surely be a rich vein for Catholic historians for many years to come.

The Cemetery of St James

We have another archive in Winchester, one which Archbishop King thought so uniquely important that he started his history with it, the cemetery of St James, already mentioned. We have copies of his 'Sermons in Stone' describing this burial ground in which lie so many of our illustrious dead. Fr Paul Atkinson, the last priest to die in prison for the Faith, Nicholas and Gilbert Tichborne, Bernard Howard, ancestor of the Duke of Norfolk, the mothers of Bishop Challoner and Bishop Milner, the parents of Archbishop King and of Archbishop Worlock, Roger Coram, the founder of the parish, and Archbishop King himself. As a young priest, Archbishop King spent many hours deciphering the old gravestones. His meticulous list, starting from 1589 and 1636, has been invaluable in a current attempt to chart the graves.

I conclude with extracts from the rough notes of the sextons of St James, in which they recorded burials between 1807 and 1882. The spelling is idiosyncratic and they make amusing reading:

Mr Swift Rose and Crown. found hir own bairraers.

A pris from Southampton

Gargoni's child by the Vaulnut tree.

The Rt Revd Dr Milner died at Woolverhampton. May he rest in peast.

N.B. Burid at Woolverhampton.

These precious archives contribute enormously to our knowledge and understanding of our Catholic community in this historic City with its age-old Catholic traditions. They form a vital part of Winchester's archival heritage. For their preservation and conservation we must thank not only our two great priest historians but all those who have played a part over many years in caring for them and keeping them from being dispersed or lost, not least the present parish priest. Long may this happy state of affairs continue.

particularly evident at Sawston Hall about which the author says: 'The Gallery hide is by a man who could think in three dimensions and in curves (p.59). In a later age Owen and others like him might well have earned themselves a comfortable living carving those secret recesses for ladies' jewellery which became such a feature of our English furniture. And yet for all their skill and heroism there was still that jealousy between the Catholics which led to a duplication of effort which has so often bedevilled the work of the Church in this country. The 'elaborate duplication' of the facilities at Hindlip, only ten miles from Harvington, is a tragic illustration of this (p.97).

Michael Hodgetts is right to continue his story down to the eighteenth century and beyond. Rotha Mary Clay did the same in her authoritative The Hermits and Anchorites of England (1914) when she brought in many of the pseuds of later times. It gives a sense of completeness. The Mass generated both love and hatred in the hearts of our English forbears. Today we enjoy a religious freedom which for those who built and used the hides was but a dream. Is religious apathy the price we have paid?

This is a valuable contribution to a subject which, like ghosts, exercises an eternal fascination over the public mind. The book is well produced and has some fine photographs and sketch plans. It deserves well of the public and will help to give flesh and blood to an exciting period of our Catholic past.

THE ARCHIVES OF THE PLYMOUTH DIOCESE

The Rev. Christopher Smith

The story has often been told that the Archives of the Plymouth Diocese have been destroyed twice: in the Gordon Riots at Bath in 1780, Bishop Walmseley of the Western District was chased from the house by the mob; the house was burnt down together with all his belongings, including the papers of his District. And then, in the Plymouth blitz of 1941, one of the casualties has been said to have been the Plymouth Diocesan Archives kept at Vescourt (the Bishop's House) which suffered indirectly from a German landmine. To an enquirer, this story proved sufficient to explain the non-existence of any form of archive for the Plymouth Diocese!

However, I can report that the cellar, which stored whatever archives existed at Vescourt, might have been shaken by the bomb, a coating of dust might have been disturbed; but the box-files that made up the archives slumbered on in much the same state as they had for many a year. Since the last War, some papers had even been added to these box-files, and a number of large cardboard boxes had been filled with assorted papers.

This was the scene that greeted me when, three years ago, our new Bishop, Christopher Budd, asked me to become the first official archivist to his diocese. The greatest encouragement came from the Bishop's secretary at the time, Father Robert Plant, who had himself constructed in the cellars a handsome and practical archive room, and next to the diocesan photocopying room which could double as a search room in due course.

One difficulty that was immediately obvious was that I lived at Marnhull in Dorset — a mere 120 miles from Plymouth where the archives were situated. I was soon tagged as the archivist who lived furthest from his archives. In spite of the distance, during the past three years I have been able to begin the enormous task of sorting the huge mound of papers. My new car clocked up 40,000 miles in eighteen months, with archives work accounting for quite a proportion of this. In November 1989, I took up residence as parish priest in Dartmouth, a mere thirty miles from Plymouth; I hope 1990 will be seen as the year in which regular archives work began in the diocese.

THE ARCHIVES

What we do not have

Perhaps I should start by describing what we do not have. The Gordon Riots certainly destroyed all the papers of the Western District, and so we have nothing prior to 1780. Since that time, we have very little local material from our Western District times. Bishop Burton of the Clifton Diocese did a magnificent and vast work in collecting the letters received by our Vicars Apostolic together in huge leather-bound volumes. This has certainly preserved these very valuable historical sources, and they may be researched in the Clifton diocesan archives at Bishop's House, St Ambrose's in Leigh Woods, Bristol. These papers, though, have their origins and tell the story of the old missions scattered throughout the whole Western District, which includes the present Clifton and Plymouth Dioceses and the whole of Wales. Should they be distributed to the dioceses of origin? It would take an iconoclast with a large, sharp knife to divide these volumes to allow for the distribution of the letters in their appropriate dioceses.

Another significant fact is that in the West Country, the strength of the great Catholic families continued longer than in many other parts of the country. This has resulted in much of our Catholic history being retained in private family archives, sometimes kept by the family themselves (as the papers of the Cliffords of Chudleigh), and others deposited in public record offices (as the Welds of Lulworth papers in the Dorset Record Office). Also in the Plymouth Diocese we have a number of convents (the Canonesses of St Augustine eventually at Abbotsleigh, the Benedictines at Teignmouth, the Carmelites at Lanherne, the Bridgettines at Syon Abbey, near South Brent, and the Cistercian Sisters at Stapehill) that settled here after a period of 'wandering' from and since Napoleonic times when they were exiled from their recusant homes in Europe. Their influence on the early days of our diocese was enormous and their archives, kept privately, contain much of diocesan interest. This scattering of papers of diocesan interest has been compounded recently, when some of these convents closed and their archives were sent to other houses of their order far away from Plymouth.

One other point should be made: we have no parish registers in the archives in Plymouth (there are a few volumes of the Bishops' personal registers, mainly for Confirmation); family historians should make note of this. We have no plans at the moment for bringing the older registers into our archives, so the small number of the older missions that possess the older registers (e.g. the Marnhull registers started in 1780) are kept in the respective parishes. This matter may well be reviewed in the future, but our priority at present is to organise what papers are already at hand.

I might also mention that we have very few bishops' letters or writings (with the exception of Bishop Graham — see later in this article). Our box-files marked with the names of our bishops are very light because, while we have thousands of letters written to them, there are very few of their replies.

The upshot of all this means that in our archives we have nothing at all prior to the 1780 Gordon Riots in Bath. We have very little material prior to the setting up of the Plymouth Diocese in 1850 (the occasional document has somehow found its way in: e.g. from my old parish of Marnhull we have the costing for the building of the 'old presbytery' in 1726 by Father William Cornforth, and his will made shortly before he died in 1748; how they came to be here is a complete mystery). There are many papers concerning the Plymouth Diocese scattered far and wide in other archives: in private families, in convents and some in record offices.

Having been so negative, the obvious question must be 'is there anything at all in the Plymouth Archives?'

What we do have

I have already mentioned that I discovered the parish box-files on taking up my appointment as archivist. Almost the entire archive consisted of these. Each of the 'older' (i.e. prior to the First World War) mission/parishes had its own box-file. Some of these were very full; e.g. the Shaftesbury box was bulging because one of the priests was fond of taking his arguments to court, usually with little success. But others were almost empty; apparently nothing of importance ever happened for a great number of years in some places. Some of the parish boxes contained material that really was personal to the priest or concerned the convents, so a great deal of reclassification of such material is necessary.

In these box-files, most of the papers are letters from parish priests to their bishop, giving information, seeking permission, etc. We have very little knowledge of the bishop's replies, except by inference. There was a period in the 1950s when carbon copies of the bishop's correspondence were made, and these are in the box-files. In a few of the boxes there are other items concerning the parish: plans and financing of the building of churches and schools, an occasional sketch of the parish history, etc.

There were also a small number of other box-files dealing with such topics as chaplains to the services, hierarchy meetings, inspections of convents and schools, etc.

The dozen large cardboard boxes full of tons of paper proved to be a mine of excellent material. For over sixty years, papers from 'upstairs' have been stored, out of sight and out of mind, 'downstairs'. I have now sorted out all but two of these boxes, and they form the basis of completely new sections of the archives: Bishops' papers, diocesan organisation, individual priests and other persons, convents, schools, organisations, finance, etc. The list is growing each time I visit Plymouth.

I have another concern in the setting up of an 'Archives System'. We are constantly having old files and papers no longer current sent 'downstairs' from the diocesan offices 'upstairs' at Vescourt. A large proportion of our system 'downstairs' must reflect the filing system 'upstairs' (of course there are some areas that are no longer in operation and so become a sort of 'dead' archive). I am not certain who is in the driving seat of our dual system! But at least we are talking and trying to find a common system.

In two areas we are very strong:

The Pastoral Letters of our first four Bishops (George Errington (1851-55), William Vaughan (1855-1902), Charles Graham (1902-11) and John Kelly (1911-28) have been bound into volumes and so we have the entire collection. I think we also have copies of most of the Pastoral Letters of the more recent bishops, but they are not bound; we have difficulties in post-war years, because they were printed, duplicated or photocopied in many different formats. It was the practice of Bishop Vaughan and Bishop Graham to use the Advent Pastoral Letter to give the people news of the dioceses, the development of new churches and schools, priests ordained and deceased, etc. This is an invaluable source of information on the diocese in those early days. The Lenten Pastoral Letter was always on a spiritual subject, many of them masterpieces that show the spirituality of the times. We had a meticulous recorder of the history of the early days of the diocese in the person of Bishop Charles Graham. He was appointed secretary by Bishop Vaughan in 1858, later had the task of treasurer of the diocese added; he was appointed auxiliary bishop to the ailing William Vaughan in 1891, and succeeded him in 1902 to be the Bishop of Plymouth until he retired in 1911. Thus he was in an excellent central position in the diocese to know everything of any importance that happened over a period of nearly sixty years. In 1872, Bishop Vaughan circularised his priests asking them to send to him what they knew of the history of their missions, schools and their own personal curriculum vitae. From these returns added to his own extensive personal knowledge, Charles Graham wrote his 'History of the Diocese of Plymouth' (never intended for publication). It is divided into two sections: 'The Missions of the Diocese' (with a general historical introduction from the Reformation) and 'The Clergy of the Diocese' (a potted biography of all the priests who have worked in the western counties from the times of the Reformation. We have five large volumes in his own handwriting; fortunately, because the legibility of his writing is an acquired taste, most of this was typed (and gathered into order) by a Miss Joy in the 1920s. There are also a number of manuscript books containing reports on his Visitation of Missions and Convents throughout the diocese covering the twenty years he was both auxiliary and diocesan bishop. In this body of manuscript books, we must be one of the best-covered dioceses in the country for detailed information on this period of early development.

You will see, then, that we are in the very early stages of setting up a Plymouth Diocesan Archives. It will take several years to sort out and catalogue what we have, and to take in what is constantly coming down to us from 'upstairs'.

REPRESENTATIVE CHURCH BODY LIBRARY, DUBLIN

Raymond Refousse

The Representative Church Body Library is the Library of the Church of Ireland (the Anglican Church in Ireland) and is, inter alia, the Church's principal repository for its archives and related manuscripts. The Library was opened in 1932 and from 1939, when its work was amalgamated with that of the Ecclesiastical Records Committee of the General Synod (which had been collecting church records and manuscripts in a small way since 1925), has provided a home for church records which cannot be satisfactorily stored in local custody. In 1981 the Church of Ireland appointed its first archivist and in 1984 provided purpose-built strong-room accommodation at the Library for Church records, since when there has been a marked increase in the deposit of archives and manuscripts in the Library.

The archives of the Church of Ireland¹ — parochial, diocesan and cathedral records, and the records of the General Synod and the Representative Church Body — form the largest and most important group of material in the Library. In addition, there is a significant collection of miscellaneous manuscripts, mostly ecclesiastical in temper, and a growing bank of microfilms of church records which are in other custodies.

Parish records are the largest class of Church archives in the Library. Unlike the Church of England, the Church of Ireland has no regulations requiring the deposit of parish records in approved repositories and thus the deposit of records in the Library is to a large extent dependent on the inclinations of the local clergy. However, the development of the Library as a modern archival repository, the absence of a system of local authority archives in Ireland, and a growing awareness among the parochial clergy that they are no longer able to manage effectively the growing quantity of non-current parish records in their custody have combined to produce, in recent years, a greater incidence of deposit in the Library than heretofore. There is one major exception to this trend. Parish records in the Library relate only to parishes in the Republic of Ireland. Since the pre-civil registration registers are public records by Acts of Parliament in both Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland, they may not be transferred from one jurisdiction to the other. Therefore, in order to avoid splitting parish collections, the records of northern parishes either remain in local custody or are deposited in the Public Records Office of Northern Ireland in Belfast.

The Library presently holds records from 340 parishes in the Republic of Ireland. A small number of others are to be found in the National Archives, the National Library and the Cork Archives Institute,² while the majority still remains in local custody. The Library's collection is dominated by records from the Dublin area and from the west of Ireland with sizeable aggregations of material also from Counties Cork, Clare, Meath and Kildare, Kilkenny and Carlow.

Inevitably, the records of the parishes in the city of Dublin are the most important. As the seat of English government in Ireland from the late twelfth century, the city was the most settled and prosperous part of the country and the most amenable to English influence: in such a situation, Anglicanism was adopted more enthusiastically than elsewhere. The records of all of the city parishes are now in the Library. Those for St Werburgh include the most significant body of medieval and early modern material (notably an important series of churchwardens' accounts 1484-1600, the survival of which is unique in the Church of Ireland), while those for St John have the earliest surviving parish registers beginning in 1619.³ The records of St James have a particular ecumenical appeal as the churchyard has a notably high incidence of Roman Catholic burials from the early eighteenth century onwards, all of which are recorded in the burial registers. In general, however, the records of most parishes survive only from the late 18th or 19th centuries and this profile is reflected in the collection in the Library. This in part is due to the destruction of much parish material in the fire in the Public Record Office of Ireland in 1922 but also reflects the historic position of the Church of Ireland as a poorly endowed minority Church. It may also owe something to the national characteristic in which the systematic keeping and preservation of records does not loom large.

The records of the dioceses and cathedrals have not survived well; but nonetheless contain the most important pre-Reformation archives which have survived in the custody of the Church. In preparation for the disestablishment of the Church of Ireland in 1869, most of the diocesan and chapter records were collected by the Irish Temporalities Commission and subsequently transferred to the Public Record Office in Dublin where they were destroyed in 1922. Only three significant diocesan collections have survived — that for Armagh is in the Public Record Office of Northern Ireland, while those for Tuam and Dublin are in the Library. The Tuam collection dates only from the seventeenth century, while the Dublin material, although also largely from the seventeenth century onwards, contains three important earlier manuscripts. Two are registers, the *Credi Mihi*⁴ dating from the thirteenth century and the *Liber Niger Alani*⁵ from the sixteenth century, while the third, the *Reperitorium Viride*⁶ is a roll of Dublin parishes dated 1533. There are records from a further twelve dioceses in the Library but they consist only of fragments of once substantial collections and none dates from before the late seventeenth century.

The profile of cathedral records is similar to that of diocesan records. Only two substantial collections survive. That for St Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin, is still in local custody, while that for Christ Church Cathedral, Dublin, is in the Library. The Christ Church muniments contain a wealth of information on the administration of the cathedral and on the ownership and development of property, both in the city and county of Dublin where the cathedral chapter was a principal landlord. The chapter acts survive in an almost unbroken sequence from 1574, while for the earlier period the two medieval registers, the Liber Niger and Liber Albus,⁷ are supplemented by the Registrum Novum, a three-volume compilation of the cathedral's deeds from 1172, the originals of which were destroyed in the fire in the Public Record Office, and a miscellaneous quantity of loose papers dating from the thirteenth century which were arranged in guard books in the eighteenth century by the antiquarian John Lyon.⁸ The Library holds records from a further six cathedrals but with the exception of St Canice's Cathedral, Kilkenny, for which there are important series of deeds and minutes of the chapter and the vicars choral from the late seventeenth century, these are fragmentary.

The General Synod and the Representative Church Body (the trustee body which administers the temporalities of the Church of Ireland) were both created following the disestablishment of the Church in 1869 and the main series of their records are still current or semi-current and so held by the administration in Church of Ireland House, Dublin. However, the Library holds the records of a number of redundant committees and commissions which reported to both bodies. Their records cover topics such as state prayers, liturgical revision, education, supply of clergy, and communications.

The Library's collection of manuscripts is for the most part composed of the papers of bishops, clergy and laity, and of the records of organizations and institutions which are related to the Church of Ireland but not administratively part of it, whilst there is also a significant body of transcripts of, or extracts from, Church records, the originals of which no longer survive.

The papers of Irish prelates have not survived particularly well, but the Library does hold some significant episcopal collections, notably those relating to Lord John George Beresford (Archbishop of Armagh, 1822–62), Euseby Cleaver (Archbishop of Dublin, 1809–19) and Charles Graves (Bishop of Limerick, 1866–99), whilst of a more recent vintage but certainly of equal importance are the papers of Archbishop Henry McAdoo, as co-chairman of ARCC I, 1970–81.

Inevitably, many of the clerical collections relate more to the academic than the personal life of their subjects. Thus the papers of Henry Cotton (Archdeacon of Cashel, 1824–72), relate largely to his Fasti Ecclesiae Hibernicae and his work on the Douay Bible and Rheims Testament, while those of H.J. Lawlor (Dean of St Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin, 1922–33) principally reflect his interest in Celtic liturgical manuscripts, the lives of the Irish saints, and Old Testament studies. Perhaps the most significant, certainly the most used, collection in this field is that of Canon J.B. Leslie (1865–1952), whose biographical succession lists contain a wealth of genealogical information about the clergy of the Church of Ireland.

Few of the collections of papers of non-clerical figures have other than a local significance. Among the exceptions are the letters to the Marquis of Townshend (Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, 1767–72) relating to ecclesiastical preferments in Ireland; the correspondence of the Stephen family, which includes some letters from Cardinal Newman to Sir James Stephen⁹ and his son Sir James Fitzjames Stephen,¹⁰ and the papers (1890–1906) of Col. P.D. Vigers, relating to an unpublished book on Irish Church plate.

At a less exalted level there are papers of many parish clergy and local laity which reflect an interest in their own church, parish or locality.

The Library provides a home too for the records of societies and organizations which although connected with the Church of Ireland are not officially part of it. The records of the Church Missionary Society Ireland (1814–1980), the Dublin University Mission to Chota Nagpur, India (1897–1969), and the Irish branches (or Hibernian Auxiliaries as they were quaintly styled) of the Church of England Zenana Missionary Society (1900–59) contain a wealth of information on missionary activity both at home and abroad, while the records of local clerical societies provide insights into the ways in which the clergy prepared themselves for their mission at home in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. There is also much material on the involvement of the Church in education in the records of such agencies as the Association for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge (1792–1978) (the Irish equivalent of S.P.C.K.) and the Church Education Society (1839–1972), while the records of now redundant schools, such as the Irish Clergy Daughters School (1841–1971) or the Dublin Diocesan School for Girls (1902–77), detail the minutiae of educational activity in the Church of Ireland. The social concerns of the Church are chronicled in the records of such organizations as the Church of Ireland Temperance Society (1879–1975), the Prison Gate Mission (1883–1915), and the Sligo Protestant Orphan Society (1839–1984).

Following the destruction of so many Church records in the fire in the Public Record Office of Ireland in 1922, the Ecclesiastical Records Committee of the General Synod set about collecting transcripts of extracts from destroyed records and this material has been inherited by the Library. Thus parts of the 1766 religious census and copies of eighteenth-century marriage licences from the diocese of Ossory were purchased, transcripts of seventeenth- and eighteenth-century diocesan visitations were obtained from scholars, and copies of parish registers were solicited from clergy, local historians and antiquarians. Inevitably, this material is variable, both in quality and quantity, but of obvious importance in the absence of the originals and especially so when used in conjunction with similar material in other repositories.

Inevitably as well, the manuscript collection contains a quantity of exotica which though interesting in itself has no discernible connection with the Church of Ireland. Items such as an early nineteenth-century register of intern patients in Tipperary County Infirmary, a translation by Thomas Miller, English Lector at the University of Gottingen, of Heliard, a ninth-century alliterative poem in Old Saxon, or Henry Herbert Morgan's diary of a voyage to Hong Kong and the Chinese islands in the 1840s, are obviously beyond the proper scope of the Library's accessions policy and would not today find a place in the collections.

In recent years the Library has begun to build up a collection of microfilms of Church records which are in other custodies. For the most part, the collection to date is of parish registers which are in clerical custody remote from the Library and especially from parishes in Counties Donegal, Cavan, Monaghan and Louth, with some material also from counties in Northern Ireland. It is hoped that in due course films will be obtained of records which in earlier years were alienated from the custody of the Church and which have been deposited in other Irish and in British repositories.

The Library has no modern published guide to its collection. J.B. Leslie's Catalogue of Manuscripts in possession of the Representative Church Body . . . collected by the Ecclesiastical Records Committee, (Dublin, 1938), lists in summary form the archives and manuscripts which formed the early core of the collections but it is now hopelessly out of date and should be used with caution. Entries for the Library's collection were included in R.J. Hayes (ed.), Manuscript Sources for the History of Irish Civilization, (Boston, 1965), and its Supplement, (Boston, 1979), but the descriptions pre-date the reorganization of the collections in the 1980s and again should be used cautiously.

Since 1981, lists of accessions of parish registers have been published biennially in the Irish Genealogist and detailed accession lists have appeared in the Report of the Library and Records Committee which is published annually in the Journal of the General Synod of the Church of Ireland. However, for the present, direct application to the Library is the surest way of obtaining accurate information on the collections.

DOWNSIDE ABBEY ARCHITECTURAL DRAWINGS COLLECTION

Dom Aidan Bellenger, OSB and Dom Paul Eggleston, OSB

I. INTRODUCTION

English Catholic historians have paid insufficient attention to buildings as a source of historical information. The developing character of architectural style, the growing scale and pretension of the buildings and the emergence of a characteristic English Catholic vernacular are all areas of study which need attention at both national and local level. For the historian or the archivist there is probably no more useful introduction to the study of buildings than architectural drawings. Many Catholic archives hold such drawings and at a time when many Catholic communities are vacating their buildings the time is right for a serious look at their conservation and listing.

The collection of drawings at Downside is a particularly rich one on account of its time-scale and the distinction of many of its architects. Its survival is to an extent accidental. The mass of the holding was kept by the Clerk of Works at Downside in what would be described as 'the current file'. Others were kept in the Abbot's Office or in the Abbey archives in the monastery library. The more important building schemes were described in the Downside Review, 33 (1914), pp.46-49, and at length, pp. 142-70, by Dom Roger Huddleston, but the drawings were more or less forgotten until 1981 when Dr Roderick O'Donnell drew attention to Pugin's plans for Downside in a contribution to the Burlington Magazine (April, pp.231-32). The drawings were moved at about this time into the monastery and were placed in two spacious map drawers. Preliminary sorting and identification was begun by Dr O'Donnell (formerly Fellow of Magdalene College, Cambridge and now of English Heritage) and continued by others including Mr Bryan Little, the Bristol-based architectural historian, Dom Aidan Bellenger, and Mr D.M. Collins of Peterhouse, Cambridge. In 1988-89 they were given a thorough listing by one of the novices, Brother Paul Eggleston.

II THE BUILDINGS

The Benedictine Community of St Gregory exiled from Douai in Northern France, acquired the Downside estate in 1814. The principal building of that property, now known as the Old House, a substantial farmhouse of c.1700, remains at the heart of the present complex of buildings. The first new building erected by the monks was a Gothic-style structure designed by H.E. Goodridge of Bath, made to appear externally like a full-scale church. In reality a fine room with a groined plaster vault on the upper storey of the 'transept' of the building served as a chapel and the rest was divided between school and monastery. This Goodridge block was opened in 1823.

A.W. PUGIN'S DESIGN FOR DOWNSIDE, 1842

Subsequent buildings have tended to be in the Gothic taste and to have been divided in use between school and monastery. Pugin's grand schemes for a complete monastery came to nothing and the first substantial building after the 1823 ensemble was the L-shaped school range with its Germanic-looking belfry to the designs of Charles Hansom who also designed the parish church of St Benedict in Stratton-on-the-Fosse. These buildings, on a relatively modest scale, were under construction from 1853 to 1857.

In 1872 a new scheme was begun which had at its centre a great monastic church of similar grandeur to those of the medieval monasteries. The plans were drawn up by the Newcastle firm of Archibald Dunn and Edward Hansom, the latter a son of Charles and an old boy of Downside School. The principal school refectory, the main school dormitory, most of the present monastery and the Petre Cloister were built between 1873 and 1876. The transept of the new church was begun in 1873 and opened in 1882. The Lady Chapel and the chevet of chapels at the east end of the proposed building were completed by 1888.

The choir of the new church was built (1902–05) by Thomas Garner and he substituted a square end for the apse which Dunn & Hansom had planned.

After Garner's death in 1906, F.A. Walters became architect and he was responsible for the Sacristy on the north side of the church opened in 1915. The nave was built by Sir Giles Gilbert Scott in 1922–25. He did further work in 1938 with the completion of the abbey church tower in the manner of the Somerset tradition. The west end of the church remains incomplete. The interior of the church is richly fitted out and has a particularly fine Lady Chapel decorated by Sir Ninian Comper.

The tower in the school quadrangle and the original buildings to the south were designed (in 1910) by Leonard Stokes, the first Catholic President of the Royal Institute of British Architects, and form part of his grand plan. Subsequent buildings in the school include Scott's Science Wing of 1932. The collection includes plans of extensions to the monastery which were never executed, and the present monastery library, designed by Francis Pollen, another old boy of Downside, was not completed until the early 1970s, along with a new monastery refectory, guest-wing and bursary.

III THE COLLECTION

What follows is merely a skeleton list of the collection. Brother Paul's detailed list, extending to twenty-seven pages, is available for reference, and enquiries are welcomed. Many of the schemes came to nothing. In architectural history, the 'might-have-beens' are almost as interesting as what was actually built. All plans refer to Downside Abbey unless otherwise specified.

EXPERIENCES OF AN ASSISTANT ARCHIVIST

Sister Marguerite-Andrée Kuhn-Regnier

A great deal of archival material has already been collected and stored away in boxes at Prinknash. When plans were laid for me to reside at St Peter's Grange and begin work on a collection, the archivist decided that priority should be given to material which could be of use to researchers. In the interval between retiring as a cataloguer at the Bodleian and starting as an assistant archivist, I prepared by reading about the background and history of the Benedictines at Prinknash. The Benedictines of Caldey, by P.F. Anson, provided the best introduction.

One of the collections in the Prinknash archives is called 'Hanbury' (see Catholic Archives No.5, 1985, pp.16-18). Dom Michael Hanbury entered the community at Caldey in 1915, only two years after its conversion to the Roman Catholic Church and was therefore clothed and professed by Abbot Aelred Carlyle. He only died in 1982 and as editor of PAX had amassed piles of letters with well-known authors and literary critics. So my very first bundle came from this collection and consisted of the letters of Fra Jerome, whose biography Peter Anson sketched in The Hermit of Cat Island.

From early years as an Anglican, John Cyril Hawes, later to be known as Fra Jerome, felt a strong vocation for the eremitical life. He spent a short time in the Novitiate of the Anglican Benedictine community at Caldey under Abbot Aelred, in 1906/7. But the call to follow the poverty of St Francis of Assisi was strong even then. After becoming a Catholic in 1911, Hawes went to Rome to study for the priesthood at the Beda and then to work in Australia. He was a trained and gifted architect and continued to use these professional skills as a secular priest. Eventually at the age of sixty-two, with the permission of his bishop, he was allowed to adopt a solitary life, in a hermitage which he designed and built with his own hands on Cat Island, in the Bahamas. Sorting and calendaring this correspondence, then listing drawings, newspaper cuttings and photographs took me four weeks, working roughly five hours a day, Monday to Friday.

Many of the letters were still in envelopes. I began by taking them out and putting them into chronological order. Fra Jerome always put the date, including the year. Often the day was noted by the name of the saint of the liturgical feast or season. In such cases, my familiarity with the old Roman calendar of saints was a help. Breviaries provided dates for major liturgical events such as Ash Wednesday, Easter, Pentecost, Corpus Christi. There were eighty letters in all. The last few were written on the backs of envelopes or even a sheet of brown paper, such was the poverty of the former Monseignor.

The END OF A PERFECT DAY.

- A day of 113 years of the first hermit;
- An 8-hour day of healthy physical work combined with piety, for the lions;
- A day of edification for S. Antony.

THE BURIAL OF SAINT PAUL, THE FIRST HERMIT,
BY SAINT ANTONY AND TWO LIONS.

Drawn by the Hermit of Cat Island, J.C. Hawes

Many of the letters had architectural designs and comments within the text. Fra Jerome's delightful sense of humour comes over in his sketches, one or two of which could appear quite suitable in Punch! There are some good photographs of churches built by him and of the hermit himself. Newspaper cuttings range from commentaries on the progress of building a Benedictine monastery in the Bahamas to reports of the death of J.C. Hawes and accounts of his life. The collection also contains a short run of a Catholic periodical, The Bahama Benedictine, Winter 1947/48 — Summer 1956.

The next original bundles were arriving while I was finishing the Hawes collection. From these I learned how to arrange and calendar correspondence which was only partially dated and sometimes not at all. For example, a letter written on 'Tuesday' had been kept in its original envelope which had a readable postmark. This enabled me to give the letter a date which I wrote in pencil in square brackets. But very often several letters were packaged in one envelope for storage and the sequence could only be guessed by careful reading of the contents. One needs patience because important clues — facts and dates — are sometimes contained in apparently trivial material. I never throw away any envelope until a likely chronological sequence of letters has been reached. Nor, as an assistant, do I ever throw away anything original without consulting the archivist. It became my practice to use up old envelopes, cutting off neat corners, which can be used to hold 3 or 4 page letters, in lieu of paper clips — the ones which do not rust are expensive. It gradually became easier to read various hands and to sort out more quickly letters which had neither adequate dating nor page numbers.

Meanwhile, the temporary office had been changed. I found myself working in a lovely spacious sitting-room with a fine old-wood desk in a corner by the window. The archivist arrived one winter afternoon with a tin trunk, an old suitcase, and many more original bundles. We spent the rest of the afternoon on the floor, going through the various identifiable collections and putting them in piles. Much preliminary sorting had already been done, so that papers of each correspondent, or connected with one person, could be retrieved easily. Working on these bundles, I discovered the extravagant handwriting of John Cowper Powys, the elegant script of Algar Thorold, and the very feminine, rather untidy, hand of Gwen Greene, niece of Baron von Hugel. Researchers into the writings of the Powys family need to know that Prinknash archives contain letters from J.C. Powys, Littleton Powys, Rev. Fr L. Alfred Powys (one letter only) and background material on that family. I drew up a simple family tree and indexed each small collection.

Work on the Carlyle collection began in September 1985 and has occupied me ever since. There were twenty-one boxes in all. Not everyone who has heard of the founder of the Prinknash community realises that Fr Aelred Carlyle spent thirty years in Vancouver B.C. as a secular priest. My labours have covered those fruitful, apostolic years between 1921 and 1951.

First, I opened every box and looked quickly through the contents, to gain a preliminary, all-over view. Then I began sorting in earnest, gradually developing a memory for new names, new handwriting, and a new dimension as assistant archivist. In a very short time a subject pattern began to emerge and I could discern various categories of letters. A loose concertina file which I tackled had never been even roughly sorted. The archivist advised me to draft a rough method for classifying these few papers. Thus I listed the different areas of concern met within that one file and came up with such headings as: Letters from Oakalla prison, where Fr Carlyle was chaplain, or from the B.C. Penitentiary (mostly referred to as 'The Pen'). There was correspondence with higher superiors, with prison authorities, with the police and with various government departments in British Columbia. Many letters were from close friends in the U.K. and in Canada, from the brethren at Caldey, from religious sisters in several different congregations, and priests who sought counsel. During those years in Vancouver, Fr Aelred was chaplain to St Vincent's Home which was run by the Grey Sisters for destitute old men. He was also Port Chaplain and edited The British Columbia Catholic. He was, however, relieved of the latter after only two years.

Towards the end of the year, much of the correspondence had returned to the twenty-one boxes, each of which was given a temporary label — single slips of paper with titles such as 'St Vincent's Home, Oakalla (2 or 3 boxes), Catholic seamen, AMIC, Friends U.K., Friends B.C. A—M, N—Z, and Single Letters. The last hours of sorting became really exciting as single sheets, various handwritings and unidentified matter began to match up and make sense. A happy example of this was related to the grandson of one of the original community who became a Catholic after leaving the Anglican set-up at Caldey early in the 1900s. This young gentleman from America visited Prinknash this summer. I was able to explain how 'F.B.', his grandfather, who also signed himself 'Bernard' or 'Francis Beverley', was identified eventually. Today, the photograph of another second generation Beverley, with a note apparently written by 'F.B.', has come to light. Perhaps this too pictures a grandchild of one of Aelred Carlyle's close friends.

A week before Christmas 1985, the archivist and I drew up a full classification scheme for the Carlyle collection, integrating any numbering already used by Carlyle himself. Four years later as I prepare this article for Catholic Archives, I still retain the first manuscript draft which listed the contents of an unsorted concertina file. Even so do we make and accumulate archives.

THE ARCHIVES OF THE SISTERS OF MERCY OF THE BLESSED SACRAMENT :
A PROTOTYPE OF RELIGIOUS ARCHIVES IN MEXICO

George Herbert Foulkes

Catholic Archives published in its 1983 issue a short report about Catholic archives in Mexico. Since then, the National Archives have been re-structured (partly because of budget cuts), suppressing all archival activities dealing with non-governmental bodies.

The ecclesiastical archives programme is now sponsored by the Episcopate and the Association of Mexican Church Archivists with satisfactory results, particularly regarding diocesan and parish archives. In contrast, religious Institutes have not been very active in their archives since the programme was withdrawn from the National Archives, and not much had been done, because their holdings are far less important for national history than diocesan and parish records.

Most of the Orders that worked in Mexico during Spanish domination lost their colonial archives due to their suppression, the expulsion of Spanish clergymen in the 1820s and 1830s, the expropriation of Church property in the second half of the nineteenth century and, in more than one case, neglect. As far as I know, the only religious Order which has its archives more or less complete since colonial times, is the Augustinian Province of Saint Nicholas of Tolentino, but I have not seen the papers myself.

Two Franciscan Provinces (Jalisco and Michoacan) keep fragments of their colonial archives, but parts of these and also of the Province of Mexico can be found in the National Library, the Institute of Anthropology, the Public Library of Guadalajara, and other public institutions.

Dominicans, Carmelites, Fatebenefratelli, and the Order of Mercy have practically no nineteenth-century or earlier documents. What exists is scattered in various archives, libraries and universities throughout the world. The National Archives in Mexico City, located in the old prison of Lecumberri, has important collections referring to all the religious Orders that existed in Mexico before the mid-nineteenth century. Part of the Benedictine archives of Montserrat, the only monastery the Order had in New Spain, is still there.

The archives of the Oratory of Saint Philip Neri in Mexico City, whose history goes back to the mid-seventeenth century, are in the possession of a private collector in Guadalajara who refuses to return them. Other Oratorian archives met with better luck, such as the one of San Miguel Allende, which is kept in the Oratory itself.

I remember having seen many papers from the archives of the Bethlemites, founded in Guatamala in 1600, in the Archdiocesan Archives of Puebla (probably the most important Catholic colonial archive in the American continent). Those of the Brothers of Charity, or at least some of them, are kept in the historical archives of the Ministry of Health, in downtown Mexico City. (Curiously, the Wellcome Institute in London has a few papers of these two Orders.)

The Jesuits, of course, have very good 19th and 20th century archives, but the earlier papers are in the National Archives of Mexico, the Institute of Anthropology, the National Library, and the Royal Academy of History in Madrid. They do have colonial materials, but only those collected by Fr Mariano Cuevas and other Jesuit historians.

The archives of monasteries of nuns did not suffer so much from the religious persecutions and the expropriations which the nuns experienced during the last century and a half. It is true that there are blanks and that much was either destroyed or is to be found in public and private hands, but usually papers in monasteries date back to their very beginning. Such is the case of most of the old establishments of Poor Clares, Augustinians, Dominicans, Capuchins, and Conceptionists. Another case is the Company of Mary, which became a Generalate in 1921, holding in its provincial house in Mexico City the documents that were found in the old autonomous convents.

Such is the fate of the archives of the first Orders that worked in Mexico. In this present epoch, when religious in general seem to be more conscious of the practical value of history and archives, efforts have been made towards the knowledge and diffusion of what exists. I find particularly praiseworthy the location and photo-reproduction programmes undertaken by the provincial superiors of the Carmelites, Brothers of Saint John of God, and the Company of Mary.

Since the second half of the nineteenth century, many Institutes from Europe and the U.S.A. have settled in Mexico; some have good archives, others lost theirs during religious persecutions or through carelessness (I know two congregations of French origin that in the last ten years sold parts of their archives and libraries to a paper mill!), but there is no need to comment on these, as they usually follow archival regulations given by major superiors.

The real problem or need today in Mexican religious archives, is within the local foundations, which have sprung up rapidly in the Church in Mexico, particularly since 1870 onwards. I do not know how many they are, but I know for sure it is a three digits number.

Most of these Institutes are fairly small, with very limited resources and, regarding archives, with hardly any awareness of the historical value of documents, or even of their importance for administrative purposes. One particular Congregation, founded in 1939 and now with approximately seventy Sisters, has no archives prior to 1985, because general superiors till then thought papers should go to the waste-paper basket! It is an extreme example, but there are perhaps others in similar conditions.

It is a fact that during the Revolution and in the 1920s and 1930s much was destroyed by persecutors of the Church, or had to be destroyed by religious as an extreme measure of wisdom, but nevertheless neglect has been our even worse harasser than political oppressors. There are certainly religious archives where things are not bad at all and most Institutes now seem to have assimilated their past faults and are now seeking ways to improve their access to information.

When the present Vicar for Religious in the Archdiocese of Mexico City was newly appointed, he immediately realized the gravity of the matter and looked for help to organize the records of the Vicariate, in order to discover the problems and needs of each Institute and, amongst other things, to suggest archival policies for religious within the jurisdiction.

In September 1985, the earthquake that shook Mexico City, seriously damaged the Chancery, a ten-storey building which it took four years to repair. The losses could have been worse: the historical records — dating back to the 1520s — and the press archives, with well over fifteen thousand newspaper cuttings that had taken two years to classify, were left in complete disorder, partly by devastation and partly by the unexpected and unplanned evacuation of the premises. The only irremediable loss was the collection of local Church censuses and statistics going back to the eighteenth century. Obviously all the archival programmes within the Chancery had to be stopped. The only feasible way left was to work inside the Institutes themselves.

At that time the Sisters of Mercy of the Blessed Sacrament were seeking advice on developing archival programmes. The opportunity was unique, a Mexican foundation, with pontifical approval but still with the General House in the Archdiocese, one which had suffered religious persecution and other events that cause damage to archives, one which had expanded to other countries and, above all, one with co-operative superiors who had clear views of what they wanted but were also open to new ideas.

The Sisters of Mercy of the Blessed Sacrament were founded in Mexico City by Refugio Aguilar y Torres, a middle-aged widow, mother of a child who in latter days became Superior General of the Congregation founded by her mother. Mother Aguilar had in mind to educate children in religion and science and to worship the Blessed Sacrament, as a means of forming committed members in the Mystical Body of Christ, and therefore active and better Catholics for the world.

The Institute was first approved in 1922. In 1925 it became affiliated to the Order of Mercy and, in 1949, received the final approval from the Holy See. It spread rapidly from 1925 to several countries of Latin and North America and Europe, where it is still serving Christ and his Church.

In other words, it was the kind of institute which would give us enough experience to solve archival problems that could arise in minor Institutes.

The first steps adopted to develop the project were to collect in one single place all the papers belonging to the Institute's Central Archive. Boxes, trunks, bundles, were brought from bookshelves, cellars and other odd places, and then combined with the materials already in the General Secretariat and arranged chronologically, there being no previous order at all.

This done, the papers were sorted as historical, intermediate, or current, and then we began to form groups of sections and series, starting with the materials we had set apart for the 'historical archive'. The same groups were used in the 'intermediate' and 'current' archives. The main groups were GOVERNMENT, ECONOMY, and RESERVED or Secret (the few files referring to serious faults of religious kept for the time ordered in Canon Law). The next division reflects the hierarchical structure of the Institute, and again another division (the series) shows the actions of each exponent of the internal hierarchy.

Another group was formed with personal papers of sisters, collections of manuscripts given to the Institute, archives of extinct Provinces or houses, etc.

The papers in the ECONOMY group differ very much between Institutes and even more from one country to another, but those in the GOVERNMENT group proved to be more or less the same. The scheme for this latter group was:

Files were arranged alphabetically and documents within the files chronologically and then put into numbered de-acidified boxes kept on metal shelves. In a few days all the files in the 250 boxes of the 'historical archive' were listed, giving names, extreme dates, and main topics mentioned in them. We went on cataloguing, having up to now registered and described all individual items prior to 1949.

But the Superior General's (and her Council's) aim, was to master the archive as a means of enlivening and encouraging the religious life of the sisters, so new projects were visualized. Various researches of historical and apostolic interest, sponsored by the General Government, began using the Institute's Central Archive. It was thought that frequent use could, in due course, damage the papers, so all the items prior to 1937 (the year the Foundress died) were photocopied and transcribed, which, in any case, had to be done sooner or later for the beatification proceedings of Mother Aguilar.

Furthermore, the Secretary General and her assistants began locating and obtaining copies of documents relating to the Institute in public, diocesan, parish and other archives in various countries. They also started an oral history programme with the aid of young sisters and lay interviewers. Computers were introduced in the General House in 1987; much of the archival processing is already being done in soft ware, and the plans for the near future are to connect with the computers in all houses and schools the Institute has throughout the world. Annexed to the Central Archives are the Photo-archives, and a small reference library with a collection of all the books and pamphlets published by the Institute.

I must add that the General Secretariat extended the archival programmes to the whole Institute, by organizing courses for the training of provincial and local archivists, publishing handbooks, and supervising the archival work during visits.

This experience with the archives of the Sisters of Mercy of the Blessed Sacrament is an encouraging proof of what can be achieved when religious and lay archivists work together. It is also a hopeful sign of a more dignified future for Mexican religious archives as evidences of Christ's presence in the world.

MERCY ARCHIVES AND RESEARCH ON MOTHER AUSTIN CARROLL

Sister Mary Hermenia Muldrey, RSM

In the 1989 issue of Catholic Archives, the Editorial Notes opened with statements which have certainly proven their worth to this archivist/researcher in England, Ireland, and Rome. The editor mentioned the use of archives for historical research as one of the primary concerns of the Catholic Archives Society. Other points in the Notes urged religious archivists to be outward looking, to encourage research, swap lists of materials, and publish articles. The last of these suggestions is currently in progress and the others are included below.

The archives of several dozen Convents of Mercy in England and Ireland yielded pertinent data concerning the person and activities of a Mercy missionary to America in the last century. A native of County Tipperary, Mother Austin Carroll,¹ collected, edited, and published four volumes of the *Annals of the Sisters of Mercy*² after she had completed the extensive Life of Catherine McAuley.³ Because Carroll was serving in the United States at the time, she gathered her materials through transatlantic correspondence which took a month to reach its destination. Carroll sent her requests for data to the early Convents of Mercy and to the relatives and friends of the Mercy foundress. Thus, when this researcher needed information for a projected biography of Carroll, she hoped to locate a host of letters, as well as an occasional mention of Carroll's name in the annals of early Mercy convents.

Extant Carroll letters were few and far between, however, although a number had been copied into various convent annals, frequently termed chronicles, diaries or journals. These handwritten volumes proved to be invaluable in furnishing the date of a visit and in their convent critiques of Carroll's books. As the volumes of Mercy Annals, the biography of the foundress, or other Carroll publications reached the convents, chroniclers noted points of literary discussion. Although comments were largely positive, certain sections were considered too frank as Carroll portrayed both the frailty and the virtue of human nature. Several journals referred to Carroll as 'the American author'. As the Mercies learned when Carroll later visited them, she was especially proud of her Irish birthright and heritage. The descriptions of Carroll, like the opinions about her books, were gems gathered from the pages of the century-old volumes.

Treasured especially were the dates concerning the 1889 journey of Mother Austin Carroll and her Mercy companion from New Orleans. Although this was her first home-visit in thirty-four years, the primary aim of the trip was really research because Carroll needed to check on the historical accuracy of several facts she had received earlier. The task of this researcher was to learn the route and timetable of the visitors. The Mercy archival collection, particularly the guest-books and journals, not only revealed the itinerary but also provided a variety of other bits and pieces. There were descriptions of Carroll's friendliness and unassuming manner, nuns excited at the approach of the 'American author', and great surprise upon learning that nuns needed no special travel disguise in America. The cause of complaints in many convents was the brevity of the visit. The grateful travellers were often escorted to the next convent by two of the sisters. Carroll could not say enough about the generosity and enthusiasm with which she was received in one convent after another.

A century later, Carroll's gratitude was shared by this researcher as she was literally overwhelmed by the warmth of Mercy hospitality and graciousness. Further, this archivist appreciated the access so readily given to the archival materials and especially enjoyed the opportunity of seeing the same journals that Carroll had used so long ago. Archival instincts, or perhaps a nudge from kindred spirits, brought two of Catherine McAuley's original letters to the attention of this researcher. That 'find' was certainly one of the highpoints of the year dedicated to research for the Carroll biography. As a means of encouraging research, the incident is mentioned here in the hope that religious archivists, like historical researchers, might realize that another such discovery can occur at any time. It is certainly possible, for instance, that one of the earlier convents has a copy of the first edition of Catherine McAuley's catechetical booklet, Cottage Controversy,⁴ published in the 1830s. Several of the 1883 reprints exist, but an original copy awaits discovery by some twentieth-century researcher.

Lists of all the convents visited, of all the itinerary trodden, and of all the archival collections used are included in the biography, Abounding in Mercy.⁵ This life of Mother Austin Carroll, the early Mercy annalist and researcher, might be of interest to any religious archivist, researcher, or historian. Even with all these jobs, Carroll was also a leader who worked against injustice in the prison system, fought racism and opened schools for the blacks, aided single-parent families, and staffed free evening classes for newsboys and street waifs. Never doubting the ability of women to accomplish successfully any career they decided to pursue, Carroll encouraged the higher education of women. This archivist, who turned researcher and then biographer, thoroughly enjoyed using the archives which revealed the qualities and activities of such a gifted religious woman as Mother Austin Carroll.

CATHOLIC LAY SOCIETIES IN ENGLAND AND WALES,
1870—1970 : A PRELIMINARY LIST

Robin Gard

The following list of Catholic lay societies in England and Wales is derived primarily from entries in the Catholic Directory of England and Wales for the years 1870, 1880, 1890, 1900, 1910, 1920, 1925, 1930, 1939, 1950, 1960, 1965 and 1970. It was originally intended to restrict the list to the inter-War years but logic demanded a wider span and so it was decided to begin in 1870 and to conclude in 1970 so as to register the situation after the First and Second Vatican Councils. Many of the societies are of course still active, and others have been formed since 1970.

It was also the original intention to omit societies whose objects were wholly spiritual or vocational, those supporting missionaries, and also charitable bodies caring for the poor and others in institutions. However, several of these have in fact been included, and the compiler admits inconsistencies. In the list itself, the primary object of a society is given as stated in the directories, but no object is given where either the society's work is well known or its object self-evident from its title. Also, in a few instances, such as the Ladies of Charity, the object (and indeed the lay character also) are unclear from the directory entries.

Inclusion in the Catholic Directory does not necessarily imply official recognition, but most of the societies named have had the approval of the hierarchy, and some were founded by the bishops. Regarding the dates of the society (given in parenthesis), the initial date is the actual year of foundation when it differs from a sample year; otherwise, the dates are the first and last sample years in which the society is identified. It is possible, also, that a society may not be included in the directory for several years after its foundation and, occasionally, one suspects that a society has been omitted inadvertently. In only a few instances in fact do the directories give the actual date of foundation, but positive dates, as well as evidence of the existence of other societies, have emerged from papers among the Hexham and Newcastle diocesan archives. The names of these 'ex-directory' societies are given in italics.

The earliest society still in existence in 1970 is the Aged Poor Society, founded in 1708. Societies still active in 1970 which were founded in the nineteenth century include the Society of St Vincent de Paul (1844), the Catholic Poor-School Committee (1847) now the Catholic Education Council, the Association for the Propagation of the Faith (1870), the Guild of Ransom (1887), the Universities Catholic Education Board (1895) now the Oxford and Cambridge Education Board, the Catholic Needlework Guild (1890), and the Catholic Truth Society (1890).

The compilation of a thoroughly reliable and comprehensive list of lay societies would require extensive research, and the compiler is only too conscious that even the present list would have been more complete if he had taken the trouble to check more directories and to consult the archivists of existing societies and other sources. Even so, publication is excused on the grounds that if the preparation of a fuller list of these societies is worthwhile, then it is better to offer an interim list, however defective, in the hope that archivists and others with information will be prompted to contribute additional details.

It is hoped that a further list would also provide details of what archives of each society may survive, where they are held, and what access there may be to them. Indeed, a prime motive for publishing this list is to beg these questions. Here again, if archivists responsible for the records of societies still active, and anyone who has knowledge of the whereabouts of the records of defunct or superseded societies would care to send details or suggestions for further enquiries, the compiler would gladly receive them, with a view to preparing a 'directory of the archives of Catholic lay societies'. And, needless to say, if anyone feels that this is something worth doing and would like to collaborate, offers of help and suggestions would be welcomed. Hopefully, it should not be necessary to form a new society to do so!

THE ASSOCIATION OF RELIGIOUS ARCHIVISTS IN IRELAND

The last account of the above Association was carried in Catholic Archives, No.2, 1982. That article dealt with the origins of the Association, its links with the Conference of Major Religious Superiors and with the Archives Department of University College, Dublin. What follows is an update on the activities of ARAI since then.

Our first Newsletter appeared in time for Christmas, 1981. No.7 will appear this year. These letters have chronicled events during the 1980s. The AGM has been held each year after Easter with a regular attendance of over thirty. The papers read at these meetings have been circularized to the full membership. The Executive Committee elected at the AGM has met about four times each year. Some worthwhile initiatives have emerged from their deliberations: the organisation of workshops; the drawing up of a draft Directory of Irish Religious Archives; the holding of Beginners Courses arranged in conjunction with University College Dublin (U.C.D.); a year-long Diploma Course also arranged with U.C.D. The Executive has tried to maintain a balance between, on the one hand, workshops or lectures on the more practical aspects of archival management, and, on the other, papers of a more reflective nature dealing with the use made at present of archival collections belonging to religious.

This last point requires further elaboration. It would have to be said that, up till now, not an awful lot of use has been made of the archival collections attached to religious houses. The main reasons for this, apart from ignorance of their existence, are mainly two: (a) their inaccessibility and (b) the lack of catalogues or lists indicating the contents. As to the first point, it would have to be admitted that, even now, access to religious archives cannot be taken for granted. To balance that, however, let me quickly say that those research students who have had occasion to approach archivists appointed in religious houses have nothing but praise for the co-operation received. The problem seems to be more with the lack of preliminary work done on archival files, rather than their inaccessibility.

That brings me to the second point. Most religious archivists are part-timers and they tend to be senior citizens. The time available for work in the archives is limited, that is, the few hours each week that can be snatched when other 'more important' work has been finished. The wonder is that so much is done! But still there are many boxes unopened, many files untouched. There are very few religious archives with a full inventory of their contents. There are still fewer with descriptive lists. This is one of the main reasons for the reluctance of religious to open their archives. They themselves are ignorant of the contents. How could they make such files accessible to total strangers?

Much more could indeed be written about the two points raised above. I merely mention them here to highlight the need for more intensive listing, calendaring, cataloguing of religious archives around the country.

One of the objects of the Association is to promote the care and preservation of records and archives in order that they might be accessible for academic research and other cultural purposes. To promote this object it was decided by the Executive to approach three people known to have an interest in archival material relating to religious in this country. The first of these was the Professor of Modern Irish History at U.C.D., Professor Donal McCarthy. His paper 'The Historian and the Archivist' appeared in the 1989 edition of Catholic Archives. Next to be approached was Mary Peckham, an American research student. Her theme was 'Religious Archives: a Rich Source of Social History'. Finally, Catriona Clear spoke on 'The Archives of Religious Congregations, to what purpose?'. The purpose of these papers was to indicate the interest of academics in our collections, to emphasize the wealth of material contained therein and as a result to stimulate in our members the desire to make more of this material available to genuine researchers. It should perhaps be noted that the two ladies mentioned above are social historians. But interest in religious archives is not confined to social historians. There are large areas yet to be explored particularly in the two fields of education and foreign missions.

Another area that is coming in for attention in our Association just now is 'Archival Policy'. Until recently the work of the archivist was regarded as of little consequence in most of our Congregations. There is a greater need now to have the role of the archivist defined, to have that role recognized within the community, to have relations with the administration clarified, to have collections protected and made secure. We have at hand now a sample document of an Archival Policy for a particular Congregation. We hope eventually to adapt it for more general purposes.

Much work still remains to be done by ARAI. During the 1980s interest has been awakened and much work done to preserve our collections for posterity. During the 1990s this work will have to continue. With the better organisation of our archives and listing of their contents there should follow a better use of these resources both at the administrative and academic level.

RELIGIOUS ARCHIVES CONFERENCE, 1989

(The following account is based on the work of rapporteurs K. Cann, J. Fox and A. Peacock to whom the compiler is greatly indebted)

Thursday, 12 October 1989 may well prove to be a significant date in the annals of religious archivology. About fifty archivists, librarians, administrators, plus a sprinkling of academics gathered together in the Lecture Theatre of London University's School of Oriental and African Studies. (A list of the offices represented is given at the end.) It had long been felt that the archivists of churches and religious societies and organisations worked in some isolation and did not, in general, feel themselves to be well informed of each other's activities. Then, too, religious archives in the British Isles were very scattered, some remaining with their creating bodies while others had been deposited in local record offices or institutional libraries and repositories. Here, the staff who administered them often acquired a subject specialism and, so to speak, became 'religious archivists'. Both custodians and users found their information about the whereabouts of religious archives was sparse and elusive. The business of the day was to discuss these and other matters of common interest and to exchange news and information.

Father A.P. Dolan, Chairman of the Catholic Archives Society, was the first speaker. His paper concerned the development and growth of the Society since its formation in 1979. He outlined its academic and cultural purposes and described the ways in which both are advanced through publications and conferences. The next two speakers were academics who provided a user's view of religious archives. Professor Richard Gray of the School of Oriental and African Studies outlined the specific and wider importance of religious archives for research. Archives were essential for the study of church history, but were also of great use to secular scholarship, for example missionary records often acted as sources of information on industry and agriculture in developing nations. Religious archives could thus demonstrate the importance of the Churches' enterprise for the world, and might even overturn the stereotypes of the historian. Specific needs of researches included ease of access, clear guides to collections and sufficient back-up material. Dr Clyde Binfield of the University of Sheffield drew on personal experience in stressing the importance of ease of access and the provision of basic facilities, most of which he acknowledged were often beyond the archivist's control. More achievable goals were improved guides to collections and contextual resources, and increased cross-referencing with material in other repositories. He saw the archivist as subject specialist rather than administrator and suggested that readers could be used as allies in obtaining new material.

The emphasis of the afternoon papers was practical and to some extent technical. Rosemary Keen of the Church Missionary Society spoke about the problems of the divided archive based on her work with the Church Missionary Society. The Society's archives were situated in three different locations: on-site records at headquarters and an off-site storage repository, both in London, while the historical archives were on deposit in Birmingham University Library. She emphasised the importance of listing and cataloguing all records placed in the care of busy academic institutions and outlined her strategy for dealing with off-site records in London. Malcolm Thomas of the Society of Friends introduced the topic of thesaurus construction in religious archives. He provided sheets with examples, and discussion centred on the need for clarification of terminology. It was suggested that different denominations might wish to produce guides to their own special terms and that a comprehensive thesaurus might wish to build on these terms. Christopher Kitching of the Royal Commission on Historical Manuscripts spoke of the advisory and information services available from the Commission and particularly how these could help participants.

The papers generated lively discussion which greatly benefited from the variety and range of organisations represented. Phraseology had at times a distinctive flavour. There was reference, for example, to the 'theology of archives' which one speaker saw as the 'record of God at work in the community'. One participant wondered whether there were denominational differences in attitudes to religious archives. Points raised indicated a wealth of topics which could be dealt with in depth at future conferences. These included closure dates and confidentiality, the difficulties of access to ecclesiastical records; the temporary loan of records; weeding; the significance of religious ephemera; and the need for a directory of religious archives. One non-participant wrote in urging the pressing need of an archive of contemporary Church magazines. Several speakers hoped that a future forum would allow for the meeting of different interest groups. The presence among us of a member of the American Theological Library Association and an observer from the Anglo-Jewish Archives indicated other future themes.

All in all, it was felt that the day had been a great success and was worth repeating in another year's time. Not least had participants benefited from the opportunity to chat amongst themselves in the intervals of the formal sessions. The proceedings would be put together and published by the Society of Archivists Specialist Repositories Group. A steering group was set up and a register of interested persons and organisations would be maintained.

THE CATHOLIC ARCHIVES SOCIETY CONFERENCE, 1989

The tenth annual conference, held at Upholland Northern Institute, on 30 May—1 June, was attended by Bishop B.C. Foley (President) and sixty members.

The conference, was opened on Tuesday evening, 30 May, by Miss Judith Close (Chairman). The evening talk was given by the Hon. Georgina Stonor, consultant archivist, who reviewed the many bodies concerned with research into Catholic history and strongly recommended the establishment of a Catholic history resource and information centre. The next morning, 31 May, Dr Judith Champ discussed the varied sources for the biography of Bishop Ullathorne on which she is presently engaged. This was followed by a talk with slides by Laurence Bird (Senior Conservationist of the Greater Manchester Record Office) in which he described the basic physical conditions for archive storage and gave other practical advice on conservation, as well as demonstrating conservation materials and equipment.

In the afternoon, instead of the usual outside visit, members viewed an exhibition on the history of the Sisters of Notre Dame de Namur prepared by Sr Joan Bunn SND, who also spoke about the provincial archives in her charge. Later, members explored the Gradwell Library, housed in the Institute, where Mgr John Butchard (Director of the Institute), and Tony Hilton, described the resources of the Library. The evening of 31 May was taken up with discussion groups, including archives and research, 'looking to the future', and diocesan archives, in which group Bishop Rawsthorne took part.

Fr Anthony Dolan (Vice-Chairman) chaired the Open Forum on Thursday morning, 1 June, the two main items discussed being a questionnaire from the new Pontifical Commission for preserving the Patrimony of Art and History sent to the Society by the Bishops' Conference for comment, and a report by Sr Marguerite-Andre Kuhn-Regnier (Secretary) on her work since 1982 as the Society's representative for monastic and enclosed religious communities, in which she referred to arrangements made for the preservation of the archives of various houses on closure. Reports from the previous evening's discussion groups were received and several members raised research queries.

The Society's AGM completed the formal business. In this, Miss Close gave her Chairman's review of the year's activities and the officers in turn accounted, and were duly thanked, for their respective stewardships. The election of officers and members of Council for the coming year (as given on the inside front cover) were made, and, finally, Sr Mary Campion McCarron FCJ was warmly thanked for organising the conference.

A full report of the conference appears in CAS Newsletter, Number 11, Autumn 1989, available from the Secretary. The 1990 conference will be held at Damascus House, Mill Hill, London, on 29–31 May 1990.

ALBERT HOLLAENDER (1909–1989)

It is fitting that a tribute should be paid in the Society to the memory of Dr Albert Hollaender, former Keeper of Manuscripts at the Guildhall Library, who died on 3 May last year, for, had his age and commitments permitted, he would surely, as a Catholic archivist, have done much to promote its objects. Indeed, he had done this indirectly by counselling and encouraging many young archivists and researchers, among them members of our Society, whom he impressed not merely with his wide knowledge of sources but particularly with his deep respect for the value of archives and history as a fundamental aspect of civilization.

Albert Hollaender was born in Vienna on 28 October 1908. He took a doctorate in medieval and modern history at Vienna University and then a diploma in archive studies. His research led him into many libraries in Central Europe, but after Hitler's invasion of Austria in 1938 he was forced to leave the country and came to England in May 1939. He worked briefly on Catholic archives at Leeds but then joined the Army and, later on, served as an interpreter in the Intelligence Corps.

After the War, he joined the Guildhall Library as a temporary assistant and spent the whole of his professional life at the Library, retiring in 1973 as Keeper of Manuscripts. As Keeper, he was very largely responsible for building up the Library's collections of ecclesiastical, civil and livery company records and for establishing the Library as the principal repository and place of research into all aspects of London history. He was an early member of the Society of Archivists and from 1950 to 1973 edited its Journal, which he changed from a cyclostyled bulletin into a periodical of international repute. He was a member of the Catholic Record Society and regularly attended general meetings in its Farm Street days.

Ever courteous, he could nevertheless be quite forceful and held strong convictions, none more firmly than that of the value of archives and the need to achieve the highest standards in their preservation for public use. A fuller appreciation of his contribution to archives is to be found in Prisca Munimenta, a selection of articles originally published in the Journal under his editorship, and published as a tribute to him by the Society of Archivists in 1973. Dr Hollaender's army discharge testimonial was of 'a tireless worker who never counts the hours'. He lived for archives and, had he been born later, he would surely have been a 'tireless worker' in the cause of Catholic archives.

BOOK REVIEW

Secret Hiding Places, Michael Hodgetts

Dublin, Veritas Publication, 270pp., illus, cased. £25.00

This is a book which is likely to prove to be the standard work on the subject for many years to come. Although for the most part an original work, it nevertheless makes proper use of pioneering work done by others. Both Allen Fea and Granville Squiers had written on the subject many years before, but the present author is right when he points to a serious defect in the latter's work:

Squiers aimed at a country gazetteer as complete as possible . . . the need to get several hundred houses into a book of reasonable length meant saying very little about the elaborate network of family relationships that linked them together . . . The recusant gentry who owned these houses and had priest-holes built in them knew one another well (p.i).

The chief merit of this book is that it places the history of so many of the hides within the context of these families. The account of such a living connection adds more to our understanding than a mere structural analysis — fascinating though this might be — could possibly achieve. Parallel with this is an emphasis on the geographical spread of these hiding-holes. Where there is doubt as to the secret hand which executed so much of this wooden wizardry, might one not suggest involving a computer as has already happened, for example, in identifying the guilds of stone masons responsible for so many of the church towers in Somerset?

Hodgetts rightly points to the sheer genius of Nicholas Owen. This is

EDITORIAL NOTES

The Society has now been established for over eleven years and, sustained by an increasing recognition by the Church of the importance of archives, it has steadily grown in confidence. Its work is now fairly well known and its member archivists are generally receiving more support from their own organisations. Even so, the Society has perhaps to be wary of progressing too ambitiously because it is still called upon to provide basic advice and assistance to new members from congregations and other bodies hitherto unrepresented. The strength of the Society lies mainly in the knowledge of its individual members who include many experienced archivists, so that new members do not need to look far for practical help. However, while the objective of promoting the preservation, care and use of Catholic archives still remains the Society's primary duty, it is perhaps time to be thinking ahead, to discuss ideas for extending its services to its members in the United Kingdom and Eire, and to develop contacts with associations of Catholic archivists in both English speaking and foreign countries, particularly with those which have had longer experience.

The articles in this edition reflect many of the challenges and responses of the Society, and bear witness to the dedication of many archivists, often working on their own. Women's congregations are well represented in articles by Sr Margaret Lonergan on the archives of the Little Sisters of the Assumption and by Sr Cora Richardson on those of the Missionary Sisters of the Holy Rosary, while Sr St Mildred Coburn traces her 'first steps' in setting up the La Sagesse Provincial Archive, and Dame Mildred Murray Sinclair and Sr Agnes Hypher discuss respectively the problems of preserving the archives and the artefacts of closed communities. The archives of a men's order of medieval foundation, the Augustinians, are reported by Bro Cyril Counihan, diocesan archives are featured this year by Fr J. Harding's description of the Clifton archives, and Mr Peter Waszak discusses the records of the parish of All Souls, Peterborough. There are shorter articles by Mrs Kate Moore on the archives the National Shrine of Our Lady, Walsingham, and by Mrs Kay Day on the registers of Catholic servicemen in the RC Records Office, Aldershot, and a note about the Baker Papers in the Dominican Historical Centre, Oxford. The Society's contacts with the United States and Australia are rewarded by Mr Ronald Patkus, Archivist to the Archdiocese of Boston, kindly allowing his paper on access to diocesan archives in America to be re-printed here, and in Mr Frank Carleton's interesting article on the surviving papers and books of Archbishop Vaughan of Sydney. The thanks of the Society are warmly accorded to all these contributors. No editorial notes would, of course, be complete without extending the usual invitation to archivists and others to offer articles for future issues.

THE ARCHIVES OF THE DIOCESE OF CLIFTON : A SKETCH

The Rev. J.A. Harding

(The Diocese of Clifton comprises the counties of Avon, Gloucestershire, Somerset and Wiltshire)

To begin on a personal note: it was in January 1986 that Bishop Mervyn Alexander asked me whether I should be willing to become Diocesan Archivist. Few requests in my life have given me greater pleasure and I readily agreed. I understand that, hitherto, the post had been combined with that of Bishop's Secretary, but knowing the pressures that appointment has for its holder it must come as no surprise that the Archives were not accorded a very high profile. In saying this, I intend no criticism.

The Archives were housed in a strong room in the basement of Bishop's House. In my view, there were two immediate problems to be faced. The first was that, following Bishop Foley's advice to the bishops, the vitally important Episcopal Correspondence dating from c. 1770, the nineteenth century parish files, and registers had been deposited at the Bristol Record Office. No doubt, such advice from the Bishop had been sound and guaranteed optimum conditions of conservation. However, it did presuppose reasonably ready access, but it was precisely on this score that, through no fault of the staff, the Bristol Record Office failed. A reading room of limited proportions meant, in my experience, a waiting period of two to three weeks. In my view this was not acceptable and our Bishop agreed.

I therefore set about the task of getting at least the Episcopal Correspondence returned to Bishop's House. The absence of these sixty or so volumes had meant that the Clifton Diocesan Archives were eviscerated. As things are now, any request for consultation can be dealt with promptly—even within forty-eight hours, if necessary.

But such opening up of the Archives—although I recognise that they remain private to the Bishop and that there is no right of admission—does imply not only reasonably prompt access but also a basic degree of comfort on arrival. I therefore sought permission from the Diocesan Trustees for the provision of a reading room. Space adjoining the strong room was available, work had already been planned on other parts of the house and so I was more than gratified when permission was granted for this very necessary upgrading of the facilities connected with the Archives. My key argument had been that historical research was rapidly becoming a growth industry and that we in Clifton would be receiving many requests from serious scholars.

I am delighted to say that, as a result of representations, we now have a very comfortable, heated, carpeted, metal-shelved reading room measuring fifteen by twelve feet. Here, I should like to pay tribute to a very supportive Bishop, to the Trustees and to the Financial Secretary. In addition, my thanks are due to Dr John Cashman for his untiring efforts in helping to put the Archives into proper working order. Much work, however, still remains to be done.

The Western District was established in January 1688 during the reign of James II. Three other Vicariates were set up at the same time: London, Midland, and Northern. Today, what was then the Western District embraces five dioceses: Wrexham, Menevia, Cardiff, Clifton and Plymouth. In 1840, the District was divided to become the Welsh District and the (much smaller) Western District. The first Vicar Apostolic was Philip Michael Ellis, OSB. Before the end of 1688 he was in prison and it is almost certain that he never in fact set foot in his Vicariate — at least not as bishop. Later, he went to Italy where he became a very successful Bishop of Segni and is recalled even today with a degree of pride and admiration.

Ellis was a Benedictine. So were five of his successors. Three others were Franciscan and only one (Baggs) was a secular. The reason for this preponderance of religious would seem to be two-fold. The Western District, with its scattered rural communities, was notoriously poor and it was felt that the bishop should not have to rely on the meagre offerings of the faithful but be supported by the more reliable resources of his religious order. In addition, there was the question of 'balance'. The religious orders shouldered a great deal of the pastoral work of the English Mission. On the other hand, relations with the secular clergy were far from harmonious and so it would seem that Rome thought it not only just but also politic to arrange that de facto, if not de jure, the regulars should have at least one representative on the bench of bishops.

The next Vicar Apostolic was a Welsh Franciscan, Matthew Prichard (VA, 1713-1750). He shared a loyalty to the Jacobite cause with many of the Catholics of the time. Indeed it is worth noting that for many years all episcopal appointments were 'filtered' to Rome through the Court of St Germaine for the approval, or otherwise, of the Old and Young Pretenders, and it was not until the time of Bishop Stonor (VA, Midland District, 1715-1756) that bishops and laity were persuaded under his strong influence to put aside this adherence to a lost cause and to accept the de facto succession of the House of Hanover.

In 1741 Rome appointed a Benedictine as coadjutor to Prichard. He was Laurence York, a former prior of Douai and Paris who since 1729 had been in charge of the Benedictine Mission in Bath. His coadjutor from 1756, and eventual successor, was another Benedictine, Charles Walmesley. He was a mathematician and astronomer of international repute, and he was consulted by the British Government when at last it decided to discard the Julian in favour of the Gregorian Calendar. This was in 1752 although most of Catholic Europe had already adopted the new calendar as far back as 1582. For Protestant England it smelt too much of papal intrusion.

Two interesting sidelights may be mentioned concerning Walmesley: on his tomb in Downside Abbey may be seen the emblems of freemasonry. Was he a mason? Apparently, many French clergy at that time were. Secondly, at the centenary celebrations of the Hierarchy held in Bristol in 1950, Ronald Knox attributed the achievements of Walmesley to his predecessor York (Occasional Sermons, page 303). Sometimes, even the great Knox nods.

Bishop Walmesley lived, as did most of his successors, in Bath. The Archives too were housed there. In 1780, a mob — no doubt inspired by the Gordon Riots in other parts of the country — attacked and destroyed a newly-built chapel in the city, and with it perished the records of the Western Vicariate. Clearly the loss was incalculable and so with one or two exceptions — like the beautifully bound Latin New Testament of Bishop Prichard, printed in Cologne in 1679, and Bishop Challoner's Sermons in manuscript — the Archives may be said to commence around 1770.

The Episcopal Correspondence is at the heart of the Archives. In the reign of Bishop Burton (1902-1931), all the letters were arranged in strict chronological order. For some this may appear an advantage but to others who wish to pursue a particular line of study such an arrangement can prove quite frustrating. The volumes in this form end in 1849 and resume again in the time of Bishop Burton (1902). Letters belonging to the intervening period are dispersed in various folders: two pertaining to Bishop Clifford — although many letters addressed to him are to be found at Ugbrooke — and one large bound volume pertaining to Archbishop Errington (of which more later). Few of the letters addressed to Bishops Hendren (1848-1851) and Burgess (1851-1854) appear to have survived. There is a volume of documents relating to the Bristol Mission from 1787 to 1845. Another is entitled English Benedictines and covers the period 1885 to 1918.

All these volumes contain incoming letters. Letters from the bishops and their secretaries are for the most part to be found in wet letter books dating from 1858 to 1919. Clifford, however, apart from the early years of his reign, often kept rough drafts of his communications, whereas Burton preferred to write brief notes of his reply on the latter received.

Apart from the researches of Fr Geoffrey Scott into the history of the English Benedictines and of Fr Dockery who in 1954 wrote a biography of his fellow Franciscan Collingridge, the letters of the Vicars Apostolic have for the most part remained untouched and are a rich quarry awaiting the skilled historian.

Peter Augustine Baines (1823-1843) is someone who for too long has been waiting for a biographer. Although aged only fifty-seven at the time of his death, he nevertheless managed to live a life that was full to overflowing. His grandiose schemes for making Prior Park into an episcopal residence and seminary succeeded in bankrupting the Vicariate, and the infant diocese of Clifton, for many years to come. His dispute with the monks at Downside was legendary and it was Bishop Burton who, years later and tongue-in-cheek, composed the inscription on his tomb in the Abbey Church. Baines, it must be remembered, had placed the monastery under interdict. With a charity so characteristic of the Order, the inscription proclaims that Baines now rests 'among friends' (inter amicos).

Recently, Dr John Cashman presented a thesis at Bristol University on Baines. It does not pretend to be a full length treatment of the man or of his achievements. Rather, it deals with five specific areas of controversy during Baines's twenty years as a bishop:

- a) the dispute with Downside and Ampleforth over the establishment of an episcopal seminary for the Western District;
- b) difficulties with the school and seminary at Prior Park;
- c) the controversy over the Lenten Pastoral Letter of 1840;
- d) the dispute with the Jesuits over the Bristol Mission;
- e) the dispute with the Benedictine nuns at Cannington.

When Bishop Baines died in 1843 — just hours after the opening of St Mary-on-the-Quay, Bristol — Rome appointed the only member of the secular clergy to have taken charge of the Western District. Although a man of great promise, Charles Michael Baggs was destined to be bishop for less than two years, and before he was forty he was dead. Like Pope John Paul I, he is one of the might-have-beens of Catholic history for had he lived there is every chance that he would have become the first Bishop of Clifton.

The ninth Vicar Apostolic was yet another Benedictine, William Bernard Ullathorne. Unlike Baines, much has been written about him and a new work by Dr Judith Champ is eagerly awaited. He was in the Western District for a mere two years before being transferred to the Midlands. Nevertheless, he left his mark, not only in salvaging the building later to become the Pro-Cathedral, but also in appointing Joseph William Hendren, a Franciscan, as his Vicar. In 1848, Hendren became Vicar Apostolic and then, in 1850, the first Bishop of Clifton. Because he was so much out of sympathy with the whole Prior Park enterprise, he was moved by Propaganda to the newly created, but still vacant, See of Nottingham.

For three years the Diocese of Clifton was in the episcopal care of Thomas Burgess, the former Prior of Ampleforth. He struggled manfully with the financial burden of Prior Park but in the end he succumbed. His death was widely attributed to stress over the Bath College; so much so that at this point Rome intervened and declared that a new Bishop of Clifton would not be appointed till the financial affairs of the diocese had been sorted out.

At his own request Archbishop George Errington — who, after only six months as coadjutor, was already in dispute with Cardinal Wiseman — came to the diocese of Clifton as Apostolic Administrator. In the Archives we have his Administration. It is a meagre, business-like document with a few facts and figures but little else.

Errington's lengthy Report to Propaganda was in due course submitted. In it he showed that the diocese was now, if not financially thriving at least in a less parlous state than before and was, in his judgement, ready for the appointment of its third bishop. The choice fell on William Clifford, a friend of Errington from the latter's days in the Plymouth diocese. Clifford was only thirty-three when he was appointed personally by Pope Pius IX and consecrated by him in the Sistine Chapel on 15 February 1857. His episcopate was to last thirty-six years and he was destined to make his name in a number of fields, not least by his interventions on Papal Infallibility and other topics in the First Vatican Council. In the Archives are two files containing letters from many of the leading church figures of the day, including Newman, Manning, Talbot and Capel.

Sadly, we have only sixteen of Clifford's Diaries. Two of these date from his days as a young priest in the diocese of Plymouth while the remainder cover the years 1880-1893 (the year of his death). The absence of the Diaries covering the period of the Council is particularly unfortunate, although it has to be said that on occasions Clifford could leave several weeks without a single entry or comment. Clifford's Diaries are interesting in that on the blank interleaf he was in the habit of enumerating points of discussion, and conclusions reached, at meetings which he attended. His accounts of audiences with Pope Leo XIII, and meetings with members of the Curia, during the period leading up to the publication of Romanos Pontifices (1881) have a particular interest for the historian.

In 1894 a new bishop of Clifton was appointed: William Brownlow, a Cambridge graduate and convert of Newman. We do not possess any of Brownlow's Diaries, but we do have thirty-five letters written to him by Newman during a period spanning over half a century (1833-1887). In his early years as a Catholic priest in Torquay, Brownlow engaged in public controversy with the Anglo-Catholics. Latterly, as Bishop, he became embroiled with George Forrest Browne, Bishop of Bristol and formerly Disney Professor of Archaeology in the University of Cambridge, over the question of the historic Apostolic Succession in this country. Browne had made some very unecumenical remarks on the occasion of his enthronement to which Brownlow replied in a series of lectures delivered in the Pro-Cathedral. These were subsequently published as a small book by the Catholic Truth Society.

George Ambrose Burton (1902-1931) was a classical scholar and his Diaries give a delightful insight into a bygone age. A day's excursion into the country would be an occasion for a paean in Latin of impeccable elegance. Entries might equally be found in Italian, French or, occasionally, Greek. It has been said that his was 'a spirit touched with genius, who never realised all his quality promised, so exacting was his taste' (The English Catholics, 1850-1950, page 193). Indeed, apart from his Pastoral Letters, his only published work would appear to be a lecture given in 1928 at the Summer School of Catholic Studies held at Cambridge. The topic that year was 'The English Martyrs' and Burton spoke on 'Popular Resistance to the New Religion'.

In the Clifton Archives there are three volumes of letters and other documents which merit special mention. The first is the Cannington Papers which deal with matters between the Benedictine nuns and the Vicars Apostolic culminating in the departure of the nuns for Staffordshire in 1848. Cannington, near Bridgwater, is a place of considerable Catholic interest. Bishop Collingridge lived, died and was buried there, although his remains were subsequently removed to Downside. The former chapel featured recently on TV, as it was there that the Public Enquiry took place regarding the building of a third nuclear power station at nearby Hinckley Point.

The Errington Papers are of enormous importance. These were bequeathed to his close personal friend, William Clifford. The volume contains much of a personal and sensitive nature, including a letter in which he expressed his grave reservations in regard to the proposal that he should leave Plymouth and go to Westminster as coadjutor to Wiseman. The papers await a scholar well versed in Italian, Latin and Canon Law.

Bishop Clifford was to the fore in presenting the case for the Bishops in their dispute with the Regulars. Disagreements had been simmering since the days of the Vicars Apostolic and were not finally resolved until the publication in 1881 of Romanos Pontifices. Clifford kept all the documents relating to this controversy and had them bound in a single volume. Again, a researcher with a canonical turn of mind might well find this a useful quarry.

Papers relating to Canon George Case of Gloucester who left the church after the definition of Papal Infallibility, and others pertaining to 'Archbishop' Arnold Mathew — erstwhile Parish Priest of St Mary, Bath and from whom most of the Episcopi Vagantes derive their orders — form part of the more exciting treasures of the Clifton Archives.

An album of Papal Briefs is kept at Clifton in which are preserved various documents of appointment. One curiosity must surely be that relating to Bishop Lee (1932-1948). On the reverse side the consecrating bishops have signed a statement to the effect that he had indeed been consecrated, but the Latin is defective, for by omitting the all-important word 'Apostolorum', they tell us that the ceremony had taken place, not in the church of the Twelve Apostles, but in the church of All Saints — a veritable mecca of Anglo-Catholicism a couple of miles away.

Albums of photographs (not always annotated), financial reports, correspondence relating to schools and churches, numerous architects' and surveyors' plans are available to the scholar. Provision is being made throughout the Archive to include copies or photocopies of documents relating to the Diocese to be found elsewhere, including papers to be found in the Vatican and Propaganda Fide.

There is in the Diocese a flourishing body known as the Gloucestershire and North Avon Catholic History Society. This has done much excellent work both in preservation and in research. In addition, the Society fosters close links with the Gloucestershire Record Office where many papers relating to parishes in the north of the Diocese are now housed.

There are also a number of non-literary treasures of an historical nature at Bishop's House. There is a splendid series of portraits of all the Vicars Apostolic of the Western District (except Sharrock) and of all the Bishops of Clifton. The portraits have recently been cleaned and re-hung. Photographs have also been taken and these are on permanent display in Clifton Cathedral opposite a large brass plate giving the succession of the Pre-Reformation and Post-Reformation Catholic Hierarchy. Four croziers are also in our proud possession: a very flamboyant piece which once belonged to the even more flamboyant Peter Augustine Baines, one that belonged to another Vicar Apostolic, Hendren, and one each belonging to Clifford and Burton.

In conclusion, there is surely a place in the modern Catholic archive for carefully selected examples of Protestant/Catholic polemic. No doubt there are some who might regard such an interest as rather perverse. Another view might be that the English Church did not grow up in a vacuum, and that since it lived in a very real world of controversy, it was precisely this abrasive atmosphere — largely, thank God, no longer with us — which in some respects has moulded it into the shape in which it is found today.

It is for this reason that in the Clifton Archives there is a display of Anti-Catholic ephemera. There is a copy of a poster from Frome protesting in 1851 against the ministrations in that town of the visiting priest from Downside — 'That Limb of Anti-Christ' as he is called. Some original Punch cartoons are on display, one dating from the time of Papal Infallibility. There is also an original drawing submitted to, and published by, Punch portraying Lloyd George and his reaction to the Peace Proposals of Benedict XV.

By the same token a small number of Anti-Catholic publications are to be found on the shelves. For example, there is a copy of R.F. Littledale's (1833-1890) Reasons Against Joining the Church of Rome. It is surely an irony that his beautiful translation of 'Come down, O Love Divine' is to be found in the Roman Breviary at the very heart of the liturgy of the Church he so abhorred.

Archives are not static but ever changing. They are about living institutions and, because living, it behoves the archivists of today to select and store away at will be treasures to-morrow. Our Lord speaks about bringing out from one's treasure house things both new and old. But the new becomes old, and so let us ensure that the heritage of today's Church finds its way into the Archives of to-morrow.

Editorial Note

This is the text of a paper given at the Annual Conference of the Society at Damascus House, Mill Hill, on 30 May 1990. Enquiries concerning the Clifton Archives may be addressed to Fr J.A. Harding, M Litt, Diocesan Archivist, St Bernadette, Wells Road, Whitchurch, Bristol, BS14 9HU.

RELIGIOUS ARCHIVES GROUP

The second one-day conference organised by the Religious Archives Group of the Society of Archivists was held on 11 September 1990 at Friends House, Euston Road, London NW1. It proved to be as lively, busy and absorbing a day as the previous conference had been. The morning (chaired by Fr A. Dolan) saw plenary sessions on Anglican archives in Canada, the Theology of Religious archives, and an account of the Baptist archives at Regents Park College, Oxford. In the afternoon, participants attended two workshops they had previously chosen from the following list: selection and weeding; images in archives; inexpensive computers for the small office (led by Fr D. Lannon); indexing; the Parochial Register and Records Measure —theory and practice. The combination of plenary and workshop sessions proved highly popular and we shall probably repeat the pattern next year.

Attendance at the conference was encouragingly high, with more than fifty participants. Among organisations represented were the British Council of Churches, the Moravian Church Library, the Greater London Record Office, the Salvatorian Fathers, the John Rylands Library, the Spanish and Portuguese Jews Congregation, the Orthodox Church of the British Isles, the Dominican nuns in England, the Church of Ireland and the Salvation Army Heritage Centre.

Since the conference there has been a flow of suggestions and ideas in response to a questionnaire for next year's conference. Plans for producing the Proceedings are well in hand. We hope that these will be ready for the next meeting of the Steering Group in January. Copies will be distributed to participants as soon after that as feasible.

I still have a few spare copies of last year's (1989) Proceedings available free to anyone who sends an A4-size SAE.

UNFINISHED BUSINESS: ARCHIVES OF THE FORMER BENEDICTINE MONASTERY OF ST SCHOLASTICA, TEIGNMOUTH

Dame Mildred Murray Sinclair, OSB

Preamble

In 1987 St Scholastica's Abbey, Teignmouth, closed after a life-span of 325 years. At the closure, instead of joining other communities, four of us went to Buckfast where we are continuing our monastic life in a small house put at our disposal by the Abbot and community of Buckfast Abbey, which house, incidentally, we have already outgrown.

St Scholastica's was not the first monastery to close, and I know of one dispersed community whose archives were partially lost because no provision had been made for their preservation. It may have been this, or a similar, incident that prompted the Secretary of this Society, in her letter of invitation, to write: 'The question of archives of dispersed communities is occupying our minds a little at present.' So, in this paper, I hope to say something about the contents, the vicissitudes, and the whereabouts of the former Teignmouth archives.

I must begin by dispelling a possible misconception. It might be supposed that, because St Scholastica's Abbey, Teignmouth, was a Benedictine Monastery, at its closure some other Benedictine House would be under obligation to accept the Teignmouth archives. This was not the case. St Scholastica's Abbey was not a member of a Congregation but an autonomous monastery under the jurisdiction of the bishop, and so had no claim on any monastery either of monks or nuns. This makes the generosity of several Benedictine Houses all the more admirable.

While it was still uncertain whether or not the Buckfast venture would get off the ground, I petitioned for the Teignmouth archives to be preserved at Downside where I knew they would be safe and well cared for. In the goodness of his heart the Downside archivist was willing to add this burden to his own. In the event, our archives did not go to Downside, though Downside did accept its close relative, our Recusant Library. I call it a 'close relative' because many of its books shed small shafts of light on the community at Dunkirk, all the more precious because of the loss of so much archival material sustained at the French Revolution. Some of these books had been in use in the school, and the young 'convicts' (as the pupils were called) were not averse to practising their handwriting on the inside covers and fly-leaves of their books, and as they usually wrote and re-wrote their names, they unwittingly recorded for posterity that X, Y or Z was at school on the continent with the Benedictine Dames of Dunkirk! Various members of the community also inscribed names and dates in a number of these books, though neatly and more discreetly. Before releasing the Recusant Library to Downside the librarian made a list of these inscriptions, which is now in the Teignmouth archives.

Of late years we have been urged to keep photographic records, with the result that, during the past two decades, most of the community have been recorded not only by name but visually. Before the advent of photography, however, only the elite, that is the Abbesses and a few of the nuns whose portraits were probably commissioned by their relatives, had their likenesses rendered in oils for future generations to see. Because of their rarity, six or seven in all, these portraits were particularly precious to us and the thought of selling them off at auction was quite repugnant. Yet, what to do with them for their size precluded taking them with us to Buckfast? Once again, our Benedictine brothers came to our help, and the portraits, now cleaned and, in some cases, re-framed have been hung by Father Prior in his excellent museum at Farnborough Abbey. Not only the portraits but much more of historical interest once belonging to Teignmouth Community will be found there.

I have visited Downside and seen our former Recusant Library in situ. The books have been catalogued and are truly appreciated. It is a comfort to know that they are still in Benedictine hands, a comfort we nearly had to forego as our Bishop expressed a wish for these books to go to Womersley, his old seminary. However, when I explained that they were already promised to Downside, he understood and did not insist. I have also visited Farnborough and seen the portraits and other items on exhibition there. The care with which the portraits have been restored and the other items displayed is quite astonishing. To both Downside and Farnborough we owe a very great debt of gratitude, and I am happy to acknowledge it here. Last but not least, it is my pleasure to record our debt of gratitude to Father Abbot and the community at Buckfast. St Mary's Convent has no space in which to store archives, but a room in the Abbey has been made available for all I brought from Teignmouth.

Perhaps this is the place in which to give in broad outline the contents of the Teignmouth archives. But first, a brief word of explanation for those, if any, who may not know the history of our Benedictine nuns during the days of persecution in England. The first Benedictine Nunnery for Englishwomen during penal times was founded at Brussels in 1598 by Lady Mary Percy, daughter of the martyred Earl of Northumberland. Brussels sent a colony to Ghent in 1624, and Ghent made three Foundations:—Bologne 1652, transferred to Pontoise six years later; Dunkirk 1662, the Teignmouth ancestor; and Ypres 1664, a monastery especially erected for Irish nuns whose descendants are to-day at Kylemore. At the French Revolution, the communities at Brussels, Ghent and Dunkirk sought refuge in England, though ours at Dunkirk only after suffering imprisonment at the hands of the Revolutionaries. Pontoise, however, became insolvent and was suppressed a few years before the Revolution, when the Abbess and the majority of the nuns joined the Dunkirk community. The English Benedictine nuns at Cambrai and Paris do not enter our history here.

In the Teignmouth archives will be found the original manuscript of the Annals of the Brussels Community which Dame Mary English, the Teignmouth archivist, was commissioned to compile in 1876 by Abbess Woollet of East Bergholt — formerly Brussels. Correspondence between Abbess and Archivist reveals the purpose of the work — Edification! It was to provide suitable reformatory reading for the community, especially for the novices. Although Dame Mary pleaded to write as an historian, this was refused her, and so, for example, the near riots which took place in the early days of the Brussels community were passed over in a single sentence, although Edmund Bishop had transcribed for Dame Mary the relevant papers in the British Museum.

It is, however, from the Pontoise Archives that we hold original seventeenth century MSS. We have Abbess Knatchbull of Ghent's History of the incredibly difficult Foundation at Bologne, her instructions to this new community, especially to the Superior, also Abbess Neville's Diary which contains information about the first two Foundations from Ghent, as well as early ceremonials, etc. There is a complete list of the Pontoise community, also their Annals compiled from original MSS., besides information concerning some of the families of the Pontoise nuns. Some of the above mentioned MSS. will be found printed in Vol. 17 of the Catholic Record Society. Ironically, we have greater knowledge of the Pontoise Community, its members and its doings, than we have of our own at Dunkirk. This is due to the sudden eviction and imprisonment of the Dunkirk nuns at the French Revolution. That we recovered more than the nuns could carry with them is due to the efforts of friends, especially of a Mrs Jarvis who, in the early nineteenth century scoured the Municipal Archives, the Dunkirk Library and other Offices, from which she recovered whatever she could, especially books and mortuary notices.

The ties between our monastery and the exiled Stuarts were strong, John Caryll, brother of Lady Mary Caryll, our first Abbess, being Secretary of State to James II in exile. One reminder of this, still in our possession, is the framed Promise of Prayers by the Community for James II, signed by Lady Mary Caryll and two councillors. (Unfortunately, the signatures on this document are so badly faded as to be almost illegible. This is due, not to the ravages of time, but to exposure to sunlight. From time immemorial, this treasured document had hung in the community workroom which, at Teignmouth, was a projection having windows on all sides except the north, thus trapping all the sun. I asked, unsuccessfully, for its removal; it was only when the workroom was redecorated that I laid my hands on it, taking it into custody while the work was being done. It was never returned.) The Dunkirk Annals were compiled by Dame Mary English, much of them culled from the reminiscences of the survivors, last of whom was Sister Winifred Tobin, who had entered the Dunkirk community in 1776, and who was one of those people — you get them in nearly every community — who have what might be described as a 'passion' for the history and customs of their House and who are only too ready to talk about them.

Things improved at Hammersmith where the community settled in 1795 the invitation of Bishop Douglass, Vicar Apostolic of the London District, who gave them the old 'Mary Ward' Convent, on condition that the nuns took care of the few remaining 'Ladies of the Former Establishment', as they were called. Entry, Chapter, Council and necrology books were kept, benefactors recorded and the Abbess's diaries punctiliously maintained. The Visitor's Book has interesting entries, for the monastery offered a couple of suites for visitors, and, while one was permanently occupied for many years by Lady Bedingfield who made the monastery her home whenever her duties as 'Supernumerary Woman of the Bedchamber' to Queen Adelaide brought her to Town, the other had a turn-over of guests. The entry that has always intrigued me reads: 'Mrs Baboon and her Chinese Maid'! From School Reports and from the children's Oblations we have a record of the pupils in the school, while letters from the Vicars Apostolic of the London District deal with both community and parochial matters, for during the first half of the nineteenth century the convent chapel served as the Parish Church, and as there were comparatively few churches then in London, major functions were often performed there. Of one such there is a full description, plus illustrations in Abbess Selby's diary — the bestowing of the Pallium on Archbishop Ferdinand English, brother of Dame Mary, by Cardinal Wiseman, whose train on that occasion was carried by a future cardinal — the young train-bearer's name was Gasquet. Hammersmith was very much alive!

At Teignmouth, where the community moved in 1862/3, the archives suffered their ups-and-downs according to the knowledge or even the interests of the archivist. Undoubtedly, our greatest archivist was Dame Mary English, who spent most of her religious life (1836 - 1887), when not composing music, in gathering up the fragments, especially of Dunkirk, and in keeping the archives up to date. She was followed by Dame Justina Rumsey, another capable archivist, but when I took over in the 1960's, the archives were by no means in perfect order, owing to the fact that a previous archivist's great love was Parkminster where she had been born and which her father had, quite unknowingly, sold to the monks. With a 'new broom's' enthusiasm but with no specialised knowledge and with no one to advise me, I set about cleansing the archives of these Carthusian accretions — and of everything else I considered irrelevant. I often wonder, with a sinking feeling, what irreparable damage I did in my zeal. I have learned a lot since then! Fortunately, I can add a post-script here: only a fortnight ago I learned that some of the 'Carthusian accretions' had found their way to Parkminster where they have proved to be of archival interest to the community. A little balm to my conscience!

Though I have done some research and endeavoured keep the archives up to date, there are past lacunae which I have been unable to fill. Perhaps the most important of these is Abbess Margaret Florin's Diary. Unfortunately, this Abbess was no diarist and her good resolutions to maintain a diary petered out after eighteen months, so for the thirty-five years from 1892 to 1927 the day-today community events went unrecorded by her. There is correspondence I have not yet examined, but I fear that important letters and documents have been either lost or destroyed. I still have to complete the Teignmouth archives with an account of the closure, while I continue to answer enquiries from people interested in our history or in search of material relating to their ancestors.

Preparing to transfer the Archives from Teignmouth to Buckfast was not as simple as it sounds. The Teignmouth archives were not all in one place or in one person's keeping. The archivist held the main archives but the Abbess held her own, so did the procurator. It would have been time-consuming but relatively simple to co-ordinate these separate deposits had care of the archives been my only, or even my chief, concern, but it was not. By this time I was superior while retaining the duties of sacristan. Add to the daily running of these offices the whole business of closure which only those who have experienced it can fully appreciate. This included such things as: drawing up documents for Rome, being primed on Canon and Civil Law; endless conducting of auctioneers round the monastery (we dealt with two firms who sometimes wanted the same article!); and, while I had an invaluable bursar and willing helpers, I had to superintend the disposal of over 200 years' accumulation stored from cellar to attics, besides making sure that each member of the community had what she needed before going to her new home. Then, of course, correspondence and telephone-calls multiplied. Much could be added, but this will suffice to show under what difficulties a poor archivist may have to labour when the time comes for transferring his or her archives from one place to another and that under such pressure mistakes are likely to be made.

At Teignmouth the main archives were in reasonably good order. Although I had some acquaintance with the Abbess's archives I had had no previous access to the personal papers of the living or to those of the more recently deceased members of the community. These archives had to be perused and sorted in order to co-ordinate them with the main archives. A friend who nurses at the Orthopaedic Hospital in Exeter provided us with innumerable boxes and cartons of every size and shape, so I was able to list, pack, number and label everything prior to transport. I also acquired two more cupboards and a table of reasonable size from vacated rooms, much to the chagrin of one of the auctioneers!

So, there were the archives all boxed and ready for transport; I heaved a sigh of relief! Now I could cross archives off my list of worries! Then, one day the bursar called me to examine the contents of the walk-in safe in the cellar. There, by the dim light of a torch, I was confronted with a collection of ancient tin trunks piled one on top of the other and which we had to struggle to lift and move. These appeared to contain 125 years of bills, receipts and other items of the bursar's stock-in-trade. Now, I have to confess that my earlier relief was my undoing, I felt I could not start again or cope with the amount of work involved this new find, for time was running out. Fortunately, I did not altogether abandon this hoard, for the first trunk I opened contained Archbishop Goodier's own manuscript of The Public Life of our Lord Jesus Christ which he wrote, among other works, while he was chaplain to the Teignmouth community, and from which one of the nuns had typed the work for publication. Later, I came across the Archbishop's Spiritual Journal. These MSS. I offered to Father Holt, SJ, the archivist of the English Province of the Society, who readily accepted them.

The Teignmouth archives duly arrived at Buckfast and, in time, were unpacked and stored. Later, I learned that several of the neglected tin trunks had turned up in the loft above the Tonic Wine Department! On investigation, I found, that they contained music, bills and receipts, deeds and farm ledgers. Of music I retained only the compositions by members of the community, such as "A Mass in Four Parts" by Dame Mary English, also music for liturgical and paraliturgical functions which would be of period interest and, in some cases, demonstrate the high standard of the nuns' choir. As storage space is limited, I reduced the bills and receipts but retained the rest.

This is the present situation. But is it final? I ask this question because our community at Buckfast is experimental for three years, and though I hope the further question will not arise we must look at it squarely; What would happen to the Teignmouth archives should our hopes be unfulfilled? I do not know. By the end of this year (1990) we will be on surer ground. Another issue must be faced, especially by me. Canonically, we are not a continuation of St Scholastica's Abbey but a new foundation, and those who come after us cannot be expected to have the same interest and enthusiasm for the Dunkirk-Hammersmith-Teignmouth community as we who have come from Teignmouth and have inherited its traditions. At best, the role of our future members can only be that of 'Caretaker' — an apt word because the archives have been to me a room that is lived in and where our sisters of the past come and go. Sometimes they stay for a while, and these I get to know more intimately. One day this room will be shrouded in dust-sheets and they will cease to come. This is a sad note to end on, so I will just say that today, the Teignmouth archives are still UNFINISHED BUSINESS.

Editorial note:

This is the text of a paper given at the annual Conference of the Society at Damascus House, Mill Hill, on 30 May 1990. Further details about the archives themselves will be found in Dame Mildred's previous article on 'The Archives of St Scholastica's Abbey, Teignmouth' in Catholic Archives, No. 4, 1984, pp. 31 - 35.

THE ARCHIVES OF THE ANGLO-SCOTTISH PROVINCE OF THE LITTLE SISTERS OF THE ASSUMPTION

Sister Margaret Lonergan LSA

From the beginning of the Congregation the care of archives has been held as a sacred trust. This heritage was valued even more after Vatican II, which gave new impetus to all orders to research their founders' charism in the light of today's world. The importance of archives was augmented by specific norms in our revised Rule.

When in 1983 I was appointed first archivist in the Province I was really fortunate in that I had the full support of the Provincial, the Secretariat and the Bursar. Having made a prior survey of the Congregation documents in our communities, I found this a most useful experience when planning ahead. I visited the communities and explained our archival policy; in this way fears were allayed and interest aroused.

I was able to adapt the Standard Archival Arrangement for Religious Congregations,² which is alphabetical/numerical in character, but using a more logical English approach, i.e. A 1 ... G 1 instead of 1 A ... 1 G, etc. I adopted colour coding at this stage, utilising seven colours for the wallets contained in the archive boxes, each colour then being repeated for the other letters in the alphabet. I found this to be a simple way of creating order when confronted by paper mountains, and offer it as a help for those of us who justifiably quail before them. Paradoxically, I found all this routine planning, arranging and familiarity with archival terminology immensely helpful when in 1988 I began the one academic year post-graduate course in Archive Studies at University College, London.

To understand the contents of the Province archives one needs to be acquainted with the history of our Congregation and works linked with it. The Little Sisters of the Assumption, a religious congregation of Pontifical right, was founded at Paris in 1865, by Fr Stephen (Etienne) Pernet, an Augustinian of the Assumption, and Antoinette Fage, in religion Mother Mary of Jesus.

FOUNDER

Fr Stephen Pernet (1824 - 1899), Augustinian of the Assumption, 'Pioneer of Social Work, Father of the sick and distressed, Champion of the working man and his family', was born at Velleuxon Haute-Saône, the eldest son of the village blacksmith, Claude Pernet, and his wife Madeleine, née Cordelet, the local midwife. As a young boy he felt a distinct call to the priesthood, but he was to achieve his calling by a very circuitous route.³ In May 1849 he met (Blessed) Eugenie Milleret de Brou, Foundress of the Assumption Sisters, who discerned in him a religious vocation. She introduced him to Fr Emmanuel D'Alzon, then founding his order of the Augustinians of the Assumption,⁴ of La Bonne Presse and 'la Croix' fame. Having made his first profession in 1850,

FR STEPHEN (ETIENNE) PERNET, AA,
(1824-1899), FOUNDER OF
THE LITTLE SISTERS OF THE ASSUMPTION

Stephen was finally ordained on 3 April 1858. Although engaged in education for fourteen years, in his priestly work Fr Pernet witnessed great distress in families as a result of illness, particularly in poor and working class families:⁵

'There were things to be done for these families which neither the husband nor the priest could do or say, ... besides I was thinking of others workers elsewhere.'⁶

Never a man to rush decisions, he waited many years for discernment, until in January 1864, whilst celebrating Mass, he received supernatural enlightenment about the nature of the Congregation he would found. He gathered a group of women willing to care for the sick gratuitously, irrespective of religion and race. In May 1864, providentially, he found the ideal leader of the group in Antoinette Fage.

CO-FOUNDER

Antoinette Fage, Mother Mary of Jesus (1824 - 1883), was born in Paris on 7 November 1824, to a dressmaker and a soldier who deserted his wife before the birth of her child. At the age of twelve she developed Pott's Disease, which left her with a curvature of the spine and always in pain; at fourteen she was orphaned. Antoinette's personal suffering made her sensitive to those of others. At her first meeting with Fr Pernet she was in charge of an orphanage for young girls, by whom she was greatly loved. Highly intelligent, she possessed the wisdom, natural and spiritual qualities needed in a co-founder. At the Convent of the Assumption, Auteuil, she was given training to form her both for the religious life and as co-founder. She was visited by Fr Pernet, and together they drew up the first Rule. The primary purpose of the Congregation was to provide a means of union with God and personal holiness and consecration through the vows, its secondary aim being service to families through nursing care in the home. To achieve this they devised a very balanced life through the 'three eights': eight hours of prayer and community life, eight hours of work, and eight hours of sleep. The contemplative dimension, necessary for those engaged in many activities, was epitomised by the secondary motto: 'soul of a Carmelite, heart of an apostle'. On-going training of the Sisters in doctrinal, biblical and professional spheres was foreseen from the beginning. In July 1875 they received papal approbation, and in 1896 the Laudatif Brief from Leo XIII.

NEW INITIATIVES AND EXPANSION

Fr Pernet's founding genius lay not so much in providing nurses for working class families, but in the way he was to anticipate the health and social services. The role of the Little Sister of the Assumption in the home was to combine what are now the professions of District Nurse, Health Visitor and Home Help with long-term follow-up in families; in short, not simply a nurse but also a counsellor and friend.

Fr Pernet sought to extend the work by other means. In 1876 he joyfully accepted the help of society ladies as Lady Servants of the Poor, not as ladies of charity, but as helpers of the Sisters doing humble chores in families without ever revealing their identity, and became involved in the spread of the Congregation. Similarly, upper-class, professional, and business men, became associated with two organisations founded by Fr Pernet for mothers and fathers of families nursed by the Sisters: 'The Brothers of the Assumption' and the 'Daughters of St Monica'. Legal, medical, business, political or other expertise were shared one with another. By this means Fr Pernet sought to raise the standards of its members, and to bridge class distinctions. The Fraternity became a training-ground for leaders; and, as a result, bishops, priests, and laity became interested in the Congregation. Fr Pernet's favourite prayer 'My God, unite all minds in truth, and all hearts in charity' has been sung world-wide in seventeen languages.

The poverty and struggles of the early years when the Sisters had, according to Fr Pernet, 'only Providence in the cash-box' was followed by an influx of vocations, and support by benefactors as the Congregation became known. The archives of the Anglo-Scottish Province reflect this earlier period, but especially the period from 1880 when the first convent of the Congregation was opened in Scotland. Wales had its first community of Little Sisters in 1949 but it is linked to the Irish Province. From the first foundation in London in 1880, there are now thirty-four convents in the United Kingdom and Ireland, including two in Northern Ireland.

The Order is present in the following countries throughout the world: England, Ireland, Scotland, Wales, France, Belgium, Spain, Portugal, Italy, Sicily, Egypt, Algeria, Tunisia, Morocco, Ethiopia, United States of America, Canada, Costa Rica, Colombia, Venezuela, Peru, Chile, Bolivia, Argentina, Brazil, Uruguay, Lebanon (now closed), and New Zealand.

HISTORY OF THE ANGLO-SCOTTISH PROVINCE.

In Paris where he was a popular confessor and sought-after director, Fr Pernet met many English society ladies who requested a foundation in England. Notable among these were Lucy Claxton, Marchioness de Salvo, the niece of Cardinal Manning; the Duchess of Fitzjames, French by birth but married to an Englishman; and Lady Georgiana Fullerton. He had also met some English Sisters of the Assumption, and several young Englishwomen who had gone to Paris as schoolmistresses or governesses. In England, Minna, Duchess of Norfolk, Elizabeth, 4th Duchess of Londonderry, Lady Georgiana, Mrs Vaughan and her sister Miss Moore, and Lady Blount together ensured a foundation in England, Cardinal Manning's niece being the prime mover. Letters from Cardinal Manning to her, and to Fr Pernet indicate his pleasure at the coming of the Sisters to the Archdiocese. Political events in France hastened their arrival.

The First English Foundation, Bow, London

Two Sisters arrived in England on 19 June 1880: Sr Mary St John, a Londoner by birth, and Sr Augustin a French Sister. They were graciously received by the Sisters of the Assumption, Kensington Square. Four more Sisters arrived later and were accommodated at St Vincent's Orphanage, followed by Fr Pernet, who joined them in their search for a house. He had a pleasant meeting with Cardinal Manning, whom he had met at the Vatican Council, where Fr Pernet, then Assistant General, was adviser to Fr D'Alzon. There was an immediate rapport between these men, both passionately interested in the plight of the working man and his family. It was agreed that they would concentrate their search for a location for the new Convent in the East End of London where poverty abounded. Describing this visit to Archbishop's House, the Founder wrote:

Cardinal Manning received us like a father. He has blessed our Sisters often and so kindly. His last words to me were 'Come to me or my Vicar General as often as you like.' I have all possible faculties in his diocese; he himself gave them to me when I merely asked continue saying Mass.⁷

This friendship was to continue during the lifetime of the Cardinal. Fr Pernet never failed to visit him during his annual visits to London.

Fr Pernet took time off to visit the relative of a Sister in Birmingham. He went to see Bishop Ullathorne at St Chad's Cathedral and then to the Birmingham Oratory where he received much encouragement from Cardinal Newman. Having returned to London, he described in another letter to Mother Mary of Jesus his purchases.

I took the opportunity of my visit to Birmingham to furnish our little chapel in Bow. For £16. 11. 0. I bought a silver-gilt chalice, a silver ciborium, a beautiful large monstrance silver bronze, four candlesticks for the altar, two smaller ones, a hanging lamp for the Blessed Sacrament, a beautiful altar cross and a thurible and boat. All we want now is a house. Already I am arranging to have an altar made. The price is moderate, very moderate — £2. It is a simple wooden altar.⁸

This letter caused excitement at the mother-house, both because the London foundation was obviously well on its way, and because the bursar there, amazed at what Fr Pernet had bought for such a small sum, asked for permission to do her shopping in Birmingham. A letter from the Founder on 7 August revealed: 'God be praised! We have a house! No. 111 Bow Road. I shall say Mass in the little oratory on the 11th, after having blessed the house.'

The Sisters began nursing in families of all faiths, and were greatly appreciated by people in the locality, a Protestant Minister even preached to his congregation on the untiring devotedness of the Sisters in the day and night nursing: some of his parishioners approved, although others were indignant. By 1883 a larger house was needed in Bow, the Convent moved to 14 Wellington Road, Bow, where they remained until bombed in 1940.

It is clear from the archives that for some time the Sisters were known as Nursing Sisters of the Poor; rather than by their religious name to distinguish them from the Sisters of the Assumption, Kensington Square, with whom the first Sisters stayed. As usual, they did not limit their nursing to their immediate neighbourhood. In 1896, in an appeal for help with the purchase the freehold of 14 Wellington Road, Bow it is stated

It is admirably suited for the work, being surrounded on all sides by poor districts, from it they nurse cases in Whitechapel, Poplar, Tower Hill, Limehouse, Upton, Mile End, Hackney, Stratford, etc.

That they were successful was due, in some measure, to testimonials from local doctors, and substantial donations from London Livery Companies.

Archival material records the history of the Bow community from 1880 until it was bombed in 1940. Much of this information is in the bound volumes of Congregation history Home-made Bread, published fortnightly, and sent around the world to all the communities; and is supplemented by Provincial newsletters and house journals, correspondence, etc. The Tablet of September 1930 recounts the Golden Jubilee celebrations of the Sisters, presided over by Cardinal Bourne. Community journals provide graphic descriptions of the wartime bombing of the Convent in the 1939-1945 war, obliging them to move to Hackney (1940-1944), until a larger more suitable convent was opened at Stamford Hill (1944-1958). In 1980, some fortuitous circumstances led me to discover some of our archives lost in the bombing at Bow in a record office; rescued it seems in wartime on behalf of the Historical Manuscripts Commission, an incident which has increased my respect for the present holdings.

Present and Former Communities in England and Scotland

In 1886 a convent was founded at 'Notting Hill' at 41 and 42 St James Gardens, present Harrison Homes. The Sisters moved to 133 Lancaster Road in 1902. In listing the location of present or former communities, one is conscious of the interest of each history, but only summary details can be given:

None of the charitable work in which the Congregation is engaged would be possible without the generosity of our benefactors. The Royal Family has long been associated with it, including the Queen and other members today; as well as countless other benefactors who have given so generously down the years.

The Causes for the Canonisation of Fr Pernet and Mother Mary of Jesus are proceeding. When, as part of the process, Fr Pernet's body was exhumed in 1935, thirty six years after his death, and that of the co-Foundress in 1937, fifty-four years after her death, both were found to be incorrupt. Pope John Paul II declared in 1985 that Fr Pernet had practised charity to an heroic degree. We look forward to the day, when he, who came annually to England for eighteen years until his death in 1899, may be declared a Saint.

THE ARCHIVES AND THEIR POTENTIAL FOR RESEARCH

The Archives are contained in two rooms, one a muniment room, the other an airy office which doubles as search room and holds a small 'back-up' reference library. The conditions are not ideal, however, and a transfer would be possible, since all the archives are boxed.

The archives contain and elucidate not only our Congregation's history in England, but also much that is incidental to it and the people and places who shared these 110 years. Historians researching religious life in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries would find ready-made themes for investigation: the combination of a semi-monastic spirituality and dedicated service to families, particularly during illness, the evident emancipation of the Sisters in Victorian England, trusted to go alone to families, the fidelity of the Congregation to its founding charism, its option for the poorest - a service which transcends all racial and religious divisions, as relevant today as in 1865.

Social Historians would appreciate the needs for such work, given the Dickensian conditions and social evils of the time, its ecumenical and gratuitous nature, and the support offered families on a long-term basis through self-help groups such as the Fraternity and its female counterpart. The advent of the National Health Service, advances in modern medicine and population trends to new housing estates influenced the manner in which the Congregation adapted to modern life, altered customs, used more psychology, welcomed new transport when, as the 'Scooter Nuns', they hastened in more modern apparel to needy areas. The problems of inner-city life reversed this trend to outlying districts as one-parent families, the elderly and the bereaved claimed attention.

Medical historians could find topics for research in almost a century of registers, in which one can establish disease patterns in a large area of West London. The incidence of epidemics such as typhoid fever, diphtheria, tuberculosis, are recorded, as well as the more prosaic, but none-the less significant, illnesses before the days of antibiotics, e.g. Spanish Flu of 1917-1918 and the dreaded pneumonia. Of interest too, is the course of each illness, and the time spent by the Sisters in day and night nursing. In all these matters confidentiality is safeguarded, and our archival policy operates.

Archival material has been used for Congregation research, jubilees, parish histories, to mount local history displays, for post-graduate research, family history enquiries etc. Although the archives are private, bona fide researchers are assured that enquiries are welcomed, and that acquaintance with some of the contents of our small archive of 400 boxes can be an enriching experience. Enquiries should be addressed, by letter please, to Sr Margaret Lonergan, Provincial Archivist, Little Sisters of the Assumption, Provincial House, 52 Kenneth Crescent, London, NW2 4PN.

THE ARCHIVES OF THE MISSIONARY SISTERS OF THE HOLY ROSARY

Sister Cora Richardson MSHR

At the outset I would like to say how much I enjoyed researching this short account. It gave me new insight into how far ahead of his time our founder, Bishop Joseph Shanahan CSSp was.

Back in the 1920's he believed that lay people, and women at that!, could be 'foreign missionaries'; and that lay men, women and even children could be missionaries in their own country. He was convinced that the love of God flows from the Father, through the Son made man, through the person united to Christ in the Spirit, into the hearts of others to give them divine life. We are blessed to have about 400 of his letters in our Archives, and they form part of a Special Collection, the Bishop Shanahan Collection, to which I will refer later. There is a second Special Collection dealing with the revision of the constitutions from 1966-1987 when they were finally approved. Apart from these two Special Collections there are eight Archival Collections, mainly following a chronological sequence, marking the growth and development of our congregation.

In our congregation it is the Secretary General who is the Archivist. This has advantages and disadvantages. Some of the advantages are that the secretary general is the person who gets the archival material from our various convents throughout the world, and, as she is usually the person who uses that material more than anyone else, ease of access to it is most helpful. A big disadvantage is that the secretary general is so busy with the day-to-day work, that she has little time left for organising the Archives. Ideally, the person responsible for Archives should be full-time on the job, perhaps an older sister who has a feel for this work and gets proper training, if there is not a permanent qualified archivist, lay or religious.

Last year I took over as secretary general from Sister Miriam, who had held the post for seventeen years, and who therefore had everything at her fingertips. I was quite 'green' as regards methodology, but having taken an honours history degree in my wild youth, had some idea of the value and importance of archives. Miriam had done a wonderful job in sorting, listing and arranging a wealth of archival material. Indeed, she had put the archives on their feet, and given them a good start, though, as she said, 'they have a long way to go'.

The first Collection of Archives, containing thirty-three items, covers the years immediately preceding the foundation of the Missionary Sisters of the Holy Rosary. Our congregation was founded in 1924, primarily to help the women of Nigeria. Brothers and priests were bringing the good news of the living love of God in Christ to Nigerian men and boys through education, and Bishop Shanahan realized the women were being neglected, and that without Christian women there would not be Christian families. Having tried in vain to get sisters to go to Nigeria, he brought out six dedicated lay women to Calabar between 1921 and 1922. Two of these, Agnes Ryan and Elizabeth Ryan - no relation - became founding members of MSHR, and a third, Marie Martin, founded the Medical Missionaries of Mary. The idea of lay missionaries was a daring initiative in the Catholic Church at the time. (There were Protestant lay missionaries). However it soon became clear that a more stable structure was needed for continuity, as some of the women got ill and had to return to Ireland. In consultation with a few friends, Bishop Shanahan made two or three drafts of a rule of life for a missionary congregation of women. One of these, written in his own hand and signed by him on 5 August 1922, is part of the first Collection. It is six pages long and is headed:

FERVOUR · CHARITY · SACRIFICE

Temporary rules and Regulations for
The Missionary Sisters
St Joseph's Convent, Calabar.

It shows just how far ahead of his time he was as regards adapting to a new culture, for example,

The Sisters will have to spend their first year in Nigeria in getting themselves fit for their great role. They must study themselves (sic); the people: especially the women and girls; the children; the climate. They should also get a working idea of the language ...

Other important items in the first Collection are a copy of Bishop Shanahan's letter to Bishop Finegan of Kilmore on 15 October 1923, requesting the admission of the Missionary Sisterhood to his diocese; Bishop Shanahan's letter to the Dominican Prioress General, Mother Colmcille, on 16 November 1923, asking that her sisters would undertake the formation of the new sisterhood; the conference he gave at the Cabra Dominican Convent, Dublin, on 17 November 1923, to the brave women who were willing to join new congregation, as well as talks given to them by the well-known Spiritual Director, Edward Leen CSSp. In fact, the Dominicans agreed to train the sisters, Bishop Finegan gave permission for the congregation to be erected in his diocese, and the glorious, if risky, venture began when seven aspirants entered Killeshandra, Co. Cavan, on 7 March 1924.

Collection Two has 324 items covering the foundation decade 1924-1934, in which year the first General Council was appointed, with Mother Augustine Cahill as the first Superior General. This collection has copies of a number of Bishop Shanahan's letters for the sake of completeness, as well as originals and copies of letters from Bishop Finegan, for example, a copy of his letter to the Holy See seeking permission to erect the new congregation in his diocese, and the resulting permission to do so. There is a cutting from an unidentified newspaper dated 4 May 1924, of a letter from Father E. Leen, requesting a sanctuary lamp, a chalice, and a set of branch candlesticks, for the chapel of the new convent in Killeshandra, and another, dated 25 May 1924, expressing gratitude to the anonymous donors of all three. When time permits I hope to check out which newspaper carried the letters. The Account Sheets from the Ulster Bank, 1924-1934, in the archives show how times have changed - the motherhouse and land at Killeshandra were acquired for £5,000, though the asking price was £5,500. His letters reveal that Bishop Shanahan had begged for the lowest price as he had very little money. At the end of 1924 the balance in the bank was £97. 2s. 3d., while the loan of £5,000 to purchase the property had still to be paid off! Newspaper cuttings of missionary articles and appeals on behalf of the congregation by Father Pat Whitney explain how we gradually became financially viable. Father Whitney, a diocesan priest, had been invited with others to Nigeria by Bishop Shanahan in 1920, and in 1923 asked by him to return to Ireland to raise funds for the proposed congregation. He later founded the St Patrick's Society, Kiltegan, to provide priests for the Missions.

Also in Collection Two are the precious diaries of the first Novice Directress, Mother Aquinas, OP and two moving letters she wrote in 1934 to Sister M. Brigid Ryan, - the Elizabeth who had gone out to Calabar in 1922 - one on how to be her 'real, beautiful self', and the other describing how unutterably lonely Mother Aquinas felt on leaving Killeshandra. The Minute books of the Council in Killeshandra 1924-1934, and of Onitsha Convent, our first house in Nigeria 1928-1934, as well as the early annals of both convents, provide us with a history of the day-to-day life of the sisters and of those whose lives they touched. A record of those invited to profession ceremonies in Killeshandra features mainly bishops and priests!

The Third Collection departs from the chronological order and contains the Sacred Returns 1920-1924, and the Statistics of the Vicariate Apostolic of Southern Nigeria 1885-1925. It shows the results of forty years of work, with a commentary by Bishop Shanahan on the last five years, and on the future prospects. The Fourth Collection is the Artefact Collection, listed and arranged alpha-numerically in 1982. It includes the carved oak table on which Bishop Shanahan said the first Mass in Killeshandra in 1924; the map of Nigeria which he brought to Pope Pius X in 1913; several films including the blessing of the foundation stone of Killeshandra Chapel 1949, the burial of Bishop Shanahan, and 'Out of the Darkness'; and the handwritten notes of a retreat given by Father E. Leen, later published in book form.

The eight years 1934-1942 are covered in the Fifth Collection. In the latter year the first General Chapter of the Congregation was held, and Mother M. Brigid Ryan was elected Superior General. One of the main items in the collection comprises the correspondence of Bishop C. Heerey, CSSp, Vicar Apostolic of Onitsha-Owerri, who succeeded Bishop Shanahan in 1932, when the latter resigned owing to failing eyesight and declining health. We have more than a 100 of his letters to the Superior General on all sorts of matters ranging from constitutions, buildings, finance, an African Sisterhood, his nearly being struck by a thunderbolt, the German priests and brothers having to leave Nigeria 1940, to remarks on the relations between the sisters and the priests.

Collections Six and Eight are items that came directly from the Motherhouse when we were moving into smaller accommodation. Collection Six consists of forty-one items received in 1982 when the sale of Killeshandra was being negotiated. It includes the novitiate annals dating from 1928, and the Book of Formularies used from 7 March 1924 to 1938, which has a statement by each postulant, beginning with the first seven, that she would 'go quietly' if asked to leave, and 'not seek compensation for any work performed' during her stay! We finally left Killeshandra in 1985, and the sixty-one items transferred to the Archives in that year, form the Eighth Collection. The complete minutes of the local council meetings 1934-1985 make up one item in this collection.

Collection Seven is the Photograph Collection which has four main divisions: the Motherhouse, the Generalate, the Regions, and Miscellanea. There are many hundreds of photographs in boxes still to be catalogued. We are fortunate to have photos of all the main characters connected with our foundation, and to have albums of photos of the 'Early Days in Nigeria', and 'South Africa', which was our second 'foreign mission', undertaken as World War II broke out. A few photos show Bishop Shanahan visiting the Holy Rosary Sisters there in 1940. Father Sean Farragher CSSp recently discovered photos of Bishop Shanahan as a nineteen year-old student, in some group photographs, in a Holy Spirit

College in France. The firm set of his jaw hints at the strong character of the young man who would become one of the greatest missionaries of the twentieth century. These photos have yet to be catalogued but will probably go into the Special Collection No. 1, known as the Bishop Shanahan Collection.

BISHOP JOSEPH SHANAHAN, CSSp,
(1871-1943) FOUNDER OF
THE HOLY ROSARY SISTERS

Not surprisingly, the Bishop Shanahan Collection is my favourite collection. His letters, most of which were handwritten, have been typed out, and many of them were edited by Sister M. Brigid (Elizabeth Ryan) under the title Bishop Shanahan and his Missionary Family. Volume I was published in 1967 and volume II in 1978. These precious writings reveal his warm humanity and deep spirituality. He wrote to sympathise with Sister M. Therese (Agnes Ryan), who though bitterly disappointed that she was not chosen to go to Nigeria with the first Holy Rosary Sisters in 1927, willingly accepted this in a spirit of obedience: 'How happy I feel now that you see this in the light of Divine Grace that floods your soul.' Writing long after the event to Sister M. Catherine O'Carroll, of the day the Pope told him to start the Holy Rosary Congregation, he says:

From that moment I carried you, living now as God's consecrated spouses, in my soul, conscious that I was united to each of you by a special bond of spiritual paternity. Hence my profound spiritual love for each of you, and for the whole Congregation.

Some of his ideas are startlingly modern, showing he was aware of and had accepted the feminine side of himself, his anima, without of course using that language.

In addition to his letters, the Collection has considerable documentation in the form of biographical material, articles, booklets, memoirs, personal manuscripts, newspaper cuttings, photographs and artefacts. The biographical material includes the original manuscript of the popular book Bishop Shanahan of Southern Nigeria, by John Jordan CSSp (1949), and several published booklets, for example, X. Carty, Bishop Shanahan; T. Geoghegan CSSp, Missionary Spirituality of Bishop Shanahan; and M. Cahill CSSp, I know a Man in Christ, as well as various missionary magazines and a large number of unpublished memoirs and tape recordings.

A real treasure is what today we would call his journal, personal notebooks giving his struggle against sin, his growing intimacy with our Lord, his deep relationship with Mary, ('my good Mother'). which is a source of his great reverence for all women. He told Sister M. Philomemena Fox that 'A man is only truly a man when he respects a woman'. We also have notes of talks he gave, for example, to the Carmelite Sisters in Nairobi, towards the end of his life, of conferences, retreats and homilies, including the sermon he preached at a reception in Killeshandra in August 1926. He often wrote personal comments on the pages of his books, and those preserved include his breviaries, Bible, New Testament, 'Evangile selon S. Marc', the 'Imitation of Christ', and 'Meditation for lay folk' by Jarrett. Among the interesting memorabilia in the Collection are the crucifix presented to him by the Pope, St Pius X, 1913, his chalice, rosary beads, episcopal seal, pectoral cross, walking stick, spectacles, watch, and the knotted rope he used as a discipline. All of which serves to bring him very close to us today and to keep his inspiration alive in our congregation. Indeed, I have learnt that Archives build unity, commitment and true pride while keeping a congregation humble and faithful to its charism.

Thanks to Sister Miriam we have reached the stage where much of our archival material is sufficiently organised to enable it to be used by others. Because we are a comparatively new congregation we have to be selective of material made available to bona fide researchers. It is not advisable to let material be used that is not sorted and listed, and one of the first group of sisters to be professed is still living. In a renewal course for our own sisters in 1988, two days were given over to telling 'our story', the story of the congregation since it was founded, illustrated with original documents, photos, newscuttings, extracts from magazines, and interesting artefacts. The novitiate programme included a day in the archives to give the novices a bird's eye view of how it all began, and an appreciation of the tradition into which they are being inserted. A Franciscan Sister who is writing a thesis on 'Irish Religious Women in the Twentieth Century Church' used our Archives almost daily for a few weeks, while a priest writing a book on the 'Irish Missionary Movement' also made use of them. The person who has made most use of them is Father Des Forristal who at our request wrote the masterful book The Second Burial of Bishop Shanahan, which was published by Veritas in May 1990.

If any reader has letters or documents relevant to our Congregation, I would be grateful to receive them. The archives are preserved at the Generalate House, 23 Cross Avenue, Blackrock, Co. Dublin, and enquiries should be addressed to the Archivist.

THE PARISH ARCHIVES OF ALL SOULS CHURCH, PETERBOROUGH

Peter Waszak

Although All Souls Church in Park Road, Peterborough, is the mother church in the city opening in 1896, the Catholic Peterborough Mission dates back to the 1840's. Fr Seed, the first resident Catholic Priest in the city since the Reformation, arrived in January 1848. No record survives of the activities of local Catholics in penal days—Peterborough was a strongly Protestant Cathedral city. The return of the Faith was via the Kings Cliffe Riding Mission, Kings Cliffe, a small village in north Northamptonshire about twelve miles west of Peterborough.¹ In September 1850 with the Restoration of the Hierarchy, Peterborough, which had been in the Eastern District, now became part of the Diocese of Northampton. In 1976 Peterborough became part of the new Diocese of East Anglia.

In the summer of 1973 in between finishing GCE 'A' levels and starting a degree course, the writer was introduced to the church archives by the then parish priest, Fr Wace. Over the years various short articles on the history of the parish appeared in Deanery and Diocesan publications and in 1984 a booklet on the history of the Roman Catholic Schools in Peterborough appeared.² Research was hampered by the Archives being scattered throughout the presbytery, no person having a clear idea of their contents. The writer at one point made the unfortunate mistake of remarking to the present parish priest, Mgr Paul Hypher, that the archives needed proper organisation. His immediate reply was 'Yes! when do you want to start?'

The first task was to search the large Victorian presbytery and church from top to bottom. Much shifting of heavy furniture was necessary to gain access to corner cupboards and open bottom drawers. Numerous spiders were evicted from dark corners, some of which were candidates for the Guinness Book of Records! The cupboard under the stairs and a room in the sub-attic revealed many interesting but very dusty boxes. An old safe was discovered—locked with no key—which no parishioner could remember ever being opened. The idea of advertising in the church bulletin for an experienced safe breaker was rejected!! Mgr Paul eventually had the safe opened—he's not revealing how! Unfortunately its contents were not significant.

As the presbytery is very busy and space at a premium, the next problem was how to bring everything together so that one could sort through the papers and produce a draft catalogue. I discovered that the only day the parish office was free was the day after Boxing Day when priests and staff were recovering from Christmas! The 27 December 1988 was spent spreading the archives all over the office tables, chairs and floor and sorting the items into major categories, for example, Registers, Holy Family, All Souls, Schools, etc. These were then placed into boxes and stored in wall cupboards high up in the office wall. By the end of the day I left looking like a coalminer and the resultant mess took some clearing up. Over the next few months I was able to take down a box at a time and list its contents.

It became apparent that Fr Dudley Cary Elwes, who arrived as curate in 1896 and was parish priest between 1910 and 1921 when he left upon his appointment as Bishop of Northampton (1921-1932), had taken an interest in the archives. It was he who started the Mission Log Book and who interviewed old catholics about the early days of the Mission in the city. He placed papers in old envelopes, a blue pencil note recording their contents.³

SURVEY OF THE ARCHIVES

The oldest surviving item is the Kings Cliffe Baptism Register commenced by Dr B. O'Brien in 1793 and continued by his successor, Fr Hayes, until his death and subsequent closure of the Mission in 1855. It is particularly revealing about the wide area of Northants, Hunts, Rutland and Lincs covered by the Riding Mission. Very little is known about the Mission itself as after the death of Fr Hayes all his papers were destroyed by Fr Thomas O'Connor of Stamford who felt they were of no interest.

Following the arrival of Fr Seed to the Peterborough Mission, the Baptism Register was started in 1848, Confirmations in 1852, and Marriages and Deaths in 1859. Some material survives about the building of the Holy Family Chapel opened in 1856. The Mission Account Book (1849-1859) reveals the desperate poverty of the Mission, while the Liber Parochialis contains visitation details, general statistics, names of parishioners, etc.

Most of the pre-First World War material was generated in the time when Fr William Moser was Parish Priest (1874-1910). A Notice Book was started in 1874. (Apart from an unfortunate gap between 1896 and 1924, a complete run exists until 1972.) Fr Moser was responsible for the building of All Souls Church. Papers survive relating to the Land Purchase, Architects Drawings, Building Contract (dated 18 October 1895), photographs, newscuttings, benefactors, etc. The oldest All Souls Account Book is for 1895-1904. Fr Moser was also responsible for building All Souls School in Manor House Street, opened in 1893. Although the school logbook for 1893-1940 is lost, the Managers Minute Book 1903-1964 survives, along with a variety of papers, plans, accounts, etc. Fr Moser introduced the Sisters of Charity of SVP to Peterborough, the sisters taking over responsibility for the school. Correspondence with Provisional House in London dates back to 1900.

Probably the most interesting item in the archives is the All Souls Mission Log Book, three volumes which date from 1896 to 1921. They are an invaluable day to day record of parish life containing numerous newscuttings, photographs, letters, concert programmes, etc. Further, they are of particular importance to anyone interested in the impact of the First World War on a local catholic community. In addition the Belgium Refugee School Minute Books survive for 1917-1919.

During the 1920's and 1930's two further parish priests, Fr Louis Allan (1921-1931) and Fr Rudderham (1931-1943), later Bishop of Clifton, added further papers to the archives. An unsuccessful attempt to resume the Mission Log was made in 1934 but only lasted a month. In addition to papers on the church and the school, there are papers relating to the purchase of land and construction of the Elwes Hall, the parish hall opened in 1934 and considered the best such facility in the city.

The impact of the Second World War can be traced in the archives through various Local Government Directives and the Bishop's pastoral letters and Ad Clerum. The arrival of the USAF in the region can be traced through the Banns of Marriage!

The Post War years were a period of great activity. Three parish priests Canon Wainwright (1943-1955), Fr Paul Taylor (1955-1968) and Fr Harry Wace (1968-1977) added a large amount of material to the archives. Fr Taylor kept a log book during the whole of his time in Peterborough. In the 1950's and early 1960's and not without considerable effort, two new churches were built, St Oswald's in Walton (papers related to land purchase date back to before the First World War) and Our Lady of Lourdes in Dogsthorpe. A large volume of papers survive relating to the construction and running of two new catholic schools, St John Fisher Secondary School and St Thomas More Primary School.

In the 1960's Peterborough was designated a New Town. This and the consequences of Vatican II were a major influence while Fr Harry Wace was parish priest. Again a large amount of material has found its way into the archives. To give just one example we have the Peterborough Churches Joint Expansion Committee Minutes and Papers c 1968-1975.

Fr Paul Hypher arrived as Parish Priest in May 1977. He has indicated that at some point he would like his non-current files moving into the archives. However, there is a problem - space. In his thirteen years in Peterborough so much paperwork has been generated that the weight of the filing cabinets in his first floor study has bowed down the centre of the floor. As some of the existing archives are kept on the ground floor there is a danger that Mgr Paul's files may soon be joining the archives but via an unauthorised route! I have recently been talking with Fr Dolan about a 'weeding policy', as the volume of recent papers exceeds everything that appeared in the last 130 years.

Anyone with a genuine interest in the archives should in the first place write to Mgr Paul Hypher, St Peter and All Souls Church, Geneva Street, Peterborough, PE1 2RS, clearly indicating the nature of the enquiry.

SUMMARY LIST OF THE ARCHIVES OF ALL SOULS CHURCH, PETERBOROUGH

ROGER BEDE VAUGHAN OSB, ARCHBISHOP OF SYDNEY: SOME PRIVATE PAPERS

Frank Carleton

Roger Bede Vaughan OSB (1834-1883) was the second Archbishop of Sydney and the second and last English Benedictine monk to hold that office. His brief, but active, archiepiscopate lasted a little over six years (March 1877 - August 1883). It had been preceded by a four year coadjutorship, with the right of succession, to his predecessor John Bede Polding OSB (1794-1877). As coadjutor and then Archbishop, Vaughan's vital and decisive leadership put the Archdiocesan finances in healthy good order, advanced the building of the second St Mary's Cathedral and introduced a brace of religious orders to Sydney, chiefly for teaching purposes, the Irish Jesuits and Franciscans. Forthright and publicly articulate in the face of rising secularism in Colonial society and politics, he tackled the question of Christian education head on. His public stance and pastorals on education before and after the wholly secular New South Wales Public Instruction Act of 1880 provoked Parkes, the Colony's Premier, to brand him as 'seditious'.¹ Vigorous and effective in the education controversy, Vaughan also contrived to lay the teaching and administrative foundations of an independent Catholic education system on which his successors built.

Most unfortunately, only a fraction of Archbishop Vaughan's private and official papers survive in the Sydney Archdiocesan Archives at St Mary's Cathedral in Sydney - less than 300 pieces in toto. These were gathered together, sorted, arranged and described during the first six months of the New South Wales Bicentennial Archives Program in the first six months of 1987. The description was subsequently published, along with that of other archives of local Benedictine provenance, in Tjurunga, the journal of the Benedictine Union of Australia and New Zealand.²

The two-year Bicentennial Archives Program consisted of three unrelated archival projects (two for private and one for public archives) entitled: the 'Archives of St Mary's Cathedral' (i.e. the Sydney Archdiocesan Archives at St Mary's Cathedral, Sydney), the Archives of the Labor (sic) Movement' (actually the archives of the New South Wales Branch of the Australian Labour Party, chiefly from 1956), and the 'Archives of Local Government' (devoted to the preparation of a published general records disposal schedule for local councils in New South Wales).³ Each project received a grant of $100,000 from the New South Bicentennial Council and the management of the whole programme was committed to the Archives Authority of New South Wales, a public body whose statutory responsibility is for public archives.⁴

Archbishop Vaughan's surviving private papers consist of a mere thirty-four miscellaneous pieces and include:

Extracts of register entries for Vaughan's baptism and confirmation, 3 March 1858.

Attestation of Vaughan's studies in philosophy and theology at the Abbey of St Paul's-outside-the-Walls, Rome, 3 August 1859.

Document confirming Vaughan's election as Prior of St Michael's, Belmont, 21 July 1866.

Correspondence with Propaganda Fidei concerning Vaughan's appointment and consecration as Archbishop of Nazianzum and coadjutor to Polding (three pieces) 15 March - 24 April 1873.

Retreat notebooks, ca. 1866-1874. 2 vols.

Letters received from other members of the Vaughan family (six pieces), 24 October 1873 - 17 April 1882.

Letters soliciting contributions towards the building of St Mary's Cathedral, 9 March 1880 - 10 January 1882.⁵

The paucity of such surviving private papers, which provide merely random points d'appui for Vaughan's life, enhances the significance of books bearing evidence of his ownership or other association. A few of Vaughan's books are held in the rare books and special collections in the Veech Library at St Patrick's College, Manly,⁶ the seminary founded in 1889 by Vaughan's successor, Patrick Francis, Cardinal Moran. Those collections include the substantial remains of the Sydney Benedictine collection of nearly 6,000 titles. Following Vaughan's closure of the Benedictine St Mary's College, Lyndhurst, in 1877, the collection was transferred to St John's College at Sydney University, which had become Vaughan's residence after his election as rector in 1874.⁷

A long lost book of Vaughan's associated with his voyage from England to Australia in 1873, came to light in the Manly seminary in August 1990. It is the second edition of Father John Gerard's 'A relation of ye gunpowder treason'. The text was edited from the manuscript in the possession of the Stonyhurst College by Father John Morris SJ (1826-1893), who published several works of recusant history in Elizabethan and Jacobean times.⁸ The book includes 'The life of Father John Gerard', taken in part from the heroic Jesuit's Autobiography and may be summarily cited as follows: *The condition of Catholics under James I. Father Gerard's Narrative of the Gunpowder Plot. Edited with his Life by John Morris, Priest of the Society of Jesus, 2nd ed. London: Longmans, Green & Co., 1872. (cclxiv, 344 p.). The life of Father John Gerard, pp. (ix) - cclii.*⁹

Such a book given to him as a gift must have appealed to Vaughan who took pride in his recusant ancestry. He was the second son of the fourteen children of Lt. Colonel John Francis Vaughan of Courtfield, Ross, Herefordshire. The Vaughans were recusant gentry who had survived in possession of the Courtfield estate and were related to the Welds.¹⁰ Vaughan referred to his family history during his address to the laity at the large public meeting to welcome him upon his arrival in Sydney on 8 December 1873. His remarks probably signified more than a diplomatic sensitivity to the susceptibilities of the Irish majority in his audience:

...I may say this in allusion to one point — to my having sprung from a very old Catholic family — that we, the old Catholics of England who went through its persecuting days, with the rack and gibbet, can stretch out a hand across the water to those who live in the Island of Saints; ...¹¹

Father Gerard, who lived in those 'persecution days', was tortured in the Tower from which he escaped in October 1597. In May 1606 dressed in livery he left England with the suites of the ambassadors of Spain and Flanders to escape the search for him in the wake of the abortive Gunpowder Plot.¹²

The copy of the book lacks its spine and one board, the other being detached. But the text is complete and clean enough. The gift inscription, which is reproduced below, is written on the blank facing the titlepage. It is dated in the same hand at the head of the titlepage, 'Monday October 20th 1873'. In the inscription the donor, Thomas Arthur Joseph, fourth Viscount Southwell KP (1836-1878)¹³ evokes his own recusant background as a descendant of the Jesuit priest, poet and martyr, Father Robert Southwell, who suffered and died at Tyburn on 21 February 1595.¹⁴

In October 1873, the month of Viscount Southwell's valedictory gift, Vaughan had reached Rome en route to Australia. Presumably, the new coadjutor archbishop and the holder of an Irish peerage, both of old English Catholic ancestry met there. As Dom Norbert Birt relates, Vaughan had set out for Rome in September planning to travel to Australia by way of Egypt and the Red Sea. On the previous 19 March he had been consecrated as Archbishop of Nazianzum in partibus infidelium by Cardinal Manning at Liverpool. In July he attended the Fourth Provincial Synod of Westminster held at St Edmund's College, Old Hall.¹⁵ As the donor's inscription recalls he had preached in London in the month before.

Monday October 20th 1873

In April 1883 Roger Bede Vaughan, Archbishop of Sydney departed for an ad limina visit to Rome and intending to recruit religious teachers while abroad. He never reached Rome. Travelling slowly to Europe via North America, he reached Liverpool in August. While the guest of Weld relations at nearby Ince Blundell he died of heart disease in his sleep on 18 August.¹⁶ His body was temporarily laid in the family vault of Mr T Weld Blundell pending return to Sydney. The return for interment in the crypt of St Mary's Cathedral, which was completed in 1928, did not occur until 1946. In the interim, Vaughan's mortal remains lay in St Michael's Pro-Cathedral, Belmont, Herefordshire, from February 1887.¹⁷

Dom Norbert Birt traces and quotes the unfortunate correspondence between Vaughan's elder brother, Herbert, Bishop of Salford (subsequently Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster) and his own successor Cardinal Moran, which failed to secure return of the remains for burial in St Mary's Cathedral in 1885.¹⁸ More happily, on the occasion of the translation of the remains in October 1946, the then Archdiocesan Archivist could still appeal to a slender living memory:

There are some who remember, though there cannot be many, the handsome person of Archbishop Vaughan, so dignified and noble, who remember the golden voice which thrilled his hearers, breathed into them the living spirit of Faith: remember the dauntless leader who inspired his followers to form behind him in battle array to war against materialism and indifference.

We in our newer generation take the place of our forerunners and bring back in honour his mortal remains.¹⁹

THE ARCHIVE OF THE AUGUSTINIAN FRIARS (OSA)

The Rev. Bro. Cyril Counihan, OSA

The Augustinian Order is an ancient one, but our archive in London is quite recent. An elaboration of this statement will help to explain the nature and content of today's collection.

The Order came into being either in 1244 or 1256 (depending on your point of view) when, by direction of the Holy See, there were two successive unions of pre-existing groups, mainly in the Tuscan region of Italy. Under the Rule of St Augustine, the united fraternity became the third of the mendicant orders.

Between the two dates given, the Augustinians had already spread widely through Europe. The first convent in England was established at Clare, in Suffolk, in 1248. By the end of the century there were at least 500 friars in twenty-two convents, and the latter figure was to rise to thirty-five.

At the Reformation, some Austin friars, like Robert Barnes and Miles Coverdale, favoured the new religion, while others, like John Stone (canonised 1970), gave their lives for the old. With his martyrdom the English Province too came to an end after 300 years. Although no manuscript material remains to us from those days, such works as those of Aubrey Gwynn SJ (The English Austin Friars, 1940) and Francis Roth OSA (The English Austin Friars, 2 vols, 1961 and 1966), ensure that we are not without knowledge of our early history in this country. The research and writing of our historians constantly enlarges and clarifies the picture.

It was rather more than another 300 years before life returned. After a false start at Bristol (1848), the Order of St Augustine appeared once more in England, when friars from the Irish Province founded St Monica's Priory at Hoxton Square in London (1864). There followed Austin Friars at Hythe, in Kent (1891) and St Augustine's Priory, Hammersmith (1903). After the Second World War there was a new surge, with the recovery of the ancient Clare Priory, and the taking on of a boarding school and two more parishes. Today there are nine communities in England and two in Scotland. These make up the Anglo-Scottish Province established in 1977 by the Order's General Chapter.

From the Second Spring of 1864 until 1977, the Augustinian priories in this country remained part of the Irish Province which had founded them. Archive material was kept, and is retained, in Dublin. Nevertheless it has been possible to compile at least the principal data on the 150-plus friars who served during those years in the United Kingdom. Quite a number of these would have seen service in Australia, in Nigeria, in Rome, in the United States. Today the Anglo-Scottish Province, in partnership with the Australian, has taken the first steps towards the establishment of the Order in Korea, as well as maintaining a contribution to the Irish Province's considerable effort in Nigeria.

This inheritance encourages an international outlook, which is reflected in the content of our present-day archive. Certainly the concentration is on our life, work, places and members in this country. But it extends to those who were here, and to several countries already mentioned. As well as the Sunday Bulletins of our eleven parishes in the U.K., we receive the newsletters of twenty provinces of the Order around the world.

The pattern is similar in the areas of history and biography. The history of the Augustinian Order in pre-Reformation England and in more recent times is, of course, our main concern. But here too the coverage extends much further afield, with background material on, for example, the countries of Korea and Nigeria, and the considerable history of the early Spanish and Portuguese Augustinian missionaries. There are works and biographies of such figures as Gregor Mendel, Luis de Leon and, of course, Martin Luther.

Augustinian liturgical books — missals, breviaries, rituals — and manuals of devotion have their place, and likewise the lives of the saints and holy people of the Order.

We receive upwards of thirty reviews, in various languages, and there are small collections of audio- and video -tapes, slides, photographs and newspaper cuttings.

The Order does not have an individual founder such as St Francis or St Ignatius. It was brought into being by the Holy See, with the Rule of St Augustine as its 'foundation document'. That Rule, in some of its many editions, and with commentaries ancient and new, is here. Of course the Rule is something we share with many other institutes, whose founders and histories are also of some interest to us.

So we come round to the source of it all, St Augustine of Hippo, whom we call 'our holy father'. Biographies are here, from that written by his companion Possidius, to those of last year and this, and not forgetting the evergreen Confessions. His works are here, as well as a selection of the commentaries and monographs which are still published with great frequency.

STANDARDIZING ACCESS TO DIOCESAN ARCHIVES IN AMERICA

Ronald D. Patkus

As the final decade of our century opens, Catholic diocesan archivists in America find themselves confronted with a number of important issues. Like their colleagues who are affiliated with other non-religious institutions they are asking questions about such topics as automation techniques, educational programs, and outreach activities. Finding answers will take a considerable amount of work, but the effort should serve as a preparation to the year 2000 and beyond for the archival community.

In the midst of this work, diocesan archivists are also cognizant of the fact that other concerns must be addressed which, while related to the archival profession as a whole, are simultaneously of particular relevance to their own unique situations. One of these, and perhaps the most significant of these, is the question of access to the archival and manuscript collections of the various dioceses. In fact, some might even go so far as to say that until this issue is dealt with directly, the archival endeavour of the Church in the United States will be seriously hindered.

What is it exactly that needs to be dealt with? Basically it is the assumption that diocesan archives are not especially hospitable when it comes to making their records available for research. The assumption is largely inaccurate, but still it is true that today a large segment of society is still in the dark about all of this. Professional and amateur researchers alike regularly voice their relief and surprise that many diocesan archives are actually open for their use. To be sure there are other issues relating to access which must be considered as well. But the perception problem deserves special attention. Until it is resolved in worthy fashion, until people are aware of the availability of diocesan collections, there will always be difficulties in this area.

Because of this, the consideration of access has become a major priority for diocesan archivists and others interested in the Church and its history. This is especially true in the early 1990's, but the work has really been in progress for at least fifteen years.

In 1974 the United States was getting ready to celebrate its 200th birthday. As a way of recognizing this, the National Conference of Catholic Bishops (NCCB) appointed a special Committee for the Bicentennial. One of the accomplishments of this committee was the creation and publication of 'A Document on Ecclesiastical Archives.' The document recalled the long and rich history of the Church in the New World and the importance of archives as a way of preserving that history. More specific to the present discussion, the document also urged that resident bishops do everything in their power to ensure that the archives of their diocese were organized and made available in a professional manner. The wording of the text was eloquent:

... we express our sincere hope that the residential bishops may be disposed to grant access to the diocesan archives without undue limitations when properly accredited historians ask for it. The past products of such research support, we believe, the contention that serious historians, even graduate students and doctoral candidates, have, with very rare exceptions, used such permission with honesty, fairness, responsibility, respect for the documents, and true Christian charity. Catholic historians have characteristically evinced a distinct pride in the persons and institutions of their Church of past generations, and, in our judgement, no bishop need fear that by opening his archives to scholarly examination, he will expose the Church's past to deliberate attempts at embarrassment. True, scandals and shortcomings may be uncovered, but in these matters we believe that it is still appropriate to follow the admonition of Pope Leo XIII, who in his letter on historical studies, Saepenumero considerantes, of August 18, 1883, quoting from Cicero, declared "that the first law of history is not to dare to utter falsehood; the second, not to fear to speak the truth; and moreover, no room must be left for suspicion of partiality or prejudice."

It is easy to see why the statement was pivotal in many respects. It enunciated a clear call for a balanced view of access and was responsible for the implementation of this attitude in several regions of the country. But it was just one step among many.

Several years later, in 1980, there was more movement in this area. Specifically, the Association of Catholic Diocesan Archives (ACDA, a nationwide organization) presented three statements to NCCB relating to archives for their consideration and possible comment. One of these statements dealt with the care and use of sacramental records, especially baptisms and marriages. Basic guidelines were proposed. This was noteworthy, because it marked the first time that ACDA had offered a formal opinion on access to a certain type of diocesan record grouping.

In the mid-1980's the diocesan archivists continued to exhibit a concern for access. During these years they were submitting a proposal for grant funding to the National Endowment for the Humanities (NEH) in Washington, D.C. The grant was intended to initiate a project which would be responsible for surveying all diocesan holdings in the U.S. and developing some type of guide which could be used by scholars and other researchers. As a way of convincing NEH about the seriousness of the proposal, a supplementary appendix was included as part of the application. One section of the appendix featured a statement, signed by a large number of residential bishops, which declared that they supported the use of church records. This was meant to be a clear indication of their balanced and reasonable position on access.

A second version of this proposed grant even contained a substantial section addressing the topic of access directly. It stated that most diocesan archives were open to the public, and that the closing of entire collections without cause was not the norm, but the exception. Here again we can see how access was still an issue.

Yet a third factor which must be kept in mind is the power of discussion. At regular intervals in the 1980's, informal and formal conversations took place among the diocesan archivists, either at archival gatherings or elsewhere. This factor is admittedly vague in some sense, but it should not be underestimated. Dialogue can be helpful, and it certainly served as a means of sharing ideas about how to work on this topic.

In fact, discussion is what led to a more ambitious effort to deal with access in the summer of 1989. At that time the ACDA was convening in Chicago for its annual meeting. During the conference it became apparent that even in view of the undertakings just mentioned, many diocesan archivists were convinced that the public perception of access was not what it should be. Much of the general population seemed to be unaware of the ways in which church collections could be of use to them.

ACDA's Executive Board decided to address this situation. In the course of the meeting I was asked to prepare a paper on the subject of a standard access policy for diocesan archives in the United States. The purpose of the paper, I hasten to add, was simply to initiate a conversation, to suggest certain ideas pertinent to the topic.

During the next few months I began to consider the importance of access more deeply, and to talk to several of my colleagues about it all. I gathered together my thoughts and wrote the paper, which was read at a subsequent meeting of ACDA in the autumn of 1989 in St Louis. The text also appeared in an issue of the association's newsletter, so that it could be made more widely available to the membership.

The paper made several points. One of them was that, it seemed to me, the publication of a standard access policy, one that would offer some general guidelines on the availability of diocesan collections, would certainly help to address the perception problem, mentioned earlier. By releasing such a policy and encouraging its adoption across the nation, diocesan archivists would make a significant contribution to the effort to convince the public that their archives are open and are managed in keeping with professional archival practice.

A second point was that the standard access policy would possibly improve the management of diocesan archives. The reason for this is simple and straightforward: if diocesan archivists across the country decided to implement general standards by writing an access policy, this would require the prerequisite that the archivists become more knowledgeable about their collections. In order to gain better control of the collections, they would have to reconsider their contents in a detailed fashion.

A third point was that a standard access policy would help many to become better reference archivists. Reference interviews and research planning would be given an added degree of clarity, due to the increased management potential just mentioned. The roles of researcher and archivist, their respective duties in other words, would be given some definition.

Fourthly, the argument was made that the policy would add a measure of consistency to the use of diocesan collections. Some users of diocesan archives and others have occasionally raised the question of whether or not there is a consistent pattern for access in all parts of the country. Can one examine the same kind of document in Boston as one can in Chicago, or Los Angeles, or New Orleans? There seems to be some concern that this is not the case. And so, if standard guidelines were printed and disseminated to the public at large, researchers and others would come to develop a particular kind of expectation about the availability of collections. It would be the expectation of a common pattern. While it is true that there may be some justifiably unique and special circumstances on the local level, the point is that there would be professional standards and attitudes present on a wide scale.

Because of these four points, I suggested that the ACDA might want to consider putting together a standard access policy of some variety. As it turned out, the members of the association present at the St Louis meeting were in agreement on this. Consequently an ad hoc committee was formed to take up this very task.

One of my first tasks as chairman of this new committee was to invite other members of ACDA to work on the project with me. Forming a committee would ensure a certain amount of discussion and added input of ideas. The other archivists who agreed to serve in this capacity were Ms Christine Taylor of the Archdiocese of Seattle, Dr Martin Towey of the Archdiocese of St Louis, and Sr Felicitas Powers of the Diocese of Savannah. Each of these individuals had different kinds of experiences in the field and their thoughts were critical to the development of the policy.

Very early on the committee determined that any standard access policy should have at least two primary goals. The first, obviously, would be to present and explain the various professional standards for access which are necessary for determining how collections ought to be used. It was hoped that this would encourage those charged with the responsibility of maintaining diocesan archives to write their own access policies.

The broader goal was a better understanding of the importance of diocesan archives as a whole. This aim, no doubt, is a lofty one, but it is a needed one as well.

As the actual work of the committee began, two important decisions were made with regard to methodology. First, it was determined that any standard access policy should be considered within the larger framework of access issues. In other words, we did not want to simply create a brief one or two page listing of proposed guidelines. The guidelines would certainly be there, but they would be described in some detail too. The narrative form of a paper seemed to be the best way to accomplish this.

The second decision was that the paper would keep its guidelines on the general, as opposed to the specific, level. The intention here was to discuss all of the broadly applicable standards of access. The application of these standards in a given diocese would not be explained, however. This approach, it seemed, would allow readers to become familiar with guidelines and then decide for themselves how they could best implement the guidelines in their own unique situations.

And so, over the course of the last year, the committee has been at work preparing the statement on access. It has had some success, and has already come up with an initial draft. This draft will need to be critiqued and improved. While the exact arrangement and wording of the paper are thus still being developed, it is possible now to mention its basic outline and contents.

The paper is divided into four parts. The first deals with general attitudes toward access. It describes those principles which are broadly accepted in the archival community as governing the practice of making records available. Topics such as equal access, the need to protect confidentiality, 'Right to Know', and the responsibilities of researchers are discussed here. In a very real sense, therefore, this section paves the way for the following three.

Section two discusses diocesan collections and their use. One of the first points made here is that such collections ought to be seen as unique. In other words, the entire archives should not be treated as a whole without distinct parts. This approach allows archivists to develop access policies which are sensitive to the differences between collections. Some treatment is given of the various kinds of collections, and how they might be made available (or restricted) in keeping with the general principles mentioned earlier. Again, it must be emphasized that this is done in a general fashion; no specific rules are listed.

The third part of the paper takes up the question of the administration of access. It presents some of the procedures archivists ought to employ on a daily basis to ensure that their collections are being used properly. Such things as security, registration, interviews, citation, quotation, and reprography are considered.

All of the foregoing is brought together in the final section of the paper, which discusses the need for each diocese to create a written access policy of its own. Attention is given to the elements which would constitute such a policy. Reference is also made to examples of a model general access policy.

As alluded to earlier, the paper will need to be refined before it appears in final form. Several readers have agreed to offer their comments and insights on the draft. The refinement process is also likely to include the potential involvement of each member of ACDA. This is to say that plans are in the making for finding a way to distribute the paper to the entire membership in order to invite their opinions. Such a step may be rather tedious, but it will yield important benefits. Not only is it possible that one point or another may be perfected, the distribution will also have the advantage of ensuring that the organization actually 'owns' the paper. The committee felt this to be a critical aspect to its release, especially since the topic is of such great import at the present.

The writing of a paper dealing with access has been an important step for diocesan archivists. But it is not the only way they have been concerning themselves with the issue at this time. Another occurrence of note is the presentation of a special session on access at ACDA's annual meeting at Mundelein, Illinois in the summer of 1990.

The session featured three papers. The first was read by Rev. M. Edmund Hussey, the association's president. It traced the history and development of Catholic Church records and the manner in which they have been made available through the centuries. This provided background for a second paper by Timothy Slavin, former Associate Archivist for the Archdiocese of Chicago. Mr Slavin discussed his experience of formulating the official access policies for the archdiocese. The last paper was given by myself; it reviewed efforts made by ACDA in the last two decades to improve the understanding of access.

The presentation of the session offers yet another indication of the concern ACDA has had for the issue at hand. The concern would appear to be unparalleled by other professional archival organizations in the United States. Because of this, diocesan archivists may well find themselves in the vanguard of this discussion as it continues in the 1990's. Though in some sense their interest in access arose from a less than ideal situation, an ironic and happy outcome may be seen as they play a central role in devising their profession's agenda for dealing with access issues in the years to come.

ESTABLISHING AN ARCHIVE: FIRST STEPS

Sister St Mildred Coburne FDLS

The writer is a member of a Religious Congregation founded in France in 1703 by St Louis Marie de Montfort. The Filles de La Sagesse are a part of the Montfortian family of Fathers, Brothers and Sisters who are engaged in a variety of apostolates throughout the world, whilst spiritually pursuing the realisation of the Eternal and Incarnate Wisdom in their lives. Due to the imposition of the anti-clerical laws in France at the end of the nineteenth century, the Sisters, like so many other Religious Orders, fled from France, to settle in the British Isles, among her places, in 1901. They have a variety of apostolates today in England, Scotland and Ireland.

The Provincial Archivist of the Sisters of La Sagesse has received no formal training for this task. She is a retired school teacher, who has specialised over the last twenty years in Adult Religious Education. Her hobbies include photography and an interest in history. These have proved an asset to her research work and storage of archives. A keen reader, this has helped in studying the subject of archival preservation. The following notes are for those in similar circumstances who will be able to set up only a very basic archive storage room and — it is a plea — to do what they can in their particular situation. It could be said that any positive efforts to preserve archives are better than none at all.

'Sister, would you like to up-date the history of our Province from the 1960's to the present?' This simple request was the prelude to an unknown world. From a long-standing interest in history I had used archives, the world of the archivist was unexplored territory. The fact that this was a profession in its own right was only to become clear to me over the next few years. After only a short period of research I came across evidence that our Province began, not as previously thought, in Hampshire, but at Withington, near Manchester. My interest was so aroused that I asked to prepare, not merely a history up-date, but to go back our roots in this country and to write a complete account. Little did I realise that my love of detective stories would now pay off, in following the tiniest of clues for a result!

In 1987 a Superior brought to my attention an advert in The Universe about the annual conference of the Catholic Archives Society. I made the happy decision to attend. Upon arrival, though knowing no-one, I was soon made to feel at ease. When we chose which groups we should attend, my 'green-ness' was very evident, as until that moment, I had no idea of the existence of such people as Provincial Archivists. I came away having learned so much from the 'professionals'. It was only at the next annual meeting that I realised I was not the only Sister present who was not even of amateur status! Upon reporting to my Provincial, I suggested that we should have a Sister responsible for organising our Archives. After being formally requested to fill the post, I accepted in the knowledge that help would always be at hand from the friends I had made in the CAS, as well as with the aid of their excellent publications. The Society's leaflet, Archive Principles and Practices, I strongly recommend to others in my situation. After studying all I could, I was ready for the next stage in setting up our own Archives.

To this day I bless the person who invented 'the plastic bag'. Without this commodity I could never have begun to sort out all the archive material that was now coming to light. An adhesive label on each bag, identifying their place of origin, kept things in order until a room could be made available for their storage. Letters and other documents were stored in folders. Photographs were labelled - yellow (photocopy), blue (Convent), and green (Works).

At first my plastic bags and other archives were stored at the Provincial House, in Hampshire. In 1989, a suitable room came available at our Convent in Newcastle and, as this was nearer my base, it was agreed to establish our Archives there. With the generous help of local Community, the room was painted in preparation for the purchase of archive boxes and something to store them in. A visit to the Conservation Resources (U.K.) Ltd at Cowley, was interesting. Although my order was minimal I was served with the best of courtesy. It was fascinating to see the boxes arriving flat-packed and then formed into shape on a special machine. After searching many catalogues and visiting super-stores I found the type of storage trolleys I needed, at the 'Texas' DIY stores. They are called 'Closet Maid' storage system.

With a search table and comfortable chair, the next stage was to cover the walls with time-charts and interesting photos and cards. At this time the boxes were simply marked with the name of the Convent concerned, until all was ready for the important cataloguing and indexing. I preferred to have all in place before settling down to this. A 'Procedure Board' was set up and thus our Archives Room was beginning to take shape.

Having catalogue files for the various subjects to be listed on the intended indexes, as well as card-index boxes, I am now ready, in 1990, to finalise my work, with an easy and clear index system that others can continue after me. As I put my archival material away I sometimes leave a little note for the Sisters of the future to read. Because I feel that our Congregation will continue through our Third World Confreres I keep such items as our daily menus and items of local interest. Even the clothes we wear may be of historical interest in fifty years time!

There is still much to be done before our Archives are complete. Items of interest are continually coming in. The lesson I've learned from this third career is 'to go gently and slowly' — a valuable one, since my life-style has also had to adapt using a wheelchair. Without the interest and help of my Sisters it would be difficult to make this contribution to our historical heritage, for future generations of Sisters.

FIRST STEPS: THE ARCHIVIST IN THE ARCHIVES ROOM

GUIDE LINES FOR OUR COMMUNITY ARCHIVISTS

WHAT ARE ARCHIVES? Archives are the records of a Congregation that reflect its historical, administrative, and legal life. These records comprise a variety of materials: diaries, chronicles, journals, letters, accounts, etc., but also photographs, visual and sound recordings, paintings, artefacts, magazine articles, newspaper reports and pictures. The main function of the Archivist is to collect, preserve, classify and protect these records as the property of the Congregation. The Archivist has to devise her own system by which the Archives can be made available for research, whilst at the same time retaining the safeguards necessary for sensitive material. The Provincial Archivist should be invited to visit the Community once a year to advise on retaining and discarding material of doubtful long-term value, and to offer assistance.

CHURCH RECOGNITION. In the 1983 Code of Canon Law the Church recognised the work of the Archivist, not only with regard to Dioceses but also within Religious Institutes. Canon 578 states that the whole Patrimony of an Institute must be faithfully preserved by all. This places an obligation on each member of the Institute to play her part in the preservation of the Archives.

LOCAL COMMUNITY ARCHIVES. These consist mainly of :

House Diaries. These record events outside the normal routine of the Community, such as an annual visit, participation in a local religious or secular event, or a special celebration.

Sacristy Journals. These can be an important source of history. They note any visiting priest who celebrates Mass or other ceremonies. Details should include date, time, reason, any unusual points of a sermon, how the visitor contacted the Community, etc.

Annual Returns. These are the short account of the Community's year that is sent to the Congregation in Rome by the person responsible for the Community.

Other records. Other materials include such things as letters or memoirs of biographical interest, publications or notes of talks given by members of the Community, exhibition materials relating to the Congregation, and materials of local interest illustrating the environment in which the community works.

Personal Archives. Upon the death of a Sister nothing should be destroyed before consulting the Provincial Archivist. If any Sister wishes to deposit material of a personal nature in the Provincial Archives, she should write on it the date it can be made available for inspection. Such records could be of a special experience, a matter of conscience, and other personal papers. It is recommended that a time limit of forty years after the death of the Sister is feasible for this type of deposit. The Provincial Archives contain a specially sealed section for these deposits.

THE ARCHIVES ROOM

THE ARCHIVES OF THE NATIONAL SHRINE OF OUR LADY, WALSINGHAM

Kate Moore

WHAT DO THE ARCHIVES CONTAIN?

The archives are the surviving records of the National Shrine from the beginning of the restoration period in the 1880's both at Walsingham and King's Lynn and material relating to its administration from the 1930's through to the present day.

For the most part the archives consist of original and unique handwritten or typed records, there is also a large collection of photographs, newspaper clippings, postcards and related pilgrimage materials dating mainly from the 1930's but some from the restoration on 19 August 1897.

Some of the material has been given by past pilgrims for safe custody in the Archives of the Shrine. Large collections include the papers of Dudley Baxter, Martin Gillett, Claude Fisher and Arthur Bond; all were prominent figures in the history of the development of the Shrine. Some of the material seems likely to have been in the diocesan archives or parish archives.

The earliest records are very scanty but a number of books have been printed since the 1850's on the history of Walsingham. There is a small collection of books and pamphlets of historical value from that period, and also a microfilm copy of the Pynson Ballad of the fourteenth century. A valuable collection of slides from the 1930's was donated recently, and videos and slides date from 1968. Other materials include banners and a variety of objects for or about the Shrine and Walsingham memorabilia.

WHO USES THE ARCHIVES?

An increasing number of enquiries are received from various persons — some conducting research into their family history or the history of the Shrine for school or parish projects. Many schools use the facility of the Shrine for outings but also to investigate the medieval pilgrimage mentality and modern developments.

A summary of the history of the Shrine is recorded on wall tablets in the cloister at the Slipper Chapel and this has promoted interest in accuracy and in the accounts of the past and present history of Walsingham. The anniversaries of great events and pilgrimages connected with that development provide the background for extra talks, information and colourful printed brochures. The Archives thus provide not only a treasury of past ideas but also give impetus to any serious research for the future.

While it is not possible to open the Archives to the general public, access for specific requests can generally be arranged. However, there is a strict rule that nothing can be taken from the Archives without permission and even then must be recorded for quick return. Through contact with the Catholic Archives Society, a number of archivists have made enquiries regarding our collections relating to Catholic history.

WHO LOOKS AFTER THE ARCHIVES?

The Director of the National Shrine has the overall responsibility for the Archives. In 1985 Father Allen asked Father Brian Ventham SM, to undertake the work needed in preserving and conserving the materials in a properly ordered and archivally correct fashion and, through the help of a qualified archivist, the work of cataloguing the material has been started. It is intended to place copies of this catalogue with the Diocesan Archivists of East Anglia and Northampton and with the Norfolk County Record Office at Norwich. If more people are interested in these Archives, then there will be a greater hope that this work will continue and provide an even greater service and encourage further developments.

WHY ARE THE NATIONAL SHRINE'S ARCHIVES SO IMPORTANT?

History is always important to Catholics, and the history of our faith since Emancipation is fascinating and interesting. And yet it is a complex subject with little written that explains the development and progress which the Church promoted. People also tend to forget details and facts, and things get overlooked as changes take place and characters disappear. A precise, accurate and knowledgeable research of the foundation of institutions is essential and it is hoped that a well arranged and catalogued Archives here will promote that research, at least in the field of the modern history of the Shrine. The medieval Priory and its history is another great challenge. The result of all these investigations will be a history of devotion to Our Lady which Walsingham inspired in so many generations during the Ages of Faith and has inspired again since 1897 and in our own times, and also a record of all the remarkable persons who have done so much, in unity with others or on their own, to foster this devotion. The Archives help to promote the mission of the Shrine in a very practical way.

Editorial note

This account is taken mostly from the preface to the Catalogue of the National Shrine Archives compiled by Father Brian Ventham SM, who organised the Archives during the years 1985-1989, and was largely responsible for their present arrangement.

REFLECTIONS ON CLOSING A CONVENT: ARTEFACTS

Sister Agnes Hypher OSM

INTRODUCTION

I like to think that these few words may be considered as an apologia for ARTEFACTS. Artefacts discovered during an archaeological dig receive the greatest attention and respect. Once displayed in a museum or a heritage room, no doubt is left as to their significance, but what becomes of artefacts which were once familiar objects of the house or convent? Their usefulness and initial attractiveness may have come and gone and their historic importance forgotten.

CLOSURE OF ST MARY'S

The memory is still fresh in my mind of the time when the Servite Mother House in London was up for sale. The convent, which had once housed a community of seventy sisters and existed for over a hundred years, was almost devoid of furniture and furnishings. The only room which could be described as cheerful and on-going was the temporary archives room. Some archives had remained at St Mary's but the main holdings had been removed in 1969 to the new Generalate in Louvain at the request of the French Mother General. I arrived a few months before the actual departure of the sisters in 1987. The various attics, cupboards and cellars revealed collections of books, house diaries, boxes of memorabilia of successive Mothers General, and innumerable relics. But that was not all: a stack of packages come to light almost at the last minute and these were the real challenge.

ST MARY'S PRIORY, STAMFORD HILL, LONDON

At the point when the fabric of the building lay unadorned it became apparent that there were two keyholes in a recess opposite the front door — at a casual glance the wall appeared to be continuous complete with beading and wainscot. Thankfully, the only content of one cupboard was a large figure of a camel which had been missing from a crib-set for years. However, the other cupboard was stacked high with brown-paper parcels covered in decades of London grime. Panic set in as everything had to be removed before the uncertain date of the sale of the convent. It was necessary to organise and repack these for removal to the provincialate Archives room in the West Midlands, and this with as little flotsam as possible.

SERVITE HISTORY

Perhaps a word about our genealogy would be appropriate here. The Congregation began with a group of young teachers in the small village of Cuves in France in 1840. Under the leadership of Marie Guyot they decided to adopt a Rule of Life. Although she died at the age of twenty-six, the small community was eventually responsible for several other religious congregations coming into existence besides that of Servite Sisters. Like so many other Religious groups in France, they were forced to live abroad during troubled times in France. Mother Philomena Morel and her community had to face various vicissitudes which beset them in England. Many disastrous moves were made. They had to disentangle themselves from bogus benefactors and clergy who did not always take into account their charism, constitution and commitment.

It was not until 1871 that the group finally took root and began to flourish after purchasing Suffolk Lodge, which became St Mary's Priory and the Mother House. It is unfortunate that during these early days two fires caused the loss of the first archives. In order to account for our Servite identity it is necessary to note that the original group in Cuves were known as the Sisters of Compassion. In 1864 they fulfilled their desire to become aggregated to the Servite Order. The Chronicles relate that on the 18th of June the decree of aggregation was signed by Pope Pius IX and on the 22nd of June twenty professed sisters and nine novices received the habit from the hands of the Vicar General, Dr Hearn, delegated by Cardinal Wiseman.

The following year, Mother Philomena made the request that Father General send Servite Friars to be directors to the sisters and also work in England. The Father General and the Friars were generous with their support and friendship, as our archives and libraries testify. It was in the great clearance that a bundle of Cardinal Lepicier's manuscripts came to light.

SOCIAL AND CHURCH HISTORY

The artefacts which had accumulated appeared to reflect the social and church history in England at that particular time. On the one hand, the sisters lived hard-working and austere lives and, on the other, imposing convents and chapels were being built. It would seem that in the wake of Catholic Emancipation and the Restoration of the Hierarchy, religious life also saw a 'Second Spring'. It could be an urgent drive to make up for lost time, caused by the Reformation and Penal Times. In this revival the inspiration came from the continent where patterns for gracious convents and monasteries were to be found. Leading church architects, such as Pugin and Comper, were foremost in the Gothic Revival and they did not restrict themselves to the architecture but also to the furnishings, fabrics and vestments in order to effect an authentic whole. As a result, the religious revival in its tangible form was not in contemporary style, for which they were severely criticised. However, the intervening centuries since the Reformation had led to a difference of opinion as to where to pick up the threads. This in turn meant that the decisions and implementations of Vatican II left a wealth of beautiful vestments, sacred vessels and ecclesiastical effects prematurely out of date, such as copes, dalmatics and Roman chasubles. St Mary's Convent, in common with other communities, spent more money on furnishing and decorating the chapel and commissioning statues than might seem appropriate. Each solemnity of the Church was marked by yet another work of art embroidered or painted by a sister, as is proudly recorded in the early chronicles.

INFLUENCE OF PRIORESSES GENERAL

The memorabilia of the Mothers General reveal much of their influence and spirituality. Mother Antonia Loughnan had received her education at Stanbrook Abbey at the time when her aunt, Dame Ignatia Power, was Abbess, so it was she who introduced the full monastic ritual and Divine Office. The Nocturn Lessons were sung with great solemnity from illuminated books designed and painted by the sisters. The second of these was the work of Sister Addolorata Bedford, who had been the first draughtswoman in England. During World War II both volumes were deposited in the Bank for safety. With the advent of Vatican II and the vernacular, these are no longer in use but have pride of place among the artefacts. Among Mother Antonia's personal keepsakes are two daguerreotypes which together with our collections of glass-plates, negatives and positive prints, slides and films may well make an almost complete photographic archive. There are even slides for a gas lantern.

MEMORABILIA OF TWO WORLD WARS

It is not surprising that there are a number of items relating to the two World Wars, since the Congregation had spread across Europe as far as Bavaria. The first World War had shattered links with Gratzen and two sisters of the English Province were caught up in the fall of France in 1939. In fact, the little house in Cuves played a special role in the French Resistance Movement. Added to this, Mother Scholastica Britten came from a military family, and certainly the sisters were encouraged by her strength and understanding during the London Blitz. We have in our possession the Britten family papers which we are anxious to return once a member of the family can be traced. Since there has been no small interest in Catholic guilds, it seems worth mentioning the 'League of the Cross'. As a young man, her brother, Thomas Britten served in Iraq in 1914. The six Catholics in his company formed an 'Order' of the League which met regularly. Despite enemy action depleting their numbers they planned to regroup and continue. Thomas Britten's Service medal is among the many commemorative medals accumulated over the years. The value of these have a special significance, not only for what they are but why they have come into our possession.

THE IMPORTANCE OF ARTEFACTS

It became obvious that the real-life situation, the human tangible element is of great importance. Artefacts are the stage-props which set the scene. One only has to note the memorabilia auctioned by Sotheby's, or to go to Boys Town and join the queue waiting to see Father Flanagan's office just as he left it, to know the truth of this. I do not think one can be too scientific at the expense of reality and the hidden reality yet to be discovered. However, the surrounding atmosphere is of vital importance, while fresh clear labelling and presentation speak volumes about the artefacts themselves. This consideration was the main factor in planning the new, but small, archives room. The holdings had rarely been seen before, particularly those in the dusty paper parcels. The memorabilia of the Mothers General had much detailed documentation but omitted to state to which 'Mother' they belonged. For the first time the beautiful vestments could be seen closely and the illuminated volumes studied. Some Roman vestments have been converted into semi-Gothic chasubles for special use. These are stored in a large chest, on shelves, and the folds protected by rolls of acid free tissue paper. When on display in the adjacent room, the library, they will hang on stands (scarecrow shaped in design) to be viewed to advantage. The crosspiece will be detachable for easy storage. Smaller items are ready to be exhibited by being always kept in sturdy boxes with transparent lids.

UNRELATED ARTEFACTS

Before closing the Mother House much remained which was not required. There was very little difficulty disposing of surplus chapel furnishings, vestments, statues, large pictures and books. Requests came from poor parishes, schools, seminaries and missions while more recent appeals are made from churches once behind the Iron Curtain. It was possible to send some objects such as church damask drapes and carved cabinets to Fine Arts dealers. Many of the relics had no authentication while individuals were keen to acquire relics of their patron saints. Even so, a sizable collection of relics still remain. Artefacts of a secular nature came from the old convent schools. The Science Museum was happy to have the stereoscope glass plates, as a donation, for demonstration purposes for younger people. The printed school magazines, dating back to the turn of the century, were welcomed by the local library for school projects in local social history.

RECONNAISSANCE AND IDENTIFICATION

With a few weeks left before the eventual closure of the convent, things were vanishing fast and I had to make on-the-spot decisions which were final. Remembering a retired Major who once told me that 'reconnaissance always pays off', further investigations were made. In my novitiate days, a shrine of St Philomena adorned the side chapel. She lay in a glass case surrounded by metal votive hearts—very much the Italian style. The statue vanished during the update of Vatican II, only to be rediscovered at the final round-up. At this juncture, all that remained was a box containing the hearts. Some were empty, others contained petitions which I hesitated to read, but one looked particularly interesting. It appeared to be silver and blackened with age. Once it was polished, the Servite monogram became visible, and also the engraving. It commemorated the dedication of St Wilfred's Priory in 1896 and contained a miniature book in which the names of the original community were written. This information, apparently quite trivial, may well be the only clue as to the first community at Arundel.

CONCLUSION

Since arriving in the West Midlands, my task in Olton convent has been to reconnoitre once again and to label discreetly objects of historic value to the Order. One such item is a Bardic chair which has pride of place at the foot of the staircase in the main hall at Olton. It was won by a Mere St Thomas in Aberystwyth in 1905 for her poem 'Light'. It was the custom of a 93-year-old blind sister to take her place at this vantage point after supper each night and to chat to the community as they passed by. On a Sunday she prolonged her supper here and crunched a packet of potato crisps into the bargain. Without considering the ethics of such a practice it became obvious that frequent usage may well obscure the significance of one's heritage until it is too late. Having identified such items, it may be hoped that the reconnaissance of others will 'pay off' for the benefit of the future of the Order.

THE BAKER PAPERS IN THE DOMINICAN HISTORICAL CENTRE, OXFORD

A large collection of papers was recently discovered, which belonged mostly to Miss Elizabeth Anstice Baker, Dominican tertiary (1849-1914). The collection contains family papers (including letters from two significant South Australian politicians, John Baker, her father, and Sir Richard Chaffey Baker, her brother), correspondence with a wide range of intellectual luminaries, such as Jacques Maritain and Sir Richard Threlfell, over sixty letters from Mgr Robert Hugh Benson, of whom Miss Baker was an important collaborator in such ventures as the Motor Mission, over 170 letters from P. Étienne Le Vigoureux OP, who received her into the church in 1877, and who was the Dominican prior who built the basilica of St Stephen at the École Biblique, Jerusalem, and much else besides. Miss Baker was the instigator of the mission of the Stone Dominican Sisters in Adelaide. She was involved in many other Catholic activities in Australia and in England. She was on the committee of the Catholic Women's League and the proposed Catholic Women's College, Cambridge. Her autobiography of her conversion, A Modern Pilgrim's Progress (London 1906), even if it is now forgotten, was in its time a widely acclaimed book, both in its original English version and in its French translation. There were plans for it to be translated into Italian and German. A fair amount of correspondence about these translations is retained. The papers are now in the possession of the Dominican Historical Centre, Blackfriars, 64 St Giles, Oxford OX1 3LY, where they can be consulted by arrangement with Fr Simon Tugwell OP. A catalogue is available in the archives of the Archdiocese of Westminster.

ROMAN CATHOLIC RECORDS OFFICE, ALDERSHOT

Kay Day

LOCATION

The Records Office is located in St Michael's House in the carpark of the (now) Cathedral Garrison RC Church of St Michael and St George, Queen's Avenue, Aldershot. It was previously situated by St Michael's RC Church near the Cambridge Military Hospital.

BACKGROUND

In 1854 the Government gave the War Office £4,500 for churches in Aldershot. The money was enough to provide three buildings, two of iron, one of wood. At first, the churches were used by all denominations, although the main users of one, St Michael's (opened in 1855), were Catholics.

In the early seventies, St Michael's, a wooden building, was nearing its one hundred and twentieth birthday and the end of its life. Since there was little justification for maintaining two garrison churches, it was decided to offer the use of St George's to Catholics. The offer was readily accepted and, to preserve continuity with the past, the church was placed under the patronage of St Michael and St George. Queen Victoria laid the foundation stone and the centenary of the church will be celebrated in June 1992.

As the church is still used jointly by the Anglicans for monthly ecumenical services, Corps days, carol services, etc., the tabernacle has been moved to a side chapel, but Sunday masses are celebrated in the main part of the church.

In July, 1987, the Rt Rev. Bishop Francis J. Walmsley, Bishop-in-Ordinary to HM Forces, was inaugurated here and the church is now the Cathedral church for all Catholic personnel, and he meets with his UK-based chaplains here three times a year. It is an extraordinarily beautiful church and the memorial church for the Royal Corps of Transport, and well worth a visit for anyone finding themselves in the Aldershot area.

THE OFFICE AND THE RECORDS

In 1952 it became the policy to centralise the records of baptisms, confirmation, marriages, dispensations which had taken place in a Service church anywhere in the world for the three services. All serving chaplains were requested to send in their registers to St Michael's House and from thereon to register the baptisms, etc. directly with the central registry.

Despite being no bigger than the size of a garage, if that, the Records Office houses records for all three services, comprising 106,000 baptisms (the Army from 1859, the RAF from 1919, and the RN from 1921), 11,500 marriages from 1856 (including all the marriage papers from 1957), 36,000 dispensations from 1935, 26,000 confirmations, and 3,500 deaths.

The present Senior Chaplain here was sent to set up programmes for computerising these records. Sadly, he has been posted to the Gulf but has got far enough with the programmes for me to record marriages and baptisms. These are also still done manually.

As well as recording all current sacramental events and putting on computer past records, there is research for Tribunals (on the increase), for people looking into their ancestry, the issuing of baptism and confirmation certificates for marriage, etc., etc.

With regard to family history enquiries, it is emphasised that the records give only sacramental details, similar to those found in RC parish registers, and therefore give limited personal information, and also that the earlier records refer mostly to personnel serving in the Aldershot area. Enquiries about servicemen are best directed, in the first instance at least, to manning and records offices or regimental headquarters, if the regiment is known. Information about the service careers of RC chaplains in the two World Wars, and otherwise, would be welcomed.

As a Civil Service Personal Assistant to the Senior RC Chaplain here, I come under the Ministry of Defence, but as a Notary for the Records Office, appointed by the Bishop of the Forces, I come under the Lord Chancellor's Office.

THE CHURCH ARCHIVISTS' SOCIETY OF AUSTRALIA

The Church Archivists' Society of Australia, under the able and energetic leadership of its President, Bro. Leo J. Ansell CFC, Diocesan Archivist of Toowoomba, Queensland, continues to co-ordinate and foster the work of preserving the archives of all Churches in Australia. The Society has already published as many as thirty-three titles, mainly diocesan and parish histories and biographies of Australian Church leaders. The following two books are particularly recommended:

Dr John Patrick Maguire, Prologue: A History of the Catholic Church as seen from Townsville 1863-1983, which covers all events of note in the Catholic Church in Australia and how they affected Townsville in these years. (Hardback, B5 470 pp., 135 maps and photos, 5 appendices, 60 pp. notes, 11 pp. bibliography, index, price, incl. postage [surface mail UK] 65 dollars)

David Parker, Getting Started with Computers. (A5, glossy cover, perfect bound, xiv + 218 pp., 24 illus., appendices, bibliography, index, price incl. postage [surface mail UK], 15 dollars)

These and other books published by the CAS (Australia) are available from Bro. Leo J. Ansell, Church Archivists' Society, PO Box 756, Toowoomba, Queensland 4350, Australia. It is suggested that prospective purchasers check first with Bro. Leo alternative methods and prices of despatch by air or surface mail and obtain the purchaser's order form. Bro Leo will be happy to correspond with archivists and historians interested in Australian Church history.

CATHOLIC ARCHIVES IN THE UNITED STATES

The valuable article by Ronald Patkus, Archivist for the Archdiocese of Boston, on 'Standardizing Access to Diocesan Archives in America' (see pp. 42-47) shews how far religious and diocesan archivists in the States have progressed towards a thoroughly professional management of Catholic archives, from which members of our Society who may still be on the threshold of their journey would surely have much to learn. Anyone who would like to know more about the activities of Catholic archivists in the States is recommended to subscribe to Catholic Archives Newsletter which is published twice yearly in January and July, and obtainable from 80 Decker Street, Milton, Massachusetts 02187. The subscription in 1990 was three dollars for American subscribers, but doubtless there is a rate for overseas subscribers.

Despite the organisational problems of co-ordinating the work of archivists throughout such a large country, there is an active Association of Diocesan Archivists which meets yearly, and in July 1989 a four-day conference was held in Illinois, at which there were working sessions on such archival issues as clergy personnel records, parish sacramental records, tribunal case files, canon law problems, automated systems, preservation, microfilming, appraisal, oral history, and the planning of diocesan historical celebrations. A manual, Basic Standards for Diocesan Archives, prepared by James O'Toole with technical assistance of the Archives of the Archdiocese of Chicago, was due for publication in 1990. The manual is designed primarily for bishops and chancellors interested in establishing a complete archives programme but also to help diocesan archivists to improve the quality of their services.

There are also regional meetings of religious archivists, for instance, a New England Archivists of Religious Institutions being formed recently in Massachusetts. The Society of American Archivists has a large and active Religious Archivists Section which holds its meetings in conjunction with the annual meetings of the present body.

The following two items are taken from the January 1990 issue of Catholic Archives Newsletter, Vol. XII, No. 1.

VATICAN ARCHIVES PROJECT UNDERWAY

Work has begun on an important project to apply computerized techniques to the collections of the Vatican Archives. The work is being done by the staff of the Bentley Historical Library of the University of Michigan, with the assistance of grants from the National Endowment for the Humanities and the Getty Foundation. The project will provide series-level archival descriptions to the Archives for the first time. Using the MARC/AMC format for the automated cataloging and control of archival collections, this project will result in a standardization of the description of the Archives' holdings. When complete, the results will be linked to the computerized catalog of the Vatican Library and to the widely used Research Libraries Information Network (RLIN), an on-line database that permits automated searching for archival materials by scholars around the world.

Editorial Note

It is hoped to report further on this project in the 1992 edition of Catholic Archives. Ms Beth Yakel, editor of Catholic Archives Newsletter, and also corresponding secretary of the Association of Catholic Diocesan Archivists (on which she reported in Catholic Archives, No. 8, 1988) is one of the staff members of the project in Rome.

MAJOR ARCHIVAL DISCOVERY IN BOSTON

After twenty years, during which they were thought to have been destroyed, a large collection of the papers of Cardinal Richard Cushing has been discovered.

Ronald Patkus, Archivist of the Archdiocese of Boston, reports that more than 20 cubic feet of Cushing Papers, predominantly from the 1950s and 1960s, have recently been found and added to the Archives' collections. The papers consist chiefly of the incoming and outgoing correspondence dealing with a wide range of individuals, organizations, and activities. There are also a great many photographs, speeches, publication and other materials.

Cushing served as Archbishop of Boston from 1944 until his death in 1970. Few of his papers survived in the archives, however, and presumption has always been that they were destroyed just prior to or immediately after his death. This discovery will help fill what had otherwise been a tremendous gap in local and national church history. The papers are closed pending processing: they were completely disorganized on their discovery, and their physical condition was very seriously deteriorated. The Archives hopes to be able to process them and make them available in a reasonable period. In the meanwhile, inquiries should be addressed to Mr Patkus, The Archives, Archdiocese of Boston, 2121 Commonwealth Avenue, Brighton, Massachusetts 02135, USA.

THE CATHOLIC ARCHIVES SOCIETY CONFERENCE, 1990

The eleventh annual conference, held at Damascus House, Mill Hill, London, on 29 - 31 May, attracted eighty members and interested persons, the largest attendance so far, and was honoured by the presence on 31 May of Bishop Philip Harvey, Bishop in North London.

The conference was opened by Fr Anthony Dolan (Chairman) in the late afternoon of 29 May and, by way of a change, two papers were given on the first day, Sr Mary Gregory IBVM describing, with slide illustrations, the life of Mary Ward, the foundress of the Institute of the Blessed Virgin Mary, and the treasures of the Bar Convent, York, and Professor Alan McClelland discussing the work of the Rev. Thomas Seddon and Catholic child emigration to Canada in the nineteenth century.

Members' minds and limbs were well occupied throughout the conference's only full day on 30 May. In the morning, papers (both printed in this issue) were given by Fr Anthony Harding on the Clifton Diocesan Archives and by Dame Mildred Murray Sinclair OSB on the preservation at Buckfast of the archives of the now closed Abbey of St Scholastica, Teignmouth. Afternoon visits were made to inspect the archives of the Mill Hill Fathers and the Daughters of Charity under the guidance respectively of their archivists, Fr William Mol MHM and Sr Judith Greville. The Society, being largely a self-help body, members made their own contributions by taking part in six 'special interest group' discussions during the late afternoon and evening on diocesan, religious and parish archives, family history, computers and congregational newsletters.

The final day, 31 May, began with the conference Mass, at which Bishop Harvey was the principal celebrant. The annual 'open forum' followed, in which reports from the interest groups were given, Mrs Rosemary Seton of the London School of African and Oriental Studies spoke about the inter-Church one-day conference on Religious Archives held in London in October 1989 and a second conference to be held in September 1990, and Sr Marguerite-Andree Kuhn-Regnier (Secretary) reported on her archive work for enclosed contemplative communities. The problem of obtaining appropriate training for religious archivists was raised. Sr Mary Campion McCarren FCJ (Vice Chairman) mentioned a Society questionnaire to be sent to Major Religious Superiors on the subject and Sr Dominique Horgan OP (Secretary of the Association of Religious Archivists of Ireland) suggested joint action by the two societies.

The annual general meeting concluded the conference. Reports were given by the officers who were duly thanked for their services, especially Sr Judith Greville (Conference Organiser), and the officers for 1991 (as given on the inside front cover) were elected. The proceedings of the conference are fully reported in CAS Newsletter, No. 12, Autumn 1990, available from the Secretary. The 1991 conference will be held at All Saints Pastoral Centre, London Colney, on 27 - 29 May 1991.

EDITORIAL NOTES

The Society can perhaps reasonably claim, even after only thirteen years' work, to be the principal body representing the interests of Roman Catholic Church archivists in the United Kingdom. To a large extent it has succeeded by adhering to its main objectives, namely the care, preservation and use of the Church's religious, diocesan and other archives, and by responding to the expressed needs of its members. However, as its membership expands, wider horizons can be perceived and the responsibilities of leadership also become apparent. This year being a leap year encourages thoughts of possible, perhaps even necessary, new initiatives.

It was not long before the Society realized the similarity of the problems faced by archivists of all Churches, both in this country and abroad. In this country, a promising start to inter-Church action in archival matters has been made by the Religious Archives Group of the Society of Archivists, while Miss Keen's article on the records of the Church Missionary Society, printed in this issue, demonstrates not only the similarities of Anglican and Catholic missionary records but also our Society's ecumenical spirit. Abroad, the Society so far has had only fitful contacts with national associations of Catholic Archivists. Many benefits would surely derive from sharing common experiences. Perhaps one of the longer established associations in Europe could be persuaded to set up a central information bureau. Both ecumenical and international roles of church archivists were underlined in the Pope's message to the Sixth International Church Archivists Day in Rome last September, also printed in this issue. Being assured that they are 'protecting the cultural value of the written memory' of the Church will hearten many archivists in their solitary labours.

A practical project currently in progress is the survey of the records of lay societies in the Church. This was first suggested by Miss Rendel in her report on the records of the Converts' Aid Society in 1988, and a preliminary list of lay societies active between the two Vatican Councils appeared in the 1990 edition of Catholic Archives. It is feared that the records of some of these societies, certainly of defunct bodies, may be in danger of dispersal or destruction. There is already a need to find homes for records of closed religious houses and the survey of lay societies may well reveal a like problem. A similar situation has already been addressed, and partly remedied, in the Netherlands, as Mr van Vugt describes in his article.

The use of archives is such a valuable stimulus to their preservation that the Society should perhaps do more to encourage research into the Church's history. It is hoped that the hundred or so articles already published in Catholic Archives will prompt such research and that the Index promised this year will help to reveal the scope of the original material available.

All leaping begins and ends on the ground and, happily, the Society continues to fulfil another of its primary functions of advising and instructing novice archivists. Dr Hughes supplies valuable practical advice in an excellent article which will surely become essential reading for all new religious archivists. Similarly, Fr O'Donnell, in his article on the Fr Browne Collection gives sound advice on the treatment of photographs and imparts much needed status to this important category of records found in almost all archives.

All contributors are warmly thanked for their articles and reports. Similar material is earnestly solicited for future issues.

SORTING RELIGIOUS ARCHIVES

Peter Hughes

INTRODUCTION

I begin by entering the caveat that the written version of a talk must inevitably omit much of the detailed illustration and spoken nuance of its original utterance. I was given a wide brief 'to speak about the practicalities of working on archives, how one sets about one's task, what 'original bundles' are, and so on'. Though such a brief evokes a practical bias towards the earlier stages of archival work, it will also be necessary to address some other matters. I hope my comments will resonate with your own experiences as archivists. If I sometimes stray into counsels of archival perfection, I remain very sensitive to the restrictions of budget, equipment, and space, within which so many archivists of religious institutes have to work. I have worked on the archives of a number of religious organisations, both Roman Catholic and Anglican, but the examples in this paper are very largely taken from my work with Catholic religious institutes. I have done my best to preserve a prudent degree of anonymity.

My personal route into archives work has been through academic historical research. This can be used as a strength. One already knows how searchers work, how they approach archives, and their needs for access to records. Perhaps the time has come when we Catholic archivists might make a more sustained address to the needs of searchers, whether these be members of our own dioceses or institutes, or others. Perhaps we confuse institutional secrecy with a prudent access policy. An academic background can also be a strength in making one sensitive to the canons of historical evidence, bringing a ready willingness to be either accurate or agnostic when deciding difficult issues of arrangement. Even so, there may be a danger that an historical research background might lead one to be unduly interested in the substantive historical content of the papers, thus impeding the progress of the archival work. I have tried to be aware of the strengths and weakness that I have brought from my past work experience into my tasks as an archivist. I have tried to use them positively by balancing commitment with objectivity. However we came to be appointed religious archivists, it is useful to review our existing skills and their degree of transferability into archival work. Such a review should not absolve us from a need to match our growing archival experience with such in-service training as we can reasonably acquire. It is equally important to retain a sense of proportion, and not become unduly discouraged or seduced by professional jargon and the more esoteric realms of archival theory.

I have ordered this account by following the stages through which archival work normally proceeds. It is important to note at the outset that any description tends to make each phase appear more neat and discrete than is actually the case. In practice there may often be some overlap and movement back to earlier stages. Occasionally, phases which are here described sequentially may readily be carried out at the same time.

AN UNSORTED COLLECTION OF RECORDS

An unsorted collection of records might range from one packet of papers to the entire surviving material of a diocese or religious institute. I remember one collection which was typical of records I have encountered in the course of my work with a number of institutes, both at general and provincial level. The greater proportion of the material consisted of correspondence, documents, registers, financial accounts, academic dissertations, plans, maps, and the like dating from around the 1850s. Also, there were about sixty printed books dating from 1732. These were largely concerned with the history of the institute, although some of the earlier ones were printed versions of constitutions and other significant documents. As well as books, there were runs of journals and printed circulars and pamphlets. The collection contained a substantial quantity of visual records dating from about 1870, mainly photographs and slides, but with some film and videotapes as well. There were also quite a number of audiotapes. A very large quantity of artefacts completed this accumulation, among which were religious relics and the equipment for making them, military medals, jewellery, crockery, Mass vestments, parts of old style religious habits, and sacred vessels, to name but some.

Even a cursory examination usually reveals that some items were self-consciously preserved from the days of the earliest members of the institute as specially significant to their history. In this category it is not uncommon to find a bundle of the early letters requesting the foundation. Some other items, like trust deeds and audited accounts, had been retained to meet legal or financial requirements. Records like old bills and invoices often survived through inertia or accident. In recent years a lot of artefacts have come to light from the lumber rooms of closed houses. Some have been kept because they seem to provide evidence of pre-Vatican II religious taste and practice, which would otherwise be lost to history in the sweep of renewal. Such is a fairly typical unsorted collection of records. At first encounter they are usually to be found packed up in suitcases, trunks, and large cardboard boxes of the sort discarded by any large grocery store or supermarket.

PRECURSORY TASKS

Before beginning any direct work on such records it can be very helpful to read something of the history of the Institute which generated them, as well as about its more general historical context. This is essential for someone like myself who is brought in to do the archiving, but it is also a useful preparation for the inside archivist new to the work, or whose historical accuracy may be dulled by familiarity. This tentative outline history is best derived from a good critical work, but even less reliable histories can provide a basic working chronology. Do not be surprised if the original documents occasionally contest the written history. It may be a name or a date, and we may need to revise our working outline. I stress that the outline is merely a tentative tool for the ordering of the records, and constantly subject to revision as the work proceeds. Where no history is available, a chronology can be built as one is making the initial inventory of the papers, and here a knowledge of the broader historical context is particularly useful.

Next try to find out how, when, and why the unsorted collection of records came into being. These are important questions for the archivist confronted with an accumulation of unsorted material. The answers may throw light on the origin of the records, where they have been, and why they have survived. These may seem historian's questions, but they relate crucially to key issues in the conservation and archival arrangement of the papers.

Finally, it is prudent to make an initial assessment of the environmental conditions of the room in which the collection is currently housed. This is particularly important if the room is intended to be the permanent record store. Even if it is a temporary location provided solely for the work of arranging the collection, an early survey of the ambient conditions may help to avoid deterioration in the condition of the records. Such an assessment is largely a matter of common-sense, although it can be done very exactly with modern devices. One such try to avoid damp, damaging sunlight, excessive heat, and lack of ventilation. The aim is to achieve reasonably constant temperature and humidity. User-friendly thermo-hygrometers are available at reasonable prices. With such an instrument it is possible to monitor regularly. Then action can be taken to approximate to the recommended standard of a temperature between 13° C and 18° C, and a relative humidity between 55% and 65%. Photographic materials, films, and magnetic tapes are best conserved at the low end of these ranges. There are more precise standards for such non-paper materials which can be referred to if necessary. Compromise is always required, if only because most religious archivists have to undertake their archival work in the same room as that in which the records are stored. If anxiety overcomes common-sense, or there is some serious problem, then one can seek advice from an experienced archivist in the C.A.S. network, or from a nearby county record office.

MAKING AN INVENTORY

Making an inventory elides into accessioning, but for present purposes it is useful to consider the two tasks discretely. Before making a detailed inventory, it is advisable to cull information from the larger containers. Note carefully any labels or identifying marks which give a clue to provenance and contents. Record accurately the location and arrangement of these large containers within the room. This information can be surprisingly helpful in identifying documents. One might find, for example, a box of untitled registers adjacent to a large box of records associated with a certain house, institution, or locality. It is not unusual to find registers left untitled because their purposes were so obvious to the original users. They would not envisage that such documents would eventually be archived in a distant location. The proximity of the boxes, or even that both are labelled 'For the Archives' in the same handwriting, may help to identify the registers at a later stage of the work. Such information can easily be lost by immediately re-arranging the room to make it tidy enough for work. Still trying not irrevocably to disturb the received arrangement of the large boxes, unpack their contents. Note very carefully the order in which the smaller parcels are packed. Repack these smaller packets, even though this may present some problems to be noted later. Then, and only then, should one move the larger containers for ease of working, or to improve their ambient conditions. It is not uncommon to find these large boxes stacked against hot radiators or in damp corners. As I record all this information from the large containers, I mark each very clearly with a number or some such code.

One can now start the inventory or outline accessioning of the packets, files or smaller bundles contained in the larger boxes. At this stage, however, I normally take a sample of two or three of the larger boxes to accession in more detail than the whole collection requires. The purpose of doing this is to gain some detailed feel for the material early in one's work. It is a matter of chance whether one has derived a representative sample. However, it has been my experience so far that one can gain a fairly good idea of the quality of the whole collection by this method. In one instance there were thirty-one large boxes of papers and registers, of which I chose two for this kind of detailed inventory. Besides some registers, the two boxes contained thirty-three packets or bundles of papers. A close examination of these packets revealed a heavy emphasis on official papers associated with the apostolate of the institute. There were some very scholarly papers on the history of the institute written by two sisters, together with their research material. A great deal of personal correspondence that seemed of historical significance was mixed with such ephemera as picture postcards and religious cards. Much of the packaging, and some of the letters themselves, suggested that they had been gathered together over a few years by one person in the institute. The survival of records sometimes depends on such a serendipitous magpie! Sets of material collected together by such a person can present an archival problem which I will address later. The detail revealed by this close examination later proved to be an accurate reflection of the quality of the collection as a whole. The feel thus gained can be of great help when one is immersed in the detail of arranging the collection. It is during this detailed sampling that the tentative chronology and outline history may first come into effective play as an archival tool.

ACCESSIONING

Once information from the larger containers has been accurately recorded and the contents of some of them sampled, the proper accessioning task can begin. What is required now is an accurate list of the contents of the packets, giving only sufficient descriptive information to identify the material. Normally it is sufficient to note the type of record, the date, the name of the person or organisation, the subject, and the locality. It is sensible to note any original labelling, taking care not to rely upon it. A hurried packer might have erroneously titled the whole bundle on the basis of the top paper. Sometimes a label can help make sense of an apparently disparate set of papers. When one comes to arrange and list the collection, this information may help us to understand the principle of collection. It is advisable to add against an item appropriate comments such as 'conservation required', 'potential for weeding', '2 copies of this in packet 1/10'. and so on. As one proceeds, each packet, bundle, or document is provided with its own accession number. I tend to number the records serially through the whole collection, while also relating each to the larger container in which it was packed. Thus 4/89 would indicate that the particular item had been in the 89th bundle on which I had worked, and this had been packed in the 4th large container. Numbering in this way helps one to link earlier identifying information to a difficult item during listing. The accession number remains permanently with the item and is independent of the eventual reference coding of the archival list. An entry in the accession register or list might look something like this:

4/66: Correspondence re chaplain 1810-1850; Mgr. Lewis, Cardiff.
[Torn and damp - needs conservation]

As one proceeds with the accessioning, there is an opportunity to do some conservation first aid. At least one can remove damaging housings and fastenings such as rubber bands, sellotape, plastic folders, metal clips, tags, and pins. Sometimes it is possible to restore records damaged by careless packing. The careful smoothing out of folds in paper is one example. However, it is very important to recognize one's limitations in conservation first aid, knowing when to call in a conservator, or to leave well alone. Usually it is best to leave a damaged record as it is until specialist advice and help can be obtained. Most institutes can only afford this for items of very special historical or sentimental significance.

As soon as I have finished with a packet, bundle, or single document, I repack the items as I found them. I replace the letters and papers in their envelopes, packets or files, and put them back into their original large containers. There are a number of exceptions to repacking the material as found. In the first place, one is not always likely to emulate the ingenuity and space economy of an original packer uncluttered by archival sensibilities! So one supplements with additional large containers cross-referenced to the original boxes. In the collection referred to, the original thirty-three large boxes increased to forty-seven by the end of the accessioning. But such an increase is also accounted for by some of the other exceptions to repacking. These include the items most seriously in need of conservation, especially where repacking would damage them further; books and registers which constitute series, such as annals, profession registers and the like; artefacts; and items of unusual size and shape.

Finally, I set aside items which will be of use as reference material while archiving. In this category, lists of houses with their foundation dates, necrologies, and the like, come readily to mind. Even if they contain some errors, they can serve as useful aids. As each item is marked with its own accession number, there is no difficulty when the time comes to re-integrate it into the collection. While I am accessioning I build up a personal working index of persons, subjects, houses, and reference notes.

Careful accessioning serves a number of important purposes. Primarily, it enables us to take formal and accurate physical possession of the collection. Furthermore, such detailed knowledge facilitates our understanding of the way the records was created and ordered. In this way we come to take intellectual possession of the collection. That is essential if we are to arrange and order it in a manner that is reasonably consistent with its own character and internal logic.

SOME PROBLEMS

Three major problems can arise quite early in the work: The accrual of further material; the thinning of the existing material; and requests for access. To cite the first as a problem might seem paradoxical in a situation where one is trying to build up an archive. The second can be very controversial. Dealing with the third can be very difficult in human terms. Although I am concerned now with these problems arising while the work on an unsorted collection is going on, they remain matters which have to be addressed once the archive is established. I raise the issues for discussion, as we need to clarify our thinking and practice as more religious institutes establish archives, and as more external users become aware of them.

Many religious archivists tend to be divorced from records management issues. Administrations, as well, tend to view current or semi-current records as wholly distinct from the records housed in the archive. In reality, the letter written today and the earliest surviving letter represent two ends of a record continuum. At the centre of this continuum are the transitional records. Sometimes an administration uses an archive as a convenient store for non-current material that may be required later. The archivist is expected to do no more than house or retrieve these records, with no guidance as to their subsequent accession, weeding, or destruction. Conversely, when administrations insist on retaining substantially earlier material, it can make access very difficult, and listing problematic or incomplete. Another awkward situation can arise when new collections of unsorted material arrive unannounced and are dumped in the record store or archive room. The poor archivist is torn in two directions; wanting both to retain the new hoard and to reject it as impeding the work in progress.

When a sharp distinction is made between the historical record and the current record, the transitional nature of many records is denied. The recent impetus to establish archives owes much to the Vatican II imperative that religious institutes return to their roots. One of the unintended effects has been to reduce sensitivity to the selective care and retention of contemporary records. We may easily forget that most records are created by administrations for the purpose of directing the life and apostolate of the institute. We must always acknowledge that the final decisions on the dispositions of records are, quite properly, a matter for the administration. For their part administrations might note the need for a more explicit articulation between the records currently held and those deposited in the archive. The key to these problems rests in the development of an agreed policy for the transfer, retrieval, and retention of records. This is not the place to go into details, save to say that each deposit would be accompanied by a transfer list, which would also serve as the basis for accessioning. It is wise to have a relatively ordered and agreed system of transfer and deposit, remembering that few archives are ever ultimately ordered, neat, and complete. To think that would be to forget that records are created, that they have a life, and that they die. Whether records find a permanent resting place in the archive, reside in the limbo of the semi-current record, or go to a fiery end, can be a matter of policy as much as of chance, or indeed of providence. Orderly transfer is often a neglected aspect of acquisition policy in the world of Catholic archives. An archivist might prudently bear in mind that building up a truly representative archive for the future may be considerably enhanced by a realistic transfer policy.

Thinning records, can cause anxiety in some archivists, as it seems so contrary to notions of historic value and guardianship. Many religious archivists play safe and keep everything that is deposited with them. Yet when they collect material from houses themselves, they will often discriminate what they will actually keep, discretely disposing of items they consider to be of no archival merit! Many retain an understandable reluctance to thin out a deposit under arrangement, or a deposit made by the administration. If one returns to the unsorted collection, the best time to thin is when one is accessioning. Thinning does not necessarily involve destruction, but can mean deposit elsewhere, or even sale. Prudent thinning can save space, boxing, and time. It is therefore a sensible economy. When the thinning involves the sale of material, it can enhance a limited budget. If a prudent transfer policy has been agreed, then many files will have been thinned before they are deposited, and difficult decisions are averted or reduced.

Many sets of financial and legal records can be thinned down after the expiry of the statutory period of retention. At the same time as a transfer policy is agreed, it might be useful to establish a retention schedule. To take an example: Under the Limitation Act of 1980 contracts for major building can be discarded after twelve years. After the expiry of that period one might keep a few basic documents and plans for permanent retention, discarding all the rest, as well as all the estimates that may have survived. Statutory requirements apart, there are a few basic rules that one can follow in deciding what documents to thin out. There is no need to retain information held in another form in the same archive, unless the document is of some intrinsic merit. I once found several boxes full of baptismal certificates and faculties for the reception of converts. The baptismal and confirmation registers for the institution were extant and recorded the same information. The children and adults were long since dead, so there seemed no particular case for retaining the certificates and faculties simply on the ground that they were old. At best they might be retained for issue to any enquiring relative. To trace descendants for that purpose would be far too expensive and time-consuming. There is no need to retain information already held in another archive, unless you are thoroughly convinced that the integrity of a set of papers requires its retention. In a number of places I have found runs of government administrative circulars or official publications relating to particular apostolates. Most of these may be found in any major library or the Public Record Office, so there seems no special reason to keep them. Spare copies of papers and documents might also be thinned out and housed separately for loan, or transfer elsewhere.

It may be that religious archivists should be wary of a bias towards older material, or against records associated largely with temporal administration. Why is it, for example, that a leather covered bank pass book of 1884 is retained, while a computerised bank statement of 1984 is discarded? Both are likely to duplicate information held elsewhere in the archive, so both could be discarded. The religious archive is not a banking archive, and unless our imaginary passbook contains unique information relevant to the history of the institute, it need not be retained. Indeed, it might profitably be sold to a dealer in financial history collectables. We need to try and develop a prospective historical imagination when we are assessing the disposition of relatively contemporary records, and a retrospective record efficiency when assessing those from the past.

It remains to consider the vexing problem of providing access while one is working on the unsorted collection. This is not an intractable problem, if one is already operating under an agreed access policy. Even at an early stage, the orderly inventory or the transfer list ensures that an item can be retrieved quickly and accurately returned to its place. If someone needs to consult a record at this stage, then it is wise to stress that the archival description is tentative. In some cases it may be necessary to deny access to a document badly in need of conservation. As the work proceeds through accessioning to listing, the improving controls on the material make it easier to provide access with precision. But all this assumes that an access policy has been agreed, with a set of rules for searchers. There is a broad consensus in the archives world about such matters as closure periods for various classes of record and searchroom practice. It is not difficult to arrive at a policy and a set of rules which meet the need of a particular institute.

One of the most difficult situations that religious archivists have discussed with me is informal entry to the archive room and unauthorised borrowing of material by members of their own institutes. It requires great tact and patience to maintain the normal standards of archival practice in such circumstances. A clear policy and well advertised rules can go far towards reducing these problems. Sometimes a lot of diplomatic work is required to make members of the institute understand that it is still possible to retain confidentiality for certain records, while also according access to outside users. It is worthwhile reflecting that we may appear eccentrically possessive to those who wish to use our archives. Sometimes we may need to remind ourselves that we are guardians of a common patrimony of Catholic history. We should try to make our archives open rather than exclusive, and this need not be inconsistent with the proper physical control of the records, nor with any appropriate need for confidentiality.

ARRANGEMENT AND LISTING

Accurate and systematic accessioning, together with detailed sampling, make it possible to look at the material as a whole, and so to determine the arrangement, with its classification and listing. By now one should have a real feel for the collection. The truly crucial point is that one must be led by the material. This allows our arrangement to reflect, so far as possible, the way the records were created, and the way they have been gathered together over the years. When first commissioned to work on some collections of records, I am often asked to catalogue or classify the records. This seems to imply that there is some pre-existing classificatory system analogous to a library classification such as Dewey or the Library of Congress. This is not the case with an archive. Each collection is unique in what has survived the passage of time, and in the order and purpose of its original creation. We need to be very cautious about imposing a schematic arrangement on our records. We should avoid a slavish copy of models such as those published in the 1981 and 1985 editions of Catholic Archives. In each case the authors quite properly comment that their schemes are guidelines only and not blueprints, that there is no scheme of general application, and that each archive shapes its own order. This fundamental notion cannot be repeated often enough.

Paradoxically, therefore, our work as archivists is ideally the opposite of what the title to this paper might seem to suggest. We are not so much sorting as trying to preserve or restore the original order in which the material was created. Archivists sometimes call this the natural or structural order. We are trying to preserve as much as we can of the long-term ways in which the records were arranged, for this reflects their use over time. Such a well established ordering reveals much of the life of the institute, and its perception of its own history. In approaching the archival arrangement we must be led by the records themselves, and our draft archival list needs to be flexible. The material itself will suggest modifications to the draft arrangement as the work proceeds.

In many cases the natural order is quite readily discerned. Registers, community annals, minutes books, correspondence files, and the like, are all readily linked to the person or entity which created them. These in turn can be linked to each other in the context of the institute and the wider Church. The arrangement and the list should reflect these organic relationships. The natural order can also reflect the way in which a set of records may have come down to us. On one occasion I discovered a hoard of neatly tied bundles of correspondence and documents spanning the period 1840-1890 in a locked bureau which had not been used since the turn of the century. These neatly tied bundles covered the whole range of business conducted by one provincial superior who had been in office for an exceptionally long term. The cache included many of the paper records prior to her time. To have dispersed these records into the classes then evolving for the main collection would have fractured the integrity of a group which uniquely reflected the work of a nineteenth century provincial superior. They showed the manner in which business was conducted by Mother X, the way she managed her records, and the way she developed her own historic archive. They were listed and described just as she arranged them, under some such title as 'Mother X's Papers'. The earlier material which she had preserved might be split off under the title 'Original Historic Archive', but preserving its arrangement by Mother X. I am emphasising the point that so far as possible we must respect the records as they have naturally evolved.

A most difficult problem is presented by the collecting activities of the type of person I referred to earlier as a serendipitous magpie. They were around long before archivists arrived on the scene! Such persons collect or have sent to them almost anything and everything; and it is through their activity that such a rich array of material survives. Often the only logic inherent in the bundles is that the contents have been collected by that one person. When letters survive which reveal him to have been a well-known collector, then we probably have a range of everyday material considered by contemporaries to be of significance in the life of the institute. Postcards, badges, personal correspondence, holiday souvenirs, and more conventionally historic material are all packed up together. Given such a diversity of material accumulated by one person, what is to be done? In this case a compromise may be appropriate. Some bundles may be retained intact to indicate Father Y's collecting role in the province or diocese, while the contents of others are dispersed to the appropriate categories. The accession number will continue to indicate the provenance of the dispersed items.

Such an instance leads us to consider the artificial or contrived arrangement, which archivists sometimes designate a devised order. Sometimes a set of records does not provide any ready evidence of a natural order. This may be the result of a number of factors. The papers may have been packed in a hurry, leaving no discernible order or logic other than getting the most into the box. It may be that over a period of long storage, the papers were rearranged to save space. Sometimes a user has been given carte blanche to forage an unarchived collection for the purposes of writing a thesis or book, with the result that records are disarranged or removed. It may be remarked that this kind of disarrangement and loss of original records has also been occasioned by the zealous promoters of the causes of saints, especially during the late nineteenth century. Though some would readily concede that this was a natural process in the life of the institute which is reflected in its records. Evidence of a natural order might be lost or distorted by straightforward accidental loss or damage. Sadly, it may also be difficult to determine an original order due to well-intentioned but ill-informed archiving in the past.

In such circumstances we may need to devise an order. It may be possible to do this with a modest confidence that one is reflecting the original order to some degree. The use of such guidelines as those published in Catholic Archives may be particularly appropriate in this instance, as they are abstracted from empirical cases of archived records similar to those the institute itself has created or acquired. Where a part of the records has been lost, it may be possible to infer an original order from that part which has survived. It is in precisely this situation that our knowledge of the historical context may help. It may be that we can make prudent use of a history based on some of the records now lost or discarded. There are many possibilities, but in the end one has to trust one's own judgement in discerning themes and devising structures.

A problem that arose while working on the records of a major church organisation may suffice as an illustration of devised arrangements. The General Secretary's correspondence and papers had been accumulating since the beginning of the nineteenth century. On several occasions in the past fifty years, large amounts of these records had been extracted, rearranged, and filed in a new system. We do not know whether any records were discarded at the same time. Although there was a substantial quantity of correspondence left, it was nevertheless a residue of the original collection. In the more recent past the residual bundles had been reboxed in chronological order. They were in their original format, folded and tied together by subject or correspondent, this information being written on the outermost letter. They seemed to cover a very wide range of subjects from workhouse children to forms of conveyancing. This was to be expected in bundles that were the residue of some major rearrangement of the original records. It is not known in which order the bundles were originally filed. On much closer scrutiny it was discovered that these letters and papers were largely concerned with education legislation and the associated political and pressure group activity, especially that relating to church schools and training colleges. It was decided to devise an order which grouped the papers into sets relating to particular parliamentary bills and acts. The papers were not originally ordered so thematically, but they had initially been evoked by such legislative events. It was felt that this arrangement would reflect the actual work of the organisation, and order the material in a useful and accessible way for searchers. The papers that remain outside the devised order would simply be listed as the General Secretary's miscellaneous papers and boxed alphabetically by subject with a person index.

Once the draft arrangement has been decided, one can proceed to list and box, using reference codes which are as simple as possible. This will help the searcher to cite and requisition a record accurately, and the archivist to produce it efficiently. The records of religious institutes are often arranged on a locality basis. This arises naturally, and sometimes reflects an institute's early history as a very loose federation of autonomous houses. This can be retained in the archival arrangement of a group of records, and the material ordered around houses. In one case CA represented Cardiff; CA/L signified the records of the local community at Cardiff; while CA/A indicated those of the apostolate that the institute conducted in Cardiff. When the institute re-structured itself into provinces, Cardiff became the provincial house for many years, and this was represented in the coding as CA/P. Within sub-groups such as these R might stand for a series or class of registers, D for documents, M for minute books, or whatever the nature of the material requires. Within each class of records, items such as bundles or volumes may then be numbered. Sometimes it may be necessary to further distinguish a single document, and a further number will suffice. On the archivist's master copy of the list, it can be useful to cross reference to the accession number. An item might be reference coded thus:

CA/L/D/1 1810-1825 Letters from Bishop Collingridge, [5/81]
Vicar Apostolic of the Western District to Mother St David Evans.

The complete list puts before the user the totality of an arrangement, and its representation of the organic unity and history of the records in a group. A searcher cannot gain an overall view of the holding from an index. It is only the list which can provide such a conspectus. It is not possible to reproduce an entire list in a paper of the present compass. The completed list should be provided with an introduction which very briefly outlines the history of the institute. It is also helpful to cite any problem or aspect of the arrangement which may affect a searcher's use of the records.

I cannot now deal in any detail with the boxing, item packing, and labelling which goes on as one is listing. It is generally better to eschew expensive and permanent labelling, to use pencil, and to work across boxes using the reference codes rather than giving boxes their own discrete numbers. In this way one can economise on money and space, as well as allowing more readily for the insertion of later accruals. An index is very much a second stage finding aid, which can be added as the work load permits. With a computer or a word processor, however, it is possible to construct an index as one proceeds with the listing. I use an Apple Macintosh LC and Portable with Microsoft Word 4.0 for document processing, and FileMaker Pro for making databases. A dedicated computer such as an Amstrad wordprocessor will suffice just as well for most purposes. It may be helpful to remark that most of the tasks described in this paper are greatly facilitated by the use of such tools, which are much easier to use than the pundits might have us believe. It is also pertinent to remark once again that in practice some of the archival stages described here as discrete may sometimes appropriately be combined.

When I have completed an assignment, I put my working notes in order and leave them with the collection. Should you move to different work, you might consider doing likewise. There are circumstances in which subsequent archivists may need to revise arrangements and dating. This can arise when missing parts of a group of records comes to light, or when work on other sources calls a chronology into question. An archivist may find old working notes of great value in determining such issues, and in resolving minor archival queries. All archivists have their own ways of working within the current consensus of best practice. The arrangement of a collection is there for all to see and judge, but our notes might explain why it came to be that way.

SOME CONCLUDING REFLECTIONS

When I feel daunted by a complex set of records, or I am concerned whether I will ever complete an arrangement, I can find myself unwittingly pondering on the qualities which might be most useful to an archivist. My personal choice would fall on patience, accuracy, discretion, and diplomacy. Another archivist might make different choices. Often our work can be boring, repetitive, and trying, especially if we are checking a long series of documents, or coming to terms with the illegible handwriting of a bundle of letters. If we are not patient, or do not persevere, an item may be misunderstood or remain unaccounted. Accuracy is essential. Where there is doubt, we must seek to verify dates and names. Never guess, but leave undated or unattributed those items whose time, provenance or identity cannot be verified. Leave inferences on such matters to those who use the records, and do not intrude your own into the archival list without exceptional cause. Discretion is needed in so many areas of our work. We come to know much that is personal and confidential. It requires discretion to balance confidentiality with access, seeking to avoid undue secrecy and a personal possessiveness of the records. It requires discretion to gather in from houses long treasured items that now require proper archival care. It can require almost infinite discretion to postpone or deny access to one of the brethren who finds it hard to accept the ordinary archival controls of the common patrimony of records. The situations are legion, and in each one needs diplomacy and tact to give discretion its best effect.

There are other occasions amid the records, when it is borne in on me that our documentary residues are mere shades of the lives of those they record. To see several hundred years of a community's life and work recorded in but a dozen or so boxes is a sobering image. They stand on the shelf like funeral urns. The irony at the heart of our work is that the historic records we tend with such care and affection are no more than the traces of real lives and relationships. There are lesser ironies, but they are no less human for that. In annals we often read of the generosity of past lay benefactors, and of the struggles to make earlier foundations. Does anything tangible remain? Perhaps there are just a few papers, books, or artefacts. All mere things, but they are things which reveal something about past lives. They are all we have, so we should treasure them. I remember once working on some registers specially maintained for the annual renewal of vows. In the early years the signatures were bold and strong. As the years went by they settled into a mature and habitual hand, until towards the end they began to fade and waver. Then for a further year or so a cross was scrawled instead. Finally, 'Requiescat in pace' and a date was scribbled in the margin. That was the only continuous record of that person. Our records tell us much, and yet nothing, about the hidden lives; about the majority who quietly sustained the lives of our institutes. It is a paradox. We only know that they were faithful. It is a fidelity to which we can respond through the quiet care and guardianship of our Catholic archives.

THE ARCHIVES OF THE ENGLISH PROVINCE OF THE SERVITE FRIARS

Stewart Foster OSM

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

The Servite Friars trace their origins to thirteenth-century Florence and the Seven Holy Founders. One of the orders of mendicant friars, from Italy they spread to France, Germany, Spain and Austria-Hungary, but did not make a foundation in Britain until 1864. A number of individual friars enjoyed links with the British Isles before that date, but it was not until Fathers Philip Bosio OSM and Augustine Morini OSM arrived in London in October 1864 that the friars may be said to have attempted a foundation across the Channel.

The immediate reason for the arrival of the friars was to act as chaplains to the Sisters of Compassion at Cale Street, Brompton. This community was aggregated to the Servite Order in 1864, having been founded at Cuves, Haute Marne, in 1840 and thereafter establishing itself in London where it worked alongside the Oratorians. The friars first lodged in a property adjacent to the Servite Sisters, but gradually relocated themselves in a variety of properties in Chelsea. In 1867, their numbers having doubled, they were assigned part of the London Oratory parish as a separate mission. In 1874 the present church of Our Lady of Dolours, Fulham Road, was opened. The friars administer the Fulham Road parish to this day.

However, there were other factors involved in the coming of the friars to England. The 1860s witnessed Garibaldi and the Risorgimento: church property and ecclesiastical institutions were penalized or suppressed, and, together with a number of other orders and congregations with strong Italian links, the Servites realized that their future survival necessitated secure foundations abroad. Curiously enough, it was Protestant England that offered the greatest prospect of security, together with opportunities for missionary work. A number of prominent English Catholics had visited Servite houses in Italy, and Faber himself was a Servite tertiary. Funds were transferred to London bank accounts on behalf of the Order in Italy, and the establishment of a priory in the city offered fresh hope for vocations and the training of young friars. By the end of the century Fulham Road had received novices from Italy and France as well as from Britain and Ireland. In 1870 Father Morini left London to establish the first Servite Priory in the United States, whilst in 1891 the first Servite community in Brussels was given its obedience from Fulham Road.

In addition to London, the Servite Friars have founded the following houses, many of them with parish apostolates attached: Fordingbridge, Hampshire (1872-75 and 1888-1909); Bognor Regis (1881-); Begbroke, Oxford (1896-); Todmorden (1914-75); Kersal, Salford (1923-); Newbury (1947-75); Dundee (1950-); Glasgow (1974-88). In 1895 the English houses were erected into a Commissary Province, and a full Province of the Order in 1914. Today the friars are engaged in a variety of apostolates: parochial ministry; retreats; hospital chaplaincy; training and formation work; and other specialized ministries. Friars from the Province also live and work in Rome, Swaziland and Hungary.

PROVENANCE

In addition to the archival material generated by the arrival of the Servites in England and their subsequent history, the Provincial Archives at St Philip's Priory, Begbroke, contain a number of items that pre-date the 1864 foundation. They comprise papers belonging or entrusted to the founding group of friars. Moreover, because so many friars were trained in London, attending St Thomas's Seminary, Hammersmith, or passing from the novitiate to Servite places of learning abroad, the archives of the English Province are especially rich in information relating to the wider order. Such material has proved very useful to scholars in our General Archives in Rome, where copies of the documents have been placed.

Although not strictly archival, there is an important collection of Servitana rescued from the continent and brought to England for safe keeping after 1864. 'The Servite Collection' is housed in a separate room but provides a useful aid to archival research. Dating from the sixteenth century onwards, the books and pamphlets in question were once part of Servite libraries in Italy and Austria. Modern works have been added to this collection so that there now exists an important resource for study of the history and spirituality of the Order.

PHYSICAL LOCATION

The archives are housed in a ground-floor room at Begbroke. Although not a large space (the room measures 7'x20'), there is a floor to ceiling height of 10' which has permitted placement of shelving above the steel cupboards, filing cabinets and open steel shelving that form the basis of the storage equipment. In common with most Provincial Archivists operating on a modest budget, we have had to improvise to some degree with regard to equipment and materials, only gradually progressing to superior products. Nevertheless, the archives utilize every inch of available space, including two large chests for maps and outsize photographic material. Moreover, the map drawers also allow the storage of exhibition material that can be produced with ease at short notice.

The archives were gathered at Begbroke in the mid-1970s and were first housed in an inferior location, a room that left a great deal to be desired with respect to physical conditions and working environment. With the availability of a ground-floor room such matters as natural light and constant temperature have been tackled, together with greater security. The chief tasks facing us at present are as follows: the repair and conservation of early material from London damaged by water some twenty years ago; the provision of a detailed list for each box of material; the sorting of as yet untouched boxes; the gathering of material from other houses so as to consolidate the Provincial holdings. Such tasks and problems will be familiar to archivists of other orders and congregations.

CONTENT

There follows a brief description of the structure of the archive, together with some notes on the more important sections. The system of classification adopted has been tailored to suit our own needs, but is broadly in keeping with the classification schedules of other orders. It has also been important, in drawing up and adapting the schedule, to keep in touch with the General Archives in Rome, both for advice and information.

Part I of the collection pertains to material from and about the Servite Friars world-wide. An introductory section houses MS histories of the Order, necrologies, biographies, etc; it is followed by a substantial Constitutional section which gathers together material relating to the government of the Order at the level of General Chapters and Constitutions. This section is arranged in chronological sequence. This is made easier by the fact that it is the General Chapter of the Order which is the highest authority for governmental change.

The third section of Part I is an important collection of official letters and reports issued by the various governmental, administrative and academic commissions and institutes of the Order. Much of the material in this section is post-Second World War, but among earlier holdings is a collection of circulars from Priors General beginning in the 1880s.

Part II of the collection pertains to the English Province itself and is divided into sixteen sections. Of these the most important are as follows: a general section containing MS histories of the English foundation, biographical registers, press cuttings and necrologies; a constitutional section housing material relating to Provincial Chapters, Council Meetings, etc; a section covering the activities of various provincial offices and ventures (e.g. finance, training, communications). A fifty-year rule is operated with regard to access to such material as the correspondence of Provincials, and matters relating to personnel. These papers are kept in a separate cabinet.

Part II continues with material relating to the foundation of the Order in England. The principle followed here has been to gather together papers pre-dating 1864 and thereafter pertaining to the London community until 1874. This latter date, that of the opening of the church in Fulham Road, acts as a rough division, whilst care has been taken to keep intact collections to which a particular theme or issue is integral even beyond 1874, e.g. relations with the Servite Sisters. A further section comprises documents relating to benefactors, trusts and wills.

Another major section is that of material pertaining to each house beginning with the oldest foundation. At present only a preliminary sorting has been achieved, but it is intended that each foundation will be further subdivided into such headings as 'community', 'parish', 'schools', etc. Part II also includes sections covering relations with the Holy See and bishops, the Servite Sisters and Enclosed Nuns, the Servite Secular Institute and lay groups, as well as a growing photographic collection from the English Province. The photographs themselves are sorted according to house, with a large collection of photographs of individual friars or groups of friars. As far as possible each photograph is identified, and it is intended that each will be numbered and described.

Part III of the collection pertains to other jurisdictions of Servite Friars and other branches of the wider Servite family. Thus, here one would find material relating to the Piedmontese Province of the Friars or the activities of the tertiary groups in the Philippines. Pictorial records of the wider order are housed here, as opposed to with the main photographic collection pertaining to the English Province. Here, too, is a collection of postcards and prints of Servite art, iconography and architecture from around the world. In particular, this latter section has proved most valuable in mounting displays and exhibitions. Thus the Provincial Archives have a public face, and can act as a useful, educational resource.

This has been but the briefest of descriptions. However, in common with other religious groups with limited time and resources, we have tried to devote as much time and energy to the consolidation of the archives as has proved possible. By way of encouragement to others, and with the benefit of having worked full-time in archives some years ago, it is my experience that once one has begun to gain an intellectual control of one's collection, i.e. when one's mental 'map' of the collection is sufficiently complete so as to facilitate sorting and listing in some detail, then the fruits of one's labours begin to show. Archival work is for the most part hidden, and is often little appreciated. Nevertheless, with a careful management of resources, judicious use of time, and a quietly-pursued policy of educating one's brethren as to the value of archives in general and one's own collection in particular, then much of our work is rewarding.

Enquiries concerning the archives should be addressed to The Archivist, St Philip's Priory, 2 Spring Hill Road, Begbroke, Oxford, OX5 1RX.

THE CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY ARCHIVES: OR THIRTY YEARS WORK IN THE BASEMENT

Rosemary Keen

WHAT IS CMS

The Church of England, unlike the Baptist and Methodist Churches, does not have one official body to organize and effect its missionary activity. The overseas work of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge (established 1698) and the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel (founded by Royal charter in 1701) was to minister to the British settlers abroad. So, in the last decade of the eighteenth century, when some members of the Eclectic Society (an Anglican discussion society) began to discuss 'foreign missions' they realized that there was scope for a society to evangelize the indigenous people.

On 12 April 1799 a group of these Evangelical clergy and laymen met at the Castle and Falcon Inn in Aldersgate in the City of London and the Church Missionary Society for Africa and the East was formed. At that meeting John Venn, rector of Clapham (and member of the Clapham sect), laid down the guidelines which the Society continues to follow. The basis was that CMS should be loyal to the leadership of bishops and to the Anglican pattern of liturgy, but that it was not to be dominated by the clergy. It emphasized the role of laymen and laywomen and was and is primarily a membership Society, with every member having equal rights. (John Henry Newman was a member while at Oxford and preached a sermon on behalf of CMS in 1830). The Society is basically run by its committees, each Secretary to the main committees being in charge of a department at headquarters. The General Committee (now General Council) is the most important and is responsible for overall policy. All CMS members are represented on General Committee and can play their part in shaping the role and work of the Society. Because it is an autonomous body within the Church of England, CMS has achieved a greater freedom of action than some other societies. Yet at the same time, because it is organized and run by its members in Britain, its leaders, particularly the Secretaries at the London headquarters, have had tremendous control over the work abroad.

This work began in Sierra Leone in 1804, but spread rapidly to India, Canada, New Zealand and the area around the Mediterranean. Its main areas of work are Sierra Leone, Nigeria, Kenya, Tanzania, Uganda, Rwanda and Sudan in Africa; India and Pakistan, Sri Lanka, China and Japan in Asia; Palestine, Jordan, Iran and Egypt in the Middle East. It has also worked extensively in New Zealand 1809-1914 and Canada 1822-1930, with smaller missions in Abyssinia 1830-42, Asia Minor (Smyrna) 1830-77, Greece 1830-75, Madagascar 1863-74, Malta 1815-43, Mauritius 1856-1929, Seychelles 1871-94, South Africa 1840-43, Turkey 1819-21, 1858-77, Turkish Arabia (Baghdad 1883-1919, Mosul 1900-1919), and the West Indies 1819-61.

THE ARCHIVES OFFICE

I was appointed as archivist on the CMS staff in 1959 but the history of the office goes back to the autumn of 1951. Scholars had for many years realized the great value of the CMS archives for the early history of the countries overseas in which the Society worked, notably West Africa. CMS agents reached Sierra Leone and many parts of Africa before any government officials arrived and their letters and journals are the first Western accounts of life in those countries.

The Pilgrim Trust gave a grant to CMS in 1951 for the express purpose of providing the means to make the early mission archives available to researchers. In the autumn of that year the first professional archivist, Mr Harry Cobb, was appointed for a three-year period. He faced a formidable task. The books and papers were in a strong-room in the sub-basement at the Salisbury Square, London, headquarters. The series of volumes were in a very confused state and many of their bindings were disintegrating, while the letters were in brown paper parcels piled high to the ceiling. Mr Cobb rapidly began to bring order from the chaos, helped by a retired missionary, Miss Grace Belcher, who typed his lists and catalogues. ¹ When he left in 1953, Miss Belcher kept the office open for researchers and dealt with staff and postal enquiries, while continuing to sort the many hundreds of packets into order and put them into folders and boxes.

The Society had celebrated its third jubilee in 1948/9 and it wanted to have its history written. There was a splendid three-volume work covering 1799-1899 by Eugene Stock, Editorial Secretary at the time of the Centenary. Stock had also written a supplementary volume for 1900-1910 but this new needed to be brought up to date. In 1959 Rev. Gordon Hewitt was chosen as author, but when he undertook the task he enquired about the availability of the more modern archives. The answer was that practically all the twentieth century material was still in cupboards in the various departments! So CMS decided to appoint a qualified archivist to the headquarters staff and I started work in 1 June 1959, having had the advantage of some years' experience under Dr Felix Hull at the Kent Archives Office.

My first office was a little space just outside the strong-room, which I shared with the research students. I was fortunate, however, in being granted an initial budget large enough to buy some adjustable racking (to complete the replacement of the old fixed metal shelves which Mr Cobb had begun) and to get some archive boxes (3,000 as a first instalment!). For the first three months Miss Belcher and I and the other two voluntary part-time staff unwrapped and boxed the piles of paper parcels which filled the quarter of the strong-room on the right of the entrance. I was able to dispose of some of the modern finance ephemeral papers which we found and thus made space for the loads of material sent down by the various headquarters' departments, notably from the General Secretary. A year or so later the office was moved to the basement level and then to a couple of light airy rooms in the Whitefriars Street premises at the back of the Salisbury Square block. The only disadvantage to this was that it was a good three minutes walk from the office, down three flights of a spiral staircase and along a subterranean corridor to the basement, and then down another staircase to the strong-room. It kept us fit!

CMS had been negotiating a move from the City of London for some years and in 1966 we crossed the river to 157 Waterloo Road, to a building designed and built for us on the site of a bombed warehouse. The General Secretary was anxious to develop the research and information services of the Society and it was decided that the archives and library should work together. The Librarian and I designed the library to provide a large research area opposite the main book-cases, with an inner office for staff, which had glass partitions so that we could supervise the researchers while still being able to converse privately ourselves. There were many students, on average 80 to 100 a year, many of them working daily for weeks or months. For some years we were very busy.

By 1975, however, there were incipient problems. The strong-room was in the basement and had allowed some space for expansion; but as the archives continued to grow rapidly I initiated a discussion on their long-term future. There had been a change of General Secretary by this time, too, and the emphasis was no longer on information and research services. There were two possibilities. Either we kept the archives on site and they gradually took over the entire basement floor, or we deposited part of them away from the headquarters building. Everyone agreed that the main task of a missionary society was evangelism and not to provide research facilities for academics, however worthy. So it was decided that we should seek for a place where the material open for research would be looked after and made available for students. A long-term contract was duly made between CMS and the University of Birmingham and the first transfer of material to the Heslop Room (Special Collections) in the Main Library took place late in 1979 and 1980.

In 1981-83 the entire headquarters administration was restructured. The Library and Archives, which had been part of the General Secretary's Department joined a new Communications Division as part of the Information Services Department. Following the transfer of the pre-1949 archives to Birmingham, the number of research people working at Waterloo Road on the history of CMS had begun to diminish. The opportunity was therefore taken to prepare the library for its new role. Traditionally, one of the library's functions had been to offer back-up material to archive users. In fields other than mission, comparative religion, or church history, this material was now 'weeded' and offered to other appropriate libraries. The space freed enabled the amalgamation of the information office with the library and the servicing of CMS personnel became the library's prime task. The information office moved into part of the library space and the archives office moved out.

Shortly afterwards, there was a further major change. For a long time, overseas Churches of the Anglican Communion had commented on the lack of any central place in London where all the missionary societies and mission bodies of the Church of England could be consulted. This discussion arose again at the moment when the United Society for the Propagation of the Gospel was seeking an alternative headquarters and when CMS was anxious to reduce its headquarters size. Canon Simon Barrington-Ward, CMS General Secretary, suggested that we should consider all coming 'Under One Roof'. The scheme involved much discussion that eventually resulted in our present Partnership House.

To prepare for this new order, 157 Waterloo Road had to be changed to open plan, in effect the whole building being gutted floor by floor. The effect on the staff was traumatic. Half moved over to share USPG's offices in Tufton Street, Westminster. The other half, including the archivist and librarian stayed in Waterloo Road. All the archives had to be packed up and stored off-site and we had only three weeks or so to do this. Birmingham University Library came to the rescue. The Heslop Room staff took that section of the archives that was not due to transfer until 1990, but was already prepared, plus 250 tea-chests full of other precious books and papers. The remaining archives (other than the section I was working on) were transferred to a strong-room at Tufton Street.

As so often happens, the refurbishment took months longer than was expected. We moved our temporary office three times before reaching our final position, which was, not surprisingly for archives, in the basement. The office-cum-workroom is immediately opposite the store-room, now shared amongst all the societies in the building. Any research students work in the library which is on the ground floor.

The amount of storage space on site for the archives is approximately 400 footrun of mobile shelving, compared to 1,900 footrun before refurbishment. This meant that initially we moved the archives which had been stored at Tufton Street back to Waterloo Road and then on to an official off-site store. Then the tea-chests came back from Birmingham and their contents were sorted and the majority sent off-site. Having had just under two years with archives in half a dozen places and with no access whatsoever either to the material at Tufton Street (we had had to pack the gangways as well as the shelves in the store) or to the contents of the Birmingham tea-chests (which were stacked four or five high), it was an improvement to have only three storage places, however scattered. The impossibility of personal access to the London off-site store was so great a difficulty, however, that we searched for an alternative. In 1990 we were able to negotiate a short-term contract for a small portion of the Church Commissioners' store at Bermondsey. At long last I was able to get everything unpacked and shelved in a place where I was personally dealing with it. The final objective appears to be in sight. This is, that the material available for research is at Birmingham, the current decade (i.e. 1990s) is at 157 Waterloo Road and the intervening decades (at present 1950s-1980s) are at Bermondsey.

WHAT ARCHIVES DO WE HOLD?

The main bulk of the archives for which I am responsible consists naturally of those of CMS itself. These include not only minute books, ledgers, etc., and vast quantities of correspondence, but also the Society's publications (annual reports, periodicals, books and pamphlets) and historical audio-visual material (films, tapes, videos, photographs and slides). Then there are records of local CMS Associations [supporting groups of CMS members] and the archives of other societies with which CMS has been linked or amalgamated over the years. There are also the deposited family papers of CMS missionaries and other agents connected with the Society and other material relating to CMS or CEZMS.

We hold the archives of three other missionary societies. Of these the most important is the Church of England Zenana Missionary Society with which we amalgamated in 1957. CEZMS is an Anglican society founded in 1880 when it separated from the interdenominational Indian Female Normal School Society (founded 1852). Its main aim was to evangelize the women of India by means of normal schools [teacher training colleges], zenana² visiting, medical missions, schools for Hindu and Muslim girls and the employment of Biblewomen. It was unusual in that it was run entirely by women and only employed women. The only man in any way connected with it was a clergyman who undertook deputations for the Society in those parishes which insisted on having men as preachers. CEZMS worked in North and South India, Sri Lanka (from 1889), China (1884-1950) and Japan (1885-92). Its archives suffered badly from numerous changes of headquarters and also from severe flood damage during the Second World War. The correspondence with the missions overseas survives only from 1921. The minute books are complete, though entries are brief. Fortunately, their periodical India's Women together with their Annual Reports provide a rich and vital source of information.

The Society for promoting Female Education in China, India and the East (commonly known as the Female Education Society) was founded in 1834. It was interdenominational, was staffed by women and employed only women agents. Its object was the establishment and superintendence of schools in China, India and the countries adjacent. It also gave schools grants of money and boxes of work for sale. Its work began in India, China and Singapore; it also spread to Palestine and Syria from the 1860s and Japan from 1877. It had shorter-lived work in South Africa (1848-92), Lebanon (1859-71) and Mauritius (1860-81). Its support for schools was widespread throughout India and China as well as Sri Lanka, Sierra Leone, Nigeria, Burma, Penang, Greece, Turkey, Algeria and throughout the Levant. In 1899, following the death of the Secretary, the Society was closed down and the work was divided amongst missionary societies of various denominations. CMS accepted twenty-four of its missionaries and their work in Palestine, China, Japan and India. The Singapore schools were handed over to CEZMS. The archives are very incomplete, comprising merely six minute books, ten finance volumes and a few printed papers. The incomplete set of the Annual Reports may be augmented by material in the British Library, which holds the reports for 1895-99 and a complete set of their periodical The Female Missionary Intelligencer.

The Loochoo Naval Mission was begun in February 1843 by a small group of naval officers who wished to send a missionary to the Loochoo Islands (Ryukyu Islands), aiming thereby to reach Japan. When their application for help from CMS was refused, they set up an independent fund and sent out Dr Bernard Jean Bettelheim, who was succeeded by Rev. G. H. Moreton. When Moreton's health failed the mission came to an end. In 1861 the balance of the funds was given to CMS as a basis of support for evangelistic work in Japan when that should be possible. CMS began work in Japan in 1869. The very small archive comprises the secretaries' papers and correspondence as well as the lengthy journals of Bettelheim and Moreton. The archive is enlivened by the naval connection, not only by the briskness of some of the comments from the secretaries, but by the inclusion of such odd items as the 1842 designs and plans for 'gangway annular scupper mouths' for use in frigates.

HOW ARE THE ARCHIVES ARRANGED AND CLASSIFIED?

The Society is basically run by committees and the Secretaries to the main committees are heads of departments at headquarters and in many ways act as a board of directors. The archives of each department have been allocated a letter to signify the department, e.g. F Finance, C Candidates, M Medical, etc., and then all the departments use basically the same classification scheme. The one exception is the work of the Africa and Asia departments. In other words, for cataloguing I have divided the work of the Society into two parts, overseas and within the British Isles.

The overseas part of the work was originally the responsibility of the Committee of Correspondence. It was to seek out prospective missionaries, to prepare them for service overseas and to be responsible for them from then on. In effect, its role combined the tasks of what were later to be the Candidates, Medical, Africa and Asia departments.

The two other committees set up when the Society began were the General Committee, which directed the overall policy, and the Committee of Accounts (later the Finance Committee), which was responsible for administering the funds. Both these committees' archives have been treated as part of the work within the British Isles.

The Society was blessed at the start with an excellent method of record-keeping. When it began, all the incoming letters were kept together, while the most important of the outgoing letters were copied into books. In June 1803, when the first mission (West Africa) was started, one of the missionaries was designated mission secretary and the correspondence with overseas was separated from the home correspondence (within the British Isles). Further missions were begun and on each occasion that a mission secretary was appointed the correspondence between that mission area and London was again separated until by 1813 each mission had its own series of papers and volumes. From the present appearance of the archives it seems probable that at some point between about 1805 and 1810 the entire early correspondence series for the missions was collated, bound and indexed. Incoming and outgoing correspondence was kept together and the series continued until 1820. From 1820 until 1880 the copies of outgoing letters were pasted into letter-books and the incoming papers were kept in bundles. Clerks at headquarters copied the incoming papers for each mission area on to quires of paper which were then bound into volumes (called mission books). They thus provided a legible copy for committee use. Until 1849 everything, including journals, was copied in full, but later only the letters were so copied. From 1880 until 1934 the letter-books continue, the incoming papers were kept year by year in a sequence numbered for each year, while a summary of them was kept in the precis books (which also acted as agenda for the committee meetings). From 1935 onwards there is a completely new filing system with incoming and outgoing correspondence kept together. The files themselves for each mission area comprise correspondence with the mission secretary, correspondence with the bishop and diocesan authorities, and separate files for each institution or place in which CMS missionaries worked. This method continues to the present day. For all these archives the 'overseas' classification system has been used.

The Africa and Asia departments have some files on general subjects and also a massive series of personal files for each missionary. For these papers I have used the 'home' method of cataloguing and classification, so that the catalogue of the Africa and Asia files from 1935 onwards has the same classification system as the Candidates department, the General Secretary's department, etc.

For all these departments I have divided the files and papers into broad groups allocating a letter to each: A Administration, C Committee work, E Education, F Finance, O Outside Organisations, Y Correspondence with overseas mission areas, etc. Where necessary, notably within the administration section, there are further subdivisions. The files in each group or subdivision are then numbered, so that each can be individually called up for reference. For the pre-1880 incoming papers of the mission series, and occasionally for certain series in other departments' papers, each individual item has its own number. For the most part, however, the reference is for a group of papers comprising a file. For the most recent papers, where the files have been divided into decades, I have indicated the decade by using numbers after the department letter. For example, G/AP 1 is the General Secretary's general policy file up to 1949. The same file for the 1950s is G59/AP 1, then G69/AP 1 for the 1960s, and so on for succeeding decades.

RECORDS OF THE HEADQUARTERS' DEPARTMENTS

When I first began work on the CMS archives I was amazed and almost overwhelmed by the amount of correspondence. This was particularly true of the Africa and Asia departments. Because the Society was in independent body it kept a very tight hold on what its agents did and had strict rules about its organisation. All the missionaries had to keep diaries, preferably detailed, and they were encouraged to describe not only what they did, but what they saw (even if they disapproved of it). These journals were to be sent back to headquarters every quarter by the mission secretary. The secretary in fact saw everything, for no missionary was allowed to write directly to London. Letters would be sent to the mission secretary who normally sent them on, after having read them, but sometimes kept them and sent copies or notes instead. Headquarters' permission was needed for practically everything, from the purchase of a bicycle to the transferring of an agent from one place to another. As a result, the mission archives at headquarters are a very rich source, not only for Church and mission history (mainly Anglican but also for the other Christian bodies working in the same fields, e.g. the Catholic work in Uganda), but also for the student of anthropology, politics, sociology, geography and economics. The papers retained by the mission secretary overseas formed the nucleus of the earliest diocesan archives of the developing churches.

The archives of other departments, though not so great in volume, also contain much of interest. The General Secretary's department is the most important, partly because the General Committee was ultimately responsible for CMS policy. Although the Secretaries have always acted as a group, the Honorary Clerical Secretary [or General Secretary as he was known from 1922 onwards] was primus inter pares. It was his task to correspond with bishops, so there are files for the appointment of overseas bishops and on the constitution of the growing churches of the Anglican Communion. He was also considered chief Candidates Secretary, so the department's papers include the records of Islington College (the CMS missionary training college) and private and confidential correspondence about prospective missionaries. As he was also ultimate arbiter these confidential letters also include much on private matters for all the staff, as well as notes of interviews with bishops, archbishops and, of course correspondence with the Society's President (a distinguished and influential layman) and its Patron (the archbishop of Canterbury).

The Medical department was set up in 1891 and served both the Medical Committee, which was responsible for the administration of medical missions overseas, and the Medical Missions Auxiliary Fund Committee whose task was to arouse support within the British Isles to enable the MMA 'to increase the number and equip thoroughly the medical missions of the Society'. The department's archives contain correspondence with all the hospitals and other medical institutions founded and staffed by CMS. There is also a medical periodical called Mercy and Truth which contains articles about the institutions and the medical work (though emphasis is on evangelistic opportunities rather than purely medical details).

The Candidates department's papers mainly comprise the application papers of prospective missionaries. Unfortunately, it was this department that suffered when an incendiary damaged headquarters in the Blitz. The committee minutes survive, though many volumes have charred edges; but for the correspondence there is one set of bound volumes of letters for 1846-65 and then a horrible gap until the early 1890s. A small tin trunk full of the 'blue packets' of application papers was all that survived for the period up to 1940.

The Finance department has the usual financial volumes, papers about property, etc. There is also interesting correspondence with the Foreign Office and other government departments such as the Post Office 1876-1900, and a packet of papers on the slave trade in Zanzibar 1866-84 (in which the Finance Secretary of the day, Edward Hutchinson, had a special interest).

There remain the papers of what used to be called the Home Division (our present Britain Region and Communications Division). Its heyday was the 1950s. Rev. Max Warren, one of our most famous General Secretaries was appointed in 1942 and set about immediately to formulate and prepare the Society for its role in a post-war, post-Empire Britain. He gathered a brilliant team of Secretaries, of whom Rev. Leslie Fisher was appointed Home Secretary. He was in charge of every aspect of work within the British Isles. He had four departments (headed by Under-Secretaries), each with many sections under them. The four comprised the Deputy Home Secretary (responsible for deputation work and the field staff), Editorial Secretary (in charge of all the Society's publications), Publicity Director and Education Secretary.

CATALOGUES, LISTS AND INDEXES

There are catalogues and lists in both Birmingham and London for all the pre-1949 archives (i.e. those available for research in Birmingham) and in London there are lists for the 1950s-80s archives. There are also many card indexes.

The main indexes (name, place and subject) contain entries from all the mission catalogues, plus the usual mass of useful information found by people when listing or browsing in the archives. They will eventually cover all the catalogues. As the pre-1880 mission catalogues list the missionaries and agents in alphabetical order and also give their mission stations, I have been able to incorporate in the place index an alphabetical list of agents (with dates) for each station. This is often a useful short cut for staff and students. In a similar way there are lists of the CEZMS mission stations with their agents.

There are also working indexes, such as those for retired and dead missionaries which will probably always be kept apart from the main indexes. There are several indexes, however, at present kept individually, which will be incorporated in the main indexes after they have been copied onto microfiche separately for easier reference. For names, these include lists of CEZMS and FES missionaries, authors of articles in the CMS periodicals C.M. Intelligencer and Mercy and Truth, and obituaries in the Intelligencer and the C.M. Gleaner. For both names and places, there are indexes of the illustrations in the periodicals C.M. Gleaner and Mercy and Truth. These indexes in particular are invaluable for answering enquiries, as nearly always the presence of an illustration means that there is something else about the subject in the contents of the periodical. The index to the photo collection is kept separately, but comprises names and places.

The whole archive, I suppose, is name-orientated, which may in part reflect that the Society is a membership society. Provided you have a name to start your research, we can pretty well guarantee to tell you whether or not the archives will contain interesting material for you. The problem of how to discover that name in the first instance is one with which I am still struggling!

AVAILABILITY FOR RESEARCH

The CMS manuscript archives operate a 40-year 'closed' rule for research. At present the material up to 1949 is available. There are two exceptions to this rule. The unofficial and deposited archives (family papers of missionaries and agents and material relating to CMS but not part of the official archive) are made available to researchers in accordance with the wish of the depositors. This often means that more recent material can be studied. The second exception applies to the official mission series for mainland China (not Hong Kong). The CMS missionaries left China in 1951 and therefore these two additional years 1950/51 have been opened now.

From the 1950s onwards, files have been arranged and listed by decades. Files for the 1950s will be opened in 1999 and so on for each decade.

Catalogues of all the series will be available in Birmingham from the time of transfer. The Heslop Room also holds sets of the CMS Proceedings/Annual Report/Yearbook 1801-1985, the CMS Historical Record 1919, 1922-1956/7, and the CMS Annual Letters (reports from missionaries sent annually to headquarters), together with Stock's History of CMS, Charles Hole's Early History of CMS, Gordon Hewitt's Problems of Success: a History of CMS 1910-1942 and Jocelyn Murray's Proclaim the Good News (which takes the history of the Society up to the 1980s).

Any researcher should write in advance to Miss C. L. Penney, Special Collections, Main Library, University of Birmingham, PO Box 363, Birmingham B15 2TT. A formal letter of introduction from an appropriate person (Supervisor, Head of Academic Department, etc.) is necessary, and it is helpful if you can indicate which particular series you wish to study. For those nearer London there are sets of catalogues at Waterloo Road. The mission catalogues are for sale (at headquarters) and copies may be found in the copyright libraries and elsewhere.

I should conclude by saying that until I retire I shall be very happy to be consulted by anyone seeking further information about our archives. Archivists are always partial to their own archives, but I feel that I have been most fortunate to have been able to spend my entire professional life working on and cataloguing such a very fine collection.

NOTES

1. Mr Harry Cobb published an article on CMS archives in Archives, Vol. II, No. 14, Michaelmas 1955, pp. 293-299. Although some of it is now out of date, it provides further details about the main classes of records.

ASSOCIATION OF CHURCH ARCHIVISTS OF SPAIN

The Association of Church Archivists of Spain is the Institution of the Spanish Episcopal Conference and dependent on the Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church.

The aims of the Association are to encourage and facilitate the work of ecclesiastics, both regular and secular, who are in charge of church archives so that they may recognize and solve common problems.

It is concerned with the conservation, organization and cataloguing of Spanish church archives following the directions of the church authorities and maintaining contact with the civil authorities in the matter of archives.

It also aims at promoting the scientific and technical activities of its members by encouraging the compilation and publication of inventories and catalogues of the ecclesiastical documentary heritage of Spain.

In addition, it also promotes meetings and conferences whereby archivists can make known the scientific projects in which different archives are engaged and contribute to the training of persons who are in charge of archives.

One of the most important scientific activities of the Association is the publication, either on a regular and occasional basis, of the results of different projects undertaken by the Association, either on its own or in collaboration with other civil or ecclesiastical bodies.

MY BROWNE HEAVEN: THE FATHER BROWNE S.J. COLLECTION

The Rev. E. E. O'Donnell S.J.

In the year 1897 two Irish youths set sail from Queenstown (now Cobh) in the south of Ireland bound for mainland Europe. Seventeen-year-old Frank Browne was accompanied by his older brother, William, and clung fast to a parting gift from his Uncle Robert - a camera. The first photographs that Frank took during his Grand Tour of France, Switzerland and Italy were the opening shots of a salvo of photography that would still be reverberating nearly a century later. When Field Marshal Earl Alexander of Tunis went to Dublin to visit Frank on his deathbed in 1960, he knew he was seeing for the last time not only "the bravest man I ever met" but a man who would one day be recognised as one of the greatest photographers of all time.

When I was working in the archives of the Irish Jesuit Provincialate in 1985, I unearthed an old trunk which had been buried there for a quarter of a century. To my amazement I discovered that it contained no less than 42,000 negatives of photographs taken by Frank Browne during his sixty-three years of life as a Jesuit. Now, as Curator of the Father Browne S.J. Collection, I would like to give you some idea of the scope of Frank Browne's work and to describe the preservation work that was essential for its survival.

SCOPE OF THE COLLECTION

The most interesting way for me to tell you what the Collection contains will be to give you a biographical sketch of the photographer's life, emphasising the features of most importance to you as British and Irish ecclesiastical archivists.

On his return from Europe in 1897 Frank entered the Jesuit novitiate at Rahan in County Offaly. If he bought his camera with him, he would have had to turn it in as a 'superfluity'! His brother, William, likewise went on for the priesthood and was for many years secretary to his Uncle Robert who was Bishop of Cloyne from 1894 to 1935.

After his first vows, Frank moved to Dublin in 1899 and studied classics at the Royal University for three years. One of his fellow students there was James Joyce. Since Jesuit students were still not allowed to have cameras, we have no Browne portrait of the literary artist as a young man. For his philosophical studies Frank was sent to Chieri, near Turin, from 1903 to 1906. He was able to borrow a camera for the summer holidays, one which was spent in Venice and another in Monte Carlo.

On his return to Dublin, he taught at his old alma mater, Belvedere College, for five years. He became founder-editor of The Belvederian, the school annual which still retains the format established by Frank during its first five years of publication. Then, and subsequently, it contained many of his own photographs: in 1906 he had founded the Camera Club, thus acquiring his first camera as a Jesuit. In the early issues of the annual we can see some fine examples of his skill and of the subjects that interested him. The monastic ruins of Ireland (Cistercian, Dominican, Franciscan and Augustinian) feature prominently in his Collection at that time. During this period - in 1909 to be precise - he went on a voyage to Rome, via Lisbon, with his Uncle Robert. Frank's sister, Mary, was a nun in the papal household so Bishop Browne and his nephew were able to have breakfast with His Holiness. Afterwards, Frank was able to take some snaps of the Pope (now Saint) Pius X.

In 1911 he began his theological studies at the Milltown Park in Dublin where he was ordained a priest by his Uncle Robert on 31 July 1915. Before that significant day, however, the Bishop was instrumental in occasioning an even more memorable event in his nephew's life. It was April 1912 that he bought Frank a first-class ticket for the first leg of the maiden voyage of R.M.V. Titanic.

In a recent feature on the Father Browne Collection, The Independent newspaper (London) reckoned that his Titanic album would fetch at least two million pounds sterling at auction. The archivist is not selling it! It is indeed a remarkable album. Beginning with a portrait of the millionaire, Mr J. J. Astor, boarding 'the first and last Titanic Special' at Waterloo Station, it contains the last picture taken of Captain Smith and the only photograph ever taken by anyone in the liner's Marconiroom.

Father Browne became a military chaplain in 1916 and spent the best part of three years on the front line in France and Flanders with the Irish Guards. His fellow-chaplain, Father Willie Doyle S.J. was killed. In his biography of that saintly man, Professor Alfred O'Rahilly makes frequent reference to Father Browne and to his ministry among the horrors of the Somme, Wytschaete, Ypres and Passchendaele. Injured five times and gassed once, he won the M.C. and bar and the Croix de Guerre. In 1919 he returned to the trenches to take photographs for an illustrated lecture on the last days of Willie Doyle.

Recently, I visited the GHQ of the Irish Guards at Wellington Barracks in London to see if they had any wartime photographs taken by Frank Browne during his years as their chaplain. From their meticulously-kept files, the archivist was able to produce two albums with 'Major F. M. Browne M.C.' embossed in gold letters on their covers. These contained pictures taken mainly at Warley Barracks, Essex, and during 'The Watch on the Rhine' at Cologne in 1919.

On being demobilized from the Irish Guards, Frank returned to teach at Belvedere College until he was appointed superior of St Francis Xavier's Church in Dublin in 1922. Because he went nowhere without his camera, it is not surprising to find 4,600 photographs of Dublin in his Collection. Many of these were used to illustrate The Annals of Dublin (Wolfhound Press, 1987).

Due to ill health - presumably the aftermath of his gassing - he was sent to Australia for two years in 1924. Sailing from Falmouth on the S.S. Orama, which had been a troopship during the war, he broke his journey to Australia by stopping over at Cape Town and took many photographs of Irish priests and nuns working in the Cape Province of South Africa.

In Australia itself he photographed all the major cities and travelled for thousands of miles in the outback. He recorded Test Cricket at Adelaide and Brisbane, horse-racing at Melbourne, gold-mining at Ophir Creek and the sheep-shearing competition at Kangarooie. His photographs of the former prison colony at Botany Bay and of Sydney Harbour without its bridge are among the more important items in his Collection. He also took photographs of nuns, priests and brothers: one example shows the novices taking their vows as Sisters of Mercy at Nymagee, New South Wales. His last Australian pictures were taken at Perth and Fremantle whence he took ship for Ceylon via the Cocos Islands. He photographed churches and convents in Ceylon and took two self-portraits entitled 'Me and the Elephant' (Colombo) and 'Self in Rickshaw' (Kandy), 1925.

The return voyage to Plymouth brought Fr Browne to Aden, Yemen, Somaliland, Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Crete, Greece, Italy, France, Gibraltar, Spain and Portugal. Clearly, this added an important international dimension to his work.

For the rest of his life he worked on the Missions and Retreats Staff of the Irish Province of the Jesuits. For most of this time (1931-57) he was based at Emo, County Laois, but his work took him to every county in Ireland and all over England, Scotland and Wales. The missionary's work included the giving of retreats to convents of nuns. Fr Browne gave hundreds of such retreats and usually took photographs of the convents and of the Sisters. Gorey (Loreto), Kylemore (Benedictine), Maryborough (Presentation), Newtownbarry (F.C.J.), Newry (Carmelite), Portlaw (St Joseph of Cluny) and Rathdowney (St John of God) are mentioned on a single page of his records.

Famous pilgrimages, such as those at Walsingham and Dunwich in England, at Lough Derg and Tubbercurry in Ireland, came under his careful scrutiny. At Walsingham, for instance, in four successive years in the 1930s, he shows Fathers Vernon Johnson S.J., Ronald Knox, Fabian Dix O.P. and Martin D'Arcy S.J. preaching to throngs of pilgrims in the open air.

Since Parish Missions were preached in the evenings, Frank Browne had plenty of time during the day to pursue his quasi-professional hobby. As he became more and more expert with the camera, and as cameras became more and more sophisticated, he began to concentrate on particular themes and to submit his work for publication in specialist periodicals. The Tatler & Sketch presented illustrated features on Country Houses, the Kodak Magazine ran a series on English Cathedrals, and Irish Travel published many gems of the Irish countryside, to give but three examples. As he became better known as a photographer, he was commissioned by various organizations to submit photographs for archival purposes. Two instances: The British Museum asked him to photograph antiquities of England, and the Governing Body of the Church of England asked him to photograph its churches in East Anglia during the late 1930s - lest they be damaged in the forthcoming hostilities. The Photographic Society of Ireland invited him to judge competitions on its behalf and - supreme accolade - the Society of Jesus had him photograph each of its houses in Ireland. He even photographed the Jesuit burial-plot in Glasnevin Cemetery, Dublin, where he now rests in peace.

CONSERVING THE COLLECTION

What makes the Father Browne Collection most valuable is the fact that Frank scrupulously dated and captioned each of his negatives. If you, as an archivist, are in possession of old photographs, the first thing to ensure is that they are dated and captioned. If nobody in your organization can help, a professional outsider will be able to give you approximate dates, based on dress and furnishings. It is important that the names of any people in the photographs be recorded: Fr Browne kept an alphabetically-indexed notebook where he kept the names of anyone he pictured. A glance at this will tell you, for instance, that he photographed 'Most Rev. Leo Parker, Bp. of Northampton, 17 April, 1949'. This record goes on to say where in the Collection the portrait of Bishop Parker is to be found.

The sad news about the Browne negatives is that they are mostly on nitrate-based film. All such negatives, anywhere in the world, are rapidly deteriorating in quality and the images will have disintegrated by the turn of the century. If you have any such negatives, you are hereby informed that they are highly unstable - even dangerous! This is not simply being alarmist. If you tell your insurance company that you keep nitrate negatives on the premises, it will not only refuse to insure them but will withdraw its cover from your building until the offending items are removed.

The only solution is to have the negatives transferred to safety-film, an expensive operation. To give you some idea of cost, the work of transferring the 42,000 Browne negatives to safety-film came to IR£60,000. I am happy to say that Allied Irish Bank picked up the tab. This was a very worthy and enlightened exercise in sponsorship for which the Irish Jesuits are extremely grateful.

At the same time as each negative was being 'saved', its caption and date were recorded on computer. The computer programme also included one hundred 'key' words so that one could enter items such as 'children', 'trains', 'nuns', 'army', 'bridges', 'convents' and so on. This, of course, was a time-consuming business, taking three years in all. Over 39,000 negatives have now been saved and catalogued; the task is due to be completed - on schedule - by the end of this year (1991).

As a result of the computerization, you will be able to write to me (at Gonzaga College, Dublin 6) and ask, say, if the Browne Collection has a photograph of Mr T. M. Bourke of Melbourne, taken in 1919. Within minutes, I should be able to tell you, having drawn a blank under 'Melbourne', that there is indeed a picture of Mr Bourke taken, not in Australia, but in Wellington Barracks (London) while he was serving in the army that year. I shall also be able to tell you how good a photograph it is: the programme includes a 'star scale' of one to five, ranging from the pathetic to the brilliant.

Whereas the nitrate negatives of Frank Browne varied from postcard-size through demi-postcard-size to 35mm, all the new negatives on safety-film are standard 35mm. This has facilitated storage. One can purchase transparent, acetate 'envelopes' that accommodate seven strips of 35mm film, with six images on each strip, i.e. forty-two images per page. One can also purchase loose-leaf binders that hold one hundred of these pages each. The 42,000 Browne negatives will thus fit neatly into ten of these binders.

The computer can also do print-outs by request. If you wanted a list, say, of all the Catholic bishops that Fr Browne photographed in England and Wales between 1910 and 1939, the computer - given a little time for 'thought' - will instruct the printer to run off a list of the required captions.

As regards the 'positives' in the Browne Collection, and there are over a thousand of them, these are going to be kept separately in acid-free envelopes. The experts tell me that ordinary paper envelopes (whether white or brown) will destroy any photograph in the course of a few decades. The 'positives', of course, have been incorporated into the computer's index as described above.

The story does not stop here, although it would if you had no intention of giving public access to your photographs. The Irish Jesuits are aware that in the Father Browne Collection they are in possession of a treasure-trove of national, indeed international, significance. The publication of Father Browne's Ireland and The Genius of Father Browne (Wolfhound Press, Dublin, 1989 and 1990 respectively) has elicited an enormous response from the public and from the media. Father Browne's England, mentioned in a splendid feature on Father Browne in the February 1991 edition of the prestigious British Journal of Photography, will be published in 1992, and Father Browne's Australia is to follow. In order to make the Collection available to research-students and to libraries, the next step will be to have the new negatives transferred to Optical Disks. When this transfer has been effected - the technology for so doing is still at the experimental stage but is expected to be available in less than twelve months' time - you will be able to sit at a Visual Display Unit and ask a computer about that Australian, Mr Bourke. Instead of assuring you that his picture exists and telling you where to find it, the Optical Disks will whirl for a few seconds and then, lo and behold, T. M. Bourne of Melbourne will be staring at you from the screen. This may not be Heaven - but it will be an archivist's paradise.

THE RECORDS OF THE CONVERTS' AID SOCIETY

Rosemary Rendel

There comes a time in the life of any society when the records of its history need to be organized - usually after its first fifty or seventy-five years in operation. In the case of the Converts' Aid Society, this has never yet been done. This need to establish a record is partly due to the realization that other people can benefit from the society's experience and partly due to pressure of space; when cupboards and filing cabinets become filled with non-current files and paper parcels (which may contain information on the founding organization or merely trivia about which day a committee should meet) action has to be taken! It appears, from what is left, that a big clear-out of material took place during the second world war. It may be, of course, that the work was done in a more informal way before that time and there was little build-up of paperwork beyond the bare minimum.

There is a complete set of annual reports through this period, but only back to 1914, whereas the Converts' Aid Society was founded in 1896, at the request of Leo XIII; but the reports for 1918-23 are missing. Should anyone reading these paragraphs have copies of early twentieth-century material, it would be much appreciated if they felt able to donate it to the society's archive.

The sorting of the Converts' Aid Society's records and organization of an historic archive has been made possible by the fortunate existence of a large loft in the Converts' Aid Society house. Once the un-piling and identification of brown paper parcels, their labelling partly obscured by soot and dust, had been achieved, it was possible for slatted wood shelving to be fixed round three walls; archive boxes were then ordered to hold the case-files dealing with each individual helped by Converts' Aid Society, these being the most damaged and illegible of the records because they had been wedged in many cases, into small pigeon-holes. But the loft is now quite an effective archive room with access by a strong and easily-sloping folding wood staircase.

In establishing an archive, one usually has two objectives: First, there is the historical and, secondly, there is the back-up to current work. In the case of Converts' Aid Society, although one is thinking chiefly in historical terms, it might well be necessary to look up earlier statements of expenses when deciding current levels, or to look back to surveys and maintenance schemes for various properties over a period of years, when deciding the future potential of a house, so one keeps more of these sorts of detailed record than one might otherwise do.

From the historical point of view, one has to try and visualise the sort of history that might be written, because the principle of selection underlies the building up of an archive, unless space is unlimited. How much one can keep depends on the space available and on the time and manpower that present or future staff can provide, because archives have to be added to every five or ten years; and to keep within a fixed space, they have to be 'weeded' or reduced at the same time, so that more recent papers can be included. If mountains of paper are allowed to accumulate unselectively, they become virtually unusable and it is this which produces the panic reaction of the bonfire or the pulping machine.

Apart from the complete set of annual reports and accounts (though with the gaps mentioned above), there are the minute books of the executive committee from 1915-35 and from 1941-60 with typed, unbound minutes from 1974-77. The early minute books include the League of Prayer and the League of English Martyrs as existing or earlier societies which were incorporated into the Converts' Aid Society. There is a whole shelf of committee papers, starting about 1946 and including several sub-committees. There is another whole shelf of very fat brown paper packets dealing solely with the house Top Meadow, and this does not include a cupboard in the office, full of similar Top Meadow parcels. Further sorting is needed here. The bulkiest items in terms of space are the case-files of individuals, helped by or applying to the society, which fill one whole wall in their archive boxes; but the largest item in terms of weight is the pile of cash books, day books and ledgers of expenses. These are not of quite the interest they might be as they seem to have survived by chance rather than by plan, and in most cases cover only a year or two; the statements of accounts given in each annual report are more useful. One need not detail other items at this stage. They are labelled and there will need to be a list.

One short wall has been given over to Freddie Chambers' personal papers. These include his reminiscences running through a good many issues of the Southwark Record, fortunately complete. There is also his obituary pamphlet by Bishop Gordon Wheeler and his own memorial pamphlet to Mgr Ronald Knox, both of which give a good many details about the Converts' Aid Society. The various Catholic Truth Society pamphlets on Mgr Vernon Johnson would, I think, add further information. There are various albums or early family photographs, but unfortunately few of them are described or identified. It is, however, slightly misleading to call these papers simply personal papers as there was obviously no clear dividing line, for him, between his personal papers and Converts' Aid Society papers, as far as correspondence was concerned.

The Converts' Aid Society papers give a fascinating picture, among other things, of a group of dedicated people running a national charity in a wholly personal way so that its work remains always on the level of one to one assistance, an achievement of which I had no idea until I began going through the papers; and this interpretation of its work continued by each succeeding secretary, so well-founded has the tradition become.

Yet I do not think that a really comprehensive, fully detailed history of the Converts' Aid Society is likely to be written, if only because not many people with the right expertise could find the time and finance to attempt it.

But an outline history to include the many personalities involved, seems quite possible. I think, also, that a social/devotional history of the Church (using the word 'devotional' in the sense of 'spiritual and corporal works of mercy') in the first half of the twentieth century or, better perhaps, between Vatican I and Vatican II, would now be very useful; it would cover the numerous specialized and collective activities of the Church started in this period, all of them sustained by unusual individuals whose lives became inseparable from the work they were doing. A mere catalogue of these societies, of which the Converts' Aid Society is one of the most important, would be illuminating. In most cases, they achieved a success far beyond what their size would suggest but their records are scattered throughout dioceses and parishes all over the country. Some of them were short-lived or were a response to a short-term need; others gathered momentum to become national institutions; but as a phenomenon of direct action by the Consensus Fidelium in response to a seen need, or in obedience to a papal suggestion, they would well repay study.

Note:

This account of the records of The Converts' Aid Society was first published in the Society's Annual Report of 1988. At that time the records were housed in the Society's offices at Twickenham. They are now held in the Society's new offices at The Old Vicarage, Upper Wolvercote, Oxford, OX2 8AH. The records are not open for research but enquiries may be addressed to J. S. Nightingale, Secretary of the Society. Information about any records referring to the Society, particularly minutes and missing annual reports, would be welcomed. This article is re-published by courtesy of Miss Rendel and Mr Nightingale. Miss Rendel is Secretary of The Catholic Record Society.

CATHOLIC ARCHIVES IN THE NETHERLANDS: THE LEGACY OF 'GLORIOUS ROMAN LIFE'

Joos van Vugt

According to the latest statistics (of 1 January 1990) there are 5,550,389 Catholics in the Netherlands, equalling 37.3% of the total population of 14,892,574. These statistics, however, suggest a greater number and a greater unity than Dutch Catholics can muster nowadays. Their community is no longer the self-assured monolith it was – or pretended to be – up till the 1950s. How different things were in the first half of the century, when in many regions more than 90% of all Catholics went to church each weekend; when the same percentage voted for Catholic politicians and when dissident voices were seldom, if ever, heard. The change took place in the 1960s, when in many respects an era came to an end. Inevitably, this development has affected the care for Catholic archives, as will be described below. But first let us take a look at the developments which led up to the present situation.

CATHOLIC EMANCIPATION

From the early nineteenth century onward there has been a steady build-up of Catholic institutions in the Netherlands, marking the emancipation of Dutch Catholics from a subdued and relatively indigent minority into a self-assured (and sometimes even overbearing) and well-to-do community. The first half of the nineteenth century saw a reorganization of the ecclesiastical organization itself. The second half of the century was remarkable for the unprecedented expansion of Catholic education and charitable institutions: schools, orphanages, hospitals, homes for the elderly, institutions for the physically or mentally handicapped, etc.

It was this phase that religious institutions of sisters, brothers and priests came into prominence and, in some respects, had their heyday. Even under the Calvinist Dutch Republic (c. 1648-1795) a few religious orders like the Jesuits and the Franciscans had maintained a precarious foothold in the Netherlands. Some small contemplative convents also survived, due to the fact that they were situated in enclaves which were exempt from the political authority of The Hague. But apart from these exemptions, at the French occupation of the Netherlands (1795-1814) convent life was virtually extinct. But then it experienced a remarkable come-back. In the wake of an upsurge in religious enthusiasm – a reflection of an international revival of Catholicism – the decades after 1820 saw the birth of several religious institutions of Dutch origin. Their number was supplemented by a large number of institutions of Belgian, German and French origin, many of which sought refuge in the Netherlands from political repression. In this way the years 1870-80 saw an influx of German institutions, driven out by the Kulturkampf. The years 1880-90 and particularly the first years after the turn of the century saw many French institutions establishing houses and schools in the south of the Netherlands, after they had been made jobless and penniless by French anticlericalists. In all, some 170 orders and congregations of sisters, brothers and regular priests found a place among Dutch Catholics. Both Dutch and foreign institutions succeeded in attracting a fair number of Dutch novices. During the nineteenth century they enjoyed a steady if seldom spectacular growth.

'PILLARIZATION'

From about 1890 onward a new phenomenon came into being. Within the Catholic community a host of new explicitly Catholic organizations were founded in every conceivable field of social activity. Every trade or craft, every social, political or cultural ambition was catered for. Furthermore, the new organizations, though usually under rather strict clerical supervision, were characteristically manned and run by laymen and not by priests or religious.

By the 1920s the Dutch Catholic minority had turned into a largely self-sufficient subculture, displaying both the pros and cons of such communities: solidarity and strength on the one hand and narrow-mindedness and self-satisfaction on the other. Since Dutch Protestants, liberals and socialists all to some extent chose the same course, the result was a wholesome division of Dutch society into denominational and ideological groups or 'pillars'. This system of 'pillarization' was by no means confined to the Netherlands alone—countries like Belgium, Austria, Switzerland have had their share – but here it went to extremes.

The consequences for the religious institutions were ambivalent. On the one hand they no longer constituted an elite as laymen became educated and more self-assured. On the other hand convent life flourished in the favourable religious and political climate. Most institutions saw their membership growing happily. In the 1930s no less than 90 congregations of sisters totalled 30,000 members: 2% of the Dutch female population of about 1.5 million! The majority of the many thousands of Catholic primary schools, colleges, hospitals, asylums and other social institutions – even the Catholic University – were managed and in many cases exclusively manned by religious. Dutch missionary efforts too reached a peak in this decade.

It is this interwar period that has been ironically described as the decades of 'glorious Roman life', pointing as much at its real glories as at its recurring fits of arrogance.

THE CRISIS OF DUTCH CATHOLICISM

After the Second World War 'glorious Roman life' seemed in a position to continue on a prewar footing as if nothing had happened, but appearances were deceiving. Wartime experiences had confronted many intellectuals with the shortcomings of their own Catholic milieu. They no longer accepted the thesis that perfect isolation was necessary to preserve Catholic faith. The internal unity of Catholics threatened to be broken as individuals started to put their political and social preferences above religious solidarity. In 1954 a pastoral letter by the Dutch episcopate, simultaneously threatening and imploring Catholics to keep to the old ways, succeeded merely in causing irritation. As the Netherlands embarked upon a vigorous program of industrialization a generally faster pace of life was introduced which boded ill for the stability the bishops would dearly have maintained. Last but not least, influences from abroad played their part. Nouvelle théologie, democratic fervour, the mere announcement of the second Vatican council, all incited Dutch Catholics with an enthusiasm for change which, for some time, gave them quite a reputation for modernism in the Catholic world at large.

In the early 1960s the huge system of Catholic social organizations started to totter. Within a few years the 'pillar' crumbled under countless liquidations, mergers and reorganizations. So far these developments could easily be interpreted as beneficiary and positive, but soon they turned into a real crisis. The Catholic community was eroded by a secularization process stronger than in most other European countries. Nowadays, the non-religious, many of them former Catholics, represent some 40% of the Dutch populace. A large percentage of Dutch Catholics has slipped into a mere nominal membership without any substantial ties with their Church and parish. The remaining faithful have become divided into conservative, progressive and moderate factions which find it hard to keep on speaking-terms with one another.

For orders and congregations these developments put an end to an era of uninterrupted growth and success. The first bad sign was the tendency of recruitment results to decline. At first many institutions suspected that the cause might be found in their own peculiar situation but they soon realized that all ecclesiastical institutions, both secular and regular, suffered from an almost universal 'vocational crisis'. This crisis took a dramatic turn after 1965, when recruitment came to a virtual standstill.

As early as the 1930s the congregations of brothers and sisters, which did not possess the prerogatives of priesthood, had felt the pressure of the rapidly growing number of laymen in education and nursing. After the war the situation changed dramatically to their disadvantage. The number of laymen active in the traditional hunting-grounds of congregations rose sharply while the religious institutions saw their (wo)manpower diminishing by the ageing of their membership and by the many cases of members leaving convent life, especially in and about 1970. Since the 1960s orders and congregations have been forced to hand over many schools, hospitals, asylums and the like to new boards and foundations which are dominated by laymen. But there were positive developments too. The renewal of religious life, stimulated by the Vatican council, has given new spiritual and social elan to many priests, brothers and sisters who were in danger of ending up in a rut. Many orders and congregations have been very successful in their missions in Indonesia and Africa and have succeeded in founding prospering communities there, which in the long run will no doubt take over from their Dutch founders. In the Netherlands they have developed many new activities, less visible and less impressive perhaps than their huge institutions in the old days but nonetheless of great value to many people. All this does not alter the fact that, as things stand, within twenty of thirty years many institutions will have disappeared from the Dutch scene.

THE CATHOLIC DOCUMENTATION CENTRE

In the 1960s there was a general awareness that an era in Catholic history had come to an end. Very few Catholics found reason for regret in this. Emotionally, they had been prepared by publicists and cabaret artists who did much to clear the air by humorously exposing the anomalies and peculiarities of 'glorious Roman life'. The large majority enjoyed their new spiritual freedom and did not care to be reminded of the recent past. Dutch Catholicism seemed about to make a fresh start. For historical research, however, this mentality held an acute danger. Many Catholic associations, unions and similar organizations took this fresh start very literally by stowing their archives in damp cellars or by dumping them into containers.

The alarm was sounded in 1967 by Dr Adrian F. Manning, professor of contemporary history at the Catholic University of Nijmegen. He proposed the foundation of an institution, based on Nijmegen university, to provide a central agency for the collection and study of documentation and archives on the history of Catholicism in the Netherlands in the nineteenth and twentieth century. He argued that much material of great historical interest was on the verge of disappearing for ever. In his view a Catholic University was morally obliged to prevent such a catastrophe from taking place and to provide an information centre for future historians interested in the history of the Dutch Catholic community. In 1969 his proposal was realized by the official opening of the Katholiek Documentatie Centrum (Catholic Documentation Centre), which under the directorship of Dr Jan Roes has become the undisputed centre for anyone studying Catholic subjects in the Netherlands. Housed in an unappealing but efficient corner of the University's library, it has a proud 800 personal and institutional archives in its care, altogether more than three miles of records. Such crucial collections as the archives of the Katholieke Volkspartij (Catholic People's Party) and the Katholieke Radio Omroep (Catholic Broadcasting Association) can be found here. Furthermore visitors are free to use an impressive library of Catholica and an up-to-date documentary collection on every conceivable subject of recent Catholic history. For the benefit of its clientele the centre has made considerable progress in preparing its assets for on-line consultation.

In the twenty-two years of existence the Documentation Centre – popularly referred to as the 'KDC' – has promoted numerous historical studies and documentary publications on Catholic history, including many in series of its own. It also publishes a journal, the Jaarboek van het Katholiek Documentatie Centrum (Yearbook of the Catholic Documentation Centre), which over the years has offered students and senior staff members an opportunity to publish articles on Catholic topics. The existence of the KDC has without doubt been a crucial factor in making the Catholic community by far the most extensively studied denomination in the Netherlands. Its success is confirmed by the fact that it has been copied both in the Netherlands and abroad. In Amsterdam in 1971 a very similar institute to the KDC was founded for the collection and study of archives of Protestant provenance: the Historisch Documentatiecentrum voor het Nederlands Protestantisme (Historical Documentation Centre for Dutch Protestantism). In Belgium, at the Catholic University of Louvain, the Katholiek Documentatie- en Onderzoekscentrum KADOC (Catholic Documentation and Research Centre KADOC) was established in 1976. At first it was much inspired by its Dutch forerunner, but since then it has developed its own structure and its own approach. It is beautifully housed in a former Franciscan convent.

THE SERVICE CENTRE FOR CONVENT ARCHIVES IN THE NETHERLANDS

There remained one sector of the organizational and spiritual life of the Catholic community that could not be served by the KDC: the religious orders and congregations. Apart from personal archives, the KDC collects archives of organizations which have either been liquidated or which in one way or another have gone through an institutional change of life which enables them to transfer the non-current part of their archives to the KDC. In other words: as a rule the KDC receives archives which represent a closed phase. The majority of KDC archives are of a purely organizational character. Persons may (and do) appear in their records, but these records are not about their personal lives but about their organizational activities. In both respects, the archives of orders and congregations fall into a different category. So far, no order or congregation has been formally liquidated. Hardly any have disappeared from the Netherlands. So far, their history has not come to an end, even if in the long run their prospects are not bright. Their archives therefore do not represent any well-defined past phase and ideally still serve to strengthen the community of their organizations. Furthermore, they not only contain the reflection of the organizational history of their institutions but also that of the personal lives of many people who lived or still live within their communities. Convent archives are organizational archives as well as personal archives. Reasons of privacy weigh heavily with the institutions. Usually they are reluctant to turn their archives into more or less public possession by handing them over to municipal or provincial services or to an institution like the KDC, which primarily serves historical research. The seven diocesan archives in the Netherlands might offer a possible depository, but they are all one-man facilities, not intended for the handling of external archives or for receiving researchers on a daily basis. In case many orders and congregations should nevertheless decide to transfer their archives to the nearest address willing to take them, the results would be highly unsatisfactory from the viewpoint of historical research. Convent archives would become as widely dispersed as the archives of most private organizations. In view of their importance and of the spiritual and practical affinity between them, that would be regrettable indeed.

But many institutions are themselves poorly equipped to manage their archives, especially if they have a higher ambition than to store them in a dry place. In the past some have been fortunate in having among their members a deserving individual with marked historical interests who, in many cases, literally saved their archives from disarray or destruction. In most institutions the archives have remained a secondary duty of their secretary, whose attention lies principally with current affairs. When the need for a separate archivist is felt, the larger communities usually succeed in finding a member who is sufficiently interested and knowledgeable – often a retired teacher-but for many smaller institutions this often poses a problem. Those who are willing to undertake this task often feel unequal to it because they lack the necessary know-how. Inevitably, they resort to a common sense approach which produces widely varying results. The fact that their work is often carried out in remote basements or attics and in relative isolation from fellow members and confreres, adds to their discomfort.

Apart from the problems of the institutions and the archivists themselves, historians – especially those specialized in ecclesiastical history – perceive problems too. One of these is the possible transfer of archives to foreign destinations. Since many Dutch convents are branches of French, German or Belgian congregations there is some likelihood that their archives will be claimed by their central institutions should their Dutch membership decline substantially. It is easy to see that archives of Dutch provenance – written in Dutch-will stop functioning once they are stored somewhere abroad. It is even conceivable that some congregations will consider to move their archives to more vital missionary branches in Asia or Africa. This may be laudable as an act of adjustment to the changing times, but it would be fatal for the accessibility of the archives involved.

To help the religious institutions in the present management of their archives and to warrant the preservation of their records in the future, the Dienstencentrum Kloosterarchieven in Nederland (Service Centre for Convent Archives in the Netherlands) was founded in 1989 on the initiative of Jan Roes who, as director of KDC, was in an excellent position to recognize the existing problems and needs. A preparatory committee proposed that the centre should be an independent foundation – though closely affiliated with the Catholic University in practical matters – and, moreover, an institution controlled and directed by representatives of the participating orders and congregations themselves. In this way the centre would avoid the impression of acting as an outside agency imposing itself upon the religious institutions. Membership is open to all religious institutions of Dutch origin or with branches in the Netherlands.

After a trial period and an inaugural meeting in December 1990, the centre has taken up its activities. It is staffed on a part-time basis by a professional archivist who provide on-the-spot advice and regular training sessions for the archivists of the institutions which have applied for membership. Furthermore several special projects for the (re)-organizing of specific archives have been undertaken.

All activities aim at enabling the institutions to manage their archives as long as possible on their own, by their own personnel, in their own buildings. Nevertheless the centre has facilities for holding archives in depository (e.g. if an institution should no longer have an archivist at its disposal). Fortunately none of its members has so far been obliged to make use of this possibility but, in view of the hard facts, one must expect that in the not too distant future some of them will. For the centre's members this possibility is a guarantee that their archives will be cared for even when they themselves are no longer able to do so. Perhaps in fifteen or twenty years time the centre will have evolved into a kind of mini-KDC, specialized in the management and study of convent archives. But that is still a matter of crystal ball gazing.

Membership is expected to have reached thirty at the end of 1991, which means that the Centre will then serve seventy-odd archivists and their assistants. There is no reason to be satisfied, however, since eventually the centre aims at enlisting at least eighty religious institutions. It turns out to be difficult to attract the smaller institutions which are often less aware of the value of their archives and which balk at the inevitable costs of membership. This is illustrated by the fact that in terms of members the centre has already reached 50% of all sisters and brothers in the Netherlands but just under a quarter of the number of institutions. It is hoped that eventually continuous propaganda and tactfully proffered discounts will have the desired effect. Sometimes it takes quite a lot of convincing. Particularly, contemplative communities often consider their archives to be unimportant and uninteresting since, after all, they never managed schools or hospitals. It is one of the centre's self-imposed tasks to make them change their mind.

THE ARCHIVES OF THE COMPANY OF MARY OUR LADY (O.D.N.)

Sister Mary Smith, ODN

This brief title enfold the story of how one religious institute responded to the fascinating but awesome commission given to religious congregations by Vatican 11 to return to their sources. Since the roots of this particular Order were put down into the rich terrain of the Church in 1607 the task was formidable. Wars, revolution and persecution - with the resultant destruction and dispersal of personnel - wrought havoc in the religious family founded by Jeanne de Lestonnac in Bordeaux, France, in the early seventeenth century.

Under the guidance of a Jesuit, Father Jean de Bordes, the foundress had begun her apostolic work for the education and instruction of girls and young women at a time when Calvinism was gaining momentum. She had many difficulties to encounter because of the prevailing laws of enclosure, but her Institute gained the approval of the Holy See under Pope Paul V in 1607, by the Brief Salvatoris et Domini.

The number of titles by which the new Institute was known can be quite confusing to the researcher. Being dedicated to Our Lady, its glory lay in its initial title 'l'Ordre de Notre Dame' (Order of Our Lady). But, as one of the first religious institutes to adapt the Ignatian Constitutions to women religious, it was equally referred to as 'the Company of Mary Our Lady', with an eye, no doubt, to the Jesuit title 'Company of Jesus'. To add to the researchers' problems, the foundress called her religious the 'Daughters of Mary Our Lady'.

Her insistence on using the term 'Mary Our Lady' on every possible occasion, and designating each of her Convents as 'la Maison de Notre Dame' (the House of Our Lady), has given rise to confusion over the years. Since 1607, many religious congregations of women have been founded with 'Notre Dame' as part of their title. Mary never ceases to be 'Our Lady', the model and guiding star of countless women dedicated to the following of her Son 'Our Lord'.

It was not until the establishment of the Generalate in 1921, and the subsequent conferring of a common title by the Holy See, that the entire Institute was officially named 'the Order of the Company of Mary Our Lady', a combination of both names.

In the light of this explanation, anyone who has had to research the history of a long-standing religious institute - which has spread its branches across the Continents - will understand the problems facing an archivist on beginning the work of returning to the sources. The Houses of Our Lady had been, perforce, autonomous, many had disappeared, records had been dispersed, lost or destroyed. Fortunately for us, a farseeing Superior General saw the importance of appointing an archivist at general level who would use all her historical expertise and dedication to accomplish this important task. Some excellent groundwork had already been done by a few Sisters but further investigation and expansion were needed.

In 1975, timely help came in the shape of the International Congress of Church Historians of France, which was held in Bordeaux - cradle of the Order. This was attended by the general archivist and some Sisters from the French Houses. They became acquainted with the Classification Scheme for Monastic Archives¹ and promptly set to work to adapt it to an apostolic religious institute of women. Because of the Order's long historical span, they agreed to confine their research from the foundation in 1607 to the establishment of the Generalate in 1921. A tentative schema was sent to all the Provinces with a view to testing it and receiving feedback from the various Houses. At the same time, a common designation was given to the archives of the entire Institute, namely, Archivum Ordinis Dominae Nostrae, with the Latin acronym 'A.O.D.N.'

The work was slow and laborious, material was not always easy to locate or identify. Many modifications were made to the original schema and the General Archivist - Pilar Foz - set more than one deadline for the compilation and publication of the findings! Finally, in 1989, the fruit of all of this effort appeared in a book entitled: Primary sources for the history of the education of women in Europe and America with the sub-title Historical Archives of the Company of Mary Our Lady 1607-1921. A review of this book will be found on pages 62-63.

In order to acquaint the Institute with its rich heritage, a history seminar, based on this book, was held in the Generalate, Rome, that same year. Present at it were the Superior General and her team together with thirty-eight archive representatives from Europe, North and South America, Asia and Africa. The seminar lasted two weeks, after which the representatives were commissioned to return to their respective countries and share this knowledge with their communities.

One of the results of this seminar was to highlight the need to clarify roles within the Provinces and to streamline information. For this purpose, the Provincial Archivists, Secretaries and Administrators were asked to meet in the summer of 1990. They had to discover a way of applying the Standard Type of Classification to their respective areas of responsibility. A daunting task lies ahead of them, requiring genuine selflessness and dedication. It is not easy to change from familiar ways of working! However, when it is accomplished, it is hoped that this will facilitate the exchange of vital information, safeguard the patrimony of the Institute, and contribute to the history of religious institutes within the Church.

The Order founded by Saint Jeanne de Lestonnac in 1607 has spread to many parts of the world, but it might be appropriate to identify the Sisters of the Company of Mary Our Lady in Great Britain in this their centenary year.

A few Sisters came from France in 1892 and settled at Penzance, Cornwall, with the blessing of the Bishop of Plymouth, William Vaughan. Their stay was short-lived; they moved to the Capital in 1895 and settled at Tollington Park, North London. They remained there until after World War II when they transferred to Cobham, Surrey, where the novices had gone for safety.

Over the years, the Sisters branched out to such places as Harworth and Stainforth in Yorkshire, Wincanton in the West Country; they have worked in the East End of London and are now concentrated in Surrey at Cobham, Walton-on-Thames and Hersham, with a small community in Dublin, Ireland. Wherever they go, they endeavour to exercise their apostolic ministry not only in the field of education and in the faith but in pastoral work in the various parishes.

Like most religious institutes in this country, the lack of vocations is keenly felt, but diminishing numbers have not diminished the Sisters' enthusiasm for spreading the word of God and prolonging the charism of their saintly foundress, Jeanne de Lestonnac.

April 16-18 of this year saw the first meeting, arranged by Sister Marguerite Kuhn-Regnier, for monastic archivists. We were a mixed group - Poor Clares, Carmelites, Benedictines, a Bernardine Cistercian and an Anglican Franciscan. We had all come, too, for a variety of reasons: some to begin archive work, some to update or train to take over from previous archivists, some to discover how to make sense of and put into order cupboards filled with papers, letters, bills, artefacts, and community memorabilia . . . wondering what to keep and what could be consigned to the dustbin. One or two admitted to a proverbial trunkful of old documents kept under the bed!

Of the participants, two of us, myself included, came from the Carmel of Walsingham, a recently founded monastery. I was keen to keep proper records from the start so that posterity would have a full account of our beginnings and not inherit a muddle of unrelated and unsorted material. Also, I am, and always have been, an historian at heart. Here then was my chance to be involved in history-in-the-making. The course was very intense, but that made it worthwhile. It would have been no use travelling a long distance for only a couple of talks. Indeed, there was something interesting to learn at every moment.

All of us were amateurs when it came to organizing records, so the seminars were geared to helping us on a practical as well as theoretical level. Sr Jean Bunn, archivist for the English Province of the S.N.D.s, opened the meeting by defining an archivist, and followed this by a most interesting display of papers, photographs, and artefacts from her own Archives. Surely such items as a hand-made box to hold a sister's bonnet, if not kept, would soon be lost to posterity once the mode of dress for the sisters had changed! Sr Jean continued her lectures with a very full account of her own methods of collecting, conserving, and collating material: we learnt how important it was to have all names clearly on the back of photographs or, within a generation, there would be no knowledge of 'Who's who'; we heard of different systems for filing and retrieving information. One point Sr Jean made strongly, and with which we could all identify, was that records of one's community history are always interesting and instructive for the whole group, and make for unity among members in their discovery of common roots. Symbols which can be shared aid in the growth towards a common future, based on an unique past. It was important, in this respect, not to destroy documents that might show up a community or individual sister in an uncomplimentary light. We have a duty to preserve for posterity all that is part of our heritage, so that ultimately the true story of past events and a complete picture of times and circumstances can emerge in due course.

Alfred Callander spoke to us on a project he had recently completed, sorting and cataloguing the papers of a contemplative house (which shall be nameless!). As most of us came from similar autonomous monasteries, his ...Talk and discussions far into the night

Where to begin ?

The 'Compleat Monastic Archivist' suggestions and methods were particularly valuable. He had been invited into a room filled with boxes of papers, etc., etc., and asked to get these into archival order. This he managed to do, taking home a box at a time, and painstakingly assembling a hundred years or so of community history. His comments found an echo in many hearts which hardly knew where to begin yet wanted to sort and catalogue documents of historical interest for future generations.

One afternoon (our only afternoon, as the course included only one full day) was spent at the Gloucestershire County Record Office. Here, we were made very welcome and found out all that such a centre can offer to researchers and archivists. It was an unique opportunity for contemplatives, who otherwise have no idea of how to obtain or use such information, or even of the variety and scope of records in existence, to which the public have access.

The displays (including one of some Dominican archival material by Sr Marguerite), the seminars, the informal talks, the discussions, were all held in the beautiful house and surroundings of St Peter's Grange, Prinknash Abbey. As usual with contemplatives 'out and about', we made the most of the opportunity to meet and talk with others who shared our interest in archives, and exchanges between participants, and between participants and lecturers, went on far into the night.

We celebrated Morning and Evening Prayer together in the Grange chapel, where we also had a special Mass 'for ourselves', celebrated by Fr Anthony Dolan. To close the course we were invited to the Abbey church, where we were escorted into the monks' stalls in choir (shades of equality for women at last!).

It seemed unbelievable that in such a short time we had forged such strong bonds of friendship and shared interest, as well as accumulating a body of practical knowledge. We all left for home determined to get at the trunks and boxes stored in odd corners, and to put our archives into such order that even the Bodleian Library would be envious!

Did we? Did I? Well... not really... not yet... But I most certainly will... and at least I know now how to go about it. Thank you C.A.S.

SOME NINETEENTH CENTURY PAPERS IN THE SYDNEY
ARCHDIOCESAN ARCHIVES:
ENTRIES IN THE GUIDE TO COLLECTIONS OF MANUSCRIPTS RELATING TO AUSTRALIA

In early 1991 another supplement (Series E, Part 1) to the National Library of Australia's Guide to collections of manuscripts relating to Australia on microfiche was issued. All five series (A - E, Pt. 1) are available with a consolidated name index of collections and sub-groups within collections included. Contained in the latest supplement are five entries for early clergy and other nineteenth-century papers in the Sydney Archdiocesan Archives at St Mary's Cathedral in Sydney.

All the papers concerned were arranged and described in 1987 during the first six months of the two-year New South Wales Bicentennial Archives Program at the Cathedral. The Cathedral project was funded by a $100,000 grant from the NSW Bicentennial Council and committed to the management of the Archives Authority of New South Wales.¹

The five summary Guide entries are referenced below. They include papers of the two first official Catholic chaplains in New South Wales, the Irish priests, Fathers Philip Conolly (1786-1839) and John Joseph Therry (1790-1864) who arrived in Sydney in 1820. There are also entries for the correspondence of the layman, John O'Sullivan (1802-1876) who was Father Therry's business agent, some papers of Father Daniel Power (c. 1790-1830), Therry's short-lived clerical confrère in Sydney of the late 1820s, and surviving private and official papers of Roger Bede Vaughan OSB (1834-1883), the second and last English Benedictine Archbishop of Sydney.²

All are partial holdings only, fortuitous survivals of much larger original groups of papers. For example, Father Philip Conolly, who moved from Sydney to Van Diemen's Land in March 1821, is represented solely by five quarterly returns of baptisms, marriages and deaths furnished in accordance with Governor Macquarie's written instructions to both priests of 14 October 1820 which specified conditions under which they would exercise their pastoral role. The final return of 10 November 1822 may be the only surviving contemporary documentary evidence of Father Conolly's only return visit to the mainland in 1822 when he journeyed to the penal settlements of Newcastle and Port Macquarie in the north accompanied by Columbus Fitzpatrick (1810-1878), a twelve-year-old boy. Fitzpatrick recalled the journey in his published reminiscences of Catholic religious and social life during the Macquarie era which appeared as a series of lengthy letters in the press in 1865.³

The largest holding consists of 372 items from the Therry papers. These strays were long ago separated from the Therry group of papers, probably around the turn of the century. The group was deposited in the Mitchell Library in Sydney by the Jesuit Fathers in 1969. A guide to the Therry papers, which was first issued by the library in 1980, is still available. ⁴The estrays at St Mary's Cathedral are also described in a guide which was issued by the Archives Authority of New South Wales in late 1988. ⁵It is an anonymous compilation which contains no details of the provenance of the estrays. ⁶Copies are available gratis (at the time of writing - September 1991) from St Mary's Cathedral, but not from the public body which published it. ⁷

GUIDE ENTRIES (Series E, Pt. 1)

CONOLLY, Rev. Philip (1786-1839) Papers, 30 Dec. 1820-10 Nov. 1822, 1 folder (5 items)

O'SULLIVAN, John (1802-1876) Correspondence, 1834-1868, 5 folders (105 items)

POWER, Rev. Daniel (c. 1790-1830) Papers, 2 Nov. 1825-29 Dec. 1829, 1 folder (15 items)

THERRY, Rev. John Joseph (1790-1864) Papers, (c 1822-1864), 372 items

VAUGHAN, Roger Bede, Archbishop (1834-1883) Papers, 1848-1888, 35 folders (287 items)

THE RELIGIOUS ARCHIVES GROUP CONFERENCE 1991

September's conference was held in the Selly Oak Colleges, Birmingham; an ideal setting for the third meeting of the Religious Archives Group of the Society of Archivists. Few people seemed to have had difficulties in reaching Birmingham, and I for one welcomed the opportunity to get away from our London-dominated culture. The meeting was well attended, but at the same time was small enough to create a friendly and informal atmosphere; and there was ample time over tea and coffee to meet other members. As a newcomer to the group I was favourably impressed by the variety of people and jobs that I met with. Specialist Repositories were represented, as were the County Record Offices, and there were also a few members of Religious Orders present; giving the group an 'ecumenical' flavour which is one of its most pleasing aspects.

It is the group's intention to retain as far as possible an inter-faith dimension to their meetings. The first session provided this in the shape of an exceptionally interesting talk by Dr Jorgen Nielsen on the history of Muslim Organizations in the UK. Rev. Penelope Rundle gave a talk which, although on a subject familiar to most of us, was equally informative: the use of Religious Archives in a County Record Office.

A display of publications, lists and guides had been scheduled to take place over lunch; unfortunately not many participants had contributed to the selection. This was slightly disappointing, as it would have been an interesting opportunity to see the varieties of material which members work with, as well as comparing their different methods of listing. Perhaps in future there will be more contributions to this display.

As in previous years, the afternoon session began with workshops, a popular feature of the conference. Three subjects were on offer: 'Introduction to Computer Applications,' 'The Administration and Conservation of artefacts and other non-manuscript materials' and 'Polemical Archives.' I had opted for 'Polemical Archives' as the group with the most intriguing title. This session proved to be a lively discussion, although the group never actually arrived at a definition of polemical archives upon which everybody could agree! The afternoon was completed with a panel discussion, with questions put by participants, on 'Confidentiality and Religious Archives.'

At present the annual conference is the main activity, although the Steering group is still considering the possibility of compiling a guide to Religious Archives. The conference proved to be a thoroughly enjoyable and useful experience; one that I would strongly recommend to anyone who works with or has an interest in Religious Archives.

CATHOLIC ARCHIVES SOCIETY CONFERENCE, 1991

The twelfth annual conference, held at All Saints Pastoral Centre, London Colney, on 27 - 29 May, was attended by over seventy members.

The conference was opened on Tuesday afternoon, 27 May, by Fr Anthony Dolan (Chairman) and the first talk was given by Fr Francis Isherwood, Portsmouth Diocesan Archivist, who described the history and content of the archives, including records of the Channel Islands. In the evening, Dr Rory O'Donnell gave a talk, generously illustrated with slides, on 'Church Architecture as a primary document for 19th century Catholic History'. The next morning, 28 May, Dr Peter Hughes, consultant archivist, gave a talk, full of very practical advice, on 'Sorting Religious Archives' (see pp 3-16), and this was followed by a presentation by Mr Mark Vine of Conservation Resources on 'Aspects of Conservation', in which he described the range of basic archive storage products and their technical and practical advantages.

During the afternoon, members went to St Edmund's College, Ware, and were guided over the museum and chapel by the Librarian and by Fr Ian Dickie, Archivist to the College and to the Westminster Archdiocese, the archives on display in the museum including the Douai diaries. The evening was fully occupied with group discussions of diocesan archives, provincial newsletters of religious congregations, work in progress, computers for advanced users and beginners respectively, lay organizations, and the archives of religious communities.

Reports from these discussion groups were made to the Open Forum on Wednesday morning, 29 May, and prompted many useful comments and suggestions for Society or individual action. Sr Marguerite Kuhn-Regnier (Secretary) reported on the seminar for monastic archivists at Prinknash in April (see pp 53-56), Sr Dominique Horgan OP referred to the formation of the new Association of Church Archivists in Ireland, which was likely to obtain wider support than the Association of Religious Archivists of Ireland which it replaced, and several members spoke about their special interests, and solicited or exchanged information. The AGM of the Society concluded the conference. The Chairman introduced Bishop J. O'Brien, who complimented the Society on its work and conveyed the greetings of Cardinal Hume, the Society's patron. The Chairman reviewed the activities of the preceding year, the officers gave their annual reports (and were duly thanked for their services, especially the conference secretary), and the officers and council were elected for 1991/2 (see inside front cover).

A full report of the conference appears in the CAS Newsletter, Autumn 1991, No. 13, obtainable from the Secretary. The 1992 conference will be held at Upholland Northern Institute, on 25 - 27 May 1992.

ADDRESS BY THE POPE TO THE SIXTH INTERNATIONAL CHURCH
ARCHIVES DAY IN ROME, 1991

On Monday, 16 September 1991, in Castel Gandolfo the Pope received the participants in a congress on Church archives. The Holy Father addressed the group in German.

Your Eminence,
Distinguished Ladies and Gentlemen,

It is a special joy to me to welcome you to Rome on the occasion of the Sixth International Church Archives Day. The joint conference of the Church Archives of Germany and the Association of Archives and Libraries in the Evangelical Church, to which you belong, is a praiseworthy and exemplary initiative, as well as an expression of the Church's consciousness of her responsibility for learning and culture. You have made it your task to protect the cultural value of the 'written memory' and to make research available.

Since the earliest Christian centuries the Popes have also had concern for the care of important writings and documents. The historian Eusebius already reported about the Chartarium or Scrinium Sanctae Romanae Ecclesiae and at that time religious archives were already being used for research. Since 1880, as you know, the doors of the Vatican Archives have been open to scholars from all over the world. In this way the Church offers an important contribution to science and learning and thus provides for the historical, spiritual and cultural development of humanity.

The religious archives which you represent also have an ecumenical meaning and function. On the one hand they contain source material about the regrettable division of the Church; and on the other hand they bear witness to the ceaseless efforts to overcome that division. Not least of all, the ecumenical significance is expressed through this International Church Archives Day which has brought you together here in Rome with the desire of meeting the Successor of St Peter as a culmination of it.

I gladly take this opportunity to thank you for your work in religious archives. At the same time, I would like to encourage you to carry on your fruitful collaboration in order to continue your important tasks in shared responsibility. For this I cordially offer you and all your collaborators God's blessing and protection.

ASSOCIATION OF CHURCH ARCHIVISTS OF IRELAND

The Association of Religious Archivists of Ireland came into existence some ten years ago, to meet the needs of some Religious Order, Congregations and Societies in Ireland. It succeeded better than its founders anticipated. Archivists have now been appointed to most of the groups mentioned above and courses have been provided to give those archivists an introduction to good archival management. But not all of them are Religious. Still they are anxious to be members of A.R.A.I. - which apparently was founded to cater only for Religious, or so the title of the Association suggested.

The Association itself decided to resolve this problem at its last AGM (in April 1991). When the question of membership was discussed, it was found that there was general agreement among those present that admission should be granted to anyone interested in pursuing the ends of the Association. After consideration of a number of options the following motion was formally proposed and seconded: 'That the name of the Association be changed to the "Association of Church Archivists of Ireland".' The motion was then adopted by all present.

The way is now open to expand membership. Lay people will feel more welcome - and not just tolerated. It is hoped especially that Diocesan Archivists will apply for membership.

There was another dimension to the debate at the AGM. It was felt that the new title would be wide enough to leave membership open to anyone working with any kind of religious archives. To quote from the minutes of the AGM: 'Contact with other traditions in our country could not but be enriching and beneficial'. In line with this thinking, the executive committee of A.C.A.I. has now issued invitations for a meeting with interested parties. It remains to be seen how much interest there is in wider membership.

Officers of A.C.A.I. this year (April 1991-April 1992) are:

BOOK REVIEWS

Historical Archives of the Company of Mary Our Lady 1607-1921.

Fuentes Primarias Para La Historia De La Educacion De La Mujer En Europa Y America. Archivos Historicos Compania De Maria Nuestra Senora 1607-1921. Pilar Foz y Foz, ODN, in collaboration with Estela Mejia Restrepo, ODN. Tipografia Poliglota Vaticana, Roma, 1989. Price £25 sterling. Available from Convent of Notre Dame, Burwood House, Cobham, Surrey, KT11 1HA.

The Archives of the Company of Mary Our Lady are a primary source for the history of the education of women in Europe and America. Sister Pilar Foz y Foz, ODN and her collaborators have produced in Spanish a massive collection of documents illustrating the Company's history. An introduction in English provides guidance to the contents and arrangement of the documents from the Company's archives.

As the introduction states: 'Mother de Lestonnac's ideas represent the vindication of a very important concept, that of making women responsible for their own education', and again: 'the compiling, cataloguing and publishing of the guide to all existing documents . . . open wide possibilities to the historian'. Here is evidence of the spiritual and theological trends in the houses of the Company, of the social profile of its members, of their educational objectives and of the functioning of the houses as religious institutions. The work is a catalogue of the contents corresponding to the 157 houses founded between 1607 and 1921.

The first section deals with the origin and development of the Company, beginning with the personality and mission of the foundress, Jeanne de Lestonnac, the establishment of a congregation 'dedicated to the education of girls under the protection of the Virgin Mary' and the approval of the Institute by Pope Paul V in April 1607. The ideas of the foundress about education were influenced by Michel de Montaigne, her uncle, and the Ratio Studiorum of the Jesuits. She had to plan the schools in such a way that religious enclosure and the apostolate were not incompatible. The documents show how rapidly the Company expanded in France, Spain and Latin America. Much later it came to England.

Dispersed in France at the Revolution, the Company achieved a recovery, and early in the nineteenth century studies were begun with a view to promoting the beatification of the foundress. Problems arising from the losses during the Revolution made it very difficult to continue gratuitous education and authorization was obtained from Rome for charging 'some slight remuneration'.

The documents show the progress made in Spain in the nineteenth century amid difficulties caused by the policy of the State towards education. Several new foundations were made; there was progress, too, in Latin America - in Mexico, Argentina, Chile and Colombia.

The second section of the documents listed deal with the problem of the government of the Company and the approach to the establishment of the generalate in 1921. Jeanne de Lestonnac had planned a centralized form of government, but the Brief of Foundation had subjected each house to the local Ordinary. After the Revolution, the need for centralizing the government was felt more strongly and this feeling became more widespread when the Company established a house in Rome in 1834; but it was not universal. When Pope Leo XIII issued the decree Quemadmodum in 1890 ordering Orders and Congregations to revise their constitutions, the need for centralized government became more evident. In the twentieth century, the Company faced difficulties in several countries and there were difficulties within about the form of government; but advance came in the pontificate of Benedict XV. By a decree of March 1921, a General Chapter was to be held and as a result a Superior General was elected.

The volume is beautifully produced and is furnished with maps, diagrams, illustrations and useful appendices and indexes.

The introduction in English is an informative and valuable guide to the documents printed (most of them in Spanish). The collection includes lists in English of documents preserved in the Company's houses in England.

The result is an abundant collection of material for the history of the Company and is evidence of the painstaking and scholarly efforts of all those concerned in the production.

Irish Church History Today

Edited by Reamonn O Muiir. ISBN 0 951 1490 a 6. Pp. 123. Published by Cumann Seanchais Ard Mhacha/the Armagh Diocesan Historical Society, 1991. Price £10.00 (Ir £11.00). Postage and packing £1.50. Available from Mr Damian Woods, St Patrick's Grammar School, Armagh, BT61 7QZ.

It was a happy thought to commemorate the foundation, 150 years ago, of Armagh Catholic Cathedral with a seminar on 'The current state of ecclesiastical history in Ireland.' The speakers were briefed to review past scholarship, present research and future prospects; they were apparently confined to the history of the Catholic Church. It was an even happier thought for the Armagh Diocesan History Society to publish the seminar papers, for the result is a richly informative and often stimulating historiographical survey.

The book falls readily into three parts. The first, comprising well over half of it, sees four historians, each a leading authority in the field, work exactly to the brief they had been given. Cardinal Tomas O Fiaich, in what alas must be his last contribution to scholarship, covers 'The Early Period'. This is defined in the conventual Irish periodisation of history as from St Patrick (modern research has blown 'the traditional St Patrick into so many pieces that no one has succeeded in putting them all together again satisfactorily') to St Malachy ('Carbon 14 dating did not succeed in separating the bones of St Malachy from those of St Bernard because they were born within five years of each other'. And buried alongside in Clairvaux.) Art Cosgrove appraises intelligently and objectively the bad press generally accorded 'The Medieval Period' because of its lapses from the highest standards of clerical discipline and lay morality. Colm Lennon brings to 'The Sixteenth Century' his own particular expertise in the key role of Dublin in the survival of Irish Catholicism with both an awareness of how Irish ecclesiastical history has been enhanced by the striking advances in general Tudor history and of the importance of siting Ireland in the context of Europe as a whole. There follows Benignus Millett, sole survivor of a heroic group of Franciscan scholars whose work especially in the Vatican archives has done so much to lay foundations for seventeenth-century Irish ecclesiastical history. His survey of that century is just as fully comprehensive and authoritative as one would expect of him. These are four top class contributions.

There follows two articles which though well worth publishing sit rather inappropriately in this particular context since they are not, nor were they intended to be, primarily historiographical. Kevin Whelan writes interestingly on 'Catholics, Politicisation and the 1798 Rebellion'. Thomas G. McGrath argues a very persuasive case in 'The Tridentine Evolution of Modern Irish Catholicism: a Re-Examination of the "Devotional Revolution" Thesis', an absorbing essay, which in an incidental way, at least partially produces a review of the current state of Catholic history in nineteenth-century Ireland. A field, one feels, in need of much more intensive cultivation.

Finally, two articles which though very different in aim and tone succeed, probably quite accidentally, in being in an important way complementary. David C. Sheehy, the Dublin diocesan archivist, considers the state of 'Archives of the Catholic Church in Ireland.' This is at once a plea, studiously moderate in tone, for the introduction of serious archival accumulation in the dioceses ('in the majority of cases dioceses hold records in poor or even perilous conditions with no qualified personnel available to conserve, describe or administer the records') and a blueprint for short-term remedial action. Dermot Keogh, in 'Church and State in Modern Ireland' reveals in some detail how much more could be achieved in this field were ecclesiastical archives better organized and more open. Keogh is concerned about an ethos of secrecy with regard to access to sources which he thinks is a problem in both Church and State and about 'defensive, protective' Catholic history. He will have none of it: 'The truth shall set you free is not a platitude to my way of thinking. It is short-sighted and cowardly to want to safeguard the people of God from the truth about the immediate past.' Amen to that!

EDITORIAL NOTES

As these notes are written on the last day of 1992, they inevitably reflect more on the year gone by than the year ahead. Some of the objectives of the year, indeed of earlier years, have yet to be realized. Abroad, for instance, contacts are still sought with European and other national associations of church archivists: much is surely to be gained from an international exchange of ideas. At home, the Society has still to commend itself to many congregations and a few dioceses but, happily, the major religious superiors are showing greater interest in archives. The setting-up of the Association of Diocesan Archivists of England and Wales, with a positive work programme for its first year, is a great step forward. The formation of similarly well-defined interest groups, serving their own practical needs, can only strengthen the Society's influence.

The editorial policy of Catholic Archives has always been to publish as much as comes to hand. At the start of 1992, the cupboard was indeed bare, but when the Good Lord provides, He does so to overflowing, and this edition is the fullest yet. Sr Jean Bunn's educational and vocational use of archives is well-known to many at first hand but she has kindly put her experience into print for a wider public. Mr van Vugt reports again on the valuable work of the Netherlands Service Centre for Convent Archives. We have much, too, to learn from archivists of other Churches. Dr Neckles writes about Methodist archives and there is a report on the 1992 Religious Archives Conference. Diocesan archives form the core of both Dr Johnson's report on Scottish Catholic Archives and Fr O'Meeghan's survey of Catholic Archives in New Zealand, while two Irish and Scottish diocesan archives are described by Jan Power and Canon Canning respectively. Ireland is also represented by Professor Corish's valuable account of the Maynooth College Archives.

Catholic historians have long been interested in the Arundell family archives, and the account by Mrs North and Mr Hobbs of their acquisition by the Cornwall and Wiltshire Record Offices will whet many appetites. Archivists are often asked to research parish and church histories. Mrs Bassett reveals a new source in the Hardman Archives, and this is complemented by Dr O'Donnell's talk on church architecture to the 1991 conference. Archivists who have hitherto been happy with making lists and card indexes have now to use the latest technological equipment which, ideally at least, will enable the diocese or congregation, the archivist and the user to refer instantly by remote control to listed information in ways beyond the scope of any manual indexes. Mr Cook reviews recent development illustrated by notable projects.

All members will congratulate Bishop Foley, our President, on his eightieth birthday and wish him many years for continued research and publication. Congratulations also to Bro. Leo Ansell, doyen of Australian church archivists, on his retirement. Almost alone, he inspired the Church Archivists Society of Australia during its ten year existence.

All these and other contributors are warmly thanked for their articles, and similar material is earnestly solicited for future issues. Finally, the Index to Nos. 1-12, promised last year will be printed shortly and, hopefully, circulated with this issue.

THE CONGREGATION

The Congregation was founded in France in 1804. It would probably have been known as Notre Dame d'Ameins, but for the effects of violent revolution and change on the Church. Bishop Demandolx of Ameins assumed, and Napoleon intended, that women's congregations would be under episcopal authority, specially new congregations. The Bishop saw Notre Dame as diocesan: not only did he need teaching religious in his huge diocese, its clergy diminished and its catechising and educational work in shreds, but to have agreed carte blanche to a woman founder's instinct for congregational autonomy would presumably have been unthinkable. St Julie Billiart's founding vision was to meet some of the educational needs, religious and secular, which were part of his worries; but the vision was wider than one diocese: St Julie wanted the Sisters of Notre Dame to go wherever they were needed, and the organisation she saw as most appropriate to serve this end was to have a Superior General with the right and responsibility of supervising, visiting and guiding the communities of each convent, wherever it was.

That Bishop Demandolx disapproved of such initiative became clear when the co-Foundress, Mère St Joseph Blin de Bourdon, committed to St Julie's aims, said that she could not agree to settle all her funding resources on the Ameins house, as he had asked. The Bishop responded with a dismissal note to St Julie: 'Since you are guiding your Sisters by a very different spirit, you may leave and go to any diocese you choose; as for me, I shall take back the house and form there true Sisters of Notre Dame.'

Bishop Pisani of Namur, in Belgium, had already asked for Sisters of Notre Dame, and had a community there in his city. Leaving the Sisters free to choose which course they would take, St Julie led those who chose to stay with the congregation to Belgium, early in 1809. Namur now became (and has remained) the home of the motherhouse. By 1816, the year of St Julie's death, all the small houses in France had been closed, and the whole Congregation was in Belgium. Motherhouse and Generalate were in Namur till the Generalate moved to Rome after the Second Vatican Council, taking the Generalate archive with it and leaving that part of the archive comprising the records of the Congregation's early history and development and the archives of the two Belgian provinces, North (Flanders) and South (Wallonne). The present (longstanding) General Archivist is a Luxembourgish Sister of the Namur community, a colossus of a personality and a compendium of Notre Dame history.

In 1840, the Foundress's international dream was realised when the sketches, clothes, furniture and their small and few personal possessions. Photocopy, especially when the machine has an enlarging facility, adds the informativeness of actual facsimile, as with this reproduction of a careful pencil drawing of the two sides of the identical medals of the Foundresses, which were given to them by Fathers of the Faith returning from Guadeloupe.

FOUNDRESSES' MEDAL (SLIGHTLY ENLARGED)

What happened to the medals themselves is an interesting reflection on the fact that what appears ephemeral at one stage will prove to be otherwise at a later one: there were in fact three identical medals; the third belonged to an earlier Sister who had begun her religious life in Ameins with the Society of the Sacred Heart of St Madeleine Sophie Barat, tried her vocation with St Julie, and returned to the Sacred Heart community. Her medal, however, hung in the Notre Dame chapel from then on, and went to Namur. The second medal, worn by succeeding Superiors General, rubbed so smooth that the 'non fecit taliter' disappeared. The third medal had its wording altered to 'Ecce ancilla domini' by a later Superior General. Then the chapel at Namur was pulverised in a war bombardment, and Catherine Duchâtel's medal was never found, though the rubble was searched. In 1988, the double pencil drawing, which must have been made during a visitation of the Superior General to Scotland before 1900, surfaced from the archives of Notre Dame in Glasgow.

After the materials related to the Foundresses and the first convents in France and Belgium come the government papers: circular letters from the Superiors General and their conferences (instructions to the Sisters on the Notre Dame religious life, especially as mandated in the Constitutions), General Chapter matters, international Notre Dame information and news, reports, bulletins, publications from the Provinces and the equivalent in news and information received direct from the foreign missions houses and also relayed.

This pattern of arrangement, again deriving from provenance, also appears in the British Province archive proper, beginning with the papers connected with the two early British Province Sister-benefactresses. The one was Sister Mary of St Francis Stafford Jerningham, of Costessey Hall in Norwich, who married the Hon. Edward Petre, member of the Catholic Poor School Committee and who, on his death, put herself and her wealth at the service of Notre Dame. The other was Sister Marie des Saints Anges Towneley, of the Towneley family near Burnley, who inherited from her brother and became the first Provincial Superior when Notre Dame in Britain was given provincial status in 1920.

The Province archive is divided into parallel collections, as is the Generalate material. On the one hand are the home convent records, boxed in alphabetical order of place, not by founding date, and followed by Sister-personnel information, and personal papers which would be less appropriately boxed with a particular community collection. The foreign mission houses' records follow these. On the other hand are the administration records, starting with the papers of the Provincial Superiors and followed by Provincial Chapter material Provincial directives and other communications mirroring those from the Generalate. Apostolate materials, obviously, mirror each other at general, provincial and local levels.

The most significant of the house records are probably the founding correspondence and the house annals. The annals were originally an accountability exercise from the house to the Superior General with regard to regular observance. Each usually begin with a detailed account of the beginnings. I think my favourite is the Sisters arrival at the intended convent in Leeds, in pouring rain, supervised by a coachman with a top hat, who 'knocked on the door with the wooden leg he happened to be wearing.' After the accountability, we are likely to hear patriotic reports, compassionate reaction to public disasters, sociological comment, delight in simple celebrations; we see the sequence of the liturgical year, the beginnings of change within the Congregation's way of life. We also catch the human flashes, covertly funny:

1st November	Canon X is coming to be our new confessor.
8th November	The Canon came to hear confessions. The Canon is deaf.

At one London convent, we are told, during an air-raid, the chaplain priests gave each other absolution next to the gas-meter under the presbytery stairs. In another, the chaplain was worried about leaving his horse outside in the extreme cold, and would only give his mind to the convent's affairs when the horse was in by the kitchen fire. The pig at St Helen's fell down the drain near the back door; the Sisters at St George's, Southwark, going to meet another Sister coming from a boat at Southampton, had nothing in their pockets to pay at the toll before crossing the Thames: the coachdriver handed in his cloak as a surety, on the Sisters' assurance that the visitor would have the price of the toll. She had. The handyman at Norwich saw a polished floor for the first time in his life, when the Superior showed him the completed chapel. 'Thass neat, S'perior,' he said, "but that'll take a year to dry ..."

With the convent records are those of the apostolate of the house. Notre Dame was founded primarily for 'the poor in the most abandoned places'. its means of approach "education, broadly conceived". The records show a fairly uniform pattern of settlement: the Sisters came to cities or to quite big towns, usually on the request of parish priests, some of whom went in person to Namur to ask the Superior General for a foundation. The Sisters would arrive, about six to a foundation, and settle in a house provided by the parish. Within days, they would begin teaching in a poor-school, and soon after that, would start night-school and Sunday-school for young working women. Then would follow a day-school, and a small boarding-school. The Sisters also operated the pupil-teacher system, accommodating these young women like boarders, in the convent — at Wigan, in St Helens, in Liverpool. The core of the archive's educational records, though, is the Mount Pleasant Training College material, with its complete set of student teaching practice assessments, tutor comments and school placements from the opening in 1856, as well as all the other related material; it fills three six-foot steel cabinets. What is relatively lacking in the educational archives, ironically, is any really comprehensive documentation of the Sisters' work in the poor-schools. This is partly because, as numbers of Sisters declined, these headships passed to seculars, and partly because where a school closed, the log books went into the keeping of the local education authority.

Some items of particular interest (to this archivist) spring to mind. There are the two large oil paintings, of St Alphonsus and St Gerard Majella, brought to England by Father Louis de Buggenoms CSSR, when he accompanied the first six Sisters here. He rolled the paintings in his umbrella to avoid the customs. Framed, and with identifying plaques, they disappeared when the convent at Clapham was sold early in the 1940's. Suddenly in 1990 they surfaced in London and were returned to us by a very helpful dealer. The paintings might not be art, but they are dear history.

Then there are the eight volumes of leather-bound and illustrated lesson-notes, parallel to those done by grateful pupils for their fee-paying parents in a Notre Dame boarding and day school: these were done annually from 1877 by the Sisters on the staff for their Superior's feastday gift. We see all the different kinds of calligraphy taught; the copperplate handwriting; the courses given in English grammar and literature; the Church history, scripture and doctrine; the mathematics, the classics; astronomy, myth and legend, art appreciation, geography with meticulously penned maps, botany with pressed flowers in situ. There is the Empaneni journal (Rhodesia) of 1899, a manuscript account, with tiny pen and ink wash pictures, of the Sisters' first year working with the Jesuits. Perhaps I shall add to the Vows section of the archives, one day, the greeting I had from a boy in a remedial class whose friend I am glad to have been. It said 'Dear St Geen, I hope you do it on saterday, David.'

Peripheral items of interest presumably appear in most archives. In this one, there is a Mount Pleasant teaching certificate endorsed eight years in succession by the same HMI. It is signed 'Matthew Arnold'. Then there is the registration of a little girl of four in the Wigan Notre Dame prep school: her father is a comedian called George Formby, and she has a brother George who, we know, will follow in father's footsteps. A priest has given a Notre Dame community a Roman lamp of considerable age as a thank-you for hospitality. The accompanying note says he was given it in the first place by a teacher of his, later to become Cardinal Merry del Val. On the back of a Liverpool journal's article about the Mount Pleasant Training College in action, in about 1864, is an astounding array of positions vacant advertisements — for butlers, housekeepers, maids, 'tweenies, grooms and chauffeurs, with terms and condition of pay.

Do people ask you what you do? A neighbour in the lift in Liverpool listened to my answer; I could see comprehension dawning. 'Oh,' she said, 'you're a filing clerk.'

THE USE OF THE ARCHIVES

My record of six years of archives usage shows the greatest percentage to have been for the Sisters themselves.

I first saw archives used in Notre Dame as a means of returning us to our roots when I was in the motherhouse in Belgium, on a visit. On the feast of Our Lady of Mount Carmel, at evening prayer, the General Archivist read an account of the arrest and martyrdom, by guillotine, of the sixteen Carmelites of Compiègne during the French Revolution. Our Foundress, St Julie Billiart, knew this community; she was in Compiègne herself, in hiding from Revolutionary pursuit, when they were taken, and their confessor and counsellor, the Abbé Lamarche, afterwards became hers.

Soon after this, at a General Chapter (also in Namur), I used a colour-slide sequence of images of our Foundresses and early history, to draw parallels with the experiences of the Sisters represented at the Chapter. I think we were all surprised by the degree of affirmation of Notre Dame identity this exercise produced, and the strengthening of our bonding. The similarity between the early and present ways of doing and being, despite much apparent change, confirmed that we had been true to our charism and spirit, and the basic perception of God which had drawn us to this Foundress's vision instead of to some other's. Then, in my first year as archivist, as a fairly large-scale visual introduction to their archive for the Sisters in Britain, I mounted an exhibition in the vestibule of the conference-centre to which two hundred and forty Sisters of the Province came for their Assembly. I displayed material about the major foundations in Britain, from our arrival (in Cornwall) in 1845 up to the founding of the province, with the noviciate, in 1920.

I learned two things in particular from doing this presentation. The first was the value of effecting continuity and connectedness. Once the material was up on the wall in its chronological order, history began to reveal more of itself than I foresaw when I chose the items; this revelation was filled out further, with the arrival of the Sisters as I was finishing off: standing listening, as I could no longer get to the wall myself, I heard lived experience being added to what the archives were relaying. I made a note of some of what I heard, later.

The second thing I learned was the importance of finding visual means to achieve this continuity and connectedness. I used large cut-out or painted letters (sometimes three-dimensional, made from polystyrene) for headings, colour-matched with poster-sized backing paper for the items, and arrows or strips of paper to make links. I learned to make enlargement photocopies of both documentation and pictorial matter, for the sake of visibility, and to avoid very long sections of text where possible, to prevent interest from flagging.

This kind of 'anamnesis' exercise then spread to other uses for the Sisters: African and South American novices quickly found parallels between Notre Dame's beginnings, in Revolutionary times and with limited resources but vigorous commitment, and their own. British novices, after archives-based instruction at home, made a pilgrimage to St Julie country, with informed eyes, just before first vows. The year before the letters of the co-Foundress were published, the Sisters of the Province, in regions, met for a day's combination of topic-based talks and the viewing of related archive material on Mère St Joseph Blin de Bourdon. Two Sisters marked their silver jubilee with a year's study of the Foundresses' lives and ideals, using guidelines and materials issued from the archive office, and one Sister used her sabbatical year to research for our archives the history of Coesfeld Notre Dame, known to us as 'the German cousins'.

There have been other 'recall' uses of the archive. Convents have had archive exhibitions to mark jubilees of their founding, and presentations have been done for past pupil associations of Notre Dame highschoools. Once, the archive was called on for material for a standing exhibition to be mounted in a highschoool building in London which had been converted into studies and workshops by a development company.

Two 'recall' exercises really stand out: the first began with a phonecall from the matron of an old people's home in Bristol; in a 'sharing of memories' exercise to stimulate and interest residents, an aged widow was found to have no recollection of immediate family, but vague recall of a whole childhood to the age of fourteen spent in a Liverpool orphanage. Could that have been Notre Dame? It was. Back to Bristol went an album of photographs from the Falkner Street convent annals, St Julie medal enclosed, and the pictures of the orphanage and refectory, dormitory, classrooms, and children at play. The matron phoned again: memory had rekindled, and the other residents had become audience. The second package sprang easily from the first: a letter from a contemplative convent said that an elderly hermit Sister had come into community (and then into hospital); she was finding her new situation — well, different. She had spoken of being a boarder, seventy years earlier, at Notre Dame in Clapham. This time, a tape came back in response to the parcel, with a clear, young-old voice recounting memories of school.

THESE TWO LINE DRAWINGS ARE GEORGE LAMBERT'S ILLUSTRATIONS FOR THE ARTICLE 'A VISIT TO NOTRE DAME TRAINING COLLEGE' (LIVERPOOL), BY 'V.C.H.' IN THE CATHOLIC FIRESIDE, VOL. XIV, NO. 4, APRIL 1892.

IN 'THE LECTURE ROOM AND STUDY OF THE 1ST YEARS (SIC) STUDENTS'. IN THE BACKGROUND AN S.N.D. IS GIVING AN EDUCATION LECTURE, USING A BLACKBOARD, TO A CLASS OF STUDENTS, WHILE, IN THE FOREGROUND, AN ART CLASS WORKS ON ITS OWN.

IN 'THE PRACTISING SCHOOL', A STUDENT IS GIVING A GRAMMAR-LESSON, ANALYSIS AND PARSING, TO A CLASS OF GIRLS, AN S.N.D. LECTURER IS OBSERVING THE LESSON FROM BEHIND THE PIANO!

Apart from the sporadic forays into the archives for genealogists, there are the more academic requests — for degree courses in education requiring college and school records; for a history of the Jesuits' elementary schools in St Helens whose heads were Sisters of the Notre Dame; for books in preparation about personalities found in our records; for printed publications like centenary brochures of particular houses. Once, a BBC TV asked for noviciate information, since a one-time postulant was to be profiled on 'Bookmark'. In the event, this information did not leave the archive, since the archivist wished to know how it would be used before parting with it. There was the doctor in Sheffield who researched the philanthropist and physician, Sir Arnold Knight, presenting his findings in a public exhibition; Sir Arnold's three daughters were at the Mount Pleasant Highschool in Liverpool, and became Sisters of Notre Dame. A Redemptorist in Ireland, researching on Irish women religious, wanted to know why so many entered Notre Dame when there are no houses of the Congregation in Ireland. Another doctor, in Massachusetts, is researching and collecting hymn books before 1966 — he asks for Notre Dame's, and has a question about 'Lord for tomorrow and its needs', written by Sister Mary Xavier Partridge, who was in charge of St Mary's Hall. Mount Pleasant Training College, the secondary teacher training department. (He had not heard about the convict who was insisting, from prison, that it was he who had written it!)

No archivist lives for ever; I often think of what my successor might need to know and to do. So, though there is never really enough time for anything, much less everything, I keep as detailed records as I can of work done, jobs pending, research requests, materials issued, and exhibitions produced, the Archives' archives, so to speak.

The Notre Dame Province Archives are held at the Notre Dame Provincial House, Spoke Road, Woolton, Liverpool, L25 7TN. Enquiries should be addressed in writing to the Archivist, and the records can be viewed, by arrangement, from Tuesday to Friday, in a working week. The archives have been, in the main, summarily but not individually listed.

THE SERVICE CENTRE FOR CONVENT ARCHIVES IN THE NETHERLANDS: AFTER TWO YEARS

Joos van Vugt

In the 1992 issue of Catholic Archives the Dienstencentrum Kloosterarchieven in Nederland (Service Centre for Convent Archives in the Netherlands) was given an opportunity to present itself to Catholic archivists in the U.K. Little was said, however, on the actual work performed by the Service Centre. At the time the article was written, in the beginning of 1991, there were as yet no clear-cut ideas on the methods the Service Centre would actually use. Now, at the end of 1992, that has changed and we hope that the readers of Catholic Archives may be interested in the experience we gained in the past two years.

EXPANSION

Since the Centre took up its activities in 1990 its membership has risen from the original twenty to thirty-three orders and congregations. Although these institutions constitute only a small section of the 170 or so present in the Netherlands, they do represent more than half of all sisters and brothers in the Netherlands and approximately 20% of the regular clerics (who are more self-sufficient in archive matters than religious brothers and sisters.) These statistics show that the Centre makes more headway with large institutions than with small. We already pointed this out in our article in last year's issue of Catholic Archives. So far there has not been a substantial improvement in this respect. Finances still constitute an obstacle. We have hopes, however, that in the near future a successful appeal may be made to the willingness of well-to-do institutions to support their smaller and less affluent colleagues. In the Netherlands solidarity between religious institutions has a long tradition and is practised both discreetly and generously.

At the moment the Centre employs a staff of three on a part-time basis: one historian and two archivists-cum-historians. They carry out the everyday business. Three further archivists are employed for special projects which are independent from all other activities and are financed separately by four congregations which prefer to have the bulk of their archives organized at a brisk pace. So far the Centre's organization runs quite smoothly. The price to pay is a considerable increase in the amount of organizing and paperwork required. This bothers us a bit, since we want to give priority to our two main activities: the meetings we organize for the archivists at Nijmegen university and our visits to the archives themselves.

MEETINGS

So far we have some twenty meetings behind us. At each meeting we welcomed between fifteen and thirty archivists of the seventy-odd we serve: the number of meetings was dictated by our wish to keep the groups relatively small. We prefer repeat performances to over-large audiences. Moreover, because the number of participants steadily increased we arranged a few extra meetings in order to allow newcomers to catch up with their colleagues.

In 1990 we decided to devote the meetings to a course in the basic technique of archives management and not to a discussion of the practical problems archivists encounter. So our meetings deal with such basic matters as the definition of 'archives', 'records' and 'series', the difference between current and non-current archives, the internal organization of archives, the differences between archival and documentary material, the elements of archival description, the principle of provenance, etc. (We do however insert in each meeting an hour for questions and answers.) In June 1992 we deviated a little from this course by devoting a meeting to the conservation of photos, slides, films, cassettes, tapes, videotapes and computer disks. Since many archivists were about to reorganize their photo collection we decided that this subject could not wait.

On hindsight this systematic approach proved to be fortunate since we avoided being asked the same questions time and again. The basic terms and concepts have become familiar and need no longer be discussed. Talks with the archivists on the problems of their archives have become much easier and more fruitful. The questions which were put forward during our meetings, tended to touch less and less upon purely practical matters, such as the kind of boxes one should use, and increasingly upon matters of organization: the centralization of archival material, the principle of provenance, the distinction between units within the archives, the distinction between archival material on the one hand and documentation and books on the other, the choice of access systems, the use of personal computers, etc.

Since there appears to be no suitable literature on basic archives management, we decided to publish a newsletter in which we summarize the contents of the meetings for later reference. We also use this newsletter to draw attention to special issues, such as the archival legacy of deceased members or the central distribution of acid-free boxes.

All this should not create the impression that the archivists who first came to our meetings were completely lacking in knowledge about archives. Far from it. But their knowledge related to the contents and the structure of their own archives and to the history of their own communities and less to the theory behind archives management. They knew their own limitations in this respect and sometimes showed themselves surprisingly insecure about they way they had so far managed their affairs — quite unnecessarily, in many instances.

The meetings with our archivists have had another, rather unexpected effect. Most archivists find themselves in a rather isolated position as far as their job is concerned. Socially, because their work often confines them to cellars and attics. Intellectually, because within their communities few people feel any affinity with the work of an archivist. The meetings in Nijmegen bring them into regular contact with colleagues who do the same work, who encounter identical problems and who also enjoy talking about archives and about the history of their communities. In this way these meetings serve both a practical and a social purpose. We do our bit to cultivate this social aspect of the meetings by lavishly sprinkling the proceedings with coffee and by organizing a collective lunch and, if the weather permits, a walk over the university grounds. Each year one meeting takes the form of an excursion to an inspiring institution or museum. These excursions give us another opportunity to combine business with pleasure.

During the next years the regular meetings will probably change in character: less frequent and oriented toward specific themes instead of a systematic program. We expect that in terms of time investment visiting the archives will slowly gain priority over the meetings in Nijmegen.

VISITS

The number of our visits to individual archives is by now quite considerable, but we are still trying to increase their frequency. The past two years have made us realize that frequent and personal visits to the archivists are not just useful but essential to our work. Letters and telephone calls are fine, but compared to personal visits they are inadequate means of communication. We noticed, for example, that archivists seldom give us a call, although we frequently told them to feel free to do so. Presumably they are afraid to disturb us in some unspecified but doubtlessly absorbing activity — not realizing that we are paid good money to take their calls! So they save all their questions in order to put them forward during the next meeting in Nijmegen, which in effect means that for weeks or months they needlessly have all kinds of small problems weighing on their mind. Visits of staff members enable them to ask all the questions they can think of and to point out the problems in their actual context. For us each visit is a reminder that for all our theoretical knowledge the practice of convent archives still confronts us with many small but tricky problems. Moreover, accompanying the archivists for a whole day is the best way to get acquainted with their collections. Each visit adds to our experience and to our ability to make useful and efficient suggestions.

Finally, visits have given us a feeling for tactics and pace. Convent archives differ greatly in the amount of work that can be done in a year's time. In some communities two or three sisters are available for several days a week and work proceeds briskly. In others the archives are strictly a one-man job. Elsewhere the community's council's secretary tries to keep the archives in order in his or her spare time. Some archivists are relatively young, in good health and energetic. Others are forced by their years or by poor health to take it easy. This means that in some archives it is possible to work along the lines of a scheme in which steps and goals are more or less precisely defined. In others one cannot do more than give good advice and quietly await how much can be achieved. We refrain from any attempt to hurry things up.

Obviously, the matter of manpower is very important. Many communities, especially the smaller ones, find it increasingly difficult to find members able and willing to take care of the archives. Yet it is imperative that communities who think of joining the Service Centre have an archivist who can spend at least a good part of the week on archival work. Membership of the Service Centre becomes a source of frustration for all concerned if it is impossible to act upon advice or new insights.

METHOD

Through our visits we have developed a method or pattern which we present, adapted to the actual circumstances, to archivists who have plans for a reorganization of their archives. We distinguish seven phases. In the end these must lead to a workable collection which can then be described in greater detail. So, in effect, it is a method to prepare an archival collection for further processing.

1. It is very important that before any reorganization takes place all archival material is located, since in most convents the centralization of archives, although officially encouraged, is far from complete. Many records have in the past been stored away in offices, rooms, attics, cellars and cupboards — and forgotten.

2. Before any major shifting around of records takes place, improvements in the construction of the store room, in its climate control or in the kind of shelves and cupboards used must be made.

3. All archives are collected and stored centrally in the store room.

4. All objects which do not belong to the convent's archives are removed. In practice this often means that many books have to be moved to the library, sold or thrown away.

5. A list is made of the labels on boxes, files and all other items in the order in which they happen to be stored. For convenience' sake the actual contents are not yet checked against the labels. The resulting list serves as an indispensable if crude survey of the archives' contents.

6. The items on the list are then, in consultation with the archivist, rearranged on paper into an outline or structure. In this outline series of records and records which form the principal collections are put together.

7. All boxes and files are then replaced in the order prescribed by the outline.

Once these seven phases are completed the archives are ready for the far more elaborate (and time-consuming) process of describing all records and of compiling a definite inventory.

THE NEAR FUTURE

During the past two years we invested a substantial part of our time in the recruitment of new members. Successfully, as our membership numbers show. Now, however, we are faced with the consequences: keeping in touch with thirty-three archives is a lot of work. Nevertheless we doubt if we will be allowed to concentrate solely on consolidation. Perhaps more of the numerous small communities will join us. Perhaps some of our members will encounter difficulties in manning their archives and will ask us to intervene. Perhaps we will be able to enlarge our staff and take on new activities. The future contains many uncertainties but by making a start which on the whole has been fortunate, we hope to be in a good position to face it.

TECHNICAL AND TECHNOLOGICAL STANDARDS FOR ARCHIVES: SOME RECENT EXAMPLES IN CATHOLIC ARCHIVES

Michael Cook

For the last decade, archivists in different parts of the world have been developing standards, particularly standards for the description of archives and for the exchange of data from one archival system to others. The documents that this work has produced have tended to be technical and difficult for the non-expert, which may be one reason why Catholic archives in Britain have not as yet been deeply affected. However, the standards movement has been important in developing several national or international projects which do have significance and interest for Catholic archivists and their users.

This paper considers two widely different projects, and uses them as examples to discuss some of the factors which are involved with large-scale data exchange, and with archival development in the future. The two projects are the University of Michigan's computerization at the Vatican archives, and the experiment with optical transmission of archival data at the Archivo General de Indias at Seville. The data exchange factors are the development of MARC formats for archives, and of an international standard for archival description, ISAD(G).

THE VATICAN ARCHIVES PROJECT

In 1988 the University of Michigan began work on a very large scale project at the archives of the Vatican¹. The aim was to create a computer-based access system for the whole archive, operating at class (series) level². The progress of the work demonstrated the great value of using a modern standard approach to control the elements of a large and complex ancient archive.

Many people, of course, have worked on creating finding aids for parts of the Vatican archive, and their work has extended over at least four centuries. The result is that several individual components of the archive have been indexed or catalogued in great detail and with much scholarly care. The piecemeal and unplanned approach which underlay this meant that there was never any complete or general guide to the whole accumulation. By adopting a class-level control, the archivists from Michigan were able to cut through the complexities of the material and solve the problem of unlisted parts.

1. The project director is Dr. F.X. Blouin, the University Archivist. Funding came from several sources, including the Getty Grant Program of Santa Monica, California, and the (US) National Endowment for the Humanities. Mgr Charles Burns was involved at the Rome end of the project.

2. These terms themselves come from an archival standard. This is M. Cook & M. Procter. Manual of Archival Description, 2nd ed (MAD2). Gower Publications, 1990.

Instead of looking at the documents themselves, they began by analyzing the organizations and departments which had created the archives in the first place. By listing these, it was possible to draw up a table of group, functional subgroups and classes which could be used as the basis for a new set of descriptions. The task became one of compiling administrative histories for each of the record-creating agencies. Over 500 of these agency histories have now been completed.

The work was complex, all the same. The archives had undergone much upheaval over the centuries. Not all the component parts are now in the custody of the Vatican archives. The Napoleonic adventure, for example, has left some parts of it in the Archives Nationales or the Bibliotheque National of France. Other parts are in the Italian archives, or held by congregations or offices in Rome.

The Michigan archivists decided at the planning stage, that the database they would produce would use the MARC AMC format, so that problems of data exchange would be minimized when the material was introduced to American systems. [Is this a model for the whole Church, one wonders?].

THE MARC FORMATS

To assess the significance of this choice, it may be useful at this point to go back a little and look more closely at the way American archivists have been using the MARC formats, and what these are.

MARC [Machine-Readable record] is a set of conventions, originally devised by librarians in the late 1960s, for setting out bibliographical descriptions in electronic databases. It is a standard for the external structure of the description, and not for the content - for the way information is set out, not for the wording and coverage of the descriptions. The main principle is that descriptions are broken down into closely defined fields, each of which is identified by a numerical tag. For example, field 100 contains information about the author of a work, field 245 holds the title; and so on.. There are fields for what librarians term 'added entries' that is index terms for names, places, subjects, etc. Although several countries have now developed variants of the original MARC format for their own use, there is considerable agreement between these variants, and, by and large, it is possible to use MARC as the basis for schemes for exchanging data nationally and internationally.

As soon as bibliographical data began to be compiled on a large scale, it became obvious that there had to be rules for the content of the data as well as for its format. The names of authors had to be standardized, there had to be authority lists of subject terms. The way descriptions were organized had to be subject to rules. Librarians therefore developed the Anglo-American Cataloguing Rules (AACR) which have now been revised twice: the current version is known as AACR2R.

At the beginning of the 1980s, American archivists began to realize that the rapid development of electronic databases offered an opportunity to them. They found, as archivists have always done, that library standards and rules are not suitable for use with archival materials. But at the same time, they realized that they would not be able to use library-based databases unless they could somehow adapt AACR and MARC to their own purposes.

The Society of American Archivists [SAA] set to work on this problem, and by 1984 had published two documents: the (US) MARC format for Archives and Manuscripts Control (AMC); and the cataloguing rules known as Archives, Personal Papers and Manuscripts (AppM)¹. These were the structural format and the rules for content, respectively. Armed with these, the SAA was able to persuade the appropriate authorities to give an official endorsement. Since then, many thousands of archival descriptions have been input to the three main online bibliographical databases current in North America. These are the Research Libraries Information Network (RLIN), the Online Library Computer Center (OCLC), and the University of Texas Library Automation System (UTLAS).

The MARC AMC format was also put to use by the archivist at the State University of Michigan, Fred Honhart, who devised a software package for archival description on personal computers. This package, MicroMARC.amc, has become widely used in America, and is one of the few ready-made 'turnkey' computer systems for archives. It is based upon the AMC format².

As a result of all this, the (US) MARC AMC format is now well established³ and there is some pressure from American and Canadian archivists to persuade their colleagues in the old world to follow suit. In this, they have not been rapidly successful. (Sister Elaine Wheeler, American Provincial archivist of the Daughters of Charity has argued powerfully in favour of the system and its standards.) The Archival Description Project at Liverpool did indeed undertake preliminary work on a (UK) MARCAMC format, but there was no encouragement from the British Library or from any European database. No European archivists except those of Sweden had any familiarity with these originally library-based systems, and it did not appear likely that there would be opportunities to include archival descriptions in a bibliographical exchange. The (British) National Council on Archives examined the question, and decided against advocating MARC as part of a national policy.¹

There have recently been some signs that this aversion to MARC may be softening. Within Britain, a group of archivists have begun using MARC AMC. These include colleagues working in the archives departments of large museums (such as the Tate Gallery and the Victoria and Albert Museum) or libraries (such as the National Library of Ireland). The attitude of the British Library towards this development has perceptibly softened. The British Library itself has elected to become a full member of RLIN, so that archival data from America (but much of which relates to Britain or Europe) can now easily be consulted. Work has begun again on completing a UK MARC AMC. Catholic archivists should therefore be aware that there is a possibility of important new developments in this field.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF DESCRIPTION STANDARDS

APPM is not the only archival cataloguing standard available in English. The Canadian government announced its interest in the subject in the run-up to the International Congress in Montreal in 1992. The Bureau of Canadian Archivists and its working parties have been responsible for a stream of very useful publications since 1985. In 1990 they began publishing the complete Rules for Archival Description (RAD), which is appearing chapter by chapter². An electronic version of these rules, HyperRAD, is also being developed, which uses the principle of hypertext to provide links between different chapters and sections. Both APPM and RAD are visibly developed from the original AACR2 rules for manuscripts, though both, and particularly RAD, have made considerable alterations in order to accommodate the special requirements of archival description.

British archivists also began work on developing a standard at about the same time as their transatlantic colleagues. The Liverpool project began in 1984, and has since issued two successive versions of the Manual of Archival Description (MAD). The second edition, MAD2, published in 1990, has secured acceptance from the National Council on Archives, and will be further developed and maintained in the coming period. MAD2 has quite a different aim and basis from both of the North American rules.

1. Information technology standards and archival description. Report of a working party to the National Council on Archives, March 1991. Copies are available from the National Register of Archives.
2. Bureau of Canadian Archivists, Ottawa, 1990 (in progress).

Its aim is to provide an agreed structure for the creation of archival finding aids within the repository. It does not set out to give a format suitable for the exchange of data outside or between repositories, though in fact one of the central principles of MAD does indeed provide an essential basis for exchange.

This description standard ought to be an important aid to Catholic archivists, and I would like to use this opportunity to set out some of its main characteristics.

MAD codifies the principle of levels of arrangement and description. The idea that there are standard levels of arrangement is not new. The concept was first clarified in the USA¹. It has been rediscovered and republished in different forms ever since². MAD restates the principle, but also extends it. A table of levels is given which looks like the hierarchical continuum characteristic of a classification scheme, and numbered like one:

0 Repository level: suitable for descriptions covering more than one repository.

1 Management levels: assemblies of archival groups brought together on the basis of some common feature, for the convenience of the repository. E.g. Official/non-official archives, ecclesiastical archives, private papers. Subordinate groupings may be numbered using decimals of 1.

2 Group or collection level (internationally fonds): the archives of distinct entities. Subgroups (functional divisions within the group) are numbered using decimals of 2.

3 Series (within Britain, termed class): physically related sets of archives. Subseries are given decimals of 3.

4 Items: the unit of physical handling (volume, file, box).

5 Pieces: indivisible components; documents. Levels 4 and 5 may be used interchangeably in some cases.

The interesting thing about this is its universality. Yet it is unlike a general classification scheme because it is tied to observable external phenomena at three points:

Group (Fonds) (level 2) always relates to the total archival product of a distinct entity (organisation or individual);

Class (Series) (level 3) are always the physically and systematically

1. The first and basic explanation is usually taken to be O.W.Holmes 'Archival arrangement: five different operations at five different levels' The American Archivist 27 (1964), 21-41.

2. It is remarkable that archivists should have had so much difficulty in building on established work. It became apparent that the principle had to be proved again when the discussion of ISAD(G) began in 1990.

related product of an administrative activity, sets that belong together because of the way they were created and used;

Items (level 4) are always the physical units of handling.

No level of arrangement is compulsory. Therefore, provided that we accept that the three levels above must always be set to correspond to the appropriate physical entities, any or all of the levels of arrangement can be used, above the group, or below the item, as convenient.

There is a multi-level rule, which says that archival descriptions should normally embrace more than one of these levels. The first part of this rule states that aggregates (e.g. groups) should be described as a whole before components of them are described severally. However, MAD has a further elaboration of the principle, which has an important use in the context of finding aids. This is the concept of 'macro' and 'micro' descriptions.

These two terms do not relate to the specific levels of arrangement which are being described, but to the relationship between them. For example, finding aids frequently contain descriptions at group, class and item levels. In these, the macro-micro relationship has a triple form:

Group description: a macro description governing:

Class description 1: a micro description in relation to the above, but a macro governing:

Item descriptions: micro descriptions of items in class 1, governed by the above.

Class description 2 etc

MAD2 also contains models for setting out descriptions at the different levels. Guidelines suggest that the relationships of dependence between them should be demonstrated to the user by the use of narrower margins, left and right. The example above shows a common situation, but not the only one. In any given case, the macro and micro descriptions may relate to any level of arrangement: group/item; management group/group; item/piece, etc. It is therefore a misconception to regard the macro description as peculiar to the 'higher' levels of arrangement, and the micro to the 'lower' ones.

Macro descriptions are written from a different standpoint from micro descriptions. They deal with the aggregate (whichever it is). Micro descriptions give specific information, case by case. In the example above, the group description will give information relating to the group as a whole (probably including provenance information, but this is a separate issue); it also gives all information common to the classes which follow, in order to avoid pointless repetition.

The class descriptions which follow have a dual character. In so far as they are micro descriptions, they deal with each class one by one, giving specific information. Each class description then operates as a macro for the items which follow. As macros they give information which relates to the class as a whole, and common data for the items. Finally, the items give data specific to each case.
