The macro/micro concept leads on to the core of the MAD2 guidelines, which are the models for different types of finding aid. The models for descriptions at the different levels involve drawing on the data elements. These are listed in a table which groups them into two sectors and seven areas. Although all the data elements in the table appear also in APPM and RAD, the groupings are different, and are not consistent with library tradition. This is perhaps the point at which MAD2 is most different from other standards. Nevertheless, the team commends the MAD2 system for consideration by Catholic colleagues. The two sectors contain information which is in the public domain [the archival description sector] and that which is not [the management information sector]. We consider that this is a useful distinction for the different parts of a finding aids system. The areas provide groups of descriptive information specific to archives, not derived from bibliographic practice.

One area, the administrative and custodial history area, contains only information about background, context and provenance. Despite some occasional controversy, it is universally agreed that this information has to be included in archival descriptions, and must include access points. MAD2 fully accepts this principle, and also states that provenance information is not attached essentially to any one level of arrangement. Thus, although it is characteristic (of course) of group descriptions, provenance data may also sometimes be found in descriptions of any other level, down to and including pieces.

Although the terminology has not yet been standardised, these principles have all been taken up in the newly announced international standard for archival description, ISAD(G), together with its explanatory introduction, the Statement of Principle regarding archival description [the Madrid Principles]¹. Both these documents include a diagram illustrating the makeup of an archival fonds, and showing the different levels. The declared purpose of the international standard is data exchange, and it assumes that the archivists who are using it will already have structured finding aids to help them.

1..The texts of these documents were produced by International Council on Archives, through its Ad Hoc Commission on Archival Description Standards. Copies can be obtained from the Commission's secretary, Hugo Stibbe, at the National Archives of Canada, 395 Wellington St, Ottawa.

ISAD(G) insists on the same basic principles of operation as MAD2: it has a multi-level rule, considers the group (fonds) as the essential starting point for description, and insists that information on provenance is essential. It does have one important innovation, the idea that every set of archival descriptions must include access points, and that these access points should be written using a strictly controlled vocabulary. This notion is derived from information science and will be new to most archivists, at least in Britain¹. Working with authorities to control our use of language has not been our strong point.

MAD2 does not explicitly use the concept of the access point. The Project team rejected it because it seemed unusable in the context of structured finding aids. This policy is now being revised in the light of experience in drafting the international standard, and it is probable that the concept of access points, subject to authority control, will be accepted for future revisions. Other concepts that are more truly of library origin, though, will continue to be excluded. An example is the concept of the 'chief source of information', which is not thought to have any value for the construction of finding aids, as opposed to 'bibliographical' descriptions for data exchange.

At this moment, English-speaking archivists have the choice of three cataloguing standards: the American APPM, the Canadian RAD and the British MAD2. Naturally we hope that MAD2 will become a general standard in this country and in Europe, but colleagues can freely take their choice, and of course they may also choose to avoid following any description standard at all. If there are any disadvantages in this last course, they will probably not become fully apparent for some time.

THE ARCHIVO GENERAL DE INDIAS PROJECT

It is against the background of all this infrastructural work that we should evaluate what is probably the biggest current development project in European archives. The archive of the Indies at Seville contains the records of the Spanish administration of the New World, from the time of Columbus until the wars of independence. The project was of course conceived as part of the international celebrations of 1492/1992, and was funded in large part by IBM and the Ramon Areces Foundation (associated with the supermarket chain El Corte Ingles).

The project creates a database of digitised images of original documents. The digital image can be enlarged so that difficult passages can be studied in detail; the images can also be screened so that discoloured or obscured parts appear clean. This invention has transformed palaeographical work, especially since the images can be accessed over remote networks. About 9 million images are held on the database, 10% of the total holdings. Each image is accompanied by a brief description containing keywords by which the document can be identified and retrieved. The system is to be extended to the other main depots of the Spanish National Archives service. As the technology becomes cheaper, and the Spanish experience is more widely shared, we can expect this to become a normal way of making archives available over networks.

In this form of digitised image, the computer system simply holds the picture of the original document as a displayable item; the computer system is not yet capable of 'reading' the content. That is why it is still necessary for the archivists to provide a searchable index. Nevertheless, being able to examine the original image over great distances, and with the enhancements that are possible, will greatly widen users' experience of older archives. Already other projects are taking up the same approach: the Samuel Hartlib papers at the University of Sheffield, and the Ottoman archives at Istanbul.

CONCLUSION

The two projects mentioned at the beginning and end of this paper provide a context within which the more technical developments in the field of archival data exchange can be discussed. Taken together, they outline the framework within which archivists will be working at the end of the century. We will be getting used to the idea of remote access to archival materials, using databases. More fundamentally, we shall be getting used to the disciplines imposed by data exchange rules and formats. These have to be developed and learnt by archival practitioners. All this represents a solid programme of collaborative work and retraining. Archives work is becoming steadily more technical, but there are compensating advantages.

THE ARUNDELL ARCHIVE

Christine North and Steven Hobbs

In 1991 the archive of the great westcountry family of Arundell was acquired jointly, by a private treaty sale, by the County Councils of Wiltshire and Cornwall, after nearly three years of deliberation and negotiation. The importance and potential of the documents had been recognized for many years. The Royal Commission on Historical Manuscripts had first made an inspection in 1871, and the ensuing report recorded that "the vast collection of Charters, Rolls and Papers are at present deposited in eighteen boxes, in several presses and in various drawers. These are filled to overflowing with documents of all dates, from the twelfth century to a comparatively recent period". More detailed listing of part of the archive was undertaken in the late 1930s, in 1947 and in 1950. The records were housed at Wardour in Wiltshire, and although they had over the years been consulted by a handful of scholars, no facilities existed for making them available for research. For a number of reasons the family did not wish to place the archive on deposit at either the Wiltshire or the Cornwall County Record Office.

In 1987 a tentative approach was made to the University of Exeter, suggesting that "a consortium of local public bodies" might be able to raise funds to purchase the archive. The University in turn approached Cornwall County Record Office. It has to be said at the outset that local authority record offices do not normally purchase documents - they simply do not have spare cash in their budgets! However, the documents were considered to be of such national and local historical importance that there was a possibility of obtaining a substantial amount of grant aid, and in January 1988 discussions began which were to continue for nearly three years.

Our first priority was to inspect the archive, since 1960 housed in a specially adapted muniment room in the grounds of the family's home in Wiltshire. We had some idea from the lists compiled for the National Register of Archives of the variety and content of a proportion of the documents, but we were quite unprepared for the quantity and quality: over 200 boxes, several large cupboards and an assortment of trunks contained the finest estate and family archive we had seen.

After several days of investigation in the documents, and research into the history of the family, we were faced with a dilemma. Clearly the archive should be secured for the nation and made available for research, but which county should negotiate the purchase, Wiltshire or Cornwall? Although the existing reports and lists suggested that the documents formed one archival unit, everything we had seen and read indicated that although the records were stored together, they did in fact comprise two separate archives, relating respectively to the properties and activities of two families: the Arundells of Lanherne in Cornwall and of Wardour in Wiltshire.

Why, then, were they all in Wiltshire? This was explained when we realized how the family had acquired, and disposed of, its vast estates in the westcountry. Domesday Book records a Roger Arundell holding lands in Dorset and Somerset; his son Robert owned property in Cornwall. Subsequent generations of male heirs made 'good' marriages which brought them substantial properties in Cornwall, Devon, Somerset, Dorset and Wiltshire. By the fourteenth century they were settled at Lanherne, in the parish of St Mawgan in Pydar in Cornwall, and by the early sixteenth century they were enjoying their greatest period of prosperity and influence. Lanherne was considered to be one of the most magnificent of all Cornish Tudor houses; members of the family served as Sheriffs, Justices of the Peace, Vice Admirals and Stewards of the Duchy of Cornwall's Cornish estates. They served in Government and at Court and were connected by marriage with many of the English aristocratic families.

In the 1520s the vast estates were divided between two brothers. The elder, John, received properties in Cornwall, Devon and Dorset, and remained at Lanherne; the younger, Thomas, received properties in Dorset, Somerset and Devon, to which he made extensive additions including Wardour Castle, which became his place of residence. Thomas' grandson, also Thomas, was in 1605 created Baron Arundell of Wardour. The Lanherne and Wardour estates continued a separate existence until the eighteenth century. In 1739 the heiress to Lanherne, Mary Bellings Arundell, married the heir to Wardour, Henry, 7th Baron Arundell, their son Henry therefore succeeding to the whole of the Arundell property.

Nevertheless, their activities had been so diverse and so significant that even though they have not lived in Cornwall for over 200 years the name of 'Arundell' remains as evocative as that of 'Trelawny' to the people of Cornwall. Sir John Arundell repulsed the French off the Cornish coast in 1379; another John became Bishop of Exeter in 1502. The Trerice branch produced a fifteenth century vice admiral of Cornwall, while yet another Sir John was governor of Pendennis Castle during the Civil War, defending it against Parliamentary troops until forced to surrender 'with flags flying and drums beating' in 1646. Arundells have served Cornwall as Justices of the Peace, Sheriffs and Members of Parliament.

Their activities in Wiltshire were equally important. The first Baron Arundell was made Count of the Holy Roman Empire for his bravery at the battle of Gran in Hungary in 1595 when the Turkish army was defeated; Lady Blanche defended Wardour Castle for 5 days when it was besieged by Parliamentary forces; while Isobel Arundell's husband, Richard Burton, the famous nineteenth century explorer, travelled extensively in Africa and was an expert on Arabic culture.

The family's involvement in national events declined after the Reformation. They remained staunchly Catholic, and their fortunes and fame fluctuated according to the religious persuasions of the Crown. Although debarred from holding major offices of state they were still active locally, and travelled extensively, particularly in France. Following the reuniting of the two branches of the family a new and magnificent house and muniment room was built at Wardour in the late 1770s. The house at Lanherne was emptied of its contents, much of the furniture being sold to local farmers; the documents were literally carted off to Wiltshire. Lanherne was offered to the Carmelites for use as a nunnery.

The Cornish properties were subsequently entirely administered from Wiltshire, necessitating a network of estate stewards and local agents to collect rents and manage the farms, with the attendant problems of attempting to run extensive and scattered holdings at a distance. Much of the Cornish estate was heavily mortgaged and the greater part had by 1820 been sold.

Clearly the documents were of enormous importance both as sources for national history, and for their potential contribution to the history of the westcountry as a whole. It was obvious that both Wiltshire and Cornwall had a major interest in the acquisition of those documents relating to their respective counties, but equally obvious that neither local authority could be expected to consider the acquisition of large quantities of out-county material. After lengthy discussions with the owner, with professional colleagues in the region and at the Historical Manuscripts Commission, and most important of all, with our respective County Councils, a two-way split was agreed - exceptionally, but in the circumstances entirely justifiably since the two estates had obviously always been separately administered.

Fund raising was now a major concern. In order to qualify for national grant aid each county had to supply at least 25% of the total purchase price. From an initial valuation of half a million pounds for the entire archive, tax concessions, negotiations and the agreement to split the archive had reduced the asking price to £100,000 for each authority. Wiltshire's £25,000 was secured mainly by an additional budget allocation, Cornwall's was raised almost entirely by a public appeal managed and supported by the Cornwall Heritage Trust. National funding was made available by the Victoria and Albert Museum Purchase Grant Fund, the National Heritage Memorial Fund, the Wolfson Trust and the Friends of the National Libraries and in July 1991 we took possession of the documents.

Cornwall's share comprises nearly 300 boxes, at a rough calculation over 20,000 documents. At least half comprises mediaeval and early modern estate and manorial records, some of which are represented in the National Register of Archives' lists. They include very early charters relating to the endowments of the Benedictine priory at Tywardreath in Cornwall, some bearing superb episcopal seals. Much of the acquisition however remains quite unlisted, though a first examination indicates some exceptional items: Papal indulgences, letters of confraternity, most of them beautifully illuminated, recusancy papers (particularly important since Cornwall's Quarter sessions records have not survived) and numerous letters reflecting the family's adherence to the Catholic faith, including a series concerning the transfer of Lanherne to the Carmelite sisters. As potential sources of information on the activities of an important Catholic family the documents deserve close attention.

However, only those documents which have been briefly listed for the National Register of Archives can at present be produced for research (there is an annotated list available at Quality House). A small group of committed volunteers is already working on a preliminary checklist of the seventy or so boxes of unsorted and unlisted documents, but the entire collection needs to be examined, rearranged into proper 'archival' order, and catalogued in enough detail to enable the early and difficult to read documents to be made available to as many researchers as possible. This task would of necessity have been scheduled as a long-term cataloguing project, albeit a high priority one; but the Cornwall Heritage Trust's application to the Leverhulme Trust for funding has been successful, and in April 1993 they will appoint a researcher whose task for the next three years will be to produce an annotated Calendar of the Cornish Arundell archive. Watch this space!

What of the Wiltshire archive? It contains far fewer mediaeval documents, some almost certainly having been destroyed during the Civil War. Estate and legal records however are plentiful from the sixteenth century, and include superb plans and drawings of the chapel at Wardour, and architectural and garden plans by James Paine and 'Capability' Brown. The papers of Henry, Lord Arundell, imprisoned in the Tower from 1679 to 1684 contain valuable material relating to the proceedings against him in Titus Oates' 'Popish Plot'. An extensive collection of letters from Catholic bishops, lords and gentry from 1786 to 1797 throws light on the position of Catholics at that time and the move towards Catholic emancipation.

We hope that even this initial brief look at what is arguably one of the finest archives in the country will serve to indicate the variety and extent of sources for the history of Catholicism both in the westcountry and nationally. Much work needs to be done, both in the conservation of the documents and in their rearrangement and cataloguing, and they will not all be readily available for consultation for some time. Further reports will be made as more detailed catalogues are compiled, to ensure the widest possible circulation of information to potential researchers. It will be by their use that the worth of this remarkable archive must in the end be judged - over to you, the readers of Catholic Archives!

THE RELIGIOUS ARCHIVES GROUP CONFERENCE 1992

The Religious Archives Group exists to facilitate liaison between academic institutions, professional archivists, and religious archives. It holds annual conferences, and publishes their proceedings. A small steering committee organises its activities.

On Monday, 14th September 1992, the annual conference was held at Wesley College, Bristol. The theme of the conference was the heritage of Methodism in Britain. Mr Gareth Lloyd of the Methodist Archives and Research Centre of the John Rylands University Library, Manchester, gave an interesting and concise paper on Methodist Archives, with particular reference to the Rylands holdings. Alison Taylor of the Museum of Methodism, Wesley's Chapel, London, then illustrated by slides the history and role of the Museum. The Rev. Tim Macquiban who serves on the Methodist Church Archives and History Committee, then spoke of the history of Wesley College. A tour of the College, and of its library then followed.

After lunch the Rev. A. Raymond George, Warden of the New Room, Bristol, gave a short paper of the heritage of John Wesley in Bristol. The conference then split into Special Interest Groups, with Dr Meryl Foster of the Public Record Office leading one on the tricky question of Copyright, and Dr Clive Field of the University of Birmingham Library guiding the other in an exploration of the issue of fundraising and income generation.

Copies of the Proceedings of the 1991 Conference at Birmingham were distributed. The conference was attended by just over thirty people.

CATHOLIC ARCHIVES IN NEW ZEALAND

The Rev. Michael O'Meehan SM

Even though the two countries are sometimes linked under the one name Australasia, Catholic Archives in Australia and New Zealand hold little in common. While both countries developed during the nineteenth century as colonies in the British Empire, their Catholic starting points are quite diverse. As a continent in its own right, Australia was never included in Propaganda's plans for evangelizing the Pacific Islands. After several earlier ad hoc arrangements, in 1819 Australia was included under the umbrella of the English Benedictine mission centred at Mauritius till 1834 when New Holland and Van Diemen's Land were established as Vicariates Apostolic. Australia's Catholic development was prompted by the need to provide pastoral care for the Catholics among the colonists and convicts who began to settle Australia from 1788 onwards.

In contrast, New Zealand was included in Rome's concern to send Catholic missionaries among the indigenous peoples of the Pacific to counter the Protestant missionaries who were already active among them. In 1830 New Zealand was included in the Prefecture of the South Sea Islands which was to be administered from Reunion Island near Madagascar/Malagassy. This plan depended on a French naval supply ship making a round-the-world voyage after supplying French bases in South America, and collapsed when the French navy withdrew its offer of cooperation.

In 1833 the Vicariate of Eastern Oceania was erected to provide more room to move for the Congregation of the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary (Picus Fathers); they had been expelled from Tahiti where they had made a beginning with a Prefecture Apostolic in 1827. In 1836 a matching Vicariate of Western Oceania was created and this included New Zealand. A new congregation that had been growing in the diocese of Lyons and Belley in France, the Society of Mary (Marist Fathers), was invited to accept responsibility for evangelizing it.

Its first Bishop, Jean-Baptiste Pompallier, made the prolonged journey out a reconnaissance of his vast territory, and eventually decided to make New Zealand his base. He arrived in northern New Zealand on 10 January 1838 with a Marist priest and a Marist catechist brother; other Marists followed when Europe learned where he had settled. Initially, there were comparatively few European settlers, and the mission was to the indigenous Maori people. When he left for Europe on his first ad limina in 1846, Auckland was emerging as the main European settlement, but the mission to Maori was still the predominant apostolate. So the bishop took to Propaganda a projection for an Archdiocese of Auckland with a cluster of Polynesian and Melanesian suffragan dioceses to its north.

The documentation recording this growth is scattered through many archives, most out of reach to the average student. A remarkably comprehensive book has gathered and linked these sources: The Founding of the Roman Catholic Church in Oceania 1825 to 1850 by Ralph M. Wiltgen (Canberra 1979). It is really a portable archive for any student interested in the Catholic Church in New Zealand as it was originally envisaged; that is, integrated with the Pacific Islands, instead of what it became as an Irish outpost at the farthest edge of the British Empire, 'half the world from Home.' Students eagerly await Wiltgen's projected second volume that will bring the story on another 25 years.

North of New Zealand an indigenous Church grew slowly in the Pacific till the mid-1960s when many Vicariates were erected into dioceses. With New Zealand's six included, there are now forty-two dioceses in Pompallier's original Vicariate of Western Oceania. But New Zealand was the exception with immigration providing it with an almost instant transplanted Church. In 1848, with a broader vision than Pompallier's, Rome drew a line across the middle of the North Island; everything within New Zealand north of it became the Vicariate Apostolic of Auckland, with Pompallier as residential bishop being responsible for finding his own clergy; everything to the south of the line became the Vicariate Apostolic of Wellington, with French Marist Philippe Viard as bishop with Marist clergy. Both these Vicariates became dioceses in 1860.

While in Rome in 1869 for the First Vatican Council Viard arranged for the two southern provinces of the South Island, Otago and Southland, to be detached from his territory. By then the pressure from Ireland for Irish bishops for the Irish diaspora around the British Empire reached New Zealand. Irish Patrick Moran, Vicar Apostolic of Cape Colony, was translated to be installed as bishop of the new diocese of Dunedin. Pompallier, also at the Council, tendered his resignation. His successor was Irish Thomas Croke, later of Cashel and remembered as a famous Irish patriot. This development started to bring New Zealand into the orbit of Australia and the then three New Zealand bishops attended the first Plenary Council of Sydney in 1885. However, by the time of the next Council in 1895, New Zealand had its fourth diocese, Christchurch in the centre of the South Island, erected in 1887. At the same time Wellington was named an archbishopric. Instead of travelling to Sydney for the 1895 Council, the New Zealand bishops organized their own Synod in Wellington in 1899. The statutes that resulted included some rules about keeping archives; today's historians regret that these directives were not implemented more methodically.

As a developing country struggling to outgrow its colonial status, New Zealand at large was too pre-occupied in making its own history to be concerned for recording it carefully; Catholics reflected this national attitude. In recounting the nation's origins the main stream of Protestant tradition tended to ignore Catholics, a 15% minority in an overall European population. Catholics preserved their own history mostly as hagiography, looking to the dogged faith of pioneers as an inspiration to later generations. Because 90% of Catholics were of Irish origin, inevitably this loyalty to Church meant perseverance in the face of English discrimination against them. The hymn 'Faith of our Fathers living still, in spite of dungeon fire and sword' had lively echoes in New Zealand into the 1930s. The ideals of the groups that had begun the methodical colonizing of New Zealand were very liberal, offering freedom of opportunity and religion. But ideals could not filter out the inherited baggage of social attitudes that immigrants brought with them. Religious bigotry became institutionalized in the 1870s with the establishment of Orange and Hibernian societies.

After World War II Irish affairs ceased to be a major concern of the Church in New Zealand. In the country's idiom, 'going Home' dropped out of usage as an expression for a visit to the British Isles. Instead New Zealanders found that they were looking at the world through bi-focal spectacles with a segment of each lens made in the USA instead of Europe. As Pacific-Asian nations began to develop the glasses have become tri-focal. As a spin-off from this national refocusing, Catholics are rediscovering Pompallier's vision of Pacific Church. An earnest of this is the Federation (formed in 1990) of four Catholic Bishops Conferences of Oceania. Its first President is Cardinal Thomas Williams of Wellington; the bishops of thirty-one Australian dioceses are included in this Federation.

In parallel with this weakening of political, commercial and emotional ties with the British Isles has come a search for roots, both at national and family level, plus an increasing awareness of Catholics as a formative influence in New Zealand's national character. This has put pressure on Catholics to open their archives to serious researchers, with varying responses. A general openness is tempered by embarrassment that the records are not as well ordered as might be, plus some fear of what might be unearthed.

A. DIOCESAN ARCHIVES

The result of this pattern of growth in the New Zealand Church is four diocesan archives. Except for Auckland in more recent years, none has ever had the blessing of a full-time archivist. The collection of material has been rather haphazard; its arrangement mostly the work of priests for whom it was more a hobby interest than a serious concern. All four archives hold the expected items of land titles, registers, etc. but the personal material that makes archives come to life is very uneven. Over the years very little money has been available to spend on equipping their premises, let alone on salaried help.

1836: All N.Z. was included in Bp Pompallier's Vicariate Apostolic of Western Oceania.

1844: Pompallier's territory limited to N.Z.

1848: Auckland Diocese established in northern half of North Island. Rest of N.Z. became Wellington Diocese.

1869: Dunedin Diocese created from Wellington in the southern sector of South Island.

1887: Christchurch Diocese created from Wellington in the central sector of South Island.

1887: The 4 Dioceses declared a Province with Wellington as Archdiocese.

1980: Hamilton diocese created from southern sector of Auckland. Palmerston North diocese created from northern sector of Wellington.

DIOCESSES OF THE PROVINCE OF NEW ZEALAND

1. Auckland has by far the best archive of the four. The basic division of material is into episcopates which have ranged from two to forty years. The present bishop is the tenth, so there are also nine matching interregna which lasted from six months to nearly four years. The National Register of Archives and Manuscripts in New Zealand summaries:

"Each of these groups contain the major administration papers and records that have survived. They include correspondence with Rome, with overseas and New Zealand bishops, and with priests, parishes, societies, orders and laity within the diocese; papers relating to official appointments, synods, conferences and councils, diocesan accounts; plans and financial documents regarding church, school and other buildings and property in the diocese; correspondence with Catholic orders regarding their foundation and administration; personal papers of bishops, clergy, religious and some laity. An incomplete sequence of parish registers of baptisms, confirmations, marriages and burials, and marriage papers dates from 1836. There are photographs of and other pictorial matters of church occasions in various parts of the diocese, photographs of bishops, clergy, religious and laity."

The organization of the Auckland archives was sparked by the canonization in 1954 of Father Peter Chanel, the Marist Protomartyr of Oceania. Stories had risen round the site of a supposed grave in northern New Zealand where his remains were said to have been re-buried, when they were recovered from Futuna Island in 1842, till their return to France (via Sydney) in 1849. In 1967 the late Mrs Ruth Ross was commissioned by the New Zealand Historic Places Trust to do a quick re-write of a pamphlet used to guide visitors through the sole building remaining from the early Catholic mission in the far north. A distinctive Lyonnaise pisé structure, it had come to be known as Pompallier House. Three years later the revised pamphlet was published, its modest format giving little hint of the intensive and extensive research that went into its preparation; nor of the bulky unpublished file that resulted. Truth about the Chanel grave was isolated from the previous myths and uncertainties. Pompallier House had never been the bishop's residence, but was built as the mission printery; the supposed grave was a filled-in tanning pit; Chanel's relics had been reverently wrapped and kept in a box in a sacristy cupboard.

But the spin-off from this exercise was that Mrs Ross was distressed by the state of the diocesan archive which she had to use in the course of her research, and she offered of her expertise to its reorganization. Over close to fifteen years she methodically gave a day a week to the project with the enthusiastic cooperation of the diocesan Chancellor, Fr Ernest Simmons, who became a dedicated archivist. The attic space of the Bishop's House was cleared and adapted to hold the archive. Each file contained its own inventory, and the collected copies of the inventories provided an index. Additional finding aids were planned, but have yet to be completed. When the basic work was complete, other organizations pointed to this archive as a model of what could be achieved with patience, dedication and minimal outlay.

Sources up till 1930 are generally available to a researcher. This means that the voluminous and well-ordered papers of Henry Cleary, the fifth bishop (1910-1929), are open. He was journalist, controversialist and pamphleteer, his episcopate spanning World War 1 and its aftermath, a period he described as 'a cycle of sectarian epilepsy', fuelled primarily by Irish political events. There is also considerable material copied at different times from overseas archives (especially from Propaganda) relating to early years in New Zealand. This complements the extensive collection that remains from Pompallier's administration. Moderate in size but well chosen, a heritage from several bishops, the attached library includes many books about early New Zealand and Oceania which are now hard to find. So as well as providing the diocese with a well ordered archive, the Simmons-Ross work established a valuable resource centre.

One immediate result was Simmons publishing two books, the first ever objectively critical presentation of segments of New Zealand Catholic history: In Cruce Salus - a History of the Diocese of Auckland 1848-1980 (Auckland 1982). and Pompallier, Prince of Bishops (Auckland 1984). Several recent theses have used this archive, particularly to assess the impact the missionaries made on the Maori, and the problems French missionaries had with a British colonial administration.

In 1989 the archive was boxed for transfer to new premises in a new diocesan administration building. Simmons' declining health and his death in March 1992 delayed arrangement of the material in its new location. The new archivist, Fr Bruce Bolland, thinks it will be mid-1993 before the archive is as accessible to students as it was before the move.

2. Wellington The archives of the Archdiocese of Wellington is still in the course of preparation. Preliminary identification was undertaken in the early 1950s, but lack of facilities and staff impeded development. On two occasions burst pipes flooded the basement where much of the archive was stored, and material had to be hurriedly rescued and packed without regard for proper order. These years of part-time spasmodic work in a catacomb ended in 1990 when a new diocesan administration building allocated generous space for the archive. However, the part-time archivist and assistant are still in the early stages of the work. The material has not been catalogued, and the archive is not open to researchers. Requests for information and assistance may be made to the archivist, and are researched by staff on behalf of the enquirer.

When Viard died in 1872 the missionary era of the diocese was coming to an end. In his first decade Marists had made a painful but encouraging beginning among the Maori whom Viard regarded as his primary pastoral responsibility. By 1860 New Zealand's European population had outnumbered the Maori, and the Land Wars that had already begun further north spilled over into his diocese; his second decade saw the Maori mission destroyed and the Maori people largely alienated from European influence. Viard found himself presiding over a settler Church.

Among the autograph material that remains from this era are Viard's letter books. Before writing a letter in copperplate, he scribbled a rough copy in ledger type volumes of which several survive. His writing in these, sometimes in English sometimes in French, is often difficult to decipher. In his diaries, written for himself in French, the writing is consistently difficult. All known Viard material was carefully sifted by Lillian Gladys Keys for her biography Philip Viard — Bishop of Wellington (Christchurch 1968), and she developed a charism for interpreting his hand. Miss Keys bequeathed to the Archdiocese her accumulated notes and transcriptions, and a number of boxes and cartons are awaiting sorting.

Viard's successor was Francis Redwood who was aged 3 when his family arrived in New Zealand from Staffordshire to settle near Nelson. At 15, under Marist auspices, he went to France and Ireland to complete his secondary education, found his vocation to the priesthood in the Society of Mary, and returned at 35 as second bishop of Wellington. At the time of his consecration in Whitechapel he was the youngest Catholic bishop in the world; at his death 61 years later he was the oldest. He arrived at the end of 1874, in the middle of the decade that saw the European population double, by natural increase and by an intensive Government campaign in Europe for migrants, from a quarter to half a million. In contrast, the Maori population was in an obvious decline which would reach a low of about 40,000 before the trend slowly reversed at the turn of the century.

Redwood's priority had to be the mission to the settler Church, developing parishes before fragile faith was lost in the scramble to get established in a new land. By then Irish Marists had begun to arrive, reinforcing the French in parish ministry. Then with five young French Marists he made a start on rebuilding the abandoned Maori mission. Surprisingly little remains from this long and involved episcopate. There are two squeeze copy letter books dealing with the years 1875-1893; two other letter books, only partially used, have a few letters and some handwritten articles and/or sermons. There is a lot of paper that relates to his family and his travels, but everything else is very fragmentary.

As Viard had had to do, Redwood acted as major superior for Marists until a New Zealand Province of the Society of Mary was established in 1889.

But soon after his arrival he arranged legal recognition for the Society as a corporation sole, so it could begin to own property in its own right. By having ten parish areas permanently allocated to the Society he planned to limit its parish responsibilities so it could develop its own proper ministries, especially in education and parish missions. But by the turn of the century there were still only ten diocesan clergy to forty Marists, so inevitably administration records tend to be held by Marists rather than the diocese.

His coadjutor, Marist Thomas O'Shea, was consecrated in 1913 at 43, but was past his best at 65 when Redwood died in 1935. It was not till 1926 that O'Shea was able to set up an independent diocesan Chancery and administration office. From then on there are the makings of a distinctive diocesan archive. In 1947 O'Shea was given a coadjutor bishop from the ranks of diocesan clergy, but the Marist era did not officially end till O'Shea's death in 1954. Given this late start in formal diocesan organization, the content of archival boxes (labelled according to persons, parishes and organizations) tends to run over into more recent times, making it problematical to open it to general researchers.

3 Dunedin. European settlement of the Provinces of Otago and Southland (the southern third of the South Island) began under the aegis of the Free Church of Scotland with the first ships arriving at Dunedin in 1848. Consequently, there were few Catholic families in the founding years and these were visited from time to time by Marists from Wellington. Any hope of maintaining an exclusive Presbyterian settlement disappeared in mid-1861 with the discovery of gold in the interior; by the end of the year 14,000 had arrived seeking their fortunes, with men outnumbering women by at least five to one. This influx peaked at 22,000 by 1864, and had six Marists ministering to the considerable number of Catholics in a very mobile population. As the more easily found gold was worked out people moved on, but by the end of the decade Dunedin was established as a prosperous town of 22,000. This became the centre of a diocese. The new Bishop arrived in early 1871 with his own clergy, and the remaining Marists returned to Viard's territory.

In 1965 Mgr Peter Mee was appointed Chancellor of the diocese, and took a keen interest in the archive. Over the years he has collected historical records and photographs for safe keeping, patiently piecing together from fragments of archival evidence the history of the parishes that resulted from the shanty town beginnings of the gold-digging era.

At present all archival material relating to the diocese is housed in one of the four locations. Anything relating to property — land titles, plans and specifications, land valuations, rates, insurance — are in the archive of the Diocesan Property Services. All records and matters pertaining to marriage are kept at the Tribunal Office. All baptismal, confirmation, marriage and death registers not held in parishes are kept in the strong room of the Cathedral Presbytery. Everything relating to the history of the diocese — parishes, bishops' correspondence, circulars, clergy, laity, organizations, etc. — is properly filed in an archive which is located in the Chancery Office attached to the Cathedral presbytery.

Two years after his arrival in Dunedin Moran launched a weekly paper, The Tablet, to foster unity among Irish Catholics and promote the cause of Catholic education in the face of a state system then fast becoming secularist as provincial governments gave way to national government. It soon labelled itself as New Zealand's Catholic Weekly, and is still in print. Covering as it does nearly 120 years of Catholic New Zealand it can prove a mine of information for researchers, especially during the long years when it included news from parishes from all over the country. The archives holds a meticulously detailed, cross-reference index to the first 30 years, compiled by Miss Mary Hussey as a labour of love. From the archive it is a ten minute walk to The Tablet office which holds a complete set of the journal: the return walk uphill takes twice as long!

In recent years, with the assistance of Sister M Duchesne Ferguson RSM as archivist, an efficient filing system has been introduced, and a register binding programme commenced. Sister is presently handling requests for information.

4. Christchurch: The Diocesan Archive is still housed at the top of a spiral iron staircase, in what was originally a choir robing room in a gallery of the stone Cathedral. Till the late 1980s the cathedral presbytery was an aging wooden building that had survived several enlargements and renovations over ninety years, and was a considerable fire risk. The present building, adapted as a presbytery, is of brick but lacks the space needed to bring the archive down from its aloof fire-proof eyrie in the cathedral tower.

The creation of a diocese in the centre of the South Island from the provinces of Canterbury and Westland (initially called West Canterbury) was proposed unanimously by the bishops assembled at the 1885 Council of Sydney. A majority vote also recommended that its bishop be an Irish diocesan, but Pope Leo XIII, advised by Propaganda, made a very unpopular decision when he appointed an English Marist, John Grimes, as first bishop of the new diocese. Grimes arrived in Christchurch in 1888. If his nationality did not enthrall his largely Irish flock it suited the civic mood. Canterbury was founded in 1850 with the first of a measured flow of English migrants who were to develop a structured pastoral and agricultural farming society modelled on England's, with the Anglican Church providing cohesion. Catholics were comparatively few and scattered till the national drive for immigrants in the 1870s broadened the criteria for selecting assisted settlers.

On the far side of the Southern Alps lay rugged Westland, the other half of the diocese, practically uninhabited. In 1865 the discovery of gold brought an invasion that in three years reached over 30,000. Roughly a quarter of these mostly temporary settlers were Catholic; for the majority, their loyalties lay with Victoria (Australia) which was more accessible across the Tasman Sea than was Christchurch over the wild mountain passes or by coastal shipping. These early years are reflected in Wellington archives, but there is enough in Christchurch archives to show that it took several generations for these disparate halves to grow into unity as a diocese.

Redwood's earlier allocation of permanent Marist territory remained unchanged, and became a source of friction. The Catholic population did not grow as quickly as Wellington's to absorb incoming diocesan clergy who complained that Marists were preventing them from normal advancement in the diocese. They reacted to the situation as if it were an extension of English political discrimination against the Irish. The problem simmered for eighty years, erupting to boiling point at regular intervals. Enough paper remains to piece together a reasonably coherent account of the problem. As an aside, this archive (like Wellington's) contain letters from a surprising number of priests seeking employment in the diocese, giving evidence of an unsuspected number of peripatetic priests moving round the English-speaking world.

The archive contains about forty boxes, plus a miscellaneous collection of photos from diocesan occasions, along with some memorabilia from several bishops. The boxes are labelled after bishops, parishes and religious congregations, with the content of each box being arranged chronologically but, as yet, without an inventory. Their content is mixed and uneven. A lot of letters to Grimes remain, annotated in the top margin with the date he answered them, but he rarely kept copies of his replies. His successor, diocesan Matthew Brodie, left practically no correspondence after an episcopate of twenty-seven years.

Occasionally a searcher finds gold. For example, a notebook Registre des actes de baptême, de mariage, et de sépulture la mission de l'Océanie occidentale établie à Akaroa (Nouvelle Zelande). It is a relic of the abortive French attempt to colonize the South Island. Despite its French title the entries were in Latin in tiny script and included confirmations. The first entry by a resident priest is dated 9 September 1840, the last 9 November 1842 when the mission foundered; later entries record the bishop and priests occasionally visiting from the north till 1860 when a priest was based at Christchurch. Another rich lode is the file of letters to Grimes from five successive Marist Provincials, the second of whom had been his mentor and close friend during the bishop's student days in Ireland; they reveal very vividly the growing pains of evolution from a fluid missionary situation, where a religious congregation has charge, to a stable local-church centred around a bishop and his diocesan clergy.

5. In 1980 two more diocese were created in the centre of the North Island: Hamilton diocese was created from the southern part of Auckland territory; Palmerston North diocese was created from the northern part of Wellington territory. Each has begun its own archives, but material prior to 1980 has been left with the parent diocese.

B. ARCHIVES OF RELIGIOUS CONGREGATIONS

Various religious congregations have been invited to New Zealand at different times to meet needs as they arose. Most have grown with local vocations to the status of Province, and so have developed their own archives of correspondence, contracts, council meetings, etc. Many have been engaged in teaching, and this apostolate generates its own records of pupils and their progress, year books, publications celebrating various jubilee milestones, etc. By and large, women religious have been better than men in faithfully keeping the house journals recommended in the constitutions of most religious. Vatican II's insistence that religious look to their origins as a basis of renewal has been an added incentive to care of archives; in this context the lives of pioneers who brought from overseas the spirit of an Institute have a special relevance. There is a sizeable body of well organized Catholic archival material scattered around New Zealand, each unit limited in scope to the interests and apostolate of the Institute, but taken together forming a sizeable complement to diocesan archives. It is just a selection from these that is listed below.

1. The Society of Mary (SM) holds the most significant of these archives as it has been longest on the New Zealand scene; its archive is attached to the residence of the Provincial in Wellington. There is little autograph material from the first thirty years of Marist endeavour in New Zealand. The lives of Marist priests and brothers were mostly too fluid to expect much to be saved. Moreover, under the then rules for a mission territory, ownership of all property had to be vested in the Vicar Apostolic so what has been salvaged tends to be in diocesan archives. However from the beginning of the mission in 1838 there was a steady flow of letters and reports back to Europe, and it is there that facts must be sought. A New Zealand section is part of the Oceania material referred to in Catholic Archives No.8 1988 (pp 15-16) in Fr Tony Ward's article 'The General Archives of the Marist Fathers'. The Turnbull Library, an independent unit within the New Zealand National Library complex, holds twelve microfilm reels of papers relating to New Zealand between 1838 and 1870. selected from these Marist holdings in Rome.

In the mid-1870s, Redwood made a beginning in distinguishing between Marist and Diocese, and the archive reflects this. With the establishment in 1889 of the New Zealand Province of the Society of Mary, Provincials kept their letters and paper work fairly methodically. Within a year a scholasticate had been founded, to be followed in due course by a novitiate, and the usual records were kept by these formation houses. In spite of several shifts over the years, and cramped quarters, the accumulated record of a hundred years of Marist work as a Province has survived reasonably intact. In 1991 a new Provincial House brought with it more adequate archival working and storage space. The transfer brought to light some forgotten account books from the late 1840s in Auckland, from Viard's Wellington and from the decade of Marist activity in Otago and Southland during the 1860s; they added considerable detail to previous knowledge of these sectors.

Through the 1950s and 1960s several semi-retired priests in turn had worked on putting some order into the archive, but the project was tackled seriously in 1968 with the appointment of Fr Vincent Burke as part-time archivist. As any original order had long since been lost, he settled on about twenty basic categories of subject matter, and within these built up files arranged chronologically. Within each file each page was numbered, and listed in an inventory. As well as the collected inventories providing a detailed table of contents, a card index of persons and places provided a finding aid to this system by listing references to page numbers of various files. Sensitive personal papers were removed to supplementary confidential files with restricted access, with a note left in the main file to indicate where the missing pages were stored. The then current-state-of-the-art method was used — binding blocks of papers together in Pre-V-Dex punched-hole files. This practice ensured nothing would be lost, but did not allow for the advent of plain paper photocopiers, so most of these files have since been dismantled with the papers now being kept loose in filing boxes.

Before his death in 1977 Burke had taken the archive to 1970. More recently, after some discussion it was decided that his system was not going to meld easily with more modern archival methods. It has been left as an independent unit and a new approach has been adopted based on an accession record from 1971 onwards. For the past six years there has been a full-time archivist.

2. Irish Sisters of Mercy (RSM). Their history is a very tangled skein as in the beginning Mercy foundations depended on the community from which a founding group stemmed. The first band (from Carlow) arrived in Auckland in 1850 with Bishop Pompallier returning from his ad limina. Further groups came later from Ireland to make a beginning in other parts of the country as the Church developed. Some communities came from Australia, some were offshoots from houses in New Zealand. By the 1940s with encouragement of the New Zealand bishops, the sisters were organized into four diocesan congregations. In the 1970s a loose federation was formed, but each Mercy diocesan centre has retained its own archive, the origin of each community carefully traced and records of personnel in teaching and nursing apostolates. One address will provide a lead to the other Mercy archives:

3. Congregation of Our Lady of the Missions (RNDM) French Sisters came to Christchurch in 1865 and Napier in 1868 in the wake of the Marist Fathers, their first foundations outside France. As teachers they flourished in New Zealand. By the 1880s they had begun their own novitiate for local vocations, and grew into two Provinces which merged in 1982. With the merger two separate archives were dovetailed, and the unit now provides coverage of their work in many parts of New Zealand. Various convent log books and scrap books can be mines of information about local church events.

4. Marist Brothers of the Schools (FMS): The French Brothers who accompanied the Marist Fathers to early New Zealand were trainees of Marcellin Champagnat. At that early stage his Institute of teaching brothers had not yet been approved by Rome, so those pioneer catechist brothers came to New Zealand attached to the Society of Mary. It was not till 1875 that the first group of brothers arrived in Wellington as members of a distinct congregation. At first they were attached to the Australian Province, but grew to independence in 1917. They hold well organized records of their schools and personnel from this time onwards, and have filled the gaps of earlier years with copies of records kept in Australia and France. For their own use the Brothers have printed a necrology containing a potted biography of all their confreres who have worked in New Zealand.

Address: The Archivist, Marist Brothers Province Centre, 52 Onslow Avenue, Auckland 3.

5. Sisters of St Joseph (RSJ) were founded in South Australia in 1866 by Mary McKillop, known in religion as Mother Mary of the Cross. In the early years of her life and work she was encouraged and guided by Fr Julian Woods who is acknowledged as co-founder. The introduction of her Cause for Beatification in 1973 has given added impetus to concern for Josephite archives in New Zealand as well as in Australia. Because some bishops in Australia in the 1880s would not accept these sisters as a congregation of pontifical right, they developed in two parallel streams, and in this way crossed the Tasman Sea.

a) The Sisters of St Joseph of the Sacred Heart of pontifical right. Known colloquially from their habit as Brown Josephites, arrived in Temuka in South Canterbury in 1883 when it was still part of Wellington diocese. They grew to over thirty communities throughout the country. Records of their century and more in the teaching apostolate are held at their Provinciate.

Address: The Archivist, Josephite Sisters' Provincial House, 25 Holgate Road, Kohimaramara, Auckland 5.

b) The Sisters of St Joseph of Nazareth of diocesan right and dubbed Black Josephites, came to Wanganui in Wellington diocese in 1880 from Bathurst diocese in New South Wales. They established their own novitiate, were blessed with local vocations, and staffed primary schools within the diocese. In the 1970s a loose federation was established with the four Australian dioceses where these sisters became established.

Address: The Archivist, Mount St Joseph, P O Box 777, Wanganui.

6. The Daughters of Our Lady of Compassion (DOLC) grew from an unsuccessful attempt to transplant the Third Order Regular of Mary from France to an isolated Maori mission station in 1883. When the parent house in France was reluctant to accept into the family this unattractive sibling as it grew, in 1892 Bishop Redwood established it as a diocesan congregation. It won recognition as a congregation of pontifical right in 1917, New Zealand's only home-grown institute. The hope of promoting the Cause of their remarkable foundress, Suzanne Aubert (known in religion as Mother Mary Joseph), has resulted in a well-appointed archive room that documents her life and her Sisters' apostolates in a variety of fields over 100 years. Their centennial celebration in 1992 was featured nationally because Aubert, who arrived in Auckland in 1860 aged 25, has come to be recognized as one of the country's outstanding pioneer women.

In 1990 Canadian Professor Donald Akenson published Half the World from Home — Perspectives on the Irish in New Zealand 1860-1950. It was the fruit of a two-year stint as Stout Research Fellow at Victoria University of Wellington. In the concluding chapter Jobs Undone, he commented on the gaps in New Zealand ethnic studies. 'And that is where the Irish Catholics are so helpful. Decade after decade, they have simply refused to go away, and thus they force social historians to remember that ethnicity has been an enduring fact in New Zealand society, from the mid-nineteenth century to the present.' For all their imperfections, New Zealand Catholic archives have much to offer scholars. Not just for a comprehensive history of the Church which still remains to be written, but in the wider fields of social history.

MAYNOOTH COLLEGE ARCHIVES

Mgr Patrick J. Corish

St Patrick's, College, Maynooth, will celebrate its bicentenary in 1995. It was perhaps inevitable that as the date approached plans should be made to mark the occasion by writing a history of the institution, and this in turn raised the question of its archives. In 1988 I retired from the professorship of Modern History and found myself in the dual role of historian and archivist of the College.

This was just about the time that the computer was beginning to dominate the keeping of records, with the result that the college material tended to divide into 'pre-computer' and 'post-computer'. Much of the 'pre-computer' material was in some disarray. Fortunately, a good deal of the more historically valuable items were in the form of bound volumes. The minute books of the episcopal Trustees and of various domestic bodies had been in the custody of successive Presidents and with one exception all were successfully located. The Bursar's Office held long rows of account books going back to the very beginnings. Correspondence and other loose papers, ranging from being in good order to being in pretty bad order, were almost exclusively in the hands of the President. All these form the material for the new Archive.

An archive storage room was constructed, protected by thick old construction walls and an inert gas system. It was comparatively simple to classify and shelve the bound volumes, about 300 in all, 180 coming from the Bursar and 120 from the President. Correspondence and loose papers needed more attention. Effectively, they begin in 1845 with the presidency of Laurence Renehan, the first to live — and die — in what have since been the President's apartments. Before him nothing has survived except scattered scraps. The obvious way to classify the material seemed to be under presidencies, with topics covering several — the building of the College, for example — being put into a separate series. Relevant material in other archives has been accessioned in copy form — from Propaganda Fide in Rome and from the Irish dioceses, especially Dublin, where the solicitude of two archbishops, Thomas Troy (1786-1823) and Daniel Murray (1823-52) provide rich material at a time when the Maynooth archives themselves are so poor. The classified material has been stored in acid-free folders, placed in about 120 low acid boxes. While cataloguing is of its nature unending, at its best every document is listed, and at its worse every folder is listed with a brief description of its contents. The catalogue is on computer-disc for ease of addition and correction, and for convenience the current print out is in the Archives in a series of ring-binders.

Quite a lot of the President's records are concerned with individual students. The information they contain is overwhelmingly routine — nominations, documents concerned with promotion to orders, etc. The Matriculation Register, dating from the beginning, was lost in a fire in 1940 most unfortunately, as it gave parents' names and home addresses. Since 1863/64 the routine matter is to be found in the annual printed Kalendarium. Before that, details of individual students must be found in two large volumes entitled 'Ordinations and Prize Lists', on the whole faithfully compiled, though there are gaps. A modern printed guide provides a starting-point for search for individual students: Patrick J. Hamell, Maynooth Students and Ordinations 1795-1895 (1982) and 1895-1984 (1984).

Overall, Maynooth Archives are highly domestic, for nearly all the period an almost disappointingly routine and uneventful chronicle of a seminary. The personal nature of some of it dictates a fairly long closed period. The archive is open up to and including the presidency of Mgr James McCaffrey, who died on 1 November 1935.

The hope is that Maynooth may become a general repository for Irish ecclesiastical material. So far, apart from a few very minor accessions, there is the significant collection of papers which came from the Irish College in Salamanca. Founded in 1592, it was closed at the outbreak of the Spanish Civil War in 1936, and did not re-open. In the early 1950s the decision was taken to close it permanently, and its archives were given to the Irish Episcopal Conference and returned to Ireland, where they were deposited in Maynooth. The extensive collection was stored first in the library, and then in a Muniment Room constructed in the 1880s to a standard guaranteeing very good storage conditions indeed.

The greater part of the collection is made up of the archives of the Salamanca college, but it also contains what is left of the archives of the smaller Irish colleges in Spain, the last of which was closed after the Suppression of the Jesuits in 1767. In 1874 William McDonald, then Rector of Salamanca, had the non-current material classified, listed, and tied up into bundles or legajos. The listing was not done in great detail for the most part, but it at least provides a starting point. Some material was overlooked, some was subsequently lost, and the archival order has been in many places disturbed by researchers both before and after the documents came to Maynooth.

By a fortunate coincidence, the best catalogue exists for the material most informative and most in need of skilled conservation, namely the rectors' correspondence from the beginning to the earlier nineteenth century, though material from before about 1660 is very scanty. In 1874 this was arranged and catalogued alphabetically under the names of correspondents. In 1986 the President of Maynooth, Mgr Ledwith, put together a fund to provide for the employment of a manuscript conservator. This necessarily tedious work has been completed: it should be noted that these letters are held in the Russell Library and not the Archives.

When a few years ago it was decided to establish an Archive it was also decided that it would house the rest of the Salamanca Papers. They have been taken from their crumbling and highly-acidic legajos and put into acid-free folders and low-acid boxes, over 80 in all. In the matter of listing, there are only slight advances on the work done in 1874, but the list then made has been checked against the actual holdings, losses noted, and an attempt made to restore material disturbed by researchers to its previous place, though the 1874 catalogue is so imperfect that often this cannot be done with any certainty: however, it is normally possible to locate a document and at least produce the folder containing it. Little has been done as yet to catalogue the material accessioned since 1874 except to collect the documentation for each rectorship into a separate series of boxes. What is overall little better than a general handlist is held on computer disc, with the current print out in the Archives for convenience.

The Archives may be consulted from 9.30 a.m. to 1 p.m. Monday to Friday. Application should be made in advance to the Archivist, St Patrick's College, Maynooth, Co.Kildare, Ireland.

GALWAY DIOCESAN ARCHIVES

Jan Power

In late 1989 a decision was taken in the diocese of Galway, Kilmacduagh and Kilfenora to employ an archivist to establish a diocesan archives. Until this time there had been no formal archives for the diocese. It was felt necessary to establish one because it was proving difficult to retrieve documents when necessary, there was no complete record of what material existed, there were no adequate research facilities for readers, and the archives which were scattered throughout various locations were occupying valuable office space. It was also recognized that the archives of the diocese were of considerable value and that proper steps should be taken to preserve them.

Some work had been carried out on the archives before this time. Dr Michael Browne, bishop of the diocese from 1937 to 1976, had been a keen historian and scholar and had a very strong sense of the importance of preserving archives for posterity. Some work had been carried out on the records during this period. However, by the time Dr Browne retired most of the records which had accrued in the diocesan office consisted of material created by himself and by his own administration. Obviously something had to be done about this large quantity of records.

In August 1989 I began working on the archives. A huge task awaited me. Records were scattered throughout various locations in the office and also in the bishop's house in Taylor's Hill. My first task was to gather all the records together in one location so that I could work on them. I found records in various locations including a safe in the basement, the diocesan library (also in the basement), cupboards in several offices, store rooms, a locked metal cabinet known as the 'archives cupboard' and in the bishop's house in Taylor's Hill, where the diocesan office had been located before being moved to the new cathedral in 1965.

Having accumulated the records in one location (an office within the diocesan office), I then set about doing a preliminary sort. I found that within the diocese records tended to relate to the central figure in the administration at any one time. In Galway this would be either the bishop or the warden. Before 1831 the area of Galway city and its environs had a unique administrative system; the area was administered by a warden who was a priest elected by the famous Tribes of Galway. (The areas of Kilmacduagh and Kilfenora constituted a separate diocese and were administered separately). After 1831 the diocese of Kilmacduagh and Kilfenora was joined to Galway and thereafter the whole area was administered by one bishop. Thus the records seemed to fall into natural and distinct collections centred around either the relevant warden or bishop.

However, the greatest bulk of the material belonged to the episcopate of Dr Michael Browne (1937-76). This collection comprised material relating to all aspects of the administration of the diocese. These included records relating to education and social affairs, the religious congregations within the diocese, the priests of the diocese, the administration of various charitable organizations, other diocesan organizations, synods, diocesan financial and legal business, and many other matters. There were also pastoral letters, manuscript sermons and addresses composed by Browne, photographs and press cuttings. Also present were special collections relating to specific projects of Browne's such as the building of the new cathedral in Galway or the Vocational Organization Committee (of which Browne was chairman).

I found that the administration of the parishes created a distinct collection of material which seemed separate in many ways. While other aspects of the administration showed a clear break when there was a change of bishop I found that the administration of the parishes seemed to continue uninterrupted. Because of this I kept the parish records apart from the Michael Browne collection even though the dates coincide approximately. These records were not usually records created and kept in the parish such as registers of births, marriages and deaths (which were normally still kept in the parish, if anywhere), but rather files of correspondence between the bishop or diocesan secretary and the parish priest. This correspondence would concern school buildings, the appointment of teachers, church buildings, parish finances and property, the bishop's visitations and any other business relating to the parish.

I decided to begin working on the Michael Browne collection and the parish records first since these were the largest single collections. In format this material consisted of several hundred files which were not arranged in any systematic way. I began the lengthy task of listing each item individually and then arranging the collection in logical order (see appendix).

While processing the collection decisions had to be made about the eventual housing of the archives. The building made available to us for the archives was a disused coach-house in the grounds of the bishop's house, Mount St. Mary's in Taylor's Hill which is about ten minutes from the cathedral and the city centre. The building was in a bad state of repair and needed much work; only the exterior walls of the original structure were retained. Space within the building was maximized by building a completely new roof structure and removing internal walls which allowed for the insertion of a first floor over approximately half of the length of the building. A kitchenette and toilet were added to the rear of the building.

Obviously archives have special storage requirements and this influenced the design of the building to some extent. We attempted to control light, temperature and relative humidity in various ways. Since we were working within the constraints of a limited budget however, some compromises were necessary. Heating is provided by storage heaters which are regulated by a thermostat which triggers an alarm if the temperature fluctuates too much within a certain range. The building is ventilated by an extractor fan which circulates the air within the building twice in twenty-four hours and natural light is excluded by means of special shutters on the windows which are to be kept closed at all times. As a safeguard against the dangers of fire, smoke alarms were also installed. For its overall design the building won the Western Region Award of the Royal Institute of Architects in Ireland in 1989 for the best restored building in its class.

Internally, the building was fitted with fixed metal shelving throughout. It was originally intended to instal mobile shelving in order to provide surplus storage space for the future needs of the diocese but, again, budgetary restraints prevented this. Fortunately, when all of the material transferred was boxed and shelved we found that we were left with some surplus space anyway.

When work on the building was completed we began moving all of the records from the cathedral where they had been worked on to the new archives building. By the end of my time in Galway the Michael Browne collection had been listed completely. Box lists were drawn up for the remaining material and it too had been safely housed in the archives.

More work remains to be done in the Galway diocesan archives in the future. But for the moment at least the records have been safely housed and some finding aids have been created. The diocese of Galway remains an excellent example to other dioceses in Ireland. It is hoped that many will follow suit.

JOHN HARDMAN & CO., STAINED GLASS MANUFACTURERS AND ECCLESIASTICAL METAL WORKERS OF BIRMINGHAM

Philippa Bassett

BRIEF HISTORY OF THE FIRM AND FAMILY

The establishment of the firm dates from as early as 1838 when John Hardman(1811-67) formerly a partner in the family button business, set up a new business in partnership with Augustus Welby Pugin, the architect and artist, to produce metal work in medieval style for the growing number of new buildings of the Gothic revival. In 1845, Hardman extended his business activities to include the manufacture of stained glass, which was both difficult to obtain and of inconsistent quality. He was encouraged by Pugin in this highly successful venture and the firm enjoyed a virtual monopoly. Pugin was responsible for most of the early designs, and the metal work and stained glass which he designed for the new Palace of Westminster were made by the Birmingham firm.

On the death of Hardman in 1867 his son, John Bernard Hardman (1843-1903), became a partner in the business which, by that date, had removed from premises in Great Charles Street to Newhall Street. In 1883, a separate manufactory for the metalwork business was also set up in King Edwards Road, carried on under the name of Hardman, Powell & Co.

The family, which apparently originated from Lancashire in the mid-eighteenth century, was staunchly Roman Catholic. John Hardman the elder founded a choir in St Chad's Roman Catholic Cathedral in Birmingham, was for many years the choir master, and was at length buried in the crypt. His sister, Juliana (1813-84) became superior of the convent of Our Lady of Mercy at Handsworth (1841-76), which was founded by her father. The younger John Hardman regularly attended services at St Chad's Cathedral and was made a knight of St Gregory the Great in 1901 by the Pope in recognition of his work for the Roman Catholic community. He was also an important public figure in Birmingham, serving as a Conservative member of the Council in 1879-95 and as member, then chairman, of the Board of Management of the General Hospital.

The business of John Hardman Studios, as it is now known, still exists but specializes exclusively in glass work. Its premises in Newhall Street were badly damaged by fire in 1971, and the firm has since then relocated to a late eighteenth century house, Lightwoods House, in Smethwick, near Birmingham.

THE ARCHIVE

Business records of the firm for the period c1840-1920 were purchased by the then Libraries Department of Birmingham City Council in 1971 in the aftermath of the fire. They constitute an enormous and complex archive which comprises nearly 100 linear metres of occupied shelving. The catalogue of the collection remains very inadequate, but during 1992 considerable work was done on the records and it is hoped to produce a more detailed handlist in the near future. At this stage in the work on the archive, however, it is impossible to do more than provide an overall indication of its scope and content.

The major classes of records can be summarized as follows: ledgers, day books, order books, outgoing correspondence, incoming letters, invoices and receipts, and cost sheets. This list reveals nothing, however, of the complexity of the archive or the inconsistencies of the firm's record keeping. There are, for example, separate sequences of most classes of records for metal, glass, brass and decoration work (ie painting). Other sequences exist for the London office in King William Street, Strand (known as London House); and the archive also includes records of Hardman, Powell & Co. Moreover, although the date range of the archive falls largely within the period 1838-1912, there are gaps in some sequences, other sequences overlap, and the runs of the same type of records for glass, metal and brass have different date spans. For example, the firm's day books comprise metal sales day books for 1838-49, 1854-75, 1881-1904 and 1908-10; glass sales rough day books for 1863-1914; glass sales day books for 1883-95 and 1899-1912; and the decoration day books for 1845-50 and 1892-1920 (although entries relating to decoration for 1882-92 can be found in the glass day books). A further problem with the archive is one of conservation: two additional metal sales day books, for instance, are too badly damaged to open and date.

The collection is difficult to use. As already stated, the present handlist to the records is very deficient, being merely a summary list compiled on their receipt in 1971. The catalogue entry for the incoming letters, for example, merely records the existence of 69 wooden boxes (now reboxed in 174 archival storage boxes) of glass and metal letters from clients, etc. for 1841-1907. The contents of these boxes are stored in chronological order and within each year the letters are bundled alphabetically in one, two or three sequences. For some years there are separate runs of letters from clients and of letters for glass and for metal, the subject matter of which overlaps considerably; for other periods, there is simply a single sequence of client correspondence. These chronologically sorted boxes also contain separate sequences of letters, memoranda and accounts from the London House, annual bundles of invoices and receipts, cost sheets, work sheets, registers of letters received and despatched and other miscellaneous items. Other boxes also contain separate bundles of correspondence with certain individuals or relating to specific projects. For example, letters from Thomas Quarme, an architect working on the New Palace, Lambeth (1848-49 and 1855-56), from A.W. Pugin (1841-52), and from Charles Barry (1846-60), and letters from the Dublin and London agents in the 1850s, are not in the main sequences of correspondence; and separate bundles exist in the chronological boxes for letters from convents (1872-1906) and for such projects as windows for Rugby School and Sydney Cathedral, Australia (1861). The bulk of the incoming correspondence is from clients relating to commissions, proposals for or advice on designs (sometimes with sketches), acknowledgement of receipt of goods, amendments to orders, complaints, payments, etc. Other correspondence includes letters from manufacturers relating to the supply of raw materials.

Research access to the archive is made possible by use of the firm's own working indexes. There are, for example, three volumes of indexes of different formats to stained glass windows manufactured for British clients (1853-99) and one for overseas orders (1882-1937) and the monumental brasses are indexed for the period 1843-1940. Many of the day and order books also include their own name and place indexes. Once the order for a window or piece of metalwork has been dated, and the name of the customer ascertained, it is then possible to use the bundles of correspondence effectively.

Many of the people who have used the archive are architectural or local historians who do so to research a particular commission, for many churches throughout the country, both Roman Catholic and Anglican, have some piece of Hardman's work such as window, lectern, memorial brass or altar vessels.

The day books, for example, record details of each order and its costings. The glass rough day book for 1867 details an order by Miss Cookson for St. Mary's Catholic Church, Warwick Bridge, Carlisle, of a window of two lights and tracery. The subject matter of the window was The Salutation and The Holy Family. The total cost of the window, iron bars, packing, carriage (by Pickford & Co.), and a man's time and expenses in fixing the window, came to £56.2s. 3d. A page in the metalwork day book dated March and April 1860 records the following orders: a silver gilt chalice and paten costing £21 for the Bishop of Clifton; a silver incense boat and spoon, "the boat of sexfoil shape, richly engraved, the spoon with pierced and engraved handle", at a cost of £10 for St. Gregory's College, Downside, a gong for a Mrs Green of Leeds; a pair of glass cruets and stand for Rev. H.E. Moore of Coventry; and a brass altar cross, 3'6" high, for Lancing College, Sussex costing £7.10s.

The order books, in addition to the details of the order (largely duplicating the entries in the day books), give information about payments and delivery, and detail special instructions relating, for example, to inscriptions and the use of colour in stained glass. The glass order book for 1883 records a commission for the Catholic Church at Coniston, Ambleside, of two windows on the Gospel side of the Sanctuary of one light each "to be very strong to stand gales". The monumental brass order books are also very detailed and the war memorials erected after the Boer War are of particular interest. In January 1904, for example, the Anglican Cathedral of Pietermaritzburg, Natal, ordered a tablet in brass for the wall "let into a Belgian granite slab" as a memorial for the Natal Carbineers who fell in the Boer War, the design to be of an "Officer and Private in karki' [sic] costume under a canopy". The inscription to be included is recorded together with all the names of officers, non-commissioned officers and troopers who fell.

Clients were not always satisfied. The glass order book for June 1878, for instance, records alterations to be made to a window of three lights in the Chapel of Our Lady of Dolours in the Convent of St Leonards on Sea: "Figure of Our Lady ungraceful - too much brown and white and too tall and masculine". There are also numerous letters from clients concerning delays in the supply of orders. However, despite such complaints, the firm developed a reputation, both at home and abroad, for work of exceptional quality. The archive itself has also acquired an international reputation, attracting enquiries from around the world. As a remarkably complete record of an important Birmingham firm it is of major historical significance.

The surviving artwork relating to the firm's activities, hitherto not mentioned, is all held by the Fine Art Department of the City's Museum and Art Gallery. This material includes several thousand window designs and full-size glass cartoons and metalwork tracing books and sketches, and complements the administrative and financial records of the firm. Enquiries regarding the artwork should be made directly to the Museum; enquiries about the business archives should be addressed to the Archives Division, Birmingham Central Library, Chamberlain Square, Birmingham, B3 3HQ.

LETTER FROM THOMAS SING CONCERNING A DELAY TO A GLASS ORDER AND WORK ON CANDLESTICKS FOR ST MARIE'S CATHOLIC CHURCH, DERBY, 1855.

St Marie's was designed by A.W. Pugin, 1837-1839, and was said by Cardinal Wiseman to mark 'the real transition from chapel to church architecture among us'.

CHURCH ARCHITECTURE AS A PRIMARY DOCUMENT FOR NINETEENTH CENTURY CATHOLIC HISTORY

R McD O'Donnell

The following is a synopsis of a talk, illustrated by slides, given extempore by Dr Rory O'Donnell at the 1991 annual conference of the Society. It has been contributed by Mr Edwin King from notes which he made at the time and is published with Dr O'Donnell's permission.

The aim of the talk was to demonstrate the perhaps unfamiliar concept that churches can be read — not merely taking questions of style and fashion into consideration, but regarding them as artefacts which show how they were used and conceived at the time. Perhaps the most important element of this was the person of a patron, and all that this means concerning finance and aims of church-building. The 1791 Relief Act allowed churches, as opposed to private chapels, to be built, but these do not resemble our usual conception of what a church looks like and are often little regarded (earlier in the day we had heard from Fr Isherwood how the first church built in the Channel Islands had been destroyed without anyone being aware of its nature). This was for several reasons — not the least being the still prevalent feeling that it was best not to attract too much attention — and the examples which we were shown were mainly in the vernacular context (that is, within the tradition of contemporary buildings), with some modification, such as Gothic windows or a Classical portice. These buildings were generally financed locally and built by local firms with little or no experience of an ecclesiastical tradition.

This state of affairs was radically altered by the arrival on the scene of Augustus Welby Pugin (born in 1812, a convert to Catholicism in the 1830's) and his patron, the sixteenth Earl of Shrewsbury. Pugin, a harsh critic of the contemporary state of things, set out to build in his own conceived ecclesiastical style and to convert the rest of the world to a neo-Medievalism. It is with this highly artificial style that analysis can begin. Pugin's designs abound in iconography and demonstrate a great deal about his conception of the liturgy, as was shown by a series of slides of a Blessed Sacrament chapel showing Eucharistic symbolism with the use of cherubim, the vine, the chalice and the host and the Agnus Dei throughout the altar decoration, the wall-tiles and on the floor. Such non-medieval symbols as the Sacred Heart were avoided, and we were shown that at St George's, Southwark, the confessionals were squeezed in between the buttresses, as contrasted to St Francis Xavier's, Liverpool, where they were major feature of the church, complete with fireplaces! Pugin came into conflict with the 'Italianate' devotions which were associated with the Newmanite converts of the 1840's. Stories about Pugin's rood screens are well known but what was demonstrated here was how, with the resulting glimpsed Mass, they were an antithesis of practices, such as the Forty Hours Devotion, introduced by Wiseman in 1848, which demanded a full view by and participation of the congregation.

To some extent, the meeting of these two paths came in the work of Edward Pugin, who took over the business on his father's death in 1852 until his own early death aged 42. This hand-over stressed the dynastic nature of the nineteenth century architect's profession (as it did the Hadfield dynasty). Architects were taken very seriously and as having the last word in any decision (woe to anyone who argued with A.W. Pugin!) — a long way had gone since the 'church by committee' we had seen earlier. Architects formed a working association with a firm of builders, perhaps best exemplified by that between Pugin and Myers, or his window-designer, Hardman (whose archives survive in Birmingham Library and Art Gallery). The importance of such highly trained craftsmen was shown in a slide of the 'Glasspainters Window' in St Chad's Cathedral, Birmingham, which shows four named workmen in various stages of the glass manufacturing process. Similarly, for the high altar at St Giles', Cheadle, an alabaster quarry was found and re-opened, and craftsmen trained for the work.

At the other end of the chain of manufacture lay the patrons, who belie the idea of the Catholic Revival as a clerical movement. Dr O'Donnell believes that the role of the Catholic country house, such as Alton Towers, as a sort of 'week-end university' has been under-estimated, allowing as it did a gathering of the intelligentsia and exchange of ideas. Certainly, it had an impact on the nature of a purely Catholic architecture. These patrons were champions of the new Gothic, which above everything else was 'stylish', and it was they — able to ignore the relative cheapness and utility of the Classical style, current among what Bossy has called the 'congregational churches' of the North — who carried it through to dominance.

The need to accommodate the liturgy and produce cheaper projects than his father's led to the style of the school that followed Edward Pugin — what Dr O'Donnell called 'Second Generation Catholic High Victorians'. This style was illustrated by Our Lady of Salette, Liverpool, and was described as being 'work-a-day' and 'pack-em-in', with a well-lit altar of which there was a good view from the wide aisles for the Exposition of the Blessed Sacrament. Stokes, architect of St Clare's, Sefton Park, approached these needs from another perspective, coming from the Anglican Gothic revival.

However, Dr O'Donnell pointed out that churches were not the only buildings built by Catholics and, indeed, not necessarily the best use of money. The need for training for the clergy was answered by the building of many diocesan seminaries; and Manning's reluctance to build a Cathedral while there was a shortage of Catholic schools and the danger of leakage, is well known. Old school buildings are to be found behind almost every church. Building by the religious orders, whose financial stability and high manpower was attractive to many bishops, was represented by St Francis of Assisi, Gorton, now sadly sold for re-development.

What was the relevance of all this to the archivist or church historian? Dr O'Donnell believes that with architecture we can chart the oft-mentioned path from chapel to church. The highly significant sociological evidence to be gained from the hierarchical structure of a place such as the Sardinian Chapel (which had two rows of altar rails, one for the rich and the other for the poor) is now only available in the form of old engravings. Designs were often well circulated in the form of hand-bills or appeals sold at one shilling, in directories or as part of A.W. Pugin's propaganda, even if they were not actually put into effect. The changes made between drawing board and topping-out can tell us a great deal about the financial situation of a parish or, in some cases, of disputes between architect and patron. The buildings did not stand in a vacuum, but were part of a complete system (illustrated by Pugin's vestments and the font shown at the 1851 Great Exhibition and presented by him to his parish in Ramsgate); such an over-view is now being lost. Dr O'Donnell ended his talk by stressing the need to record a part of our Catholic heritage which will soon be lost — he showed us the disastrous effects of neglect or an over-enthusiastic liturgical re-ordering. The final pinnacle of the nineteenth century architecture was then shown — one wholly distanced from the pattern that had gone before — Westminster Cathedral.

Christine Johnson

Catholic Archives, number 9 (1989) contains a report of developments in the Scottish Catholic Archives from 1984 to 1988. As the new Keeper it is my pleasant duty to outline further progress from 1989 to 1992.

In the past four years the national character of this institution has become, if anything, more prominent. It could have been argued that pre-1878 material, stemming from the old Vicariates, should, of necessity, have been housed in a national repository, since it could not be said to belong to any one of the post-1878 dioceses. Indeed, Columba House was inaugurated to provide just such a repository. However, Mgr David McRoberts, Keeper 1973-78, was firmly of the belief that post-1878 diocesan records should be retained in their own dioceses. Experience has now demonstrated that this is not always the best solution.

Once all the known pre-1878 material had been gathered in to Columba House and catalogued, the next logical step was to survey the records of the various dioceses, to establish what material they had, and how it was handled once it became archival rather than current. The Archdiocese of Glasgow was well served with a professional archivist in its employ. The Archdiocese of St Andrews and Edinburgh, although fairly well off for space, had already voluntarily handed over its archives to Columba House, thus creating a valuable precedent. The former Keeper, Dom Mark Dilworth OSB, now Abbot of Fort Augustus, following up on this precedent, surveyed the archives of several of the dioceses within the Metropolitan of St Andrews & Edinburgh. The survey brought to light the fact that the smaller dioceses often did not have proper facilities for storing archives. Due to lack of space old records were often simply relegated to a cupboard, where they lay, gathering dust, inaccessible, and (sometimes literally) forgotten. The case for urging their deposit in Columba House was very strong.

The Diocese of Galloway was the first to respond to the Keeper's approaches. In 1989 it deposited a large quantity of papers from the Bishop's House, Ayr. Most of it was twentieth century, many of the files dating from the 1950s. The small amount of nineteenth century material consisted mainly of printed pastoral letters, papal encyclicals and circulars. This raised the question of what had happened to the nineteenth century correspondence. Enquiries were made at the former Bishop's House, now the presbytery of St Andrew's, Dumfries, with the thought that archives might have been left behind when the location of the cathedral was transferred to Ayr. They drew a blank. It began to look as if this early material must have perished. Then, three years later, in 1992, it came to light in a cupboard in the Bishop's House, Ayr, lying forgotten, tied up in neat parcels with brown paper and string. It contained material dating from as early as 1797. There could not have been a better demonstration of the benefits of a national repository for diocesan archives.

The stimulus to search out the nineteenth century Galloway material came in part from the deposit, made in 1990, by Dunkeld diocese. This deposit contained a great deal of nineteenth century correspondence, which reinforced the belief that Galloway should have similar material.

The Galloway archives contained no real surprises. They concerned the normal running of the diocese: its administration, its finances, its parishes, its clergy. Dunkeld, however, did prove to have some unexpected treasures. Unexpected, that is, until a logical explanation had been sought and found.

Firstly, there was a significant quantity of Lowland and Eastern Vicariate papers. Some of them probably owed their presence in Dundee to Bishop Carruthers, Vicar Apostolic of the Eastern Vicariate, 1833-52, who spent the last years of his life there. Some of these early papers consist of letters to him, a number being from Bishop Scott. More surprising is the presence of letters from Scott to Rev. (later Bishop) James Gillis. The dates of the Gillis correspondence would allow it to have come to Dundee with Carruthers, but one is left with the question - why? The presence of Rev. John MacCorry and Rev. John MacPherson papers is more readily explained. MacCorry was stationed at Perth, 1846-56; MacPherson was at Perth 1864-69, and Dundee 1869-71. MacPherson must have brought the Perth papers to Dundee.

Also among the Dunkeld papers is a large, mostly pre-1878, deposit which originated in the Western Vicariate. It consists of diaries and papers of Rev. Michael Condon. The archives of Glasgow Archdiocese contain the bulk of the Condon papers, but, for some reason, Rev. John Tonor brought part of the collection with him to Dundee, when he became Bishop of Dunkeld in 1914, including three very early diaries, some account books, correspondence, and a number of pastoral letters. Of particular interest are printed pamphlets, some very rare, relating to the Glasgow Free Press.

A nice outcome of the deposit in Columba House of the Dunkeld archives is that it brings together under one roof both sides of the acrimonious nineteenth century dispute between Dunkeld and St Andrews & Edinburgh on the subject of money. When the dioceses were established in 1878 the financial liabilities of the old Vicariates were apportioned among them. Dunkeld, in the person of Bishop Rigg, felt itself to have been unfairly burdened. The case dragged on for years in spite of the intervention of arbiters.

In 1992 a first approach was made to the Diocese of Argyll and the Isles. It resulted in two large deposits being received at Columba House. The first included financial ledgers, minute books, pastoral letters and a certain amount of correspondence. Of particular value was a complete set of reports to Rome from 1888 to 1972. Also deposited were a number of items relating to Oban Cathedral, including a large quantity of building plans. The gem, however, was a music book used at the seminary of Lismore, from which very few records survive.

The second deposit consisted mainly of the now familiar diocesan administration files. But it did also include some rarities. The Bishop's House in Oban contained a number of volumes which had originally belonged to the Scots Monastery at Ratisbon. Both manuscript and printed, these seventeenth century volumes had been brought to Oban when the monastery closed in the nineteenth century. They are destined for the National Library of Scotland as a deposit of the diocese.

The deposits by Galloway, Dunkeld and Argyll dioceses demonstrate the value of the Scottish Catholic Archives as a national repository. In a small diocese there are no facilities or resources for a proper archive. Old papers are often simply tied up in parcels, whose contents are unlisted. Even when papers are left in their original files, these cannot be made available to historians. A working file has an entirely different raison d'être from an archival bundle. There is not the same need for concern about security and confidentiality since a working file is open only to specific individuals.

By contrast, when these old papers are deposited at Columba House, the files and parcels are scrutinized. Documents are divided into manageable bundles. Each document is given a unique number for security and location purposes. Confidential documents are marked 'closed'. Finally a full catalogue is made. A copy of the catalogue goes to the diocese, which now has, at its fingertips, a guide to its archives, and a means of recalling any specific document should the need arise. The diocese benefits; so do researchers.

Having tackled the older dioceses, where it was likely that nineteenth century material might survive, a logical follow-up was to approach the post-war dioceses, Motherwell and Paisley, both erected in 1947. Although it seemed possible that neither would wish to make use of the facilities offered by Columba House, it made sense to alert them to the possibility. As had been expected, Paisley felt that its records were too recent and too small in quantity to merit their removal from the diocese. In addition the priest in charge of its archives was interested in, and felt able to cope with them. Motherwell, on the other hand, welcomed the opportunity to deposit material in Columba House. Although its diocesan offices were new and purpose-built, it had already been forced to parcel up its older files, and these files were taking up valuable space, besides being unusable in their present state. A car load of papers duly arrived at Columba House and are in the process of being catalogued at this moment.

The co-operation of the different dioceses in depositing their archives in Columba House has marked a new era in its development. No longer can it be regarded simply as the repository for an historic collection; now it is an active archive repository cooperating with the hierarchy in ensuring the smooth transition of papers from working files to archival storage.

Mgr McRoberts might have questioned the wisdom of this new departure; he would, I suspect, have had no qualms about housing the archives of Blairs College. Blairs had opened in 1829 as the national seminary for Scotland. Later relegated to junior seminary status, it continued to teach boys with vocations for the priesthood until it was closed in 1986. Its oldest archives had already been deposited in Columba House. In 1989 some of its basement cupboards were cleared out and their contents brought to Edinburgh.

It was obvious, however, that this was only the tip of the iceberg; that there must be many more documents and papers lying in the now empty building. When there seemed to be some prospect that Blairs might be sold, a trip north became urgent. The entire college building was gone through, room by room, and all material of any archival value collected together. Decisions had to be made as to just what was valuable. Student records were obviously of interest, so, too, were papers concerning the administration of the seminary, and of its estate. Thus, along with applications from boys for admission, went crop records, files on forestry, records of milk yields and salmon catches. In short, all the administrative papers, of whatever sort, were earmarked for Columba House. It could be argued that much was trivial. On the other hand, Blairs was unique, and it seemed fitting that as complete a record of its history as possible be preserved.

It was in the area of education that the problem of selection arose. Blairs contained cupboard after cupboard full of circulars from the Scottish Education Department, forms relating to Scottish Leaving Certificate examinations, and old examination papers. Now every senior secondary school in Scotland would have received the same and copies would also be available in the Department itself. They were in no way unique documentation. On the other hand, they were crucial to the running of Blairs as a school. Ultimately, it was decided to keep samples of the annually repeated circulars, together with one of each of those giving specific information on examination curricula.

Again, teaching material was so extensive that sampling was the only possible course. It lay in heaps everywhere: in cupboards, on the floors, in cardboard boxes. Much of it was in multiple copies. It could not even be systematically sorted before sampling. The only feasible step was to try to take examples from each subject. This was not ideal archival practice. But teaching notes on, say, Macbeth, do not tell the historian anything really new about instruction in a junior seminary. Random samples would, it was felt, give a sufficient indication of what subjects were taught, and of the standard of teaching. As it was, it took three car trips to bring all the selected archives of Blairs College to Columba House in 1991. Now that they are all sorted and catalogued they provide a fascinating picture of the running of a seminary and of a Kincardineshire estate.

In the last month or so it has been announced that the two senior seminaries in Scotland are to amalgamate, with the closure of Gillis College in Edinburgh and the removal of its students to Glasgow. It is to be hoped that the Gillis College archives will eventually join those of Blairs.

Diocesan and seminary deposits are, by their nature, large. They take time to deal with. It is always therefore a welcome change to receive small deposits from parishes or individuals. Such deposits can also provide exciting surprises. Sometimes records are solicited; more often they are volunteered. As Columba House is a national institution its remit covers all areas of Scotland and all forms of deposit. This can be illustrated by citing a few examples.

As a corollary to the Blairs deposit, the present secretary of the Blairs Society was approached. He gladly agreed to deposit his files in Columba House. A totally different deposit was the one received from the secretary of the Scottish Catholic Historical Association, which is responsible for the publication of the Innes Review. Again, the attics of a parish due for closure produced letters written to an emigré seminary student during the Second World War by his parents who were still in Germany. These letters, although not historically important, provide an insight into the life of a war-time "alien". This same parish also produced the papers of several other priests as well as the usual run of account books and notice books.

One parish in the north-east produced a deposit of truly national importance. The parish priest was complaining to a friend that some old ledgers were taking up far too much space in his sacristy. The friend advised depositing them in Columba House. The old ledgers turned out to be the Procurator's accounts for the Scottish Mission, with related documents, from 1701 onwards. They had been moving round Aberdeen Diocese, from procurator to procurator, for almost three hundred years, the parish priest in whose sacristy they had ended up being the current holder of that office. These records complement the financial records received from Buckie some years previously, and are of immense value to researchers.

But it is not only parishes that reveal surprises. An approach was made to Columba House by the sister of a deceased priest. She wondered if it would be interested in accepting her late brother's diaries. As an afterthought she also offered his other papers. The diaries in themselves were a welcome deposit. Their author had been in Rome for many years, first as a student, and, later, as a professor. His diaries describe life in the Scots College from both viewpoints and make fascinating reading. But it was the other papers that were truly surprising. Our priest had researched, and written a book on, the life of Bishop Henry Grey Graham. For this study he had collected, not only all the articles written by Graham, but also his letters written to other priests. Furthermore, he had acquired letters and pamphlets of Rev. John Charleson, a contemporary and friend of Graham. Both Graham and Charleson were Church of Scotland ministers who converted to Catholicism and became priests. This collection of papers reveals much of how their conversions occurred and of the philosophy behind them.

The Scottish Catholic Archives benefits from being a national institution whose remit is unfettered by diocesan boundaries. It is now establishing its value as a national repository for any archival material which would otherwise be, at best, unavailable to researchers, and, at worst, at risk of damage, or even destruction. It is to be hoped that the next four years will see its holdings expand even further as its role becomes more widely known.

NOTE

Dr Christine Johnson succeeded Dom Mark Dilworth OSB as Keeper of Scottish Catholic Archives in May 1991. PAISLEY DIOCESAN ARCHIVES

The Very Rev. Bernard J. Canon Canning, FSA Scot

The Paisley Diocesan Archives came into being in 1982 when Bishop Stephen McGill of Paisley named the present writer the first archivist of the diocese. The archives were planned along suggestions made by Glasgow University. Steel frames were provided in a three-tier system with strong cardboard boxes measuring 15 1/2 ins x 11 ins x 5 ins. Much has to be said for the boxes themselves which give a concise lay-out, are capable for meeting most items, safe against dampness and dust. On the front of the boxes is a well fixed label giving in particularly black ink the details in brief form of the contents.

The lay-out of the archives is divided into several divisions such as (a) diocesan, (b) episcopal (c) parish (d) organisations (e) schools (f) miscellaneous. Then there are references to Papal authority in various ways, dioceses of Scotland and the general life of the Church throughout the world as seen in Scotland.

A box is given to each of the three Bishops of Paisley since its creation in 1947-1948 by Pius XII.¹ Biographical details about each bishop are provided as well as additional boxes on their Ad Clerum letters or Pastoral Addresses to the diocese. The present Ordinary of Paisley, Bishop John Mone, has also provided his 1992 Ad Limina visit to Rome. It was his first such report since assuming control of Paisley in 1988.² It runs into several pages meeting the many questions posed by the Holy See about the diocese of Paisley. Researchers in a hundred years will be grateful for such a report as it covers all aspects of the diocese. It is presented in print, unlike Ad Limina reports to the beginning of the present century which were hand-written and often in deplorable penmanship. It was the American Bishops who first produced type-written reports. They were followed shortly by the Archdiocese of Dublin which gave the report in printed form.³

Each of the thirty five parishes of the diocese of Paisley providing for an estimated Catholic population of 85,500 mainly in Renfrewshire has its own box as laid out in The Catholic Directory for Scotland.⁴ There is a box for each religious congregation existing in the diocese or that is already defunct and gone. Organisations that operate within the diocese each have a box, although some with few papers are boxed with others of similar character. Statistics are valuable as well as helpful. Holy Childhood Society, for example, gives indicative data on the thinking and charity of Catholic schools of past generations.

Because the archives are diocesan, the emphasis is on the actual diocese of Paisley founded in 1947-1948. It is relatively easy to record diocesan matters since 1948 but when data is required for earlier times one is often compelled to consult other archdiocesan or diocesan archives. Some schools have records while others have surrendered them to public bodies.

Although comparatively new as a diocese, Paisley has strong Catholic roots going back to St Mirin, abbot of the seventh century who made a foundation in Paisley itself.⁵ The House of Stewart had its beginnings in Paisley. Such was their devotion to St James the Great, the Apostle, that they gave Scotland six King James, and Paisley adopted devotion to St James as recorded in so many ways in the city to this day such as St James Park, St James Station, St James Street, St James Court, and two churches dedicated to him by the Catholic Church and the Church of Scotland.

The shell of St James is incorporated in the civic arms of Paisley and in the arms of the first Bishop of Paisley, Bishop James Black (1948-1968.)⁶ The present and third Bishop of Paisley, Bishop John Aloysius Mone, appointed 8 March, 1988,⁷ also has the shell of St James in his arms as well as the cinquefoil of the old Scottish see of Abercorn of which he was titular Bishop when Auxiliary of Glasgow on 24 April 1984.⁸

The cinquefoil also recalls the Abercorn family who did great service for the Church in the troublesome times of the Reformation. They are said to have taken care of the burial of St John Ogilvie after he had been hanged at Glasgow Cross on 10 March 1615 rather than deny the supremacy of the Pope in faith and morals.¹⁰ Unfortunately, the actual location of his grave is unknown. Many think he was buried in the grounds of St Mungo's Cathedral, Glasgow, in a common grave for those hanged at nearby Glasgow Cross. There is also the opinion that he was buried by the Abercorns in the collegiate church, Lochwinnoch,, near the residence of the Semples who were true to Catholicism and exercised a certain amount of authority. Mass was said for the first time after the Reformation in the ruins of the collegiate on 3 July 1988 by Bishop John Mone.¹¹

In 1615 Paisley did not yet have a resident minister of the new religion which came into being in 1560. At the Reformation Paisley was designated as a 'nest of Papistry' and it was not until the seventeenth century that it had the first resident minister of the Reformed Church. St John Ogilvie, convert to the faith, Jesuit, and described by Pius XI as a martyr for the Papacy, spent most of his short apostolate in Renfrewshire offering Mass and the sacraments until betrayed by a false friend in Glasgow while offering Mass.

Paisley had the first Catholic church in the West of Scotland including Glasgow after the penal times when St Mirin's was opened in 1808.¹² It served from Paisley to Stranraer. There were considerable difficulties in building the church through bigotry and opposition but the faithful few Catholics succeeded. A vigilante group had to be mounted over the church in its early stages after several attempts had been made to destroy it. It was apt that the later St Mirin's, built in 1932, became the first St Mirin Cathedral in 1948. Paisley burgh has seven parishes with a Catholic population of 16,290, with St Mirin's having 4,500.¹³

DIOCESAN ARMS

There is an interesting file on diocesan and episcopal arms. The Revisionary Act 1978 destroyed for the most part the 1851 Ecclesiastical Titles Act but only partially the 1871 Act, leaving some loose ends still on the Statute Book forbidding Catholic dioceses to be corporate bodies or hold arms. The Catholic Emancipation Act 1829 technically had some penal law infringement against the Catholic community.¹⁴

PAISLEY DIOCESAN ARMS, GRANTED 1989

PROCLAMTION OF PAISLEY DIOCESAN ARMS IN ST MIRIN'S CATHEDRAL BY JOHN G. GEORGE, KINTYRE PURSUIVANT OF ARMS, IN THE PRESENCE OF BISHOP JOHN MOORE, 26 NOVEMBER 1989.

It was discovered comparatively recently that such penal laws applied to England and Ireland but not to Scotland according to the words of legislation. On 15 August 1989, as the archdiocese of St Andrews and Edinburgh marked the 175th anniversary of St Mary's Cathedral parish, Edinburgh, the Kintyre Pursuivant of Arms, Mr John G. George, the first known Catholic to work in the Court of the Lord Lyon, made a proclamation in St Mary's Cathedral, granting the archdiocese its own coat of arms. It was Scotland's first diocesan arms.¹⁵

On the feast of the Kingship of Christ, 26 November 1989, Paisley diocese became the second see in Scotland to have its own arms and the first in the Western Province.¹⁶ It was the first time that the Lord Lyon was officially represented in St Mirin's Cathedral. Mr John G. George as his representative made the proclamation. By coincidence, Mr George is a descendant of Cardinal Paul Cullen, one time Archbishop of Armagh and Primate of All Ireland and the first Cardinal of Ireland in modern times. On 14 December 1850, Queen Victoria directed that Cardinal Cullen be prosecuted for daring to call himself Archbishop of Armagh and Primate of All Ireland. She considered him as an obtruder! Dublin Castle declined to prosecute.¹⁷

The Paisley diocesan arms depicts St Mirin, patron of Paisley, between a St Andrew's Cross with blue and white squares of the Stewarts who had their beginnings in Paisley. At the bottom of the arms is a detail — the dove of peace — from the arms of Pius XII who created the diocese of Paisley in 1948. Also on the shield are two shells of St James the Great, the Apostle — the shell of Compostella — to whom the Stewarts had particular devotion.¹⁸

DIOCESAN BASIS

On a diocesan basis there are files on the Paisley Cathedral Chapter, erected on 8 November 1952; the diocesan cemetery, St Conval's, Barrhead, opened on 12 April 1937;¹⁹ Diocesan Priests' Council; parish annual returns which give useful data on statistics each year and other information helpful for parish histories; Diocesan Youth Council; ordinations to the episcopate and priesthood for the diocese; ecclesiastical students and reports from seminaries; religious congregations within the diocese; schools within the diocese and statistics on marriages. In relation to the Church in Scotland, there is a file for each of the two archdioceses and six dioceses in the land. Often pastoral letters from various dioceses are stored if acquired. Some English pastorals are also stored. Statistics of the diocese and of the recent annual returns of the parishes are kept. Their value will be appreciated later. Three files are given to John Paul II, including his historic visit to Scotland in 1982. There is a file on St John Ogilvie, the Scottish martyr for the Papacy in 1615 and the Ven. Margaret Sinclair.

On various aspects of life there is data on Pro Life organisations active in Scotland and in the diocese of Paisley, such as Innocents, Life and the Society for the Protection of Unborn Children. There is a file as it relates to Paisley diocese on the St Margaret of Scotland Adoption Society founded in the West of Scotland dioceses in 1955. Since that year 3,118 adoptions have been finalised.²⁰ The development of the first twenty five years since the Abortion Act became law in 1968 is being maintained giving the statistics for the four million infants legally murdered through that legislation in those years.²¹

CURRENT AFFAIRS

A file provides some information on current Irish affairs in such matters as the Civil Rights Campaign in 1968; Derry's Bloody Sunday, 30 January 1972, when thirteen Catholic men were shot dead seeking basic human rights;²² the Church's role in the North of Ireland in the on-going loss of blood almost each day.

South Africa also has a file particularly relating to the Catholic History Bureau, Linden, conducted by the Oblates of Mary Immaculate, led by Very Rev. John E. Brady, OMI, Archivist and Director of the Catholic History Bureau. English by birth, Fr Brady arrived in S. Africa in 1930 to devote the rest of his life to the Oblate apostolate begun there in 1887 by the first Oblates.²³ At the opening of the new Catholic History Bureau and Archives on 17 August 1992, mainly through his efforts Fr Brady was described as Church Historian par excellence.²⁴ He has given great assistance to various projects in Paisley diocese.

There is a file of various posters which have been received in the past few years. Perhaps of little value in themselves, they give different styles and should be of interest in the future. Various aspects of the Church in Scotland are noted, such as the Scottish Hierarchy in general; the Catholic Press and media; Scottish Catholic Historical Society; Serra International; Catholic Nurses' Guild; Scottish Catholic International Aid Fund, and others.

The success of an archive is dependent on the determination and work of the archivist and the various people or associates of the movement being served through the archives. An archive cannot be stagnant. It should keep moving and obtaining material. Otherwise the danger is that it will die. The nature of archives is such that often the actual work of the archivist is unknown, often ignored and seldom appreciated. Nevertheless the work must go on and in a religious environment it is God that counts and ultimately rewards. Critics abound in every sphere and it is assumed there are many in the areas of archives. Their criticism will die out and be forgotten, whereas the work of the religious archivist will live on and be remembered and used for the glory of God, the good of the Church and, in its own way through the mysteries of Providence of God, the salvation of souls.

THE CHURCH ARCHIVISTS' SOCIETY OF AUSTRALIA, 1981-1991: AN OVERVIEW

The Rev. Bro. Leo J. Ansell, CFC

After being appointed as Archivist to the Diocese of Toowoomba (Queensland) in October 1977, one of my first actions, was to join the Australian Society of Archivists. I soon discovered this professional body had very little to offer church archivists. It ran no training programmes and had no handbooks or other literature. The two journals per year contain mainly academic articles and reviews, while the six bulletins give reports of State and Federal meetings and coming events. It was therefore clear to me that a society was needed to cater for the needs of church archivists and give the support they were not receiving.

Towards the end of 1981 I called a meeting of archivists of the major Churches in Queensland, as well as members of Religious Orders. Right from the start I was determined the Society (if one was founded) was to be for all Churches, and so it proved to be. The Church Archivists' Society was born on 24 October and the first Newsletter appeared the following month. The raison d'être was to be the monthly Newsletter (ten a year February to November). The articles were meant to be informative, particularly for those who were new to the discipline and wanted an introduction to the basics. I think I can say that as a teaching aid, the Newsletter has been successful. Quite a few members have given of their expertise and many excellent articles have been reprinted with permission from other societies, both national and overseas.

In ten years the Society grew to embrace all the main Churches, roughly in proportion to their numerical strength. The monthly circulation passed the 250 after a few years and stayed there for the duration of the Society's life. As there was a steady attrition from retirement or death among the members and their places taken by others, the total actually in receipt of membership for some period was near 500. Apart from the Churches, subscribers also included public libraries, schools, tertiary institutes, historical societies and interested individuals.

The administration of the Society was simple with an executive of three and meetings limited to one a year, though as the three members were only 120 km apart they were able to communicate by phone regularly and in later years by facsimile. I must admit that the only 'working' member of the executive was the President/Editor. I held these positions for the entire life of the Society as, even though we had biennial elections, no other member stood for either position.

In the decade of the Society's existence we published six books: two editions of Register of Church Archives, two handbooks on archival theory and practice, a bicentennial project for 1988 and, lastly, a handbook for beginners in the use of computers. All except the first handbook are still in print and most sold extremely well, particularly the second handbook, The Small Archive's Companion, and Getting started with Computing. Both of these filled a vacuum in their respective publishing worlds. Their success did not lie in their excellence but the fact they had no competition — and to the best of my knowledge they still do not in Australia when the needs of those for whom they were written are considered, as well as the price range. Both these books are under $20 and the computer manual was even under $10 in its first printing. It is now into its third, but will not be reprinted as such books date.

The Church Archivists' Society had no general meetings. From the first they were decided against for three reasons: the size of the country, the cost of travel (all church archivists are poorer than the proverbial church mice) and the age of the members. Although the Churches gave lip service to the importance of archives, in practice the finance made available was minimal and, as a result, many clergy, religious and lay people were literally brought out of retirement to fill the positions. Members in their eighties were by no means rare, although 'young' pensioners would be the norm. Schools, of course, are exceptions, with some employing professionals, still fresh from their post-graduate courses.

To compensate for the lack of meetings, I made a practice of visiting as many members as possible each year. My longest trip was in January 1984 when I visited every State, except Tasmania, covering in all, 10,500 km. Visits to New South Wales (the most populous State with the most members) were made yearly and also frequently to Victoria, the next in size, numerically. I would make the trips my annual holidays, so the cost was met by my religious community. These visits were appreciated, as I discovered from the correspondence which resulted, and over the decade I got to know many of the members very well. It also made the extracting of articles for the Newsletter, somewhat easier. I might mention here the amount of correspondence that was associated with the Society, as well as my work as Archivist for the Diocese of Toowoomba. It grew to some 300 pieces a month, and it was only due to the approval of my employer, Bishop Edward Kelly, who regarded the work of the Society of major importance, that I was able to carry on its administration during my office hours. To make up for this I got into the habit of opening my office an hour and half early each day and I also worked most of Saturdays. I must state that I have never regarded the time spent as anything more than satisfying and by no means a sacrifice on my part. However, my interest in the work to such an extent may have been my undoing.

With the onset of age and various health reasons, I decided in 1990 I would retire at the end of 1992. I gave my employer notice and the members of the Society ample time to consider a replacement for me in the administration. However, although 'I combed Jerusalem with lamps' I was unsuccessful. I was hoping a member of one of the other Churches would volunteer. Some did offer to help, but not to take over the reins. So, by June 1991, the Executive decided the Society would be wound up. A great stream of letters resulted in commiseration, but they were not any practical solution., so Newsletter No. 100 issued in November 1991, was the last. Three months's grace was then given and on 12 February 1991 the Society was formally dissolved. All the Executive records and sets of the Newsletters and publications were lodged with the Oxley Library, Brisbane, being the historical record repository of the State Library of Queensland.

My ten years with the Church Archivists' Society were perhaps the fullest of my life and for me the greatest reward was the interaction with the other Churches and the firm friendships that resulted. The degree of scholarship in many of them, both sacred and profane, has been a source of admiration and I was pleased to review many of their books. All in all I have learnt to see in them, in the words of a recent Pope, 'other facets of the face of Christ'.

As I write this I have a brief week left in the Toowoomba Archives and when I move to my Congregation's retirement home in Brisbane, I'll be busy (but not under pressure) with the books I'll still be publishing, under a new name: Church Archivists' Press. In case any readers want to communicate or buy copies of our books, my new address will be:

THE ASSOCIATION OF DIOCESAN ARCHIVISTS OF ENGLAND AND WALES

Although the 1983 Code of Canon Law contains a section concerning the setting up of diocesan archives and the safe keeping of documents (Canons 486 - 491), there is however no mention of the appointment of diocesan archivists. Canon 491 specifies that the diocesan Bishop is ultimately responsible for ensuring that:

'the acts and documents of the archives of cathedral, collegiate, parochial and other churches in his territory are carefully kept ...'

"there is an historical archive in the diocese, and the documents which have an historical value are carefully kept in it and systematically filed."

"the diocesan Bishop lays down norms for the inspection or removal of such documents."

The interpretation and implementation of the above Canons appears to vary from diocese to diocese, and not all diocesan bishops have yet appointed archivists. Where they have, the terms of the appointment have not always been clearly defined.

Nationally, some of these archivists have been meeting informally at the annual conference of the Catholic Archives Society, and in February 1992 the Society wrote to all twenty-two dioceses in England and Wales, inviting their archivists to a formal meeting at the Society's annual conference at Upholland in May 1992 in order to:

'consider the formulation of a constitution that would enable them to be set up as a recognised body and agency of the Church in this country, and also to discuss matters of mutual concern.'

The meeting was attended by archivists from nine of the twenty-two dioceses. During the course of discussion it emerged that the diocesan representatives wanted the support of a national Association to help them in their work and they expressed the wish to continue their association.

A further meeting was arranged for 4 November in the Bar Convent, York, at which, among other things, there would be the opportunity of exchanging catalogues of diocesan holdings, and information about the copying of parish registers.

This time the numbers had doubled: eighteen representatives came from twelve dioceses with apologies from a further three dioceses. It was agreed that there was no need for a formal constitution; that Fr Francis Isherwood would act as general liaison secretary, and the meetings would take place annually, in the autumn, alternating between the north and the south of the country.

The 1993 meeting has been arranged to take place in Southwark, and by way of preparation the archivist of each diocese present agreed to prepare a short paper on a particular topic relating to its archives. These papers will be collated and produced in booklet form in the summer for distribution to all dioceses.

HIS LORDSHIP BISHOP B.C.FOLEY (PRESIDENT OF THE SOCIETY) AND SISTER M-A KUHN-REGNIER (SECRETARY) EXAMINING A MANUSCRIPT IN STONYHURST COLLEGE LIBRARY, MAY 1992

THE CATHOLIC ARCHIVES SOCIETY CONFERENCE 1992

The thirteenth annual conference, held at Upholland Conference centre on 25-27 May, was attended by Bishop B.C. Foley (President) and seventy-seven members, including several from Ireland.

The conference was opened on Monday afternoon, 25 May, by Fr Anthony Dolan (Chairman) and the first talk was given by Mr Michael Cook (Archivist to Liverpool University) on 'Archives in Europe', aspects of which are published in this edition. After supper, Mr Melvyn Draycott, speaking on 'Practicalities, Microfilms', introduced members to the wide range of micro-filming equipment and facilities and their application to archive work.

The next morning, Tuesday 26 May, Mrs Anna Hardman (Archivist, Lancashire Record Office) spoke on the 'Ecumenical Aspects of Archives', referring in particular to the work of the Society of Archivists' Religious Archives Group, which holds an annual conference and aims to publish guides and handbooks. This was followed by a talk by Dr Elizabeth Roberts (Lancaster University) on 'Oral History: Some Reflections', in which she discussed the historical value of recollections and gave some useful practical advice on equipment and techniques, with sample extracts.

Tuesday afternoon was devoted to a visit to Stonyhurst College which was reached after an adventurous journey along narrow country lanes which had rarely entertained a double decker bus. At the College, the large party was divided into three groups which were taken in turn to see the library and archives, ancient vestments and artefacts, and the chapel and older buildings. The Society is greatly indebted to the Rector, Fr Michael O'Halloran SJ, Fr Francis Turner SJ, librarian and archivist, and their colleagues for their hospitality and expert guidance. With energies renewed by supper, members separated during the evening into discussion groups on such matters as diocesan archives, lay societies, work in progress, the archives of religious congregations and setting up a data base. During the day members joined in congratulating their President on his eightieth birthday.

The final morning, Wednesday 27 May, was occupied firstly with the customary open forum, during which reports were received from the previous evening's interest groups and any action arising therefrom agreed, and various matters raised by members were discussed. The annual general meeting which followed was, similarly, lively, and occasionally lighthearted. The chairman reviewed the year's work of the Society and its Council, and each officer reported on their respective activity. It was agreed to divide the heavy work load of the Secretary between general, membership and conference secretaries. Sr Mary Campion McCarren FCJ was elected Chairperson, and Fr Francis Isherwood, Vice-Chairmen and Membership Secretary. The other officers and members of Council (as stated on the inside front cover) were duly elected for 1992/3.

A full report of the conference appears in CAS Newsletter, No. 14, Autumn 1992, obtainable from Sr Marguerite Kuhn-Régner. The 1993 Conference will be held at Swanwick Conference Centre on 25-27 May 1993.

EDITORIAL NOTES

The Society has come a long way since the meeting of a few dozen Catholic archivists and interested persons invited to Spode by the late Fr Conrad Pepler in 1979. Its membership now exceeds two hundred, many of whom are practising archivists, while over one hundred institutions and individuals subscribe separately to Catholic Archives, which first appeared in 1981. However, only some seventy members attend the annual conference which was once for main forum for guidance and the exchange of experiences. Training seminars have proved popular but cannot easily be arranged for all those wishing to improve their archival skills. The Society is thus challenged, internally, to provide its members with instruction and information by other means, while, externally, it has not only to represent Catholic archivists in the wider world of archival practice but also to uphold the value of archives as a core element of the Church's own heritage.

The Society's two annual publications, Catholic Archives and CAS Bulletin thus clearly need to be harnessed to serve members' needs more directly, and indeed, probably to be augmented by other publications. An Editorial Board is being set up to determine editorial policy and to oversee the Society's publications. It is unlikely that Catholic Archives will be drastically altered but the resignation of the editor at last year's AGM has provided the Society with the opportunity of making any necessary changes. However, until the new Board operates and a new editor is appointed, the present editor has volunteered to see the 1994 edition through the press.

The contents of this edition again reflects the idiosyncratic editorial policy hitherto adopted which, as with other apparently haphazard systems, has its basic logic. Elizabeth Yakel describes the important Vatican Archives Project and the international theme is continued in Professor Joy Brain's account of Church archives in South Africa and in George Foulkes' vivid tale of parish record hunting in Mexico. As to religious archives, Dom Philip Jebb updates his 1975 description of the Downside archives and Sr Michelle Motherway describes the archives of the Little Company of Mary. On the diocesan front, Canon John Marmion describes the Shrewsbury archives and Fr Francis Isherwood reports on the work of the Association of Diocesan Archivists. Mr Daniel Huws provides our first article on Welsh archives and Ireland is doubly represented by Sr Dominique Horgan's description of the archives of the Irish Dominican Sisters at Cabra and by an appeal for the proposed Cardinal Tomas O Fiaich Memorial Library and Archive. Finally, Dr Peter Nockles' account of the Methodist Archives and Research Centre at Manchester shows just how much we have to learn from archivists of other Churches.

The editor thanks these and all other contributors to the 1994 edition, and, if indeed it is to be his swan song, likewise the contributors to the previous twelve editions. The Index to Nos. 1-12 is still available. Finally, no editorial notes would be complete without the usual appeal for articles for future issues.

THE VATICAN ARCHIVES PROJECT: AUTOMATING ACCESS TO THE HOLDINGS OF THE VATICAN ARCHIVES

Elizabeth Yakel

The Vatican Archives Project uses information technology to enhance access to the vast holdings of the Vatican Archives (Archivio Segreto Vaticano) for the international scholarly community. Computer technology does this by bringing together information from the variety of indexes and guides, published works, and the Vatican's archival collections themselves. The Vatican Archives Project is the story of how the information was collected and the problems encountered in applying twentieth century technology to archival records dating back to the twelfth century.

INTRODUCTION AND HISTORY

The roots of the Vatican Archives Project date back to 1984 when Francis X. Blouin, Director of the Bentley Historical Library at the University of Michigan in Ann Arbor, visited the Vatican Archives. Blouin discussed the problems of access to both the more modern archives of the Vatican and the medieval records with the Prefect, Fr Josef Metzler, OMI, and Mgr Charles Burns, a member of the Vatican Archives staff. Blouin then began to think about possible automated access applications for the Vatican Archives. Specifically, he wondered if the then recently developed Machine Readable Cataloging format for Archival and Manuscripts Control (MARC AMC) might be applicable to the rich archival collections of the Vatican.¹

In 1988, two archivists from the Bentley Library, Thomas Powers and Leonard Coombs, accompanied by Blouin, conducted a pilot project in the Vatican Archives to test the feasibility of applying the MARC AMC format to its collections. The group selected the Secretary of State's records as the test sample. Blouin, Powers, and Coombs prepared for the pilot project by reading about the Vatican's archival collections prior to the visit. After spending several weeks in Rome, the group returned to Ann Arbor and input the data into the computer. The three men then assessed the data which they collected and critiqued the theory that archival computer applications could be applied in the Vatican Archives. After careful study, Blouin, Coombs, and Powers decided that automated archival applications could be applied to the Vatican's rich holdings.²

In 1989, the Vatican Archives Project formally began. The primary purpose of the work was to provide a more comprehensive framework for researchers seeking to understand the basic organization of the Archives of the Vatican and the relationship of the records housed in the Archives with the evolving nature of the Vatican administration. Thus, at a minimum, the resulting database tries to address three questions:

- 1) What is the Vatican and what administrative agencies have formed the organization of the Vatican over time?

2) Which of those agencies have deposited records in the Archives and which have not? and

3) For those records which have been deposited in the Vatican Archives what are the characteristics of the record series and what sorts of finding aids exist both within the archival series and outside it?³

Additionally, by employing the MARC AMC format which is used in a variety of computer systems, the information can be shared widely. Scholars can potentially begin preliminary research concerning the Vatican Archives at home, thus arriving at the Vatican Archives with a better understanding of the collections and saving travel expenses.

PROJECT PERSONNEL

Project personnel, totalling five historians and archivists, were divided between Rome and Ann Arbor. Blouin continued to act as Project Director and was based in Ann Arbor. Katherine Gill, a medieval historian, and Elizabeth Yakel, an archivist with a background in automated techniques, were the on-site personnel in Rome.⁴ The collaboration between a historian and an archivist was one of the strong points of the project. Each looked at the records with different skills and complementary perspectives. Gill concentrated on developing scope and contents notes on varying records series and critical analysis of the indexes. Yakel developed the series physical descriptions, an initial survey of shelves, and tied indices to record series. This type of collaboration is rare in the United States. In total, Gill and Yakel gathered information on over 1,000 records series and input this data into a laptop computer on site at the Vatican Archives. A software package for personal computers employing the MARC AMC format, entitled MicroMARC:amc, was used.⁵

On the other side of the Atlantic, archivists were also hard at work on the Vatican Archives Project. Sr Claudia Carlen, IHM, and Leonard Coombs developed the agency histories for approximately 550 Vatican congregations, departments, and offices which functioned between 800 and 1922. Histories were developed for agencies whether or not extant records were found in the Vatican Archives. The agency histories also contained information on the competencies or responsibilities of the agencies, thus providing additional access points for scholars who are interested in a specific activity and are unaware of which Vatican agency was responsible for that particular type of work.

In order to bring together existing published information on collections related to the holdings of the Vatican Archives, Leonard Coombs developed entries for archival materials in Fabbrica and the Archivio di Stato di Roma. All entries in the database from these locations were taken from pre-existing guides: Michele Basso's inventory of the Fabbrica di San Pietro and the records descriptions prepared by Edvige Barletta and Carla Lodolini in Guida Generale

Degli Archivi Dei Stato Italiani and Maria Ruggiero's La Reverenda Camera Apostolica E I Suoi Archivi.⁶ Coombs also developed histories for all of the agencies associated with the administration of the Papal States. Finally, Coombs 'cleaned up' the computer records developed in Rome by Yakel and Gill, assigned subject headings to all the series described, and facilitated transfer of the data from the personal computer based MicroMARC:amc version of MARC to the RLIN database.⁷

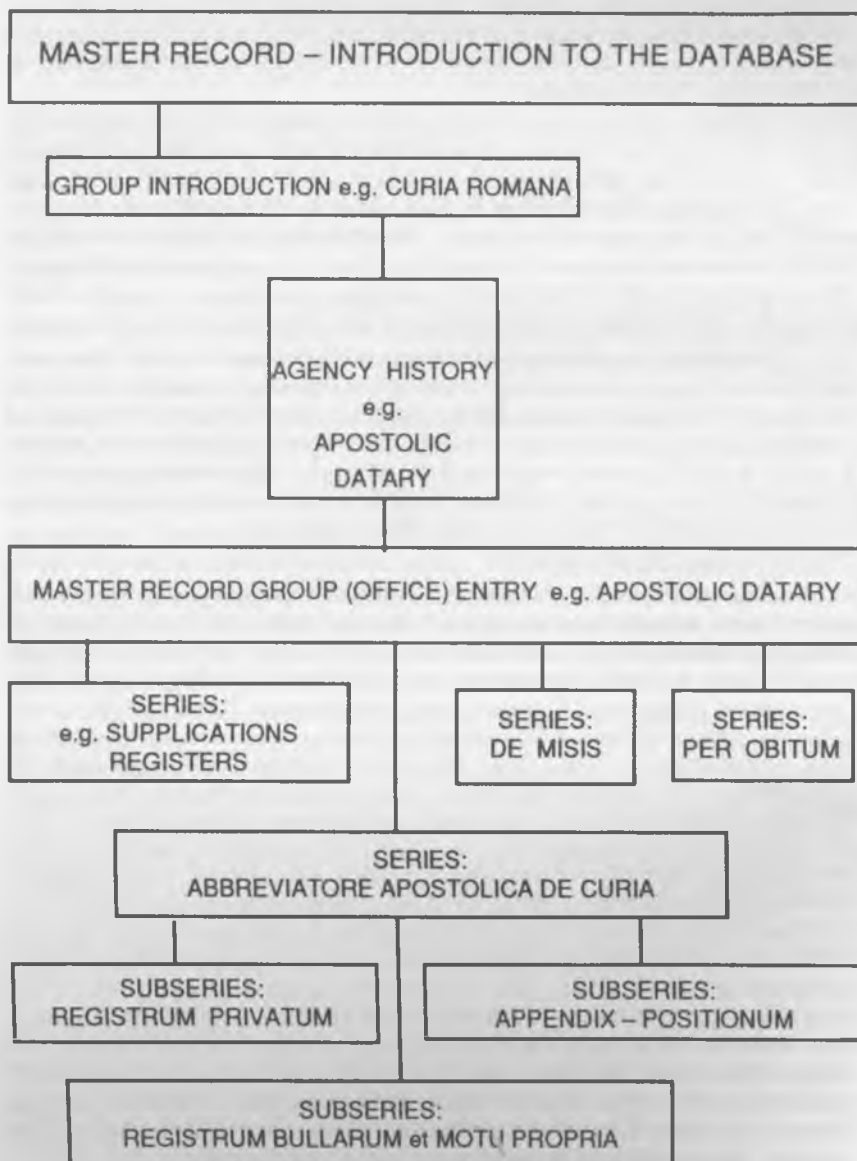

This initial phase of the Vatican Archives Project was primarily funded by the United States National Endowment for the Humanities, a federal granting agency, and the Getty Grant Program, a private foundation. Another private foundation, the American Friends of the Vatican Library also contributed to the initial phase of the project. The American Friends of the Vatican Library monies are being used to download (after the appropriate conversion or editing is done) the RLIN MARC AMC records to the Vatican Library's GEAC computer. The Vatican Library's computer also employs the MARC format.

In general, the distribution of responsibilities worked well. However, the Project was not without its problems of co-ordination between the Rome and the Ann Arbor contingents. There were times when Gill and Yakel also had to research agency histories, essentially the same duties as Carlen and Coombs, in order to develop some background on archival series encountering in the Vatican Archives. During the Project, the difficulties of exchanging and sharing information internationally were experienced first hand.

STRUCTURE OF THE DATABASE

The structure of the database is a hierarchy of descriptions from a very general master record which introduces the entire database to over one thousand very specific series descriptions. Under the master record, there are thirteen large group divisions: Apostolic Nunciatures, Cappella Pontificia, Collegio dei Cardinali, Commissioni Permanenti, Consistorium, Curia Romana, Famiglia della Santita di Nostra Signore, Uffici e Amministrazioni Palatine, Papal States, Papal States Local Administrations, Papal States (Territory under French occupation, 1809-1814), Vatican City, and Miscellaneous. These divisions are based primarily, but not fully, on actual bureaucratic and functional divisions within the Vatican. The groups are divided into agencies. In the hierarchy, the next thing one discovers are the histories of each agency compiled by Carlen and Coombs. Next, all series belonging to one entity are listed in the master record group entries. Finally, each individual series is listed. In general, the smallest denominators in the database are the series descriptions, although there are some subseries and individual items represented in the database. One can enter the database at any point of this hierarchy and one can move around without going step by step, eg. one can move from the series to the agency history by simply requesting the record number. The diagram "Structure of the Vatican Archives Database within the RLIN Network" is a partial outline of the database which highlights some of the relationships between the different levels of information in one of the thirteen large group divisions, the Curia Romana.

STRUCTURE OF THE VATICAN ARCHIVES DATABASE WITHIN THE RLIN NETWORK

The most obvious way that the Vatican Archives database differs from the earlier works is its comprehensiveness. The database includes virtually all extant series in the Vatican Archives. Prior to this, the only way scholars knew about records in the Vatican Archives was through the guides, indices in the Vatican Archives' own Sala degli Indici, or through the citations of other scholars.⁸ While these provided access to many series, not all of the series have previously been listed in the published guides. Similarly, not all series are indexed nor have scholars cited all of the series in the Vatican Archives. Now one can see the entire forest of series available for consultation at the Vatican Archives in the database. But, with that potential comes a new array of problems and promises. Approximately one third of the series in the Vatican Archives have no indexes available for consultation. Over three hundred of the series identified in Vatican Archives which are now in the database have neither indexes/inventories nor have ever appeared in the published guides. It will be up to scholars to explore the riches of these series and to determine the research value of the archival materials.

For Gill and Yakel in Rome, there were two necessities. First, Josef Metzler, OMI, Prefect of the Vatican Archives permitted stack access. Second, the computer enabled Gill and Yakel to input information into the computer directly from the archival series and to update, sort, and retrieve the information easily. This was essential because Gill and Yakel often consulted archival series separately and the automated environment made information sharing easier. Additionally, information gathered directly from each archival series was compared with data in the published guides, published and unpublished indexes, and selected articles and books dealing with the series. This experience was similar to that of all other researchers at the Vatican Archives, since successful understanding of each archival series is dependent upon careful examination of the primary sources, as well as insight into the indices and extensive reading of related secondary literature

Using this method of triangulation, the most comprehensive information on access was input into the database. Locating the background materials for the archival series in the Vatican Archives required a significant amount of research work. Guides, inventories, and articles are scattered throughout the Vatican Archives itself and in the Vatican Library (Biblioteca Apostolica Vaticana), which is administered separately. However, this time-consuming detective work did result in the addition of bibliographic and descriptive information to the database.

The series descriptions are the heart of the database. They provide a variety of basic archival information about each archival series such as: series title, inclusive dates, amount, language, indexes (published, unpublished, and internal), physical details about the volumes such as spine titles or additional title information found in the volumes, and any information on when the series arrived at the Vatican Archives. Furthermore, the series descriptions contain previously unwritten 'lore' of former archives users and the Vatican Archives staff. This is an attempt to get as much of the information as possible written down in one location and to point to most of the pertinent information. The types of lore to be found in the database include information on how best to approach a series or the existence of hidden indexes within certain volumes of a given series.

In general, Gill and Yakel used the actual archival series as the primary source of information due to a multitude of problems with the calendars, indexes, and inventories. This approach was necessary to understand the intricacies of both the archival series and the strategies of compilation of the indices which date from the thirteenth century to the present. The indexing methodology behind the inventories has evolved over time, just as the recordkeeping practices at the Vatican have changed over the centuries. The database attempts to inform researchers about the evolution and selectivity of the contents of indices in the Vatican Archives Index Room.

These inventories to archival collections in the Vatican Archives are long on arrangement and very short on description, to employ a distinction used in the United States. Several common problems with different types of indices exist. First, there are calendars which appear to be comprehensive, but which actually only list selected documents in a volume. Second, there are indices which seemingly transcribe volume titles verbatim, when in fact the titles are summarized. One example of this problem is the indices to the Armarii (Vatican Archives Indici numbers 133-134). Third, there are indices which describe only a part of a series without noting that more materials exist. The index to the Congregazione del Concilio, Posizioni series (Vatican Archives indici 910-920, "Fondo Storico della S. Congregazione del Concilio - Posizioni: Rilevazione" by Dom Domenico Troiani, FDP) provides a detailed index to the first 48 volumes of this 2,526 volume series without referring to the existence of the rest of the series. Fourth, some indices describe materials lost long ago and for which the index entry is the only evidence of an action. Finally, there are indices compiled for specific purposes which may only list a certain type of document in a series, for example judicial decisions. An understanding of the strengths and weaknesses of the indices is critical for any researcher's effective use of the Vatican Archives.⁹

The complexity of the archival materials in the Vatican Archives is especially evident in the series description section because series in the Vatican Archives are often related through hierarchies and/or functions. When known these links have been noted. While there are many 'roadsigns' in the database noting the evolution of entities, the turns are sometimes sharp. Even when provenance has been maintained in the Vatican Archives, as it has been for ninety-five percent of the holdings, clerical functions or competencies have migrated between offices within one congregation, as well as between congregations. This is difficult to trace and delineate in any form, including an automated database employing the MARC format which does not provide an easy way to link archival series in non-hierarchical ways.

Another problem encountered in developing the database is how to deal with non-provenancial materials such as the volumes in the Armarii. The Armarii have primarily been characterized in previous guides as having materials from one office. Upon investigation, however, each Armaria contains volumes primarily from one office or congregation but also is peppered with a few miscellaneous volumes from several other offices. At this point, we have not been able to highlight all of the hidden treasures in the Armarii and ideally some of the Armarii require item level (eg. volume by volume) description.

The presentation of information in the form of a database also creates problems in and of itself. First, the very fact of the database format tends to flatten out each entry and make entries appear to have similarities when none exist. Without a close inspection, each database record appears equal when in fact some series are more important than others. Series with 10 volumes may seem to be equivalent to series with 250 volumes, simply because more information is available for the smaller series. Furthermore, large database records do not always correspond to large series. More significant, a small database record does not always correspond to an unimportant series, it simply signifies that less information was available concerning that series.

The Vatican Archives Project staff deliberated at length over the most appropriate voice through which to present information on the Vatican Archives holdings in the database. The staff speculated that perhaps a deviation from the standard objective bibliographic database language, through the use of interpretative analyses and the inclusion of ongoing questions, was necessary in order to make the Vatican Archives data a better research tool. Therefore, at times the database abandons the objective stance in order to make suggestions or pose questions. I personally think that the addition of interpretive entries enhances rather than diminishes the authority and reliability of the entire database. Analytical entries could prevent repetitive or misguided research and they could suggest new avenues of investigation.

As the Vatican Archives Project progressed, time and priorities affected the relative value of following leads to verify connections between records series and indices. Pursuing leads resulted in the discovery of valuable new access points in some cases. At other times, potentially valuable new access points could not be pursued due to time constraints. For example, in the Vatican Archives, there is a collection entitled "Archivio dello Studio Belli", likewise in the Vatican Library there is a collection identified as the "Carte Belli". The connection between these two collections is not known, however a researcher using only one of these collections might never learn of the other's existence from existing reference sources. Therefore the Vatican Archives database notes the Library's collection in the series description for the "Archivio dello Studio Belli."

Only minimal connections between archival records in the Vatican Archives and records in the Vatican Library, the Archivio di Stato di Roma, the Propaganda Fide, the Biblioteque Nationale in Paris, Trinity College in Dublin and other archival repositories with related or alienated Vatican archival materials have been made in the database. One of the strengths of the database is that these connections can be made in the future and materials in diverse locations can once again be brought together intellectually.

One of the best aspects of the database is that now that the information is in electronic form it can be manipulated in different ways to increase access. The database has been available on RLIN to member institutions, such as the British Library, since the Fall of 1992. As yet, no information is available on its use or on the problems encountered by its users in the future. The data will soon also be available in the Vatican Library's GEAC computer. The reaction of the scholarly community should and will guide improvements in the database. Some additions to the database are already being planned.

In the next phase of the Vatican Archives Project, which has been funded by the Andrew W. Mellon Foundation, the Lilly Endowment, and the National Endowment for the Humanities, there are four goals. These are: 1) a more intensive analysis of the indices in the Vatican Archives index room, 2) an analysis and intellectual reintegration of materials from the Vatican Archives which have been transferred to the Vatican Library over the years, 3) the development of more detailed record and series descriptions for materials in the Vatican Archives, and 4) the drafting of fuller descriptions for materials in the Propaganda Fide Archives which were only partially included in the first phase of the project.

NOTES

1. The MARC AMC format is not a computer program or computer software. It is a standardized format which enables users to exchange data on archival collections. The MARC AMC format is incorporated in software programs for personal computers, such as MicroMARC:AMC, which was ultimately used in the Vatican Archives Project. The MARC AMC format is also employed in larger bibliographic database systems, such as the GEAC system at the Vatican Library, and in international bibliographic networks, such as the Research Libraries Information Network (RLIN), where the data from the Vatican Archives Project is now available. A brief description of the MARC:AMC format can be found in many articles including Lisa Weber's "Record Formatting: MARC AMC" in Describing Archival materials: The use of the MARC AMC Format, edited by Richard Smiraglia, New York: Haworth Press, 1991, 117-143.
2. The pilot project is discussed in Leonard Coombs, "A New Access System for the Vatican Archives", American Archivist 52 (Fall 1989), 538-546. The pilot project was funded by the Office of the Vice President for Research at the University of Michigan. The Vatican Archives Project, as well as other aspects of international exchange of archival information are treated in two articles by Francis X. Blouin, "A Case for Bridging the Gap: The Significance of the Vatican Archives Project", American Archivist 55 (Winter 1992), 182-191 and "The Historian, the Archivist, and the Vatican Archives: A Case Study in Collaboration in the Age of Information Technology" Archivi & Computer, 2, 1993.

5. MicroMARC:amc was developed by Michigan State University in the United States. At the time it was the only available software package for the personal computer which employed the MARC AMC format. Data was entered into MicroMARC: amc according to accepted international standards, specifically the Anglo-American Cataloguing Rules Second Edition (AACR2). In the United States, the authoritative translation of the AACR2 rules for archives and manuscripts is Steven Hensen, Archives, Personal Papers, and Manuscripts: A Cataloguing Manual for Archival Repositories, Historical Societies, and Manuscript Libraries, 2nd edition, Chicago: Society of American Archivists, 1989. For a discussion of the specific minuses and pluses of using the program see the newsletter of the Society of American Archivists, MicroMARC:amc Users Group Roundtable, Mug News 5/3, Summer 1993, "Using MicroMARC: amc in the Vatican Archives Project", by Elizabeth Yakel and Leonard Coombs.

7. The Research Libraries Information Network (RLIN) is sponsored by Research Libraries Group, a consortium of over one hundred research libraries around the world, including the British Library. RLIN links information on the holdings (both archival and library) of all the member institutions as well as information on other specialized collections, such as the Vatican Archives.
8. The guides to the Vatican Archives are too numerous to cite here. The basic English language guide is Leonard Boyle, OP, Survey of the Vatican Archives and of its Medieval Holdings, Toronto: Pontifical Institute of Mediaeval Studies, 1972. One prevalent problem with this guide and most of the others done prior to the 1980's is the fact that the Vatican Archives indexes have been renumbered. The most comprehensive bibliography of works citing series in the Vatican Archives is Giulio Battelli, ed., Bibliografia dell'Archivio Vaticano, 5 volumes, Vatican City: Archivio Vaticano, 1962-1992.
9. A discussion of problems with the indexes in the Vatican Archives as well as problems in applying the MARC AMC format to the archival materials in the Vatican is contained in Elizabeth Yakel, "Pushing MARC AMC to its Limits: The Vatican Archives Project", American Archivist 55/1 (Winter 1992): 192-201.

Elizabeth Yakel, former archivist for the Archdiocese of Detroit and for the Maryknoll Missioners, has also worked as a consultant for a number of other religious archives in the United States. She is currently a doctoral student at the University of Michigan, School of Information and Library Studies, and will be happy to respond to any questions concerning the project. THE ARCHIVES OF THE LITTLE COMPANY OF MARY

Sister Michelle Motherway, LCM

HISTORY OF THE CONGREGATION

The Little Company of Mary was founded in Nottingham by Mary Potter to bring the love of Christ into the lives and deaths of people everywhere. Caring for the sick and dying with love and compassion, and bringing wholeness into broken lives – this is its mission. Mary Potter said “The whole purpose of our lives is to be for the members of the Body of Christ today what Our Lady was for her Son on Calvary”.

The fifth child of William and Mary Potter and their only daughter, Mary was born in Bermondsey, London, on 22 November 1847. Her parents were Anglicans, but her mother became a convert two years before Mary’s birth. When she was a year old, Mary became the victim of a broken home. Her parents’ marriage broke up, and after much unpleasantness her father emigrated to Australia and never returned. This was a traumatic experience for the whole family, and the cause of many hardships. ‘They had to move house several times. By the time Mary was six years old the family had moved four times.

Mary was born a frail child with congenital heart disease, and suffered ill health for most of her life. In spite of all this, she had a happy childhood. When she was eight years old she went to boarding school, where she remained until she was seventeen, so she was well educated. It is to this period that Mary’s earliest known writings belong – a few of the letters which she wrote to her mother are still preserved. From the beginning Mrs Potter felt that “Mary was special”.

In 1864 Mary Potter and her mother went to live with her brother in Southsea. Mary grew up to become a lively attractive young lady. She became engaged to a rather serious young man, Godfrey King, who had tried his vocation as a Trappist monk. It was through Godfrey’s example that Mary became more aware of God in her life, and the meaning of prayer. At this time Mary felt the seed of a vocation growing within her, and she had great doubts about the prospect of marrying. Rather, she felt called to a life of prayer and good works, but her problem was to find out the way in which God wished her to serve Him. Unable to decide, she turned to Bishop Grant of Southwark for help. Bishop Grant knew Mary and the Potter family very well. His advice was brief and to the point – marriage was definitely not her vocation. She was to break off her engagement to Godfrey, she was to have one spouse, Jesus, whether in the world or in the convent. With the Bishop’s blessing and encouragement, Mary wrote to Godfrey and broke off the engagement. He was naturally very disturbed by Mary’s change of plan, and called on her to try and persuade her to reconsider the matter, but to no avail.

The Bishop felt strongly that Mary had a vocation, so after much prayer and discernment, she entered the Sisters of Mercy in Brighton on 7 December 1886. She remained there, an exemplary novice, but was destined for other things. Her spiritual director and the Superior of the Mercy Sisters felt that she had a vocation, but not as a Sister of Mercy.

In 1870 Mary returned to her mother in Portsmouth. She was very ill for the next two years, during which time she spent long hours in prayer before a crucifix in her room. As her health improved she still retained a vivid memory of the weakness, isolation and inability to pray which she had experienced through her suffering. She had had many mystical experiences too and felt strongly that God was calling her to devote her life to assisting souls in their last agony, as Our Lady had done for her Son on Calvary. It was during this time that she wrote her first book The Path of Mary. She had known what it was to be on the verge of death several times - she was diagnosed with cancer when 29 years of age - and wanted to reach out to help others who were suffering and afraid of dying. It was this intense desire, coupled with her courage and determination that finally brought the Little Company of Mary to life in the Church.

Mary received much opposition from her family, her spiritual director and bishops in seeking to establish the Congregation. In 1876 Bishop Danell of Southwark forbade her to found an Order in his diocese and Cardinal Manning advised her to return to her mother. However, in January 1877 Mary travelled to Nottingham to see Bishop Bagshawe. This was with the help of, and advice from, one of her brothers, who felt that his sister would find a friend who would encourage her. The Bishop was kind to Mary and very interested in her plan. He introduced her to the area of Hyson Green, telling her that if she found a suitable property he would pay the rent. The only place that Mary could find was a disused stocking factory; she decided "Yes, this is where we will commence our work". She wrote to her two companions in London, asking them to join her.

The Bishop gave them one week to prepare for the official opening. The place was cleaned up and repaired by willing neighbours. Mary herself painted a large wooden Cross red, and had it placed on the roof. Benches came up from the Cathedral and an organ from the home of a non-Catholic friend. At the conclusion of the Benediction, the Bishop deliberately left the Blessed Sacrament, and from that day the Sisters took it in turn to watch and pray before the Blessed Sacrament for the sick and dying. The care of the dying through prayer and presence is perhaps the most unique hallmark of the Little Company of Mary. All other works are undertaken based on the inspiration of our Foundress - the need for continuous prayer for the dying.

Mary Potter was a remarkable woman, attempting and accomplishing so much in her life in spite of poor health and many obstacles. She had two operations for cancer by the age of thirty. She prayed to know what God wanted of her, and when she knew His Will, she offered her "heart to love God", her "heart to work earnestly for His cause" and her "body to suffer for it".

HYSON GREEN AND LATER FOUNDATIONS

The poverty-stricken area of Hyson Green became for Mary and her companions the first home of the Little Company of Mary. It was here that the soul of the Foundress began to develop and be fashioned by supreme sacrifice, extreme hardship, willing apostolic work, and above all great misunderstandings. Bishop Bagshawe gave her encouragement and the start that she needed. We have her first impressions in her own words; "here at Hyson Green I was wandering alone, then sleeping in an old dilapidated place in the midst of mortar and rubbish of all kinds, with doors that would not fasten. I remember putting a pickaxe against the door to fasten it. A ladder led to that was later to become the Chapel". Then to sum up her feelings, she told us, "In working for God you must not look for personal comfort".

At that time there was no Parish here, it was just a Mission, but the work of the LCM had begun. The first few sisters did not spare themselves - they visited all the people of the locality, brought many back to the practice of their faith, instructed others in the Faith; converts were numerous. With great love they nursed the sick and dying in their homes. As well as all that, at the insistence of the Bishop, they gathered the children together and began a school. They were laying a sure foundation for a future parish, but Mary Potter had to suffer. She was to say later "Hyson Green was a place of grace greater than which she had not come across". The development in Hyson Green was truly outstanding in pastoral work. The school expanded and the number of Sisters increased. Four other Missions were begun on the Bishop's instructions Quarndon, Eastwell, Market Rasen and Melton Mowbray, the Sisters acting as teachers, nurses and catechists. The work in Hyson Green meanwhile increased and Bishop Bagshawe's diary records that the newly-built chapel there was completed on 26 June 1880, the new Parish developed a character all its own, being blessed from the beginning by the apostolic efforts of Mary Potter and her band of sisters who devoted themselves to the spiritual and material needs of the poor in this deprived area of the city. With great joy and gratitude to God, the first Clothing Ceremony took place on, 2 July 1877.

When Mary Potter came to Nottingham, there were two religious congregations: the Sisters of Mercy, with whom she had had close links and the Sisters of Nazareth, who looked after orphans and the elderly. Both congregations were extremely kind to Mary and the sisters. Later, in 1884, the Sisters of St Joseph of Peace were founded in Nottingham and Mary Potter had the privilege and pleasure to help their Foundress, Mother Clare Cusack.

In 1882 Mary Potter and two companions set off for Rome to seek Papal approval of the Constitutions of the new Congregation, and in due time approval was granted. To add to the joy of the sisters, Pope Leo XIII himself said to Mary "Why go back to England, the doors of Rome are open to you". This proved to be the crown of all her work and suffering.

Meanwhile, back in Hyson Green, membership was growing and apostolic work expanding, the beginning of much expansion through the years as the little Company of Mary responded to invitations from around the world to come and be of service to suffering humanity. Due to the meeting in Rome between a Bishop from Australia and Mother Mary, as she was now called, Sydney opened its heart to four sisters from Hyson Green. This small foundation grew to be the largest Province of the Little Company of Mary, and now incorporates four houses in Korea.

Foundations followed in North and South America, Africa, New Zealand, Malta, England, Scotland, Ireland, Wales and Italy itself, Rome having been now established as the Mother House of the Congregation and the residence of the Superior General. It would be true to say that all these developments were the fruit of the prayers and sacrifices of this saintly woman.

The original convent in Hyson Green was occupied until the sisters moved from there in 1922. Their new home was in West Bridgford where now stands the Becket School. This house did not prove satisfactory due to flooding. In 1929 the community moved to Woodthorpe, where it is still to the present day. This building was a large house which was altered and extended to meet the needs of the sisters and patients. Through the years extensions were added to meet the medical and surgical needs of the city, the last one in 1991, giving us the present modern private hospital in use today.

Mary Potter was a prolific writer and her spirit has been passed on through her writings which are distinguished by sound theological thought, deep spirituality and that gift of the Holy Spirit which is associated with great holiness. Sincerity, conviction and simplicity are the qualities of her work. – the Bible and Calvary are the bibliography, Charity is its source, a prayerful life, sanctified by suffering and self-sacrificing work, are its credentials.

VENERABLE MARY POTTER

The 8th February 1988 was a red letter day for the Little Company of Mary, when it was announced that Pope John Paul II had declared Mary Potter Venerable, an important step in the process of Beatification.

This honour is the official seal of the Church on the confirmed sanctity of the person in question. This declaration makes Mother Mary Potter the first English woman to be pronounced Venerable since the Reformation.

RECENT DEVELOPMENTS

1963. Mission Clinic in Korea, complemented by other clinics through the ensuing years, plus the establishment of a novitiate.

1970. Here in our foundation city of Nottingham itself, the Mary Potter Health Centre opened its doors, offering non-residential medical care in the Hyson Green area.

1981. Four Sisters arrived in Cardiff to undertake work for the terminally ill in their homes. The need and response spread to the extent that now, in larger premises, there are 100 volunteers working with the Sisters. Bereavement counselling is part of the care offered by the Sisters in this our first Welsh foundation.

1989. As a result of a request from the local Bishop, three volunteer Sisters from England, Ireland and Africa with one lady from Australia went to Haiti. This small deprived country is half of one of the larger islands of the Caribbean. The poor people here have so many needs - they seek justice and basic human rights, apart from the medical care the Sisters came to help with; this latter includes treatment for Aids sufferers.

1990. Three years ago saw the official opening, by Bishop James McGuinness, of the Sanctuary in the city of Nottingham. This event was the culmination of much hard work and effort with alcoholics by one of our Sisters. This house, newly acquired and refurbished, provides, free of charge, help for individuals and family members whose lives have been seriously disrupted by alcohol abuse.

1991. Despite the fact that a new wing was built on to the Nottingham Hospital in 1982, it was considered necessary to extend again in 1991. A fine unit was added on top of the existing building, giving much appreciated extra hospital beds.

1993. The latest call to the Little Company of Mary came from Albania. Two Sisters have gone to help with medical care in a country where is poverty and suffering on a large scale. With the help of generous benefactors they hope to open a Health Centre, and bring the spirit and courage of Mary Potter to the people of this sad country.

Of latter years, our apostolate has widened its focus to embrace present-day needs. The Sisters are presently engaged in prison ministry, hospital chaplaincy and pastoral care of patients in our own and other hospitals and homes for the elderly. We also have Sisters in the various Provinces serving as members of parish teams, thus affording a response to one of today's needs, which is much appreciated by both priests and people alike.

THE ARCHIVES

The archives of the Little Company of Mary are divided into four main categories; those of the Generalate, preserved at Tooting Bec, London; the Provincial Archives, kept in Ealing; the archives of local houses, held in various houses; and records kept at Wilson House, Nottingham.

THE GENERALATE ARCHIVES

These contain the evidences of the foundation and early beginnings of the Congregation at Hyson Green, and indeed letters and papers relating to Mary Potter's early life. Otherwise, as may be supposed, the central archives comprise records of the overall administration of the Congregation and of its foundations and work throughout the world. The archives were formerly preserved in Rome but were transferred to London in 1987. They are now housed in archival boxes on compact storage shelving in approved archival conditions.

These archives are arranged in the following categories.

General	a. Mother Mary Potter	Historical data, correspondence, writings
	b. Foundation	All relevant data.
Constitutional	a. Rules and Constitutions
	b. General Chapters	Acts and Minutes, Decrees
Officials	a. Superior and Council/Team	Administrations, Visitations
	b. Appointments	Provincial Superiors & Councils, Formation Directresses
Sisters	a. Active	Relevant details
	b. Inactive	Left Congregation, Deceased
Foundations	a. Provinces	Erection, Suppression
	b. Houses	Opening, Closure
Legal Documents	a. Canonical
	b. Civil
Cause for the Beatification	a. History
	b. Promotion
Celebrations	a. Golden Jubilee, 1927	Data from
	b. Centenary, 1977	Provinces and
	c. Other Occasions	Houses
Letters	a. Circular	To the Sisters.
	b. Annual Motto	To the Sisters, with Christmas message
Books	-	There is also a library of books about Mary Potter and her contemporaries, and about the people involved in the various foundations, as well as background histories and reference books.
Artefacts	-	When the Generalate archives were transferred to London, most of the artefacts closely associated with Mary Potter remained in Rome where they lie in the crypt under the high altar of the church in the Mother House. The room in which she died is now an oratory, and the room next door is kept as a souvenir room. Even so, some personal relics, including an ivory crucifix, her vow formula and rosary beads, a relic of the True Cross, and the booklet Stations of the Cross which she said daily were brought from Rome.

THE PROVINCIAL ARCHIVES

These were first put in order in 1970 and an archivist appointed. Here again, the archives were kept in traditional and approved archival conditions. The archives are classified as follows.

THE ARCHIVES OF THE ENGLISH BENEDICTINE CONGREGATION KEPT AT ST GREGORY'S, DOWNSIDE

Dom Philip Jebb, OSB

An account of the E.B.C. Archives was published in the Downside Review, No. 312 in July 1975. The main scheme of general and subsidiary categories described there has stood the test of time, but inevitably there have been modifications and additions, which mark changes and developments in the structures and workings of the Congregation. It has therefore been thought advantageous to bring out a new account of them.

It is assumed that the reader of this piece has a knowledge of, or access to, the previous article, so that much of what was said there will not be repeated here. Copies of this previous article are obtainable from the Archivist at Downside. However, the following list of the general and subsidiary categories of the Archives kept at Downside supercedes the 1975 list and is accurate and complete up to October 1993.

DESCRIPTIONS OF THE VARIOUS SECTIONS

(This part will contain additions and emendations to what was written in the previous article, and will not repeat much of what was contained there apart from the major lists of contents which have been revised)

I. GENERAL

A. Histories

Add the microfiches of the complete works of Allanson with introductions by Dom Placid Spearitt and Dom Bernard Green.

B. E.B.C. Lists

In 1980 Dom Andrew Moore updated Dom Basil Whelan's Series of Lists, and his unpublished typescript is kept in this section.

III. OFFICIALS

A. The President

The President now has three Assistants, making up the Regimen. Material from the following Presidents has been added to the collection: Trafford, Byrne and Christopher Butler.

B. The Procurator in Curia

Additional material from Abbot Philip Langdon (2 boxes) and Abbot Rudesind Brookes. Also material concerning the House in Trastevere, once owned by the Congregation.

D. There are now 7 boxes of material from the Inspector dating from 1928-1957.

F. A small section consisting of two boxes.

IV. THE MISSION

C. The complete alphabetical list of parishes with material at Downside now reads: Acton, Acton Burnell, Bath, Beccles, Blackmore Park, Bonham, Bungay, Cheltenham, Chilcompton, Clayton Green, Clydach, Coventry, Dowlais, Dulwich, Ealing, Easingwold [not Easingwell as printed in the previous article], Egremont, Hindley, Liverpool (St Anne's, St Mary's & Great Howard Street), Maesteg, Great & Little Malvern, Midsomer Norton, Morriston, Norton St Philip, Petersfield, Radstock, Redditch, Stratford-upon-Avon, Stratton-on-the-Fosse, Warrington, Whitehaven, Woolton, Wootton Wawen.

V. EXTERNAL RELATIONS

Includes quite a large collection of Papal Bulls, etc., 1614-1908, among them two original ms copies of Plantata. Also records of Krug's Visitation of 1881.

VI. OTHER BENEDICTINE MATTERS

C. Contains at least some material from the archives of Atherstone, Hazlemere (including Brussels, Winchester and East Bergholt), Jamberoo in NSW, Australia (including West Pennant Hills), Kylemore and Teignmouth.

VII. INDIVIDUAL HOUSES OF THE E.B.C.

A. St Gregory's

3.a The Abbot

Much of the material prior to 1900 and previously kept in the Abbot's files is now housed in the Archives. It is very diverse in character and is simply arranged chronologically. Work is in progress producing abstracts of each document, and these abstracts are then indexed for all proper names they contain.

3.b.i Annals, Fasti, Chapter and Council Minutes

Chapter and Council Minutes since 1900 are not normally available for researchers.

3.c The Bursar's Office

The move to the new Bursar's Office has been completed, but very little material in fact passed to the Archives.

3.d.x St Gregory's Society

References to Old Boys may also be found under [IX].

3.e Dependent Houses

Since 1975 both Gorey and Benet House have been closed and a certain amount of new material is available on them. Dom Wulstan Phillipson (a monk of Downside and an Old Boy of Gorey) was writing a history of the school at the time of his death, but the version on which he was working was not found among his papers. It is presumed that he had sent it to some contemporary to read it over. It could be of considerable significance if this ever turned up as Dom Francis Sweetman, the Superior at Gorey, was regarded as an important figure in the opposition to the British before the setting up of the Irish Free State.

3.f Personal Papers of Individual Monks of St Gregory's

The following is a revised alphabetical list of all Gregorian Monks of whom there are personal papers in the Archives. These continue to be arranged in order of death, which is the date given after a monk's name. Where there is no date given the monk is still alive at the time of writing (October 1993). These latter papers are arranged in the order of their arrival in the Archives. Where no details are given after a name it indicates a single item of no obvious historical importance other than its personal connection. Because this is by far the largest section of the archives it is not possible to keep them all in one place.

3.g Relations with the Holy See

The main collection of papal Bulls, etc has been moved to [V] as it refers to the E.B.C. rather than to St Gregory's

3.j Pictorial Records

This is now a very considerable collection which has been largely listed and catalogued. There are photographs and portraits of many individual monks of the E.B.C. going back to the 1850's, as also boys from the School at Downside. There are photographs of many other monks and ecclesiastics and public figures, including 19th and 20th century post cards.

The very considerable collection of maps and plans deal with Downside and its dependencies and parishes, and go back to about 1820 and include work by Goodridge, Pugin, Hansom & Dunn, Stokes, Pollen, Brett and Scott.

There is also a collection of about 30,000 post cards of architectural and topographical subjects, arranged alphabetically, still being added to, but starting in the 1890's.

VII.B. St Lawrence's at Dieulouard & Ampleforth: The very important collection of ms works of the Venerable Augustine Baker is still being added to. The latest addition is an account of the life and death of Francis Gascoigne, who died as a boy at St Gregory's in 1638. There are also notes of D. Athanasius Allanson for his great works on the history of the E.B.C. The actual works themselves are kept under I.B. There are also two copies of the account by D. Richard Marsh of his escape from France during the Revolution. A copy of the Ampleforth continuation of Birt's Obit Book, 1912-1977 is kept under I.B.

VII.C. St Edmund's at Paris, Douai & Woolhampton: besides the ms history of St Edmund's, Paris, written about 1742 there is now a microfilm of the 17th century library catalogue in the hand of D. Benet Weldon and xerox copies of biographical notes on all the monks of St Edmund's, Paris in the 17th century compiled by D. Stephen Marron, and the same for monks at Woolhampton 1914-79 (ie, continuing Birt's Obit Book), compiled by Abbot Sylvester Mooney.

VII.D. SS. Aidan & Denis at Lambspring & Broadway: now about 30 items. Most of the additions are volumes which belonged to members of the Community or came from the Library. Among them are a set of homilies for each day of Lent in the hand of D. Maurus Corker and chapter conferences by a Prior of Lambspring dated 1699. There is also a microfilm of the Cartulary.

VII.E. St Benedict's, Fort Augustus: the collection now includes the diary of Prior Jerome Vaughan which covers the last three months of his time there.

VII.F. St Michael's, Belmont: 12 boxes and files. This collection now includes a box of copies of documents in the Belmont Archives of interest to Downside, including various Lambspring papers, and an exercise book giving an account of the Novitiate at St Michael's, copied from a ms of D. Alphonsus Morrall's, written about 1865. A copy of D. Basil Whelan's own corrections to his Series of Lists Relating to the E.B.C., is kept under I.B.

VII.G. St Benedict's, Ealing: 1 box of miscellaneous papers. Before 1949 cf VII.A.3.e.(ii)

VII.H. St Mary's, Buckfast: 1 box of miscellaneous papers

VII.K. Our Lady Help of Christians, Worth: 1 large box of miscellaneous papers including copies of the Wheel, letters and other papers concerning the foundations in the Apurimac Valley and Lima, Peru. Before 1957 cf VII.A.3.e.(v)

VII.L. St Gregory's, Portsmouth (USA): 1 box of miscellaneous papers, includes pamphlet A Benedictine Priory in the US, 1916, by D. Leonard Sargent. Written while still a dependency of Downside, but kept with the other Portsmouth papers

VII.N.

1. Our Lady Help of Christians at Cambrai, Woolton, Salford Hall & Stanbrook: Narrative of the Seizure of the Dames of Cambrai by French Republicans (ms copy); also 4 vols in the hand of Dame Barbara Constable. Others in her hand will be found among the mss of D. Augustine Baker. A box of miscellaneous papers of the Community, includes declarations on the Rule and a report by D. P.A. O'Neill; also photocopy of the 2 ms vols of the "Catalogue of the names and ages of all those who have for any time lived in the Abbey at Stanbrook" Contains a list of all those buried in the cemetery.

2. St Scholastica's at Kilcumein, Inverness-shire was aggregated to the E.B.C. in 1908 and moved to Holme Eden in 1921. It was closed in 1984: 1 box of miscellaneous papers

3. Our Lady Help of Christians at Milford Haven, Talacre and Curzon Park. This Community started as Anglican, moving from West Malling to Milford Haven in 1911, where they were received into the Catholic Church; in 1920 they moved to Talacre, and from there to much smaller premises at Curzon Park in Chester in 1988. At this point some of their archives were deposited at Downside. These include: 1 box of papers from West Malling, the Chronicle of Talacre 1913-1945, a box of papers concerned with Milford Haven, Register of Baptisms at Talacre Hall 1846-1855 and Church notices up to 1914, a large box of conferences by various Abbesses, artistic work by Dame Catherine Weekes, also by Peter Anson and D. Hubert van Zeller (chaplain there), liturgical customaries, etc.

VIII. ARTIFICIAL COLLECTIONS

A. The index of the proper names in the abstracts of the Birt Collection is now almost complete.

B. There are important quantities of transcripts, etc. from the following institutions: The British Museum and British Library; The Public Record Office; The Vatican Library and Archives; Propaganda Archives; Departmental Archives at Arras, Lille, Nancy, Ile et Vilane; St Alban's College, Valladolid; The Archives of the Abbeys of Silos and Salamanca; The State Papers of Simancas; The Bibliotheca Nacional, Madrid; The Biblioteca Ambrosiana, Milan; The Royal Archives in the Hague; Australian Ecclesiastical Records collected by Brian Condon.

A great many transcriptions, photocopies, etc. are also to be found among the personal papers of the following monks: D. Christopher Butler, D. Cuthbert Butler, D. Bede Camm, D. John Chapman, D. Hugh Connolly, D. Gilbert Dolan, D. Hugh Edmund Ford, D. Aidan Gasquet, D. Lucius Graham, D. Ethelbert Horne, D. Adrian Morey, D. Alphonsus Morrall, D. Wilfrid Passmore, D. Wulstan Phillipson, D. Leander Ramsay, D. Stephen Rawlinson, D. Julian Stonor.

Such material will also be found among the papers of the following laymen: Francis Joseph Baigent, Edmund Bishop, William Bliss, W.E. Campbell, Charles Gatty, Daniel Parsons, J.B.L. Tolhurst, W.H.J. Weale.

C. The material collected by the E.B.C. History Commission includes reports on visits to the Archives in Paris, Douai and Lille and copies of the papers given at the various Symposia organised by the Commission.

IX. PERSONAL PAPERS OF INDIVIDUALS NOT DIRECTLY CONNECTED WITH THE E.B.C.

This very diverse collection still needs a great deal of work to be done on it before a satisfactory catalogue can be produced of all it contains. There follows here simply an alphabetical list of those people, places and institutions of whom the Archives have at least a box of papers: Lord Acton, Amazon Trust, Peter Anson, Robin Atthill, Australiana, Francis Joseph Baigent, Edmund Bishop, Blenman family, Professor Christopher Brooke, Canon Brownlow, Stephen Bucknall, Cyril Francis Burnand, M. Butler, Carmelites of Presteigne, Abbot Casaretto, Catholic Records Press, D.Yves (de) Chaussy, Bishop Clifford, Clifton Diocese, Bishop Collingridge, Sir Ninian Comper, Sister Bernadette Conroy, Archibald Cochrane (Lord Dundonald), John Coulson, John Crockett, William Crowder, Gervase de Bless, Prince Charles de Broglie, Alexander de Themines Bishop of Blois, Mrs Anne Mary Dyde, Dr Francis Elloy, Miss Elmes, Countess Isabella Jane English, Outram Evennett, Adrian Fortescue, Charles Gatty, Bishop Gibson, Everard Green, Teresa Harris, James Harting, Bishop Hay, Stephen Hewitt, Francis James, Pope John Paul II, Canon Johnson, Julian Latham, Bryan Little, Archbishop David Mathew, Frank Mathew, Lord Maynard, John Bernard Morrall, Mostyn family, Michael O'Callaghan, T.O'Farrell, John Orchard, Daniel and Gertrude Parsons, Maurice Percival, Isaac Perry, Monsignor Persico, St Oliver Plunkett, Augustus Welby Pugin, Mr Richardson, Bishop Rudderham, Mrs Thomas Salvin, Siegfried Sassoon, Aidan Savage, Francis L. Sexton, Lance Sheppard, Richard Simpson, Father Simpson of Caughton, Smythe family, Staniforth family, Anthony Symondson, Ethelred Taunton, John Tidmarsh, Pope Urban VIII, Alexis Valgalier, Lori van Biervliet, Bishop Vaughan of Plymouth, Baron von Hugel, Daniel Waterland, Neville Watts, Evelyn Waugh, James Weale, Anthony Wheatley, Cardinal Wiseman, Woburn Park.

NB: reference to the card index may show that the papers of some of those referred to above may in fact be found under another name, and even in another section. The catalogue of the main library should also be consulted.

X. UNIDENTIFIED PAPERS OR NOT CONNECTED WITH THE E.B.C.

This is another very miscellaneous section, and something of a dumping ground for material which cannot be fitted into any other category. Among items which might be thought to be significant are the following: St Alfonso de Liguori, autograph letter dated 14th August 1755; Joseph Bains; A.T.Bennett: survey of Tenures of Bruton, 1825; Terrier of Tithings of Benter [or Benter] in the parish of Midsomer Norton; will of Miss Sarah Bromley; Prince Charles Stuart, later King Charles I, holograph letter written to his father King James I; Scrapbook of Chingford parish 1914-1976, collected by Mgr John Howell; Rev G. Corbishley, notes of a sermon; Catalogue of the paintings in the house of the Earls of Denbigh (undated); Executors' accounts of William Dobson, deceased 18.2.1848; Terrier of the Tithings of Downside in the parish of Midsomer Norton; Letters in the hand of M. Dupont, 'the Holy Man of Tours'; Sister Veronica Giuliani, letter dated 1667; Biographical notes on 19th century Hampshire Catholics; the Priory, Haywards Heath, notes of Abbot Chapmans's retreat by Sr M. Michael; Sovereign Military Order of Malta; Survey of tenures in Midsomer Norton, 1825; Box of newspaper cuttings concerning Cardinal Newman at the time of his death, 1890; Order of Malta Volunteers; Dorothy L. Sayers; Sheldon family, papers of martyrs of the Popish plot, including letters and speeches from the scaffold written in their own hands by SS Plunkett, John Kemble, etc; D.J.Skelton, Journals 1785-1859; J.Smith of Cosiehill, Perth, book of poems; Stratton-on-the-Fosse, box of papers relating to the civil parish; Box of writings of Charles Thomas; Sister Mabel Tottie; Alan Turner of Spa Mills; musical ms for the occasion of Cardinal Weld's reception into the Sacred College, 1830, by Joseph Bani.

NB: as with the previous section, reference to the card index may show that some of these items are kept under a different name and even in another section, and items may be found in the catalogue of the main library. The monastery's collection of medieval mss is also catalogued and housed in the main library.

Finally, it must be emphasised that the Downside Archives are a private collection and that access to them is entirely at the discretion of the Abbot. Personal papers are not normally available until 50 years after the person's death, though exception is sometimes made in the case of strictly scholarly material deposited in the Archives which does not deal with living people.

Anyone wishing to consult the Archives should in the first instance communicate with the Archivist in writing at: Downside Abbey, Stratton-on-the-Fosse, Bath, BA3 4RH

THE SHREWSBURY DIOCESAN ARCHIVES

Canon John P. Marmion

THE SHREWSBURY DIOCESE

The restoration of the Hierarchy of England and Wales in 1850 was incomplete. Three dioceses were left without bishops, Salford, Shrewsbury and Southwark. Professor Schiefen has suggested that there was a shortage of suitable candidates to fill the diocese in 1850. And the outcry following Wiseman's flamboyant pastoral letter from the Flaminian Gate eventually made it imperative to fill these three dioceses. Shrewsbury, in sheer size, was as big as any of the new dioceses and larger than most, though short in both Catholic population and clergy. The diocese covered Cheshire, Shropshire and the six counties of northern Wales (Anglesea, Caernarvon, Denbigh, Flint, Merioneth and Montgomery). North Wales was to remain a part of Shrewsbury Diocese until the establishment of Menevia (as it then was) in 1898. Consequently, the diocesan archives also hold papers of Welsh interest.

THE DIOCESAN ARCHIVES

The range of the archives will become apparent from the description of the various holdings; and it is equally clear that there are considerable gaps in the records. I will suggest one reason for this at the end of the paper. When it was decided to box the records, the scheme of classification suggested by the Society (see Catholic Archives, No.1. 1981) was adopted, with the main groups: A. Bishop and Diocese in relation to Rome and the Hierarchy; B. The Bishop and Diocesan Clergy; C. Diocesan Administration; D. Clergy Funds; E. The Chapter; F. Diocesan Societies and G. Parish Records. We have not always followed all the subdivisions, and at times it has seemed preferable to keep papers in their traditional order and not divide them into all the different categories. Thus, most of the episcopal letters are in one series (A), undivided and classified according to the individual bishop. We have begun to number the individual boxes as well as to use the letter classification. It is hoped to build up a reference system to the whole archive on a computer (Tandy 1000 with a D-base III installed). This would provide a useful instrument for both classification and retrieval.

EPISCOPAL PAPERS

The first surprise, and disappointment, is that only a handful of papers concerning James Brown, the first bishop of Shrewsbury (1851-1881) survive. It was possible in 1987 to build up a collection of Brown's letters from the Jesuit Archives in London (4 items); from the English College in Rome (5); Ushaw (13); Southwark archives (23); and Birmingham archives (72). These are, however, preceded by a small collection of letters to and from Bishop Briggs. The second volume in the series (Brown and Knight) has fifteen for Brown and five envelopes of letters covering Bishop Knight (1882-1895), which include newspaper cuttings, the Church Education Fund – Midland District 1850 and school statistics 1891 The Bishop Carroll papers (he was Coadjutor 1893, succeeded in 1895 and died in 1897) contain eleven envelopes, some with quite a number of letters in them. Bishops Allen (1897-1908) and Singleton (1908-34) share a single box and it is only with Bishop Moriarty (Coadjutor, 1932, succeeded in 1944 and died in 1949) that there is any real body of correspondence. His files also have lots of Shropshire notes, some manuscripts, various reports, an agenda for a Hierarchy meeting, a Young Christian Workers report, a few Ad Clerums from various dioceses, and some pamphlets. I think that there is a certain value in retaining all these papers in the order in which Bishop Moriarty kept them. The final collection of episcopal letters, at the moment, are those of Bishop Murphy (Coadjutor, 1948, Bishop 1949, and translated to Cardiff in 1961), Bishop Grasar (1962 until his retirement in 1980) and his Auxiliary, Bishop Brewer. At present these comprise about eighteen boxes. It is hoped, eventually, to produce a full calendar of these episcopal letters, and possibly to cross reference them with the letter books.

THE LETTER BOOKS OF THE BISHOPS OF SHREWSBURY

The title is inaccurate but has been used a long time. Many, perhaps most, of the letters have been written by the various secretaries to the bishops over the years, but they do represent the major source for the study of episcopal control over the diocese. All the letter books have indices, so that it is easy to gain an indication of the scope of the correspondence. The bound volumes, at first sight, look like carbon copies bound into a book, but, according to a rubric in the front of one volume, the copy was made by a form of blotting paper, and the result, although usually good, is occasionally difficult to read. The first book begins in 1882, but I do not know if there were earlier books in the series. The letter books are numbered and titled as follows.

1. July 1882 - May 1884. 475 pages. The majority of the letters are to the clergy and often include the parish of residence. Some are written by the future Bishop Singleton.
2. May 1884 - Dec 1886. 506 pages. A letter of 9 June 1886 mentions a diocesan library, and other items refer to confraternities, the industrial school, seminaries, and, inevitably, the clergy.
3. Dec 1886 - Jan 1889. 489 pages. This book includes some letters of Bishop Knight and the future Bishop Singleton, and an inspector of schools is mentioned.
4. Jan 1889 - May 1891. 991 pages. Bishop Knight was in charge of the diocese in these years.
5. June 1891 - March 1895. 937 pages. According to a note, loose sheets were cut out to make extra diocesan copies of some letters.
6. March 1895 - Dec 1901. 934 pages. Letters of Bishops Carroll and Allen.

7. Dec 1901 - Jan 1910. 971 pages. Letters mostly written by Fr C. Giles, secretary to Bishops Allen and Singleton.
8. Feb 1910 - Dec 1927. Only 504 pages used. Mostly written by Fr Giles, others just stamped 'Bishop of Shrewsbury'.

There are also seven letters books titled 'Private and Confidential' and numbered I to VII. They all contain letters signed by Bishop Singleton and cover the years 1907 to 1939, each book containing some 500 pages. There is a further book in which only 149 pages are entered and this contains letters dated Jan to April 1917 and Dec 1959 to April 1948.

With a dozen or more boxes of episcopal letters and sixteen letter books there is a good coverage of the work of the bishops of Shrewsbury from 1882 to 1948, but it is unfortunate that there are no letters and little information in the archives generally about the founder bishop. These letters and letter books are supplemented by a number of items which deserve special mention.

There is a diary of Bishop Brown titled 'Memoranda of the Diocese of Shrewsbury' covering, in eighty-eight pages, the years 1850 to 1897, with some notes on diocesan finance, the 1853 synod, episcopal functions and clergy deaths. Another bound volume is titled 'Shrewsbury Diocese - Record of Deeds', and another 'Historical Documents - Funds - Lists of Students'. There is also a single volume 'Diocese of Shrewsbury. Charities 1889-1900' giving details of the Bishop Brown Memorial Certified Industrial School, Stockport.

There are in all twenty-four volumes of Pastoral Letters from 1851 onwards and other volumes titled 'Reports and Pastorals' which contain a mixture of pastoral letters and reports on schools. There are two volumes of Diocesan Synods, the first covering the first eleven synods from 1853 to 1898 and the second the twelfth to the nineteenth (and last) synods from 1901 to 1957. There are thirteen bound volumes of Ad Clerum letters, and conference papers for the clergy since the last War. Unfortunately, there are few of the actual papers written by priests for these conferences, which I remember as being minor theological treatises. And, supporting this material, we have an almost complete set of The Catholic Directory from 1814.

OTHER EPISCOPAL PAPERS

The episcopal papers also contain, in the A3 series, correspondence with Roman congregations, such as charity collections, matters of canonization, papal prayers for peace and for vocations and, indeed, all formal documents and papers which require papal sanction and in which the Vatican has an interest in the Diocese. The series A4 has the Quinquennial and relationes reports on the Diocese sent to Rome. They do not date back, alas, to the beginning of the Diocese, and it would be a notable addition to the Archives to obtain some historic copies from Rome. Any for the first twenty years would help to build up the picture of the work of the founder bishop.

The final group of episcopal papers are classified as A6. These boxes, more than fifty in number, range in alphabetical order from Amnesty International through to the end of the alphabet. There is a vast range of papers, usually with both incoming letters and documents, and replies by the bishop in either a carbon or xerox copy. Once again, the order in which this collection has grown indicates the way in which the bishop has had to work, and there seemed little advantage in resorting the papers to meet the Catholic Archives Society's draft classification. A box early in the series is titled 'Archives' and has some general documents relevant to the archives and some reports on work done in the past. The correspondence of many diocesan and national societies will be found in this series, although, as will be noted later, some diocesan societies have their own archives.

PAPERS RELATING TO THE CLERGY AND PARISHES

The Book of Ordinations is not kept in the Archives, but early lists of clergy are impressive, since the Diocese included much of North Wales from 1851 to 1895 and so had within it such religious houses as St Beuno's, then the Jesuit theological faculty, and Pantasaph, the Capuchin Friary. Ordinations from these houses swell the lists considerably. The Archives include lists of all clergy, many obituary notices, and some collections of clergy papers.

The series G has over ninety boxes of parish papers, and it is intended to expand this series so as to have an individual box for each parish in the Diocese. Quite a number of parishes have produced brochures for a golden jubilee, centenary and even a 150th celebration of establishment. These are normally filed with the parish, but it is hoped to get two copies, so that a second series can be formed just of parish histories. Particularly notable are the books for the 150th anniversary of St Peter's, Stalybridge, and St Alban's, Macclesfield, and the excellent double centenary booklet for St Werburgh's and St Francis's, Chester. These insights into parish life are augmented by the series B9, the Visitation Returns, which normally give a report on the parish for about every three years. The series is fairly complete back to 1909. but, again, there is little information for the early years of the Diocese. In 1886, Fr Edward Slaughter collated returns from the parishes to produce a basic history. The Archives holds the relevant returns and Fr Slaughter's manuscript which has never been published. However, Canon Maurice Abbott used this material as a basis for his Diocese of Shrewsbury 1851-1951 Centenary Record (1951). It should be noted that S.T.Lander, the author of the excellent articles in the Cheshire and Shropshire Victoria County History volumes, did not know of the work of Fr Slaughter. Canon Abbott's two works almost provide a basic index to the holdings on the subject of parishes in series G.

FINANCIAL RECORDS

The growth of parishes throughout Cheshire and Shropshire leads inevitably to the subject of finance. About 460 wills have been classified and boxed alphabetically, with some cross references, in some twenty or so boxes, and the series expands as the documents accumulate. There are eighteen boxes of accounts, and more in the Finance Office, and there are some published and bound accounts. Details of parish accounts may be found in the Visitation returns and, more recently, the annual parish financial returns, but these do not date very far back. The picture of how Cheshire, Shropshire and North Wales (the six counties of Anglesey, Caernarvon, Denbigh, Flint, Merioneth and Montgomery), with only twenty-six diocesan priests and seven religious order parishes could be established and then grow and increase in number in so few years still remains something of a financial mystery, and there is room for research here. Some knowledge of the Chapter minutes indicates the generosity of many of the laity, among them converts, who helped to establish both parishes and religious houses, and this may be elaborated by a study of the wills. At one stage, the Archives included some parish registers but these have been returned to their respective parishes, partly because the Curial Offices were being asked for information by family historians.

EDUCATION RECORDS

Together with the growth of the parishes was that of the schools. Among the bound volumes are a number of school reports, especially from the religious inspectors. The education papers are in series C7, and are nearly all from the 'Diocesan Schools' Commission and concerned with the establishment and extension of our schools. Some, like St Hugh's, Birkenhead, have already run their full life and passed into history. The files relate almost exclusively to voluntary aided schools and the religious orders which have run schools will have papers in their own archives. The bulk of the C7 series is considerable as the Diocese was concerned at one time with eight different Local Education Authorities and the Department of Education and Science. Many of the papers are ephemeral and the series needs a great deal of reducing, not least to make room for more papers likely to be sent in from the Education Office as they cease to be needed for current work. A notable loss to this section however, is the thesis of C.A. Humphreys on the beginnings of Catholic Education in Wallasey presented for his M.Ed. at Liverpool University. A copy of this work, presented by Mr Humphreys to the Diocesan Schools' Commission, has been taken out and not returned. He wrote an article in the Diocesan Year Book of 1974 but the student will now have to go to the University for the full work. Similar regional studies would make a useful contribution to the history of the Diocese.

ARTEFACTS AND LIBRARY BOOKS

While much of history is usually reconstructed from documentation, artefacts can be significant. Back in 1984 Rosemary Rendel the secretary of the Catholic Record Society, carried out a survey of holdings of significance in the parishes, and her final documentation on this is kept in the Archives. The one hundred page document covers twenty-nine parishes and The Council House itself (no longer in Diocesan possession). It lists the registers kept in the parishes, indicates those at risk (some were in cellars and attics), lists historical objects (for example, the early fifteenth century German vestment at the Cathedral), church plate, furniture, and stained glass windows. As the clergy are moved from parish to parish there is a danger of items being lost, overlooked or forgotten and so it is valuable to hold a central register of the more important and historic objects.

The parishes were required to make Lenten returns of the numbers of baptisms, first communions, confirmations, marriages, deaths, and Mass attendance. There are volumes of registers of parish returns from 1909 to 1938 1957 to 1958 (almost empty) and 1959 to 1964 (a fairly full register of statistics).

Miss Rendel also looked at what was called 'The Moriarty Library' during her survey. Except for a section at Hawkstone Hall, this was moved to the Curial Offices and, more recently, a substantial section of it has been placed on extended loan in The Talbot Library, Preston, which opened in May 1992. The major illustration in the booklet for the opening of this Library was taken from the reverse of the title page of Decretum Aureum Domini Gratiani cum suo Apparatu, published in 1581, from the Shrewsbury collection. It shows canon law enshrined amidst prophets, evangelists and doctors of the Church, and treated with the reverence of the book of the Gospels at Mass. Many of the books in the collection will have Bishop Moriarty's bookplate in the front, and from this it is possible to identify his interests. The Archives holds a computer listing of all the books in the library in the Curial Offices as at September 1988 before its division.

OTHER RECORDS

There are two series which are allied in content. One contains papers on seminaries, especially Ushaw, Oscott and the English College in Rome, but which also includes some material from Lisbon and the Irish seminaries. And, together with this series, there is a set of boxes on 'Vocations'. Certainly for the last thirty years or more there has been a team in the Diocese with special responsibility in this area, and this group may still have further relevant papers.

An important series of boxes covers all the religious houses in the Diocese, including those which have closed, and also the secular institutes. Here, the correspondence will need to be supplemented by the holdings in the various orders, congregations and institutes in order to obtain a complete picture. Since the Diocese has had a vicar for religious for a decade or two, he will presumably have a growing collection of correspondence supplementary to the diocesan archives. The Bishops' correspondence will also contain communications from Rome on the consecrated life.

There are a number of small collections which have been created in response to special events during the last few decades, such as the 'Call to the North', the Papal Visit, Springfield Read (for a time Bishop Brewer's accommodation in Altrincham), the Second Vatican Council (attended by Bishop Grasar), and Bishop Gray's period as chairman of the National Liturgical Commission. The canonization of various martyrs of England and Wales also created a special series of boxes, associated with which are a number of paperbacked volumes of documentation from the Sacred Congregation for the Cause of Saints. Among these is the documentation of the miracle at Bowdon Vale which was used in the cause of the foundress of the Sisters of St Joseph, Emilie de Vialar.

OTHER DIOCESAN RECORDS NOT IN THE ARCHIVES

Various Diocesan Commissions, for instance Education and the Liturgy, the Marriage Tribunal and the Finance Office, and various societies and organizations, such as the Children's and Family Society, the Justice and Peace Group, the Religious Education Service, the Youth Service, those working for Christian Unity, the organizers of the Lourdes Pilgrimage, and many others will all have their own papers, and in some cases the holdings in the Diocesan Archives will not indicate the amount of material really available. The Diocesan Yearbook is the first place of reference for an indication of these different bodies and their work. Finally, the archives of the Diocesan Chapter are quite separate and not in the Diocesan Archives.

SOME FINAL THOUGHTS

Anyone who works in the Archives for any time becomes aware of considerable gaps in the collection. I have noted how little primary material we have for Bishop Brown. A former bishop's secretary, who had a second career as a Benedictine monk, described to me in some detail what happened when Bishop Moriarty became the ordinary in December 1934. His predecessor, Bishop Singleton, had lived in Birkenhead whereas Bishop Moriarty was in Shrewsbury. He came to Birkenhead and spent three days, on and off, burning papers, commenting to Fr P. Adamson, the secretary, that 'people deserve a second chance'. It may be remembered that St Bonaventure, when he became General of the Franciscans, wrote an official life of St Francis and attempted to destroy the previous two works, Celano I and II. He was concerned with the tensions in the Order between the spirituals and others, and saw this as a way of moving towards a united policy. It did not endear him to historians. Seemingly, Bishop Moriarty saw a conflict between a pastoral approach and historical completeness. It is necessary to record that the Archives are clearly defective without being able to speculate as to what material has been lost. The New Code of Canon Law envisages four archives, one of which is a secret one. It indicates that matters of morals and criminal cases should be destroyed, but a short summary of the facts kept.

The Diocesan Archives, described above, are now boxed and kept in three different rooms in the Curial Offices in Park Road South, Birkenhead, having been transferred there after a long sojourn in The Council House, Shrewsbury. They are not open to the general public for a number of reasons, the most obvious being lack of staff. Even so, serious scholars may gain access, but by appointment only. Requests may be sent to The Diocesan Archivist, c/o The Curial Offices, 2 Park Road South, Birkenhead, Merseyside, L43 4UX. Such requests should be made in writing.

THE WORK OF THE METHODIST ARCHIVES & RESEARCH CENTRE, JOHN RYLANDS UNIVERSITY LIBRARY OF MANCHESTER

Peter B. Nockles

The broad contents and work of the Methodist Archives and Research Centre at the John Rylands University Library of Manchester are not perhaps familiar to many members of this group. In this paper, I shall present a brief outline sketch of the background history, followed by a survey of the more significant content of the Archives. Finally, I shall conclude with some information on recent developments and future prospects and challenges. Firstly, a few words by way of introduction, about the Deansgate building of the John Rylands Library, and its early history of building up Methodist archive collections. For it is important to draw attention to the fact that the Rylands Library possessed substantial Methodist holdings long before the formal transfer in 1977 of the Methodist Archives and Research Centre.

THE BUILDING

The John Rylands Library was founded almost 100 years ago by Enriqeta Augustina Rylands as a memorial to her husband, John Rylands, a cotton magnate who, on his death in 1888, left an estate worth £2,575,000. In 1889 Mrs Rylands bought a site on Deansgate in one of the city's worst slum districts, and chose Basil Champneys, well known for his work on Mansfield College Library in Oxford, as her architect. The Library took from 1890-99 to build, at a cost of the then extraordinary sum of £500,000. The Library opened its doors to the public on 1st January 1900, with a mere 70,000 books and less than 100 manuscripts in its holdings. The foundation of the Rylands Library was a significant event in Manchester's cultural history, and compared with the establishment of the Halle and Free Trade Hall, the Whitworth Art Gallery and the Royal Northern College of Music. The John Rylands Library remained as an independent institution, though close ties were cultivated with the expanding University Library on the Oxford Road in Manchester. However, financial difficulties led to the solution of a merger between the two institutions in 1972. The combined library now has 3.5m books and 1m manuscript or archival items, making it the third or fourth largest university library in the country. The Deansgate building now houses the Library's special collections, and it is here that the Methodist Archives and Research Centre was set up in 1977. A further crucial development took place in 1987 with the creation of the John Rylands Research Institute formally launched in January 1988. Its broad purpose has been to develop, rationalize and promote the Library's special collections of manuscripts and printed books. To this end, an integrated programme of research, cataloguing, publication, promotion, acquisition and conservation was embarked upon. Full details about the work of the Institute from which the Methodist Archives has been a beneficiary are set out in the Institute prospectus (copies of which are available on request).

HISTORY OF DEVELOPMENT OF METHODIST COLLECTIONS IN THE RYLANDS LIBRARY, 1900-77.

Due to the purchase of two very important book and manuscript collections by Mrs Rylands, namely the Spencer collection from Althorp Library, which included 57 Caxtons and the Crawford collection, which included 125 Latin manuscripts, the Library quickly established itself as an academic and research library of international standing. However, the nonconformist religious roots of the Library's foundation - both John Rylands and his wife were Congregationalists - continued to be reflected in the content and development of the Library's holdings, and the Library emerged as a leading centre for the study of Nonconformity, though it is only in more recent years that the Library's riches in this area have become obvious.

The Library steadily built up substantial holdings of Baptist, Presbyterian and Unitarian, Quaker and Moravian material, though surprisingly, given the religious affiliations of the Library's founders, Congregational holdings were relatively weak prior to the 1970s. However, from a very early date it was Methodist material that formed one of the most significant portions of the Library's Nonconformist resources. The foundation for this was laid in 1903 with Mrs Rylands' purchase from R. Thursfield-Smith of a collection of 818 works in 858 separate volumes. Nearly half of the titles appeared during the lifetime of John Wesley (1703-91). This core material became known as the Rylands Wesley Collection. The content is primarily of British Methodist and Wesleyan interest; the main component being works of John Wesley and Charles Wesley (1707-88). The collection is recorded in the supplementary name and subject catalogues of the Special Collections Division at Deansgate. Numerous important early Methodist periodicals such as the Arminian Magazine, along with minutes of the annual Conferences of the Wesleyan Methodists from 1744, as well as notable manuscript accessions such as 16 bound volumes of nearly 3,000 letters and portraits of eighteenth and nineteenth century Methodist worthies, were soon added to the collection. Of particular note was the early acquisition of 14 letters of Selina Hastings, Countess of Huntingdon (1707-91) for 1774-84.

The next major increase of the Library's Methodist holdings came in 1973 with the transfer of the entire library of the Hartley-Victoria College, Methodism's ministerial training institution in Manchester which had closed at that date. Most of the research materials came on 'permanent loan' and since have been kept in the Special Collections Division. I have recently catalogued the mainly administrative records comprising this collection. Another notable element of the material transferred to the Rylands in 1973 included the Hobill Collection, formed by G. Alexander Kilham Hobill, and part of the library formed by James Everett (1784-1872). The collection which in 1973 comprised 46 periodical and serial titles in 475 volumes for the period 1797-1959, embraces all aspects of Methodist history, and there is coverage of Primitive Methodism and the Methodist New Connexion as well as of Wesleyan Methodism.

THE METHODIST ARCHIVES AND RESEARCH CENTRE

The Centre, established by the Methodist Church in 1961, had been located in London since 1962. In the legal agreement between the Methodist Church and the Library, the size of the collection transferred from London in 1977 was estimated at over 26,000 printed items (exclusive of circuit plans) and approximately 600 feet of manuscript shelving. Over the last fifteen years the Archives have grown significantly, with c.60,000 accessions (about two-thirds of which were manuscripts). A single volume guide to the manuscript collections in the Methodist Archives down to 1983-84 was prepared by Homer L. Calkin and published by the World Methodist Historical Society in 1985.+ However this work contains omissions and some inaccuracies and the documents-reference system does not match that in use in the Archives. The Library has various in-house finding aids as well as a fairly comprehensive Guide (copies of which are available on request). Moreover a series of articles by David Riley in various recent issues of the Proceedings of the Wesley Historical Society detail some of the more notable accessions of late years, while full documentation of such accessions is available on an annual basis by consulting the annual Report of the Methodist Archives and Research Centre. As regards access, approved readers are welcome, on written application. An embargo is placed on certain 'sensitive' MS material and written permission for access to these items must be obtained firstly from the Secretary of the Methodist Church. Discussions are taking place at present on possible amendments to the rules of embargo.

I shall now proceed to give a very brief survey of some of the more notable manuscripts and printed items held in the Archives. Firstly, let us turn to manuscripts, some key collections of which my colleague, Gareth Lloyd is primarily engaged in cataloguing.

i. Manuscripts

The nucleus of the Collection is represented by the outstanding number of manuscripts relating to John Wesley himself. We have the largest single collection of his autograph letters and only surviving diaries. According to Frank Baker, the Methodist Archives contain about one third of all John Wesley's extant correspondence anywhere in the world. In all, the correspondence of the Wesley family in the Collection comprises approximately 5,000 letters (in boxes and ledgers) of the period 1700-1830, including letters to the Wesleys' parents Samuel (1666-1735) and Susanna (1669-1742) as well as to the brothers John and Charles. Card indexes for this correspondence have always been available but recently Gareth Lloyd has produced a full catalogue of the Wesley Family correspondence and is currently embarked on cataloguing the extensive Charles Wesley correspondence. It should be of particular value for scholars that this collection be made more accessible, especially since no comprehensive edition of the Charles Wesley correspondence currently exists, though his manuscript sermons and diary (1736-56) which are held in the Archives have been edited.

The other large component of manuscript holdings in the Archives is the Fletcher-Tooth Collection. This comprises 44 boxes of correspondence, journals and other papers for 1759-1843, relating to John Fletcher (1729-85), the well known Vicar of Madeley, his wife Mary Bosanquet Fletcher (1739-1815) and their adopted daughter Mary Tooth (1777-1843). Lists of the contents, some provisional and some definitive, exist. The correspondence and/or diaries of other early Methodist leaders, notably Benjamin Ingham (1712-72), Samuel Bradburn (1751-1816), Thomas Coke (1747-1814), Hester Ann Roe Rogers (1756-94) are also contained in the Archives. A comprehensive catalogue of the Coke correspondence providing a vital insight into the history of early Methodism has been compiled by Gareth Lloyd. Copies of the catalogue are available on request. Also of note is one of the many private diaries in the Archives, namely that of John Bennett which records Wesley's first Conference.

The Archives also include extensive minor collections of personal papers of nineteenth century Wesleyan Methodists, the most notable being the c.25,000 items in 122 boxes relating to nearly 4,000 individuals which make up the series of Preachers' Letters and Portraits. The most significant sub-section of this collection is that relating to Jabez Bunting (1779-1858) and John Telford (1851-1936). Another collection, named after Thomas Allan, the connexional solicitor, extends to 21 boxes of correspondence and other papers relating to the public side of Wesleyan Methodism for the first half of the nineteenth century. Other collections that deserve brief mention include the Moulton Collection comprising 900 manuscripts and the Thomas Jackson Collection (1783-1873) comprising 22 boxes. However, I would like to give pride of place to two important collections hitherto not very accessible but for which Gareth Lloyd has recently produced full catalogues with indexes, the papers of Adam Clarke (c.1762-1832) and Joseph Benson (1748-1821). Again, copies of these catalogues are available on request.

The institutional records of Wesleyan Methodism are fully represented in the Archives. As is well known to many of you, a primary source for the history of Methodism is to be found in the manuscript journals of the various Conferences. These are available under certain restrictions up to the year of union, 1932. The Wesleyan Conference Journals commence with an attested copy of the Deed of Declaration of 1784, and the Minutes of the first seven Conferences are signed by John Wesley as President. The minutes of the District Synods are preserved in two separate sequences; a chronological set for 1834-1932 in 80 boxes and 55 volumes, and an incomplete geographical set for 1792-1932 in 615 volumes. There are also Minutes of the various connexional committees, notably the Book Committee contained in 21 volumes and covering the period 1788-1932. Ordination matters are covered in the archives of connexional organisations such as the Richmond College Collection, the Children's Fund, and the Local Preachers Mutual Aid Association. There is also a large archive relating to the work of the Chapel Committee and Property Division.

Other Methodist denominations are less well represented in the Archives, but among items relating to the Methodist New Connexion, the first body to separate from the Wesleyans, we have the papers of its founder, Alexander Kilham (1762-98), and for a much later date, the literary figure, Joseph Barlow Brooks (1874-1952). We also have New Connexion institutional records such as Conference Journals (1797-1907) and preachers' records.

For the Primitive Methodists, we have extensive personal papers for the co-founders, Hugh Bourne (1772-1852) and William Clowes (1780-1851), and for a later date, the papers of the biblical scholar, Arthur Samuel Peake, as well as for several other lesser figures. The Archives include the institutional records of Primitive Methodism including the Conference Journal (1827-1932), records of the Book Committee and Publishing House (1853-1932) and other Minutes such as for the Home Missions Committee (1874-80) and for the Norwich District (1839-1932).

The records of the Bible Christians and the United Methodist Free Churches are also represented in the Archives in the form of private papers and institutional records.

The paucity of private papers for British Methodism since the reunion in 1932 is a source of regret. But the Archives does contain the papers of some notable figures of this recent period such as the painter Frank Owen Salisbury (1874-1962) catalogued by a previous Archivist, Alison Peacock, and of Lord Soper during his year (1953-54) as President of the Conference.

Institutional records for the post-1932 period are more abundant than private papers. These include minutes and correspondence concerning the reunion of Methodism (1917-32), documents relating to the Division of Social Responsibility, many concerning moral as well as social issues such as Abortion, the Conference Daily Record since 1932 and papers relating to the Anglican-Methodist Conversations (1955-72). Recently, these holdings have been supplemented by notable accessions of divisional material from the Army and Forces Board which have been fully listed, from Humanby Hall School (including a photographic archive), and DSR Division of Overseas Ministries papers up to 1990. Finally, a notable small archive (including photographs) relating to Headingley ministerial training college in the 1930s was recently deposited by a one-time candidate for the ministry there.

ii. Printed works.

Turning to printed works, the Methodist Archives contains nearly 6,000 serial volumes. The core of the printed holdings is represented by John Wesley's printed work comprising over 1,300 eighteenth century items. Approximately 500 volumes can be identified as coming from the library of Charles Wesley and his family. Over 130 volumes from the library of John Fletcher of Madeley include a collection of pamphlets bound together in 12 volumes, for which there is a manuscript index in Fletcher's own hand. These collections, along with the theological works of Thomas Jackson came into the possession of the Methodist Archives with the closure of Richmond College in 1972. (Much of the College's working library, being transferred to Wesley College, Bristol). The c.2,600 volumes which make up the Richmond College collection at the Rylands largely cover the late eighteenth and early nineteenth century period.

Alongside the collections of publications by John and Charles Wesley, must be considered the numerous body of works in the Archives published in opposition to and defence of Methodism in the eighteenth century. This collection is arranged according to the standard bibliographies of Richard Green which should be consulted in order to access it. Dr Clive Field has calculated that in all there are 2,865 copies of 1,783 works of the Wesleys and 396 copies of 348 anti-Methodist items in the Archives. It should now possible also to search the eighteenth-century editions on the Eighteenth-Century Short Title Catalogue database. There is also a collection of c.6,000 pamphlets, primarily in chronological order from 1562 to 1933. These are mainly nineteenth century and Wesleyan. But there is a second sequence arranged by subject covering such notable Methodist controversies as the Kilhamite controversy (1791-97) and the Leeds Organ dispute (1827-32). The pamphlets in the chronological sequence can be accessed via the catalogue and a typescript list.

Mention should also be made of the fact that the Archives contain over 3,000 hymn books, the nucleus formed by the Percy Collection. This is not limited to Methodist items, for about half are either Anglican, Baptist, Unitarian or Congregationalist in source. Many of these were designed for use in the overseas mission field and are in a variety of foreign languages. John Wesley's Collection of Psalms and Hymns (listed by Green) includes some of his earliest translations of German hymns and was first published in America as early 1737. According to a former Archivist, Mr David Riley, it is probably one of the rarest items in the Collection. Another grouping is represented by a collection of over 1,500 hymnals or liturgies with a Methodist or Moravian emphasis, covering the eighteenth to twentieth centuries. Many of these were designed for use in the overseas mission field and are in a variety of foreign languages. Finally, a more recent acquisition (1983) is represented by the Holbrook Collection comprising over 350 works of hymnody and church music published between 1749 and 1969.

As regards British Methodist periodicals, Alan Rose's invaluable union list surveying 48 institutional and 14 private locations reveals that about three-quarters of the 142 titles he lists are in the Methodist Archives. In all, over 5,000 volumes are to be found in the Methodist Archives including such crucial Methodist newspapers of the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries as The Watchman (1835-84) and the Methodist Times (1885-1937). Other important runs include the Primitive Methodist Magazine (1819-1932) and the Bible Christian Magazine (1832-1907). Some titles such as Tent Methodists Magazine are unique to the Methodist Archives. Periodical holdings can be accessed via an index in six catalogue drawers and in various unpublished finding aids prepared by William Leary. Periodical holdings are also now becoming available on microfiche thanks to the IDC microfilming project.

Non-periodical printed works in the Methodist Archives are being recorded by Kenneth Rowe of Drew University, in his Methodist Union Catalog. However, so far only six of the projected 20 volumes are available. It should also be noted that we try to order the latest books of Methodist-related interest, especially history and biography, on a regular basis from our book purchasing fund.

Finally, it must be stressed that resources for Methodism at the local level are necessarily limited. The Methodist Archives primarily encompass central organisational records and the papers of leading Connexional figures. However, there is an extensive local history collection of over 500 monographs and c.4,000 pamphlets or other small works. The latter include any modern chapel and circuit brochures, many commemorating the centenary of a particular chapel or Sunday school. This material can be accessed by means of a 13-drawer card catalogue arranged by place. There are also over 10,000 circuit plans, about two-fifths of which date to the period prior to Methodist union in 1932. In recent years, a complete set has been acquired for every District at quinquennial intervals. Alan Rose has drawn up a published register of the pre-1908 plans. Another distinctive feature of the Methodist movement, class tickets, are also represented in the Archives; these tickets were issued quarterly by class leaders to the members of the societies and are thus another valuable source for the history of early Methodism. However, while biographical information for Methodist ministers is readily available from obituary notices in the Minutes of Conferences and, in many cases, Methodist magazines and lists of ministerial stations can be traced from sources such as Hill's Arrangement of Methodist ministers, primary source material for local preachers is much less easy to come by. I shall say a few more words about the limited nature of our records for the purposes of family and genealogical history in a moment as this is an important point to stress.

THE PUBLIC ROLE OF THE METHODIST ARCHIVES: RESEARCH ENQUIRY SERVICES & PROMOTIONAL ACTIVITY.

The Methodist Archives handles something approaching 1,000 letters of enquiry in an average year though numbers have fluctuated in recent years. Of course, added to this there are a great number of personal enquiries by visiting readers using the Archives. To give you a sample, for the academic year 1990-91, nearly 400 readers used the Methodist Archives specifically. Our Counter staff issued 3348 printed volumes, 233 manuscript volumes and 5252 individual manuscript letters to these readers. Nearly 300 orders for photocopying and photographic reproduction were processed, though this figure excludes the many single sheet obituaries sometimes supplied gratis to amateur genealogists. We continue to attract a considerable number of scholars from all over the world, especially from North America during the summer months. However, a substantial portion of our enquiries come from family historians. To cope with the volume of enquiries from this source, we have adopted the expedient of a standard letter format detailing the fact that our own local history resources are limited but supplying a comprehensive set of names and addresses of individuals and institutions who are more likely to be able to help. For again it must be emphasised that it has been the policy of all Connexional Archivists as far as possible to retain local records in the locality. Few records of genealogical interest are kept in the Archives, and certainly no baptismal, marriage or burial registers. These registers, if extant, are kept locally in county record offices and similar repositories. A particularly useful volume which we recommend Methodist family history enquirers to consult is William Leary's My ancestor was a Methodist: How can I find out more about him? (2nd edn. 1990).

DISTRICT ARCHIVISTS

The Methodist Church also has a network of District Archivists covering the whole country whose role is co-ordinated by the Connexional Liaison Officer, Dr Dorothy Graham. From time to time these District Archivists, sometimes via Dr Graham, supply us with local material which, where deemed appropriate, we accept for the Archives. Dr Graham is doing much to collect all local church histories and similar publications which come to her notice so that the collection in the Methodist Archives can be improved. She also visits various Divisions from time to time to check on the state of their archives. In a few instances in response to enquiries we suggest the name and address of the relevant District Archivist as a person who might be able to provide additional on-the-ground information but it is always stressed that District Archivists themselves are in no way a repository or even necessarily a conduit for such records. However, in many cases their local knowledge and expertise, as particularly manifested in the case of Mr Alan Rose, Archivist for the Manchester & Stockport District, proves invaluable. We try to maintain close links with the District Archivists and there is a bi-annual conference where we can all meet together, pool ideas and become more attuned to each other's needs. As for missionary records, our holdings are limited and enquirers are referred, when we cannot help further, either to the Methodist Church Overseas Division or to the School of Oriental and African Studies.

CURRENT PROJECTS

In conclusion, I would just like briefly to touch on two current projects which should greatly improve accessibility and knowledge of our Methodist archival holdings. As many of you will know, in April 1990 a joint project was begun between the John Rylands University Library, the Methodist Church and the Nineteenth-Century Short Title Catalogue, to catalogue and machine-readable form, nineteenth century collections within the Methodist Archives and Research Centre. Already, c.7,500 records of eighteenth century items from the Methodist Archives had been contributed to the ESTC. In the case of the NSTC project, it was decided to focus on the pamphlet collections in the Archives. The nineteenth century runs of the 'Chronological set' of pamphlets covering the period 1562 and 1965 mentioned earlier, have now been fully catalogued by the projects staff member at Manchester, Mrs Brenda MacDougall. The Methodist Reform pamphlets and also the important Hobill Collection and the Richmond College Library Collection have been catalogued in the same way. Copies of the full catalogue of pamphlets are now available on request.

Finally, there is an essential link between this project and The People called Methodists IDC microfiche project being edited and co-ordinated by Dr Field as part of an international advisory panel also including Professor Frank Baker, Mrs Sheila Himsworth and Dr John Vickers. The IDC microfiche project aims to provide a documentary history of the Methodist Church in Great Britain and Ireland on microfiche. The project is divided into four phases. Full detail on the latest progress can be provided on request and Dr Field compiled a comprehensive progress report in a recent issue of the Journal of the Association of Theological & Philosophical Libraries.

It can confidently be assumed that both projects will make Methodist records more readily available to the wider academic and lay community and help put the John Rylands University Library and the Methodist Archives in particular more than ever 'on the map'.

The Library is to mount an exhibition in the late Summer of 1994 with the title, 'Charles Wesley – Sweet Singer of Methodism'. This will use original manuscripts and printed books, many of which have never been shown in public before, to illustrate the significance of the life and work of Charles Wesley. A facsimile version of this exhibition will be shown at the New Room in Bristol in May, and it is hoped at the Museum of Methodism in City Road, and other Methodist historical sites. Sponsorship for the facsimile exhibition is being sought from several quarters. Negotiations are also under way for certain items from the Lawson Collection in the Methodist Archives to be displayed at the new exhibition site of the Museum of Labour History in Manchester in the second half of 1994.

NOTE

This article by Dr Peter Nockles of the Methodist Church Archives of The John Rylands University Library of Manchester was originally delivered at the annual conference of the Religious Archives Group of the Society of Archivists at Wesley College, Bristol, on 14 September 1992. It is reprinted here, with some minor updating amendments, by kind permission of Dr Nockles and the Religious Archives Group, to whom the copyright jointly belongs.

CATHOLIC CHURCH ARCHIVES IN SOUTH AFRICA

Joy B. Brain

The Catholic archives in South Africa differ from those in Britain and in the older countries of Europe and the Americas in that they go back only to the beginning of the nineteenth century. They differ also in the variety of languages in which the documents are written – Portuguese, French, German, Italian, Dutch, Afrikaans, Zulu, Sotho, Xhosa and other African languages, as well as Latin and English.

Prior to the arrival of the Dutch in 1652, Portuguese, English and Dutch vessels called regularly at the Cape of Good Hope on their way to and from the East. Accounts of these visits are given by a number of writers and it is from these that a few snippets of information about the Catholic Church can be gathered. Best known of these visitors are Bartholomew Dias and Vasco Da Gama and the information concerning their visits and actions comes from various Portuguese manuscripts. The published work of Joao de Barros (1496-1570) makes it clear that both explorers carried Franciscan chaplains, probably one on each vessel, and certainly Mass must have been said all along the coast of Africa in the fifteenth century.

Dias called at various natural harbours along the west coast giving them the names of the saints on whose feast day the ships entered the harbour e.g. St Barbara, St Brendan, St Helena, Cabo de Maria Immaculata (Walvis Bay) and Sao Bras (Mossel Bay). His expedition probably reached the Chalumna River and not the Great Fish as previously thought. At Ilheo da Santa Cruz (Holy Cross Island), in the vicinity of Algoa Bay, he erected one of his padroes, dedicated to St Gregory, and here Mass was said for the first time in southern Africa. Then, at the insistence of his crew, he reluctantly turned back and reached Portugal at the end of 1488. He planted padraos on both the outward and the return journey and Professor Eric Axelson found the remains of one of these crosses at Kwaaihoek in 1939. Others were at Cape Point and near Angra Pequena.

Da Gama made two voyages. The first left the Tagus on 8 July 1497 and the account of the voyage is to be found in a roteira or log book which has been preserved. Da Gama's ships followed the route along the west coast, rounded the Cape on 22 November 1497, landed at Sao Bras (Mossel Bay) and, during a two week sojourn there, had some distant contact with Khoi Khoi living there. He continued around the coast of southern Africa, sighting the Pondoland and Natal coasts in December 1497.

Brown¹ notes that da Gama "took a most solemn oath on the banner of the Order of Christ that he would carry the faith wherever he went; nor has anyone since gone to South Africa with more religious intentions". However, credit for the erection of the first chapel is given to Joao da Nova who visited Mossel Bay in 1501-02; the walls of this primitive building were still standing in 1576 when Manuel de Mesquita Perestrello called there². Da Gama set out on his second voyage in 1502, by which time Mossel Bay had become an established watering and resting place and 'post office', and it is believed that the crews of most visiting ships made use of the chapel.

Apart from the published accounts of the voyages of the Portuguese mariners, documents concerning the Cape of Good Hope and other parts of the South African coastline were housed in the national archives in Lisbon. It was here, working in the 1890s, that the historian G.M. Theal sought and eventually found valuable archival material relevant to the early history of South Africa and its indigenous peoples as seen from Portuguese eyes. Some twenty years later a priest, Father Sidney Welch, searched the Portuguese national archives again, this time for church documents concerning the Cape of Good Hope and Natal. Like Theal, he undertook extensive archival research long before the days of photocopies. They had no choice but to copy documents and references by hand, a system requiring enormous dedication and careful checking to avoid the introduction of all sorts of errors of transcription, especially as both men were working in a foreign tongue. In time Welch became a great admirer of Portuguese colonization and wrote six volumes on its history, emphasizing the role played by missionaries.³ Theal was even more industrious, collecting documents of all kinds, editing and publishing them in series. His Records of South-East Africa,⁴ include details of shipwrecks along the Natal and Transkei coasts, the desperate attempts by the survivors to stay alive in inhospitable and dangerous country, and the efforts of the priests on board to erect some kind of shelter in which Mass could be offered and prayers said. Likewise, nearly all the information available to researchers working on the history of Catholicism at the Cape in the first years of the nineteenth century can be found in Theal's Records of the Cape Colony, published in thirty-six volumes⁵. The historians working on the Catholic Church in South Africa, then, are dependent on published archival material for the early period, while the archivist has a set of printed and indexed documents and very little else.

Although the first European settlers arrived at the Cape in 1652, a full century before Europeans settled permanently in Australia and New Zealand, the Catholic Church was established only in the 1830s. The Dutch East India Company, the trading company responsible for the settlement at the Cape, was strongly Calvinist and did not encourage visits from clergy of other denominations, while their policy was to employ no Catholics at any of its trading posts. However, there is no doubt that there were a number of Catholic soldiers in the garrison and perhaps there were also Catholics among the clerks and less important officials, but they were unable to practise their religion openly. It is known that occasionally Catholics visited the French and Portuguese ships when they visited Table Bay and heard Mass on board⁶. In 1685 a party of Jesuit astronomers on their way to Siam, called at Cape town and were well received by the governor. One of the party, Pere Guy Tachard, has left an account of the Catholics he met there and their delight at meeting a priest, albeit clandestinely.

Dislike of Catholics and of their faith continued after the first British occupation of the Cape in 1795 and only in 1804, when the liberal Batavian Republic was in control of the former Dutch colonies, was full religious tolerance permitted under the Church Ordinance of that year. A group of priests were immediately sent from Holland to serve the needs of the Catholic soldiers in the garrison; but shortly afterwards, in 1806, the British re-occupied the Cape and the priests were returned to Europe with the soldiers and officials, apparently on the orders of the British general, David Baird.

In 1814, under the terms of the Treaty of London, the Cape of Good Hope became a British colony. Shortly afterwards, as a result of the efforts of Bishop Poynter of the London district, Dom Edward Bede Slater OSB was appointed vicar-apostolic of the Cape of Good Hope. However, he was not permitted by the British government to take up his appointment and, in 1819, his jurisdiction was extended to include the islands of Mauritius and Madagascar, with his headquarters in the former. On his way to take up the appointment, he called at the Cape of Good Hope, leaving an Irish priest, Patrick Scully, to care for the spiritual needs of the Catholics there⁸. The next seventeen years were stormy in every sense with priests unable to get along with the newly appointed churchwardens, a burden of debt contracted in the construction of the first church in Cape Town and the final disaster when the church was washed away in the floods of 1837. For a few years a military chaplain was able to hold the few Catholics together until, in 1835, he too became disillusioned and departed for Europe. Records of this period are to be found most readily in Theal's Records of the Cape Colony, with the originals in the Public Record Office or the Cape Archives.

The history of the Catholic Church in South Africa really begins with the creation of the Vicariate of the Cape of Good Hope in 1837 and the consecration of the first vicar apostolate, Patrick Raymond Griffith, an Irish Dominican of considerable energy and talent, in Dublin on 24 August in that year. Bishops Thomas Grimley (1862-71) and John Leonard (1872-1908), were readers and collectors of books and made efforts to assemble relevant documents from Father Welch's Portuguese collection and also from the archives of the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda, as these became available to researchers. From Griffith's time the Cape Town archdiocesan archives began to look much like any other church archive, with diaries, correspondence, reports on various parishes and sodalities, registers, financial and statistical records. Bishop Leonard, in his twenty-six years in office, conducted a voluminous correspondence with his fellow bishops in South Africa and with colleagues overseas, as well as writing historical accounts of the Cape vicariate from the earliest times. These archives are well looked after although for long periods there was no trained archivist, the staff doing the best they could to keep the files in order.

In 1847 the Cape of Good hope vicariate was split into two separate sections, with the Eastern vicariate centred around Grahamstown and Port Elizabeth. Another Irishman, Aidan Devereux, was appointed first vicar apostolic of the Eastern districts from 1847 until his sudden death in 1854. Devereux began a codex historicus for his vicariate, known as the Chronicon of the Eastern vicariate, and this was continued by his successors, Bishops Moran, Ricards and Strobino, providing a detailed and valuable account of the early years of the vicariate. Devereux, who had a vigorous literary style, founded the first Catholic newspaper, The Cape Colonist, assisted by Father David Ricards who later became the editor. Devereux used the columns of this paper to counter attacks on Catholicism, of which there were many at this time, and also to introduce subjects of wider interest, political and literary. The diocesan archives at Port Elizabeth contain material relating to the history of the Eastern vicariate, the correspondence of the various bishops, the Chronicon and the records of the parishes and the statistical returns.

When Natal was annexed by the Cape Colony in 1845 there was only a handful of white settlers, some of whom had survived the Boer-Zulu disputes of 1838-39, and a garrison of British and colonial troops who had been brought up from the Cape Colony. In the next few years over 4000 settlers arrived from Britain and from Germany as part of private immigration schemes. Bishop Devereux was responsible for sending one of his priests, Thomas Murphy, to investigate the number of Catholics among the soldiers and settlers and to assess their situation. Murphy arrived in November 1850 and remained about six months, making contact with Catholics in the two main centres, Pietermaritzburg and Durban and acquiring sites for churches. His enthusiastic reports about the economic prospects for the new colony resulted in the establishment of the Natal vicariate under the control of the Missionary Oblates of Mary Immaculate. The boundaries of this vicariate took in an enormous expanse of southern Africa, including present day Swaziland, Lesotho, part of Botswana, the Transkei, Griqualand West, the Transvaal and the Orange Free State. And this territory had initially one bishop and a handful of priests, all French speaking and without missionary experience⁹. The first vicar apostolic, Francois Allard (1852-74), kept a letter book from 1851 to 1862, Memoires (of the Catholic mission) from 1856 to 1869, Actus Administrationis from 1865 to 1869 and Deliberations du Conseil 1854 to 1857 and 1871. Various papers, such as the Acts of Visitation by his superior in 1874 have also survived. About thirty years ago the originals of these documents were sent to the generalate of the OMI in Rome, but photographic facsimiles were retained in Durban in the archdiocesan archives which are now housed in a modern air conditioned building. The next bishop was Charles Jolivet (1874-1903) who kept an interesting diary, but left a disappointing collection of documents, consisting of an incomplete set of draft correspondence, miscellaneous papers and statistical reports. Even more disappointing are the papers of the third bishop, Henri Delalle (1904-1946) who left a set of appointment books rather than diaries and a few files of letters. Delalle had no secretary or other clerical assistance and each morning after breakfast he dealt with his correspondence rapidly. His practice was to read each letter, and turning it over scribble his reply on the back of the letter itself. It was then posted and both letter and answer disappeared from the records. When he initiated the correspondence he used a carbon book and since his handwriting was small and the pressure light his letter books are now illegible. When Delalle resigned in 1946 he was replaced by Bishop (later Archbishop) Denis Hurley whose voluminous papers and correspondence make up most of the contents of the Durban Archdiocesan Archives. He retired at the end of 1992 and his papers are now being sorted in the hope that he will now write his memoirs after forty-six eventful years of public life. The author of this article is the part-time archivist for the Durban archdiocese and the project to computerize the baptismal and marriage records for the entire diocese and to microfilm the originals is far advanced. A great deal of time is spent in tracing baptismal and marriage certificates; there are also numerous requests from genealogists and it is hoped that computerization will make the process more rapid and more accurate.

The extensive territory included in the original Natal vicariate encouraged regular sub-division as soon as a part or district became viable. The discovery of diamonds, for example, led to the formation of the Orange Free State and Kimberley vicariate; the gold discovery resulted in the Transvaal being cut off from Natal in 1886, subsequently becoming the most heavily populated area of South Africa. Lesotho and Swaziland were separated, as was Mariannhill and Zululand. Then the Transvaal itself was subdivided, with apostolic prefectures, and later dioceses, coming into being in the northern, eastern and western Transvaal. At the present time, twenty-four dioceses of the total of thirty-four, have been carved out of the original Natal vicariate.

The problems for the archivists and researchers resulting from frequent division and sub-division are obvious. Even the tracing of baptism and marriage certificates becomes difficult, while correspondence relating to a church, or parish or school must often be sought in the original diocese and when that fails, in each of the subsequent ones. Another difficulty is that the names of churches, e.g. St Theresa, tend to be repeated in the newly formed vicariate and dealing, as we do, with thousands of Catholics to whom English is either unknown or is not the mother tongue, and who remember St Theresa's church and nothing more.¹⁰

Another uniquely South African problem arose from the political situation after 1948. Under the Group Areas Act thousands of families were removed from one area and relocated in another, often far from their original parish and birthplace. The churches, schools and other facilities in the old place of residence were closed or rented to the local authority and new ones had to be erected in the resettlement areas. In these circumstances tracing church records becomes a real problem – were the registers returned to the diocesan archives, and if so which one, or were they sent to the new church when it was built some time later, or are they missing altogether? Unfortunately, even the priests who take the question of church records seriously are faced with consistent overwork and a lack of money to pay for trained assistants. This is particularly true in the mission stations where there is at yet no electricity, computerization of records is impossible and the handwritten copies sent in to the diocesan archives are frequently difficult to read and to file.

The diocesan archives in the older dioceses are generally well organised and staffed by part-time archivists, many of whom are voluntary workers. Some contain extensive collections of photographs, not all of which are indexed yet. The best collection of secondary sources, photographs, Catholic newspapers and journals, books with a Catholic theme or author, is the Catholic History Bureau in Johannesburg. This collection was put together by Father John Brady over many years and only in the last year has it been provided with a new and spacious building and a librarian. Father Brady has a remarkable memory, and historians and archivists from all over the country ask his help in identifying old photographs and portraits and he can recall the day and even the hour on which some Catholic event took place sixty years ago. Johannesburg diocesan records are thin because the archives and library were destroyed in the 1920s when the Bishop's house caught fire, making the secondary sources preserved in the Catholic History Bureau particularly valuable.

Since 1837 a considerable number of religious orders and congregations have worked in South Africa and at present there are over seventy-five communities of religious sisters and nuns. These include teaching and nursing sisters, those engaged in social work and care, such as the poor Sisters of Nazareth of Hammersmith and the Good Shepherd Sisters. Contemplative nuns are to be found in all four provinces, including Carmelites, Poor Clare Capuchins and Spanish Dominican sisters. Each of these communities has a mother house either in South Africa or in Europe where their records are preserved.¹¹ Of the religious orders, Benedictines, Jesuits, Franciscans, Dominicans, Premonstratensians and Servites are active, while Trappists laid the foundation of the Mariannhill Missionaries at the beginning of the century. In addition, there are at present about thirty congregations, most of which are working on the missions. There are also five communities of teaching brothers. Researchers have a difficult task finding information from these many sources, or indeed of knowing which one to approach. Some congregations have trained archivists and are well organised, but the majority have not. In a few instances archives are looked after by elderly retired religious who often have no experience or interest in information retrieval and are placed in the post when they cannot continue with their usual occupation.

The work of evangelization in South Africa is in full swing, and in some places the results have been remarkably successful. There are, as stated above, numerous congregations and communities at work in both rural and urban areas. With the rapidly growing Black population there is a constant demand for churches, schools, clinics, creches, pastoral and catechetical centres and a chronic shortage of religious and of money. In this situation, it is difficult to persuade bishops and superiors that the efficient organisation of their archives should be a priority and that funds should be made available for trained staff, air conditioning, strongrooms, computerization and so on. There is no doubt that most Catholic archivists in South Africa are isolated from their fellows both here and abroad and tend to become discouraged. Visits from overseas archivists, especially those working in diocesan archives, would be generally welcomed while seminars on new methods and new ideas would be most useful. Perhaps the council or annual conference of the Catholic Archives Society could consider this suggestion?

IN OUR KEEPING: ARCHIVES OF THE CONGREGATION OF IRISH DOMINICAN SISTERS, CABRA

Sister Dominique Horgan, OP

The Archives of the Congregation of Irish Dominican Sisters span four centuries. The earliest document dates from 1644, and is to be found in the archives of the Dominican Sisters in Galway City. Other early documents are in the archives of the Cabra Convent in Dublin, which became the Mother House of the Congregation, in time. A number of convents were founded from Cabra in Ireland, North America, South Africa, Australia, and more recently, in Latin America. To date, all documentation has remained in the convents of origin. The Lisbon Convent, in Portugal, gave their archives and artefacts to the National Archives in Lisbon during the Salazar revolution.

In 1928, the Irish Convents amalgamated to form what is now recognised as the Congregation of the Irish Dominican Sisters, Cabra, with the exception of the two oldest foundations, in Galway City and Lisbon, Portugal. These joined the Congregation separately at later dates. In 1938, South Africa amalgamated with the Congregation and was established as a Region. In 1978, further organisation established four other Regions, Ireland, Latin America, Louisiana and Portugal. Each Region has its own Regional Archives, as well as local convent archives.

At present, there is an Archivium Generale containing documents from 1928 when the Congregation was established, with some documents previous to that date. Since August 1993, the Archivium Generale is located in a new purpose-built Archivium at the Generalate House, in Dublin. The main archival material of the origins of the Congregation remains in the respective convents or regions of their origin.

WHY NOT BURN THE STUFF!

On the morning the General Archives were being moved to the new Archivium, someone watching the loading of the carrier and my solicitous concern for the boxes and artefacts, remarked - why not bum the stuff!. This raises the question why do we keep archives at all?

The fundamental reason for keeping archives is that they serve us as a memory. As individuals people will dysfunction without a memory, so too, will an institution/organisation. Archival materials, documentation and artefacts, provide recall of the origins, the spirit and wellsprings of a heritage to which an institution belongs. A rich memory introduces personalities and events which help build up a sense of identity and self-worth, and becomes a moment of encouragement and enlightenment and of love for a heritage rightly laid claim to.

UNDERLYING PHILOSOPHY

Archives are the authentic documents created by the very life and activities of members of an institution since its foundation. Let me quote from a document from the Centre of Research of Religious History in Paris in 1969 on "The Archives of Religious Congregations of Women". "The Archives of a Religious Congregation have importance under a double title: on the one hand they witness to a fact of civilisation and constitute a page of general history, while on the other hand for Christians they preserve the tracing of the action of the living God. They are treasures of the Church and constitute a spiritual nourishment for successive generations of the people of God". It was in this light that Pope John XXIII had wished to renew interest in religious archives (going back to the charism of the founder etc.) so as to give solid assistance to renewal. He acknowledged that archives are particularly important as a source of renewal, enabling members of Religious Congregations to keep in touch with their roots, historically and spiritually, ensuring renewal and adaptation within the spirit and history of the Congregation.

These values and beliefs raise consciousness of moral obligation to the records, to those who created them and to future users of these documents. Responsible custody involves developing policies and procedures to structure the archives, to ensure a consistency and effectiveness in their management and use.

Since the late 1960's there has been growing awareness of religious archives and many societies of Catholic Archivists have been established to promote their care and preservation and to help archivists become aware of their special ecclesial role. In recent years too, social historians have taken an increased interest in religious archives. One social historian has described the sources of Religious Archives as "human, three-dimensional" that makes good social history so meaningful and enjoyable.¹ Religious archives have also been caught up in what Michael Cook calls "the archival revolution" (which gathered momentum after the second world war), with many Religious Congregations/Institutes legislating for the formal setting up of archives.

ESTABLISHING THE ARCHIVES

I was given the General Archives portfolio by the Congregation in March 1987. One of our communities agreed to give a room to house the archives, temporarily, as the Generalate was moving to another location in the city. The records arrived in steel cabinets, apple boxes and old trunks. There was no archival structure at all. The immediate task was to weed these records for archival material. As the material was worked on, it was put into collections and roughly classified and boxed in archival boxes and folders. Likewise photographic and newsprint materials were similarly dealt with. In this way the bulk of the material was reduced by about one third, this one third not being archival in any sense of the word. Incredibly, this work took four years on an average of three hours per week. As I lecture on a fulltime basis this was the maximum amount of time I could give to the archives. During the summer vacation of 1987 I attended a one week course at University College, Dublin, in Records and Archival Management and annually I have attended the Conference of the Catholic Archives Society. Both of these have been singularly helpful in understanding archival procedures and enabling me to organize the archives to a professional level.

In the course of 1989/90, I drew up an Archives Policy Document. This document creates a flexible framework to form the basis for archival procedures in the various Regions of the Congregation and at the various local levels. The document

- (a) defined archives
- (b) defined the role and functions of the Archivist
- (c) established Directives providing the Archivist with details in the exercise of duties, responsibilities and functions
- (d) established working procedures governing access
- (e) defined the authority of the Archivist.

During 1991/92, an archival consultant was engaged for approximately three months, to assist in the tedious and mammoth task of listing our holdings. She further weeded and listed documents. An arrangement system was imposed on the holdings which reflects the structures and functions of the Congregation. The bulk of the collection dates from the 1920's and consists mainly of constitutional and administrative data as well as records pertaining to the congregational apostolate and the domestic life of individual houses. The collection has been given the reference acronym OPG - Dominican Generalate - which serves to maintain and reinforce its identity. It is mainly document and print based but does include some non-written material, inter alia, photographs, film and slides. The collection is housed in a purpose built repository in the Generalate House, Harold's Cross, and is available for consultation on request.

CLASSIFICATION

An alpha-numeric classification system has been used. The primary arrangement levels are alphabetically coded A-J but the documents are listed numerically. Sub-numbering is in use where expansive or evolving items occur. This provides for the addition of data without disturbing numerical sequences and is particularly relevant to Series B which deals with the post-1978 regionalised congregation. To access the collection and locate data one consults the Content & Structure. The primary and subsidiary arrangement levels are signposts to the main body of the collection. Data here has been arranged and listed by hierarchical structure, subject matter, function and document type, and listed chronologically. Each arrangement level has an accompanying page number. These pages contain the descriptions of each item and their reference numbers. These are the numbers that the searcher gives to the record custodian to retrieve the material.

DESCRIPTIVE PRACTICES

The descriptive list gives a summary of each item in the collection using either a single or compound descriptive format. Single descriptions are used for lone items or items of individual significance, e.g. a letter from A to B. Compound descriptions are used for inter-related material e.g. correspondence between A and B. Some descriptions, particularly in Series A, may appear rather extensive. This arises from the quality of the collection and the need to ensure that interesting features are not overlooked by researchers. Cross references are used to facilitate comprehensive exploitation of the material. Abbreviations have been avoided and on the few occasions on which they appear they can be easily interpreted from their context. Printed material is underlined. Finally, the use of square brackets denotes information which is not contained in the document but is provided by the archivist.

ARRANGEMENT

The arrangement reflects the structure, functions and workings of the creating body. This collection is therefore divided into ten series.

A. Amalgamated Structures. This is the most voluminous and significant series and covers congregational amalgamation and the constitutional and administrative activities of 1928-1978.

B. Regional Structures. This deals with the administrative and constitutional changes leading to and flowing from regionalisation in 1978. The diminution of the Generalate's day-to-day administrative role and the provision of greater regional autonomy is reflected in the nature and volume of archives accessions.

C. Formation & Personnel. Includes policy documents, vocation literature, personnel literature, books of profession, regional and congregational directories, surveys and works by individual sisters.

D. Apostolate. Deals mainly with the Education Ministry and makes provision for changes to the apostolate.

E. Houses of the Congregation: Ireland. The houses are listed chronologically by date of foundation. The nature and volume of material varies from house to house. Accessions of closed houses are generally comprehensive. The remainder consists in the main of correspondence and data on apostolate.

F. Dominican Order & Family. Comprises correspondence with Irish Dominican fathers and Masters General with papers of national and international Dominican Chapters and gatherings.

G. Inter-Congregational Relations.

H. Correspondence

I. Annals. Annals in this context comprise not only the formal written annals sent annually to the Generality but all associated records. These include records of memorable events, celebrations, anniversaries, commemorative publications, personal memoirs, press clippings and photographs. The bulk of the data, as in the rest of the collection, is of Irish and South African origin and provides a more intimate picture of congregational life.

J. Archival Library. Contains congregational, historical and spiritual works, research theses of the Sisters and some publications of curiosity value.

RESEARCH VALUE

The archives will be of interest in the main to congregational researchers and historians and should help to increase awareness of the Congregation's evolution and identity. Interest may also be expressed by social scientists and educationalists and the ever increasing number of researchers analyzing the contribution to and influence of the religious in Irish life.

CATHOLIC RECORDS IN THE NATIONAL LIBRARY OF WALES

Daniel Huws

Investigation of the family roots of the congregation at mass in a Welsh parish would normally reveal that while there might be many with deep Welsh roots those roots would seldom be the Catholic ones. Not that such a finding would be of a kind peculiar to Wales. There were in Wales special factors at work, most notably the language — the Anglican Church on its first introduction was doubly alien; but the lack of continuity is similar to that in much of England. Readers of Welsh Catholic history soon come to feel with Archbishop McGrath when he wrote: 'The whole tale of the disappearance of the Catholic Faith from Wales is unutterably sad'. This despite notable instances of continuity in some families, Vaughan of Courtfield, Jones of Llanarth, Mostyn of Talacre, and even more remarkably, the relatively humble Havards of Breconshire, who preserved not only their faith but also their language.

Crippled in 1679, Welsh recusancy went into slow decline, even in its heartland in Monmouthshire and the neighbouring Welsh parts of Herefordshire. A critical falling away in the second half of the eighteenth century was due in part to the drift from rural communities to new industrial ones and in part perhaps to the allure of Methodism. Welsh Catholicism became, in many respects, a new creation after 1800. Until 1800 the names in registers, few though the numbers may be, are mostly Welsh, as were the priests: Welsh was still the first language of many of the faithful. After 1800 the Welsh names are soon swamped and the Welsh language became a matter of little concern to the Church.

In the absence of a public record office for Wales, the National Library has, from its foundation, undertaken many of the functions of such an office. It is the repository of many official archives as well as private ones. The full range of holdings will be apparent in the guide to the Department of Manuscripts and Records to be published in 1994. No major deposit of official Catholic records has yet been made, but agreement has been reached for the deposit of the pre-1916 archives of the diocese of Cardiff (previously, the diocese of Newport, and prior to that Newport and Menevia). These records date back to the 1840s. Most registers remain in their parishes (as can be discovered from Michael Gandy, Catholic Missions and Registers 1700-1880 (1993), vol. 3. The Brecon register, beginning in 1799, came to the National Library as a harbinger.

When we turn to official records of the State, the National Library has much to offer, by way of both court records and records of the Established Church. Wales, after the Acts of Union of 1536 and 1542, was brought wholly under English law but was at the same time given its own system of courts. Those relevant to our present concerns were the Court of Wales and the Marches, a conciliar court of medieval origin, located at Ludlow, whose records have almost entirely failed to survive; Great Sessions, to which we shall now turn; and Quarter Sessions, which differed in no important respect from its English counterpart.

Great Sessions was a court established by the second Act of Union in 1542, abolished in 1830, and based on the counties. Twelve Welsh shires (Monmouthshire was excepted and came within the Oxford assize circuit) were arranged in four circuits: North Wales (Anglesey, Caernarfon and Merioneth), Chester (Flint, Denbigh and Montgomery), Brecon (Brecon, Radnor and Glamorgan), and Carmarthen (Carmarthen, Cardigan and Pembroke). Sessions were held twice yearly in each county. The court had not only common law jurisdiction, civil and criminal, but also an equity side, albeit not a very active one. It is of course the Crown (criminal) side of the court's work which interests the historian of recusancy. The Crown side of Great Sessions corresponds closely to that of assizes in England. For the historian, one striking difference is in the superior quality of the surviving records of Great Sessions: some circuits preserve a fuller and wider range of documentation than do any assize records. Outstandingly, the best preserved Great Sessions records are those of the Chester circuit, surviving almost intact from 1542.

After spending half a century in the Public Record Office, many of the minor post-1660 classes of Great Sessions records (scheduled for destruction by the PRO) were transferred to Aberystwyth in 1909. The main group followed in 1962. Most of the latter group is listed in PRO Lists and Indexes, vols, iv and xl, and briefly described in Guide to the Public Record Office (London, 1963), i, pp.168-71. The most convenient short guide is the current National Library of Wales pamphlet Records of the Court of Great Sessions. All lists and guides will be superseded by A Guide to the Records of Great Sessions in Wales, by Glyn Parry, now in the press (to be published by the National Library).

We shall restrict ourselves here to comment on the records of the Crown side. The essential record is the file of documents made up by the Clerk of the Crown for each county for each sessions. The name adopted for these by the Public Record Office was Gaol Files. Subsidiary to the Gaol Files were records compiled by clerks for their convenience recording the Crown business of each sessions in summary form. To historians, as to clerks, these provide quick finding aids. Unfortunately, they were not necessarily kept for all counties for all periods. What survive are series of Calendar Rolls for Radnor (1553-1659), Glamorgan (1553-1601), Cardigan (1541-1602) and Pembroke (1541-1674), and a series of Crown Books, analogous in content, for Flintshire (1564-1756). Calendar Rolls and Crown Books, where they exist, serve as indexes to the contents of the Gaol Files. In both classes, as in the Gaol Files themselves, returns of recusants will be found. These are lists which may be used in parallel with those which are to be found in the Public Record Office in the Pipe Rolls and Recusant Rolls.

To return to the essential record, the Gaol File. One large membrane, commonly used as a wrapper, contains the calendar of prisoners, in effect an index to the criminal actions to come to court. The calendar is particularly valuable also for the subsequent annotation, indicating verdicts, sentences and later action. On the file are the formal documents associated with each prisoner: indictments, presentments, informations (where actions were referred to Great Sessions by the Council of Wales and the Marches), recognizances, jury lists and, if the searcher is in luck, examinations. The examinations, if they survive, are the cream: written records of examinations of prisoners and witnesses made before JPs. Their survival depended on the filing practice of the circuit. On the Chester circuit, examinations were filed fairly regularly on the Gaol File; they are notably fully filed for the period 1580-1640. Yet on the Brecon circuit, we meet no examinations before 1720. Up till that date they were evidently filed apart and because of their transient value (from the legal standpoint) were not retained in the long term. The survival of examinations means, for instance, that we have detailed information about the several trials of Saint Richard Gwyn at Wrexham. The value of the examinations in the Great Sessions records can be underlined, not only in the context of recusant history, by the fact that a mere two examinations survive in the English Home Circuit assizes records for the reigns of Elizabeth I and James I.

The value of the recusant lists in the Great Sessions records may be seen in the contrast between those for Monmouthshire and Glamorgan in the reigns of Elizabeth I and James I, published by the South Wales and Monmouthshire Record Society (Publications 3 (1954) and 4 (1957)). Those for Monmouthshire (that the recusants are so much more numerous in that county is another matter) are entirely dependent on the Pipe Rolls and Recusant Rolls: those for Glamorgan draw more on Great Sessions than on the other sources.

The other local court to whose records the historian can turn for information about recusants is that of Quarter Sessions. With the exception of Caernarfonshire, no Welsh county has Quarter Sessions records worth speaking of before the mid-seventeenth century. The Welsh Quarter Sessions records are in the county record offices. But two groups, now in the National Library, which survived in unofficial custody, deserve mention here. The Denbighshire Quarter Sessions records for the second half of the seventeenth century survived by virtue of their having found a home among the munitions of the Myddeltons of Chirk Castle. Preserved likewise among the archives of the Morgans of Tredegar are stray Monmouthshire Quarter Sessions records, including recusant lists for 1696, 1706 and 1723.

The diocesan and capitular records of the Church in Wales are deposited in the National Library. These include the surviving records of the Established Church. Like many Welsh archives, they have their disappointing aspects. Very little other than bishops' registers survives from before the Restoration. However, for the century and a half after 1660, the period of the saddest decline, the diocesan records offer a useful source, particularly so the visitation records. These survive from 1663 in the diocese of St Davids, 1675 in Bangor, 1682 in St Asaph and 1703 in Llandaff. In the earlier part of the period the churchwardens' presentments provide the best source; later, the visitation articles of inquiry, with their written answers, commonly include questions about papist recusants together with protestant dissenters. Information of a kindred nature may be found in the few surviving examples of bishops' notitiae, all for the diocese of St Asaph.

By the period we are speaking of there was in many places, it is recognised, a high degree of tolerance of Catholics by Anglicans; sometimes even a blurring of distinctions. In such a climate Anglican parish registers can become an interesting source for the history of recusant families. The National Library holds many of the surviving parish registers and all the surviving bishops' transcripts for the Welsh dioceses. The guide to their location is Parish Registers of Wales, edited by C. Williams and J. Watts-Williams (Aberystwyth, 1986).

Another matter touched by ambiguity was that of ecclesiastical patronage. Preventative measures notwithstanding, presentations to benefices were made by Catholics. The diocesan archives provide the primary evidence.

A large part of the archival holdings of the National Library consists of family and estate records. Again, as with official archives, they may offer glimpses of recusancy from both inside and out; on the one hand the archives of Catholic families, on the other those of the landed families which furnished the local ruling class, providing the MPs, the members of the Council of Wales and the Marches, the JPs. By the nature of things, the latter type of archive often yields the most unequivocal testimony.

There is no archive in the National Library of any of the main north Wales recusant families. Three major archives of powerful non-Catholic families, each rich in early correspondence, contain relevant material: those of Wynn of Gwydir, Maurice of Clennau (in the Brogyntyn archive) and Myddelton of Chirk Castle. The most magnificent of all mid-Wales estate archives is that of Powis Castle; the Herberts, earls of Powis, were staunchly Catholic until 1748.

South Wales, unlike the north, is represented in the National Library by the archives (estate records, it has to be said, more than personal papers) of several Catholic families: the Lords Abergavenny, Vaughan of Courtfield, Milbourne of Wonastow, Baker-Gabb of Abergavenny, all in the south east, and Barlow of Slebech in the west. Three massive estate archives of potential value are those of the firmly anti-Catholic Morgans of Tredegar (which include many papers relating to public affairs), those of the Dukes of Beaufort (embracing the Raglan Castle estates of the Somerset family, Marquesses of Worcester, Catholic until 1667), and those of the Marquesses of Bute.

While personal papers and correspondence in some of these archives may turn out to be disappointing in quantity, the plain estate records remain a rewarding and much under-used source, particularly the fine series of rentals of the Raglan and Powis Castle estates, each in its day a notorious harbourer of recusants. Even allowing for a degree of panicky exaggeration in a letter of a vicar of Welshpool to his bishop in 1736 which reports that 'my Lord Powis owns the greater part of the town and parish, and all his tenants and domesticks are of the same communion with himself', the remark should be enough to remind us of the potential value of a series such as the Powis Castle estate rentals.

English recusancy generated a vigorous stream of literature for lay people. It was harder for the Welsh, if only for economic reasons. A few books in Welsh were printed on the continent and a heroic attempt was made to print in Wales: a secret press in a cave near Llandudno managed to produce one book (the earliest book of any kind to be printed in Wales) before in 1588 its location was betrayed to the authorities. For want of printed books, much Catholic literature had to be propagated by manuscript. In such a situation literary archives are particularly significant. The surviving literary material is mostly in the National Library. This is not the place to go into detail, but it might be said that a look at the bibliographies of Welsh Literature will reveal a very worthy output of recusant writing until about 1680. Thereafter, it dries to a trickle. The comment has been made, fairly enough, that the Welsh Catholics were spiritually starved to death, deprived of priests and deprived of books.

A word might be said about those responsible for the transmission of Welsh recusant literature in manuscript. There were on the one hand those who appear to have worked, semiprofessionally at least, as scribes. The two most notable flourished in the late sixteenth and early seventeenth century, Llywelyn Sion of Glamorgan and Wiliam Dafydd Llywelyn of Breconshire. Then there were the educated laymen of a literary or antiquarian bent: Thomas Wiliems, the first great Welsh lexicographer, Dr John Davies (alias Sion Dafydd Rhys), the Italian-trained doctor of medicine, the much persecuted John Edwards of Chirk, and others. There are, besides, the often anonymous commonplace-books in whose privacy the owners entered the poems which reveal their Roman sympathy if not allegiance, often setting contemporary recusant poems alongside medieval devotional poetry. The last of this line of Welsh Catholic anthologies is that of David Powell (Dewi Nantbran), a Franciscan who was responsible for several Catholic publications in Welsh and who died in 1781.

Until the Cardiff diocesan archives have been received and catalogued the National Library will be able to offer no major archive representing the renewed Catholicism of the nineteenth century. Printed material, including periodicals and newspapers, is of course another matter. The only Catholic clerical archive, modest as it is, is that of John Davies, a turbulent priest in Brecon around 1860 (NLW. MSS. 19910-22). Small parts of the archive and collection of John Hobson Mathews, the industrious editor of Welsh Catholic records, have reached the National Library; others are in the South Glamorgan Library (Cardiff Central Library). Among twentieth-century archives are the personal papers of a number of Welsh Catholic laymen, including Saunders Lewis and David Jones, the poet and artist.

It could almost go without saying that the manuscript collection of a national library accumulates a large quantity of material which is of archival origin but no longer constitutes part of integral archives. Much such material in the National Library is to be found in its general series of 'NLW Manuscripts', described and indexed in Handlist of Manuscripts in the National Library of Wales (Aberystwyth, 1940- , four volumes to date). Researchers on any aspect of Welsh history will find the indexes to the Handlist worth combing.

Family history inevitably is a main constituent of recusant history. Having custody of many of the primary sources for Welsh family history, including the Church in Wales archives and the pre-1858 Welsh probate records, the National Library has gone out of its way to cater for family historians by the acquisition of other relevant archives in microform; most sources that the searcher might hope for are at hand. A feature of Welsh genealogy is the abundance of pedigree books. The compilations of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries — those relevant to recusant history were largely the work of gentlemen antiquaries (the earlier ones are often the work of bards). Many of these compilations are remarkable for their reliability as well as their extent. Noting that they record the pedigrees of the 'gentry' one must hasten to add that in Wales the 'gentry' might reach quite low in society. A pamphlet Guide to Genealogical Sources in the National Library of Wales is available.

ADVENTURES IN MEXICAN PARISH ARCHIVES

George Herbert Foulkes

Working in Church archives in Latin American countries can be a fascinating adventure and a most gratifying experience. My first contact with parish archives was in 1982, while working in the National Archives of Mexico with a team charged with promoting the conservation and organization of ecclesiastical records.

Our first commission was in the sierra mixe, about six hours drive from the city of Oaxaca, along deserted and unpaved roads, flanked by precipices and forests of tropical fruit trees, such as mameyes, mangoes and bananas, plus an extraordinary variety of orchids. We visited five parishes, about four or five hours drive apart, with different climates and altitudes, but all more or less in the same conditions: hardly any Spanish spoken, no electricity or running water, and where the only food available was beans, coffee and some fruits.

There were obviously no hotels, which meant that we had to sleep on petates (carpets made of straw, used by natives instead of beds) placed in the sacristies, which were dark and humid huts with soil floors. On the first night, it was difficult to sleep as, besides not being a very warm and comfortable room, we had been warned against venomous vipers! We did not see any but, instead, the place was infested with rats.

The churches had long been sacked of all their images and paintings, but what amazed me was that, despite such adverse conditions, documents still survived, although some needed urgent conservation. Among them, we found sacramental books going back to the seventeenth century and grammar books of that period used by the Dominican missionaries to learn the Indian dialects.

In due time, we worked in more civilized parishes in the dioceses of Campecho, San Luis Potosi, Zamora, Mexico City, and several others, where the only unfriendly companions of documents were scorpions, cockroaches, worms or mice. But, in fact, in many parishes there was no chance of finding any of these unpleasant creatures.

There were, though, towns like Chilapa, arid, warm and isolated, which had no running water, or water of any kind, during the ten days I remained there. The archives were in the most deplorable condition and, after fourteen hours work (the sooner I could leave the town the better), one could not even wash one's hands and, to mitigate thirst, the only drink available was Coca Cola.

On another occasion, a religious community asked me to organize the parish archive of Mascota, the place of birth of their founder. On looking at the map, it was a town fairly near Guadalajara, so we departed by car at nine a.m., with the idea of arriving there before lunch time. What the atlas did not tell us was that the route was along an unpaved road crossing eleven rivers with no bridges! We got stuck in one, but were helped out by a group of peasants. At eleven p.m. we saw the lights of Mascota, but we still had to cross the eleventh river, the deepest of them all. We had already decided to spend the night in the car and to wait till next morning when we could walk safely to the town, but were fortunate enough that the car's lights had been seen in the distance by someone. A truck came up, chained up the car, pulled it across the river and towed us all the way to the convent. On our arrival, we learned that a new paved road, with bridges, was to be opened in three days time!

Nevertheless, it was all worthwhile. It was a beautiful place and, on organizing the parish archives, I came across a detailed chronicle of the first communion of 150 children, among them the now Blessed José María Robles, founder of the Sisters.

But the most exciting experience occurred to me in 1985, in San Miguel de Allende, where Mexico's War of Independence began in 1810. I was organizing the parish archive in order to do research on the foundress of the Mexican Sisters of Mercy and was about to finish after several days work when, leaning on a wall, to my astonishment it collapsed, uncovering piles of loose papers that had probably been hidden during the religious persecution in the 1920's. With enormous joy and enthusiasm, I decided to remain there another month, finding letters of Fr Hidalgo and other heroes of Independence, eighteenth century cook books, letters referring to civil wars and French intervention in Mexico, Maximilian of Hapsburg's visit to San Miguel, sketches for the parish church's famous facade, etc.

It was only in more recent years that I became familiar with some parish archives in Mexico City (there are over 400 in the Archdiocese alone). Most of them are well kept. The one that impressed me most was that of the parish annexed to the Cathedral, contained in several thousand archival boxes, with documents going back to 1540.

It is obvious that parishes produce similar types of documents throughout the country and even throughout the world. This made it very easy to establish policies common to all parishes, and to all civil and ecclesiastical bodies that undertake or promote field work in parish archives.

The practice has been to sort the papers into two groups or sections. sacramental and disciplinary. In the sacramental group we place registers of baptisms, confirmations, matrimonial enquiries, marriages and deaths.

In the disciplinary group, we place all other papers, such as books of canon, pastoral letters, correspondence, deeds and lists of members of parish guilds and associations, censuses or 'status animarum', account books, inventories, mass intention books, pastoral visitations, etc. We then place the documents in archival boxes and list the contents of each box (following alphabetical criteria for series and a chronological sequence within each series).

In Mexican parish archives (it should be the same in other Latin American countries), sacramental records remain more or less complete since the foundation of the parish and are, therefore, the main source for statistics, and ethnic and demographic studies up to the mid-nineteenth century. They are also very useful for the history of medicine (death registers mentioning the causes of death), economic researches (marriage enquiries citing the professional activity or employment of the parties and their witnesses), devotions (according to the names given in baptism), etc.

Most parishes have deeds and other documents of confraternities, censuses stating the profession, age, sex, and number of members of each household, and whether they keep the paschal precept or not, deeds of pastoral visitations and edicts. Very few keep correspondence. We list the documents when placing them in the archival boxes, giving the title or description of each item, dates, number of document (if any) within the series, and the reference to the number of the box. Notes are included regarding the state of conservation and special features, such as any important event mentioned or entries in sacramental registers referring to persons of historical signification.

The whole process is photographed in all its stages and a brief introduction is prepared, with historical data regarding the parish, details of how the archives had previously been kept, and the actual work done. It is unfortunate that few parishes have been interested in publishing these inventories. It is a relative simple job to examine and list parish records in this way, but it has nevertheless helped by establishing control over the records, promoted their use in research, and encouraged clergy in the necessary, if tiresome, duty of updating them.

THE ASSOCIATION OF DIOCESAN ARCHIVISTS OF ENGLAND AND WALES

Following its successful launch in 1992 as a forum for Archivists representing the twenty-two dioceses of England and Wales, the Association held two meetings in 1993. The first, in May, took place in Swanwick, after the Catholic Archives Society Annual Conference. It was attended by eleven representatives from eight dioceses, with three apologies. Its main concern was the process leading up to the formation of a Sub-Committee on Roman Catholic Libraries and Archives under the aegis of the Church Art, Architecture and Heritage Committee of the Bishops' Conference. Although contact had previously been established by several members of the Association with the Bishops' Conference Secretariat on this subject, there had been no positive response, leaving the Association concerned that those involved with the formation of the Sub-Committee did not appear to appreciate the effective role played by Diocesan Archivists in safeguarding the patrimony of the Church.

The second meeting of the Association took place in Archbishop's House, Southwark, last September. Eleven representatives attended, with six apologies. It was then reported that the Archivist of Westminster had been invited to join the Sub-Committee, but there was still no clear picture of its structure or aims. All Archivists present agreed to ask their own Bishops to raise the matter at the Hierarchy's October meeting. A response is still awaited.

By way of preparation for this meeting, twelve dioceses had previously agreed to prepare a paper on a chosen topic, all to be assembled in booklet form and distributed to members prior to the meeting. The topics comprised:

Catalogues of archive holdings relating to Districts of Vicars Apostolic and the Early History of the Diocese (Birmingham);

Financing the Establishment of a Diocesan Archive (East Anglia); Clergy Records (Hexham and Newcastle);

Lay Subsidies (Lancaster);

The Correspondence of the Vicars Apostolic 1688 - 1840 (Leeds);

Ongoing Work (Middlesbrough);

Compiling a working index (Northampton);

Microfilming, and microfiche copies for parishes (Nottingham);

Licences, Concessions and Dispensations (Plymouth);

Data-base possibilities (Portsmouth);

Archival sources for Parish Boundaries (Salford);

Research Papers of Bishops, Priests and Others in Southwark Diocesan Archives (Southwark).

This compilation proved helpful as a means of sharing information about work in progress in diocesan archives. The next stage is for various dioceses to collaborate in producing new papers describing general applications.

Correspondence and enquiries should be addressed to the Rev. Francis P. Isherwood, the Association of Diocesan Archivists of England and Wales, St Joseph's Presbytery, 1 Milton Road, Portsmouth, Hants, PO3 6AN.

RELIGIOUS ARCHIVES GROUP CONFERENCE, 1993

Some 45 people attended the 1993 Conference of the Religious Archives Group of the Society of Archivists, held on 13 September at the Friends Meeting House, Euston, London.

Two opening papers dealt with Quaker archives. Edward Milligan gave a concise and interesting outline of Quaker History. Joseph Keith then spoke about Quaker Archives. The two papers complemented each other, the first providing a structure that helped place in time and locality the details of the second paper. A tour of the Library and Archive Rooms completed this part of the Conference.

Before the tour, George McKenzie from the Scottish Record Office focused our attention on Archive Search Rooms: their provision, equipping, staffing and security. This he illustrated with slides (including one of an ashtray in a German search room: smoking and search rooms are not recommended partners!), and with a presentation of the "Mr Bean in the Library" video, which humorously portrayed what should not happen, and increased our awareness of dangers, pitfalls and their prevention. The conclusion was that each archive, being unique, needs to plan its own search room provision within the context of its circumstances.

The by now traditional workshops followed after lunch. Judith Bright, a visitor from the Kinder Library, Auckland, New Zealand, spoke briefly of activities on that side of the globe, before we broke into two groups.

Ken Roullier, Conservation Manager of the British Library Bindery led the first group in a consideration of the prevention, and post factum repair, of damage caused by disasters such as fire and flood. Use was made of the excellent video "If Disaster Strikes" hired from the National Preservation Library. The moral is to have contingency plans ready before hand, have speedy access to basic equipment such as cold air fans, dehumidifiers, generators, archive type bags and markers, and an agreement with a local deep freeze firm and your neighbourhood conservation unit!

George McKenzie led the second group in a session dealing with the physical handling and storage of archives, illustrating good practice with examples of materials commercially available. This useful and practical session ended with a quick look at the video used by the first group.

In brief, it was an excellent conference, with a good balance between religious archives with the Quaker input and religious archives with the practical input on searchrooms, archive handling and disaster contingency planning.

In a welcome coordinated move, the same premises were used the next day by the Catholic Archives Society for a training day, and on the Wednesday, the Association of Diocesan Archivists from the Catholic dioceses held their meeting at Southwark Cathedral.

THE PROPOSED CARDINAL TOMAS O FIAICH MEMORIAL LIBRARY AND ARCHIVE

Ever since the lamented death of the Cardinal O Fiaich, there has been a widespread desire that his name and life's work be permanently commemorated in a suitable manner. This desire has been strongly expressed throughout the Archdiocese of Armagh and indeed widely across Ireland. Tomas O Fiaich was widely recognised as an outstanding Irish language scholar and historian. He had a particular interest and expertise in Irish-European links. He travelled frequently and extensively on the continent, always adding to his knowledge of Irish connections with various European shrines and centres. His renowned lectures, his television programmes and his published works bear eloquent testimony to his unique authority in this field of Irish-European associations.

One of his permanent legacies is Cumann Seanchais Ard Mhacha—the Armagh Diocesan Historical Society - founded by him in 1953. He was the first editor of its prestigious journal Seanchais Ard Mhacha which now can boast of 31 issues of superb historical research and which deservedly holds a high place in the world of historical scholarship. By his will the late Cardinal bequeathed to the committee of Cumann Seanchais Ard Mhacha all rights and interests in his published works. Under the aegis of this Society plans have been prepared to build a library and archive bearing his name on a site in Armagh near St Patrick's Cathedral and his residence.

At a seminar held in Armagh on 10 March 1990, at which the Cardinal lectured, a number of archivists emphasised the richness of the archives of the Catholic Church in Ireland and the need to preserve and update them and make them more accessible to interested scholars. The Armagh Archdiocesan Archive, being of national significance, is of critical importance in this regard. It is fitting that an essential part of the memorial to the late Cardinal should be a proper archive in Armagh. It is also a very pressing necessity.

It is also envisaged that the late Cardinal's historical and Irish language library, together with other collections, would form the nucleus of a specialised library. A Trust Deed has been established and six trustees appointed. The basic charitable trust is that the Trustees should hold the Library and Archive and all books, papers and documents for promoting study and research :

- in Irish history, especially ecclesiastical history
- in Irish culture, especially the Irish language, and Irish games
- in Irish—European links

all with the object of advancing the education of the public.

It is hoped to start the building in April 1994. The plans have been prepared by Paul Mongan, architect, of P. & B. Gregory, architects, Belfast. The estimated building cost, including all fees, is £600,000. An archdiocesan collection has been taken up. At the time of writing it looks as if it might raise over £100,000. We have made and are continuing to make representations to various granting agencies but we still will need a lot of support to put the venture on a sound long-term footing. Any contributions would be greatly welcomed by Cardinal Cahal Daly at Ara Caeli, Armagh.

FR CONRAD PEPLER, OP (1908-1993)

Fr Conrad Pepler OP died on 10 November 1993 at Blackfriars, Cambridge, aged 85 years. For twenty-seven years (1953-1981) he was warden of the Dominican conference centre, Spode House, Staffordshire, and will be remembered by a multitude as a welcoming and joyful host.

Born in Hammersmith in 1908, Conrad's father was that remarkable man, Hilary Pepler who, with Eric Gill the sculptor, founded the Guild of St Joseph and St Dominic at Ditchling, Sussex.

Conrad joined the Dominican Order in 1927; after his own formal studies in England and Rome, he taught his younger brethren here before going back, in 1939, himself to teach in Rome. He had to return in 1940, when Italy entered the War. He was appointed editor of Blackfriars, the Dominican monthly publication, a post he held for eleven years, during which time he developed a new periodical, Life of the Spirit, and also Blackfriars Publications.

In 1953 he was appointed Warden of Spode House, the first Catholic conference centre in the U.K. He built up a remarkable array of speakers, many of them of international repute; and many thousands, of other religions and none, found in Spode a welcoming, homely place, the like of which, so many said, they had never experienced before. Not only academics, but school children, religious sisters, musicians (from famous makers of music to the listeners), calligraphers, actors, business people and politicians, found their way to Spode. Some believe that, so far as the Catholic Church in England and Wales was prepared for Vatican II, Spode, and that meant Conrad, had a large share of the credit.

Among those who came to Spode were Catholic archivists, ranging in talents from professional archivists and experienced religious archivists to novice religious archivists, amateurs appointed by their orders and congregations who were struggling to cope with the contents of attics, cupboards, wardrobes and cabinets in bursars' offices. These latter acquired basic skills and learnt about the evils of paper clips, staples and rubber bands, where to obtain boxes and non-acidic materials, and the principles of archival arranging and cataloguing.

It was Conrad who had the foresight to call the initial meeting at Spode in 1979, at which the Society was formed, and the first six annual conferences were held there. While the credit for the development of the Society in succeeding years lies elsewhere, none of it might have happened, at least at the time and in the way it did, if Conrad one day had not proposed that an effort should be made to bring Catholic archivists together. He had the imagination and did the organizing, wrote all the necessary letters, and from these essential but elementary proceedings, there grew, like so many other Spode initiatives that have lasted, the present Catholic Archives Society, well grounded, if ever learning, with its own particular and valuable archival role and a healthy future. We thank him.

In 1981 Conrad retired, to his lasting surprise, to Cambridge where he lived, always in choir for Mass and the Office, still preaching at Mass until a few weeks before his death, an example of God's love.

BOOK REVIEW

Irish Church Records: Their History, Availability and use in Family and Local History

Edited by James G. Ryan. ISBN 0 9508466 4 3. Pp. 207. Published by Flyleaf Press, 4 Spencer Villas, Glenageary, Co Dublin, Ireland, 1992. Price IR £24.00; US 46 dollars (Airmail).

Do you know about Irish Church History? Would you like to know more? I recommend this slim volume on Irish Church Records, especially to the beginner, and, as the title indicates, for anyone interested in family and local research.

In his introduction, James Ryan tells us that the book "presents chapters on the records of all the major, and several of the minor, denominations which have existed in Ireland during the last three centuries". In the eight following chapters a specialist historian of each denomination outlines the history of the Quaker, Church of Ireland, Presbyterian, Roman Catholic, Methodist, Jewish, Huguenot and Baptist Churches in Ireland and describes their records.

James Ryan himself contributes the chapter (5) on Roman Catholic Records. Although the majority of Irish people have for centuries belonged to the Catholic Church, yet because of the Penal Laws, church records are almost non-existent until the beginning of the nineteenth century, when the economic situation improved. These records, however, are vitally important as they are the only sign of the existence of the labouring class. Since most Catholics used only the Gaelic language and culture, it was difficult to 'missionize' them into the Protestant State Church. An interesting feature is the well kept registers of Continentally trained priests.

The book is eminently readable, the layout good, and there are many facsimiles and extracts from records. Each chapter concludes with a detailed list of references for further reading and the 16 page index is more than adequate. The cost of the book may appear high for its length, but its value as a major source of reference renders it worth every penny.

THE SURVEY OF RECORDS OF CATHOLIC LAY SOCIETIES

A preliminary list of Catholic lay societies active in England and Wales between 1870 and 1970 was published in Catholic Archives, No.10, 1990 (pp.48-57). This list created much interest in the subject and concern was widely expressed that the records of many of the societies, particularly of those which had evidently ceased to function, may have been lost or in danger. The Society invited a small team of volunteers to investigate the problem. This team subsequently circulated a letter and questionnaire to all those Catholic lay societies listed in The Catholic Directory. This initial survey received a welcome, even though incomplete, response, and useful information was gathered as to the nature of records kept, where and in whose custody. While it is not in the power of the Society to offer much more than advice, at least at this stage, it was hoped that the survey would alert the officers of existing societies to the value of their records and to make proper arrangements for their preservation, both in their own interest: and ultimately in the interest of historical research.

Since only those lay societies listed in the current Directory were initially circulated, the information obtained is restricted to existing societies, the majority of which have been founded since Vatican II, and some of quite recent date. The volunteer team has been engaged, intermittently, in follow-up work on the initial survey, although it may be assumed that most societies have retained some records, even if there has been no positive response. The limitation of the initial survey to existing societies has of course emphasized the great need to try to locate the records of defunct societies. These may be identified in the 1990 list in Catholic Archives by their terminal dates falling prior to 1970. Any attempt to trace the whereabouts of the records of these societies would involve tracing the whereabouts of the last named officers, and this is probably an undertaking beyond the scope of the Society, and certainly of the team of volunteers who undertook the initial survey. It is possible, however, that members of the Society may be aware of the whereabouts of the records of defunct societies, or know persons who were active in particular societies, and thus could make suggestions as to where or to whom enquiries may be directed. This brief report on the survey of Catholic Lay Society records is therefore an appeal for any enlightened suggestions upon which further enquiries may be made.

Any information or suggestions may be sent, in the first instance, to Mr R. Gard, 21 Larchwood Avenue, Wideopen, Newcastle upon Tyne, NE13 6PY.

THE CATHOLIC ARCHIVES SOCIETY CONFERENCE, 1993

The fourteenth annual conference, held at The Hayes Conference Centre, Swanwick, on 25 - 27 May, attracted some 67 members, including several Irish members and a few newcomers.

The conference was opened on Thursday afternoon, 25 May, by Fr Francis Isherwood, deputizing for Sr Mary Campion McCarren FCJ (Chairperson), who was unavoidably delayed. He greeted Bishop J. McGuinness, who welcomed the conference to the Nottingham Diocese again. The first talk was given by Sr Michelle Motherway LCM, on the archives of the Little Company of Mary, the text of which is published in this edition. After supper, Fr Frank Bullivant OMI described the work of Peter Andreas Munch, a Norwegian scholar, who was the first to gain access to the Vatican archives, in the late nineteenth century.

Members' energies were fully extended on the conference's only full day, Wednesday, 26 May. Firstly, Dr Dorothy Johnston discussed the work of the Society of Archivists and the support which the Society and local record offices could give to Catholic archivists. Then, Fr Michael Edwards described the recent establishment of the Diocesan Archives of East Anglia. During the afternoon, a party went to Matlock, where Dr Margaret O'Sullivan kindly gave a guided tour of the Derbyshire Record Office, while other members stayed at home to discuss the publications of the Society and other matters. After supper, members again divided, this time into discussion groups on setting up an archive, work in progress, lay societies' records, setting up a data base, oral history, and updating annals.

On the final morning, Thursday, 27 May, there was, firstly, the customary open forum, during which reports from the previous evening's discussion groups were given, and other topics aired. This was followed by the annual general meeting, in which Sr Mary Campion McCarren FCJ (Chairperson) presented the reports of the officers and Sr Patricia Moran CSJP (Treasurer) gave her annual statement of the Society's accounts. The officers were duly thanked for their services, especially Sr Marguerite Kuhn-Regnier (Secretary) and Fr Anthony Dolan (Conference Organizer), and the officers and members of Council were elected for 1993-4 (see inside front cover). The proceedings of the conference are reported fully in the Society's CAS Bulletin, No. 15 Summer 1993, obtainable from the Secretary. The 1994 conference will be held at Ushaw College, Durham, on 30 May - 1 June.

EDITORIAL NOTES

As foreshadowed in these Notes last year, the varied interests of an increasing membership have prompted the Society to look afresh at its publication policy. The retirement of the editor, which takes effect from this edition, has provided the opportunity for this review, and the new Editorial Board has considered how best to try to supply the needs of the Society's over two hundred members. Less than one third are able to attend the annual conference and the Board realizes that many of its archivist members work alone and that both older and especially newer members look to the Society's publications for practical advice. It is gratifying to learn that Catholic Archives has been of help in this way. One correspondent wrote last year: 'The "sharing" aspect of so many of the articles over the years is something that helps the novice archivist. It is comforting to learn that someone else has been confronted with, and has overcome, a problem similar to one's own, and one can always imitate, follow and adapt another's solution. . . And there is no better spot than the Journal for picking other people's brains!'. While such a comment indicates the practical value of the journal, it also challenges the Society to make its publications even more helpful.

The fresh look, however, does not imply radical changes to either Catholic Archives or CAS Bulletin (once again published twice yearly), which will continue as the main means of informing members, but occasional publications, such as leaflets giving practical advice, will be considered. The Directory will also be up-dated regularly. The Board is likewise aware that over one hundred institutions and individuals subscribe to Catholic Archives separately and that it therefore provides their sole means of information about the Society's activities, which for members are reported more fully in the CAS Bulletin. It is important that the interests of both members and subscribers are served as fully as possible, without unnecessary duplication.

The composition of the Editorial Board is shown on the inside front cover, but it may be helpful to note that correspondence about the Society's editorial policy should be sent to Sr Helen Butterworth and that offers of articles and material for Catholic Archives and CAS Bulletin should be sent to their respective editors, Fr Stewart Foster and Miss Stephanie Gilluly. Sr Mary Coke's role is that of co-ordinating the Society's publications and reporting on the work of the Board to the Council.

The joint editors would have wished to record individual thanks to the contributors to this edition, but space unfortunately precludes this customary courtesy. Instead, it is hoped that they will accept inclusion in an omnibus tribute of appreciation which the retiring editor expresses, on behalf of the Society, to the one hundred and fifty or so contributors of articles and reports to the first fifteen editions. The generosity and patience they have shown and the encouragement they have given to the editor have made his work light, while the friendships gained will be a lasting joy. He does not doubt that members will give equally generous support to Fr Stewart Foster, the new sole editor, particularly by offering articles for publication.

RECORDS OF THE CHILDREN'S HOMES OF THE DAUGHTERS OF CHARITY OF ST VINCENT DE PAUL

Sister Judith Greville, DC

THE DAUGHTERS OF CHARITY OF ST VINCENT DE PAUL

The Daughters of Charity began in France when a country woman, Marguerite Naseau, offered to be a servant of the poor under the direction of St Vincent's Ladies of Charity. Others joined her and by 1633 the groups of volunteers were organized by St Louise de Marillac, herself a Lady of Charity. She brought them into her own house in Paris. They kept the status of lay women and the focus of their lives was not within an enclosure but in the active service of the poor, wherever they were to be found and mindful of the changing needs of the times. The Daughters of Charity are a Society of Apostolic Life. They take Simple Vows which must be renewed each year.

Our history in England begins with Daniel Lee, who attempted to establish the Sisters in Manchester in 1847. He had seen and appreciated their works on the Continent and thought that if similar works could be established in England it would greatly help to restore the Faith to this country. With the approbation of the Vicars Apostolic - the hierarchy had not yet been restored - Mr and Mrs Lee appealed to Father Etienne, the Superior General, to send Sisters to St John's (later Salford Cathedral). Here they visited the sick and held classes for factory girls. However, due to various factors, including Irish immigration, Chartist riots, and the general unrest in the country, people became more and more anti-Catholic. The Sisters were physically attacked and their house burnt down. They returned to Paris in 1849.

In 1857, two houses were opened in Dublin, and once again the Sisters came to England, where two factors in particular, made it possible. The year 1850 marked the restoration of the hierarchy and the Crimean War of 1854-1856 had seen the Sisters on the battlefields nursing the injured of both sides. Florence Nightingale was impressed by their standard of nursing and many returning soldiers recognized them on the streets and championed them in the event of hostility.

As happened at the beginning of the Community, so here benefactors played a large part in the establishment of the Sisters. The Vincentian Fathers had gone to Solly Street, Sheffield, in 1855 and asked the Sisters to visit and teach in the parish. The Norfolk family had an estate in the vicinity and were interested in helping to relieve the conditions of the poor. They paid the rent of the Sisters' house (£25.00 per annum). Once again, many of the benefactors were Ladies of Charity, some of whom later entered the Community. They invited the Sisters to do parish visiting, set up creches for poor working women, opened schools and orphanages, visited prisoners and migrants, and organized hostels and night classes for young men and women. This was not only in London, but on the benefactors' estates - the Monteith's in Lanark, Mrs Mary Gillow in Hereford, and the Blundell's in Little Crosby. Many of the benefactors from the great Catholic families were also benefactors to other communities, and the Church in the British Isles owes an enormous debt of gratitude to them for their generosity in providing relief and Catholic education to the poor in the nineteenth century. Later, the hierarchy became interested and supported the works or founded new ones, but in the early days they had neither the status nor the means to do so. I believe that the Catholic Archives Society would do well to promote research into the role of benefactors of the Church in this period.

GENESIS AND GROWTH OF THE WORKS

The works of the Daughters of Charity were very varied, and any account of them can sometimes be confusing because, true to their charism, the Community has tried to respond to the needs of the times, and as these changed so new works were commenced and older ones became obsolete. We can trace the works of individual houses through from parish visiting to the addition of a creche, parish school, orphanage, hostel for young people, night classes for young men and women, special education, sometimes residential, for the deaf, blind and mentally handicapped, or the request of Church or local authorities for approved schools. The works grew, changed, or were discontinued according to circumstances and, later on, according to legislation and Government policies.

How they came to be founded, by whom and with what degree of funding is material for another article. It is strange to us today to find that there was so little material security for the works and more emphasis on public and private charity, ingenuity in making ends meet, sheer hard work and, above all, trust in Divine Providence. Where there was a need, it was met, even if this entailed some very difficult conditions. Agreements were drawn up to ensure an adequate start to a project, and benefactors often left legacies or invested shares to aid it, but in many cases the continuation of projects depended on donations and bazaars to a degree that would not be tolerated now.

Among other things not appreciated today is the fact that the Sisters were asked to take charge of works yet did not have any legal or statutory rights over their charges and the decisions made in their regard. This was the function of the hierarchy and local authorities. Just one example of this was the Emigration Programme. Some of the Sisters really broke their hearts over this. They could neither prevent it nor go with the children. They could only try to keep in touch with some of the children by correspondence.

In the last four years, I have had many enquiries from genealogists, but still more from men and women who were placed in our homes and orphanages. They speak with affection of their old homes and many have kept in touch with the Sisters who cared for them. One Sister, now retired, sent me an address book of old boys from Torquay, and has sent a copy to each of them so that they can continue their reunions and keep in touch with one another. A number of these past pupils have been to see their records here at Mill Hill and to look over Damascus House, once St Vincent's Orphanage. Last Summer, one of them remarked: "I feel sorry for the youngsters today, the Sisters taught us what was right and wrong, and we've never been in trouble". Another old boy writes several times a year and always manages to find press cuttings and other souvenirs of St Vincent's, Preston. He is inordinately proud of 'his' Sisters and 'his' Orphanage, and frequently tells me he boasted of it in the Army! It seems that the 'good' stories don't get to the media!

THE RECORDS OF CHILDREN'S HOMES

The following list of records of Children's Homes is obviously incomplete, and I would welcome any more information. Perhaps it is worth pointing out one or two factors. The nineteenth century records of Children's Homes are relatively few. In the absence of legislation there was not then a very consistent approach to the keeping of records, and in some cases the registers suffered in the interests of confidentiality. Unfortunately, this persisted well into this century. In some cases it went to extremes, so that one or two people who have contacted me in recent years are not even sure of their right name or date of birth. It applied particularly in one case where a benefactor placed a child with the Sisters but seems to have applied the strictest secrecy to the event. Only the letters survive to prove that she came, and they give little away. She may have been placed on behalf of the family or a friend in the days when illegitimacy was such a scar.

Some records were lost during the two World Wars, others were given to the Catholic Children's Societies when the Sisters moved out of the works or were sent to them. Some Authorities have been helpful and specific in supplying information on what they hold, others did not answer or had only a vague idea. It became more difficult than I thought it would be to assemble a full list, but, hopefully, this beginning will encourage others to contribute to a central 'List' of Children's Records, and where they can be found.

ACCESS TO CHILDREN'S RECORDS

Confidentiality in the matter of personal records is of the utmost importance. Records in the Archives of the Daughters of Charity are available to the individual to whom they relate and to relatives by means of a written application. Please give as much information as possible as this makes the person easier to trace. Other researchers should apply, also in writing, stating the nature of the research and enclosing letters from two referees. The Daughters of Charity reserve the right to decide what material is open for research and the conditions of use. In the case of personal records, numbers and case studies may be used for statistics in research, but names are never published. Enquiries should be sent to The Provincial Archivist, Provincial House, The Ridgeway, Mill Hill, London, NW7 1EH. For records held by other authorities, please apply direct to them.

THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON HISTORICAL MANUSCRIPTS AND THE NATIONAL REGISTER OF ARCHIVES

Christopher Kitching

Some, indeed I hope many, readers of this journal will already know of the work of the Royal Commission on Historical Manuscripts alias the Historical Manuscripts Commission (HMC), established in 1869, and also of what was once referred to as its 'special branch', the National Register of Archives (NRA), established in 1945. But I am very glad of this opportunity, as we celebrate the important milestone of the Register's fiftieth anniversary, to contribute an article to Catholic Archives, not least because it gives me the opportunity to acknowledge how important this journal has itself been in gathering and disseminating information in its special field. The Index to Numbers 1-12 is an impressive roll-call of religious orders, dioceses, colleges, parishes and families whose archives have already been outlined in the journal's pages, and I need hardly add that the Commission's library is a keen subscriber.

Since 1959, when it received its most recent Royal Warrant, with much expanded terms of reference, the Commission has been the United Kingdom's central source of information and advice about archives and historical manuscripts apart from the Public Records which are separately governed by the Public Records Acts of 1958 and 1967. Its work is carried out by a team of unpaid Commissioners, currently 17 in number, and under them a salaried staff of 23. The Commission is wholly reliant on government funding, and is at present sponsored by the Department of National Heritage, through whose Secretary of State it is answerable to Parliament.

The Chairman and Commissioners are appointed by the Queen on the recommendation of the Prime Minister. If there is one of their terms of reference¹ which neatly summarises their overall role, it is that they are to 'consider and advise upon general questions relating to the location, preservation and use of manuscripts and records'. Incidentally, as is made clear elsewhere in the warrant, this includes 'records or archives of all kinds'. The welcome breadth of this definition is becoming more important with the rapid diversification of media in which archival information is now held. The Commissioners fulfil their responsibilities as the nation's watchdog on archival issues by gathering and publishing information about archives, by making representations to Ministers, funding bodies and others on aspects of public policy concerning archives, by overseeing the work of their staff who deal with day-to-day issues and case-work, and by publishing occasional Reports to the Crown. These Reports, of which the most recent is the Twenty-Seventh Report 1982-1990 (HMSO, 1992), provide an opportunity for an authoritative longer-term look at trends and developments for good and ill in the world of archives.

The work of the Commission's staff falls into three main categories:

maintaining and developing the National Register of Archives by gathering in, from every available source, information about the nature and whereabouts of manuscripts and archives which are of importance for every aspect of the history of the United Kingdom; disseminating this information as widely as possible to assist users and potential users, by maintaining a public search room, answering historical enquiries and publishing texts and calendars, guides and surveys, and information sheets about sources for particular topics; and advising central and local government, grant-awarding bodies, owners, custodians and users of archives, on every aspect of their care, preservation and use.

The Commission's Annual Review, published in November each year and obtainable from HMSO, contains the Secretary's progress report to the Commissioners, whilst leaflets about the Commission and its work, the National Register of Archives, Publications, and the Manorial Documents Register are obtainable free of charge from the address given at the end of this article. (A stamped-addressed envelope is appreciated).

Royal Commissions, you may be thinking, are usually set up to carry out an investigation, make a report, and then be wound up. With the remarkable exception of the Royal Commission for the Exhibition of 1851, HMC is the longest-standing Royal Commission. Would the Treasury, I wonder, have sanctioned the establishment of the Royal Commission on Historical Manuscripts in 1869 if it had realised that there would in all probability be no end to its work, and that a century and a quarter along the road its then Secretary would be asked to write an article such as this? But in fact it is not at all surprising, for even a moment's pause for reflection is enough to show that the task is never ending. Each successive generation creates its own archives. Just as we think we are beginning to know the whole field in outline, it gets bigger and bigger! Even if things remained static, there is such a backlog of cataloguing and recording to be done even on the collections that have passed into public repositories, let alone those still in private hands, to guarantee that the information will continue to flow in more or less indefinitely. And on top of that, existing collections migrate or are dispersed, for a variety of family and business reasons; we attempt to keep track of them by monitoring the main sale catalogues and generally by keeping our ears to the ground. As the quantity of archives being cared for increases, so in proportion do the problems of storage and conservation, cataloguing and (where appropriate) arrangements for public access. So there is no shortage either of information still to be unearthed or of advice to be given.

The foundation of the Commission's reputation in the world of scholarship – and regrettably still the only context in which certain historians are familiar with our work – was the great series of HMC Reports and Calendars, of which publication began in 1870. This is now being brought to a close, with only one final volume remaining to go to press to complete a set of 240.² This series contains a great deal which is of potential interest to Catholic history, in part through its coverage of a number of specifically Catholic family and institutional archives, but also from the broader light shed by reports on other collections.³

When the idea of a Royal Commission to seek out the sources of British history that were in private hands was first being discussed in the 1850s, and indeed for a time after its actual foundation in 1869, there was vocal dissent from a few prominent individuals who feared it might be a thinly disguised government ploy to pry into private property or perhaps to discover religious or ideological affiliations. Cardinal Wiseman was among the few prominent public figures who, having been approached, declined to support a petition to the Prime Minister to establish a Commission,⁴ and when Dr William Russell, President of St Patrick's College Maynooth, was included in the eventual list of Commissioners Sir Thomas Phillipps, the great manuscript collector wrote to another Commissioner, the Deputy Keeper of Public Records, Thomas Duffus Hardy, 'What possible motive can he have for prying into the private papers of any Protestant?'⁵

In order to allay fears such as these, the Commission's early inspectors were debarred from examining title deeds less than a century old, and in general confined their reports to papers pre-1800, a specific limitation which by the twentieth century had become increasingly irrelevant, as well as frustrating to scholars. Moreover, it had to be ruled at the outset that Roman Catholic Commissioners should not be allowed to inspect Protestants' papers.⁶ The reverse side of the coin was that virtually all the important Catholic collections inspected in the Commission's early years were contracted to a recent and highly reputed convert to Catholicism, Joseph Stevenson, one of the few people to bear the epithet 'archivist' in the DNB, who, after a distinguished early career working for the Public Record Office and British Museum, had been ordained as an Anglican in 1839. He was received into the Roman Catholic Church in 1863 and entered Oscott College on the death of his wife in 1869,⁷ the year of the Commission's establishment. He was appointed as one of the Commission's inspectors at the specific request of a number of Catholic owners of manuscripts, with the important result that they freely allowed him access to their papers and permission to write summary reports on them for publication. He was able to report, for example, that the President of Oscott would 'gladly allow all due facilities for such further examination. . . as may be desired by the. . . Commission'.⁸ In the same vein Lord Herries had 'no objection to permit access. . . under such restrictions as he may consider advisable'.⁹ The Provincial of the Dominican Friars was 'happy to further the objects of the Commission in every way in his power'.¹⁰ There were just one or two hesitations. At Buckie on the Moray Firth where Stevenson went to inspect the papers of Dr Kyle, Bishop of the Northern District of Scotland, 'the privilege for inspecting the collection in detail was not afforded me',¹¹ whilst at Blairs College the President was prepared to allow more general public access, but only to 'those who have the permission of the Catholic Bishops of Scotland'.¹²

Catholic institutional archives thus in fact came to be quite strongly represented in the Commission's early reports, although like most other collections inspected they were described in a most summary form. Nevertheless, it could be said that they were 'on the map', and considering the meanderings of some of the records, from English, Scots and Irish Colleges, seminaries and religious houses elsewhere in Europe to their eventual resting places in this country, that is not a bad metaphor.

After mapping as much of the ground in general as they thought productive, the Commissioners turned to publishing more extensive reports on individual collections, and this became the mainstay of the Commission's work, subject to financial vagaries particularly in wartime, right down to 1945. Among reports of specifically Catholic interest might be mentioned the calendar, in 7 volumes (1902-1923), of the Stuart Papers at Windsor Castle, which was unfortunately terminated at 1718, falling victim to post- (First World) war economies, and latterly being rendered less necessary by the microfilm edition of the papers. Its introduction is worth reading for the eventful story of the papers' recovery from Italy.¹³ It may be worth recalling, too, that Ireland was very firmly in the Commission's remit when it began its work, and the calendars include the holdings of the Irish Jesuits¹⁴ and Franciscans.¹⁵

The creation of the NRA in 1945 was an important landmark in the Commission's history and fortunes. It meant a radical change in the approach to the collection of information. A new and altogether more comprehensive country-wide survey was launched, initially with a great deal of voluntary help through county committees. Their work was only slowly assumed by the local authority and university record offices which began to spring up in greater numbers in the post-war decades. Gone was the old restriction as to the dates of manuscripts inspected and reported. Yawning gaps in the Commission's information for the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, caused by the earlier self-denying ordinance, could therefore be filled and whole new fields such as business records and even the archives of relatively modern institutions could be covered for the first time. Again this was seen by the Treasury at first as a short-term project, with initial funding for only two and a half years. But, again unsurprisingly, the scale of the task, and the enthusiasm with which it was embraced throughout the country not only by archivists and volunteer inspectors but also by many families and institutions eager to deposit their papers on loan for study and safe keeping in properly-appointed record offices, generated the momentum to build and improve the Register and thus to establish it as a permanent source of information on the sources of history for the benefit of the whole nation. It advanced rapidly from collecting summary reports of papers to collecting full catalogues, lists and indexes, and eventually to opening a public search room - the only one of its kind in the country - where all these finding aids, together with many other works of reference such as guides to individual libraries and record offices and thematic or regional surveys of archival sources could be assembled for public inspection without charge. Today, readers may consult catalogues, both published and unpublished, from every record office in the United Kingdom and numerous overseas repositories, from libraries, museums and specialist research institutes, from private families and individuals, from institutions and businesses, churches and charities, and so on. There are over 38,000 numbered reports filed in the Register.

It should be explained that the catalogues filed in the search room are only one of the sources of information used in compiling the indexes to the Register. In addition, for example, the principal public repositories are invited each year by means of a questionnaire to inform us of their year's accessions, even where these remain unlisted, so that an early marker of the papers' existence may be put down on the indexes. Reports about individual archives, in journals such as Catholic Archives, will not themselves find a place in the Register but should, once processed, generate index entries with a reference to the article where appropriate. From time to time the Commission itself launches new, targeted surveys to fill gaps in the information contained in the Register. A number of these have been published in the successful series of Guides to Sources for British History. Papers of British Churchmen 1780-1940 (HMSO, 1987), for example, includes summaries of the papers of a number of prominent Roman Catholics of the period, both men and women, and although the project did not extend to the archives of institutions it naturally involved visits to, or correspondence with, diocesan archives and religious communities, allowing the Commission considerably to expand its knowledge of archives in this sector. The survey currently in progress of principal collections of family and estate papers will include, for example, the Fitzalan-Howards.

After an eight-year programme of computerisation, the NRA's indexes have been refined beyond recognition for anyone familiar with its original card indexes and slips of paper. In 1994 the indexes contained an estimated 170,000 entries. The Personal Index selectively indexes references to the papers of men and women of importance in every field of British history, with details of the nature and location of each individual's papers and of correspondences in other collections. A 'Subject' Index, which is still being developed, in fact provides a classified arrangement of papers generated by particular types of institution or organisation. The reader can search for bodies such as religious orders, missions, schools, theological colleges and religious societies, but this index still requires a good deal of working up. To get the best out of the finding aids, lateral thinking sometimes has to be applied. The indexes, for example, do not for the most part pick up references from the Reports and Calendars series, which therefore have to be searched in tandem with the NRA. And there may be additional HMC library references to collections which have been reported on in print but not necessarily yet entered in the NRA indexes, including some of the excellent articles published in Catholic Archives. In time most of these anomalies should be ironed out.

By the time this article is published we hope we shall be well on the way to linking our computer system to one or more national and international computer networks so that it will be possible to obtain access to the indexed information from many local work stations. Networking should enable many more researchers to identify the collections they need to study, and their location, without the need for a visit to the Commission's search room. We hope that every user will become our eyes and ears, drawing to our attention the existence of records and papers hitherto unrecorded in the Register and its indexes. Because of the scale of the effort involved in maintaining a nationwide index of this kind we have to maintain a selective approach to the individuals and institutions that can be covered as a matter of course, but we are always interested to learn of collections hitherto unnoted in the NRA which scholars have found to be of importance to their research: this, rather than the status of the individual or institution concerned, will often be the best indicator whether or not the papers should be included in the NRA indexes.

Any Catholic archivist or historian reading this article who may have information that the Commission ought to record is warmly invited to write to me at the address at the end of this article. I should emphasise that whilst the Commission is delighted to receive both summary lists and completed catalogues which may be communicated to the public, it is equally glad to note on its own files, in confidence and not for public communication, the existence and scope of archives which, for whatever reason, are not yet available for public inspection. At the same time it does encourage owners and custodians wherever possible to seek ways of making historically important papers available for study, which in the long run can only be of benefit to scholarship.

Alongside its now formidable bank of data about the archives themselves, the Commission attempts to keep up-to-date information about the repositories or institutions which hold them, and the terms and conditions (if any) on which access may be granted to the public. In the case of public repositories, summary details are published in the Commission's best-selling directory Record repositories in Great Britain.¹⁶ The Commission's combined knowledge of papers and their owners or custodians is the main justification for its central role in offering independent advice about archives and manuscripts.

The Commission's staff advise owners and custodians, without charge, by post or telephone or where appropriate by arranging a visit of inspection, on a large range of issues. They may on request carry out a general survey of an archive to assess its scholarly importance or to make recommendations to the owner, in confidence, as to its future care or custody. They also advise on a multiplicity of problems with old, or plans for new, storage accommodation; on sources of grant aid for purchase, conservation and cataloguing of archives; on possible alternative homes for the records if for whatever reason the owner is no longer able (or no longer wishes) to retain them; and on methods of arrangement and listing. The Commission's advice is given in confidence, and from an entirely independent point of view: the Commission does not itself hold records, but only information about them.

It is pleasing to note that our clients have already included a number of Catholic communities, societies and families (and of course no religious Test is nowadays applied either to the Commission's staff or to the client!) But the Commission remains equally at the service of all archives in need of care and attention. A series of advisory memoranda is available, covering for example: planning a new record repository; applying for grant aid; the Commission's advisory services; records management for small organisations; and protecting archives and manuscripts from disaster. Each of these is available free of charge in return for a stamped-addressed A4-size envelope.

The address for all enquiries is The Secretary, Royal Commission on Historical Manuscripts, Quality House, Quality Court, Chancery Lane, London WC2A 1HP.

THE BRENTWOOD DIOCESAN ARCHIVES

Rev. Stewart Foster, OSM

The Diocese of Brentwood was erected in 1917 from the eastern portion of the Archdiocese of Westminster, and today consists of the County of Essex and the London Boroughs of Newham, Waltham Forest, Redbridge, Barking & Dagenham, and Havering. The diocese thus covers territory both varied and mixed: East London; the suburbs; rural Essex; seaside resorts such as Southend and Clacton; new towns such as Harlow and Basildon; and the older centres of Colchester, Chelmsford and Brentwood itself. The Catholic history of the diocese is much tied in with the generosity of the Petre family and other recusant households, and among the parishes of the present Diocese of Brentwood are numbered the old Catholic centres of Ingatestone, Stock and Witham.

The history of the diocese (recorded in a recently published book by the present writer) is thus much associated with the parent archdiocese, and the Westminster Archives contain a good deal of material on individual missions and clergy from the earlier period. A number of parishes also house important local collections of archival material such as registers and correspondence (much of it unsorted), while the Petre Archives in the Essex Record Office at Chelmsford include quite a lot of source material (see Catholic Archives 5, pp.39-43). As with most diocesan archives, the potential researcher should not expect to find everything he wants in the one place.

LOCATION

The Brentwood Diocesan Archives are housed in a first floor room in the diocesan offices at Cathedral House, Brentwood. When the present bishop, Bishop Thomas McMahon, was appointed to the diocese in 1980, he arranged for the renovation and extension of the former Convent of Mercy adjacent to the cathedral to serve as the administrative centre of the diocese. Hitherto the curial offices had (since the 1950s) been located at South Woodford, in East London, and before that the old Bishop's House in Brentwood served the diocese in somewhat restricted quarters.

The archive room itself is small (14 x 10 feet), but every inch of space is used by the installation of lockable, built-in wall cupboards. The room is well lit, and researchers are housed in a library room at the end of the building, thus leaving the archivist space to work. The present Diocesan Archivist, Miss Jane Neely, has recently taken over responsibility from Sister Mary Peter CRSS of New Hall, and much archival work was done in former times by the then Chancellor of the diocese, Monsignor Daniel Shanahan. Indeed, the diocese has been blessed with a galaxy of historically-minded clergy during its brief history: the first bishop, Bishop Bernard Ward, was the foremost English Catholic historian of his era; Canon Joseph Whitfield; Canon Charles Kuypers; and Canon (now Bishop) Brian Foley. The diocese has also benefited from the labours of the Essex Recusant Society, founded in 1959.

DESCRIPTION

The first cabinet houses material relating to the foundation and government of the diocese: relations with the Holy See; the history of the diocese; individual bishops; financial documents etc. Each of the bishops has a section: Bernard Ward (1917-20); Arthur Doubleday (1920-51); George Andrew Beck (Coadjutor 1948, bishop 1951-55); Bernard Wall (1955-69); Patrick Casey (1969-80); and Thomas McMahon (1980-). Among the papers on the origins of the diocese are notes made by Canon Edwin Burton and Canon Joseph Whitfield. Burton made a register of priests known to have served in Essex in the nineteenth century (and some earlier), as well as brief histories of each mission/parish and lists of their incumbents. These notes were made in the early part of the present century, but are of obvious value with regard to those parishes in the diocese which pre-date 1917. Whitfield's notes are much more concerned with recusant and Penal era Catholicism in the county.

Also in this first cabinet one finds papers relating to episcopal administration: Ad Clera; Pastoral Letters; Ad Limina Visits; Clergy Conferences; as well as bishops' official engagement diaries. Again, local parish archives can often supplement what is lacking in the diocesan archives, e.g. the present writer recently discovered a more or less complete set of pastoral letters from the Vicars Apostolic of the London District and Cardinals Wiseman and Manning (from the 1840s, and some earlier) in a filing cabinet in a parish office, including Wiseman's Out the Flaminian Gate announcing the Restoration of the Hierarchy of England and Wales in 1850. Such discoveries should be an encouragement to archivists and a warning to Parish Priests about good care of historical records!

The first cabinet then holds papers and books relating to episcopal/pontifical liturgy, a collection of Missals, episcopal registers (dispensations, confirmations, ordinations and faculties), as well as material relating to the rebuilding of Brentwood Cathedral and also papers concerning the widespread damage suffered by churches in the diocese (chiefly in East London) during the Second World War.

A second large wall cabinet contains files on every parish in the diocese, arranged alphabetically. The contents are chiefly official papers such as Visitation Returns, as well as correspondence to and from Parish Priests on parochial matters, but in some boxes or files there have been added items of more historical interest such as summaries of the foundation of the mission (thus to be used in conjunction with Burton's notes), and notes on the architecture of individual churches and chapels. This section is followed by files containing the papers (often academic records from seminary days) of the deceased priests of the diocese, but some such files also give details of a particular priest's role in the foundation of a parish, and are thus important sources for local history, given the rule regarding a sufficient time lapse after a person's death before papers should be released. Among this section is a very important collection of letters from the last century, to and from Father John Moore, who founded the mission at Westcliff-on-Sea (1862). Moore's correspondence includes letters from Daniel O'Connell and others involved in the Irish Nationalist movement, as well as letters from the leading ecclesiastical figures of the day and many fellow clergy. Finally, in this second cabinet one will find material from the Harwich mission (founded in 1864) which was damaged in the great flood of 1953, as well as microfiche records of various diocesan meetings.

The third cabinet houses material regarding the different diocesan commissions: Education, Social Welfare, Liturgy, Ecumenism, etc.; and likewise papers concerning the various groups and societies established in the diocese: Society of St Vincent de Paul; Pax Christi; Catholic Women's League; Knights of St Columba, Legion of Mary etc. There are sections dealing with the seminaries and vocations to the priesthood.

In a further cupboard there are collections of files on each of the religious orders and congregations (male and female) represented in the diocese. A number of orders, such as the Canonesses of the Holy Sepulchre at New Hall (1799), predate the diocese, and among the orders of men a number are responsible for parishes, e.g. the Franciscan Friars Minor (Forest Gate, Stratford and Woodford Green) and La Salette Missionaries (St Peter's, Dagenham, Rainham and Goodmayes), and thus reference should also be made to the parish section. The bulk of material in the files for the orders and congregations concerns relations with the bishops, details of the erection of religious houses, and the adoption of apostolic works within the diocese. Of particular interest are the files for houses that have closed, and details of which may often be difficult to obtain, especially, as in one case, where the religious society (of Oblates) has ceased to exist.

The Brentwood Diocesan Archives also house a good collection of photographs, including portraits of clergy who served in Essex in the nineteenth century. Of special interest, and perhaps a model for other diocesan archivists, is the collection of recent photographs of each church and chapel in the diocese - a valuable record in an age of closures, demolition and liturgical reordering. There are extensive records of the features, interior and external, of the new Brentwood Cathedral, and the diocesan archives also house maps and plans of the various properties, both diocesan and parochial.

ASSESSMENT

For a more recent foundation, and for one of a relatively small size in geographical terms, the Diocese of Brentwood can boast a well organised archive room, although there is still a great deal to be done by any archival standards, in that much listing and calendaring is required within individual files and groups of files. However, a great achievement is that within most boxes and files the papers have been well sorted and arranged, and the process of removing metal paper clips, etc. is well under way. As all part-time diocesan archivists will recognise, time is a precious commodity, especially when other calls are made upon archival resources (researchers, reception of new material, visits to parishes, etc.).

The Brentwood Diocesan Archives benefit from their location at the administrative centre of the diocese, where there is quick access to other departments and officials, and where there is also access to the Essex Recusant Society Library. Moreover, the archivist can call upon an almost complete set of The Laity's Directory and The Catholic Directory.

The Brentwood Diocesan Archives are an essential port of call for anyone wishing to write a history of a particular parish. This point is made in that it is not always easy to find one's material with such ease of access as is found at Brentwood. Indeed, in recent years a number of the older parishes of the diocese have had produced books or pamphlets on their origins and history, including Brentwood, Grays, Colchester, Chelmsford, Witham, Stock, Ingatestone, Upminster and district, Stratford and Saffron Walden. Such publications vary in length and scope, but in each case the diocesan archives house material which has been used by the authors.

Finally, it is important to add a note about the relationship of the diocesan archives/archivist to the diocesan administration and, in particular, to the bishop himself. The Diocese of Brentwood is fortunate that its present bishop is very keen that the history of both the diocese and its parishes be recorded and written, and thus that the diocesan archives be given the appropriate help and support. In terms of an appreciation of the practical and applied management and use of a diocesan archive this is very important and encouraging. In the experience of the present writer this is very helpful to potential historians and researchers, since a diocesan archive can all too readily be regarded as little more than a records repository, rather than a resource and essential cog in the diocesan 'machine'. Much of the local historical work, and thus consultation of the diocesan archives, is associated with specific anniversaries and commemorations, and again the bishop is keen for such events to be marked in an appropriate fashion: liturgical, social, and historical.

In the opinion of the present writer, the Brentwood Diocesan Archives are too small-scale for any widespread holding of local parish material, at least at the moment. The divergent views on such an approach to diocesan archives notwithstanding, what has happened is that care has been taken to retrieve such records as exist from centres that have closed, and also to house papers of deceased priests who have harboured particular historical interests, or who have kept records or diaries of their activities. This is especially important in a diocese where more than half the parishes and Mass centres have been founded or developed since the creation of the diocese itself, and where there have been a number of new or pioneering projects, e.g. the Diocesan Travelling Mission (1951-69); the development of the post-war new towns and London over-spill housing estates; the virtual 'revolution' inaugurated by Bishop Beck from 1951 to 1955, as the diocese sought to recover from the relative decline suffered during the last years of Bishop Doubleday's episcopate; and the growth of ecumenical projects encouraged by Bishop McMahon, including shared churches and schools. In such cases the preservation of historical records is especially significant.

The Diocesan Archivist, Miss Jane Neely, is usually in attendance for one day per week at the Cathedral offices, and all enquiries should be addressed to her at: Cathedral House, Ingrave Road, Brentwood, Essex. Enquiries regarding The Diocese of Brentwood, 1917-1992 should be directed to the Bishop's secretary at the same address.

1. For a description of the De La Salle Generalate Archives, see Catholic Archives 5 (1985), pp.34-38.
2. These facsimiles constitute vols. 11-25 of the Cahiers Lasalliens series initiated in 1959. The series owed its origin to a long article in Revue d'Ascétique et de Mystique (Jan - Mar 1952) over the signature of the editor, Andre Rayczy, S.J. He surveyed the then existing material available to would-be students of De La Salle's life and work and concluded by lamenting the fact that first editions of his writings were not available for general use. When, he asked, would there be Monumenta Lasalliana comparable to the long-established Monumenta Ignatiana of the Society of Jesus? Our Institute's response to this appeal by the leading authority on 17th century French spirituality has gone beyond a complete facsimile series of the first editions of De La Salle's works. It comprises the fruits of research by many scholars for whom the discovery of the Founder of a humble Institute of teaching Brothers has been a revelation. The series has recently published a 670-page study of De La Salle's Explication de la Méthode d'Oraison.
3. The other letter is on permanent display at the Rheims residence where De La Salle was born and which is now a Lasallian museum.

THE ARCHIVES OF THE GREAT BRITAIN PROVINCE OF THE DE LA SALLE BROTHERS

Bro. Austin Chadwick, F S C

INTRODUCTION

In addition to the Generalate Archives in Rome¹, each of the seventy or so Provinces of the De La Salle Brothers has, or with increasing urgency aims to have, an organised archive of materials relating particularly to its own area of activity.

The Archives of the Great Britain Province are situated at the Provincialate in Oxford, and because the house is new and purpose-built, due provision was made in the plans for the archives. The top floor of the three storey building was designated for this purpose, comprising six rooms with floor spaces as follows: No.1, 432 sq.ft; No.2, 121 sq.ft; No.3, 100 sq.ft; No.4, 361 sq.ft; No.5, 224 sq.ft; and No.6, 294 sq.ft. All rooms were equipped from the start with appropriate shelving and other furniture. The holdings have been distributed in a departmentalised system, and a survey of the use to which each room has been put will form a convenient framework for describing the archive.

THE FOUNDER'S ROOM (ROOM 3)

Although the smallest in size, Room 3 has pride of place in the affections of the Brothers visiting the Provincialate. It is known as 'The Founder's Room', and it contains all holdings directly connected with the life and work of St Jean-Baptiste De La Salle (1651-1719). Six rows of shelving hold 118 box files (15"x11"x4"), the contents of which comprise: (a) published biographies; (b) editions of his writings; (c) published studies of his spirituality and pedagogy.

In the first category are copies of 66 of the published biographies of the Founder, arranged in chronological order of publication, beginning with three that were written shortly after his death by men who had known him personally. They are in various languages, the majority being in French, but with many of them translated into English, as well as works in languages other than French. In fact the most scholarly life of De La Salle to date, the nearest approach to what may be called a critical biography, is by a Spanish Brother, Saturnino Gallego, published in 1986 by the Biblioteca de Autores Cristianos, Madrid. However, English speaking biographers are well-represented in our series, notably by a complete collection of the Lasallian writings of the late Dr W.J. Battersby (Bro. Clair Stanislaus); and the latest biography to be added to the collection is by a member of the Great Britain Province, Bro. Alfred Calcutt: De La Salle: A City Saint and the Liberation of the Poor through Education, pp.650 (1993).

The second category comprises a respectable number of the many editions of the Founder's published writings, including facsimile copies of the first editions of each work² A complete collection of the 51 volumes of the Cahiers LaSalliens series of first editions of De La Salle's works and studies by many scholars forms the most important part of the holdings of the third category housed in this room. Moreover, I think that we hold at least one copy of the many other such principal works to have appeared over the years, published that is independently of the Cahiers series. The most recent acquisition in this section is an assembly of computer diskettes constituting a complete concordance of the writings of the Founder. The computerisation was carried out by the 'Centre Informatique et Bible' of the Benedictine Abbey of Maredsous, Belgium. It will prove an invaluable tool for future students of De La Salle's works. At the touch of a button they will be able to bring up on screen every example of his use of any single word.

The centre-piece of the room's holdings is an original letter of the saint. It is one of only two known letters not held in the Generalate Archives³. How our Provincialate Archives came to possess such a precious item is a curious story. The letter was discovered in 1955 by the then librarian of Ushaw College, the late Fr Bernard Payne, as he was sorting through the manuscript section of the library. He noticed the signature 'De La Salle' and had the generous thought of communicating his discovery to the then De La Salle Provincial, requesting verification and offering to arrange for its donation to the Province. The Ushaw authorities made no difficulties about the transfer, adding but one condition, viz. that 'the relic continue to be conserved in Great Britain' - a clause which the Provincial was only too pleased to accept since it safeguarded the Province from a 'request' from the Superior General in Rome for the deposit of the MS in the Generalate Archives. What is more, the discovery was made, quite fortuitously, and the gift conferred, in the very year in which the Brothers were celebrating the centenary of their arrival in England! The letter now hangs, beautifully framed, and veiled to exclude light, on the principal wall of the Founder's Room, and alongside it is a framed print of the only ancient portrait of De La Salle, which belongs to the English Benedictine Abbey of Douai at Woolhampton.

THE OTHER ROOMS

Room 1, the largest room, houses all the material relating to the De La Salle Province of Great Britain and the Sub-Province of Malta. The material is contained in large archival boxes (16"x14"x10") and the chief items consist of documentation gathered from the Brothers' communities and schools in Great Britain. The boxes are labelled according to the towns concerned and are arranged alphabetically. So far there are 49 boxes in this section, of which 25 relate to establishments from which the Brothers have completely withdrawn. Of the remaining 24 boxes, 11 hold material relating to schools which are no longer under the direction of the Institute, but to which communities are still attached and where a few of their members still work in the school concerned. Only 5 boxes have, as yet, material from schools of which the Headmaster is still a Brother. The remaining boxes relate to communities which have never been school-based. Needless to say, much, perhaps the majority, of the material relating to schools still under the trusteeship of the Institute is still kept by the schools or communities concerned, and to my knowledge some establishments have well-organised archives of their own, e.g. St Joseph's College, Beulah Hill, London, and De La Salle College, Salford. In addition to these 49 'community' boxes there are a further 32 boxes containing documentation of the overall administration of the Province from its beginnings in 1855.

The next largest room, No.4, contains material emanating from the general Institute. Here can be consulted bound volumes of the Bulletin des Ecoles Chretiennes, inaugurated in 1907 and published in French, with interruptions only during the two World Wars, until the late 1960s. From then onwards it was published in the three languages used for all publications from the Institute's central administration in Rome, viz. French, English and Spanish. There are also bound volumes of magazines published by individual communities or schools. This room also houses a complete set of the administrative and pastoral letters addressed by the Superior General to the Institute as a whole from 1870. Also conserved in boxes are a complete series of the 'Notices Nécrologiques' of every Brother who has died in the Institute. These notices are published in quarterly bound volumes from the inauguration of the new format series in 1904 (the year of the expulsion of the Institute from France under the Combe Laws). Until 1967 these notices were published only in French, but the General Chapter held in that year decided to discontinue the centrally-published series, which was now replaced by each Province taking responsibility to prepare and publish its own obituaries. Other boxes in this room contain biographies of individual Brothers, prominent among whom are three canonised saints and nineteen beati. There are also shelves holding box files containing not very abundant material from other Provinces of the Institute; but such material is unsolicited and is given house-room according as it happens to come our way.

Still in descending order of size, Room No.6 houses the beginnings of a Lasallian museum. A valuable holding here is very large collection of photographs, still to be sorted and captioned - wherever needed and wherever possible! - and in due course to be presented in periodical, changing displays. But there are already other interesting objects relating to the history of the Institute, e.g. a tricorne hat of the type worn by the French Brothers up until their expulsion in 1904, and a black skull-cap ('calotte') such as was worn by many Brothers of our own Province. There is also a display case exhibiting medals and decorations conferred on Brothers: Pro Ecclesia et Pontifice; O.B.E.; M.B.E.; Légion d'Honneur, Palmes Académiques etc. The collection is as yet small, and I am always on the look-out for additional accessions, making appeals not only to our own communities but also to foreign Brothers who usually call at the Provincialate during a visit to Great Britain.

PHOTOGRAPHIC LABORATORY

Room 5 is a photographic laboratory. The Assistant Provincial at the time the archive was being established, Brother Benet Conroy, includes among his many skills an expertise in photography, and hence he was able to suggest an appropriate equipping of the laboratory. The room includes developing tanks for films (35mm and 120 film) rectangular and square format, with processing available for colour print film, colour slides, and black and white (up to five 35mm films can be processed at any one time). There are also developing trays and tanks for photographic printing, with tray sizes ranging from 10"x10" to 16"x20", enabling processing for black and white prints. The tanks include a Cylinder type for Cibachrome processing (colour prints from slides) with a motor turntable to rotate the processing tank. There are also three photographic enlargers, of which two are specifically for black and white prints, with filter trays for variable contrast papers, capable of producing prints and enlargements up to 16"x20" with the need to project on to the wall.

The laboratory also houses a Jobo Colour enlarger with full filtering: 35mm and 120 film (square format) and slides. There is a timer for light control; two print copiers with stands and lights (for photographing old photographs for enlargement or preservation); a slide copier for attachment to a 35mm camera for slide copying and enlarging; one flat-bed heated print drier; and other miscellaneous equipment for measuring and storing chemicals, as well as thermometers, tongs, tweezers, squeegees, microenlargers, books on processing, stop clocks to time processing, a meter for reading times of exposure...

CONCLUSION

The remaining room, No.2, is used at present for general storage, including surplus-to-requirement copies of books: there are kept for archival conservation two copies of every publication of the Institute, and the rest are stored in Room No.2, where they are available on request to the communities of Brothers. In this connection I have had the satisfaction of donating substantial consignments of such works to three English-speaking missionary centres, two in Africa (Ethiopia and Nigeria) and one in India.

Although the general disposition of our holdings is thus in place, my work is far from complete. The next task will be the construction, by computer, of a complete inventory of what we have. In this connection I have much to learn, and I would welcome advice from any reader of this journal who has had experience in this field.

RECONSTRUCTING AN ARCHIVE: THE STORY OF PAX

Valerie Flessati

1995 is going to be a year of anniversaries. We will no doubt witness many ceremonies reminding us that it is fifty years since the end of the Second World War, fifty years since the atomic bombing of Hiroshima and Nagasaki, but fifty years, too, since the creation of the United Nations, as the expression of new hope that the world might forever rid itself of the scourge of war.

Pax Christi, the international Catholic peace movement, was founded on that same hope rising from the ashes of the Second World War. Mme Dortel-Claudot, a teacher in the south of France, started in her local parish a crusade of prayer for peace and reconciliation. Today there are national branches in 22 countries. The highlight of Pax Christi's 50th anniversary year will be an international festival in Assisi (26-28 May) during which members will renew their commitment to work for peace.

British Pax Christi members will be among them. However we have an extra piece of history all of our own as the result of a merger, in 1971, between British Pax Christi and an older, English, peace society called simply PAX. It is PAX and its archives that I want to describe in this article.

BRIEF HISTORY OF PAX

PAX began in London in May 1936 after a correspondence in the Catholic Herald about the role of Catholics in any future war. Its founders aimed at 'resistance to modern warfare on grounds of traditional morality'. Believing that 'just war' criteria could no longer be met, they called themselves pacifists.

Although most members were Roman Catholic PAX did not claim to be a 'Catholic society' but a 'society of Catholics and others'. This wording helped PAX to evade too much hierarchical control which would have stifled it from the start. The Church at that time took an opposing view, particularly of conscientious objection. Church authorities attempted to censor PAX literature and on more than one occasion clergy were instructed to resign from the society.

PAX supported conscientious objectors during the Second World War. When membership declined afterwards it continued to publish the PAX Bulletin and to provide a forum where Catholics could debate theological and practical questions of war and peace. An annual conference at Spode House became a key element in this, especially when the peace movement began to swell once again in the late 1950s and early 1960s in response to public concern about nuclear weapons.

By then PAX had gained some distinguished sponsors and a branch in the United States - support which enabled it to influence debate at the Second Vatican Council. In 1965 the Council endorsed the right to conscientious objection and condemned weapons of mass destruction.

As early as 1952 PAX members had heard that a new international Pax Christi movement had been started in Europe with the kind of episcopal approval which PAX had never enjoyed. Pax Christi took root in Britain in 1958 and from then on the paths of the two Catholic peace groups began to converge. The two groups complemented each other well: PAX with its more experienced members and sponsors, valuable publications and conferences, and more literary style; Pax Christi with its youthful energy, activist approach, and established international network. By 1971 a merger became obvious for the sake of a stronger Catholic peace movement, and this was achieved smoothly and gracefully.

ARCHIVES OF LAY SOCIETIES

In 1972 I was appointed the first full-time General Secretary of the recently-merged Pax Christi. In my new office were deposited several cardboard boxes and buff files containing some PAX records, leftover copies of the PAX Bulletin, and the remnants of a lending library. These stayed in a cupboard for ten or more years - only the cupboard changed as we moved premises. No one had time to go through the papers, even though one suspected they might be fascinating. We were too busy getting on with the day to day business of running Pax Christi.

By 1985, ready to return to some studies, I decided to research and write the history of PAX. It was the process of doing this that led to the 'reconstruction' of the PAX archives. This turned out to be a most enjoyable treasure trail. It may also be the kind of trail that other members of the Catholic Archives Society will need to follow if they want to collect and preserve the archives of Catholic lay societies such as those listed in Catholic Archives 10 (1990), some of which are now defunct.

Unlike religious orders and dioceses the voluntary organisations do not always have a sense of their own history or much interest in passing on their tradition. They do not all value their records, nor do they have the time, money, space or staff to look after them. Some of the defunct societies will have petered out for lack of support rather than come to a deliberate end and so their papers - if they have not been thrown out - may be scattered among the possessions of the last chairman, secretary and treasurer.

RECONSTRUCTING THE PAX ARCHIVE

In this respect I was fortunate in that the early members of PAX were conscientious record-keepers. The records deposited with Pax Christi included an almost complete set of Minute books, and an almost complete set of the PAX Bulletin.

As I read through these systematically I made a list of all the important items which were referred to but which were now missing. They included the Minutes of meetings held between 1946 and 1953, nine of the earliest issues of the bulletin, the original statement of principles and 1936 constitution, leaflets which caused particular controversy, correspondence with the Archbishop of Westminster, photographs, some journals in which articles about PAX appeared, and some books either published by PAX or written by its key members. There were 27 groups of documents on the list and today I am pleased to say only a few are still missing.

My first source for the missing material was the older PAX members themselves. I sent the list to about 15 people, asking them to look through their cupboards and bookshelves, but also to let me know of other documents which might not be on the list. My appeal met a generous response. Indeed, some members had been keeping papers, pamphlets and correspondence for years in the hope that one day they might be of use and they were only too glad to hand over their files and regain some extra space in their cupboards!

In the course of my research I visited quite a number of PAX members to record interviews with them. These visits also brought to light many valuable items. If the owners could not part with original photographs or letters, then I was happy to make copies. Other books and pamphlets were gradually accumulated by scanning the shelves of secondhand bookshops. Here is some more detail about the different sorts of records which now form the PAX archive.

MINUTE BOOKS

These books begin with the very first PAX meeting on 8 May 1936, meticulously recorded, and end with the annual general meeting, on 30 October 1971, when PAX was formally amalgamated with Pax Christi. Some of the minutes are signed by Eric Gill, who was Chairman of PAX in 1940, the last year of his life.

There seemed little hope of finding the missing books for the period 1946-1953, although I made enquiries and visited Audrey Henson, a doctor who had been the Secretary of PAX for part of that time. She did not think she had anything left at all. Not long afterwards she died. Several years later, quite unexpectedly, I received a package from Australia which contained an exercise book with the PAX Minutes from 1948-1951, along with membership lists from 1936-1953. Someone was belatedly carrying out her instructions by forwarding these treasures from her estate.

PAX BULLETIN

The PAX Bulletin is a unique resource for anyone interested in the development of Catholic theology on issues of war and peace. It was the one place in which were gathered news items from all over the world, any new Church pronouncement on the subject, with commentary and reports alongside relevant quotations and examples from history. The quality of the writing is excellent - much of it as fresh and inspiring today as it must have been when first printed. Many of PAX's well-known sponsors contributed articles: Thomas Merton, Archbishop Roberts SJ, Bede Griffiths OSB, among them, as well as continental theologians such as Pie Régamey OP, Pierre Lorson SJ, and Franziskus Stratmann OP.

From 1943 onwards the PAX Bulletin was printed - usually quarterly. Unfortunately the only copies still missing (numbers 1,2,4 and 10) were among the earliest issues which were duplicated on to varying sizes of loose paper. Although university and other libraries worldwide eventually subscribed to the PAX Bulletin to find any of these early numbers now seems increasingly unlikely.

PAX PAMPHLETS

I had seen one or two PAX publications apart from the PAX Bulletin and before long, through the generosity of former members, collected a full set for the archives. In 1938-1939 PAX produced six pamphlets putting forward its basic case. They were written by Eric Gill, Nicholas Berdyaev, Luigi Sturzo, E.I. Watkin, Donald Attwater and Gerald Vann OP. Apart from the content the elegance of the printing is striking: they were printed by Hague & Gill. Gill also printed the original PAX publicity leaflets, handbills and posters. These include a notice defining, according to Catholic teaching, the role of conscience in judgements about war. Another leaflet, on The Catholic Church, War and You, would seem unexceptional now but PAX was forbidden to distribute it outside churches.

PAX went on to produce other pamphlets including a compilation of quotations from Leo XIII, Benedict XV, Pius XI and Pius XII on War, Conscience and the Rule of Christ (1942). In the post-war period PAX maintained its pioneering role by publishing Morals and Missiles - Catholic Essays on the Problem of War Today (1959). This provoked a heated debate in the Catholic press about nuclear deterrence.

CORRESPONDENCE

The writing of any history is of course going to be influenced by the type of evidence one has to hand. The quantity of correspondence available - or not - to supply parts of the story can make a great difference. Back issues of the Catholic Herald enabled me to trace the letters which had brought the first PAX members together. E.I. Watkin, the philosopher, had written some of them and had then been invited to draft a statement of principles and to become the first President of PAX. He kept about 100 letters which he had received in response to the PAX initiative, and his daughter kindly let me have copies.

Thank goodness people wrote rather than, phoned in 1936! Their letters add colour and detail to the early tensions as PAX found its focus. There was a fundamental difference of approach. Those at the 'Distributist end' of PAX (including Eric Gill and his supporters) thought that peace could only come about by constructing a new social order: redistributing land, decentralising power, encouraging self-sufficiency, and dismantling industrial society along with the materialism and greed which bred war. This group was largely contemptuous of the state. Individual responsibility and conscience were paramount, especially in relation to participating in war.

At the other end of the spectrum were PAX supporters like Barbara Barclay Carter, who accepted the state as a fact of life and who saw a way forward through states working together to make war less likely. They still hoped that the League of Nations might be able to regulate disputes between states. PAX, they thought, should mobilise Catholics behind such organisations and use political methods to persuade nations to observe contracts under international law. For this group international morality was of greater concern than the personal morality of the individual conscientious objector.

As it turned out the Distributist view prevailed in PAX until 1945. During the Second World War PAX encouraged its members, especially the COs, to form communities on the land. Afterwards, some of them became involved in a new Catholic land movement, Pax in Terra. But when PAX itself regrouped and refocussed after the war it adopted a much narrower agenda than before, more strictly confined to questions of Christianity and militarism. It could be argued that whatever successes were achieved at the Second Vatican Council would not have occurred without this shift towards more winnable goals.

TENSIONS WITH THE BISHOPS

Another aspect of PAX history which showed up chiefly through correspondence was the recurring conflict with successive Archbishops of Westminster. One supposes that for reasons of discretion not much of this appeared in the Minutes or in the newsletter. Some letters from the PAX side had been kept by Donald Attwater (first Chairman) and subsequent officers of PAX. I found the other half of the correspondence in the Westminster Diocesan Archives. The bishops' attitude to PAX cannot be disguised. When it was not portrayed as actually dangerous PAX was regarded as a collection of cranks. 'One realises that most of these people are a bit cracked,' wrote one archbishop to another!

PAX took an independent and unwelcome line by adopting an impartial approach to the Spanish Civil War, by upholding the right of Catholics to be conscientious objectors, by criticising hierarchies for echoing the national interests of their respective governments during the war, and later by questioning the morality of nuclear deterrence. Why did this tiny organisation meet such hostility? First of all, because PAX's assertion that the individual conscience had to be the judge in these matters was perceived as a threat to unity and authority in the Church. But more than that, PAX's attitude might jeopardise the efforts of the hierarchy to prove that Catholics were loyal and patriotic citizens, to shake off historic suspicions about papist treachery, and to win a respected position for Catholics in the life of the nation. Subversive questions about defence also challenged the Church's implacable opposition to Communism.

BUILDING A NETWORK

Through the 1950s and 1960s PAX struggled to overcome its dissident image by winning some respectable allies. This period is well represented in the PAX archives because Charles Thompson, editor of the PAX Bulletin and later Chairman, carefully kept and passed on all his papers.

These provide evidence of the solid and steady work of PAX to build up support. There were international contacts with the Catholic Worker in the United States² and with small, similar groups trying to frame legislation permitting conscientious objection in other European countries.

Of enormous importance was a long-standing connection with the Dominicans. This went back to Illtud Evans, who as a young man had been one of the founders of PAX, and Gerald Vann, who had started in 1936 a 'Union of Prayer for Peace'. These and other Dominicans provided personal guidance and theological clarity on many occasions. The most fruitful collaboration between Charles Thompson and Conrad Pepler OP brought about the annual Peace conferences at Spode House from which sprang so many initiatives.

It was at Spode in 1959 that PAX discussed a strategy for the Vatican Council which had recently been announced. Archbishop Roberts disclosed that he had written to Rome, proposing that the morality of war and the rights of conscience should be given priority on the Council agenda. He dreamed of a preparatory 'Council of Survival' at which soldiers, scientists, historians and economists, with theologians from all Christian traditions, would unite to study the practical requirements for peace. Such a preliminary study would enable the Council Fathers to have a much more informed debate and to arrive at a much more authoritative verdict.

PAX started to campaign on these proposals by circulating a petition and by writing to the superiors of religious orders. Letters in the PAX archives hint at the difficulties which Archbishop Roberts faced. In 1960 he was delated to Rome for speaking so openly about nuclear warfare and for associating with PAX. In the event Roberts was never called to address the Council, but instead made a strong written submission on conscientious objection.

BEDE GRIFFITHS AND THOMAS MERTON

Thanks to Charles Thompson's persistence in following up any signs of interest among the clergy we possess some illuminating letters from Bede Griffiths and Thomas Merton, both of whom became sponsors of PAX. Those from Griffiths (1956-1966) demonstrate his changing attitude to war. At the outset he regarded war as unfortunate but legitimate, and saw pacifism, like monasticism, as a vocation or 'counsel of perfection' for the minority. After reading the books which Thompson sent him he admitted to a more sympathetic understanding of nonviolence in the way that Gandhi used it, as a positive force for justice. Griffiths contributed articles to the PAX Bulletin, to Morals and Missiles, and he addressed a memorable PAX conference in 1963 at which Dorothy Day was also a speaker.

Thomas Merton sent a subscription to PAX in 1961 when he was becoming more involved with the peace movement in America. His letters contain interesting comments about his admiration for aspects of the English Catholic tradition, and for the stand which PAX had taken on war. Much of the correspondence is about plans for various publications and he sent over a number of articles and talks which PAX could reproduce. The most substantial was a duplicated book called Peace in the Post-Christian Era. But this had to be circulated privately because in 1962 Merton's superiors ordered him not to publish anything new about war and peace. 'The book was not condemned' he wrote to Thompson, 'It was simply forbidden because the topic was not considered to be proper for a "contemplative monk" . . .' In 1964 he reported 'I am still not able to write on war' but he kept in close touch with PAX and with the American peace activists who were preparing for the Vatican Council debate.

THE AMERICAN PAX ASSOCIATION

By the 1960s the Catholic Worker had been the centre for three decades of what there was of an American Catholic peace movement. It had engendered an Association of Catholic Conscientious Objectors during the Second World War. In 1961 Dorothy Day, Eileen Egan and Gordon Zahn were among those who formed a branch of PAX. Their letters to British colleagues describe their initial problems. It was a difficult decade with the Vietnam war dividing American society. The provocative tactics of Catholic protesters like the Berrigan brothers were seen as either prophetic or subversive. Civil disobedience was the subject of fierce debate and personal turmoil throughout the rest of the peace movement too.

Nevertheless American PAX maintained a steady campaign directed towards the Vatican Council. They sent a special peace issue of the Catholic Worker to every bishop who would be attending. It contained detailed comments on the draft passages in Schema 13 which became Gaudium et Spes (The Church in the Modern World).

PAX members from both sides of the Atlantic were in Rome for the 1964 and 1965 sessions to lobby individual bishops, to talk to the press, and to work with Archbishop Roberts and other sympathisers, in order to get the right wording into the final documents. The key points were the unacceptability of indiscriminate warfare, and the right of the individual conscience to refuse participation in war. PAX members were enormously gratified that some of the most influential speeches on peace were made by English Bishops Wheeler, Beck and Grant, and by Abbot Butler.

OTHER SOURCES

Although not strictly part of the PAX archives there were other sources which proved essential in piecing together the history of PAX. To find out what happened to Catholic conscientious objectors during the war I went through the tribunal records of the Central Board for Conscientious Objectors, picking out those applicants who said they were RC or whose names I recognised from PAX. They came, like all the other COs, from every walk of life. The marked difference was that they had less support from their clergy than any other denomination. One tribunal judge asked why he had not seen a single Catholic priest speaking up for any applicant.

As I collected PAX material from various people I was pleased to accept additional papers relating to associated small groups. There were, for example, a few items from the pre-war Catholic Land Movement and from Pax in Terra which operated for a short time after it. Some newsletters called The Catholic Peacemaker were produced by the Society of the Peace of Christ (c.1944-1946), a short-lived project organised by a breakaway group who thought they might achieve more ecclesiastical support than PAX itself. Of more significance was the Catholic Nuclear Disarmament Group (c.1959-1964) which pre-dated Christian CND. The CNDG banner was the rallying point for Catholics on the Aldermaston marches.

Of course PAX members kept newspaper cuttings about their own activities and letters to the press. They also kept some scrapbooks with clippings from The Times and the religious press about the issues they followed - for example, during the H-bomb debate of the 1950s. These specific collections were very useful and certainly saved the historian a great deal of time. So too did the PAX library which I was also trying to reconstruct. Housed at the Pax Christi office in London, it includes some quite rare pacifist tracts from between the wars.

INTERVIEWS

Many readers will have discovered for themselves the value of interviews in providing the kind of background which you cannot always glean from paper records: thumbnail sketches about people's appearance and character; a sense of the atmosphere and a feeling for the times. The most pervasive quality which my PAX veterans displayed was modesty. Each one told me that they had really done nothing; I should be talking to someone else. Then it turned out, for instance, that they had 'only' produced the newsletter for twenty years, or kept PAX going through its darkest days when there were hardly any other supporters. The persistence and commitment of these pioneers was impressive.

The story of PAX should encourage everybody who is struggling in an unpopular cause. It is a story of hidden witness: slow, painstaking, and largely unspectacular work, often in the face of substantial opposition, and of people tenaciously keeping alive a tradition which might otherwise have been unrepresented in the Church.

NOTES

1. PAX never exceeded about 600, although up to 1,000 people were on the mailing list for the PAX Bulletin.
2. Founded in 1933 by Peter Maurin and Dorothy Day.

THE LURE OF THE VATICAN ARCHIVES:
A LONG-CENTURY OF NORDIC RESEARCH

Rev. F.J. Bullivant, OMI

One sign of a 'thaw' in the ecumenical climate of Northern Europe during recent years has been a wider and growing interest among Nordic Lutheran church historians and others in the pre-Reformation history of their countries through the several centuries of Catholic Christian past. For much of that period, of course, an indispensable source is the holdings of the Vatican Archives: indeed, since soon after the 1939-45 War quite a number of individual Scandinavian researchers, mostly Swedes and Danes, have come down to Rome and become users of the Vatican Archives.

And yet, pan-Scandinavian research therein has a long pedigree going back over a century and a third to the pioneering achievements of the Norwegian polymath Peter Andreas Munch (1810-63), as well as the later teamwork of Danish, Swedish and Norwegian scholars during a dozen years around 1900 and, not least, the subsequent ten 'expeditions' spread over the post-1914-18 War period from 1920 to 1939.

In the British Isles and continental Europe, not to mention further afield, there was and remains - as far as I know - hardly any awareness of the persevering enterprize of these Scandinavian researchers whose 'Aladdin' was P.A.Munch during the years 1859-61. Hence, perhaps it may be of interest to readers if I explain briefly how I became aware thereof.

Having in 1972 and 1976 located in the Vatican Archives two documents relevant to Icelandic church history, previously unpublished, and subsequently contributed towards the publishing of them in Iceland, I was invited by the (Lutheran) Divinity Faculty Church History Department of the University of Iceland - seconded by the National Manuscript Institute - to give two public lectures on the Vatican Archives in Reykjavik in late 1984. It was through researching for these that I came to learn about the labours of P.A.Munch and his later successors; a further outcome of this research was a lecture entitled 'P.A.Munch, a pioneer angler, and pan-Scandinavian fishing in the Vatican Archives (1858. . . 1939-)', given under the auspices of the Institutum Romanum Norvegiae in May 1985; and then, more recently, a revised and adapted version thereof, 'Nordic ecumenical trawling "sub anulo Piscatoris"', was presented at the 1993 annual conference of this Society.

The former occasion (1985), I recall, seemed to me rather like, mutatis mutandis, a Norwegian trying to tell a British audience about Munch's contemporary, the historian Lord Macaulay (1800-59)! But, in fact, Munch did have certain links with these islands, i.a. in the late 1840s he travelled to the Orkneys, the Hebrides, Scotland and England pursuing his research-studies; later, he was made an honorary member of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland, as well as a corresponding member of the (English) Royal Geographical Society; besides, it was said within his family that their paternal ancestor had originally come over from England.

A POLYMATH PATRIOT IN THE MAKING

Munch was born in 1810, the eldest child - ten siblings followed - of a devout Lutheran family, his father being a minister (and uncle a future bishop), and christened Peter Andreas - thereby distantly evoking two fishermen! During his school and university years he acquired a wide range of literary, linguistic, philological and historical knowledge; he became a fervent Norwegian patriot and this spurred him on to profound study of his country's history. He earned his living mainly as a university teacher, though lecturing was not his forte. He had married, at 25, a minister's daughter and their union was blessed with a son and then four daughters, all of whom he loved dearly and was their much-beloved father. Doubtless, 'absence made the heart grow fonder' when his historical research took him abroad, as in the 1840s and in the early 1850s when we have found him working in archives and libraries in Denmark, and in Germany as well.

By the mid-1850s, now in his mid-forties, Munch was busy writing a magnum opus, his History of the Norwegian People; but as he progressed through the Middle Ages, reaching the latter 13th century, the native Nordic sources began to dry up and, as he well knew, he now had to search elsewhere, seeking untapped sources abroad, notably in Berlin, Vienna and, most of all, in the Vatican Archives in faraway Rome. As foreseen, he was a welcome visitor in those transalpine cities, but the Vatican Archives was a different 'kettle of fish'. All along the way, his fellow-historians warned him not to waste his time trying to gain access thereto, because those of them who had already made attempts had all been denied entry. But Munch was not convinced, nor easily put off. While in Copenhagen, he had made friends with Mgr Djunkowsky, Prefect Apostolic of the Arctic Missions, and in Vienna made the acquaintance of, and was entertained by, Cardinal-Archbishop Rauscher, both of whom assured him of their goodwill and support in Rome.

And so, he had his family (wife and four daughters) join him in Vienna, whence they set off on the long journey to Rome, which they reached in early December 1858.

THE 'ALADDIN' AND 'PATHFINDER'

Given the political circumstances within the Papal States at the end of 1858-and, by then, Pius IX (Pio Nono) had already been pope for a dozen years -, it seems astonishing, and surely calls for explanation, that within a few weeks of arrival in the papal capital, this most worthy son of a Norwegian manse was happily ensconced in the Prefect of the Vatican Archives' own work-room, where, if he so wished, he could pursue his research 'from 8 in the morning till dusk' - and all during a period when outsiders were refused access! How on earth, one may ask, did Munch gain such a unique privilege?¹

The fact is, this patriotic polymath was sui generis: among his various artistic and intellectual gifts were sharp perspicacity and a flair for getting to the bottom of problems; extremely shrewd, he could also be most charming. His successful 'strategy' is revealed in his letters home to colleagues and state authorities mostly, in Norway and Sweden. Briefly, he perceived that others' lack of success was mainly due to their wrong approach and, primarily, failing to win the favour and enlist the goodwill of those persons in Rome in a position to help them. In contrast, Munch's policy was 'as far as possible, to proceed differently, i.e. to do my best to make myself persona grata' and, he adds, 'First and foremost, it has proved a real asset that I brought my family here with me. . . (thus) I do not inhabit some shabby artist's digs, nor need to frequent disreputable taverns, (but instead) can receive people who pay me a return-visit in decent surroundings - in short, maintain a more respectable standing in society here. . . '

First to pay the Munchs a 'contravisit' was a friend from Copenhagen, none other than the Prefect-Apostolic of the Arctic Missions, Mgr Djunkowsky, who, true to his word, proffered advice and began pulling strings in his friend's behalf. On 30 December 1858 Professor Munch of the Royal University of Christiania (Oslo) was received in private audience by the Pope! Gratefully, the Norwegian Lutheran presented Pius IX with a special copy of his hefty book on Trondheim Cathedral, just published, and soon after their meeting, recorded that the Pope 'displayed the greatest benevolence and graciousness towards me. He conversed with me at length and gave me the best of assurances' and later commented 'It's always good to have the Pope himself up one's sleeve.' Munch had thus succeeded in charming the holder of the Fisherman's Ring; meanwhile, again thanks to Djunkowsky, he had been getting acquainted with the keeper of the documents sealed therewith, namely Pater Augustin Theiner (1804-74), Prefect of the Vatican Archives .

THE MUNCH - THEINER RELATIONSHIP

Writing to his friend and contemporary, C. Lange (1810-61), the Norwegian State Archivist, Munch relates: 'the greatly-feared Theiner has, from our first meeting turned out to be a very friendly as well as reasonable man; indeed, on my taking leave of him, I was somewhat taken aback when he formally embraced and virtually kissed me, to betoken his joy at being able to welcome -in his words - a sound scholar who realizes the value, and knows how to make use, of the treasures to be found in the Archives.' Theiner's words were music to Munch's ears; he longed now for their tangible fulfilment - and soon words were matched by deeds. Already in February 1859, Munch was able to write back to Scandinavia: 'I have acquired an up till now unheard-of thing - my own comfortable place in Theiner's own workroom. . . , where '(he) has made available to me. . . up till now completely unknown historical treasures. . . of whose existence I had not even dreamt'; 'All of it had never until now been brought forth, and this is the first time that it has seen the light of day since it was (c.1330) sent in to the Curia'; '(Theiner) told me. . . "You are the first outsider ever to set eyes thereon"', and went on to say that Munch's being allowed to transcribe directly from original texts was 'a privilege which had not, within living memory, been granted to any outsider. . . ' Some months later, towards the end of his first year in Rome, Munch pauses to reflect: ' . . . at present, I remain not only the sole Norwegian, but also perhaps the sole Protestant, even European, to have enjoyed the advantage of such access to the Vatican's ARCANA. . . '

Yet, by no means was it a case of all taking and no giving, for Munch was able to help Theiner with his historical research in various ways - for a start, Munch knew German and spoke it; but, to explore their mutual collaboration and developing personal relationship would require another article! In passing, it is noteworthy that, nearly forty years afterwards, one of Munch's pan-Scandinavian successors, the Swede Karlsson, detected evidence of that mutual collaboration. Here, it must suffice to mention one instance thereof, when two heads, even those of Theiner and Munch, proved better than one; their discovery concerning many volumes of 14th century papal registers (Avignon period) largely extant on paper as well as on parchment, that it was the paper ones, hitherto ipso facto disregarded, which were the originals, having sometimes fuller texts, whereas the parchment ones were later copies and sometimes shortened.

Before long, Munch came to realize, for example, from hints dropped by Theiner, that the German Prefect's tenure was not altogether secure: hence 'make hay while the sun shines' became, so-to-say, Munch's motto, spurring him on during his many hours 'daily toil for his country's sake, on top of which he did much work for Sweden and less for Denmark at home, mostly in the evenings.

MAN PROPOSES, GOD DISPOSES

After two and a quarter years of such sustained labour, by the spring of 1861, Munch judged that he had largely acquitted the task undertaken for Norway; moreover, the (paid) leave-of-absence from his professorship and his research-grant from the national Treasury were both running out; the time had come for the Munchs to return to their homeland. But 'man proposes, God disposes': his wife was in poor health, so Munch entrusted her to the care of their four daughters and set out from Rome on his own. An exhausting nine days' journey by land and sea ended, not in a happy homecoming but in a sorrowful disembarking - Munch was straightaway confronted with the shocking news of the sudden death of his frequent correspondent, Chr. Lange, the State Archivist, with whom he had hoped to discuss the results of his work in Rome. So now, instead of returning there that summer to fetch home his family, he had to face the prospect of filling his dead colleague's shoes - in October he was appointed pro tem. to that post, while still holding his history professorship. One consolation was that this new responsibility entailed visits to Stockholm; these enabled him to fulfil also his longing to see again his son Edward, an officer in the Royal Guard; and, in 1862, he there received - in recognition of his services to Swedish history - the Order of the North Star, conferred personally by the King.

During almost two years, while lodging with his married sister in Christiania (Oslo), he kept on working long hours editing the fruits of his Vatican Archives research, as well as writing and publishing further volumes of his magnum opus. But, alas!, his health was becoming undermined, and now, at last, in April 1863, he took upon himself the journey back to Rome, mostly overland this time, lasting two weeks. He arrived feeling unwell, having caught a cold en route and, sad-to-say, the writing was on the wall. Within less than a month he suffered a stroke; after rallying for a dozen days, he was stricken again and, surrounded by his distraught wife and four daughters, expired. He had departed from his native land at Easter, he died in Rome on Whitmonday (25 May) and, two days later, was laid to rest in that city's 'Protestant cemetery'.

MUNCH'S ENDURING INFLUENCE AND LATER SUCCESSORS

Munch's untimely death in 1863 at the rather early age of 52, caused evidently by driving himself too hard, also ended prematurely the unique relationship with Theiner and, thereby, Scandinavian research in the Vatican Archives for the (then) foreseeable future. But back in his homeland he would not be forgotten, for his posthumous influence was lasting, thanks both to his many published works and to the remaining quantity of his so far unpublished Vatican transcripts conserved in Christiania (Oslo), Stockholm and Copenhagen. In passing, it seems odd that his wife who had been too ill to travel back to Norway with him in 1861 should have outlived him by nearly forty years; had Munch himself survived even half that long, he could have witnessed the action of Pius IX's successor (Leo XIII) in the 'opening' of the Vatican Archives in 1880/1. Nevertheless, his posthumous influence did reach that far, and beyond, because, for those incoming scholars who could read German, there became available in 1880 a translation into that language of Munch's little book, the first-ever guide to the Vatican Archives, published in Christiania (Oslo) in 1876, which, though composed already in 1860, had been embargoed by its author not to appear until after Theiner's death (1874).

Apparently, Munch's output of transcripts, dutifully sent, or brought back, to Scandinavia during 1859-61/3 must have kept interested scholars in Norway, Sweden and Denmark busy over some thirty years, because a dozen years passed after the 'opening' of the Vatican Archives before a new Scandinavian face appeared on the scene, that of a librarian from the Royal Library in Stockholm, B. Lundstedt (1846-1914) in 1893. This Swede was the one who, an 1894 Norwegian Government document reveals, had been urged by a Vatican librarian/archivist to persuade Norway also to send a researcher down to Rome to work alongside the Dane (L. Moltesen, 1865-1950) and the Swede (K.H. Karlsson, 1857-1909) who had arrived already the previous year (1894); and so it was that the scholar who had published Munch's handbook (G. Storm, 1845-1903) was seconded, in Norway's behalf, to join the other two that same autumn (1895).

Thirty-five years earlier, their polymath predecessor had proved no 'dog in the manger', having furnished transcripts also for Sweden and even for Denmark. Munch's commendable spirit of sharing would seem to have descended upon his successors; it was ever a characteristic of their method of working, from 1894 onwards, that they aided one another, e.g. when one (two) of the countries was (were) unrepresented, then the two (one) present covered for the absent one(s) – an exemplary policy, surely, for all archivists everywhere! Nor did what they owed to Munch go unrecorded, for instance, Karlsson praised his 'epoch-making researches' (1905), while the Dane, A. Krarup (1872-1950) recalled 'the great pathfinder for all Nordic research in the Vatican Archives' (1942). These scholars' combined consequent output of transcripts, in turn, was followed by a decade's 'digestion' thereof in their homelands before, and during, the First World War.

En passant, this northernmost fellowship merited a rare continental European mention in the report (1903) by a contemporary Belgian Benedictine Vatican Archives researcher who gives us an eye-witness's glimpse of the zeal and good-will reigning, a score of years after the 'opening' of the Vatican Archives, among his eager-beaver colleagues:

'Dès 8.20 on aperçoit les travailleurs se diriger en hâte vers le local des archives par petits groupes ou isolement; on voit que pour eux TIME IS MONEY. Ils viennent de tous pays, ils sont de toutes confessions et cependant il règne entre eux une bonne confraternité. Le protestant allemand salue aussi gentiment le capuchin que ses collègues scandinaves ou autrichiens; le chartreux travailler à côté d'un ecclésiastique allemand, et le bénédictin aura pour aimables voisins un dominicain, un pénitencier de St-Pierre et un savant finlandais. . . a la condition toutefois de ne pas voler une minute de leur temps de travail'.

and he also notes:

'Les pays de Nord montrèrent un intérêt aussi vif que ceux du centre de l'Europe. . . à partir de 1894. . . et depuis lors elles (missions) n'ont cessé d' être renouvelées. . .'

and adds that, in the reference library (Sala Leonina),

'La France, l'Angleterre, la Russie, les pays du Nord ont leur compartiment respectif.'²

Comparably, a few years later, a new colleague 'du Nord' (the Norwegian, O. Kolsrud, 1885-1945) observed:

'On coming into the Vatican Archives early in the morning, one sees the diligent scholars at their research. . . laymen and clergy side by side:

sockless brown Franciscans with their dangling rosary-beads, black long-cloaked clerics, dandified young post-graduates, dust-covered absent-minded professors, patient Italian copyists. . . {all busy} from 8.30 till 11.45 when the invigilator rings his bell, whereat they shut their hefty codexes and these are borne away by the Vatican attendants. . . '

FRESH 'FISHING' IN 'THE POPES' POND'

Understandably, during the years of the 1914-18 War there was a hiatus in pan-Scandinavian research within the Vatican Archives, though doubtless various 'follow-up' work continued back home in the North. Not until 1920 was it resumed, but now from the re-start it was an organised 'expedition', led this time by a new Swede, L.M. Baath (1874-1960) who enlisted two experienced researchers from the earlier group (around 1900), the senior national archivist, Krarup (Denmark) and Kolsrud (Norway) to form a renewed 'troika'. For them, as for other post-War researchers, a most important time-saving factor was now the possibility of having photostats of documents made in the Archives, whereby transcriptions could be done at leisure back in their homelands. This enterprise was pursued nine times more, with a break of four years' follow-up (1929-32), until almost the outbreak of the 1939-45 World War. From 1923, Finland too had thrice sent its representative (Aarno Maliniemi, 1892-1972) to work alongside the three Scandinavians. Once again, one can only applaud the spirit of co-operation which animated all the researchers of these ten 'expeditions' - and commend it to archivists everywhere!.

Early in this article, I opined that in 'continental Europe' there remains 'hardly any awareness of the persevering enterprise of these Scandinavian researchers'; one indication of this is that a centenary book, published in 1983, on the use of the Vatican Archives (cf. Note 1) includes a sole, incidental and passing, reference - by an aged Italian scholar - to the 'EXPEDITIO SCANDINAVA', while its twelve-page Index does not include a single one of their names! (i.e. from 1893 onwards).

A 'FISH' THAT NEARLY GOT AWAY

Not long before the advent in 1895 of the earliest 'troika' of Scandinavians, a German Lutheran scholar, in 1892, had sought guidance within the Vatican Archives from the chief cataloguer among the archivists, but received the smiling reply: 'Bisogna pescare!' (You have to fish about!).³ After all the Nordic 'trawling' described above, one might well imagine that any subsequent endeavours would amount to 'overfishing' in 'the Pope's pond'; so, let me try to elucidate an actual case of a 'fish' that nearly 'got away'.

It is a document of some importance for both Norwegian and, more so, Icelandic church history during the pontificate of Boniface VIII, from the year 1303. Munch was evidently unaware of its existence for, otherwise, he would surely have made use of it in his History of the Norwegian People; nor, apparently, did any of the earlier Scandinavian group come across it, because anyway they were concentrating on the post-1316 period, having decided to rely, for the time being, on the École Française (Rome) researchers who were methodically covering the prior period from 1198 (Innocent III) onwards.

The first post-War Scandinavian 'expedition' of 1920 commenced by going back over that earlier (1198-1316) period, making use also of the fruits of the École Française enterprise published so far. But, unfortunately for the new 'troika', publishing in Paris had been held up because of the War, so that the École Française volume including 1303 did not appear until 1921 just one year too late for them. (This volume, in fact, does contain an extract - approximately one third - from the Boniface VIII letter).

The second - tenth Scandinavian 'expeditions' returned again to the later (1316-1527) period. Not until 1983 was this document made known in Scandinavia (Norway), but - being based on the École Française publication - still only one third of it. At long last, in 1984, its full text was made known in Reykjavík and, the following year, published there, thanks to a Lutheran church historian (Jónas Gíslason) of the University of Iceland's Divinity Faculty!. (I hazard the guess that there was a 'queue' to consult documents of Boniface VIII, from Theiner (as historian) to the later École Française scholars - based on the deduction that Munch did not, apparently, get to see them, and nor are they included in a listing of papal registers by Karlsson in 1900).

POSTSCRIPT

Indirectly related to all the above, this year I was invited to attend the annual remembrance of P.A.Munch in Rome on Norway's national day (17 May); this event takes place around his tomb within the 'non-Catholic' cemetery at the foot of the Pyramid near St Paul's Gate. There, fittingly, is also the grave of B. Lundstedt, the Swede who, a century ago, was instrumental in promoting fresh pan-Scandinavian 'fishing' in 'the Pope's pond'.

THE BRITISH CATHOLIC AUTHORS COLLECTION IN THE BURNS LIBRARY AT BOSTON COLLEGE

Ronald D. Patkus

INTRODUCTION

The John J. Burns Library of Rare Books and Special Collections is part of the Boston College library system. As its title implies, the Burns Library serves as the home for many of the University's unique and valuable research sources. Today the library houses more than one hundred thousand books and over four million manuscripts.

The Burns Library was dedicated in 1986. Named in honor of Judge John J. Burns (1901-1957), a distinguished alumnus of Boston College, the new library continues a long tradition of interest in special collections at the University. At present areas of strength include Bostoniana, Irish culture and history, the history of Boston College, the book arts, Jesuitana, Nursing, Catholic Liturgy and Life, Detective Fiction, ethnic studies of Africa and the Caribbean, Massachusetts and American politics, and British Catholic authors.

Boston College has developed its British Catholic Authors Collection over the course of more than fifty years. Today the Collection documents the Catholic experience in Britain from 1829 (the date of the Catholic Emancipation Act) to the present. The various components of this Collection are both interesting and valuable from a research perspective.

THE THOMPSON-MEYNELL CIRCLE

The foundation for the British Catholic Authors Collection was laid by Terence L. Connolly, SJ, who served as University Librarian from 1946 to 1959. Father Connolly was very involved in efforts to collect in two special areas: the life and works of the British poet Francis Thompson (1859-1907), and Irish culture and history. The beginnings of the British Catholic Authors Collection, therefore, can be traced back to the very beginnings of Special Collections at Boston College.

Father Connolly became interested in Francis Thompson while teaching English Literature. He wanted to collect primary source material which would assist in the study of the poet's works. In 1937 Seymour Adelman's collection of Thompsoniana, then considered the second largest such collection in existence, was purchased by Boston College. In 1948 the largest collection, that kept by Wilfred Meynell, Thompson's longtime friend and literary executor, also became part of the University's holdings. Other items of interest have been added in the years since.

During the summer of 1994, for instance, a William Butler Yeats letter to Wilfred Meynell, expressing condolences on the death of Thompson, was added to the collection.

The Thompson collection includes letters, literary manuscripts, articles and publications, and first editions of books. It includes such items as the Ushaw College Notebook (which features some of the poet's earliest creative efforts), the original holograph manuscript of 'The Hound of Heaven,' and the essay on Shelley. There are also a number of signed reviews by Thompson, and copies of unique printed volumes of Thompson's poetry. Today the collection ranks as the largest one of its kind in the world.

The Thompson collection is complemented by holdings on other British Catholic writers. Of special note are books and manuscripts which together make up the Meynell Collection. Alice Meynell (1847-1922) and Wilfrid Meynell (1852-1948) were central figures in the world of English Catholic letters. Mrs Meynell is known primarily as a poet, though she produced a variety of literary works. She was highly regarded by her contemporaries, and some even felt that she should succeed Tennyson as poet laureate upon the latter's death. The holdings on Alice Meynell are extensive, and include reviews, essays, and a number of autograph letters to friends and fellow writers. There is also a large collection of the poet's published works, including first editions of her books of poetry, such as Preludes, The Rhythm of Life, and The Colour of Life.

Wilfred Meynell was a journalist and editor. At the request of Cardinal Manning he edited the Weekly Register from 1881-1899, and later, with the assistance of his wife Alice, he founded Merry England, a monthly journal devoted largely to the promotion of arts and letters. In addition to a complete run of Merry England, the library is fortunate to possess a collection of letters written by and to Wilfred Meynell. The letters date between 1881 and 1947, and reveal much about Meynell's various interests and activities. There are also a number of letters to Meynell in the Thompson collection.

The Meynells raised a large family, and a number of children pursued literary interests. Francis Meynell founded Nonesuch Press, and Everard wrote one of the earliest biographies of Francis Thompson. Viola Meynell (1886-1956) became especially known for her books Alice Meynell: A Memoir and Francis Thompson and Wilfred Meynell: A Memoir. The Burns Library holds a sampling of her letters, primarily notes written to a publisher toward the end of her life. The Sasnett-Meynell Collection, also housed in the library, contains additional letters from Viola and Wilfred Meynell to J. Randolph Sasnett, mostly dating from the 1930s.

Moving among the Thompson-Meynell circle was Coventry Patmore (1823-1896). A friend of Tennyson and Ruskin, and an early contributor to pre-Raphaelite publications, Patmore converted to Catholicism in 1864 and was known for the mystical quality of his poetry. Patmore knew Thompson and for many years was a friend of Alice Meynell. ♪

The Burns Library holds a large collection of material relating to Patmore. The collection is comprised mainly of letters, printed works (in both book and periodical format), and manuscripts. There are more than eighty autograph letters of Patmore, written to such figures as the Meynells, William Allingham, and others. Letters to Patmore can also be found; correspondents include Tennyson, Thompson, and Dante Gabriel Rossetti. Among the printed works are first editions, and a substantial number of works about or related to the poet. There are many periodical articles as well, including critical appraisals of Patmore's work, and appraisals by Patmore of the work of others. One may find, for instance, the obituary for Patmore written by Wilfred Meynell for The Academy, and articles on the poems of Alice Meynell and Francis Thompson by Patmore, which appeared in the Fortnightly Review. Finally, there are original manuscripts of Patmore poems, such as 'Dieu et ma Dame', and 'Aglaia'. One manuscript of special note is an autograph draft of 'The Angel in the House', presented to Alice Meynell by Patmore. The Patmore collection is completed with copies of Patmore letters (especially to Edmund Gosse), and original letters of Harriet Patmore and other members of the Patmore family.

Other members of the Thompson-Meynell circle include Wilfred Scawen Blunt (1840-1922), Christopher Dawson (1889-1970), and Henry Austin Dobson (1840-1921). The library possesses average research collections on these writers, composed primarily of published works.

The Thompson and Meynell collections offer a wealth of resources to those interested in British Catholic literature during the late nineteenth and early twentieth century. The Patmore collection does so too, but also provides much material dating from the mid-1800s. Other collections in the Burns Library document important aspects of the nineteenth century.

OTHER NINETEENTH CENTURY COLLECTIONS

The Hopkins Family Papers contain material relating to the Jesuit poet Gerard Manley Hopkins (1844-1889), his parents Manley Hopkins (1818-1897) and Catherine Smith Hopkins (1821-1920), his siblings, and other related families. Manuscript material of Hopkins is considered especially rare, since the poet destroyed much of his early work. The Burns Library is fortunate to possess an autograph letter to fellow pupil Charles Luxmoore, dated 7 May 1862, and believed to be the second letter extant of Hopkins. There are also a number of letters written by Hopkins near the time of his conversion to Catholicism to his friend William Urquhart. In part the letters discuss revisions of poems and other literary subjects. Other miscellaneous items include Hopkins' personal annotated Bible, photographs, and various newspaper clippings.

A substantial section of the Hopkins Family Papers concern Manley and Catherine Hopkins. Manley was a churchwarden, diplomat and poet. There are many letters, official documents, and photographs concerning Manley Hopkins' role in developing diplomatic ties between Hawaii and Great Britain. These items are especially interesting for the information they provide on the culture of Hawaii. The elder Hopkins' more creative side is evidenced in his poetry, sheet music, artwork, and prose. The Papers also include poems, music, and artwork of other members of the Hopkins family. There are photographs of the parents, children, and relatives as well. Together the items reveal a keen interest in the arts and literature among the Hopkins family.

In connection with Gerard Manley Hopkins it is worth noting that the Burns Library also holds the Papers of Rev. William Van Etten Casey (1914-1990), a Jesuit theologian and Hopkins scholar. Casey wrote Immortal Diamond: A Jesuit in Poet's Corner, a play about Hopkins, and various articles on the poet. His papers provide additional insight into the meaning of Hopkins' work.

Other prominent Catholic churchmen of the period are represented in the holdings at the Burns Library. In recent years there have been notable additions to the John Henry Cardinal Newman (1801-1890) Collection. The library currently houses approximately fifty letters of Newman, dating from 1853 to 1890, the period following his conversion to Rome and the establishment of The Oratory at Birmingham. In the correspondence Newman discusses such topics as the work of students, the hiring of professors, and philosophical essays. The letters are complemented by a small collection of published materials relating to Newman and the Oxford Movement.

There is also a small collection of letters to and from Henry Edward Cardinal Manning (1808-1892). These items are similar to the letters in the Newman collection in that they too cover a broad period of time, dating from 1847-1891. The bulk of the letters were written while Manning served as Archbishop of Westminster. They primarily concern Manning's daily duties.

Life in England during the nineteenth century is also documented in the Woodruff-Acton Family Papers. This collection includes a number of interesting items created by members of the two families. Of special interest are diaries and notebooks of the 1st Baron Acton, John Emerich Edward (1834-1902), the 2nd Baron Acton, Richard Maximilian (1870-1924), and his wife Dorothy Lyon Acton (d. 1923).

EARLY TWENTIETH CENTURY COLLECTIONS

Within the Woodruff-Acton Family Papers one can also find manuscripts from the early twentieth century. Much of this material was produced by (John) Douglas Woodruff (1897-1978), the well-known author and editor of The Tablet from 1936-1967. It was he who married Marie Immaculee, daughter of the 2nd Baron Acton, thus bringing the two families together. The papers of Douglas Woodruff include diaries, notebooks, correspondence, and financial records. These materials are especially valuable because of Woodruff's place in British Catholic society during much of the twentieth century.

When considering Catholic letters in England during the first part of the twentieth century, three figures which come to mind most quickly are Maurice Baring (1874-1945), G.K. Chesterton (1874-1936), and Hilaire Belloc (1870-1953). The library holds papers of each of these men. The Baring collection consists primarily of letters to Enid Bagnold, the author of National Velvet. Among other things the letters discuss Bagnold's literary work and visits of literary friends to Baring.

G.K. Chesterton was known for both his artistic and literary talents, and both of these aspects are documented in the Chesterton Collection. Included in the holdings are manuscripts, sketches and drawings, and correspondence. Manuscripts make up the bulk of the collection; they include drafts of poems, essays, plays, and stories. Examples of artwork include studies of figures and scenes, and other illustrations. The correspondence dates between 1899 and 1935, and there are a number of letters to and from Hilaire Belloc.

One of the largest and most significant collections in the Burns Library is the Belloc Collection. Since early in his adult life, Belloc was careful to preserve his library, correspondence, manuscripts, and financial records. The Burns Library acquired Belloc's Kingsland Library and personal papers in 1980.

The most outstanding feature of the collection is the great bulk of correspondence. The letters date from 1890 to 1953, the year of the writer's death. Belloc maintained a vast correspondence with family, friends, colleagues, business partners, admirers, and others. Representative correspondents include such people as George Bernard Shaw, H.G. Wells, Wilfred Blunt, Ronald Knox, Vincent McNabb, Frank Sheed and Maisie Ward, Desmond MacCarthy, Lady Astor, John Galsworthy, Sigrid Undset, and William Butler Yeats.

In addition to the correspondence there is a wealth of literary manuscripts. These include drafts of nearly all of the author's writings, a fair number of which include editorial comments and corrections. The manuscripts are complemented by a complete collection of English first editions of Belloc's major writings.

Since acquiring the Belloc collection, the library has added other Belloc-related collections to its holdings. These include the Cahill-Belloc Collection, created by Patrick Cahill, Belloc's bibliographer; the Nickerson-Belloc Collection, maintained by Belloc's secretary and long-time friend Jane Soames Nickerson and her husband Hoffman Nickerson; the Herbert Family-Belloc Collection, composed largely of correspondence with Auberon Herbert; and the Kelsey-Belloc Collection, comprised mainly of correspondence between Belloc and members of the Kelsey family. Each of these collections is significant, and together they provide a rich resource for those interested in the man and his era.

Other writers from this time period are represented in the library. Alfred Noyes (1880-1958), the poet, wrote ballads and epics in the Victorian style. He also became known for Catholic apologetic works, such as The Unknown God. In addition to published works, a small collection of Noyes letters is located in the Burns Library. Other letters of Noyes can be found in the Belloc Papers and the Woodruff-Acton Family Papers.

Though born to parents of Serbian and Irish descent, Annie Christitch (1885-1977) is often grouped with other British Catholic writers of the early twentieth century. After receiving her bachelor's degree from the University of London, Christitch took a position on the staff of a London daily, and was active in the women's franchise movement and efforts to improve social conditions in Serbia. The collection in the Burns Library documents the journalist's various activities. In particular there are many letters and postcards of Christitch, as well as copies of articles she had written for periodicals, and photographs.

Sheila Kaye-Smith (1887-1956) was a prolific writer who produced more than thirty novels, many of which were set in her native Sussex. In the library rests a collection of novels, as well as manuscript notes compiled by the author. A contemporary of Kaye-Smith was Dame Edith Sitwell (1887-1964). Much of her poetry is noted for its rhythmic and musical quality, and in later years elements of religious faith appeared (she converted to Catholicism in 1955). The library holds a small collection of notes and manuscript drafts of poems by Sitwell. Yet another writer of note during this period was Pamela Frankau (1908-1967). The daughter of Gilbert Frankau, the popular novelist, Frankau wrote a number of novels and short stories. The manuscripts of nine works are housed in the library.

Two of the greatest twentieth century Catholic writers from Britain were Evelyn Waugh (1903-1966) and Graham Greene (1904-1991). Holdings on Waugh include published works and a corrected typescript of the novel Put Out More Flags, a work published in 1942.

Until recently the Greene collection was interesting but modest, composed of books, articles, typescripts, galleys, manuscript notes, and some correspondence. Not long ago, however, the Burns Library expanded this collection considerably with the purchase of the Graham Greene library and archives. Indeed, with this acquisition Boston College has now emerged as perhaps the leading repository of Greene material. Greene's personal library consists of approximately 3,000 volumes relating to a variety of subjects, including literature, film, politics, travel, history, religion, and philosophy. Among the books are copies of works of Edwardian writers read by Greene in his youth, first editions of many modern novelists, and of course a collection of Greene's own work, including a copy of the very rare first book of poems Babbling April. What is more, a substantial number of volumes contain numerous annotations of the author—mainly notes and comments which provide insight to Greene's perspective and thought.

In addition to the personal library is the Graham Greene archives, which consist of some 60,000 documents. Among these items one will find correspondence, business records, reviews, notes, radio and television scripts, and other materials. The correspondence includes original incoming letters and copies of Greene's outgoing correspondence. There are many exchanges with notable Catholic lay and religious intellectuals. Though a portion of Greene's correspondence already rests in various repositories, the archives accompanying the personal library add greatly to our knowledge of the man and his work.

TWENTIETH CENTURY CHURCHMEN

The Burns Library has developed collections on British Catholic churchmen active in this century. The holdings on Sitwell, Waugh, and Greene are complemented by additional material relating to these authors in the Philip Caraman, SJ collection. The collection features letters and other correspondence to Father Caraman. There are also a few miscellaneous items, such as photographs, newsletters, and reviews.

There is a small collection of manuscript writings and published works of Monsignor Ronald Knox (1888-1957). During his career Knox produced a new translation of the Bible based on the Vulgate text, and a variety of other writings. Among the manuscripts at Boston College are drafts of A Spiritual Aeneid, an autobiographical work, and 'Why Stand You Here?' The holdings on Martin D'Arcy, SJ (1888-1976), the famous philosopher, lecturer, and author, are also representative. The collection includes manuscript drafts of essays such as 'Belief or Unbelief', and 'On Authority'. Correspondence between D'Arcy and Father Caraman is also located in the Caraman collection.

Another prominent philosopher of our time was Frederick Charles Copleston, SJ (1904-1994). Father Copleston was a professor at Heythrop College and the Gregorian in Rome. He published numerous books in his field, including works on Nietzsche, Schopenhauer, and Aquinas. The Burns Library is the major repository for the Copleston papers. The papers contain correspondence with hundreds of individuals (including major writers, theologians, and philosophers), lectures, and transcripts of the famous BBC radio debates with Bertrand Russell and A.J. Ayer. There are a number of manuscript drafts, including the original script of Copleston's autobiographical memoirs. It is worth noting that these memoirs recently appeared in published form under the title Memoirs of a Philosopher (Kansas City, MO: Sheed & Ward, 1993).

THE BOOK ARTS, PRIVATE PRESSES, AND PUBLISHERS

Other English Catholics of the early twentieth century distinguished themselves for their creativity in a number of fields embracing both literature and art. One of the greatest figures of note in this regard is Eric Gill (1882-1940), the famous stone carver, engraver, sculptor, and writer. The collection in the Burns Library is made up primarily of Gill's artwork. There is some variety to the collection; one will find wood cuts, pencil sketches, annotated drawings, sculpture rubbings, and a splendid Latin inscription on stone of Psalm 103, Verse 30.

At Ditchling, Sussex, Gill and a circle of other artists and thinkers gathered to live and work in pursuit of common ideals. One of the most famous members of this circle was David Jones (1895-1974). Jones originally pursued an artistic career, but by 1927 he had also taken up writing. Jones' artistic and literary output is reflected in the Burns Library collection. Original art works include signed prints, sketches, proofs of engravings, and a large watercolour portrait of Joanna and Petra Gill. There is also a series of literary works, which is made up of both prose and poetry manuscripts. The collection also includes personal and business correspondence of Jones, dating from 1924 to 1973. Many of the letters were written to the poet Vernon Watkins, who helped to bring Jones and his work to the attention of the American literary community. Finally, it is worth noting that the Burns Library possesses an extensive collection of Jones' published works. The Jones Collection is one of the largest of its kind outside Wales.

Ditchling is also known as the location of St Dominic's Press, founded by Hilary Pepler (1878-1951) in 1916. During the next twenty years the press emerged as one of the most important English Catholic presses of the period. The Burns Library's holdings on St. Dominic's Press are representative of the various kinds of books Pepler published. They include such items as Sculpture: An Essay on Stone-cutting by Eric Gill; God's Book by Father Vincent McNabb (1930), with wood engravings by Thomas Derrick; and Pertinent and Impertinent: An Assortment of Verse (1926), with engravings by Desmond Chute, David Jones, and Harold Purney.

As a young man Brocard Sewell (1912-) learned how to set type from Hilary Pepler. Sewell worked for the Press of Edward Walters before the Second World War, and then later, after ordination as a priest of the Carmelite Order in 1954, he directed the operation of St Albert's Press at Aylesford and Llandeilo. Early on the press printed and published The Aylesford Review, which appeared from 1955-1968. The library holds a nearly complete set of the periodical. In addition, there are a number of books which have been published by the Aylesford Press in more recent years.

Located in Worcester, Stanbrook Abbey serves as home to a community of English Benedictine nuns. In 1876, at the initiative of Rev. Laurence Shepherd, the Stanbrook Abbey Press was founded. The press has been noted for its work, especially in the post-war era. The library has brought together a fairly extensive collection of materials produced by the press. These include books, bookplates, broadsides, catalogues, Christmas and Easter cards, correspondence, holy cards, invitations, pamphlets, poems, postcards, and other miscellaneous material.

Apart from these holdings on private presses, the library also houses collections of other British Catholic publishers. One of the most prominent Catholic publishing firms in contemporary times is Burns and Oates (for a time Burns, Oates, and Washbourne). The firm was begun by James Burns (1808-1871), a convert who became a publisher in 1832. In the 1970s the Burns Library purchased the firm's file library. Individual titles date from as early as 1840, and continue up to 1970. For many years Burns and Oates was known for the special series it issued, such as The Dublin Review, The New Library of Catholic Knowledge, and the Faith and Fact series.

Lastly in the area of publishers and presses there is a small collection of business records of The Tablet, the premier English Catholic periodical. Mention has already been made of the Woodruff-Acton Papers, which include a substantial series of papers of Douglas Woodruff, who edited The Tablet for many years. In addition the library houses correspondence to the editorial offices from the 1970s. Much of this material concerns submissions to the publication and related administrative matters.

CURRENT AUTHORS

The work of collecting books and manuscripts and developing areas of strength is very much an on-going process. The Burns Library continues to seek out and respond to offers to acquire important collections to the holdings. In recent years the papers of several British Catholic writers have been added to the library. Boston College has become the principal repository for the papers of Peter Levi (1931-). Levi has enjoyed careers as theologian, poet, classical scholar, archaeologist, and social activist. A very large collection has been gathered at the library. It includes manuscripts of literary works; academic materials; sermons, interviews, and reviews; and a vast series of correspondence.

Another contemporary writer whose papers have been collected by the library is Elizabeth Jennings (1926-). Jennings has published several volumes of verse. Much of her poetry deals with religious themes. The collection in the Burns Library consists largely of poetry notebooks of Jennings, which include drafts of poems. There is also a small collection of correspondence. Most of the material dates from 1970 to the present.

Arrangements have also been made for the transfer of the papers of the late Peter Hebblethwaite. Hebblethwaite was best known as a biographer of Pope John XXIII and Pope Paul VI. He also wrote a number of other books on the Catholic Church, and for many years served as Vatican Correspondent to the National Catholic Reporter. The addition of the Hebblethwaite Papers to the Burns Library will strengthen holdings on the role of the Church in the modern era.

LESSER COLLECTIONS

In addition to these many holdings, the library has developed other collections of British Catholic writers which, though not extensive, are suitable for projects on special aspects of an author's work. These collections relate to authors like Robert Hugh Benson (1871-1914); Arnold Lunn (1888-1974); J.R.R. Tolkien (1892-1973); John Bingham Morton (1893-); Elizabeth Longford (1906-); and Derek Patmore (1908-). Most of these collections consist of books, though some letters and manuscripts can also be found. There are also scattered samplings of the published works of other British Catholic authors.

CONCLUSION

While many of the individual collections mentioned above are significant in themselves, together they help to create a wide-ranging resource dealing with the British Catholic experience from the nineteenth century to the present.

Over the years the British Catholic Authors Collection has been of great use to scholars, students, and other researchers. The importance of the collections to the research community is made clear in the appearance of a number of publications. In recent years books have been published which discuss particular aspects of the British Catholic experience from the nineteenth century to the contemporary period. Examples of works based at least in part on holdings in the Burns Library include Jay P. Corrin, G.K. Chesterton and Hilaire Belloc: The Battle against Modernity (Athens: Ohio University Press, 1981); Brigid Boardman, Between Heaven and Charing Cross: The Life of Francis Thompson (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1988); Thomas Dilworth, The Shape of Meaning in the Poetry of David Jones (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1988); Ian Anstruther, Coventry Patmore's Angel: A Study of Coventry Patmore, his Wife Emily and the Angel in the House (London: Haggerston Press, 1992); and Kathleen H. Staudt, At the Turn of a Civilization: David Jones and Modern Poetics (Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1993).

The richness of the collections and the ongoing development of this area of interest suggests that work will continue to be done in the Burns Library on British Catholic authors and their times. The Library welcomes questions regarding the holdings, and looks forward to serving researchers interested in specific topics. Inquiries should be forwarded to: The Burns Librarian, John J. CATHOLIC ARCHIVES IN FIJI

Margaret Knox

A tropical climate, destructive hurricanes, and an abundance of insect life are hardly ideal conditions for the preservation of records and it is something of a miracle that the Fiji Catholic Church has such a good collection of archival material comprising around 50,000 items. These include manuscript letters, diaries, reports, notes and hand-written dictionaries as well as legal documents, printed books, pamphlets and circulars (many of them imprints of the Fiji Catholic Mission Press), building plans and photographs. Also included are the records of the Catholic Church in Rotuma, which was part of the Vicariate of Central Oceania until 1888, when it was joined to Fiji. Rotuma is a small Polynesian island about 300 miles north of Fiji and it has its own distinctive language and culture. The Catholic archives are housed in an air-conditioned room at the Archdiocesan Office, Nicolas House, Pratt Street, Suva (P.O.Box 109; Telephone 679 301955 FAX 679 301565).

The sorting of the records for the period up to 1941 was carried out in 1972 by Mr Robert Langdon, Executive Officer of the Pacific Manuscripts Bureau, Canberra, Australia, and a selection was microfilmed and a short catalogue of those items prepared. Copies of the microfilms have been lodged at the National Archives of Fiji in Suva and in the libraries of Universities around the world that specialise in Pacific Studies. Later material is also housed in the Archives, filed as it was in the Diocesan and later Archdiocesan Office. This material has so far not been available to the public.

INDEX TO THE ARCHIVES

Those wishing to consult the Fiji Catholic archives in the past faced two problems - there was no index and most of the documents of the first 100 years of the mission are in French, whereas the lingua franca of Fiji is English. In 1976 while living in Fiji I was asked by the Archbishop's secretary to prepare an Index to the Archives covering the period 1837 (the date of first Catholic contact with Fiji) to 1941 (which marks the end of the 'French' period of the Catholic Church in Fiji). I did this work on a voluntary basis. I am not an archivist but I had become interested in the history of the Catholic Mission in Fiji while teaching at the Catholic Teachers' College. I took advice on preparing an Index from members of the Library Staff of the University of the South Pacific, where my husband was working. I spent about three years reading the documents and noting their contents. Each item was listed under relevant headings - topics, names of missions and missionaries and other persons - altogether approximately 500 headings. For each document there are usually three or more headings. Each entry gives where possible the date; author; a short summary or description in English; the language (omitted if the original is in French). The collection of photographs is not included in the index. Material already filmed has been given its Pacific Manuscripts Bureau (PMB) call number in the index and the rest have been given the Roman Catholic Archives of Fiji (RCAF) call number.

I left Fiji in 1979 having completed the Index and shortly afterwards Fiji was visited by the late Fr Theo Kok, SM, the Marist Archivist from Rome. He supervised the printing of the Index which is now available from the Archdiocesan Office in Suva. The archives are not open to the general public but they are available to bona fide researchers. Requests for information or permission to research in the archives or for photocopies should be addressed to the Archdiocesan Office. No full time archivist or librarian is employed and requests may take some time to be processed.

I visited the Archives again in 1990 and found many documents were crumbling in spite of being stored in an air-conditioned room. Unfortunately, the air-conditioning was frequently switched off and the altering hot humid atmosphere followed by the drying and cooling effects of air conditioning was causing damage. The Procure material from the 1910s to the 1930s seems particularly vulnerable, partly because of the thick pens and heavy ink used then. The use of the Archives was not always supervised and some materials were missing. With so many demands on the time of the staff and on resources it is not surprising that the care of the Archives is not a high priority. On my next visit, in 1993, storage conditions and supervision had much improved.

OUTLINE OF THE HISTORY OF THE FIJI MISSION

Two French Marist priests and a Brother were brought to Fiji by Bishop Bataillon in 1844, three years after the martyrdom of St Peter Chanel on the tiny island of Futuna which lies to the north east of the Fiji Group. Wesleyan missionaries were already established in Fiji at Lakeba in the Lau Islands on the extreme eastern edge of the Fiji Group and within relatively easy reach of Tonga. The rest of Fiji was considered too dangerous, both on account of the fierce reputation of the Fijians and the hazards to ships among the uncharted reefs. As a result it was at Lakeba that the Catholics also set up their mission, to the consternation of the Wesleyans Ministers. The Catholic missionaries remained there for eleven years under conditions of extreme hardship, barely tolerated by the Fijians and their Tongan overlords, and making little progress. Three more Marist priests and three Brothers arrived in Fiji in 1851 and attempts were made to establish missions on the main islands but in vain. In the second period of the Mission, the Bishop transferred three priests to Levuka in the centre of the Group, where English speaking Europeans had settled as traders and planters. Levuka proved a safer haven and the first permanent mission was established there. The cession of Fiji to the British Crown brought law and order and enabled a handful of Catholic missions to be established, often in remote rural areas among the traditional enemies of the Wesleyan chiefs, now in the ascendancy.

More French missionaries, including Sisters, arrived and in 1888 the first Catholic Bishop was appointed, Bishop Julian Vidal S.M. This energetic and charismatic Marist transformed the Mission. He bought land and embarked on an ambitious building programme in 'stone' - a form of cement being made by burning coral. Education and health became important concerns under Bishop Vidal, to the approval of the Colonial government. Conversions followed although the dominance of the Wesleyans was never really challenged. Neither the Catholics nor the Wesleyans made any real progress in evangelising the rapidly growing Indian population, first introduced as indentured labourers in 1879.

Bishop Nicolas, another French Marist, succeeded Vidal in 1922 and consolidated his work, especially in the field of education. The death of Bishop Nicolas in 1941 marks the end of the 'French' period. From that time English became the official language of the church, an English Bishop was appointed and gradually English speaking missionaries replaced the French.

FIJI'S HISTORICAL RECORDS

During the Lakeba period of the Fiji Catholic mission it was led by Fr P. Roulleaux SM but after he became ill and returned to France, he was succeeded by Fr-J-B. Bréhéret SM who was created Prefect Apostolic in 1863. Fr Bréhéret was in no sense 'clerical', ('The tiller is my pen', he wrote) and the few records from this period in Fiji are mainly in the Marist Archives in Rome. Bréhéret's Lakeba Journal, 191 of his letters to his Marist superiors and reports to the Propagation of the Faith are all held in Rome; nor are there any letters or notes in the Fiji Archives by the founding priests of the important catechists' school and nothing concerning the builder of the timber church at Levuka, Fr Louyot SM. The Fiji Catholic Archives do, however, contain correspondence between the mission stations and the colonial Government, a French-Fijian Dictionary, the Treaty of Religious Freedom and good early material on Rotuma.

With the arrival of Bishop Vidal and a group of more scholarly priests more extensive records and correspondence find their way into the Fiji Catholic Archives including notes on the native religion, customs and legends, as well as liturgical and catechetical material, some of it in Fijian.

Under Bishop Vidal the organisation of the Vicariate was more efficient as his copious correspondence and printed pastoral and circular letters reveal. There are also mission station correspondence and reports, Procure accounts and correspondence, and the Marist Visitors' reports. Nevertheless, the material is patchy and there are many gaps, particularly in the financial records. Vidal's correspondence is much more complete in the Marist Archives in Rome. With the coming of Nicolas the records are more 'Official' and bureaucratic - he was not a great correspondent. Bishop Nicolas is reported to have destroyed much of his correspondence at the end of his term as Marist Provincial before becoming Bishop and he may well have destroyed material when head of the Fiji Vicariate.

In the 1920s Bishop J. Blanc (Vicar Apostolic of Central Oceania 1912-1953) was preparing to write his Histoire Religieuse de L'Archipel Fidjien

(Toulon, 1926). He encouraged priests in Fiji to write short monographs on the history of the mission stations and much of this is in the Fiji Catholic Archives, some on PMB microfilms. Unfortunately, not all the materials cited by Bishop Blanc are still in existence. Later, under Bishops Foley and Archbishop Pearce, retired priests were encouraged to record their memoirs; those of Fr J. Castanié (1875-1959) and Fr J.L. Guinard (1899-1961) are held in the archives and are of particular interest. These are on Pacific Manuscripts Bureau microfilms.

In 1948 Fr P. O'Reilly, the French archivist, visited Fiji in order to search out and catalogue the Imprints of the Fiji Catholic Mission including The Loreto Press. A catalogue under that title was published in 1958. As he says in the foreword 'I tried to discover some specimens, rummaging through drawers in sacristies and in the attics of rectories, disputing their food with termites and cockroaches.' As a result an almost complete collection of those imprints is deposited in the Fiji Catholic Archives. The catalogue also contains a history of the Catholic Mission presses. Fr O'Reilly was assisted in this work by Fr J. Castanié, SM, whose local knowledge of Fiji and the Fijian language were invaluable.

OCEANIA MARIST PROVINCE ARCHIVES, SUVA

In addition to the Archdiocesan Archives, records of the Marist Fathers (Society of Mary, or S.M.) are held in the Oceania Marist Province Archives at 7 Lavena Road, P.O.Box 1198, Suva, Fiji. These Archives were established in 1971 when the Province's administrative headquarters were transferred from Villa Maria in Sydney, Australia, to Suva. All the pre-1898 holdings were shipped to the Archivio Padri Maristi in Rome and the post-1898 archival material was transferred to Suva, 1898 being the date when the Province was established.

150TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE FIJI CATHOLIC CHURCH

The Fiji Catholic Archives are not accessible to the majority of the Catholics of Fiji, partly because the early material is in French. Yet the Fijians are the very people to whom the archives are of the greatest interest. With the aim of increasing awareness of the early history of their Church among Fiji Catholics and to celebrate the 150th Anniversary of that Church in 1994, I decided to prepare a short history of the first 100 years of the Catholic Church in Fiji and Rotuma, based on the records in Fiji and Rome and illustrated by 80 photographs of the early mission from the collection held by the Marist Archives in Rome. The publication of the book, entitled Voyage of Faith, is being made possible by generous financial assistance from the French Government. A prospectus for Voyage of Faith is being prepared at the Archdiocesan Office, P.O. Box 109, Suva, Fiji, giving details of the format, content, and price; and will be available to enquirers early in 1995. Publication will follow later in the year.

THE CURRENT STATE OF CATHOLIC ARCHIVES IN IRELAND: AN OVERVIEW

David C. Sheehy

Ireland has been described as 'a country with a unique manuscript heritage but with a poor archival tradition'. In spite of its geographic peripherality, Ireland has contributed significantly to European civilization. The Irish have produced a rich culture and a literature that was the earliest vernacular in western Europe. Their role in the preservation of western values from the sixth to the twelfth century was significant, and Irish missionaries contributed greatly towards the Christianising of Scotland, England and much of western and central Europe.

A key aspect of this achievement was the influence of Irish monastic foundations on the production and decoration of medieval manuscripts. The Book of Kells and the Book of Durrow, preserved in the library of Trinity College, Dublin and the Stowe Missal and the Book of Lecan, housed in the library of the Royal Irish Academy, are some of the finest extant examples of the artistic output of the 'island of saints and scholars'.

Compared to its illustrious manuscript tradition, Ireland's archival tradition is still in its infancy. Happily, however, this writer is able to report that the all-important first tentative steps have been taken and over the past quarter of a century, in particular, a firm foundation has been laid in terms of the development of an indigenous archival profession, legislative enactment, and measures taken to preserve Ireland's archival heritage.

The Roman Catholic Church has been a major beneficiary of this rising tide of archival progress in Ireland. Indeed, it would be fair to state that the Church has in fact been in the vanguard of institutions which have recently begun to take seriously their responsibilities towards the records in their keeping. This is all the more remarkable given its turbulent and troubled administrative history.

In the wake of the Reformation in Ireland, and with the later violent upheavals of the Cromwellian and Williamite eras, Catholic episcopal organisation suffered severe disruption. During periods of active persecution, bishops, far from hoarding records, needed to distance themselves from their own potentially incriminating papers. In 1713, for example, Edmund Byrne, the then Archbishop of Dublin, was ordered by the Lords Justice and Council 'to be apprehended and committed in jail and his papers to be sealed up and sent to the Council offices'. The subsequent search of Byrne's family home failed to turn up any sign of the archbishop or his papers—nothing except 'some old accounts of hoops and barrelis', evidence of cooerage, the Byrne family trade. In reality, toleration rather than persecution governed official policy towards the Catholic Church during the eighteenth century. From about the middle of the century, bishops began, tentatively at first, to keep records, an indication that Catholic episcopal organisation had by this time been firmly re-established, and that the Penal Era was perceived, at least by some, as coming to a close.

Even as the Catholic Church emerged from the shadows, however, caution for some remained an enduring instinct. Thus Archbishop Carpenter of Dublin kept transcripts instead of originals, refused to trust the postal system with confidential documents intended for the Holy See, and in 1776, the year of the Declaration of American Independence, advised the Papal Nuncio, then based in Brussels, to address him 'as a private person - as Dr Carpenter, living in Usher's Island, Dublin'.

By the early decades of the nineteenth century the Catholic Church in Ireland was asserting itself with increasing confidence. From about 1820 the bishops met annually as a body and kept a record of their proceedings. Parishes began to systematically record baptisms and marriages, though some urban areas had already been doing so from about the middle of the eighteenth century.

As bishops strove to reform their dioceses, develop a sense of corporate identity, negotiate with government, and keep in touch with their episcopal colleagues and their priests, so their correspondence multiplied and broadened. The advent of the 'penny post' in the 1840s fattened their postbags as lay members of their flock put pen to paper to voice opinions or seek assistance of some kind. However, administrative discontinuity, the lack of fixed episcopal residences, and the often vexatious nature of episcopal succession in Ireland all mitigated against the building up of an archival tradition.

'The absence of proper episcopal archives in Ireland is much to be regretted, and the disappearance of such papers as many of the leading Prelates thought fit to preserve is not a little singular.'

Thus lamented the historian, William John Fitzpatrick, in his famed Life and Times of Bishop Doyle, published in 1861. The writer went on to relate a number of archival horror stories involving the loss of papers of eighteenth and nineteenth century bishops of Armagh, Dublin, Ferns and Ossory. Readers were regaled with such anecdotes as that concerning Dean Meyler of Dublin finding soft goods he had ordered from a Dublin shop wrapped in a portion of Dr Troy's manuscripts. Readers were further informed that 'the voluminous papers of the late distinguished Primate, Dr Curtis, were found, in the year 1841, scattered around the hayloft of premises belonging to a grocer in Drogheda'. Some prelates, such as Archbishop Croke of Cashel, destroyed their papers as a matter of course. 'I keep very few letters', Croke admitted in a letter to Michael Davitt in 1892. Others such as Archbishop McHale of Tuam seemingly took steps to ensure that their immediate successors were denied sight of their papers. In May 1850, Dr Paul Cullen arrived at Drogheda as successor to Dr George Crolly as Archbishop of Armagh. 'Not a scrap of paper in the archives', Cullen complained in a letter to a friend in Rome, 'not even to tell me the name of the priests'. Cullen himself proved to be archivally enlightened. When contemplating the construction of a permanent archiepiscopal residence at Drumcondra, in Dublin, in the 1860s, archival priorities were to the fore in his thinking. 'The new house', he wrote, 'would have a good library, archives and rooms for a strange bishop and four or five priests. A fixed home for the Archbishop and for the archives would be most important'. In the event, Cullen's plan was implemented by his successor but two, Archbishop William Walsh.

As each diocese settled on a fixed episcopal residence over the period 1850 to 1950 so one of the essential prerequisites for successful archival accumulation and survival was finally obtained. In the largest dioceses, such as Armagh and Dublin, the sheer complexity of modern diocesan administration required that fully kept records be available to each new office-holder. Admonitions from the National Synod at Thurles in 1850 and from later diocesan synods concerning the orderly keeping of diocesan archives as an important element in diocesan administration were given added force by the provisions laid down in the first edition of the Code of Canon Law in 1917. Against all this, however, the human factor vitiated against any degree of uniformity of archival progress.

Besides diocesan archives, the archives of religious congregations and societies form a major part of the ecclesiastical archival inheritance of Ireland. Indeed, the treasures of such renowned archival repositories as the Franciscan Library at Killiney, County Dublin, the Jesuit Archives in Dublin and the Benedictine Archives at Glenstal Abbey, County Limerick, testify to the fact that religious archives are of significance, in a wider, national, context. This is particularly true of religious archives in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, which document, firstly, a period of unprecedented expansion and, latterly, a period of contraction for religious orders and which record their unique contribution to the development of modern Ireland.

The nineteenth century witnessed a phenomenal growth in organised religious life in Ireland. For example, at the beginning of the century there were a mere 11 convents in Ireland. This rose to 89 by 1851, 368 by 1900, reaching a peak of 882 by 1985. The Irish urban landscape was transformed by the building of monasteries, convents, seminaries, schools, hospitals, orphanages and asylums. The religious orders played a vital role in areas such as education and public health to the extent that the Catholic Church effectively established an alternative social service structure to that provided by the State. All this activity was reflected in the steady accumulation of records. By the 1970s religious orders and congregations found themselves in the same position as diocesan archives. A mass of often disorganised archives documenting their institutional history had accumulated - a veritable embarrassment of riches. Administrators seeking to lay their hands on important documents became increasingly frustrated by the disordered jumble of archival strong-rooms and by their inability to satisfy the clamour of secular historians seeking access to this new source material. Fortunately one of those historians was to provide part of the answer to these problems.

From 1937 to 1978 Robin Dudley Edwards was Professor of Modern Irish History at University College, Dublin. Dudley Edwards, together with Professor Theodore Moody of Trinity College, Dublin, launched a new approach to the study of Irish history which challenged the prevailing romantic and simplistic assumptions about Ireland's past through rigorous argument based on the close scrutiny of primary source materials. However, Dudley Edwards did not merely view archives from a utilitarian perspective but saw them as having intrinsic value and thus worthy of independent administration and professional preservation. As a doctoral student at University College, London in the 1930s, he had attended lectures on archives given by Sir Hilary Jenkinson - the 'Father' of the modern archival profession in Britain. Towards the end of his own career Dudley Edwards founded the Archives Department at University College, Dublin, which not only served as a working repository but also as a teaching agency. For the first time in Ireland student archivists could gain a professional training and qualification.

Since 1972 the availability of professionally qualified young graduates from the Archives Department at University College, Dublin, has had a dramatic effect on the archival situation in Ireland. A wide number of institutions in the public and private sectors have employed professionally qualified archivists either full-time or on a contract basis and thus for the first time made proper arrangements for the preservation and management of their archives. Dublin Diocesan Archives now has a full-time professional archivist whilst the dioceses of Galway, Clonfert, Limerick and Kilmore have in recent years taken on UCD graduates on contracts of varying length. St Patrick's College, Maynooth, Ireland's national seminary, has also employed a young archivist to put its archival house in order and a number of religious orders have taken a similar path. Religious have themselves directly benefitted from the training available at University College, Dublin. A few have taken the one year full-time course leading to a Diploma in Archival Studies while a greater number have participated in the short summer courses given by the staff of the Archives Department at U.C.D. These latter undertakings have been specifically organised for the benefit of members of the Association of Church Archivists of Ireland (formerly the Association of Religious Archivists of Ireland). The A.C.A.I. shares common origins with the Catholic Archives Society and its successful blossoming from a modest narrow-focused beginning into a multi-denominational organisation with a broad perspective owes much to the dedicated work and indefatigable enthusiasm of Father Leo Layden of the Holy Spirit Fathers. Professional training opportunities and the support service network provided by the Association of Church Archivists of Ireland are key factors underpinning the current revolution in ecclesiastical archives in Ireland. A measurement of the success achieved to-date is the fact that a quarter of the entries in the second edition of the Directory of Irish Archives, published in 1993 were church archives.

Major problems still remain, such as the uneven nature of archival progress both at diocesan and congregational level, lack of funding for archives, and the lack of continuity of office-holding. However, a start has been made in the vital work of protecting and making available the records which have survived the ravages of time and which constitute an important part of Ireland's archival heritage. With the positive encouragement and occasional prodding of bodies such as the Association of Church Archivists of Ireland and the Catholic Archives Society this forward momentum will surely be maintained.

Christine Johnson

When I last wrote for this Journal (1993 issue), I was able to report that five out of the eight Scottish dioceses had deposited their records in the Scottish Catholic Archives (SCA) in Edinburgh. Gratifying though this response was, it did make me aware of the danger of concentrating so much in one place. If the archives of only one diocese were destroyed something at least of its history could be reconstructed from the archives of the other dioceses, should each diocese retain its own records. But, with five entrusting their archives to SCA, the responsibility for their safety becomes a heavy one. Surveys conducted by the Royal Insurance Ltd and the Scottish Record Office established ways of improving the security of the premises and increasing the protection of the documents, thus reducing any risks. The fire alarm system was extended; the intruder system was upgraded, and British Telecom's RedCare installed. Security bolts and mesh were fitted to windows and doors. The electrical installation was tested and brought up to recommended safety standards; the lighting circuits were rewired. Search Room security was tightened up and stricter rules for readers introduced. Documents were removed from inadequate folders and placed in folders large and strong enough to afford complete protection, Substandard archive boxes were replaced. Finally, a second range of mobile shelving was installed.

It was fortunate that the decision to install this shelving had not been delayed as, in October 1993, the Archdiocese of St Andrews & Edinburgh deposited a very large quantity of records. For some time I had been pressing for the deposit of the remainder of Archbishop Andrew Joseph McDonald's papers (1929 - 50), which were at risk in poor storage conditions. What I finally received was not just this small rump of papers but also the entire archives of the late Cardinal Gray, from 1951 to his retiral in 1985. It took eight months to sort and subdivide these files into manageable bundles. In the end they filled 725 archive storage boxes.

Although the Archdiocesan deposit was by far the largest received over the past two years, it was by no means the only one. The Dioceses of Motherwell and Argyll & the Isles added to their previous deposits, the former with a few Seminary files, the latter with two major deposits. Cardinal Gray, shortly before his death, gifted a number of personal papers. Archbishop O'Brien deposited the Minute Books of the first meetings of the restored Hierarchy. Gillis College, when it closed, handed in some of its files, files which turned out to relate mainly to the previous College at Drygrange. Unfortunately, the earliest Drygrange files were missing while the most recent files of Gillis College have been retained in the Archdiocesan Offices. Hopefully, at some time in the future the complete records of the two Colleges will be reunited in the SCA.

This bringing together of separate deposits to complete a picture is one of the most satisfying elements of my work in the SCA. Sometimes it is a national picture that is built up, at others a more local one. But, before describing particular examples, it might be helpful if I were to fill in something of the historical background. Scotland was originally a single Vicariate. In 1732 it was divided into two: Lowland and Highland. In 1829 these two were replaced by three: the Eastern, Northern and Western Vicariates. (In each case it took several years for the original decree promulgated in Rome to be enacted in Scotland; the year given above relates in each case to the enactment). The core collection of archives in SCA was put together by Bishop Kyle, first Vicar Apostolic of the Northern Vicariate, and comprises mainly Lowland Vicariate documents, supplemented by Northern up to Kyle's death in 1869. Its two main series of correspondence are now known as the Blairs Letters and the Preshome Letters.

When it lost much of its funding because of the French Revolution and the Napoleonic Wars, the Scottish Mission was forced to look to other means of supporting the clergy in the poorest mission stations. The Lowland Vicariate decided to take advantage of the 1793 Act of Parliament 'for the Encouragement and Relief of Friendly Societies in Great Britain' and to set up a Clerical Friendly Society of its own. Like all Friendly Societies, it relied for its funds on the subscriptions of its members. The capital was invested, and the interest used to supplement the incomes of the poorest members.

The records of Clerical Friendly Societies give much useful information and the SCA has been lucky enough to acquire a reasonably comprehensive collection. A number of years ago the records of the Friendly Societies of the Eastern and Western Districts were acquired in two separate deposits. Then, in 1987, the Friendly Society of Aberdeen Diocese deposited its Treasurer's papers, followed, in 1993, by its Secretary's. These last two deposits were found to include the records both of the previous Northern Vicariate, and of its forerunner, the Lowland Vicariate, back as far as the foundation of the original Society in 1808. Since the Highland Vicariate never had a Friendly Society, this means that records of all the pre-1878 Friendly Societies are now collected together under one roof.

Another achievement is the gradual accumulation of Highland archives. The earliest records form part of the Blairs Letters. They consist of letters written by bishops and priests of the Highland Vicariate to their Lowland counterparts. No letters written to bishops of the Highland Vicariate have yet come to light. With the division of Scotland into three Vicariates, Northern, Eastern and Western, the old Highland Vicariate was divided between Northern and Western. Letters written to Bishop Kyle of the Northern Vicariate can be found in the Blairs and Preshome Letters. Those written to Bishops Scott and Murdoch of the Western Vicariate were deposited in 1974 by Colin MacPherson, Bishop of Argyll & the Isles (1969 - 90), and now form the Oban Letters. In 1992, Bishop MacPherson's successor, Bishop Wright, deposited some post-1878 records to form the basis of the Argyll Diocese deposit. A survey of these last records revealed that the papers of the first Bishop of Argyll & the Isles, Angus MacDonald 1878 - 92), were missing. They were traced to Glencoe and subsequently added to the Argyll Diocese deposit. Finally in 1994, Bishop Wright deposited a further series of files, thus completing the run of Argyll Diocese papers in the SCA from 1878 to the translation of Bishop McGill to Paisley Diocese in 1967.

Other deposits have complemented the main deposits of Highland episcopal correspondence. The Oban Letters contain Borrodale family papers (1771 - 1858), and pastoral letters (1842 - 68). A deposit from Oban in about 1985 included pastoral letters (1870 - 77) and ad clera (1885 - 1920), while a deposit from Taynuilt at about the same time contained ad clera (1850 - 62). The Taynuilt deposit also contained Arisaig Mission papers which had become separated from the Bishop Martin correspondence in the Argyll Diocese deposit. The records of the Friendly Societies of the Western and Northern Vicariates contain information on the financial position of the various Highland Mission Stations. In 1975 Rev Anthony Ross of the Edinburgh Dominican Community gifted correspondence about the building of the primary school at Fort William (1926 - 32). He himself had received these papers from Mgr William MacMaster, parish priest at Fort William (1922 - 58).

In this way a picture of the history of the Church in the Highlands is building up as records accumulate in the SCA. One notable gap remains. To date no records of any of the old Highland seminaries have been discovered. It is my hope that somewhere, some time, some at least of these records will be discovered. And therein, I think, lies the appeal of being the Keeper of the Scottish Catholic Archives: the challenge of tracking down records known to have at one time existed, and the excitement when completely unknown records arrive on the doorstep.

THE SYDNEY ARCHDIOCESAN ARCHIVES AND AUSTRALIAN BICENTENNIAL FUNDS: A RETROSPECTIVE BIBLIOGRAPHY

Frank Carleton

In the course of a 1990 article in the Australian Catholic Record, Dr John Atchison referred in passing to 'the historical records of St Mary's Cathedral, Sydney.'¹ With reference to the vast holding of Cardinal Moran's papers there, he gave an opinion which was referenced as 'indebted to discussion on 17 January 1989 at St. Mary's Cathedral, Sydney, with Chantal Celjan and the late Gavan Cashman. . .'² The writer stated: 'The task of indexing Cardinal P.F. Moran's correspondence, alone, may employ an archivist for many years.'³ As a basic local text in archives administration, published by the Australian Society of Archivists, points out, preparing indexes to archives can be very time consuming but 'can supplement the essential finding aids (my emphasis).'⁴ To put it bluntly, without the prior work of arranging and describing archives in accordance with the fundamental principles of provenance and respect for original order,⁵ indexing them, other than in some incomplete and ad hoc way, of limited, if any, use to researchers, will probably be impossible.

Such description of the holdings of archives at St. Mary's Cathedral as may be useful will be entered in the following work which is approaching completion: Sydney Archdiocesan Archives, St. Mary's Cathedral: a critically annotated bibliography of published and unpublished items on the organisation and holdings since the inception of the New South Wales Bicentennial Archives Program in the Cathedral crypt in December 1986.

The New South Wales Bicentennial Archives Program consisted of three unrelated archival projects, of which two were for private archives, namely 'Archives of St Mary's Cathedral (sic)' and 'Archives of the Labour Movement (sic)' (actually the archives of the New South Wales Branch of the Australian Labor Party, chiefly from 1956).⁶ The third project, 'Archives of Local Government',⁷ was devoted to the preparation of a published general records disposal schedule for local councils in New South Wales.⁸ Each project received a grant of 100,000 dollars from the New South Wales Bicentennial Council, and the management of the whole program, which attracted a percentage management fee, was committed to the Archives Authority of New South Wales, a public body, whose statutory authority is for public, not private, archives.⁹ The Program's tenure was for two years.

The title of the Cathedral project was both inaccurate and misleading. While the archives in the Cathedral crypt include records of the building and administration of St. Mary's Cathedral, they are, as they have been designated in numerous works of Australian Catholic history by professional historians, the *Sydney Archdiocesan Archives*¹⁰ and have holdings reaching back before the inception of the Archdiocese in 1842.¹¹ Included, for example, are Archdiocesan records for parishes, clergy and religious orders, and private and official papers (insofar as they survive) of past Archbishops of Sydney, including J.B. Polding OSB (1842-1877), R.B. Vaughan OSB (1877-1883),¹² Patrick Francis Cardinal Moran (1884-1911) and Michael Kelly (1911-1940).

Diocesan archives are, of course, subject to particular provisions of the 1983 Code of Canon Law, of which Canon 491, specifying episcopal responsibility, is fundamental. Its first two sections state:

1. The diocesan bishop is to see to it that the acts and documents of the archives of cathedral, collegiate, parochial and other churches in his territory are diligently preserved; also, inventories or catalogues are to be made in duplicate, one of which is to be kept in the church's own archive and the other in the diocesan archive.

2. The diocesan bishop is also to see to it that there is an historical archive in the diocese in which documents having historical value are diligently preserved and systematically arranged.¹³

It will be noted that while the first section refers to such basic forms of archival description as inventories and the second prescribes systematic arrangement, neither makes any reference to 'indexing'. While the utility of proper indexing of 'essential finding aids', like those mentioned, is obvious, 'indexing', in my direct personal experience, can often mean random rifling through valuable and sometimes fragile archives in order to create ad hoc lists of names or notional subjects, crude proceedings which are quite foreign to the techniques of controlled indexing employed by professional archivists, librarians and indexers.

Within a month of the commencement of the Cathedral project, J. Burke, Program Coordinator, in a Progress Report for October 1986 - January 1987 on the Bicentennial Archives Program, noted that it had started later than the other two projects, and observed:

'Although St Mary's Cathedral is a comparatively small archive, which has been in existence for some seventy years, it has many problems. These include: a diverse un-catalogued collection; acute shortage of space; preponderance of genealogical enquiries; uncoordinated activities initiated by 'volunteers', etc. . .'¹⁴

According to the preface of a publication issued at the end of 1988 by the Archives Authority, with the names of the Principal Archivist, B.J. Cross, and the Chairperson, K.W. Knight, of that body at its foot:

'This is the first time that the Archives Authority has been directly involved in the publication of material not exclusively part of the State Archives collection.'¹⁵

Apart from an explanatory preface and separate indexes of personal and corporate names and of the provenance of archives referenced in items entered in it, the projected bibliography will consist of over thirty detailed entries, each with critical annotation. Entries will vary in length according to the nature and extent of the items described. Among others, these will describe three publications with ISBNs and the imprint of the Archives Authority,¹⁶ periodical articles, newspaper articles, and typescripts consigned to the statutory deposit libraries. Overall coverage is of published and unpublished items which deal wholly, or in part, with the organisation and holdings of the Sydney Archdiocesan Archives since December 1986.

The forthcoming bibliography should serve to introduce some Australian archivists in public employment to the more elementary practices of physical and reference bibliography, provide insights into basic historical method and some aspects of Australian Catholic history, and indicate examples of modes of description for church archives. However, on present indications, the entries in it will reference only a portion of the holdings of the Sydney Archdiocesan Archives.

An appendix to the bibliography will list eleven entries for archives contributed to the National Library's Guide to collections of manuscripts relating to Australia (Series E), of which five are represented in Part I of the microfiche issue of the series.¹⁷

'The principle of provenance requires that the archives of an organisation or person be not mixed with the archives of another.'; 'The principle of original order requires that the order in which an organisation or person created, maintained and used records be respected and reserved.' To what extent the loss of the original order of Cardinal Moran's papers has been effected would require detailed archive appraisal to determine even approximately. The writer recalls seeing in 1987 immense piles of transcriptions of historical documents gathered by Moran in Rome in the middle of the nineteenth century and stacked, not stored, in another room, well from the filing cabinets holding his papers.
6. Cf. John Burke, 'The New South Wales Bicentennial Archives Program', Archeion: the Newsletter of the State Archives, 6, November 1989, pp. 15-17. the paragraphs entitled 'Archives of St Mary's Cathedral', on p.15 include the statement: 'The State Archives was given Bicentennial funds to assist the Archives of St Mary's Cathedral [sic].' The nature of the assistance is not specified.
As anyone with an elementary knowledge of Australian history will know, as can be confirmed by standard works on the subject, the Australian Labor Party and the Labor Movement (however defined) are not precisely and historically coextensive. Therefore, the archives of the Australian Labor Party, or any branch of it, could not comprehend the Labor Movement, whose nineteenth century origins antedate the formation of the Party, but only part of it.

RELIGIOUS ARCHIVES GROUP CONFERENCE, 1994

The 1994 Conference of the Religious Archives Group of the Society of Archivists was held on 26 September at College Hall, Malet Street, London.

The theme of the Conference was that of Roman Catholic Archives and the morning session was devoted to three talks on this subject. Introducing the session and speakers, Fr David Lannon reminded the audience of the historical background of persecution, the introduction of Vicars Apostolic which led eventually to the Restoration of the Hierarchy in 1850, and the type of archive that this background would have generated. He then described the typical content of a diocesan archive and, by way of comparison, that of a religious archive. Finally, he outlined the story of the St Mary's Reformatory Colony at Mount St Bernard's Monastery, which the Salford Diocese had run for a number of years, and gave a list of the different ecclesiastical and civil archives in which material relating to its twenty-five years of history might be found.

Fr Michael Williams then took up the story of the English Catholic Colleges on the Continent, the archives of which he had used in research, and gave descriptions of the other archives in Rome and elsewhere, on which he had worked, giving useful advice about access, transport, and refreshments. The third and final talk in the morning was given by Mr Michael Gandy, who spoke about other archives in England which held material on Roman Catholics, stressing the often pragmatic and episodic nature of the sources.

After a buffet lunch and a short plenary session, the Conference divided into two work groups. Mrs Anna Hardman, of the Lancashire Record Office, led the first group into an exploration of Finding Aids. Beginning with a selection of terms such as list, catalogue and about twenty other similar words, the group sought to link them together, clarifying their purposes and identifying the needs they were designed to answer, in relation to differing types and sizes of archives. Meanwhile, the second group, led by Joy Fox and David Cambridge, looked at oral history and discussed the central control, costings, practices, value and drawbacks that the recording of oral history entailed. Their experience was based on the recent Oral History Pilot Project run by the Overseas Division of the Methodist Church, in which former missionaries had been interviewed.

It is intended to publish the proceedings of this and the 1993 Conference within the next few months, and to distribute them to participants.

THE ASSOCIATION OF DIOCESAN ARCHIVISTS OF ENGLAND AND WALES

Almost all the dioceses in England and Wales now have diocesan archivists, and while these are mostly part-time and include serving parish priests, diocesan officers, and some lay people with archive or related experience, the Association can justifiably claim to represent their interests and, more importantly, the interests of the archives for which they care. The Association, like the Catholic Archives Society itself, seeks to achieve the highest professional standards of and for its members but its initial objectives have been to establish its own credentials and corporate identity and to distinguish the classes of records which constitute a diocesan archive. Thus, at its two meetings in 1993, the Association prepared reports on twelve classes of diocesan archives or related topics, which were listed in last year's journal (page 73) and in 1994, members at their first meetings following the Society's annual conference in May, were invited to prepare further reports for a meeting in November. This meeting, held at the English Martyrs' Church, Cambridge, on 8 November was attended by nine diocesan archivists. The papers submitted for this meeting comprised reports on Diocesan Synods, Diocesan Magazines, Ad Limina Reports, The Channel Islands as Part of a Mainland Diocese, School Log Books, The Historical Potential of Wills, and the Mark Cross Junior Seminary. While these reports describe the character of the relevant records found in a single diocese, they nevertheless enable other diocesan archivists and interested persons to assess the potential of diocesan archives generally and, in any event, build up an extremely useful corpus of information about diocesan archives.

Topics for reports to the 1995 meeting were suggested and among longer term aims of the Association is a guide to diocesan holdings, which it is hoped may be ready for publication by the year 2000, and represent one way by which the Association could commemorate the 150th anniversary of the restoration of the Hierarchy in 1850. The next meeting of the Association will take place at the May Conference of the Society.

Correspondence and enquiries should be addressed to the Rev. Francis P. Isherwood, the Association of Diocesan Archivists of England and Wales, St Joseph's Presbytery, 1 Milton Road, Portsmouth, Hants, PO3 6AN.

BOOK REVIEW
Keeping Archives

Edited by Judith Ellis. Second Edition, 1993. Pp 491. ISBN 1 875589 155. Published by D.W. Thorpe in association with the Australian Society of Archivists. Price £25.00. Obtainable from Bowker-Saur, Maypole House, Maypole Road, East Grinstead, Sussex (Tel: 0732 88456).

The late review of Keeping Archives in this journal can be likened to the pleasure given by a belated greeting-card, it is increased because it is unexpected. The acclaim which greeted the first edition in 1987 assured its place as a standard text for archivists. The demand for this book and the developments in information technology have inspired the appearance of this Second Edition.

The new Editor Judith Ellis and her eminent contributors have ensured that it will continue to be of lasting value for the potential archivist and the professional who wishes to develop expertise. The text has been expanded from 374 pages to 491, most of the original chapters have been retained but revised. This is evident in the chapter on Preservation which replaces that on Conservation. Here the onus for preservation is placed on the archivist at every stage in the archival process. The skill of the Conservator being reserved for major work, bearing in mind the access to other means of reproducing the original, the relative cost, etc.

Two new chapters have been added. Legal Responsibilities highlights the legal obligations of archivists and issues relating to them in an age when accountability, is demanded at every level. Inevitably, here and elsewhere the references are drawn from an Australian context. Managing Records in Special Formats discusses the multi-disciplinary approach needed when arranging, describing and preserving photographs, cine-films videos, optical discs, sound recordings etc.

The clarity and depth with which each author deals with the subject matter is matched by the enthusiasm and practical suggestions they offer. As a result, archivists are enabled to make informed decisions concerning new and established archival thinking as well as information technology. The text is supplemented by tables, checklists and photographs. The provision of an enlarged glossary of archival terminology and a good index complete this excellent book. At conferences and elsewhere one has often been at a loss to recommend a textbook which would combine initiation for the beginner and proficiency for the professional archivist.

Once again, in this second edition, the Australian Society of Archivists have produced a book which is a monument to co-operation as well as the quality of Australian archives. Echoing the praise accorded the first edition, I would suggest that Keeping Archives is the answer to every archivist's prayer.

THE CATHOLIC ARCHIVES SOCIETY CONFERENCE, 1994

The fifteenth annual conference, held at Ushaw College Conference Centre on 30 May - 1 June, was attended by some sixty-two members, including several from Ireland and one from Rome.

The conference was opened on Monday afternoon, 30 May, by Sr Mary Campion McCarren FCJ (Chairman) and the first talk was given by Mr George MacKenzie (Head of Preservation Services, Scottish Record Office) on 'Preserving and Using Records'. After supper, Mr David Sheehy (Archivist, Archdiocese of Dublin) gave 'An Overview of the Archives Situation in Ireland' (published in this edition).

Before the first talk on Tuesday, 31 May, Sr Mary Campion greeted Bishop Ambrose Griffiths OSB (Bishop of Hexham and Newcastle), who as well as welcoming the Society to the Diocese also attended the talk given by Miss Hazelle Page (Antiquities Conservator for the North of England Museums Service) who spoke on 'The Conservation of Artefacts and Non-Manuscript Materials'. This was followed by two shorter talks by Miss Jennifer Gill (County Archivist of Durham) on 'The Survey and Transfer of Ecclesiastical Records', describing the procedure for Church of England parish records under The Parochial Registers and Records Measure 1978, and by Mr David Butler (Deputy County Archivist of Durham) on 'The Theory of Records Management', very relevant to those archivists concerned about the need for procedures for the selection and transfer of current and non-current records into the archives.

Tuesday afternoon was given over to a tour of Ushaw College, under the guidance of Fr Michael Sharratt, and a visit to the Library and an exhibition on the 200th anniversary of the establishment of the Douai students at Crook Hall in 1794, prior to the move to Ushaw in 1808, arranged and described by Dr Jan Rhodes (Librarian). Refreshed by supper, the members then divided into interest groups on putting on an exhibition, work in progress, family history, sorting archives, listing archives, and archive storage.

The final morning, 1 June, was devoted firstly to the usual Open Forum, at which reports from the special interest groups of the previous evening were made and other topics raised, and then by the annual general meeting. In this Sr Mary Campion reviewed the Society's work during the last year. The officers gave their respective reports and were duly thanked for their hard work, a special tribute being paid to Sr Marguerite André Kuhn-Regnier, Secretary of the Society since 1981. The officers and Council members were then elected for 1994/5 (see inside front cover) and the conference ended. A meeting of the Association of Diocesan Archivists was held in the afternoon.

A full report of the conference is given in CAS Bulletin, Autumn 1994, Number 16, distributed to full members but also obtainable from the Bulletin editor, Miss Stephanie Gilluly. The 1995 conference will also be held at Ushaw College on 30 May - 1 June 1995.

EDITORIAL NOTES

As I write this editorial foreword I have just finished reading Father Robert O'Neill's excellent new study, Cardinal Herbert Vaughan (Burns & Oates, 1995), a massive 500-page biography of a man who was Bishop of Salford, Archbishop of Westminster and Founder of the Mill Hill Missionaries. In that book there is abundant evidence of the author's use of archival material in the custody of members of the Catholic Archives Society. The appearance of this book, and indeed of other studies as well, acts as a great encouragement to archivists and librarians alike. Moreover, by a happy coincidence, and following upon a year in which the centenary of Westminster Cathedral has been kept with all due solemnity, there is a certain 'Vaughan theme' in this edition of Catholic Archives, with articles on the Salford Diocesan Archives, a report on recent work in the Mill Hill Archives, and a welcome contribution on the archival holdings of the Franciscan Missionary Sisters of St Joseph, a congregation closely associated with Cardinal Vaughan, Mill Hill and the Diocese of Salford.

That Salford connection is maintained in the first of two articles drawn from papers given at the 1995 Catholic Archives Conference: Sister Dominic Savio's account of the use of archival material in writing her much admired biography of Mother Prout, Foundress of the Cross and Passion Sisters and very much a leading figure in Catholic life in nineteenth-century Manchester. The second contribution to emerge from the 1995 conference is Maria McClelland's account of the Hull Mercy Nuns. This edition of the journal also includes material on Catholic records in Liverpool Record Office, a report on the archives of the Servite Secular Institute, and Robin Gard's survey of the records of lay societies kept in the Westminster Diocesan Archives.

I should like to thank all the contributors to this the first edition of the journal which it has fallen to me to edit, and I encourage readers and subscribers to be generous in offering material for future publication. I must also thank the other members of the Society's Editorial Board for their help and co-operation, and likewise acknowledge the good offices of our printers, the Carmelites at Darlington. The opening article reproduces the text of a recent address given by Pope John Paul II to the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church, and represents a very positive encouragement to all concerned with the care of archives on behalf of the Catholic Church.

CATHOLIC ARCHIVES: THE FIRST FIFTEEN YEARS

'The Society hopes that Catholic Archives will commend itself to archivists, record repositories, libraries and institutions, and to all who are concerned for the care and use of the archives of the Catholic Church': such was the conclusion to the 'Editorial Notes' in the very first issue of this journal in 1981. Since that date a total of fifteen issues of Catholic Archives have appeared, each one edited in a most professional way by Robin Gard with his characteristic eye for detail and concern for scholarship. Indeed, for a comparatively small organisation, and for one which has been in existence for less than twenty years, the Catholic Archives Society may be justly proud of such a highly regarded publication.

Over the years both contributors and subscribers alike have met with Robin's thoughtful and courteous promotion of the aims of the Catholic Archives Society through his editorship of its journal. Contributors will be familiar with his persuasive charm in eliciting from them the required article, report or book review to meet the famous deadline; subscribers will know the pains taken to ensure that the journal reached them; and officers of the Catholic Archives Society will be aware of the care with which Robin has seen each volume through the press, enjoying in the process a very good working relationship with the Darlington Carmel which has printed the journal from its first issue.

It remains for the incoming Editor, on behalf of the Catholic Archives Society and its Editorial Board, to thank Robin for his dedicated work in launching and keeping afloat a journal which has rightly earned a place on the shelves of libraries, record offices and academic institutions, Catholic and non-Catholic alike, in many countries throughout the world. Indeed, a special feature of Robin's editorship has been his concern to publish both internationally and ecumenically while retaining a primary focus on archival holdings in, or of particular interest to, Roman Catholic institutions in the United Kingdom and Eire. This is all the more remarkable given the fact that when Robin was appointed Editor he was still engaged in full-time work as a professional archivist, while since his retirement he has continued to care for the archives of the Diocese of Hexham and Newcastle, as well as editing Northern Catholic History, the journal of the North East Catholic History Society. The hope expressed in that first editorial has been fully realised.

Finally, lest it be thought that his retirement as Editor of this journal represents the prelude to inactivity, Robin Gard was elected Chairman of the Catholic Archives Society in June 1995. From that important office this journal can be assured of his continuing help and counsel, for which the new Editor has already had much reason to be grateful.

The Editor

ADDRESS OF POPE JOHN PAUL II TO MEMBERS OF THE PONTIFICAL COMMISSION FOR THE CULTURAL HERITAGE OF THE CHURCH, 12
OCTOBER 1995

Venerable Brothers in the Episcopate and in the Priesthood, Distinguished Ladies and Gentlemen,

1. 'Whatever is true, whatever is honourable, whatever is just, whatever is pure, whatever is lovely, whatever is gracious, if there is any excellence, and if there is anything worthy of praise, think about these things' (Phil. 4:8). With these words of the Apostle Paul, I cordially greet you all, dear members of the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church, gathered for the first time in plenary session six years after the Apostolic Constitution Pastor Bonus, which created your young dicastery, and three years since it was given a new status by the Motu proprio Inde a Pontificatus Nostri initio.

I extend a special thought to your President, Archbishop Francesco Marchisano, whom I thank for the words with which a few moments ago he gave a concise but effective outline of the many activities carried out during these years.

2. This meeting gives me the welcome opportunity to stress the importance of cultural affairs in the expression and inculturation of the faith and in the Church's dialogue with mankind. In my ministry as Bishop of Rome I have always maintained an open and trusting relationship with the world of culture and art, trying to approach it even in my Pastoral Visits to Churches throughout the world. Culture and art refer to and reveal each other. No culturally rich historical moment exists that does not flourish in artistic production, just as no artistically flourishing period exists that does not include overall cultural wealth. But between religion and art and religion and culture there is a very close relationship. Numerous are the intellectual works and artistic masterpieces that draw their inspiration from religious values. And everyone is aware of the contribution made to the religious sense by the artistic and cultural achievements that the faith of Christian generations has accumulated over the centuries.

GIVE PRECISE MEANING TO CULTURAL HERITAGE

In this regard, the words of Gaudium et spes, which I borrowed in the Motu proprio Inde a Pontificatus Nostri initio, are significant: 'In their own way literature and art are very important in the life of the Church. . . Every effort should be made, therefore, to make artists feel that they are understood by the Church in their artistic work and to encourage them, while enjoying a reasonable standard of freedom, to enter into happier relations with the Christian community'.

3. In these first years of life of your Pontifical Commission I have often had occasion to follow its main projects and to direct its development. Indeed, there has been development. Very soon the word 'preservation', present in the initial description of your Commission, appeared clearly unsuitable because it was limiting and static: if we want to involve cultural heritage in the dynamism of evangelization, we cannot confine ourselves to maintaining and protecting its integrity; we must systematically and wisely promote it, in order to make it part of the lifeblood of the Church's cultural and pastoral activity. The present phrase - 'for the cultural heritage of the Church' - better expresses the purpose of your office.

In reading the various documents published during these years, we discover a real glossary, created for indicating corresponding actions or dimensions of the Church's concern for her cultural and artistic wealth. These are terms that are rich in meaning and heralds of commitment for all those who have at heart the values of human and religious culture.

In this context it was desired that the very concept of 'cultural heritage' should be given a precise meaning and an immediately understandable content: thus it includes, first of all, the artistic wealth of painting, sculpture, architecture, mosaic and music, placed at the service of the Church's mission. To these we should then add the wealth of books contained in ecclesiastical libraries and the historical documents preserved in the archives of ecclesial communities. Finally, this concept covers the literary, theatrical and cinematographic works produced by the mass media.

4. The Pontifical Commission has also tried to clarify the main activities regarding this heritage, identifying it so as to restore, preserve, catalogue and protect it. At the same time, the importance of making use of it was stressed, thus promoting a greater knowledge and suitable use of it both in catechesis and in the liturgy. Nor did the Commission fail to think of the promotion of new cultural wealth, supplying artists with stimulating theological, liturgical and iconographic subjects, motivating them with new and worthy commissions, deepening a renewed bond between artists and the Church, as the Council had hoped and the unforgettable Pope Paul VI had passionately advocated and put into effect.

ENCOURAGING A REBIRTH OF ARTISTIC CULTURE IN THE CHURCH

The Pontifical Commission also tried to define the principal agents of the Church's service in this field, starting with those who are institutionally involved, such as Episcopal Conferences, diocesan Bishops, the Roman Congregations of Catholic Education and Divine Worship, and the Pontifical Council for Culture.

In harmony with these principal agents, a valuable work of creating awareness and providing leadership is carried out by national Episcopal Commissions, the various people in charge of the Commissions of Sacred Art and the Ecclesiastical Cultural Heritage, librarians and archivists, the associations of Catholic artists, the directors of ecclesiastical museums, the teachers of the ecclesiastical and Catholic universities, employees in the schools that specialize in the Church's cultural heritage, which are being created following the example of that already in operation in the Pontifical Gregorian University, the men and women religious who are specifically involved in those delicate sectors or, in any case, are the curators of the artistic and historical heritage of their respective communities, and the craftsmen who restore artistic documents and works.

The harmonious dedication of such an 'army' of workers cannot fail to encourage a rebirth of artistic culture, spreading within the Church and in the world a renewed fervour of thought and work to shed light on the values of beauty and truth.

5. The Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church has also tried to perfect its working procedures, as defined by the Apostolic Constitution Pastor Bonus with the words 'agere una cum' (cf. art. 102). In this regard I am pleased to note the good relations established with the Papal Representatives, the Episcopal Conferences and individual Bishops, as also with local commissions for cultural heritage and individual agents. In this way the Pontifical Commission is increasingly becoming a driving force and a welcome point of reference, because it is discreet, open and purposeful.

I cannot fail, then, to congratulate you on the intense and respectful dialogue established with the international organizations in this area, which, at the time, greeted the birth of the Pontifical Commission as a very positive factor and reacted favourably to the possibility offered them to discuss these sensitive matters with one central office of the Catholic Church.

In expressing my personal satisfaction with the loyal and dynamic realization of the directives of the Apostolic Constitution Pastor Bonus, I thank each one of you, dear friends, for what you have already done during these years and for the projects you have already prepared for the future.

6. I urge you to persevere with enthusiasm in your valuable work. See to it that art continues to celebrate the dogmas of the faith, to enrich the liturgical mystery, to give form and shape to the Christian message, thus making the invisible world palpable (cf. Message of the Second Vatican Ecumenical Council to Artists).

BEAUTY COINCIDES WITH GOD'S OWN REALITY

What a noble mission! Spare no energy in promoting sacred art. It is well known how the specific nature of sacred art is not to be found in being merely a decorative veneer applied to realities that would otherwise remain insignificant. In that case art would be reduced to an aesthetic embellishment of a formless subject.

We are well aware that in God beauty is not a derivative attribute, but rather coincides with his own reality, which is 'glory', as the Scriptures state: 'Yours, O Lord, is the greatness, and the power, and the glory, and the victory and the majesty' (1 Chr 29:11). When the Church calls on art to assist her mission, it is not only for aesthetic reasons, but to obey the very 'logic' of Revelation and the Incarnation. It is not a question of sweetening man's bitter path with invigorating images, but of offering him even now the possibility of having an experience of God, who contains within himself all that is good, beautiful and true.

7. Dear brothers and sisters, in creating your Pontifical Commission I meant to respond to the need for a more conscious and watchful attention on the Church's part to both ecclesiastical and civil cultural heritage: thank you for having made this aspiration your own and for the generosity with which you try to express the directives received in concrete decisions.

I offer to you and to all who support your professional work my best wishes for ever renewed enthusiasm in your dedication to such a noble cause. As I assure you of a special thought before the Lord for you and your activities, I sincerely bless you, together with those who work with you and all your loved ones.

SALFORD DIOCESAN ARCHIVES

Rev. David Lannon

The Salford Diocesan Archive consists of a miscellaneous collection of papers, manuscripts, correspondence, printed material, books and ledgers, photographs and memorabilia preserved by design and by chance from the working documents of the diocese. Few items predate 1850, and little remains from the nineteenth century. Bishop Turner, the first bishop, had little in the way of diocesan administration, and even Bishop (later Cardinal) Vaughan left few papers in Salford.

WILLIAM TURNER, 1ST BISHOP OF SALFORD

The main archives are kept in storage at the Administration Offices in Gerald Road, Pendleton, with some material being located at Wardley Hall (the residence of the bishop), and some at Salford Cathedral. Certain items are kept at Derker, where the archivist is based, to enable ready access to be had to them.

It is at Derker that researchers are usually given access to archive material. A room can be set aside for work, and photocopying facilities are available. It must be stressed that the archives are private, and no right to access exists, though whenever possible the archivist will facilitate bona fide researchers. In general, no research can be undertaken for individuals, and certainly not for genealogical reasons. Prior arrangement is always needed, and the archivist can be contacted on 0161 624 8760 or by fax on 0161 628 4967.

Much work still needs to be completed before the full richness of the archive can be opened to researchers. Clergy biographical notices are being compiled. The indexing of the main contents of the storage boxes is being undertaken by Mr Edwin King, and Miss M Kay is preparing a card index to the Harvest magazine which was published for nearly a century by the Diocesan Rescue Society. The archivist is engaged in cataloguing parish files from the Deed Room, and is preparing a list of nineteenth century parish registers, with brief historical notes and details of location.

One major content is the working papers of the bishops. Bound volumes of their letters to the clergy, pastoral letters and similar documents are held. Some memorabilia are also held. An annotated list of some of Bishop Turner's acta has been prepared. Reports for or by Bishop Vaughan on San Lucar and Sir John Sutton's seminary in Bruges are held. The diaries and copy letters of Bishop Casartelli form an invaluable resource.

Some records of early diocesan administration have been preserved, including financial ledgers, minute books, and property deed indexes. Boundaries Board material, Building Office papers, and School Emergency Fund documents are complemented with a host of unsorted correspondence to the Vicar General in the early 1900s, and a complete set of parish visitation reports for 1900.

There is an extensive collection of individual parish histories, booklets, and brochures, together with material connected with property and site transactions. Parish registers however are not held centrally. They are kept in the individual parishes, although certain parishes have placed their earlier registers into the care of the Lancashire County Record Office at Preston.

Information on many Catholic societies is held, usually in connection with their correspondence with the bishop. Some material, notably from the Catholic Women's League, and the Diocesan Scout Guild, has been deposited with the archives directly.

Material on religious congregations, past and present, constitute a substantial holding. The Society of the Divine Pastor and the Franciscan Sisters of the Holy Spirit were two diocesan foundations which did not survive, while the Cross and Passion Sisters and the Franciscan Missionaries of St Joseph were two which thrived.

An extensive holding concerns education. It reflects the history of the various Education Acts since 1870, and local and national activity before and after the different Acts. As the diocesan commitment to Catholic schools and education at every level has been heroic and substantial, these holdings offer rich rewards to diligent researchers. Material is also kept on individual schools and institutions. In passing, reference must be made to the ED files at the Public Record Office, Kew.

There is also an extensive amount of miscellaneous material, mainly covering congresses and meetings held in the diocese on different occasions. Finally there is a substantially complete set of the national Catholic Directory from 1840 to the 1920s, and of the diocesan Almanac and the Harvest magazine. A selection of maps and town plans is also held. Access can be arranged to the archivist's own library with some seven hundred books, mainly devoted to nineteenth century and local Catholic history.

Some four hundred photographs have been indexed, and a substantial amount of unindexed ones awaits attention. These include a series of photographs of the diocesan Lourdes Pilgrimages of recent years, a set of historically important photographs of Salford Cathedral before recent reordering, and a collection of photographs of some of the diocesan clergy.

EDITORIAL NOTE

Father Lannon is Archivist of the Diocese of Salford. This article is reprinted with permission from North West Catholic History. Since this article was first written the author has moved to: St Mary's Presbytery, 3 Todmorden Road, Burnley, Lancashire BB10 4AU. Tel. 01282 422007.

HERBERT VAUGHAN, 2ND BISHOP OF SALFORD, 3RD ARCHBISHOP OF WESTMINSTER, FOUNDER OF MILL HILL MISSIONARY SOCIETY

THE ARCHIVES OF THE MILL HILL MISSIONARIES SINCE 1982

Rev. William Mol MHM

INTRODUCTION

In Catholic Archives 2 (1982) I wrote an article on the archives of the Mill Hill Missionaries. In that article I narrated how in August 1976 I was asked to build up a proper archives for all the material which for over a century had accumulated here but was never properly sorted out. I started by dividing all this material into five groups: 1) Founder; 2) Generalate; 3) Members; 4) Missions; 5) Colleges and Houses. I then divided each group into sections, using for each section a code consisting of three capital letters. Every ecclesiastical territory on the missions (diocese, vicariate, prefecture) received its own code. The same happened to each college and house in Europe and the United States. In the end there were so many codes that it became difficult rather than easy to find one's way. Since 1982 the codifying system has been greatly simplified. Three reasons led to this simplification: a) The difficulty visitors to the archives encountered in finding the material they are looking for; b) My visit in 1984 to the archives of the Missions Etrangères de Paris and to the archives of the White Fathers in Rome; c) The start of two more groups: Periodicals and Photographs.

A SIMPLER CODIFICATION

When I started codifying all the material I found, I placed it under the ecclesiastical territory or under the college from where the letters and other documents and publications originated, e.g. the material sent by our missionaries in the Diocese of Soroti (Uganda) I placed under the code for Soroti, SOR. At first this looked a very sensible thing to do, and it worked out all right for myself and other Mill Hill Missionaries acquainted with the names of all the different mission territories. After all, whenever a missionary receives an appointment, he is always sent either to an ecclesiastical territory or to a particular college. However, people who call here to consult the archives will know where Kenya is, or Uganda or Borneo. But the names of ecclesiastical territories, like Soroti, Eldoret, or Miri, often cause difficulties for them in locating these names. Moreover, not only are there too many names, but ecclesiastical territories also have a tendency to divide and subdivide, and to change both their names and their status. A good example is our mission in Borneo. The Prefecture of Labuan and North Borneo (erected in 1855) was entrusted to the Mill Hill Missionaries in 1882. In 1927 the territory was divided into the Prefecture of Kuching and the Prefecture of North Borneo. The Prefecture of North Borneo became in 1952 the Vicariate of Jesselton and in 1976 the Diocese of Kota Kinabalu. This would have meant four different codes for one ecclesiastical territory, viz. one for Labuan and North Borneo (LBN), one for North Borneo (NBN), one for Jesselton (JES), and one for Kota Kinabalu (KKB). Our original mission in East Africa was the Vicariate of the Upper Nile. Today the territory comprises twelve dioceses divided over two countries. In order to avoid confusion I decided to place the material from the missions under the country of origin rather than under its ecclesiastical territory. Thus all the material from six dioceses in Kenya is now under one code (KEN). This method has reduced the number of codes considerably. A subdivision of the different dioceses is maintained in each box.

A VISIT TO THE ARCHIVES OF TWO MISSIONARY SOCIETIES

In October 1984 I was asked to visit the archives of the White Fathers in Rome so as to learn more about the building up and organisation of archives. I decided to travel by train because I had never been in France and Italy, and from a train one gets at least some idea of what the country looks like. I interrupted my journey in Paris, and stayed for two days at the headquarters of the Missions Etrangères in the Rue du Bac. To my great relief I found out that their archivist spoke English very well, because my knowledge of French never went much further than 'la plume de ma tante'. I was shown the archives and I was given an explanation of the work done since the beginning of their society in 1660. At first letters from their missionaries were all pasted in large-sized books. Gradually this method did not prove very satisfactory, especially with letters written on both sides of a sheet. The present system is modern and the collection of letters and documents of the last three centuries is very impressive. Father Archivist told me that at the outbreak of the French Revolution many important documents were placed in a large trunk and buried to wait for better times. When eventually better times arrived nobody could remember where the trunk had been buried, and even today the documents remain hidden somewhere beneath French soil. I was also shown the library, which contains a large collection of very old and very rare books. The weight of all these books was such that the seminary authorities had started reinforcing the foundations beneath that section of the building. The seminary also has a very large and impressive museum.

From Paris I travelled by rail to Rome. The archivist of the White Fathers, Father Lamey, knew I was coming, and after having welcomed me at their headquarters he started showing me around his archives, explaining his method in French. I managed to make it clear to him that I did not know French, and for a moment I feared that my journey to Rome had been in vain. 'What about German?', he asked. Since I speak and understand German fairly well, the build up and organisation of the archives of the White Fathers in Rome was explained by a Frenchman to a Dutchman in German. Father Lamey was a very pleasant man who went out of his way to explain everything to me very clearly. For three mornings I travelled from our house in Trastevere to the Generalate of the White Fathers in the Via Aurelia.

The archives of the White Fathers are placed in a modern building and well spaced. The division into sections is arranged according to the periods of office of the Superiors General. Then there follows a subdivision into provinces. Each member has his own file, and these files are placed in alphabetical order regardless of nationality or date of ordination. Along one of the walls in his office Father Lamey had a large board on which all the names of the members appear, each under the place where they are. This board is kept up to date, and once a month he takes a photograph of the board and thus builds up a month-by-month account of the work and whereabouts of all the members. Another system to keep the number of members up to date is a card for each one on which only the name of the member has been typed out. The cards are divided between two boxes, one for the living members, the others for those who have died or left. Father Lamey was also building up an historical survey in the form of annual reports. These have the layout of a magazine, and all the happenings of each year are placed in the appropriate survey, e.g. ordinations, obituaries, opening of missions etc. These annual surveys contain maps drawn by Father Lamey himself. The White Fathers also have a very extensive library in which publications by their own members are placed with a reference in the archives as to their place in the library.

HERBERT CARDINAL VAUGHAN, THE FOUNDER

Back in Mill Hill I started simplifying the code system as explained above. I kept the division into five main groups and in later years added two more groups. The first group is that of our Founder, Cardinal Vaughan. All the letters, notes and articles written by or about him are contained in fifty uniform boxes and a few 'oversized' ones. These boxes contain the following:

- 2: 1852-63
- 3: 1863-65
- 4: 1860-65 Accounts
- 5: 1865-71 The acquisition of The Tablet
- 6: 1871-75
- 7: 1876-80
- 8: 1881-85
- 9: 1886-90
- 10: 1891-95
- 11: 1896-1900
- 12: 1901-03
- 13-18: Sermon Notes
- 19: Notebooks
- 20: Pastoral Letters
- 21: Books written by Cardinal Vaughan
- 22: Books mentioning Cardinal Vaughan
- 23: Books written by members of the Vaughan Family
- 24: Books written on members of the Vaughan Family
- 25-26: Studies on the life of Cardinal Vaughan
- 27: Background information on the times and lives of Catholics in eighteenth and nineteenth-century England
- 28: Biographical articles
- 29-30: Biographies
- 31-40: Books containing paper-cuttings collected by Miss Caroline Hanmer (1818-1908), covering the years 1868-1903 and taken from national newspapers and from local papers and periodicals.
- 41: Liturgical books left by Cardinal Vaughan
- 42-43: Personal effects left by Cardinal Vaughan

- 44-45: Miscellaneous
- 46: The Vaughan Family
- 47: Transcribed letters
- 48: Preparations for the centenary year (1966) of the founding of St Joseph's Missionary Society
- 49-50: Material collected since 1980.

The 'oversize' boxes contain items left by Cardinal Vaughan which are too big to be placed in the uniform boxes, e.g. his cardinal's hat. When Vaughan died in 1903 he left a set of bound volumes of mission magazines, viz.: Annals of the Propagation of the Faith (1838-1902); Missions Catholiques (a French illustrated weekly, 1868-1903); a very incomplete set of the Illustrated Catholic Missions, a monthly Cardinal Vaughan helped to start in 1885. These magazines have been placed in the Cardinal Vaughan group. An acquisition of a much more recent date is a set of The Edmundian, the magazine of St Edmund's College (1896-1962), where Vaughan served as Vice-Rector from 1855 to 1860.

THE GENERALATE

This second group is divided thus: a) The Generalate: containing the correspondence, meetings, notes, logbooks, lists of appointments and anything else connected with the daily government of the Society. They are divided between more than two hundred boxes and are arranged in chronological order. b) The General Chapters: this section holds not only the acts of the General Chapters, but also papers relating to their preparation and results, e.g. the Constitutions of the Society. c) Rome: since 1924 the Society has had a Procurator in Rome. All the correspondence between Rome (including the Vatican) and Mill Hill, as well as the correspondence between missionary bishops and Rome, is kept under this section. This section also contains a complete set of Fides, the magazine of the Vatican News Agency. d) Finance: All correspondence dealing with financial matters, legacies and old ledgers is kept in this section.

THE MEMBERS

In this group the files of all the priest-members are placed according to the year of their ordination, and of the brothers according to the date of their perpetual oath. Only the files of our deceased members are kept here. The files of our living members with their correspondence are kept in the office of the daily government of the Society.

THE MISSIONS

All the correspondence, surveys and publications from our missions are placed under this group. As mentioned above, the divisions in this group are no longer into ecclesiastical territories but into countries. This group contains:

- a) United States of America (1871-93). Mission amongst the coloured population in the Southern States of the U.S.A. together with its continuation by the Josephites (from 1893): 30 boxes.
- b) India (1875-1975): 40 boxes.
- c) Pakistan and Kashmir (from 1878): 30 boxes.
- d) Borneo (from 1881): 80 boxes.
- e) New Zealand (from 1887): mission amongst the Maoris: 16 boxes.
- f) Uganda (from 1894): 72 boxes.
- g) Zaire (from 1904): 28 boxes.
- h) Philippines (from 1905): 24 boxes.
- i) Caribbean Islands (1912-25): 2 boxes.
- j) Cameroon (from 1921): 40 boxes.
- k) Kenya (from 1924): 40 boxes.
- l) Sudan (from 1938): 12 boxes.
- m) Falkland Islands (from 1952): 6 boxes.
- n) Brazil (from 1974): 4 boxes.
- o) Australia (from 1984): mission amongst the Aborigines: 1 box.

COLLEGES AND HOUSES

This group has been divided into five sections according to the five areas where our houses and colleges are situated:

- a) Britain (7 houses).
- b) The Netherlands and Belgium (6).
- c) Ireland (2).
- d) Austria, Germany, Italy (4).
- e) North America (3).

PUBLICATIONS

Since 1982 this group, together with Photographs, has been added; and since in my earlier article they were not mentioned, I will give a more detailed survey of them here.

When in 1976 I started building up our archives I found large bundles of back-copies of our Society's publications. The completion of the different sets was not very difficult since most of our own houses were able to provide me with the missing copies. These publications (magazines) have now been bound into books, each containing a set of magazines of one year, viz: St Joseph's Advocate (quarterly), 1882-1936; St Joseph's Advocate (quarterly U.S.A. edition), 1883-89; St Joseph's Advocate (quarterly Irish edition), from 1935; St Joseph's Advocate (quarterly Scottish edition) from 1936, although some issues from the 1950s and 1960s are missing. The English edition of St Joseph's Advocate was continued in 1937 in Missions and Missionaries (changed to Mission Today in 1992). Our archives have a complete set of this magazine.

The Society also has two magazines for private circulation: Millhilliana (quarterly), 1948-94; Central Newsletter (six times a year), from 1970. Outside England the Society published: in the Netherlands, Annalen van Mill Hill (monthly), 1890-1967; Kontaktblad (quarterly), from 1968. In Belgium: Contact met Mill Hill (quarterly), 1956-70. In Austria and Northern Italy: St Josefs-Missionbote (monthly), from 1896. In the U.S.A.: Mill Hill World (quarterly), from 1959.

In the late 1960s most missionary congregations on the continent decided to issue one magazine for each country. These publications are of first-class quality, and because of their excellent articles and superb photographs I have collected the following magazines: Bijeen (Netherlands, monthly from 1968); Wereldwijd (Belgium, 10 times a year from 1969); Peuples du Monde (France, 10 times a year from 1967); Kontinente (6 times a year from 1966); Alle Welt (6 times a year from 1977).

Besides these national mission magazines I have also collected periodicals from the following missionary societies:

White Fathers: White Fathers and White Sisters, England from 1968; Vivant Univers, Belgium from 1969.

S.M.A.Fathers: African Missionary, Ireland from 1914.

Kiltegan Fathers: Africa, Ireland from 1982.

Holy Ghost Fathers: Missionwide, England from 1981.

Consolata Fathers: Consolata Missions, England from 1971.

Bethlehem Fathers: Bethlehem, England 1970-82; Wendekreis, Switzerland from 1972.

Maryknoll Fathers: Maryknoll, U.S.A from 1970.

Columban Fathers: Far East, Ireland from 1918.

Comboni Fathers: Comboni Missions, England from 1985; Comboni Missions, U.S.A. from 1970.

Scarboro Fathers: Scarboro Missions, Canada from 1980.

A few years ago our own archives received a donation of a full set of the German mission magazine Die Katholische Missionen from 1875 onwards. There are also some bound pre-war mission magazines from the U.S.A., Belgium and The Netherlands. Moreover, under 'Publications' I have added a section of about sixty boxes containing books and articles written by our members only. A spare copy of these books and articles will be placed in the personal file of the author.

PHOTOGRAPHS

Our archives treasure thousands upon thousands of photographs. At the moment they are in the process of being sorted out and catalogued. Photographs from the missions and colleges are being mounted on sheets of cartridge paper measuring 10 x 13 inches. Albums containing photographs, either from the missions or colleges, are placed under the same codes as used for all the other material in our archives. Family albums and photographs left by our members will be placed under the code and number of their personal files. Boxes containing slides are also placed under this group and catalogued in the same way as the photographs. There are also a number of black and white films, some as old as sixty or seventy years, most of them shot on the missions. At present I have not seen these films and I am unacquainted with their contents. In the last few years we have been sent videos from our missions and from some of our colleges. These show mainly special occasions, e.g. the consecration of a bishop, an ordination ceremony or some jubilee.

FUTURE PLANS

Earlier in 1995 I wrote to Mr Robin Gard, Chairman of the Catholic Archives Society, for advice about placing the index to our archives on computer. Mr Gard not only gave me advice, he also asked other archivists to do the same. I received several letters from different archivists, and following their advice I bought a database computer in April 1995. It took a while to get to know its workings and possibilities, but now I am that far and I am busily entering all the data of our members. Later on I hope to add a complete index to the contents of our archives in detail. I also plan to add a little museum which will contain objects sent to us from the missions. As soon as I have more storage room I will, with the permission of our Librarian, place his collection of The Tablet (from 1895), and of the English edition of the Osservatore Romano (from 1968) in the archives.

THE ARCHIVES OF THE FRANCISCAN MISSIONARY SISTERS OF ST JOSEPH Sister Germaine Henry FMSJ

BRIEF HISTORY OF THE CONGREGATION

On 2 May 1871, Alice Ingham, a forty-one-year-old Lancashire woman, her stepmother and two friends began community life together. In Franciscan simplicity and apostolic zeal in the mill town of Rochdale, they worked for the poor, ignorant, sick and dying. They earned their living, and the resources with which to help the poor, by means of a millinery and confectionery shop on the ground floor of their house.

Alice had been attracted to the Franciscan monastery established at Gorton, Manchester, in 1861. She had been directed and encouraged by Father Gomair, a Belgian friar. The then Bishop of Salford was informed of the group but died before the period of probation he imposed was completed. Herbert Vaughan, founder of St Joseph's Society for Foreign Missions was chosen as his successor. After a period of testing the community's intentions, he invited them in 1878 to go to London to take over the management of his missionary college: 'To be to the priests of the St Joseph's Society what the holy women in the Gospels were to the Apostles'

Alice, now Mother Francis, and eleven of her companions, all professed members of the Third Order Secular, made religious vows of poverty, chastity and obedience on 8 September 1883. They became 'Sisters of St Joseph's Society of the Sacred Heart of the Third Order Regular of St Francis'. Associates of Mill Hill, the Franciscan spirit of the community was fostered by the Friars Minor at Stratford, East London.

Besides the management of St Joseph's College, and before religious profession, the Sisters had a separate novitiate, ran an orphanage in Hampstead and did parish work in Malmesbury, Wiltshire. In 1885 five Sisters went to South East Asia to the new mission territory of Borneo. In 1886 Bishop Vaughan requested the Sisters for his newly-established 'Rescue' Society in Salford to take care of abandoned children at risk of losing their faith in the establishments of the proselytising societies of the times.

The main branches of the Congregation were established within three years of the official foundation and continue today, excepting that the college management has been superceded by care of the elderly. Missionary endeavour spread to West Africa in 1925, East Africa in 1929, and South America in 1972.

A 'defection', which eventually led to the foundation of two further Franciscan Missionary Congregations, resulted in a return to the north of England. The Mill Hill community continued until 1990. Mother Francis went to Blackburn and 'rescue' work expanded. The first community was sent to Holland.

The foundress died in August 1890 at the age of sixty years. Her remains were taken to Mill Hill for burial at the express wish of Bishop (later Cardinal) Vaughan. Her successor, an original companion in Rochdale, was Mother Catherine Prescott, but she served only seven months in office before she too died. Mother Elizabeth Smith then became 'Good Mother' both to the young congregation and to the children of the Rescue Society for the next twenty-six years. During her period of office the first community was appointed to Ireland (1906).

Through the Mill Hill connections the international character of the Congregation was established. Dutch and German/Tyrolese candidates joined the English, Scottish and Irish members. Later others came from the United States and the Phillippines, and recently the first Kenyan Sister has made perpetual profession. In 1925 the Congregation obtained aggregation to the First and Second Orders of the Franciscans and the title was changed to 'Franciscan Missionaries of St Joseph'. The decree of praise and approval from the Congregation for Religious in 1929 meant separation from Mill Hill. This was a legal act, however, and did not affect the close co-operation in the apostolate.

RECORDING THE ARCHIVES

In 1975, as noted in a recent article in Catholic Archives,¹ I was a 'novice religious archivist, an amateur appointed by my superiors, struggling to cope etc.' I did cope, and after 1979 found a source of interest in the meetings, at Spode House, of the Catholic Archives Society. In 1975, after moving the archives office from the Mother House in the Staffordshire countryside – the Generalate being moved to Manchester - I attempted to reorganise and rationalise the Congregation's papers. Surrounded by a proliferation of archival material, some 114 items listed without categorization or grouping, recorded on three typed sheets of A4 paper, my task did not appear unsurmountable.

Yet it was 1977 before I had managed to examine what actually had been preserved. Having once acted as school librarian, I was familiar with the Dewey Decimal System and so devised a classification system for: i) easier reference; ii) logical storage; iii) facility for incorporation of further material, without at the time considering what use would be made of the archives.

The Generalate is in Manchester, England. There are no Provinces, but there were Regions in Sabah & Sarawak (now defunct) and Kenya. Ireland and the United States were later given regional status, while Camerouns, Holland/Tyrol and Peru/Ecuador had Representative status.

The Third Summary: TABLES

This lists items under further divisions, e.g. 460.1 Obituaries pre-1952.

VALUE TO THE CONGREGATION³

Division 400 contains original letters from 1871, the time of our foundress's initiation of the 'work' which was to become a Pontifical Religious Congregation, up to her death in 1890. These, together with photocopies of letters to, from and about her and her Sisters and their connections with Cardinal Vaughan and others of the St Joseph's Society for Foreign Missions (in the Mill Hill archives), enabled the 'return to the sources and original charism' of the Congregation. The reorganisation of the archives permitted the centenary of the official commencement of the Congregation to be fittingly commemorated in print.⁴

Photographs and cuttings from the Salford Harvest Magazine (1886-1967) and the St Joseph's Annual Reports (1870s-1890s) give a record of the early years of the sisterhood. Our own Franciscan Missionary Herald magazine (1936 to date), with ninety per cent of the contents being articles, with photographs, by Sisters about their apostolates and experiences, covers the last sixty years. It is my ambition to index the 120 editions. Congregational newsletters since the 1969 Renewal Chapter pinpoint people, places and events.

There are gaps: e.g. the Borneo Mission (1885-1978). The Sisters were under the care of the Mill Hill Missionaries, and the first visitation by a Mother General took place only in 1930. It was 1951 before an air-mail postal service was available (and that only once a month for personal correspondence). Lack of communication, humidity and insects all militated against the preservation of papers. The absence of the Sisters from 1942 - 1945, when they were imprisoned in Japanese Internment Camps, leaves us with little original archives. However, there is a strong oral tradition kept up by the ex-Bornean missionaries who heard the stories of their predecessors who never came home. The long association with the Salford Rescue Society means that records of our apostolate are in their archives.

Division 200 (Legislation) has expanded enormously with the renewal and adaptation process of the 1970s and 1980s. The arrival of technology (videos, personal computers, laser printers) has provided more reams of paper. Microfilms and diskettes no doubt have a part to play, and will take up less storage space, in the archives of the future. One would hope that the masses of documents now printed will have as much to offer us as the poor, cramped, faded letters of our forebears.

THE WHOLE STORY ? USING ARCHIVES TO WRITE BIOGRAPHY:
ELIZABETH PROUT, FOUNDRRESS OF THE CROSS AND PASSION SISTERS

Sister Dominic Savio Hamer CP

ELIZABETH PROUT

When beginning my exploration into archives for my investigation into the life of Elizabeth Prout (Mother Mary Joseph of Jesus), I decided to cast a wide net and to search under every stone. That was necessary because comparatively little was known about the Foundress of the Cross and Passion Sisters.

I began with the information that she was born in Shrewsbury on 2 September 1820; that she was baptised into the Church of England in St Julian's, Shrewsbury, on 17 September 1820; and that she was the daughter of Edward Prout, a cooper, and his wife Ann (née Yates) of Coleham, Shrewsbury. We also knew that in the summer of 1848 Elizabeth Prout entered the convent of the Sisters of the Infant Jesus in Northampton but had to leave after a short time because of ill-health; that she founded the Congregation of the Cross and Passion in Manchester about 1851 in order to provide consecrated religious life for women of the middle and working classes who could not afford the dowry required by the established orders; that the first group of Sisters, apart from Elizabeth Prout herself, all caught fever; and that she taught in the schools in St Chad's, St Mary's and St Joseph's in central Manchester, and in Levenshulme and Ashton-under-Lyne, as well as in Sutton, St Helens, where she died on 11 January 1864. In addition to these facts, there were oral traditions that she received the grace of the Catholic Faith at a service of Benediction; that she was received into the Church by the Passionist, Blessed Dominic Barberi; and that her parents, despite their initial opposition to her conversion, eventually became Catholics themselves. With that information I began my investigation from where I stood, which happened to be on Victoria Station, Manchester, as I waited for a train back to Scotland after being appointed to this research.

BEGINNING THE TRAIL

Inspirations come at odd moments and in strange places: I found myself gazing at a notice adverting to the bicentenary of Boddington's brewery. Two hundred years, I thought, and coopers might work in breweries. After meditating on that for the five hours of my journey northwards, I wrote to Boddington's and that led me, or rather others on my behalf at that stage, through the brewery's archives to those of Greenall Whitley and Allied Breweries, and finally drew me to the present owners of a brewery in Coleham, Shrewsbury.

ELIZABETH PROUT
MOTHER MARY OF JESUS

Shrewsbury is an historian's paradise on account of its archives, libraries, museums and its many ancient buildings. By making use of the Shropshire County Record Office and by searching newspapers and old journals in the Local Studies Library, I was able to see Elizabeth Prout's baptismal entry; to browse through papers belonging to the Coleham brewery; and to make a tentative reconstruction of the type of education she might have had. I was also able to locate the brewery, the cottages beside it - in one of which she might have been born - the church where she was baptised and the Abbey where possibly she attended Sunday school. I also discovered that she could well have left Shrewsbury when she was about eight years old, because the brewery was put up for sale, sold, and closed down within a few years. My next task was thus to discover where Edward Prout found another job.

Because Blessed Dominic Barberi founded the first Passionist monastery in England at Aston Hall, near Stone, I enquired about a brewery in that town. I was overjoyed when an assistant in the Staffordshire Record Office not only told me about Joule's brewery in Stone, but also that the Prout family were living in New Brewery Yard at the time of the 1841 census. This was a major breakthrough because it meant that Elizabeth Prout was living near Aston Hall when she reached her twenty-first birthday in September 1841, only a few months before Blessed Dominic's arrival in 1842. She found herself in the one place in England where she had ample opportunity to see him, to hear him preach, to be converted by him and from him to receive conditional baptism. The oral tradition that she had been received into the Catholic Church by Dominic Barberi was likely to be true.

MORE ARCHIVES

There were seven sets of archives in the Stone area which interested me: those in the Staffordshire County Record Office; the newspapers in the Salt Library, Stafford; the registers at St Dominic's, Stone, St Michael's, Stone, and Aston Hall; the archives of the Dominican Sisters, Stone, and those of Colwich Abbey. At Colwich there were some letters from Blessed Dominic Barberi, Father Ignatius Spencer, and Father Gaudentius Rossi, who was Elizabeth Prout's co-founder. The newspapers and census returns in Stafford gave me a wealth of background material, as well as further details about the family's presence at Stone in 1841, 1851 and 1861. Although the various registers at Aston Hall and Stone failed to prove that Elizabeth Prout was received into the Catholic Church by Blessed Dominic Barberi, they did verify that other oral tradition that her parents died as Catholics, while the Dominican archives revealed that Edward Prout had in fact been a Catholic all along but had lapsed before his marriage.

I then visited the diocesan archives in Birmingham and Northampton. The first yielded what all researchers have to be prepared for: hours of mainly fruitless labour. At Northampton, however, I was taken down the cellar steps of Cathedral House, ushered through a creaky door into a room resplendent with cobwebs, dusty cardboard boxes and rusty iron cases, and invited to help myself. Several hours later I emerged in triumph, holding one single document. The next day I discovered a copy of the same document in our own General Archives.

The Cross and Passion Archives were the main source for my research but they needed the other sources to elucidate them. It was this need that led me to the Westminster Diocesan Archives, to those of the Catholic Education Council, and to the educational papers in the Public Record Office, Kew. There, in the section relating to the Manchester schools, I found a goldmine, viz. the evidence that Elizabeth Prout taught in St Chad's in December 1849; that her school was inspected in 1850; and that, as a result of her dedicated service in the most adverse circumstances, the government gave St Chad's a building grant of £620 as well as money for books and apparatus. There, too, were descriptions of the social conditions in which she lived and worked and I was able to supplement these accounts from archives in Manchester itself.

From October 1989 I was based in Manchester and so had access to the excellent John Rylands University Library and Central Reference Library, the latter housing collections of parliamentary papers, journals, magazines, newspapers, and the archives of the City of Manchester. Here I spent many long and fruitful hours, and discovered Elizabeth Prout listed in Stocks Street in the 1851 census returns and her convent at Levenshulme recorded in the Ratebooks of 1858 and the census returns of 1861. In the Salford Diocesan Archives I found the school deeds that supplemented the government papers in the Public Record Office. Gradually, as I filled out the minutiae of the primary sources with the information in secondary sources, there began to emerge a picture of Elizabeth Prout in the Manchester of her day.

Outside Manchester there were still more archives to visit. The census returns microfilmed in the Local Studies Library in St Helens showed Elizabeth Prout in her convent and school at Sutton in 1861. In the provincial archives of the Passionists at Sutton I was able to identify a document as the Mission and Retreat Book kept by Father Gaudentius Rossi, and this helped to date a number of his letters in our own archives. In the Passionist provincial archives in Dublin there was, as at Sutton, another goldmine. Here in Dublin were the writings of Elizabeth Prout's friend, Father Salvian Nardocci, while in the National Library of Ireland I found the newspaper accounts and street directories that established that she was in the city at the time of the Great Winds of November 1857. From Dublin I moved to Rome, to Propaganda Fide and the Vatican Archives, but above all to work in the Passionist General Archives, where I found yet another treasure trove in the letters of Father Ignatius Spencer. From Rome I went to the United States, to the Passionist provincial archives in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, where Father Gaudentius Rossi lived for some years and where I found invaluable material on his missionary journeys which formed the background to his letters to Elizabeth Prout from North America. In other Passionist archives in Union City, New Jersey, where Father Gaudentius died, I found more material and made the discovery that a barber was paid three dollars for shaving him after he had died

On my return to England I went to the Lancashire Record Office in Preston, where I found the Reports of the Religious Inspections in the parishes and schools in which Elizabeth Prout or her Sisters taught. In the libraries of Downside Abbey, Oscott College, Upholland, Wardley Hall and the [Salford] Catholic Rescue Society, and in the Catholic Central Library in London I found wonderful material on nineteenth-century English Catholicism. In the Liverpool Record Office I ploughed through several years of baptismal entries, with as many as 1,100 to 1,400 baptisms per annum in each parish I searched. It also paid to visit the places where Father Gaudentius Rossi gave missions and from where he wrote his letters - especially St Anthony's, Liverpool - and it was likewise important to follow literally in Elizabeth Prout's footsteps. It was only when I walked through the streets of Manchester myself that I began to have any conception of the distances she tramped and the pain she must have endured in her tubercular knee; and it was only when I too stayed, as she had done, with the Presentation Sisters in Fermoy and went out each day to the neighbouring towns in my quest for information that I began to appreciate her humility and endurance as she sought alms in the winter of 1857-58.

THE USE OF ARCHIVES

This point leads to the question of the purpose for which archives are used. Historians use archives because they seek to produce a final picture. In my case I wanted to find Elizabeth Prout. What kind of person emerged as I put together the precious pieces of mosaic collected in so many archives ? The education papers in the Public Record Office proved that, as the archives of the Cross and Passion Sisters said, she did indeed teach in St Chad's, George Leigh Street, in 1849; that her school was no more than a ramshackle old warehouse; that her desks and furniture were only moderate and that her books and equipment were rather scanty. They also recorded that her discipline was good and that she was personally well disposed, although she was apparently lacking in energy – which is not surprising given that these papers also suggest that she had at least 100 girls in a long, low-ceilinged room. If we add to her own tubercular condition the smoke, fog, rain and smells that characterised central Manchester in the mid-nineteenth century, we begin to appreciate that she endured a great deal.

To reach George Leigh Street from her residence in Stocks Street, Elizabeth Prout probably walked across Angel Meadow. It is also likely that she would have taught in Dyche Street, Angel Meadow, from November 1851 to about September 1852. As described by Father Sheehan in his application for a school building grant, this district was 'the most densely populated part of the town. . . where the poorest, the less educated and the most criminal members of the community' resided. One-and-a-half miles in length and a mile wide, Angel Meadow had a population of 15,000 Catholics, 'chiefly employed as handloom weavers, hawkers and factory operatives. . . the poorest members of the community'. In 1852 Elizabeth Prout went to teach in St Mary's, Royton Street, off Deansgate, an area Father Henry Browne described on his building grant application form in 1854 as one of 'back streets and cellars' and 'noted for wickedness and crime'. He described the school as 'a few miserable rented rooms' Elizabeth's unsuccessful attempts to find a house in the area meant that she had to limp all the way from Stocks Street to Deansgate throughout the winter of 1852-53. In early 1853 she was seriously ill, but before she had recovered she was asked to take care of a school at St Joseph's, Goulden Street. As described by Father Gaudentius, it had not a single desk, no books, maps, ink or slates, and no stove to heat the room in winter. It was 'at the very centre' of a 'densely populated' part of Manchester, where the majority were 'poor Irish Catholics'. He understood there were about 4,000 parishioners but said that no more than two or three families could be considered 'respectable' and none 'independent'. Nevertheless, he wanted Elizabeth to move her convent into St Joseph's parish: 'The sooner you go there the better. . . Take my advice and find a home in St Joseph's district, and if you cannot find a very fine palace learn to be satisfied like the Holy Family to dwell in a stable or at least to live in a poor house in Nazareth.' But she could not find a house. The empty ones she inspected were either too small for her religious community of ten or were 'full of bugs', and so she continued to limp across Angel Meadow from Stocks Street until in 1853 all her Sisters caught fever.

The parliamentary papers in Manchester's Central Reference Library add another dimension to the picture. Elizabeth Prout knew that she was needed in the city especially because of the crucial debate then being waged about education on the rates and the threat of the exclusion of Catholics and Jews from rate support in order to reduce the number of children needing free education. It was proposed to enforce the use of the Authorised Version of the Bible as the criterion for granting rate support and to provide this free schooling in those working class areas where there were insufficient schools. As a result, especially in view of Irish immigration from the Great Potato Famine, the Catholic Church in Manchester was desperately in need of teachers and schools. In teaching in first one working class area and then another, Elizabeth Prout was helping to meet that need. When S.N.Stokes, the H.M.I., came to inspect her school at St Joseph's in 1853, he found a mixed class of 179 girls and boys. He regretted the school was too poor to receive a grant. 'This very interesting school', he reported, 'situated in one of the poorest and most populous parts of Manchester, and crowded with children, is not in a condition to claim aid from my Lords. It is imperfectly furnished, and ill supplied with indispensable requisites'. 'Nevertheless', he added, 'the children seem to attend with willingness, and to be much attached to their two amiable teachers, who cannot fail to exercise a moral influence of high value.' Thus my search in the education papers in the Public Record Office revealed Elizabeth Prout to have been a person 'well disposed', 'amiable' and much loved by her children.

WRITING A BIOGRAPHY

One of the demands of writing a biography is to follow the lead of one's subject. From an academic point of view Elizabeth Prout, as a foundress of a religious order, might seem to present a fairly well contained unit. However, for a delicate, diminutive woman who had lived mainly hidden and unknown, and was to remain so in history even within her own Congregation for over one hundred years, Elizabeth Prout presented a very complex subject for research. It must be remembered that archival documents present only the raw material of history. Each one is like a piece of a jigsaw puzzle. In some cases they can be put together to create a section of the final picture, but they will not tell the whole story especially if the subject of research is a person. Human beings live in time, are influenced by the ideas of their age, and are conditioned by their environment. Their lives can also be deeply affected by the prejudices of their contemporaries. It is thus necessary to read around the archival evidence and to supplement it with secondary sources. For example, to understand the information that Elizabeth's father was a cooper, I had to read what historians had to say about a cooper's work and lifestyle at that time. When I had done that I was able to understand what one of the annalists meant when she wrote that the Foundress was a 'gently-nurtured lady' from a 'comfortable home'. Similarly, it was only by reading about the religious controversies of the time that I could even begin to understand the charges levelled against Elizabeth Prout in 1858 and why the parliamentary papers, of all archives, should be concerned with the 'Forcible Detention of Females in Religious Houses'. Literature from the period is also important, because it reveals how people of that time thought, as well as incidentals of their domestic living, such as the blue and white check cotton curtains that the Manchester working classes used in their homes and which were still being used in our convents when I entered in 1954!

In writing a biography it is of course the thought of one's subject that is most important, but this is also likely to be most elusive. In the case of Elizabeth Prout this is a particular problem because so few of her letters have survived. The archives do, however, provide some pointers. Father Gaudentius Rossi's letter to Father Robert Croskell on 25 June 1852, for instance, indicates his deliberate intention to found an order that was both contemplative and active, like his own Passionist Congregation. The writer of Annals A/E assures us that Elizabeth Prout would never allow the 'active work of Martha' to interfere with the 'contemplation of Mary'. Father Croskell's letter to Elizabeth on 2 July 1858 clarifies the point that the spirituality of her Congregation had always been Passionist and was constantly reinforced by close contacts with such outstanding Passionist priests as Fathers Ignatius Spencer, Bernardine O'Loughlin and Salvian Nardocci, as well as Father Gaudentius Rossi.

CONCLUSION: THE WIDER CONTEXT

Finally, something must be said about the wider spiritual and ecclesial context of Elizabeth Prout's life. St Paul of the Cross (1694-1775) founded the Passionists in 1720 and received papal approbation of his Rule in 1741. Elizabeth Prout made her profession of vows in 1854, and the Sisters of the Cross and Passion were granted aggregation to the Congregation of the Passion in 1874-75. Thus any study of the life of the Foundress required the integration of biographical detail with an appreciation of the theology and spirituality of the Passionist tradition. In particular it required an understanding of the importance of the conversion of England as an element in the mystical experience and spiritual teaching of St Paul of the Cross, as well as the fulfilment of that commitment in the Passionist mission to England in the nineteenth century.

The Passionist spirituality was the message that Blessed Dominic Barberi first began to preach in Aston Hall by Stone in the spring of 1842, the message that reached the heart of Elizabeth Prout. Moreover, strong circumstantial evidence points to her reception into the Catholic Church by Blessed Dominic in March 1844. Thus again it was necessary to seek to understand Elizabeth Prout against the background of Blessed Dominic's own life and mission, especially his role in the establishment of the Passionist presence in England and Ireland, his commitment to Christian Unity, and his contact with Wiseman, Newman, Lord Shrewsbury and other leading ecclesiastical figures. Through Blessed Dominic Barberi, the Founder of the Passionist Congregation in England and the direct heir to the promises made to St Paul of the Cross, Elizabeth Prout, the future Foundress of the Sisters of the Cross and Passion, entered into her own Passionist inheritance. It was that Passionist spirituality that formed the essence of her life as a Catholic and which is thus an essential part of her biography. Without it the documents in the various archives I visited must remain little more than dry bones.

IN SEARCH OF THE HULL MERCY NUNS: AN ARCHIVAL TRAVELOGUE

Maria McClelland

THE HULL MERCY NUNS

Some years ago I registered for a Master's degree at Hull University with the intention of tracing the history of Endsleigh Teacher Training College from 1905 to 1976. My first encounter with the Mercy Archivist at Hull, however, resulted in a change of focus when it was revealed that the early papers relating to the founding of Endsleigh had probably been destroyed by bombing. The story of the Hull Mercy community itself had hitherto been neglected, and I determined to try to fill that gap instead. The result was a study of the work of the Hull Mercy nuns from 1855 to 1930, with particular reference to their educational endeavours. I concentrated on their struggle to find their feet and their vocation as new nuns in a new country, and have shown elsewhere how that struggle was an intensive one culminating in what has come to be called The Great Convent Case, when in 1869 all the Hull Mercy nuns were effectively 'on trial' for a month before the Court of the Queen's Bench at Westminster Hall.¹ The case against them was that they conspired between them, under the direction of Mothers Starr and Kennedy, to cause another nun, Susan Saurin, to have to leave the convent against her will. It was an extraordinary case that rattled the composure of the Catholic Church in England for the duration of the trial and reverberated throughout the Irish dioceses of Meath and Dublin.

I also examined the ways in which these nuns worked with Fr Edward Clifford, the first incumbent of St Edward's Church in Clifford near Boston Spa in the West Riding of Yorkshire, to establish schools for a growing Catholic community in that village. They were assisted by the Grimstons, descendants of a recusant martyr and the chief landowning and mill-owning family in the village. However, the priest and the nuns did not share the same understanding of the role of the nun in a parish, and this inevitably led to difficulties. As lay observers of the build-up to the Great Convent Case, the Grimstons became disenchanted with Starr and Kennedy and eventually withdrew their financial support in sympathy with Sr Saurin.

When the nuns moved to Hull (partly in 1857 and completely in 1867), they worked with Fr Michael Trappes and his curates to establish a strong Catholic community in the city. Their considerable educational success has been shamefully neglected hitherto by historians, probably deliberately so, to ensure that the Great Convent Case skeleton was well and truly buried before the city was spotlighted again. This is a pity, particularly since that success was won in the teeth of opposition from local officials on the Hull School Board and (after 1902) on the Local Education Committee. In 1905 the Hull Mercy nuns opened their training college at Endsleigh for Catholic women teachers, at a time when such provision was very much in a developmental state throughout the country.² The birth of the college and its growth and survival was a tribute to the true grit personality of Mother Dawson who had, in turn, been trained and formed by Mother Kennedy.

Whilst this story is a localised one, it could not be properly told or understood without reference to its wider context. As well as being the story of a new convent in Clifford and then in Hull, it was also a significant part of the larger story of the spread of the Mercy congregation founded by Catherine McAuley. It was equally the story of an intrepid band of women who set sail for England from Dublin in 1855 and another chapter in the story of the Irish diaspora in the nineteenth century; of a community of women religious and the growth of a city's Catholic lay community; of the foundation of Catholic schools in Hull and of the wider struggle for education for

ACCOUNT OF THE HULL MERCY TRIAL

Catholic children and their teachers. There was also a social dimension to this study. The nuns came to England at a time when the country was becoming openly and increasingly hostile to nuns. From the 1850s there was a growing public campaign to secure state inspection of convents on the grounds that 'factories, prisons, mines, workhouses, madhouses had to be open to public scrutiny, why not convents too?'¹³ With or without state inspection, the lives of these first Hull Mercy nuns were under a public microscope as they necessarily interacted with people in their uncloistered apostolate to the young, the old, the poor and the needy.

It will be appreciated, therefore, that this wider context of a Hull-based story required a spread of archival resources. Little did I realise that my travels through these archives were to become as educative for me as the secrets they were about to unfold.

PRESBYTERY RECORDS : 'WATCH YOUR LANGUAGE'

Presbyteries can be difficult places to penetrate. One might never have had the courage to broach the wonderful (yet terrifying) housekeeper of one Hull parish were it not for an organised visit to the church with a group of Catholic history teachers. We were given a guided tour of the church and were then taken to the cellar to look at some wall burials. The floor was littered with bric-a-brac and there were papers and old ledgers strewn around as well as a collection of framed pictures standing against one wall. Enquiries as to what they might be led to an invitation to 'have a look'.

Imagine the delight when the very dusty collection yielded photographs of Dean Trappes and some of his curates, including Arthur Riddell and John Motler. Trappes had been responsible for bringing the Mercy nuns to Hull in 1857. Naturally, the find fuelled a belief that there was a goldmine of information in this presbytery and permission was instantly sought to quarry in it. Back came the reply, 'We have no records or archives here'. Undaunted, I offered to clear out the cellar, convinced that by doing so I would find my goldmine under the dust.

Arriving a week later, suitably dressed for the job, the housekeeper greeted me at the door with a 'What do you want?', to which I replied, 'Father has asked me to come to help him clear the cellar'. 'I don't know where he is', she said as she disappeared into the house, leaving me standing, with the front door slightly ajar. Presumably, she hoped I would be gone before the priest could be found. As it happened, the contents of the cellar were brought to me in a large cardboard box, and I worked through them alone on the floor of the parlour.

They did not yield a goldmine but they provided some very useful stepping stones. Membership books and ledgers of the Catholic Men's Club provided clues to surnames, as also did advertisements for church events, e.g. St Charles Grand Bazaar, which could raise over £2,000 in three days for the purpose of 'reducing the debt. . . and for the completion of the sanctuary'. Some notable Catholics emerged from the list. It was as if the floorboards of the world into which the nuns came were being laid for me. An early handwritten attempt at the history of St Charles contained a more vivid oral history of the Hull Catholic scene than some of the pamphlet-type histories printed at a later date.

A reliable sequence of parish priests and curates was gleaned, together with odd snippets of personal details, including reference to the public recognition of the service given to the Hull School Board by Fr Randerson, one of Trappes' curates. There were also many photographs in the collection, including those of children processing through crowded streets in white dresses and veils and accompanied by nuns. The message for the researcher was that Catholics and non-Catholics did respect each other sometimes, did work together on public bodies and did make an impact on one another. This was a factor that needed to be kept in mind in the interests of presenting a balanced account. One of the chief rewards of this search was the chance to become acquainted with the handwriting of some of the priests.

Shortly after this visit to the presbytery two typed sheets came into my possession. Printed on headed notepaper from the County Archives Office in Beverley, they were clearly a recently inspected set of Catholic records from 1840 to the present day, and were stated to be housed at St Charles' Presbytery. I came to realise that I probably had asked incorrectly in the first place: had I enquired about registers etc. rather than letters or archival material, perhaps I would have been led directly to the contents of these two pages. A valuable lesson was learned: it pays to rehearse one's words when seeking information. I now went for the direct approach, with a letter to the Parish Priest asking for permission to see the 'Status Animorum' book of 1853, the Parishioners Book of 1854, and the printed Summary of Decrees from the Synod of the Diocese of Beverley (1862-69). There was no problem about access: yes, they had these items but did not know that I was interested in them.

Two public repositories warranted attention: the national P.R.O. at Kew, which was important because the nuns had been prolific in establishing schools in Hull; and the Beverley Records Office, because of its proximity to Hull. On my way to Beverley library one day I chanced to call in at the Beverley Office to enquire about any Catholic records. The assistant told me there were none, but I was free to consult the catalogue. This had references to the Constable Maxwells, the local landed Catholic family, and I determined to make a note of the file for future reference. Having no paper, I picked two discarded A4 photocopied sheets from the bin - these were the aforementioned typed inventory of the St Charles' records. I returned to the assistant to ask how one might have access to these files and was met with a protest that nothing was known about Catholic files and that I had no business reading things from the bin. It was a curious encounter, but I mention it because rumour has it that much of what is on these two sheets has now been deposited at Beverley. One hopes it will be kept intact as a Catholic section rather than be dispersed into a myriad of unrelated files.

The P.R.O. at Kew conjures up more helpful memories once one has cracked the intricate system of tracking, ordering and using the facilities. I confined myself to the section of the catalogue relating to elementary and secondary schools for the period in question and was particularly grateful for the introduction to that section in the catalogue itself, which summarised educational provision for the period, thus giving an informed context in which to study individual files and thereby enhancing considerably the value of their contents.

True to the traditions of Catherine McAuley, the Hull nuns were ever keen to submit their schools to government inspection for the sake of receiving a grant and for self-evaluation. Catherine McAuley had always maintained that critics of religious institutions would have to re-think their position if such institutions were supervised by the National Board.

H.M.I. reports on individual schools in the second half of the nineteenth century were every bit as tedious as such reports today. Their value to researchers, however, lies in the variety of information that they can supply about school populations, accommodation and resources, as well as information about the quality of teaching and learning. This is the kind of information which in turn can be translated into an understanding of the impact of these nuns on the emergent

Catholic population. It was in these reports that one was alerted to the chapel-up/school-down pattern of development in all Catholic elementary school buildings in Hull until the turn of the century. The only exception was St Joseph's, which was purpose built as a school in the grounds of the Mercy Convent in Anlaby Road. This pattern was provided for by the Provincial Synod of Westminster in 1851 which declared, 'wherever there may seem to be an opening for a new mission, we should prefer the erection of a school so arranged to serve temporarily for a chapel, to that of a church without [a school]. . . for it is the good school that secures the virtuous and edifying congregation'.⁴

The real pearls of interest in the P.R.O. nestled among the letters of members of the Hull School Board and of Hull priests about Catholic schools, and were a real test of one's impartiality. The Hull nuns presented a collective image of being formidable women well able to fight their corner. A study of the machinations of the School Board and its successors, however, reveals that the nuns needed to be made of true grit to contend with them.

The School Boards were established as a result of the 1870 Education Act that sought to provide elementary education for all. Their function was to equip, maintain and staff schools for those not provided for by voluntary denominational schools. Board schools were to exist alongside the latter, but were empowered to raise rates to finance their activities. As a result of this access to the rates they soon outstripped, or at least rivalled, the voluntary schools. The Hull School Board felt threatened by any spare accommodation in church schools, especially the ever-increasing numbers of schools under the direction of the Mercy nuns. It feared that should its own schools be filled, Protestant children could be required to attend a Catholic school with vacancies. Thus it kept a close watch on applications for extensions to Catholic schools and opposed applications for new ones.

The correspondence in the P.R.O. witnesses to much haggling over numbers at Catholic schools and the accuracy of returns of average yearly attendance. The reaction of Whitehall officials is particularly interesting: many evinced very narrow feelings about not permitting Catholics to spread out so freely. Thus the Minute Papers to and from government officials cannot be overlooked. Written on poor quality foolscap paper, often in pencil, spontaneously annotated by each recipient and containing many frank asides in the margins, they can help to build an appreciation of the true nature of the struggle to establish Catholic schools in England and particularly in Hull.

The Hull Board opposed extensions to Catholic schools on the grounds that the overflow from one school could easily fill the vacancies in others - which always existed, it was contended, where average attendances did not match numbers on roll. But this made no allowance for the fact that very young children would be obliged to walk over a mile-and-a-quarter through dangerous busy streets with tram lines in the heart of the town. Nor did the analysis of average attendances take into account absences because of illness or epidemics, or because of the need to withdraw children from school for seasonal work. This latter point was also drawn to the attention of officials by non-Catholic groups in Hull.

The Hull Board's protests seem unreasonable when one considers that the overcrowded city centre schools of St Charles and St Patrick were repeatedly refused permission to extend until in 1893 the situation was so desperate that St Gregory's School had to be built nearby to relieve the strain. Within a year of its opening this school required extension into the chapel above, with space for 226 pupils, leaving the ground floor for the infants. One year later, across the city at the Boulevard, plans were submitted for a church and school dedicated to St Wilfrid. As Whitehall dragged its feet over the school, the church went ahead and - in the process - occupied 100 square feet of playground space. Government officials were furious at this 'very cool proceeding' and the Minute Papers indicate the debates between three of their number as to what could be done to make the Catholics pay for their crime. Restoration of the space was demanded by 1898, and from then until 1910 all applications for extensions to that school were refused on the grounds of inadequate playground space.

To opponents of state aid for Catholic schools, the Church must have evinced one very irritating characteristic, viz. the principle that once a school had been erected, then God would provide children to fill it. Its school building policy was thus proactive rather than reactive, and this scuppered the plans of officialdom. This is seen in the construction of St Vincent's School. On 30 January 1901 Fr Francis Hall, Parish Priest of St Charles, wrote to Whitehall with a proposal for a new elementary school in Queen's Road. Six months later the Secretary of the Board of Education replied that the Hull School Board disputed the need for such accommodation. The Minute Papers suggested it was time to stop Catholics 'building on as big a scale as they liked' and to limit their accommodation to their 'probable RC requirements'.⁵ 'We have several times allowed grants to RC schools which were technically unnecessary', wrote Mr Cowrie, but an annual grant for this new school would be clearly unjustifiable.⁶ Marginal notes indicate that many representations were made on behalf of St Vincent's School, including personal visits to Whitehall by the Duke of Norfolk. When H.M.I. L T Munro investigated, Fr Hall convinced him that he had a ready-made population of at least 176 children and that there was every possibility of this number increasing as a result of the rapid housing development around Newland Avenue and Queen's Road. His school population was to be drawn from St Vincent's Orphanage in Wright Street and orphans imported from Middlesbrough. The orphanage was eventually built in the school grounds and provided a steady flow of pupils.

The plans were approved in January 1902 and building was completed in November 1903. Meanwhile LEAs took over from School Boards, and a fresh dispute arose. The LEA's brief was to 'maintain and keep efficient all public elementary schools including voluntary schools in the area'. The empty St Vincent's building could not be deemed to be a school, declared the new Hull LEA, because it did not have 'school desks, furniture or any apparatus of elementary education'. Furthermore, as it was not already an elementary school, its establishment as one would mean the provision of a new public elementary school under Section 8 of the 1902 Act, and all the proper procedures would have to be gone through! Once again it was intimated that there was no need for such a school. It was a clever move to settle old scores against Catholics for the proliferation of schools hitherto, but it heralded even greater arguments. Fr Hall furnished the school on a shoestring, and it was opened in May 1904. Six years later, after an inspection by HMI Leaf, the LEA was ordered to replace the furniture on the grounds that the desks were totally unsuitable for the children.

LOCAL HISTORY ARCHIVES : 'SYMPATHISING WITH THE GRAFFITI ARTIST'; AND NEWSPAPER LIBRARY : 'ACCESSING THE OPINION POLLS'

Having consulted the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Hull Elementary Education Committee and those of the Higher Education Committee, I had an instant rapport with the feelings of graffiti artists. Why? We have in central Hull an Alfred Gelder Street, a Hall Road, a Francis Askew School, and a well-known firm of estate agents called Larards. However, these and others were the names of those on the Hull Education Committee who would have cut off the educational oxygen to the nuns and their schools were it not for the incredible galvanisation of all local Catholic forces behind the priests and nuns. As a result of the machinations of these antagonists, Catholics set out to forge 'a real live effective organisation which can penetrate every municipal ward of the city and which can speak authoritatively for and direct the entire Catholic vote when election time comes around'.⁷ To this present day, I cannot walk down Alfred Gelder Street without entertaining an extreme urge to daub the walls with 'Three cheers for the Mercy Nuns'. One could select from a whole range of examples of simple or more prolonged tales of opposition from these men, each one minuted in the Committee Proceedings records and then more fully covered in the newspapers.

In 1903 new regulations sought to improve the training of pupil-teachers by stipulating that intending pupil-teachers remain in full time education until the age of sixteen; and that a period of apprenticeship (16-18 years) was to be accompanied by 'at least 300 hours of instruction in approved centres or classes for pupil-teachers'. The Mercy nuns applied for recognition of St Mary's High School and their Pupil Teachers Centre in Anlaby Road under the new regulations. At the same time the LEA applied for recognition of its High Schools and Pupil Teachers Centre. The buildings were inspected and both parties were alerted to certain defects which had to be remedied before recognition could be granted.

On receipt of the nuns' plans, the Board of Education granted temporary recognition (6 February 1904), as long as the Hull Education Committee agreed to allow pupil-teachers to attend the Catholic centre for five half-days per week. The Committee refused permission until the nuns completed their improvements, although it sanctioned attendance at its own centre. It also refused to appoint probationary teachers to supply for those pupil-teachers already in the Catholic system of training. This effectively prevented them from attending any Pupil Teachers Centre, and was a severe blow to the nuns because they had nearly 70 pupil-teachers in training. Moreover, it was unfair because the Committee had clearly sought to give its own Pupil Teachers Centre a headstart before the nuns could compete for custom. The pages of the Eastern Morning News and the [Hull] Daily Mail were peppered with debates on the issue and letters supporting both sides of the argument. The Hull Education Committee was accused of trying to supplant voluntary schools and of taking undue advantage of misplaced confidence in its powers. It was reminded that through its many years of ratepaying, the Catholic community had contributed 'more than £50,000 to build Board Schools for the general public, from which schools they have not received a fraction of benefit because their conscientious convictions compelled them to send their children to their own schools'.⁸ The Committee was unimpressed with warnings about the growth of intense indignation among Catholics who feared that the supply of Catholic teachers would dry up and that within a very short time school managers would be forced to employ non-Catholics for Catholic elementary schools.

When repairs to the Catholic Pupil Teachers Centre were completed in August 1904 full recognition was granted by the Board of Education, and the Hull Education Committee could no longer refuse to recognise its status. However, improvements to St Mary's High School were still under way and the Committee explored that weak link through the Bursaries dispute.

In June 1904, under the auspices of the Hull Education Committee, an entrance examination was held for all sixteen year olds desiring to become pupil-teachers. A scholarship worth £10 for each of two years was on offer to 125 of the best examinees. Sixteen Catholics sat the examination and twelve qualified. When they applied for the bursary to be tenable at St Mary's High School they were refused on the grounds that St Mary's was still deemed 'inefficient' in relation to its science, English and history provision : it was not formally removed from that list until March 1906, by which time the two years had elapsed. None of the candidates received the bursaries. Eight of them persisted through the nuns' scheme, but without financial help, while the others were forced to abandon their teaching ambitions. From June 1904 to June 1906 this dispute was the most contentious issue in Hull and it became a key feature in attracting or losing votes at the local elections.

The Education Committee's opposition to the holding of bursaries at inefficient schools appeared legitimate, but some of their own schools were also on that list. Furthermore, it was active in preventing science teachers from taking part-time Saturday jobs at the nuns' school lest this should assist St Mary's to remedy its problems in this area. Twenty-nine of the sixty members of the Committee favoured the Catholics' claim to the bursaries, some of them arguing that the nuns had contributed magnificently to the good of the city, having spent nearly £65,000 on buildings since their arrival and having paid considerable sums to local tradesmen. Their annual rate contribution of £177-10-0d was also mentioned, as well as nearly thirty years of rate aid for education paid by Hull Catholics to no benefit for themselves.⁹ The thirty-one members who were opposed to payment of the bursaries to Catholics made no secret of their prejudices and would do nothing to help Catholicism or further its exclusive educational practice which, like the Irish education scheme, made it 'a matter of sin for a Catholic and a Protestant child to learn their multiplication tables together'.¹⁰ The award of bursaries to St Mary's would simply fill the coffers of the 73 nuns working in Hull who were deemed to be occupying jobs that lay people could not thus hold.

When changes to the school were completed in September 1905 the grand opening was attended by Bishop Lacy of Middlesbrough, who took full advantage of the occasion to give his distinguished audience, which included Lord Mayor Larard, a few home truths: the bishop called for fairness in the treatment of Catholics, adding that the city would have to accept that 'she could not mould all the citizens in one shape and that she would have to give a certain amount of latitude to each individual taste and sentiment so far as it was legitimate'.¹¹

DIOCESAN ARCHIVES: 'LOOKING FOR MICHAEL EMUS'

At the time of the nuns' arrival in England, Clifford and Hull were under the jurisdiction of Bishop Briggs of Beverley. His successor in 1861 was Bishop Cornthwaite. In 1878 the diocese was divided into the new territories of Leeds and Middlesbrough, and Lacy became the first Bishop of Middlesbrough while Cornthwaite was translated to Leeds. Hull was in the Diocese of Middlesbrough, but Clifford fell within Leeds.

Compared with the public record offices, the welcome at the two diocesan archives was altogether different. In each case the archivists and their assistants seemed to want the story to be discovered and told. Catalogues were detailed and very effective in helping to locate material under the headings of bishops, parishes or religious orders. Nor was there any 'drip-feeding' of files. This was an important luxury because it removed the frustration of having to work on a curtailed view of resources at any one time. Some parish files proved useful for odd pieces of information because many of the 'home-grown' nuns had brothers and uncles who were priests and this generated some correspondence, e.g. Mother Dawson had six brothers, of whom four were priests.¹² Examination of a wealthy parish priest's will can sometimes extend the horizons of research when possessions are left to a lay legatee.

There is, however, another but more complicated way to do this. As a child I sometimes had difficulty pronouncing long words - one which always attracted my attention in local newspapers, mainly because it screened some very interesting information, was 'miscellaneous', which I chose to call it 'Michael Emus'. To this day I have the greatest interest in the Michael Emus section of any collection.

After hours spent over the papers of Bishop Cornthwaite and the Mercy nuns working in the Diocese of Leeds, and of parishes associated with them, I could not understand how there was never mention of the Great Convent Case, which had aroused such interest at the time. I was certain that records were filed in someone's Michael Emus section, and so I took the direct approach: 'May I see the file on Bishop Cornthwaite's legal affairs?' There was none. 'Tomorrow I would like to concentrate on the Great Convent Case. Will it take long to find that file?' There was none. 'But there must be some record. What could it be called? Where would one normally file something as important as this?' Note the questioning technique. By hinting at the possibility that an obviously very competent archivist has misfiled something important, one hopes to charge him with the determination to find it. The information turned up in a simple pink folder whose importance had become dimmed over the years, thus causing it to be located in the Michael Emus collection somewhere in the cellar.

THE CONVENT ARCHIVES : 'BEING A GUEST IN THE PARLOUR'

Elizabeth Smyth has this to say about working in convent archives:

Several challenges are inherent in the study of women religious. The archives of religious communities are private archives. The researcher is using the sources as a guest of the community and must abide by the community policies. Further, while the archival holdings may be rich, they are often informally catalogued. The researcher is directly dependent upon the archivist for the identification of and access to relevant materials. Materials are brought to the researcher and browsing through the collection is frequently prohibited. To undertake research on women religious, one must accept these challenges and work within the regulations established by the community.¹³

I cannot decide whether this was written in plaintive or informative tone. Her experience of convent archives was for the most part similar to my own. The desire to be given open access to all that an archive contains is strong and very human, but there is part of me that feels it is better not to be given such freedom until some process of initiation into the esprit de corps of the community has taken place.

Having abandoned the initial focus of my study, and having decided to trace the roots of the first Hull Mercy nuns, I was given permission to work in the Baggot Street Archives in Dublin, the Mother House of the Mercy Congregation. I was there on 10 April 1990, the day on which Catherine McAuley was declared Venerable. It was an extraordinary experience for me as an outsider: there was an almost tangible sense of joy and celebration, of collective pride and thanksgiving, of renewed vocation and determination. It was as if God had telephoned to say 'Catherine has made it to Paradise. Keep doing what you are doing and you will all get there too.' This guest in the parlour was quickly made to feel one of the family. Every nun could adduce some information about Catherine to acquaint me with this celebrity. Every nun 'knew' her personally and felt related to her, every nun was proud to have a relative who was a saint-in-the-making. If these Mercy nuns could identify so closely with their foundress in 1990, I reflected, then these same close ties could not be overlooked in those first Hull nuns who had lived at Baggot Street just eleven years after McAuley's death. It was a timely lesson for me and the rest of that week was spent studying the two-volume Positio Super Virtutibus of Catherine McAuley – the documentary study presented to Rome in support of her claim to eventual canonisation.

On my return to Endsleigh I could much more easily accept the visitor-in-the-parlour relationship where information would be released to me piecemeal and haphazardly. More importantly, I knew that every visit would provide an opportunity to become acquainted with the Hull nuns' current self-image and with their image of their own past. The slow release of material gave time for reflection. Explanations had to be sought when the first five names on the Hull Register failed to tally with those acquired in Baggot Street. The Hull Register – at least the first page – had been compiled by Mother Kennedy and she had changed it to put her own name first and Mother Starr's second. She had eliminated Susan Saurin's name altogether despite Saurin's sixteen years as a nun. This simple indicator alerted me to the fact that even convent sources might sometimes be managed/manipulated, and that all information needed to be carefully scrutinised wherever possible. Short commemorative pamphlet-style histories of the Hull nuns were abundant and very repetitive. They became signposts to other avenues of exploration, e.g. names of streets, schools, benefactors, priests, visitors etc., as well as triggering enquiry in themselves. More than eleven of these pamphlets glossed over the twelve years' work of the nuns in Clifford. This studied erasure of their first abode in England begged an explanation and accounts for my foray into the Clifford parish records.

I visited the Hull convent many times over the three-year period of research for my thesis, and I built up an enormous respect for and a much-valued friendship with Sr Imelda, the Mercy archivist. She was patient and interested, and very knowledgeable about her community's history. Moreover, she was very generous with her time. On one occasion when I called to see her she said she had been tidying up and had found two large cardboard boxes. She had not had time to go through the contents but they seemed to be the type of thing I might enjoy browsing through: two more chapters were added to the thesis, for in the boxes was the whole story of the Founding of Endsleigh Training College.

This was a study that began as a purely academic exercise and developed into an enjoyable and long-term 'disease' because of the talents and skills of archivists. I envy them their roles as custodians of Michael Emus collections and as discoverers of exciting stories. I pray God that they may always thrive and prosper.

CATHOLIC RECORDS IN LIVERPOOL CITY RECORD OFFICE

John Davies

Concern has been expressed in a number of places about the condition of Catholic records in Liverpool. Archdiocesan records seem to be deposited in a number of places while parish records, when they have been deposited, seem to have been done so somewhat unsystematically. Liverpool City Record Office (LRO), while containing no Archdiocesan records as such, does have an extensive, if incomplete, collection of parish records for the City of Liverpool. These records fall into two main groups: parish registers and school records.

PARISH REGISTERS

In most cases these are Baptism and Marriage Registers, although for some parishes there are Confirmation and Burial Registers. Although the majority of parishes within the city itself have deposited their registers in the LRO, there are some exceptions. It would seem that the decision to deposit or not was left to the initiative of individual parish priests.

The registers variously cover periods from the early nineteenth to mid-twentieth centuries. In one case, viz. St Brendan's, Old Swan, they cover the 1980s. For some parishes these formal registers are supplemented by additional material, a brief history of the parish for St Anne's, Overbury Street and St Oswald's, Old Swan, for St Patrick's papers relating to the Society of St Patrick, and for St Mary's, Highfield Street the Minute Book of the Society of St Vincent De Paul (1868-77).

Although this parish material is much valued, particularly by family historians, the gaps in the deposits are obviously very large, as is clearly illustrated by the material from St Peter's, Seel Street. St Peter's, which ceased to function as a parish in the 1970s, indicates the diversity of parish records which are missing in the case of other parishes. One can only assume that similar records from other parishes have been lost, destroyed, or still lie in presbyteries throughout the city.

In 1930 Father Louis Joseph D'Andrea OSB came from Ampleforth Abbey, which serviced the parish, to St Peter's, Seel Street. From then until his death in November 1945 he was very active in collecting historical and contemporary materials relating to the parish. On his death his papers were bequeathed to Liverpool City Library and now form the D'Andrea Collection in the LRO. However, the photographs and small prints have been separated from the written material and can be consulted via the Photographs and Small Prints Index. Father D'Andrea was especially keen to collect lists of residents from the local directories and to match them with members of the parish. In the 1970s, when St Peter's ceased to function as a parish – although the church is still used for worship – an extensive deposit of parish records was made. These records cover many aspects of parish life, including as they do the Minute Books of the Society of St Vincent De Paul, the registers of various confraternities and guilds, pew rent registers and extensive school records. Taken with the D'Andrea Collection, there is here an extensive archive for this one parish, which unfortunately is not available for any other Liverpool parish.

SCHOOL RECORDS

In the LRO there is an extensive collection of school records - mainly log book and registers (admissions, withdrawal, attendance), and in some cases architects' and builders' plans. These records date variously from the late nineteenth century. However, because the depositing has been haphazard and dependent on the enthusiasm and foresight of individuals, the archive is by no means complete.

As an example of the haphazard depositing procedures, it is perhaps instructive to look at the records of the former Catholic secondary modern schools (LRO 352 EDU 1/123/-). The secondary modern schools were created in response to the 1936 and 1944 Education Acts, and in some cases were based on existing parish senior schools, while in others they were entirely new foundations covering several parishes. In the major reorganisation of Catholic secondary education which took effect in September 1983, these schools ceased to exist, as did also the Catholic grammar schools. They were replaced by comprehensive high schools. In some cases the sites of the secondary modern schools continued to be used, at least for a time, as part of the new high schools. The records of many of the secondary modern schools have been deposited in the LRO, seemingly on the initiative of the Director of Education. But there are some omissions. In some cases the records may not have been made available because the former secondary modern school formed the basis of the new high school. However, this does not provide a full explanation. The site of St Bonaventure's School was used by the new Archbishop Beck High School. The records of St Bonaventure's have been deposited. But this is not the case with, for example, St John Almond School (now St John Almond High School), or for All Hallows, Speke (now Pope John Paul High School). In other cases, such as St John's, Kirkdale, St Martin's, and St Anne's, the records of the girls' schools have been deposited but not those of the corresponding boys' schools. Interestingly enough, the records of none of the Catholic grammar schools, which also ceased to exist at this time, have been deposited in the LRO. One must assume that they have been retained by their successor schools. A complete deposit of school records for the post-1944 Education Act period up until the comprehensive reorganisation of the 1980s would have provided a fascinating archive for the educational history of that era. This is perhaps just one example of the somewhat sorry state of Catholic records in Liverpool.

Apart from the parish and school records there are a small number of other Catholic deposits in the LRO, notably the records of the Liverpool Catholic Benevolent Society, the Liverpool Catholic Reformatory Association (later the Liverpool Catholic Training Schools Association), and the Liverpool Children's Protection Society (records of Catholic children emigrating to Canada). Whilst again these records are useful, they are by no means the complete archive. Notably missing in this area are any of the papers of the pioneer and founder of Catholic social provision in Liverpool, Monsignor James Nugent. Monsignor J Bennett clearly drew on Nugent's papers for his Father Nugent of Liverpool (1940), but these papers are no longer in the archives of the Nugent Care Society, the successor to Catholic Social Services.¹

THE ARCHIVES OF THE SERVITE SECULAR INSTITUTE: AN INTERIM REPORT

Mary Burchfield SSI

HISTORY OF THE INSTITUTE

In 1947 the Servite Secular Institute was founded by Joan Bartlett OBE, DSG with the opening of 17 The Boltons, in Kensington as a residential home for the elderly made homeless as a result of the war. The idea of starting an Institute had been in Joan's mind for sometime, as can be seen from her writings.

During the Second World War Joan Bartlett had been received into the Catholic Church by Father Gerard Corr OSM. To become a Servite Tertiary was the next step. Joan writes:

I subsequently made private vows, but still the knowledge that God was calling me, claiming me for Himself was ever present! To what? I was in a reserved occupation. Twice I tried to enter the Convent. Twice this was blocked. Father Corr had other plans!

At that time Joan was told it was not God's will she should enter the convent, but that she would found something which would bring religious life into the world. She was very bewildered and writes:

In a mysterious way God's will and mine became one, although I had no idea at the time how I was to set about what seemed an impossible task. Provida Mater did not yet exist. Like my mother I was independent and hard-working, but now I was travelling into a world of obedience and loneliness; the unknown was frightening, but I do remember cycling through Eaton Place from work to hospital, filled with joy and singing to the Lord in my heart that I was now all His; I had become a free person.

On Passion Sunday in 1945 Joan attended a meeting in Caxton Hall, London, to hear the late Violet Markham speak about the plight of the homeless, especially the elderly who had lost all their possessions and homes.

As I left Caxton Hall that afternoon the interior darkness received light. I knew I had to give up a secure job in European Broadcasting where I had known nothing but happiness, and become a wanderer without security.

In 1945, after studying Provida Mater it became clear that, to form a Secular Institute there must be a stable work, so a Housing Association was formed and duly registered. The opening of 17 The Boltons, a bombed property in a beautiful part of London, hitherto housing the wealthy, took place in January 1947, and in a few days bombed-out elderly and homeless people were taken in.

Since her reception into the Church, Joan Bartlett had been closely involved with the Servite Friars in Fulham Road. The Servite Order, which had lent her £8,000 to help purchase the freehold property, was repaid. Today there are over 5,000 tenancies including full care homes, accomodation for (still) homeless families, confused men and women, and Alzheimer patients.

As Servite Houses has spread, so also has the Secular Institute, and it is now present in Europe, North and South America, and Africa. Pontifical recognition and the Decree of Approval of Constitutions have both happily occurred during Joan's lifetime.

THE ARCHIVES

I came to the Archives about ten years ago, at which point they had not been touched. With no knowledge of how to set about the task of creating an archive, I came to the Catholic Archives Society where help was at hand. From the conferences and material available in the journals, light began to dawn. Then the course at University College Dublin was brought to my attention. This I attended one summer and it really put me on the right track. I left Ireland with a confidence that had previously been lacking.

Being members of a Secular Institute we live in secular circumstances, mainly alone. Unlike religious, for us a central house is not a necessary requirement. In view of this we are grateful to the Servite Sisters in Dorking for allowing us to house our Archives on their premises.

So far several closed collections have been sorted and listed. The current work is on the founding country and Constitutions work up to the time of Pontifical Approval. Progress is slow as the Archives have to take second place to other Institute work. Nevertheless, things are taking shape. Maybe it will be possible to give details of completed collections and some of our early history in the not too distant future.

THE SURVEY OF RECORDS OF LAY SOCIETIES: RECORDS IN THE WESTMINSTER DIOCESAN ARCHIVES

Robin Gard

Following the publication in Catholic Archives no.10 (1990) of a provisional list of lay societies active in England and Wales between 1870 and 1970, the Catholic Archives Society promoted a survey of the records of the listed societies. This was undertaken by a few volunteers by questionnaire and correspondence and obtained a reasonable, if incomplete, response. An assurance was given to the societies circulated that none of the information given would be published without permission, but the contributor of this note, who holds the returns to the questionnaire, is able to advise researchers as to the existence and whereabouts of the records of those societies which sent in returns.

A brief report on the results of the survey was published in Catholic Archives no.14 (1994). This ended with an appeal 'for enlightened suggestions upon which further enquiries may be made.' The Society continues to be concerned for the safe preservation of the records of all lay societies, but is particularly anxious about the fate of records of defunct societies. Through its volunteer surveyors, the Society is willing to follow up any information which may lead to the discovery of and then, hopefully, arrangements for the preservation of such records. The 1990 list evidently omitted several former societies and it is therefore hoped to publish an additional list in due course. Again, the writer will be pleased to receive any information.

In the meanwhile, Father Ian Dickie, Archivist of the Archdiocese of Westminster, has kindly allowed the records of lay societies deposited in the Westminster Diocesan Archives to be examined and listed, and lists, albeit of an interim nature, have been made. Space does not permit these to be published in extenso, but it is hoped that the following summaries may be helpful to potential researchers, as well as encouraging more interest in the preservation of this very important class of records of the Catholic Church in England and Wales during the last century and half.

Permission to examine the records should be solicited from the depositors through the good offices of Father Dickie and, when permission has been obtained, the records may be seen during normal office hours. Enquiries, accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope, should be sent to Rev Ian Dickie, Westminster Diocesan Archives, 16A

Abingdon Road, London W8 6AF. Enquiries and information concerning the survey should be addressed to Mr R M Gard, 21 Larchwood Avenue, Wideopen, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, NE13 6PY.

BOOK REVIEWS

The Catholic Historian's Handbook 1829-1965 by Brian Plumb (North West Catholic History Society, Wigan, 1995, pp 33): available from the Society's Treasurer, 10 Ellesmere Road, Pemberton, Wigan WN5 9LA.

This booklet is a useful source of reference for any archivist or researcher concerned with English Catholic records from the past 150 years. Covering the period from Catholic Emancipation to the end of the Second Vatican Council, the booklet contains lists of popes, bishops, seminaries and religious orders, as well as a useful glossary of terms which would prove especially helpful to newcomers to the world of Catholic archives in England and Wales. Even for more experienced hands the lists are a practical resource when seeking a quick reference to the identity of a particular prelate mentioned in correspondence, or when checking technical terms used in ecclesiastical life. There is also a welcome list of County Record Offices and principal Catholic historical societies. This publication stands as a companion to The Recusant Historian's Handbook and is to be recommended to readers of this journal.

Dom Mauro Inguanez 1887-1955, Benedictine of Montecassino by Carol Jaccarini (Malta, 1987, pp 190).

Few archivists or librarians have had a full-length biography dedicated to them. An exception is Dom Mauro Inguanez (1887-1955), the Maltese Archivist of Montecassino, whose life, written by Carol Jaccarini, appeared in 1987 and coincided with a documentary exhibition of his life and work held at the Cathedral Museum, Mdina, Malta. I was given a copy of this book on a recent visit to the island.

Malta, at the crossroads of so many worlds, has had a stirring history, not least in the last century. Montecassino, too, the cradle of Benedictine monasticism, was centrally involved in the military history of the Second World War as it had been in so much else. Malta, in recent times, has looked both to England and to Italy for its contacts. Inguanez, who had spent a year in London studying pharmacy, entered Montecassino as a Benedictine postulant in 1906 and was ordained priest in 1911. He was appointed Archivist-Librarian of Montecassino in 1915, a post he was to retain until the bombing of the abbey in 1943.

He did not return to the monastery after the war and was appointed, in 1947, Librarian of the Royal Malta Library. He was awarded the O.B.E. in 1954.

His academic work was centred on the Middle Ages, an area in which the Montecassino collection was (and is) particularly strong. He was a prolific author and editor. In his most productive period between 1928 and 1942 he published 104 studies. Jaccarini's footnotes, which are very full, provide a commentary on the bibliography which forms part of the book, and on some interesting connections with England in Dom Mauro's academic and personal life. The correspondence between W.E.Gladstone and the great rebuilder of nineteenth-century Montecassino, Abbot Tosti, is highlighted. The monk's unlikely friendship with the writer D.H.Lawrence, who visited the abbey, is also chronicled.

The excitements of the archivist and librarian, at least at a professional level, are generally limited to the cerebral, but Dom Mauro had some difficult and delicate moments during 1939-45 not least in his journey to Rome taking back the Keats-Shelley manuscripts from safe-keeping at Montecassino.

This book, well-illustrated and providing an accessible introduction to recent Maltese Catholic history, was translated from the Maltese by Victor Buhagier and published for the Mdina Museum by the Mid-Med Bank.

THE CATHOLIC ARCHIVES SOCIETY CONFERENCE, 1995

The sixteenth annual conference of the Society was held at Ushaw College, Durham, from 30 May to 1 June.

The first paper on the Monday evening was given by Ian Foster on 'The Clergy of the Embassy Chapels' and focused on Catholicism in eighteenth-century London. Maria McClelland's talk, reproduced in this edition of the journal, offered a fascinating and amusing account of her quest to piece together the story of the Hull Mercy Nuns. On the Tuesday morning Father Christopher Smith, Diocesan Archivist of Plymouth, gave a tour de force on the use of registers of faculties and dispensations in seeking information about the historical development of the Church. He was followed by Sister Dominic Savio CP on 'Using Archives to Write Biography', an account of her study of Mother Prout, Foundress of the Cross and Passion Sisters (reproduced in this number of the journal).

Delegates were able to visit the Lisbon Room at Ushaw College to view the collection which houses artefacts and documents from the former English College in that city, while another trip went further afield to view the Bede's World exhibition at Jarrow.

This year's conference witnessed a new departure in 'Archivists' Question Time', which allowed delegates to pick the brains of a specially selected panel of experts. In the Open Forum on Thursday morning delegates were given the opportunity to respond to a number of issues, and a number of short talks and appeals were also given. The usual reports and elections took place (for new Officers etc. see inside front cover). A full report of the conference is given in CAS Bulletin, Autumn 1995, No.17, distributed to full members but also obtainable from the Editor of the Bulletin, Miss Stephanie Gilluly. The 1996 Conference will be held at All Saints Pastoral Centre, London Colney, Hertfordshire, from 28 to 30 June.

EDITORIAL NOTES

The visit of the Catholic Archives Society to Rome in October 1995 will certainly be remembered by those who took part as an 'archival experience' never to be forgotten. The interest with which the party was received and the warmth of welcome from fellow archivists is still commented on by the participants. The first article in the present edition of the journal is Dr Judith Champ's paper delivered to the Roman visitors - a masterly survey of the revival of interest in Roman ecclesiastical archaeology with regard to the restoration of Catholic fortunes in nineteenth-century England.

One of the omissions from last year's journal was the presence of an article of Irish archival interest. This year, however, owing to the generosity of our contributors (and even a little 'persuasion' on the part of the Editor), Ireland is very well represented via Edward Walsh's interesting piece on Bishop O'Brien's speech from the scaffold, a survey of the Archives of the Religious Sisters of Charity, and Mary Ellen Doona's tribute to the Sisters of Mercy and their archival heritage. Indeed, this last contribution follows on well from Maria McClelland's article in Catholic Archives 16.

Sister Agnes Hypher, a past contributor to the journal, offers a highly practical account of how an archival exhibition assisted the Servite Sisters in their 150th anniversary celebrations, while Ronald Patkus, reminding us of another milestone - that of the 150th anniversary of the birth of Alice Meynell in 1847 - presents a detailed survey of the collection at Boston College devoted to this important English Catholic writer.

Finally, should it be thought that the work and interests of archivists lie in the remote past only, Bernard Barrett offers a glimpse of the archival holdings of a more recently-established body, namely CAFOD, the aid agency of the Catholic Bishops' Conference of England and Wales.

Once again it is the sincere hope of the Editor, on behalf of the Editorial Board, that Catholic Archives 17 will continue to stimulate interest in the work of the Catholic Archives Society, and will recommend to a wider audience both within and beyond the Catholic Church the importance of a careful preservation of her archival treasures.

THE 'REDISCOVERY' OF THE CATACOMBS

JUDITH F. CHAMP

The Roman Catacombs - a name consecrated by long usage, but having no etymological meaning, and not a very determinate geographical one - are a vast labyrinth of galleries excavated in the bowels of the earth in the hills around the eternal city; not in the hills on which the city itself was built, but those beyond the walls. Their extent is enormous; not as to the amount of superficial soil which they underlie, for they rarely, if ever, pass beyond the third milestone from the city, but in the actual length of their galleries; for these are often excavated on various levels, three, four or even five - one above the other; and they cross and recross one another, sometimes at short intervals; so that, on the whole, there are certainly not less than 350 miles of them; that is to say, if stretched out in one continuous line, they would extend the whole length of Italy itself.

Northcote and Brownlow, Roma Sotteranea. This work, published in 1869 remains the authoritative English work on the catacombs and reflects a passionate interest in the mid-nineteenth century Church in rediscovering the history of the catacombs. This was pursued with rigour, for emotional and spiritual reasons as much as scholarly ones and reflected a particularly nineteenth-century understanding of the Church. It was an understanding which emphasised continuity and historicity and the centrality of the Roman claim to authority.

It was linked to a tradition of pilgrimage to Rome which had grown up from as early as the fourth century. From the time of Constantine, the three great shrines of the burial place of St Peter and of St Paul and the Constantinian basilica of St John Lateran had become established as pilgrim shrines, but the other main attractions were the catacombs, the burial places of early martyrs. A list dating from 354 gave the names of 32 martyrs revered by the Christians in Rome and a revised list of the early seventh century had added a further 70 names.¹ There were 25 or 26 'parish' catacombs, corresponding to the areas of Rome and at least as many private ones in addition. Many of the names which survive were those of the owners - Priscilla, Domitilla etc. Others, like S Callistus, are named after those who had them constructed. Pope Damasus (366-84), one of the most powerful advocates of Roman primacy among the early Popes, restored the catacombs to demonstrate clearly that Rome's glory was Christian not pagan. He was also the founder of the church of S Lorenzo in Damaso, where he is buried.²

Successive sieges wrecked and pillaged the catacombs and liturgical life in Rome gradually transferred to the great basilicas, as it became desirable to translate the martyrs' remains to the city. By the fourth century churches were springing up all over Rome and the catacombs were falling into disrepair. According to Northcote, the catacombs ceased to be used for burial after the capture of Rome by Alaric in 410. At the beginning of the seventh century, 28 wagon loads of relics were translated to the Pantheon, newly renamed S Maria ad Martyres.³ This process was accelerated after the Lombard destruction of 756 and by the ninth century there were scarcely any significant saints left in the catacombs.⁴ In some cases even the location of the catacombs were forgotten.

Pilgrimage was associated primarily with honouring the martyrs of primitive Christianity, so it too shifted into the city, to become entangled with an exercise of power and Roman authority, which was not necessarily always spiritual. Thus the counter-attractions of the city and its basilicas drew the attention of those seeking spiritual aid and ecclesiastical sanction. Pilgrimage became formalised in the circuit of shrines to be visited and in the ritual of departure. The parish gathered at the local church for the celebration of the Eucharist and for the blessing of the departing pilgrims with the recitation of psalms and sprinkling of holy water. Guilds would often accompany their pilgrim members out of town and provide alms for the journey.⁵ The familiar pattern of devotions which developed during the mediaeval period was built around the seven principal churches and their relics - S Pietro (the tomb of Peter and the Veronica), S Maria Maggiore (the crib), S Giovanni Laterani (the Scala Santa), S Paolo fuori le Muri (the tomb and chair of S Paul), S Lorenzo (the gridiron), S Sebastiano (the catacombs), and Santa Croce (the Passion relics). These seven seem to have been a well-established circuit from earliest times, based on the huge importance of relics, but interestingly, only S Sebastiano is a catacomb church. Mediaeval piety was dominated by relics and, 'the richness of Rome as reliquary made it a constant festa.'⁶ A book on the Seven Churches published in 1694 describes it as 'a pilgrimage peradventure the most celebrated after Calvary and the Sepulchre of Christ.'⁷

By the early thirteenth century the system of indulgences had become established, by which the Church administered the 'store' of merit gained by Christ and the saints for the benefit of the penitent. Indulgences became available to those who went on pilgrimage and visited shrines and could become a source of competition and rivalry between Popes, religious orders and sodalities. The system had begun under Gregory the Great and by the mid-twelfth century indulgences could be obtained at all forty of the Roman Lent 'Station Churches'. Gerald of Wales gained all the station indulgences on his visit in 1195.⁸ He maintained that, of all pilgrimages, the Welsh preferred to go to Rome and that having reached St Peter's they prayed most devoutly.⁹ Plenary indulgences (remission of full temporal punishment obtained by a sinner) could be gained by pilgrims visiting the Roman basilicas in a Holy Year. It was the indulgence system which first gave rise to the publication of guide books to Christian Rome. There already existed, for the benefit of travellers, accounts of the remains of ancient Rome under various forms known as the Mirabilia Urbis Romae (The Wonders of Rome). This ran into numerous editions and one of its more sophisticated readers was an Englishman, Master Gregory, who visited Rome at the beginning of the thirteenth century and wrote his own account, De Mirabilibus Romae. He was impressed by the classical buildings and the remains of the Roman water system, but did not swallow all that the guidebooks contained and was contemptuous of the unlettered pilgrims who did.¹⁰

As a result of the shrinking population and extent of Rome and removal of the relics to city churches, the catacombs became neglected and abandoned. The catacombs of S Sebastian were one of the few remaining open and accessible to visitors during the late mediaeval period and they were mentioned by the fifteenth-century English Augustinian writer on Rome, John Capgrave. However, only from the late sixteenth century were the catacombs 'rediscovered' and a famous story is told of the workmen in a vineyard off Via Salaria, in 1578, suddenly losing their spades into a cavity beneath their feet, which opened up into a network of galleries.¹¹ This was enshrined (somewhat misleadingly) as the 'rediscovery of the catacombs'. It was taken up with enthusiasm as a valuable piece of Counter Reformation propaganda and a number of scholars began work on the excavations and clumsy reproductions of the frescoes were made. The first real systematic scholar of the catacombs was Antonio Bosio, who worked on them from 1593 (aged 18) until his death in 1629. He bequeathed his papers to the Knights of Malta who secured their publication in 1634 under the patronage of Cardinal Barberini. Bosio was really the founder of modern Christian archeology - i.e. archeology with the purpose of revealing Christian continuity and ultimately, truth. The growing interest which resulted, led to the catacombs being pillaged all over again - this time by tourists as well as scholars. The mining of the catacombs for relics and artifacts led to a decline in interest in the sites themselves. Much of the archeology was done in museums and libraries. Neglect and apathy characterised the eighteenth century and when Benedict XIV opened a museum of Christian Antiquity, while it stimulated interest, it also made it possible to satisfy that interest in more leisurely and pleasant surroundings. The underground galleries still lay largely unexplored and only partially understood.

From the early nineteenth century Rome figured more vividly in the European and English Catholic spiritual landscape. The French Revolutionary imprisonment and exile of Pius VI and then of Pius VII at the hands of Napoleon wrought considerable sympathy in Catholic hearts for the person of the Pope. The persecution of the papacy and the final reinstatement of the Papal States in 1815 also contributed to a growing enthusiasm for papal authority and for the vision of Rome at the centre of European peace, maintaining the balance of power and true order. England in the eighteenth century had developed a passion for Rome, which was frustrated by the wartime embargo on continental travel. The image of Rome was kept alive for the English in the published travel accounts and after the end of the war a stream of English visitors from an increasingly wide spectrum of society headed for Rome along the Napoleonic military roads which enabled quicker and more comfortable travel. The neo-classical sculptor Antonio Canova spent the winter of 1815 in London restoring his contacts in the world of fashionable artistic patronage and on his return was able to obtain commissions for young artists in Rome and did much to rebuild the artistic colony in the city. One of his patrons was the Catholic Henry Blundell of Ince Blundell, Lancashire. He was an indefatigable art collector who spent considerable time abroad forming a collection of paintings and sculpture.

Cardinal Consalvi, protégé of the Cardinal Duke of York, convinced anglophile and Papal Secretary of State became (in 1814) the first Roman Cardinal to set foot in England since the Reformation. He was also Cardinal Protector of the English College from 1818 until his death in 1824. He became great friends with the Prince Regent and his portrait by Sir Thomas Lawrence hangs in Windsor Castle. Part of the achievement of his diplomatic mission to England was that the British government paid the costs of Canova's operation to reclaim the art treasures of Rome removed to Paris during the occupation. The Pope's letter of thanks and the Prince Regent's cordial reply were the first exchange of royal and papal letters in centuries. Meanwhile, English Catholics were joining the increased numbers of post-war visitors. Consalvi was also to play an important part in the recovery of Rome's archeology and history and to begin to rebuild the ideological continuity so predominant in the nineteenth century.

Before the mid-and late-nineteenth century achievement of English Ultramontaniam brought papal and Roman devotion into the heart of English Catholic life, there were many English Catholic families who visited Rome, often for extended spells. These visits were stimulated by a combination of poverty, devotion and artistic interest, and they joined large numbers of their countrymen and women. The Gentleman's Magazine of 1817 reported 1,700 English families living in Italy. Two years later the Travellers' Club was founded in London, the criterion for membership being that the applicant had stood on the heights of the Capitol in Rome.¹² In the winter of 1818 it was estimated that over 2,000 English were in residence - one seventeenth of the total population of the city.¹³ The imagination was stirred by the completion in 1818 of Byron's enormously successful romance, Childe Harold's Pilgrimage, which may well have played an important part in the popular reclamation of the word 'pilgrimage'. Childe Harold ends his pilgrimage in Rome and much of the fourth canto celebrates the city. Rome for Byron was the climax of all civilisations, embracing Classical and Christian and he mourns the loss of her glory.

O Rome! my country! city of the soul!
The orphans of the heart must turn to thee,
Lone mother of dead empires¹⁴

Although Byron was partly responsible for their enthusiasm, the post-war travellers drove him to distraction, as he wrote in 1817,

I have not the least idea where I am going, nor what I am to do.
I wished to have gone to Rome; but at present it is pestilent with English - a parcel of staring boobies, who go about gaping and wishing to be at once cheap and magnificent. A man is a fool who travels now in France or Italy, till this tribe of wretches is swept home again. In two or three years the first rush will be over and the Continent will be roomy and agreeable.¹⁵

He was wrong. By 1820 the tide of British tourists to Rome had reached a peak and over the next ten years the literary market was awash with books on Italian travel.¹⁶ Rome, like most other Italian cities had pensione and alberghi named 'di Londra' or 'd'Inghilterra' and the Caffè Inglese near the Spanish Steps was more popular than the famous Caffè Greco, despite the fact that the latter reserved a room for the English and served tea.¹⁷ The area around the Piazza di Spagna had already begun to be colonised by the English in large numbers.

Among the most powerful attractions in Rome for this generation was the appearance of its ancient treasury, pagan and Christian, as never seen before. Classical Rome was revealed in greater glory due to excavations carried out by the French and continued with great determination by Pius VII and Cardinal Consalvi. The Colosseum was cleaned and strengthened and it was freed from the mounds of earth and rubbish that had built up over centuries. The temples of the Forum were dug out to their bases and later buildings surrounding them were demolished. The views of Rome familiar from the Piranesi prints was beginning to disappear.¹⁸ Canova, on behalf of Consalvi, was dispatched to Paris with British support to reclaim the art treasures and the antique sculpture removed from Rome by the French. The British Navy dealt with the transportation and paid the removal bill. A new Vatican Gallery was created to house the returned antique sculpture. Between February 1810 and February 1811, 3,239 chests of Vatican Archives had also crossed the Alps, containing an estimated 102,435 registers, volumes or bundles. These too had to be returned and late in 1817 the first wagon train of 174 chests arrived by sea from Marseilles. Other consignments followed but an estimated one third never made it, and it was possible to buy Vatican documents in the flea markets of Paris until late in the nineteenth century.¹⁹

However, the Christian past was being rediscovered in the form of the catacombs, which after centuries of neglect and misunderstanding, began to be excavated and interpreted for the first time by serious archeologists. They were to play a vital part in the recovery of Christian pilgrimage in the nineteenth century, in the creation of a powerful sense of Roman Catholic identity and in the emergence of Rome in the Protestant Christian imagination.²⁰ In 1802 the relics 'identified' as those of a Roman maiden Filumena were excavated from the catacomb of S Priscilla. The relics wrought a miraculous cure of a fever in a parish priest from Mugnano who had sought them for his church. After his recovery, he told his travelling companion, the local bishop, of the circumstances and the bishop vowed that the relics should be translated back to Mugnano on the front of the carriage. When the relic box was inadvertently placed under the bishop's seat, he received a severe kicking on the back of the legs, which only ceased when the box was placed at the front of the carriage. Filumena was taken up with great enthusiasm and the parish priest managed to construct a pious biography of her based on the symbols in the tomb inscription. She was taken up by, among others, the Curé D'Ars, Gladstone's sister, Wiseman and Gregory XIV and symbolises the direction which catacomb archeology was to take in the nineteenth century and the use to which it could be put. The personal link with an individual martyr gave a powerful emotional fillip to faith.

For the generation of English Catholics who were beginning to emerge from the constraints of penal times and to assert their identity, the trend in the European Church of restored confidence and renewal centred on Papal authority was encouraging. Symbolic of the desire to restore Roman links with England after the defeat of Napoleon was the determination to reopen the English College, despite the logic that seminaries were now flourishing on English soil by the end of the Napoleonic wars. Significantly, the English bishops were determined to have the college controlled by English superiors.²¹ It took until 1818 to bring about the restoration under Gradwell's rectorship. One of the first students was Nicholas Wiseman, author of a devoted and very personal volume of Recollections of the Last Four Popes (1858) recalling the period of his early familiarity with Rome.

He was at the centre of the circle of English Catholics who entered Rome as pilgrims or visitors of longer duration and had considerable influence on them and the ideal of the Church which was formative in England. In the early 1830s he was described by one English observer as '... a young man, rapidly gaining a great reputation at the church Degli Incurabili on the Corso. He was a tall slim man of ascetic appearance, and not promising to be the very corpulent man he was in after years.'²² The reputation he was gaining was as a preacher of English language sermons for the Catholics (and anyone else interested) in Rome.

Wiseman was sensitive to the new mood in Rome and in England and was anxious to see Catholic travel guides to Rome which would counterbalance those already flooding the market and 'resonate with proper spiritual and devotional tone'.²³ He wrote powerfully of this need in the Dublin Review.

If we enter the precincts of the Eternal City, the power of religion, associated as she ever should be with the beautiful and the amiable, lays hold of our mind and heart and encompasses us with an inspiring influence which denotes the presence of the spirit of the place. A marvellous combination of splendid natural scenery, with grey and broken masses of ruins - the emblems of the enduring and of the perishable, of the works of God and of man - encircles and adorns those sacred temples, which seem to partake of the properties of both - erected of the frail materials composing the latter, yet apparently endowed with the immortal and unfading newness which is the prerogative of the former.²⁴

Wiseman's desires to inspire people with the spirit of the place were fulfilled by W.J. A. Sheehy in 1838 (Reminiscences of Rome: a religious, moral and literary view of the Eternal City) and in 1842 by Jeremiah Donovan, (Rome, Ancient and Modern and its Environs). Works like these reflected and stimulated the growing confidence among English Catholics that the devotional and historical fabric of Rome clearly expressed its apostolic heritage, which was also theirs to reclaim.

During the middle and later years of the nineteenth century, attitudes to Catholicism in England changed. The tolerant indifference of the eighteenth century and the often open co-operation of the early nineteenth century disappeared in a more hostile atmosphere. Catholicism for its part became more self-assured, more assertive, more distinctive - more Roman. This encouraged a desire among English Catholics, especially perhaps among the new converts of the nineteenth century, who sought the assurance of papal authority, to forge even more concrete links between England and Rome. The Oxford Movement in the Church of England, dedicated to restoring the Established Church to its pre-Reformation Catholic roots, was a source of division within English Protestantism. To its advocates it led naturally to a positive reappraisal of the relationship between the Church of England and Rome and in many cases led individuals to seek membership of the Catholic Church. However, to the vast majority of Church of England members, supported by the Protestant Nonconformists, the Oxford Movement was a source of danger, undermining Protestantism from within and threatening the overthrow of English Christianity by papal authority. It did not take long for the latent anti-Popery in the English mentality to resurface. The reassertion of the 'Romanness' of Catholicism and the increased focus on the person and office of the Pope did not help and the furore over Wiseman's Letter from the Flaminian Gate was a prime case of how easily such fury was stirred.²⁵

On his appointment as Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster in 1850, Wiseman was given the titular church of S Pudentiana, reputed (though along with other claimants) to be the oldest Christian foundation in Rome. It was said to have been built in 154 on or near the site of the house of a Roman senator whose daughters Praxede and Pudentiana had a particular devotion to the Christian martyrs and tradition had it that Caractacus, a British chieftain, was imprisoned there, became a Christian and carried out missionary journeys to his native land. As H.V. Morton evocatively, if a little romantically, wrote, 'In this church Christian tradition goes back to the time of Pius I and the year 154 when old people were still living who had received first hand accounts of the apostles from those who had known them 78 years previously. St Paul is said to have lived here too and it is claimed the St Mark may have written his gospel here'.²⁶ To the left of the apse is a chapel containing a portion of a table believed to have been used by St Peter (the rest being in S John Lateran). The growing interest in relics caught Wiseman's imagination and when he was titular Cardinal he became interested in this tradition and had it compared scientifically with the wood in St John Lateran. It was concluded that both sections came from the same table, which was almost certainly of first century date. Following the examination, Wiseman had the wood enclosed behind glass, where it is now preserved. S Pudentiana was also the titular church of one of Wiseman's successors at Westminster, Cardinal Francis Bourne.

Later, as Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster he presided over the 'Romanising' of English Catholicism and the flowering of passionate Papal devotion. Better known to most English Catholics of a certain age than his Recollections, is Wiseman's hymn 'Full in the Panting Heart of Rome'. He was a key figure in forging the connection between the rebirth of English Catholicism and the assertion of Roman spiritual authority. 'Not since Gregory Martin wrote of Rome in 1581 had an English Catholic been so sensitive to the historical and devotional value of the Christian monuments of Rome. Like Martin, Wiseman saw Rome as the heavenly Jerusalem, 'the capital of spiritual Christianity'²⁷

The rediscovery of the catacombs and the attention which this brought upon the history of early Christianity played an important propaganda role. The history of the early Christian community in Rome, the 'Church of the Catacombs' was increasingly explained in polemical terms, by Catholics asserting the historic continuity, and by Protestants arguing that theirs was the true heritage of the Early Church.²⁸ In the face of Protestant writers trying to proclaim the essentially Protestant simplicity of the Church of the Catacombs, cleansed of all the accretions of later centuries, Catholic scholarship (supported by the Tractarians) fought back fiercely and successfully. Wiseman was an important figure in this campaign to reclaim the catacombs. He had been fascinated by them since his early years in Rome and used the evidence of them in his well publicised lectures given in England in 1836. He wanted to capture and communicate the blend of history and devotion available in the archeology of the catacombs and so turned to the most popular literary form in Victorian England - the novel. He published Fabiola in 1858 to immediate success. The first run of 4,000 sold rapidly. The novel contains a great deal of Church History and drew upon a wealth of archeological evidence as well as imagination. A number of real historical figures are woven into the story and Wiseman used a number of individual and composite portraits to demonstrate forcefully the continuity between the Church of the Catacombs and the English Catholic Church of nineteenth century.²⁹ Its success spread beyond England and it was translated into seven Italian editions as well as French, Spanish, Portuguese, Hungarian, German, Danish, Polish, Slavonic and Dutch. In England it ran through numerous editions and had widespread and lasting popularity.³⁰

Wiseman saw the roots of nineteenth-century Catholicism in the catacombs, but the catacombs in the contemporary history of English Catholicism. What else had the Recusant communities done within living memory, but emerge anew from the catacombs? Fabiola marked the peak of Catholic presentation of the catacombs, provided Catholic apologists with a powerful tool and ensured enduring interest in the catacombs among pilgrims. However, even before the publication of Fabiola, the catacombs wrought a fierce emotional effect on at least one English pilgrim, Pauline de la Ferronays, the 20-year-old daughter of a French émigré Count who became British Ambassador in Rome in 1829:

We left the catacombs by the stair that had been used by the Christians. When I was on its steps, the different impressions I had received in succession broke upon me in their fullness. The steps were the same as the martyrs trod on their way to death. I longed to cast myself on the ground and kiss their footprints. I longed to stay and weep without stint. I felt there I could have given utterance to the feelings with which my heart was full. Then I thought that the young girls who went up those slopes to die heroically saw me from their height in heaven and prayed for me who was so little like them. . . I could not resist the satisfaction of kissing those sacred stones before I returned to the church. When again in it, I knelt down and longed to remain there. I had felt emotions never before experienced by me. I owed to them the religion in which, happily, I was born. I felt the need of thanksgiving and of prayer to God that all my life should be an expression of my gratitude and of my love towards Him.³¹

This overheated emotionalism was to become a feature in Catholic piety in the nineteenth century and to play a part in the reclaiming of a direct, immediate and personal relationship between the present day Catholic and the saints and martyrs of the past.

The archeological work on the catacombs was in part done by Englishmen, influenced by both Wiseman and the Tractarian search for Christian history and continuity. James Spencer Northcote was educated at Corpus Christi, Oxford, where he formed a lifelong friendship with Newman and eventually became a highly successful Rector of Oscott. After graduation in 1841 he married and was ordained in the Church of England. He worked as a curate in Ilfracombe, Devon, where he became close friends with the other leading Tractarian, Edward Pusey. In 1845 his wife and three sisters converted to Catholicism and he was not long in following. After a brief period as a teacher, he moved to Rome in 1847 and spent three years there, during which time he wrote a series of articles for The Rambler. In the first article he wrote of the attractions of Rome and criticised English visitors who never set foot in the catacombs:

The history of the Church may record its triumphs; antiquaries and tourist may enumerate its treasures; all its churches and palaces, museums and galleries, may be traversed by the hurrying foot, and scanned by the curious eye; but not all these taken together will suffice to give an adequate idea of the indescribable charm of a residence within its walls, nor even a faithful representation of what it really is. Rome is pre-eminently a place to be lived in, not learnt from books; and in which the longer you live the more you learn, and the more you learn, the longer you will desire to live in it; I might add too, if you would not think me too enthusiastic and too tiresome, that the more you learn, the more you will find is yet to be learnt; for when you have exhausted your studies of that Rome which is before your eyes, you have yet an equal task remaining in that Rome which is beneath your feet. Roma Sotteranea is hardly less extensive, and certainly not a whit less interesting, than the Rome in which we live; and if it be true that time and labour are necessary for the understanding of the latter, still more are they required for the understanding of the former. . . Yet many of our countrymen - some too who spend a considerable time in Rome, and devote themselves most assiduously to the task of lionising - have been known to go away without having paid even a single visit to these most interesting Christian antiquities; and many more, after a rapid walk through some of the subterranean galleries and an impatient peep into two or three of the principal chapels, having too (it may be) a very imperfect comprehension of the lingo spoken by their guide, come away with a satisfactory conviction that they have done the catacombs, and that after all there is not so very much in them.

Northcote's ambition was to write a straightforward but thorough account of the catacombs and to this end he accompanied the leading archeologist John Baptist de Rossi day after day into the catacombs. De Rossi (1822-94) had trained in both Philosophy and Jurisprudence, but in 1841, working as a scriptor in the Vatican Library, he met the archeologist and Custode of the Sacred Cemeteries, Joseph Marchi SJ. He fired De Rossi's lifelong interest in the catacombs. The younger scholar, trained to handle documentary evidence, was the first to recognise the importance of using literary sources to augment the archeological evidence. He widened the scope of the investigations by searching later material as well as the galleries themselves and making use of topographical evidence of Patristic and Mediaeval Rome.³²

Throughout the 1860s and 1870s he published a vast corpus of works.³³ Rossi and Marchi were both, from 1851, members of Pius IX's newly formed Commissione di Archeologia Sacra. The Commission both funded and supervised all future work on the catacomb sites. Its existence is indicative of the growing interest in the origins of the Church in Rome by the Pope who was fighting a rear guard action to hold on to Rome for the Church.

Northcote's extensive first hand knowledge enabled him to write creatively an appealing image of the life and worship of the early Christians. His were among the most popular and successful items in the early editions of the Rambler and kept the catacombs in the forefront of English attention for two years. His was the first treatment to take full account of the scientific and scholarly breakthroughs. He created a popular image of the catacombs which would enkindle a devotional response, demonstrating the Catholic character of the evidence and portraying the Early Church as the progenitor of modern Catholic faith. In 1854, in response to demand from the English for tours of the catacombs, Northcote published his Roman Catacombs, revised in 1859. This was reworked in collaboration with Brownlow a decade later, and remains the most detailed and scholarly account of the catacombs to have appeared in English.

The Catacombs of S Callisto underwent considerable excavation by Marchi and De Rossi. As late as 1844, Marchi discovered the entrance to S Callisto and determined once and for all that it was a separate complex, not part of the catacomb of S Sebastiano. Among other important finds in S Callisto were the tomb of St Cornelius, identified by Rossi in 1849 and uncovered in 1852, and the Crypt of the Popes, excavated and identified by De Rossi in 1854 and to which he brought Pius IX. This visit reflected the Ultramontane desire to emphasise continuity and historicity in Roman and papal authority. De Rossi was also able, using his variety of skills and techniques, (i.e. using seventh-century copies) to reassemble the moving inscription to the early popes, written by Pope Damasus himself:

Learn that here lies here a whole group of saints. The revered tombs enclose their bodies while the Kingdom of Heaven has carried off their chosen souls: here Sixtus' companions triumphing over their persecutors. Here the band of prelates who guard the altars of Christ. Here the bishop whose long life was a time of peace. Here the holy confessors sent by Greece. Here young men and boys; here aged fathers and their offspring who chose to preserve their virginity. Here too, I Damasus, I admit it, would like to have been laid, were it not for fear of disturbing the ashes of these saints.

Not only the martyrs of the catacombs, but inevitably, the relics of martyrs underwent a resurgence in interest in the nineteenth century. The Ultramontane Church emphasised the direct relationship which the Catholic Christian could have with the divine, particularly through devotion to saints. Rediscovered patristic saints like Filumena were immensely popular, but contemporary holy men and women such as Bernadette Soubirous and John Vianney were quickly canonised and visionaries and mystics were popular devotional figures. As part of the Ultramontane development of the Church, the authority of Rome in the discernment and authentication of saints and their relics became increasingly important. Roman approbation of holy people, sites and objects was a vital part of the centralisation which characterised the Ultramontane vision of the Church. One particular controversy over relics reflected the English determination to become part of this vision. The controversy emerged in the early 1860s over the supposed phials of blood which were found at the tombs in the catacombs and were taken as an authentic sign of the martyrdom of the dead person. Thus they were venerated as important relics. When questions were raised over whether this was in fact the case, Wiseman was horrified and Northcote (while sharing some of the scholarly reservations) was concerned about the effect of the controversy on devotional life. The phials represented the cult of martyrs and the validity and necessity of the use of relics in English devotional life. What would be the effect if the faithful thought that they had been venerating relics improperly identified? More worryingly, what would be the effect on Roman authority in relation to the relics which it authenticated and distributed worldwide and on its control of devotional practice? The phial controversy illustrates the growing intransigence and assertion of Roman rule in the face of intellectual advance, and the hostile use to which intellectual advance could be put by opponents of Roman authority, in an effort to undermine it.³⁴ The anxiety for the faithful may have been unfounded, as one pilgrim expressed a healthily pragmatic but nonetheless religious attitude to relics, in the light of the controversy:

We are also eager to venerate relics, as were the early Christians, even though we may mistake the identity of the relic which we think we possess. After all, what does it matter in God's sight what we venerate, if we sincerely believe the authenticity of what is under our eyes? Be there error in that or not, still our homage is offered to the true object, whatever it may be?³⁵

Nevertheless, the defensive attitude taken up by proponents of the Ultramontane Catholic view had become the norm. English pilgrims were encouraged to see present day Rome, not only as the heir of the early Christians, but as embattled by hostile forces of liberal politics, Protestant polemic and scientific rationalism. Hence the tone of one typical Catholic guide book published in 1858:

The circumstances of the present times render it more necessary than ever, that the journey to Rome should now bear the character of a pious pilgrimage, when the anti-Christian spirit of the writers and so-called foreign correspondents of too many journals, seek to fill their letters with all that is calculated to throw ridicule on the manners, customs and social regulations of the Eternal City. More than ever should she be surrounded with love and respect, for she has more than ever become the stronghold of faith and liberty and the centre of civilisation. The railroads and steamers, and the desire to travel, which seems to be the grand characteristic of the times, have made the pilgrimage to Rome easier and more frequent than in days gone by. A work which will embrace both a religious and a scientific view of the Eternal City, must be calculated to assist the pious pilgrim in his accomplishing his longed for object, and will aid him in his walks through this sacred city.³⁶

Such defensiveness was fuelled by the often hostile attitudes of English Protestantism. English travellers to Rome throughout the century shared something of Newman's ambivalence on his first visit as a member of the Church of England, but without his theological sophistication. As one author has expressed it, 'Nothing in the Mediterranean was so enticing, nor yet so repulsive as the religion of Papal Rome'.³⁷ Fascination with the exotic 'foreignness' of Catholic ceremonial drew visitors to St Peter's and the other great churches as to some curious ritual of an alien race. Their behaviour at times embarrassed even their own countrymen who commented on the crassness of English reaction to Catholic services. Protestant authors, however, delighted in telling their correspondents and readers of the horrors of Popery encountered in Roman churches, which in their eyes took on something of the mesmerising horror of Madame Tussaud's. The theatrical style of liturgical devotions and the overtly pious behaviour of the local population both produced distaste. Worst of all was the appearance of English Catholicism in all its enthusiastic Ultramontanist in Rome. One Presbyterian visitor refused to visit the English College, fearing that the Rector would bestow on him 'the same help the wolf gives to the lamb.'³⁸

The desire to enshrine the Church of the catacombs afresh and to build a consciousness of it in the popular mind can be seen in the story of the chapel of the English Convent of Mater Dei. The Poor Servants of the Mother of God, founded in 1870 by Frances Taylor to work among the poor of London, founded their Roman house in 1887. The desire to have a house in Rome was apparent in many orders and congregations and emphasised the enhanced consciousness of Rome, especially among the English. Frances Taylor published an account of her experiences in the Crimea and also Tyburn and Those Who Went Thither - the first attempt at a systematic account of the Elizabethan Catholic martyrs. This brought Frances to the attention of Lady Georgiana Fullerton, herself an accomplished writer and published novelist. She was a member of the Cavendish family and married a Guards officer with lands in Ireland. To the astonishment of Georgiana and her family, he became a Catholic in 1843. She followed suit in 1846. Alongside charitable work and her other writings, she collected material on the English Catholic martyrs to aid their recognition and if possible advance the cause of their beatification - hence her interest in Fanny Taylor's book.

The two women met and became firm friends and allies. By 1868 they had begun to evolve plans for a religious institute of women, taking the model of a Polish congregation of Little Servants of the Mother of God. The little community began in London in 1870 in a cottage near Farm Street, where the women took in sewing and laundry to maintain themselves and their work. By 1872 the order had a distinct identity from the Polish root, as the Poor Servants of the Mother of God. The idea of a house in Rome did not emerge till the 1880s, when a chance conversation of Fanny Taylor (now M Magdalen) while in Rome in 1885 sowed the seed. Things moved quickly. A flat in a house in Via San Sebastianello was rented, but Mr Fullerton quickly took steps to purchase the entire property for the sisters. His wife had died in January 1885 but he continued to support the sisters and the Rome convent was in part a memorial to his wife.

M Magdalen and two companions moved into the house in January 1886, beginning with laundry and charitable activity among the poor. Soon after, the sisters began an English speaking school, which at its peak had 600 pupils and lasted for over a century till 1992. The chapel of St George and the English Saints was built as a memorial to his wife by Mr Fullerton and was opened on the anniversary of her death in January 1887. It contains a replica of the earliest known fresco of Our Lady and the Holy Child in the Catacombs of S Priscilla. This picture, given the title of Our Lady, Queen of Prophets, was solemnly enshrined in the chapel on 14 December 1895, since when it has been the focus of particular prayer for unity between Anglicans and Catholics.

Writing in 1863, the distinguished archeologist of the catacombs, John Baptist de Rossi assessed it thus:

Everyone can see that the scene depicted in the catacomb of Priscilla is quite in the classical style and is a work of the best period of art. The form of the clothing points to remote antiquity; the cloak thrown over the nude, the figure of the prophet with the right shoulder bare, and still more the tunic with short sleeves worn by the Virgin. The beauty of the composition, the dignity and grace of the features, the freedom and power of the drawing, give to this fresco the impress of an age so cultivated and flourishing as to the fine arts, that when I first beheld it I seemed to see before me one of the oldest specimens of Christian painting which are to be found in our cemeteries.

While the nineteenth-century copy cannot imitate the fragile delicacy of the ancient fresco, it is still possible to see from the painting the source of the archeologist's passionate excitement. For many years, a Jesuit archeologist from the Gregorian University, Fr Bonavena, had wished to see this oldest known fresco of the Mother of God reproduced and honoured publicly. He first voiced this desire in 1893 and action to find the right church for this was triggered by Leo XIII's letter 'Ad Anglos' of April 1895. The Guild of Our Lady of Ransom had been canonically erected in the chapel of St George at Mater Dei in 1890, to pray for the conversion of England. Thus it seemed an appropriate location for a shrine to Our Lady which was both Biblical and Prophetic. Papal approval of the copy made on canvas was obtained and the picture was solemnly enshrined in December 1895. In 1896 Leo XIII instituted the feast of Our Lady Queen of Prophets on 27 January and the 'English Convent' became widely known as a centre of prayer for the reunion of Rome and Canterbury. These sort of connections with the church of the catacombs naturally have increased the popular awareness of them and reverence for what they represent.

After 1870, the unsettled state of Rome made the work of the archeologists more difficult. The new secular government controlled the excavations and the previous authority and resources of the Sacred Congregation of the Vatican were greatly curtailed. The unsettled mood made the raising of funds for archeology more difficult and even the leading excavator John Baptist de Rossi was forced to rely on donations, Northcote helped by publishing a popular work in 1877 A Visit to the Roman Catacombs, but interest in England in the catacombs was fading from its earlier peak. Many of the English abhorred the determined restoration by the government of works of art, buildings and classical ruins. Archeologists were blamed for the ruin of the familiar decay and vegetation around buildings which had appealed to the Victorian taste.³⁹ A new Rome began to emerge - the secular modern city, in which the pilgrim was perhaps less at home?

English Catholic interest and piety shifted towards the cause of the martyrs of the Reformation and penal times, whose stories became part of the popular reassertion of English Catholicism. The cause for beatification by the Church of the first group of martyrs was opened by Cardinal Manning in June 1874, although as early as 1860 Wiseman had petitioned the Pope (unsuccessfully) to institute a feast in England in honour of the martyrs.

The passionate interest in the life of the early Christians in Rome had contributed to a recovery of the close link between martyrdom and pilgrimage. The stories of Roman martyrs again became familiar to Catholic pilgrims visiting Rome (and the armchair pilgrims, through the written word). Martyrdom and pilgrimage were again interconnected and in the English mind took on a new level of interest. Wiseman was not the only one to idealise English Catholic history as a rewriting of the Early Church and the stories of Catholic martyrdom associated with the life of the 'Recusant Catacombs' began to be told for the first time. In the second half of the nineteenth century, English writers including Georgiana Fullerton, Frances Taylor and Bede Camm began to collect together the evidence of the English Catholic martyrdoms of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries and to tell their stories for historical and devotional purposes. The result was in 1886 and 1894 that interest had reached sufficient level to persuade Rome to beatify the first groups of English martyrs and set them on the road to canonisation. By then, the Pope himself was perceived as the victim of oppression. Martyrdom in defence of faith and in defence of Rome had re-entered the Catholic mind and heart by the late nineteenth century. The persecuted leaders of the Early Church, the heroic seminary priests of the sixteenth century and seventeenth century and the prisoner of the Vatican were all believed to be standing in a great tradition which was the mark of Catholic identity.

TERENCE ALBERT O'BRIEN'S SPEECH FROM THE SCAFFOLD

Edward Walsh

When the Irish Dominican historian and prolific writer,¹ Hugh Fenning asked me to check a reference at the British Library I could scarcely have imagined where it would lead.

So while noting the entry details of Tady O'Brien's 1745 *Truth Triumphant*² in one of the well known quarto sized catalogue tomes under the great central dome of the famous Bloomsbury circular reading room, my eye spied another but unrelated O'Brien entry under shelf mark E.647.(2). 'O'Brien (Terence) Speech and Confession of the Bishop of Clonwel at the place of execution at Limerick' 1651. Terence Albert O'Brien O.P. born 1601, was the martyred Bishop of Emly 1647-1651 and not Clonwel [sic] which is of course Clonmel, County Tipperary. That was the detail that caught my attention.

Further investigation revealed that there was another and complete title listing for the same pamphlet under the same shelf mark but with a different author; this time one James Hind. The Humble Petition of James Hind (Close Prisoner in New-gate) To the Right Honourable the Councill of State; And their proceedings there upon together with the Speech and Confession of the Bishop of Clonwel at the place of Execution at Limerick in Ireland on the 9 of this instant November 1651, As also his prayer immediately before he was turned off the Ladder; And his declaration to the people, concerning the King of Scots; and the grounds of his Engagement against the Parliament. Likewise the manner of the Deportment of General Oneal, and 29 Colonels and other officers, who were all hanged at the same time. London, Printed for G. Horton, 1651. This writer had no recollection of ever seeing any mention or reference to this document and was both intrigued and amazed to discover that it had not been used by Augustine Valkenburg O.P.³ in the position papers for Terence Albert's beatification in 1992.⁴ Obviously Valkenburg was unaware of the existence of this document, but then he was not alone in this respect.⁵

This is a six page pamphlet of which one page is given over to James Hind (a famous and colourful highwayman) and the bishop gets the other five. In 1615 there would have been no difference between the calendars used at Limerick and London, so how did Horton the printer get the date of Terence's death wrong by ten days? If in fact he got it right, then Bl Terence has been given the wrong feastday (29th October).

Little is known about pamphleteer Horton other than that between 1647-1660 he was 'publisher of political pamphlets and news-sheets' in London at (1) Royal Exchange in Cornhill, (2) near the Three Crowns in Barbican, (3) Figg-Tree Court in Barbican, and (4) the lower end of Red Cross Street over against St Giles Church near Cripplegate.⁶

By any standard Terence's was an impressive speech to have made from a scaffold, but the date of death is out by almost two weeks and one can only wonder how it could all have been so fully reported. The archivist at the Royal Historical Manuscripts Commission at the quaintly titled Quality House, Quality Court, Chancery Lane, confirmed that shorthand was in use at that time. Leading recusant historian, the Jesuit, Francis Edwards observed that this sort of document was 'not that rare'. The document is to be found in the Thomason Tract Collection, that unique compilation of books, pamphlets and newspapers collected contemporaneously by George Thomason (d.1666).⁷ The collection is comprised of 23,926 tracts in 2,142 volumes and was bought by George III in 1761 for £300 and presented to the British Museum a year later.

There are differences in the BL catalogue listings for this opus; under O'Brien⁸ the entry states Clonwel, while under Hind⁹ it is Clonmel and similarly in the catalogue of the Thomason Tracts.¹⁰ What the document does confirm however is the long held tradition as to where the execution actually took place, the main square in Limerick. All the principal dramatis personae appear in the DNB.¹¹

The document has been examined, scrutinised and subjected to critical analysis by Hugh Fenning for publication in Collectanea Hibernica. But I have to admit to a thrill and frisson of excitement on making this discovery, especially as when it happened in May 1994, Canadian academic Dr Jeanne Shami had just discovered an unknown manuscript of a politically sensitive sermon by the 17th century poet John Donne in the Public Record Office, Chancery Lane. The sermon dated 1622 delivered by Donne (who was then Dean of St Paul's) at the cathedral on the anniversary of the Gunpowder Plot has rightly been regarded as a major discovery and caused not a little excitement in literary and historical circles.¹²

THE ARCHIVES OF THE RELIGIOUS SISTERS OF CHARITY

Sister Marie Bernadette O'Leary RSC

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

Before attempting to write about the archives of the Religious Sisters of Charity, it seems reasonable to provide a little background history.

Born in Cork on 19 January 1787, Mary Aikenhead was the eldest child of an Irish Catholic mother, Mary Stackpole, and a Protestant father of Scottish descent, David Aikenhead. Baptised a Protestant, she was received into the Catholic Church on 6 June 1802, her father having been converted to Catholicism before his death in the previous year.

Although Mary belonged to the socially and economically privileged class of her day, she was not unaware of the appalling conditions in which the poor were living, and from her earliest years she was filled with compassion and a desire to do what she could to alleviate their misery. As a young girl she paid daily visits to the poorest quarters of Cork city, accompanied by a friend of like disposition, bringing food and medicine to the sick and under-nourished inhabitants.

When, at the age of seventeen, Mary experienced a call to the religious life, she looked for a congregation where she might serve God in the poor, and especially those who were sick. She had heard of the work being done in France and elsewhere by the Daughters of Charity of St Vincent de Paul, but no such congregation had as yet been introduced into Ireland. Eventually Providence led her to Father Daniel Murray, later Archbishop of Dublin. He was most desirous to establish a congregation of Sisters of Charity in Ireland, and upon hearing of Mary Aikenhead's aspirations he enquired how she would feel about committing herself to the new venture he had in mind. She replied that if an efficient superior and two or three others could be found to begin the work, she would be happy to join them. Little did she think that she would be the efficient superior! However, this was God's plan for her, and on 6 June 1812 she and another young woman, Alicia Walsh, arrived at the Bar Convent, York, to begin a novitiate which was to last three years and which was to be a preparation for their life's work as Sisters of Charity.

Having returned to Ireland in August 1815, the two sisters went to live at North William Street, Dublin, where they were given charge of a group of orphans. Before long they were joined by other young women, and so began the congregation of the Religious Sisters of Charity. The sisters visited the sick poor in their homes and did all they could to alleviate their sufferings.

EXPANSION

Other foundations followed, notably the establishment in 1834 of St Vincent's Hospital, which marked the realisation of Mother Mary Aikenhead's dream to provide professional medical and nursing care for the poor. In 1838, at the request of Bishop Polding, Mother Aikenhead sent five sisters to Australia to work with women prisoners in Parramatta penal settlement. They were the first religious sisters to set foot on Australian soil. The first foundation in England was made at Preston, Lancashire, in 1840. Unfortunately, circumstances necessitated the withdrawal of these sisters in 1848, although a total of sixteen foundations were made in England in later years and three houses were opened in Scotland. The congregation is now international, comprising sisters of at least seven nationalities and supporting communities in Ireland, England, Scotland, Zambia, Nigeria, California and Venezuela. The sisters in Australia form a separate congregation, but there is a strong bond between them and the Religious Sisters of Charity, and members from both groups are working together in Zambia, Nigeria and Ireland.

THE ARCHIVES

Until September 1995 the archives of the congregation were housed at Mount St Anne's, Milltown, Dublin, which had been the mother house of the Religious Sisters of Charity since 1879. In recent years, in view of the declining number of sisters, it was deemed impractical to continue to maintain such a large building, and thus in 1995 Mount St Anne's was sold and the generalate transferred to a smaller house built in the grounds of Lakelands Convent, Sandymount, Dublin. The new generalate was named 'Caritas' and consists of a residential block housing a community of six, an administration centre and an archival unit. The latter comprises an office, reference room, storeroom and a strongroom. The strongroom is fitted with air conditioning and moisture control apparatus, as well as strip lighting and a burglar alarm. It is equipped with steel shelving and cupboards and a cabinet for outsize material.

The first section of the archival collection contains material relating to Mother Mary Aikenhead, beginning with her correspondence. Mother Aikenhead was an invalid for the last twenty-seven years of her life and she directed her young congregation chiefly by means of the pen. There are 1,277 of her letters extant, the greater number of which were written to superiors of local communities. There are also letters to Mary Aikenhead from Archbishop Murray and other ecclesiastical figures, as well as business correspondence. Material concerning the early years of the congregation includes the Annals, Mary Aikenhead's accounts, and a diary (1815-25) kept by her first companion, Mother Catherine (Alicia) Walsh. Various printed books used in the early years are included in this section, together with manuscript notebooks of meditations, spiritual exhortations etc. One very precious treasure is the manuscript copy of the Constitutions in Mary Aikenhead's hand, with an appendix signed and sealed by Archbishop Murray. This document was sent to Rome for approval in 1823.

Legal records among Mother Mary Aikenhead's papers cover a wide range of material concerning the management of finances in the early years of the congregation and the acquisition of property for new charitable projects. They include leases from 1760, rentals, wills, title deeds, legal opinions and related correspondence.

The cause of beatification of Mary Aikenhead furnishes a considerable volume of material, including records of the Informative Process (1911) and the Apostolic Process (1922), as well as correspondence with those appointed by the Holy See to deal with the cause. There have been many books, articles and plays written about Mary Aikenhead and copies of these are also kept. Since 1910 there has been a stream of letters coming to the sisters working on the cause, either seeking the intercession of Mary Aikenhead or returning thanks for favours received. These too are stored in the archives.

In addition to material relating to the foundress there are other documents concerning the Constitutions, General Chapters, and Superiors General, as well as records of personnel and copies of books and papers written by members of the congregation. There are also holdings connected with the different Provinces and Regions of the congregation (arranged in order of foundation). There is quite a large collection of spiritual books which have contributed to the sisters' religious formation through the years, as well as manuscript copies of retreats and triduum - the perfection of the copperplate writing fills the present writer with envious admiration!

Among the most valuable records in the archives are the Annals. The first six volumes were written between 1858 and 1878 by two contemporaries and close associates of Mother Mary Aikenhead. Subsequent volumes comprise reports from individual houses of the congregation submitted to the General Chapter every six years.

Press cuttings dating back to 1858 (following the death of the foundress) form yet another section of the archives, and there is also a large collection of photographs. There are relics of saints with certificates of authenticity and some second-class relics of the foundress herself. Artefacts include a few polished wooden writing desks and also weighing scales and seals. From more recent years there are tapes, audio and audio-visual material, and a film entitled 'Waters of Providence', being a documentary on the Providence Woollen Mills, Foxford, initiated by Mother M. Arsenius Morrogh-Bernard in 1891 to provide employment for the poor of the district.

CONCLUSION

The foregoing description of the contents of the archival holdings is by no means exhaustive, but it gives some idea of what is to be found in the archives of the Religious Sisters of Charity. There is indeed a wealth of material with which the present writer is as yet unfamiliar, having worked in the archives only since 1994, and I am still discovering hidden treasures. The bulk of the work of identifying and arranging documents was undertaken by a highly-skilled professional archivist, Miss Marianne Cosgrave, and I shall always be deeply indebted to her for having got me off to a good start.

One aspect of the work of an archivist that has fascinated me throughout my brief experience as custodian of our congregational records is the variety of topics of interest to researchers. These include lace-making, nineteenth-century education, the cholera epidemics of the 1830s, sodalities, and the Hospice movement, to mention but a few. It gives me great satisfaction to be able to furnish a piece or two of the jigsaw being assembled by the researcher, and for the most part I have found them very pleasant to deal with and appreciative of whatever help I have been able to offer.

MERCY MEMORY

Mary Ellen Doona

Any consideration of Mercy Archives must begin with the condition of the Irish people in 1996. Today Irish women and men own their own country, conduct their own affairs and educate their own people. That Irish politicians, business people and educators are able to do these things in 1996 is due in some measure to the decision Catherine McAuley made in 1827 and the work done, from then till now, by her associates and followers.

This work is not commemorated in statues and stone, though in the lives of its recipients, it is much more significant than the wars and heroes so celebrated. Only recently feminists in search of a usable past have begun to uncover the nineteenth century's female-led humanitarian movement. 'The first specifically religious mission to the sick poor in Britain was a Catholic initiative,' writes military historian Anne Summers. 'Between 1827 and 1831 Catherine McAuley founded an institution dedicated to the "service of the poor, sick and ignorant" in Dublin.'¹ Given the growing interest in women's history in particular, and social history in general, it is safe to predict the numbers of scholars researching women's history in the nineteenth century will increase. Because Sisters of Mercy made much of that history, scholars will want to search documents preserved in Mercy archives.

ARCHIVES AS RESERVOIRS OF MERCY MEMORY

Mercy Archives throughout the world preserve the memory of Catherine McAuley's choice and all the choices that have proceeded from it. In those archives - some in sophisticated state-of-the-art settings, such as at Mercy International in Dublin and Bermondsey Convent in London; others, the labours of love of retired Sisters of Mercy - Mercy Memory is stored. Scattered in convents throughout the world, these archives preserve the primary sources in which Mercy Memory resides. But these archives are not mere reliquaries of the past. They are places, to be sure, but they are also states of mind where the future is chosen. Sisters of Mercy may reminisce about the future. But unless each Sister of Mercy dips into the past preserved in archival documents, her choice for the future will be more superficial than profound.

Choice depends on memory. Consider for a moment persons with amnesia. They can function rather well, but without memory, they are doomed to learn the same lesson anew each day. Consider, as well, persons suffering from Alzheimer's disease. The physical destruction of the brain severely impairs cognitive function, and eventually erases memory. Persons with amnesia or Alzheimer's disease are locked in a permanent now with their ability to make appropriate judgments severely impaired. As a healthy mind and brain are essential to the functioning of the individual, so, too, is an intact institutional memory necessary to an organization. Mercy Memory links each Sister of Mercy with the other and with the choices her predecessors made throughout the history of her congregation even as she is making the choices that will decide the future directions. Mercy Memory is not merely a shrine of past accomplishments, though these accomplishments should be honored. Nor can Mercy Memory be only the province of the archivist or annalist. Mercy Memory is a necessary part of the daily functioning of each Sister of Mercy. The Sisters of Mercy have been fortunate in their predecessors who preserved many historical documents. Among these in each convent are the Annals of the house. These Annals are often the duty of a retired sister, suggesting that age and wisdom are partners. Care must be taken to insure that recording the history of the house is also a partner to the urgent and present activities of the house. Writing Annals and reverencing the past are coequals with action and making choices for the future. Thus Mercy Memory represents a temporal synthesis of past, present and future.

MERCY ARCHIVES FROM A RESEARCHER'S PERSPECTIVE

What follows are some reflections from the vantage point of research being done on the Sisters of Mercy and their nursing during the Crimean War (1854-56). Though these few years are only a minute in the long years of the Mercy crusade for the poor, sick and ignorant, they do provide a glimpse of how important the past is as the Sisters of Mercy choose the future. This research has been going on for almost a decade. During this time, the archives of the Sisters of Mercy have become increasingly more open to scholars. Initially requests for access to Crimean War papers were denied. A very helpful nun who was unaware of the requirements of historical research advised consulting a secondary source then thirty years old. That history was richly grounded in primary sources unavailable to others, but answered very different research questions.² It was a rich history indeed, but only one of many that reside in these primary sources. A few examples will suggest the rest: racial and religious prejudice in the nineteenth century, women's status in a patriarchal society, the growth of the sisterhoods, the evolution of workhouse and hospital care, emigration from Ireland, the economic conditions of the nineteenth century, child care, the emergence of women as a political force, and more.

More recently this researcher has been granted unrestricted access to the primary documents related to nursing during the Crimean War. That access has been facilitated or impeded by the status of individual archives. For example, the primary sources in the Charleville Convent were painstakingly organized by the late Sister M. Albeus Russell as part of her convent's celebration of its sesquicentennial in 1986. Precious documents, original correspondence and copies of Catherine McAuley's letters to the Charleville foundress Angela Dunne were placed with a sheet of paper separating them in plastic sleeves in a ringed binder. The same was done with later correspondence. Each binder began with an inventory of what it contained.

This had been a labour of love of the retired Sister Albeus Russell and because of her careful mind, it was carefully done. Perhaps only Albeus and the researchers using the collection appreciated just how labour intensive this task had been. She and her associates, Sisters Dymphna, Perpetua, Brigid and Ena, also established the Catherine McAuley Museum/Archive. They created posters and a video incorporating the history of the Charleville Convent thus making their history vividly available to the townspeople. During this time artifacts of the convent from its founding in 1836 to the present were organized and carefully displayed in a glassed door cabinet. Among this collection were found Mother Joseph Croke's diary³ and poem⁴ about her Crimean War nursing experience under the leadership of Mother M. Francis Bridgeman of Kinsale, County Cork. The Annals and Register of the convent were shelved nearby. Secondary sources and other relevant data were nearby on book shelves.

ARCHIVES IN MERCY CONVENTS

If this and the services provided by Sister Albeus and her colleagues were a treasure to the researcher, there was still a worrisome concern for the primary documents. Were the plastic sleeves that held the letters of archival quality? Was the paper that separated the letters acid free? Should not the diary and poem be stored flat in acid free boxes?

Was the moist climate of Ireland and the convent harmful to the papers? Should there not be an inventory of the entire collection: letters, papers, Annals, Register, albums, books and ephemera? Perhaps these questions could also be asked of all the other small archives in convents.

At the Convent of Mercy in Bermondsey, London, these questions were largely unnecessary. There the archives is state of the art. Precious documents are in archival quality plastic sleeves and acid free boxes stored in climate-and-temperature-controlled conditions. All are secured in a vault. Here, as in Dublin and Charleville, the supporting collection of books is first rate. The guardians of the collection, Sisters Imelda and Teresa, from an inventory kept in their heads, make available the documents of the Sisters of Mercy and the Crimean War. What is more, they are well versed in the traditional lore and the nineteenth-century context of the mission in Bermondsey.

In addition, the archives at Bermondsey has a collection policy. Sister Imelda had visited convents in England and educated Sisters of Mercy about their primary sources. As some of these Convents closed, they were invited to place their precious papers at Bermondsey. This researcher wonders if these convents have been as thoughtful about their collections of books as they have been of their documents. More than likely every convent has copies of the *Leaves from the Annals*⁵ and they may be ignored as commonplace. But these volumes will become increasingly rare as the years pass by. Great care should be taken to preserve these volumes and others of their ilk in convent libraries.

Because the Bermondsey Convent Archives had been successful in this undertaking the manuscript of the Croke poem originally in the collection at the Derby Convent is now preserved in Bermondsey. More than likely Croke gave Mother Francis Bridgeman this copy on their return to London from the Crimean War in 1856 as Croke left for Ireland and Bridgeman for Derby, the convent she founded from Kinsale. This fragile manuscript should be compared with the (later?) copy of the poem preserved at Charleville. Still another thing to be done is to search for a copy of Croke's Crimean diary among the papers at Bermondsey, for if the manuscript of the poem is there, perhaps a copy of the diary is there as well. The hope behind such a wish is that the Bermondsey copy would be free of the censorship found in the Charleville copy.

If the archives at Bermondsey is state of the art, so too is that at Mercy International. There is no worry about the preservation of documents. They are carefully preserved in climate-and-temperature - controlled conditions even as they await processing. Although they are safe from the further ravages of time, much work needs to be done to organize them and make them more accessible to scholars.

The vital statistics of Sisters of Mercy from 1827 to the present at Mercy International are in a more complete state. Bound in volumes according to the convent and country where each sister entered, these data are readily available to the researcher. What is more, these data currently are being entered into an interactive computer. The individual 'Catherine' is emerging from the anonymity of her community identity, testifying that the individual and her judgment were important to the congregation of Catherine's. This collection is already necessary for the scholar and will become increasingly more precious as time goes by. Hopefully, Mercy International will create an inventory of all the documents throughout the world pulling together in a tight network all the pieces of Mercy Memory. Mercy Memory will be more useful for making choices when it is coherent and complete.

THE WORK OF THE ARCHIVIST

Sister Mercedes McCarthy the archivist at Mercy International (with part time help she is training) is steadfastly organizing the Archive according to a more rational format. At the same time she is providing services to researchers. Each of these three tasks: organizing the collection, training technicians and servicing scholars is a full time task. Yet the archivist has other tasks as urgent and as time-consuming. To list the most outstanding, the archivist must develop a collection policy, process the papers already collected, create an inventory for each collection in the archive, and develop a system of collecting oral histories. Can one person do all this? Not likely.

In addition there is much beginning and catch-up work to be done in collecting oral histories (via audio and/or video taping) of individual sisters and the life of the convents. Senior members should be recorded as quickly as possible before they take, as Sister Albeus did, the archive they hold in their minds with them to the grave. Much of Mercy Memory has already been lost in this way. At the same time, the present is passing into history, and this too must be collected. Sisters other than the archivist might take on this task. For instance, younger sisters might record the memories of their elders, at the one time collecting these precious data and learning about the history the particular sister made. Two individuals for oral histories come immediately to mind: Sister Thomas More, the oldest sister at Bermondsey, and an old priest under Mercy care who survived the World War II bombing of the Bermondsey convent in 1945. A Charleville sister pointed out among the nursing home residents a man who was a participant in Ireland's revolution - still another rich source of the past.

A collection policy would guide the development of the archives and the search for the documents needed to complete a collection. One wonders who is collecting the research papers of Sister M. Muldrey the biographer of Sister Austin Carroll, the author of Leaves from the Annals?⁶ If Mercy International wins the competition for these papers, then it has the additional task of arranging a reception to recognize the significance of the papers and their author. Publicity resulting from the reception of these papers would garner attention for the archives at Mercy International, and thereby alert scholars to these rich resources.

In line with this increased visibility the archivist will naturally become the consultant for associates wondering what to collect and what to discard. At the same time that the archivist monitors the archives and consults with colleagues, she must know what is in each of the collections as well as its historical significance. Such consultation and scholarship requires freedom of mind as well as focus, neither of which is possible if the archivist is expected to do all the tasks related to the archives. In addition, the archivist must authenticate the artifacts in the collection. For example, is the lamp displayed in the Crimean War exhibit at Mercy International one that was really used by a Sister during the Crimean War or is it a nineteenth-century lamp in use at that time in Dublin? Finding the answers to such questions eats up considerable time and takes a great deal of effort.

The archivist must also know collections associated with those at Mercy International. Using the Crimean War as an example, the archivist not only has to know in great detail the significance of her own archival holdings. She must also know where related documents are held. According to hearsay, the correspondence between the English Sisters of Mercy and Florence Nightingale, for example, is scattered among English convents. This needs to be found out for certain. Furthermore, there should be a search among the collections of Nightingalia for letters from Sisters of Mercy. Regimental histories are an untapped source for data about the Mercy mission during the Crimean War.

Once the Archivist has organized the collections and created inventories for each collection, these inventories have to be arranged in publishable form. If catalogues of the collections are important for making the archives known, more important is the archivist's own research. That research should be published and her knowledge of the collections shared in professional journals. Such scholarship makes the collections more visible, as well as makes others more aware of the Mercy mission. In essence it is not enough to organize the collection. The archivist must be articulate about what is in the collections and their historical significance, especially within the context of the Mercy crusade for social justice.

The archivist could also join as a partner with other scholars. For example, Sr Teresa Green of the Bermondsey Convent Archives and Sr Mary Sullivan of New York are preparing for publication the Florence Nightingale letters preserved in the Bermondsey convent. This book will make these letters available to many more scholars than can visit the Bermondsey Convent Archives. Other documents relative to Crimean War nursing should also be published. The sesquicentennial of the Crimean War will begin in 2004. Unless these documents are available, used and published, the hoary myths of Florence Nightingale single-handedly caring for thousands of soldiers will be trotted out. And once again the contributions of the Sisters of Mercy to the emergence of modern nursing will be relegated to oblivion.

Crimean War nursing is only one of many stories. To repeat what has already been said, there are many other stories waiting to be set free from the archives. When the archives is an essential part of the present, there is a great deal of work, but none is more pressing if the Sisters of Mercy are to step with confidence over the threshold into the twenty-first century. Accordingly, the archivist must be free to attend professional meetings with other archivists, first for professional nourishment, and then to make her archives known. At these meetings she will be a spokeswoman for her sisters and their Mission. At the same time she must alert her own sisters to what is important to collect. Just as the Mercy apostolate of education freed her gender from ignorance and helped to raise the Irish people, this commitment to Mercy Memory will yield insights for choosing paths into the future.

The archivist's position is lonely and one that is not often understood by others. The extensiveness of the work and the drudgery associated with it are often invisible to others. It would be unfortunate if the women of Mercy do to their archivists what the world has done too long to women's work - not seen it, or if seen, not valued its worth. It would be terrible indeed if Sisters of Mercy do not see the full significance of archival work, or worse, once seeing it, devalue it. The work of safeguarding Mercy Memory is tedious, time-consuming and exhausting. The work is made more difficult when others do not realize how tedious, how time-consuming and how exhausting it is. One way to help the archivist until more professional help is forthcoming is to create Archives Associates made up of senior and junior members of the Sisters of Mercy. These women might provide the archivist with their wisdom, advice, and most of all, their support. At the same time, the Archives Associates could become good-will ambassadors about the nature of archives and their importance to the future.

KNOWING THE PAST AN ESSENTIAL PART OF CHOOSING THE FUTURE

Sisters of Mercy are so busy that often the urgent can overwhelm the important. Because papers are inert, some believe, erroneously, that papers can wait. But those papers are the rich source for making judgments about the future. As soon as these judgments are made, others must be made. Such is the dynamic nature of human reasoning. Remembering the past and making judgments for the future are of the present tense. Both require accuracy and precision if decisions are to be rich in insights, as well as calls to action. Neither the papers nor the judgments on which these decisions depend can wait.

Consider Catriona Clear's⁷ research of nuns and their convent careers in the nineteenth century. These nuns, more than anyone else in the nineteenth century, had the raw data of Ireland's social state. What might have happened if these nuns had carefully collected and analyzed the data as they cared for the poor, sick and ignorant? Might the twentieth century in Ireland have been different because of judgments made in the light of such analysis? Might poverty, ignorance and sickness have been eradicated, or at least lessened, if these nuns had cared for others on the basis of analyzed data? Compassion is no less significant when sharpened by the mind, as well as provided from the heart.

Consider, too, the verbal snapshot of Catherine McAuley in 1829 given by Sr Clare Augustine Moore. What if those words had not been preserved by the Sisters of Mercy? Sr Mary Sullivan would not have been able to use them on page seven of her recent book on Catherine McAuley.⁸ More important, Mother Clare Augustine Moore's verbal and detailed portrait of Catherine McAuley provides data nowhere else available and corrects the portraits drawn from imagination after her death. What if Mr Clark had not asked Elizabeth Moore about the origins of the Sisters of Mercy? And what if Catherine McAuley had not replied though her fingers were 'stiff' and her penmanship a 'scribble'? And what if Neumann had not published Catherine McAuley's letter?⁹ But Elizabeth Moore did ask Catherine. Catherine did reply. Neumann did publish the letter.

Still another consideration is Mother Clare Moore's directive to the Sisters from Bermondsey to collect souvenirs from the battlefields of the Crimea. Dried flowers have survived one hundred and fifty years in the Bermondsey convent archives though the pages they are glued to are turning to dust. The vicwer can almost see these women gathering the flowers and imagine how they were fertilized by the blood men shed unnecessarily in this most unnecessary of wars. What lessons emerge from reflecting on these relics of the past? How can these lessons help Sisters of Mercy now shaping the future with the judgments they make to-day?

And finally, consider the four black heavy lines drawn through a section of the Croke Diary in Charleville. Perhaps the censor was trying to prevent a scandal. It is hard to see from the vantage point of 1996 what could have been more scandalous than sending men to an almost certain death when they signed on for service during the Crimean War. Scandalous, too, is the unknown hand that censored Croke's report and the truth that lay within. Hopefully, today's superiors and archivists know that closing a collection for a certain period of time serves to protect living people, while at the same time, safeguards the integrity of original sources.

Fortunate to be living in a more open time, and taking advantage of this privilege, the Sisters of Mercy in Limerick have put their Annals in typescript form making available the story of Crimean War nursing to researchers at Mercy International in Dublin. In making their Annals available the good sisters in Limerick have provided a model for other convents to imitate. This copy will help scholars during the relocation of the Sisters of Mercy and until they will be able to read the original source.

The mission of the Sisters of Mercy continues to focus on those in need. The world is in need of the Mercy story if the need for mercy in this world is ever to become extinct. Making visible women's work in this world and making what women do each day valuable is dependent on knowing the story thus far and sharing that story with others. That story depends on the integrity of Mercy Memory and the archivists who protect it and then make it available to others.

ON MOUNTING AN ARCHIVAL EXHIBITION: THE SERVITE SISTERS OF LONDON CELEBRATE 150 YEARS

Sister Agnes Hypher OSM

The pilgrimage 'Celebrating Our Servite Journey' took place during the hot July and August of 1995. The booklet recording this event is suitably subtitled 'Returning to the Sources'. Not only did the international group visit the village of Cuves in France, through Chaumont, Langres and Le Raincy, before crossing the Channel for England, but also spent four days studying the archives of the Congregation in the Generalate at Solihull. This activity was offered in response to the request of the Sisters themselves. It seemed an ideal opportunity to mount an exhibition of historic photographs and artefacts alongside the work with books, letters and papers.

SCHOOL INVOLVEMENT

Involving the primary school attached to the convent in Solihull brought its own benefits, not least the use of the school hall. Seeing the area to be utilised it came as a relief to have the children's work, bringing as it did originality, life and colour to what might have been a very factual exhibition. The headmaster, having requested school participation, suggested a meeting with the staff in order to introduce the historical topics and the occasion marked by the international pilgrimage.

The theme of the French Sisters arriving in England to learn English and work among the poor of London did not fit too well into the National Curriculum, which by this stage in the academic year was well advanced. Nevertheless, topics were selected which were suited to the various classes throughout the school. To name but a few, to mark the Servite Sisters' link with the Dukes of Norfolk via their nineteenth-century foundation at Arundel there was the Carpet of Flowers in Arundel Cathedral worked in collage, together with the cathedral windows, as well as maps and essays related to the Sisters' journey from France to London, and a frieze of the Pilgrims' Way, the latter being one of the claims to fame of the town of Dorking where there is to this day a community of Servite Sisters. Many people assisted in the construction of a centre-piece stage scene of the Sisters in Victorian London. British Home Stores in Birmingham kindly loaned life-size models, which were duly dressed by the parents of the schoolchildren. The background to the scene of Victorian London was taken from the previous year's school pantomime and was re-erected by some men from the local parish. It had been planned to make a tape recording of some of the younger children singing nursery rhymes of London, but since this did not materialise the 'Bells of London' were played instead.

DISPLAYS AND EQUIPMENT

The scope of the topics to be exhibited required not only a year to prepare, but also at least ten display boards. To find anyone who could loan this number of boards, and so far in advance of the exhibition, proved to be impossible. There was also the problem of ensuring that the display equipment was returned. The Heath Robinson approach thus proved to be the remedy, using large pieces of display board and free-standing wooden screens of the type once used in hospitals and clinics. The screens, without their curtains and now supporting sheets of coloured card, fulfilled the purpose adequately, apart from being a more interesting shape. A staplegun proved invaluable since one can then rely on the display remaining in position without the whole effect sagging and looking weary before the end of the week.

The shape of the hall and the arrangement of the stands makes or mars the overall interest of the exhibition. As in my own case, one may still finish the day with a large empty space in the middle of the display, yet this proved to be the answer to the problem of where to seat researchers as they pursued their studies - all thirty-five of them. Once they had departed and as other Sisters and friends arrived to view the exhibition, the tables were removed and the chairs were left for exhausted visitors to use while reminiscing with their friends.

One cannot exaggerate the importance of labels in an exhibition, especially with regard to their size and legibility from a reasonable distance. The height should be as near as possible to eye level. People wearing bifocal glasses, or those who are short-sighted, can find the exercise of reading labels both back-breaking and headache-inducing. One can see this phenomenon in museums and art galleries where groups of visitors strain to read the same small brass plates or typed labels. Handwritten calligraphy notices can be most attractive. The titles of the various stands also require to be written in large bold print so that the visitor with a special interest in a particular topic, but with limited time to spend at the exhibition, can begin at the point of greatest interest.

The advantage of having to place display boards on tables means that each has an area where relevant artefacts can be exhibited in plastic boxes or protected in large wooden bread trays covered with acetate sheets. These should not be attached over the top, but should be tucked in over the objects at the edges. This will minimise the risk of the covering being leant upon or perforated. Covering the display tables and making use of plants and flowers add a variety of texture and colour to the exhibition.

ADVERTISING AND VISITORS

It soon became apparent that the exhibition would be of interest to more people than those for whom it was originally intended. Potential visitors would include Servites of the English Province, children, parents and staff of the school, parishioners and neighbours. Each of these groups were to be invited once the serious study had been completed. By this stage the schoolchildren and their parents were on holiday, and consequently they were disappointed not to have seen the work completed. The hall had to be left in readiness for the new term and everything cleared away so that there was no prospect of leaving any displays for them to see, despite the fact that this was a golden opportunity to devote plenty of space to the history and archival material of the school itself. Past pupils returned time and again to pour over the school magazine, The Oltonian (1912-72). Because we hold two sets of the magazine there was no hesitation in leaving copies to be handled. Since there was constant supervision it was possible to display vestments, embroidery and trophies. Illuminated manuscripts and other more fragile objects were housed in a large cabinet loaned by the school.

The fact that there is so much archival history associated with Our Lady of Compassion Primary School dating back to the turn of the present century is because the school was once a convent boarding school. The Sisters of Our Lady of Compassion of St Denis took refuge in England at the time of the anti-religious laws enacted in France in 1903. They came to Olton, near Solihull, at the invitation of Bishop Illsley and established a flourishing boarding school. However, by 1967 falling numbers of vocations meant that both the convent and the school were threatened with closure. The Sisters of Our Lady of Compassion shared a spirituality and devotional life similar to that of the Servite Sisters of London, and thus, an amalgamation between the two groups was effected, and the two communities worked side by side, although by this time the boarding school at Olton no longer existed. The school was in due course supported by the local parish, but the archives remain in the convent. On the arrival of the present writer at Olton in 1988 the priority was to search every corner of the convent and to gather together all archival material. In this way I soon learnt the history of the Sisters of Our Lady of Compassion.

Enthusiastic friends were keen that I should give the exhibition as much publicity as possible, especially through the local newspapers. My preference was to distribute leaflets to the different churches in the area and to our neighbours and friends. In this way security would not be so great a problem, and those who visited the exhibition would not be casual callers looking for something to do on a hot weekend in mid-August.

PLANNING AND REPORTING PROJECTS

Presenting project work for the international group proved to be difficult. Some of the Sisters were known to me, but not all of them - particularly a new community from Jolimont in Belgium recently aggregated to the London Congregation. Having requested this study of archival material it was of the utmost importance that the exercise should not end in disappointment. During the pilgrimage itself the early history of the Congregation had been well covered through first-hand experience, talks and the liturgy. The element of surprise and something new was required, and this task fell into three categories, viz. the pioneer convents of Belgium, Gratzen (Austria), Jamaica and America; houses in wartime (1914-18 and 1939-45) England, Belgium and France; and the letters (in French and English) of Mother Philomena Morel, the first General of the Congregation. These letters proved a particularly good introduction for the Jolimont Sisters. Should my own choice of subject not have been suitable, a project could have been assembled from any aspect of the exhibition. Thankfully, however, no one chose this option. Working in pairs proved to be a good idea, and thus folders were prepared with the study material placed inside. Because time was limited this saved the necessity of choosing a partner to work with and then having to decide which topic to select.

Among the projects undertaken were those concerned with wartime diaries, photograph albums, chronicles, letters and house diaries. According to the timetable one afternoon and one morning were set aside for project work, and each report was to take a maximum of eight minutes to deliver. This part of the timetable had to be extended since many reports lasted twenty minutes or more. The presentations took various forms from songs to poems, verbal presentations to 'Mastermind', and others made use of large charts and sketches. When it was all over I hoped to have a few projects for the archives, only to find that most of them had been packed into suitcases ready for home.

An introductory half-hour had been allotted for my archival observations which were deliberately kept to a minimum, while just pointing out that the historical talks given during the pilgrimage were authenticated by the archives, the official memory of the Congregation. My plea and great concern was the preservation of the present, making the observation that if this had not been done in the past there would have been no exhibition or projects. Before beginning the work a timely word was given with regard to the use of white cotton gloves, beanbag cushions, pencils, curtain weights for holding down pages, and replacing material in folders when not in use.

OUTREACH

There was no fear of an anti-climax when the pilgrims returned home. Various people working in adult education with embroidery and design, calligraphy and art, as well as floral arranging and festivals, kept in touch. Past pupils and those working on their family tree also made contact. For some years the school has benefited from the archives and (limited) guided tours have been arranged in the convent and grounds in connection with local history studies. The parents and grandparents of some of the children had attended the convent school when it was housed in the convent itself. The outreach continues to extend, although the Heath Robinson equipment is stored away.

ALICE MEYNELL AND THE MEYNELL COLLECTION AT BOSTON COLLEGE

Ronald D. Patkus

INTRODUCTION

Boston College was founded in 1863 by members of the Society of Jesus. Today it is a large university with many programmes and a student body of approximately 15,000. The library system at Boston College includes the Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr. Library (the central facility on campus) as well as a number of other libraries with special fields of focus.

One centre for many of the university's unique and valuable research sources is the John J. Burns Library of Rare Books and Special Collections. Though dedicated little more than a decade ago (1986), the library continues a strong tradition in the university of collecting rare books, periodicals, manuscripts, archives, works of art, photographs, maps, ephemera, and other materials. At present there are several areas of special interest, including Boston Studies, Massachusetts politics, Irish culture and history, the book arts, Jesuitana, Nursing, Catholic Liturgy and Life, Detective Fiction, Balkan Studies, Africa and the Caribbean, and British Catholic authors.

The British Catholic Authors Collection seeks to document the experience of Catholics in Britain since Emancipation in 1829. Of particular note are holdings which relate to English literary figures. The collection centres on the lives and works of four authors: Francis Thompson (1859-1907); Coventry Patmore (1823-1896); Wilfrid Meynell (1852-1948); and Alice Meynell (1847-1922).

1997 therefore marks the 150th anniversary of the birth of Alice Meynell. In order to mark this occasion the library plans to offer a number of programmes during the year. The article which follows will provide some background information on Meynell and her work, offer a brief overview of Alice Meynell studies, and discuss collections relating to Meynell in the Burns Library.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Alice Meynell was born on 22 September 1847, the second daughter of Thomas James Thompson and Christiana Weller. The first daughter, Elizabeth, had been born one year earlier. Thompson pursued no career of his own in accordance with the terms of his grandfather's will. He and his wife were friends of Charles Dickens, who had actually taken a strong interest in Christiana prior to her marriage to Thompson. Mrs Thompson was known especially for her musical and artistic gifts.

The Thompson daughters learned to read and write largely under the guidance of their father. Their outlook on life was also shaped by the experience of living and travelling abroad. The family spent a great deal of time in various parts of England, France, and especially Italy. Before long, in fact, the two young girls were able to speak the Genoese dialect with great facility. One must also note that by the 1860s Mrs Thompson had become attracted to the Church of Rome. Her interest became so great, that eventually she could do nothing other than convert. Some time later Alice too decided to embrace Catholicism; she was received into the Church in July 1868.

As they grew older both Elizabeth and Alice began to display particular gifts. While Elizabeth pursued an interest in painting (the family eventually settled in South Kensington so she could attend the School of Art there), Alice began to devote herself to the development of her skills as a writer. By 1875 she had published her first book of poems.

About this time the young poet came into contact with Wilfrid Meynell, a London journalist who like Alice had converted to Catholicism. They decided to marry in 1877. Rev William Lockhart, a friend of both Meynell and the Thompson family, wrote to Alice saying that she had determined to link her lot with someone who was 'chivalrous in honour' and 'tender in piety and love'. He also wrote that 'For him you have been willing to forgo a more brilliant but not, as I believe, a happier lot'. In time eight children were born to the Meynells, and seven grew to adulthood: Sebastian, Monica, Madeline, Everard, Viola, Olivia, and Francis.

For many years the Meynells resided at Palace Court in London. In addition to raising a large and growing family, they both very quickly settled into a literary life. This life consisted of several activities: reading and writing books, editing journals, submitting articles to various periodicals of the day, maintaining correspondence, and attending and hosting social gatherings. Alice became known especially as an essayist, and many of her works were eventually gathered together and made available in book form. While London served as the base for most of her work, she was also able to visit the United States from 1901-1902, and during this time she presented a number of lectures on literary topics to audiences in various American cities.

Alice Meynell maintained friendships with many of the important literary figures of the late Victorian era, including Coventry Patmore and George Meredith. She also corresponded with or visited some of the most famous artists and musicians of her generation, including the sculptor Medardo Rosso, the painter John Sargent, and the composer Edward Elgar. Gatherings at Palace Court were attended by many interesting people, and one may even go so far as to say that in some ways it served as a veritable centre for some of the most important representatives of English society in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries.

Of special note in this regard is the presence of the poet Francis Thompson. Thompson (no relation to Alice Meynell's father) had first come into contact with the Meynells in their capacity as editors of Merry England. Before long he had come to rely on the Meynells as his close friends and literary supporters. With Alice he felt a special spiritual bond.

Apart from literature, Alice Meynell also exhibited concern for social issues. During the early 1900s, for instance, she became active in the movement to secure the vote for women in England. She led suffrage societies, wrote articles for suffrage publications, and marched in mass processions. She was also affected by the spectre of armed conflict in Europe. The theme of war became common in much of the verse she produced after 1914.

Before the war Wilfrid Meynell purchased Greatham, a house in Sussex which would serve as a more rural retreat for his family. In the last years of Alice Meynell's life the family was often divided between the residence in London and Greatham. The strain of old age began to make itself known, but she continued to work at writing, especially poetry. In 1922 she fell seriously ill, and died while asleep in the early morning of 27 November.

We may gain some sense of Alice Meynell's personality and the impression she made on others by examining part of a passage written by Richard Le Gallienne in The Romantic 90s:

Never surely was a lady who carried her learning and wore the flower of her gentle humane sanctity with such quiet grace, with so gentle and understanding a smile. The touch of exquisite asceticism about her seemed but to accent the sensitive sympathy of her manner, the manner of one quite humanly and simply in this world with all its varied interests, and yet not of it.

LITERARY ACCOMPLISHMENTS

Alice Meynell was twenty-eight when her first book of poems, Preludes, appeared in 1875. The thin volume contained verse which she had composed since the age of eighteen. In 1893 another volume appeared, entitled simply Poems. Poems included much of what had first been published in Preludes, with the addition of several new poems. In style and content these first volumes are very similar. A frequent theme in each is sorrow, though this is not to say that sadness is the ultimate feeling generated by a reading of the poems. Many of Alice Meynell's most famous works, including 'Renouncement' and 'My Heart Shall Be Thy Garden' actually date from this early period. This is also true of 'Neophyte', a sonnet written at the time of the poet's conversion to Catholicism.

The poems of the middle years appeared from about 1895 to 1916 in volumes of various titles, most notably, however, in Later Poems. In 1923 Bums, Oates and Washbourne published both The Last Poems of Alice Meynell and The Poems of Alice Meynell. The later and last poems, as might be expected, bear a certain resemblance to the verse of earlier years; like them, they often look inward. It is characteristic of Alice Meynell's poetry to dwell not so much on emotional feelings as on the contemplation of things sublime.

Poetry did not serve as the only outlet for the young writer's creativity. She also became active in journal editing. She assisted her husband in the publication of The Pen, a Journal of Literature (which survived through just seven issues) and the Weekly Register, a periodical devoted more strictly to Church matters. Alice Meynell contributed most, however, to the publication of another journal called Merry England, which was published from 1883-1895. Like the Weekly Register, Merry England was Catholic in nature, but it had a broader focus, and was concerned primarily with literature and the arts.

Though the production of these journals demanded a great amount of effort, Alice Meynell also found time to submit essays to other journals. In fact, her by-line eventually appeared in nearly all of the major periodicals of the day. Often the essays presented brief studies of various aspects of life in general. Alice Meynell developed a particular style of essay-writing. More than anything else she emphasized the selection of the right word to convey her thoughts to the reader. Precise phrasing was the key to a good essay, she felt.

Many of Alice Meynell's most famous essays appeared in either the Pall Mall Gazette or the National Observer. With regard to the former, she was responsible from 1893 to 1898 for a weekly submission to the 'Wares of Autolycus' column. The column was written by women and mainly treated topics of concern to other women. Alice Meynell continued to write for the Gazette until 1905. The National Observer was another common arena for the author's work. Essays such as 'Rejection' and 'The Rhythm of Life' appeared there, as did other pieces, such as poems and book reviews.

Alice Meynell's art criticism also deserves some attention of its own. Her family's deep interest in art and her own personal talents had prepared her well for such work. Essays about art and artists appeared in such periodicals as the Magazine of Art and Art Journal. She also served as art critic for The Tablet from 1888 to 1897, and for the Pall Mall Gazette from 1902 to 1905.

The journalistic endeavour of Alice Meynell was thus quite considerable. Because of the popularity of the essays it was almost inevitable that many of them would be gathered together and published again, in book form. Well-known titles include The Rhythm of Life, The Colour of Life, The Children, The Spirit of Place, Ceres' Runaway, Hearts of Controversy, and The Second Person Singular. Other essays appeared in books as prefaces to the works of some of the greatest names in modern English letters, such as Matthew Arnold, William Blake, Robert and Elizabeth Barrett Browning, Samuel Taylor Coleridge, William Cowper, John Keats, Christina Georgina Rossetti, William Shakespeare, Percy Bysshe Shelley, Alfred Lord Tennyson, and William Wordsworth.

Some of the prefaces appeared in anthologies which Alice Meynell herself had produced. These include The Flower of the Mind, an anthology of poems from Chaucer to Wordsworth, and The School of Poetry, a selection of verse for children, published in 1897 and 1923 respectively. In addition Alice Meynell compiled anthologies which did not happen to include critical introductions, such as those on the seventeenth-century religious poets, Samuel Johnson, and John B.

Tabb.

Occasionally Alice Meynell put her strong linguistic skills to work by producing translations of various works into English from either French or Italian. She translated Rene Bazin's The Nun, a book about Lourdes, Adolfo Venturi's The Madonna, and several ecclesiastical treatises, including a pastoral letter of the Primate of Belgium, Cardinal Mercier.

Alice Meynell's literary production was thus vast and varied. As poet, journalist, critic, essayist, editor, and translator she made her mark on the world of letters in both Victorian and Edwardian England. One may wonder, however, just exactly what the ultimate significance of Alice Meynell's work was. We can begin to approach this question by reviewing some of the literary criticism which has been published during the course of the past hundred years and more.

ALICE MEYNELL STUDIES

In a certain sense studies of the life and work of Alice Meynell began during her own lifetime. As her poetry and prose was published, contemporary critics responded with reviews of the work in various periodicals. Much of the criticism produced at this time was positive in nature. For example, the early poems received considerable praise from literary figures and critics such as John Ruskin, Alfred Lord Tennyson, and Aubrey de Vere. Ruskin believed that certain passages of poems from Preludes were actually some of the finest things he had read in modern verse. Coventry Patmore was similarly impressed; in 1895, after Poems had appeared in print, he wrote an article for The Tablet arguing that Alice Meynell should be the one to succeed Tennyson as poet laureate of England.

As with her poetry, contemporary critics were quick to see the quality of Alice Meynell's prose. In a National Review article, fellow friend and writer George Meredith gave a very telling assessment: 'A woman who thinks and can write, who does not disdain the school of journalism, and who brings novelty and poetic beauty, the devout but open mind, to her practice of it, bears promise that she will some day rank as one of the great English-women of letters.'

This is not to say, of course, that all reviews of Alice Meynell's work were uniformly praiseworthy. Critical comments were made about certain aspects of both the poetry and prose. In general, however, this did not change the overall reception she received from her peers. Even Max Beerbohm, a fellow English writer who felt that admiration for Alice Meynell's style had gone too far, could not but admit her literary talents.

At the time of her death in 1922 there appeared naturally a number of obituaries and other articles describing Alice Meynell's life and work. In addition, one of the first major critical works appeared at this time, namely Mrs Meynell and Her Literary Generation, by Anne Kimball Tuell. Tuell, a professor at Wellesley College in Massachusetts, had actually begun to work on this book during the author's lifetime. The study was not published, however, until 1925. Though dated, Tuell's book still stands as a useful introduction to the full range of Alice Meynell's literary opus. It gives attention to both the poetry and prose, and considers special topics, such as Alice Meynell as a writer for women, and as a religious poet.

Tuell's literary study of Alice Meynell was followed in 1929 by Alice Meynell: A Memoir, by Viola Meynell. The subtitle of this book indicates that it was not meant to be a scholarly dissertation, and it should not be judged as such. Instead, it primarily provides a recollection of a life lived, told by one close to the subject. Because of this unique perspective, A Memoir still holds value for readers today.

A number of other works were published which discussed Alice Meynell's work as it related to other broad themes. Writing in 1940, Alfred Noyes summed up what many readers of Alice Meynell's poetry have felt. In Pageant of Letters he wrote, 'By those whose love of poetry claims them wholly – making demands on the intellect as well as on the heart, on their spiritual being as well as on the senses – it has long been recognized that Alice Meynell, with her hundred poems, is among the imperishable names.'

1947 marked the centenary of Alice Meynell's birth, and the occasion was observed in several ways both in England and America. In London, for instance, there was a special exhibition of books and other material, mounted with the assistance of Sir Francis Meynell and other members of the family. In Boston, the Thompson Associates of Boston College sponsored a Centenary Symposium which featured presentations by Anne Kimball Tuell, Rev. Terence L. Connolly, SJ, and others. The symposium opened a special exhibition of Alice Meynell items in the Great Hall and Reception Room of Boston College Library. Subsequently a printed memorial of the symposium, including a short-title list of works, was published. In addition to these special events a number of literary journals, such as the Irish Monthly, the Poetry Review, and The Tablet, allocated space to articles which recalled the work of Alice Meynell.

A number of studies have appeared in more recent times. One of the most substantial of these is June Badeni's The Slender Tree: A Life of Alice Meynell, a full-length biography published in 1981. It presents a survey of the author's life in chronological order, relying on both published and unpublished sources. This biography is useful in bringing a more objective perspective to Alice Meynell's life than was possible in the book written by Viola Meynell.

Other contributions to Alice Meynell studies include theses, dissertations, and articles which have appeared in a number of scholarly and literary journals. These works discuss specific aspects of the author's work, or how the work relates to a particular subject. There have been studies of Alice Meynell as a journalistic essayist, as a translator, and as a poet. Works have also been published which consider her connection with George Meredith, and the question of what place she takes as part of a 'world poet' tradition.

Some of the most interesting studies of Alice Meynell in recent years have made use of the new approaches to writing history. Especially noteworthy in this regard are articles written from the perspective of feminism and women's studies. Sharon Smulders has published 'Feminism, Pacifism and the Ethics of War: The Politics and Poetics of Alice Meynell's War Verse,' in English Literature in Translation and Beverly Ann Schlack has written 'The "Poetess of Poets": Alice Meynell Rediscovered' in Women's Studies: An Interdisciplinary Journal.

Interest in Alice Meynell as both a person and a literary figure has continued unabated since the publication of her first book of poems in 1875. Critical studies of her work have been produced by authors and scholars from various backgrounds. In recent years Alice Meynell has been 're-discovered' by some working in the field of English literature. Nevertheless it would appear that the study of this author has not been exhausted. New topics of interest may be supported by primary and secondary source materials now housed in the Burns Library at Boston College. The call to document Alice Meynell's life and work, as well as the circle in which she moved, has been strong indeed.

ALICE MEYNELL COLLECTION

The history of the Meynell Collection at Boston College can be traced back to the efforts of Rev. Terence L. Connolly, SJ. Father Connolly first came to the university in 1929. For many years he held a position on the faculty of the English Department, and specialized in the writings of English Catholics. He was especially interested in Francis Thompson, the subject of his doctoral dissertation. With Father Connolly's assistance Boston College acquired the Seymour Adelman Collection of Francis Thompson in 1937; this led to the acquisition of other Thompson items in succeeding years, particularly from the family of Wilfrid Meynell.

From 1945 until his death in 1961 Father Connolly served as Librarian at Boston College. During this time he made great advances in collecting not only Thompsoniana but also materials of other poets and literary figures of late-nineteenth and early-twentieth century England. The Meynell Collection originated from this activity. Building on this foundation, the library has continued to receive new items. Today the collection forms part of a mosaic of holdings in the Burns Library relating to British Catholic Authors.

Items for the Meynell Collection have been acquired from a number of sources. The greatest portion of material has come from members of the family itself, especially Viola Meynell Dallyn, Olivia Meynell Sowerby, Francis Meynell, and Wilfrid Meynell. (After Alice Meynell's death, Mrs Sowerby served as curator of her mother's papers). Many other friends of Boston College Libraries have made possible the acquisition of specific items. Of special note in this regard are donors such as Frank S. Kysela, Sara Logue, John F. Power, Richard Montgomery Tobin, Mrs. Edward C. Donnelly, and others. Because of the broad base of donor support it is no exaggeration to say that in some ways the collection is the result of the interest of the entire Boston College community.

A description of the collection may justly begin with the books. Some of the most important of these, of course, are Alice Meynell's own books, including volumes of her poetry, prose, translations, and anthologies. The collection contains numerous first editions, many of which were actually inscribed by the author. A copy of the 1893 issue of Poems, for instance, features the note, 'To my dearest mother', with an autograph of the author. A 1913 edition of Poems includes an inscription to John Drinkwater from Alice Meynell, 'his admiring and delighted reader'. There is also a copy of a limited edition printing of The Rhythm of Life inscribed by Coventry Patmore to St Clair Baddely.

The collection includes books which were not solely the work of Alice Meynell, but to which she made one or more significant contributions. The publications in this section comprise mainly books for which she wrote prefaces, and books in which examples of her work, usually chosen from the poetry, are included.

One of the largest parts of the collection is composed of books and other publications about Alice Meynell. This includes full-length monographs as well as original copies of periodicals and other publications featuring material on the author. Of special importance are publications which appeared during Alice Meynell's lifetime and at the time of her death. These include such items as an original copy of the Coventry Patmore article in the 2 November 1895 issue of The Tablet which recommended Alice Meynell for the poet laureateship, and a 1923 essay of G.K. Chesterton from the Dublin Review.

The collection includes Alice Meynell manuscripts of some of her most significant works. A good number of these are poems. Some are typed, but most are hand-written, usually one or two pages in length. Often they include the autograph of the author. Among the holdings are manuscripts of 'Renouncement' 'The Shepherdess' and 'Summer in England, 1914'. Other examples include 'The Poet to the Birds' 'Christ in Portugal', and 'The Watershed'.

The library also possesses a small but nevertheless useful collection of autographed letters signed by Alice Meynell. Significant correspondents include family, friends, and business contacts. There is correspondence to Wilfrid Meynell, Coventry Patmore, F. Holland Day, Sidney Cockerell, and others. A number of letters in the collection were sent by Alice Meynell to her publisher, John Lane.

One unique part of the Alice Meynell holdings is a collection of music. This collection consists of songs, mainly poems of the author, set to music by various composers. Such music was published both during and after Alice Meynell's lifetime. The poem entitled 'The Shepherdess' was actually set to music by a number of composers, including J.F. Whitelaw, Rhoma Rodway, Dermot Macmurrough, Hugh S. Roberton,

S. Anna Goulef, Hermann Lohr, and Edward Horsman. Other works of Alice Meynell which were put to music include the sonnets 'My Heart Shall Be Thy Garden', 'The Neophyte', and 'Renouncement'.

Finally one must mention some of the miscellaneous items which make up part of the collection. These include such things as phonograph records of readings of Alice Meynell's poetry, a large leather-bound scrapbook featuring newspaper clippings relating to the author, and a Christmas card of the Meynell family. In addition there are some representative pictures and photographs. Among the images are a picture of Alice Meynell with her friend Agnes Tobin, a facsimile of the John Sargent drawing of Alice Meynell, as well as a painting of her by Neville Lytton.

RELATED HOLDINGS

The collection of items in the Burns Library relating directly to Alice Meynell is complemented by other materials. In the effort to document the experience of British Catholic authors since 1829 the library has acquired several collections which provide additional insight into the world in which Alice Meynell lived and wrote.

Among the most important of these are holdings relating to Wilfrid Meynell. These include copies of his books, periodicals in which his articles appeared, and also personal papers. The papers include a collection of Wilfrid Meynell's correspondence, dating from the early 1880s to 1947. These letters help to document certain aspects of the journalist's life. There is correspondence with the editor John Lane, Wilfrid Scawen Blunt (a friend and neighbour of Wilfrid Meynell) and Aubrey de Vere. A great many letters also exist from Wilfrid Meynell to Rev. Terence L. Connolly, SJ, of the Boston College Library.

A separate but related collection is the William Randolph Sasnett-Wilfrid Meynell Collection. It consists largely of correspondence between Wilfrid Meynell and Sasnett, thus the title of the collection. There are other valuable items, however, including letters of Viola Meynell and material about Charles Dickens, the friend of Alice Meynell's father. One may also find several photographs, including one taken at Greatham in 1936.

The library holds material relating to the children of Alice and Wilfrid Meynell, especially Francis, Everard, and Viola. The material includes many books of Viola and Francis. The books relating to Francis document his career as a typographer, printer, and publisher. There are also some letters from the Meynell children written on various occasions and at different times in their lives.

The Coventry Patmore Collection is of interest from several vantage points. Not only was Patmore a friend of Alice Meynell (though they did have a sort of falling out in later years) but his poetry was held in very high regard by her throughout her life. Some have even wondered to what extent Patmore's verse influenced the work of his fellow poet. The collection contains both printed and unpublished material of, or relating to, Patmore. Certain items concern Alice Meynell directly, such as published reviews of her work written by Patmore for various periodicals. There is a small collection of autographed letters signed by various nineteenth century writers which was actually presented to Alice Meynell by Patmore. In the Patmore Collection one will also come across one of the fifty privately printed copies of Seven Unpublished Poems by Coventry Patmore to Alice Meynell.

As has already been mentioned, Francis Thompson maintained a close relationship with the Meynell family in both his personal life and his work. The Thompson Collection at Boston College, which is the largest of its kind, sheds light not only on the poet himself but also on others in his literary circle. Like the Alice Meynell Collection, it includes a wide variety of materials, from books and manuscripts to correspondence and ephemera. Several of the manuscripts and letters in the Thompson Collection concern Alice Meynell, as do various books which have been placed there.

The Burns Library is fortunate to possess full runs of several important periodicals relating to the Meynells. There is a complete set of The Pen, A Journal of Literature, as well as of Merry England. It is worth noting that the Merry England set is believed to be one of only two complete collections, the other being in the British Museum. In addition, there are microfilm copies of the Weekly Register. Bound copies of other periodicals to which the Meynells contributed, such as Art Journal and the Magazine of Art, are also available.

The papers of Rev. Terence L. Connolly, SJ, may also be consulted. During his lifetime Father Connolly taught and lectured on British Catholic authors, and among his papers are to be found notes and research material relating to the Meynells, Coventry Patmore, and Francis Thompson. His administrative correspondence as Librarian at Boston College dates from the period after Alice Meynell's death, but it does include letters with other members of the Meynell family concerning a variety of matters.

Finally one may mention in a general way the full variety of reference materials, books, manuscripts, and other materials available to researchers at the Burns Library. Though too extensive to be described here, many other items help to provide information in various ways to those wanting to extend their knowledge and understanding of the literary world of Alice Meynell and her circle.

SUMMARY

The 150th anniversary of the birth of Alice Meynell provides an occasion to re-examine her life and work. Though in some ways quiet, her life was filled with activity. Her literary production was considerable, and was roundly praised by many of her contemporaries. Scholars and other writers of more recent times have also found reason to study the significance of Alice Meynell and her contributions to English literature. The John J. Burns Library of Rare Books and Special Collections at Boston College maintains a number of collections which support research concerning Alice Meynell and her literary circle. It is hoped that the collections will be useful to future researchers seeking to understand the author and her work.

THE MEMORY OF THOSE IN NEED: THE ARCHIVES OF CAFOD

Bernard Barrett

MISSION OF NEED

I was appointed as the First professionally-qualified Librarian and Information Scientist for CAFOD (Catholic Fund for Overseas Development) just over three years ago. An essential part of the job was to be Archivist as well as Librarian. CAFOD plays a unique role in the Catholic Church in England and Wales, in that it forms a bridge between the people of comparatively rich northern countries and those of the decidedly poor south. CAFOD's motto and logo is that it is on the side of people in need, and its archive is the record of how it has become that. More importantly, CAFOD is and continually hopes to become, the authentic voice of those who are in need.

QUESTIONS OF DEFINITION

The first step was to be clear about what material should be admitted to the archive, in order to achieve the aforementioned aim. The following decisions were taken:

(a) Periodicals: the Library receives well in excess of 600 periodical titles per year. Some of these are well-established substantial titles to which CAFOD subscribes. However, the vast majority are free and have their origin in the countries of the south. Many are from partners with whom CAFOD has a close connection, some are from those who seek CAFOD's support, while others, depending on their geographical point of origin, are for private circulation only. What is common to all is that they form an independent voice and an important source of information on the countries where CAFOD works.

(b) Newspapers: in the context of CAFOD the heading 'periodicals' tends to be an all-embracing one. Many publications issued in the format of a newspaper would be stored with the periodicals. In addition to these the Library also holds back copies of the quality daily and weekend papers. These are kept for three months, whereafter access to news stories can be had through a press cutting bulletin, the Financial Times on CD-ROM and the Daily Telegraph on the Internet. We also keep an archive of the religious press, including well known titles such as The Universe, Catholic Herald, and Catholic Times, together with the National Catholic Reporter from the United States and the religious press of other Christian traditions such as the Methodist Recorder, Baptist Times and Church Times. Space permitting, we intend to keep these.

(c) The CAFOD Campaign: CAFOD has been working for justice on behalf of its partners, through the medium of an educational campaign, for the past fifteen years or so. Many of these campaigns have been both popular and inventive, and have involved a great many people from groups in parishes to young people and politicians. An essential part of these campaigns has been the material produced by CAFOD to encourage greater awareness among people, e.g. study guides, video recordings, posters and resources for both reflection and discussion. The latter include quotations and testimonies from partners in the south and CAFOD's popular Advent and Lenten reflections which place the southern point of view into a liturgical context.

(d) The WIP Archive: WIP is a CAFOD acronym for 'Working in Partnership'. The WIP scheme attempts to link parishes in England and Wales with parishes in the countries where CAFOD works. Underpinning the scheme is the understanding that the only way to change for the better is by means of coming to a greater knowledge of the cause and effect relationship behind the way in which we live. The WIP material is formed from sets of 'updates' on each country, which not only provide a snapshot of local conditions at a given time, but also introduce real people and situations and suggest ways in which we can both help and learn.

(e) The CAFOD Fast: In recent years it has become fashionable to join CAFOD's twenty-four-hour fast at both Lent and Harvest-time. This fast is an act of solidarity: act and think. Those who take part have the chance to become involved, and the archive collection of Fast Day packs illustrates this well at both parish and school levels.

(f) Press Releases: copies are retained of most of CAFOD's press releases from the past six years. CAFOD now has its own Media Relations Section which aims to ensure that the voice of its partners is heard on television and radio and in the newspapers as frequently as possible. The press releases form a record of CAFOD's involvement and indicate the options it has made for the poor over the years.

(g) Project Field Trip Reports: CAFOD is one of a handful of agencies which do not have field offices abroad. Instead it seeks to identify and work with trusted partners, empowering them to bring about change in their own lives. Project Officers visit partners to build a relationship with them and to ensure that the aid given is both appropriate and effective. The Project Field Trip Reports are records of those visits and of what was learnt. For this reason they attract a fairly high degree of confidentiality.

(h) CAFOD Publications: Because CAFOD is a publisher in its own right, the archive receives on deposit two copies of everything that is produced. Such publications range from the campaign materials and Advent/Lent reflections mentioned above to the text of CAFOD's annual Pope Paul VI Memorial Lectures, its magazine and its Annual Reports and Reviews.

(i) Special Collections Held In Trust: notable among the two collections held is the Whitfield Archive. Teresa Whitfield was the author of Paying The Price: Ignacio Ellacuria and the Murdered Jesuits of El Salvador. She has deposited with the CAFOD archive the material she collected while researching her book in El Salvador.

LOCATION AND ACCESS

Both the Library and Archive are currently housed in separate rooms in two separate buildings, but this situation is set to change in the near future when, as part of a major reorganization of CAFOD's office accomodation, both will be amalgamated to form a single unit. This will make it much easier to pass from past to present material and will improve the level of access that can be offered.

The task of sorting, arranging and describing much of the material held is still in process, and for this reason access has been primarily to CAFOD staff. Use is being made of the subject specializations of highly qualified volunteers, who with technical and managerial guidance are helping the Librarian/Archivist to make information more readily retrievable. Although both time and staffing can be a problem, we will always endeavour to find time to welcome external enquirers as well.

Both Library and Archive use a computerised information management system called ALICE. This system possesses a very user-friendly OPAC which enables one to search by Subject, Keyword, Title, Series, Author, Location, Classification and by material type. Moreover, it is possible to search by using combinations of these. An example of how flexible this can be is seen in the recent addition of the CAFOD campaign materials to the ALICE system.

Material can be searched for on two levels: the first enables one to gain a broad appreciation of what each campaign is about. By entering 'CAFOD Campaign' at the search prompt it is first possible to see a list of the campaigns year by year with their title. The next stage is to select the campaign of your choice and expand the title to a full entry. This gives details of who within CAFOD was responsible for the production of the campaign and breaks the campaign itself into its constituent parts. From here, utilizing a link option, it is then possible to view all the publications produced as part of the campaign (i.e. parish guides, youth guides etc.).

The second level enables one to 'go inside' each campaign in order to view the type of material that has been used. It then becomes possible to search for quotations relating specifically to debt, used as part of a campaign, or to see whether any role-plays exist to illustrate the plight of living in a Brazilian shanty town. It is intended to develop this approach with regard to the WIP archive next, and then the twenty-four-hour fast materials.

Visitors wishing to consult the archive are welcome to do so, but by appointment only. This is to ensure that there is time available to help them and to make the necessary material ready. It should also be borne in mind that some of the above-mentioned categories are in the process of being worked upon and thus they may not be readily accessible. It is hoped that access to and use of these materials can play an important part both in raising awareness of the issues that CAFOD seeks to confront and in creating support for the work it undertakes.

EDITORIAL NOTE

The CAFOD Archive is open to consultation by researchers by appointment. Enquiries should be addressed to: The Librarian/Archivist, CAFOD, Romero Close, Stockwell Road, London SW9 9TY.

BOOK REVIEWS

The Cross on the Sword: Catholic Chaplains in the Forces by Tom Johnstone & James Hagerty [Geoffrey Chapman, 1996, pp.338; hbk £40, pbk £19.99].

This is the first comprehensive study of the history of Catholic chaplains in the three services. Much space is given to the long process of official recognition, from the first commissioning of a chaplain in 1794 to the recent ecclesiastical appointment of Bishop Francis Walmsley in 1987 as the first Military Ordinary, with a quasi diocese of the Forces. However, what will possibly interest the general reader more, particularly as the dreadful events and tragic consequences of the two world wars of this century still remain in the memory of older generations and, strangely, as the years pass seem to have become increasingly part of the national consciousness, will be the many intimate accounts of the courage of Catholic chaplains ministering the sacraments to Catholic soldiers in battle and in the front line, while the devotion of Catholic soldiers to the Faith is both poignant and inspiring.

The authors have clearly researched the subject very thoroughly and cast their net of enquiries widely, which is evident from the long list of acknowledgements, the extensive references at the end of each chapter, and the catalogue of published and unpublished sources. The wealth of material is well presented in clearly-defined chapters in logical sequence, each with appropriate sub-sections making for easier general or selective reading, and there is a useful index. The book will surely satisfy a variety of readers who approach it with differing interests and will undoubtedly stimulate further research in the published and documentary sources, thus enlarging our knowledge of this most heroic of priestly ministries. While the study concentrates on the role of Catholic chaplains, it also contains much information on the similarly valued work of Anglican, Church of Scotland and Free Church chaplains. Indeed, Bishop Walmsley, who himself is an authority on the subject and who collects information on individual chaplains, in an admirable Foreword commends the book to a universal readership on the bicentenary of the Royal Army Chaplains Department. The book is dedicated to the sixty-nine priests of Great Britain, Ireland and the Commonwealth who died in the Crimea, India and the two world wars, and whose names are given in a roll of honour. The authors are to be congratulated on producing what will surely become the standard work on the history of Catholic chaplains.

The Letters of John Peniston, Salisbury Architect, Catholic, and Yeomanry Officer, 1823-30 edited by Michael Cowan (Wiltshire Record Society, vol.50, March 1996, pp xx + 270, £20): available from Michael Lansdown, 53 Clarendon Road, Trowbridge, Wilts BA14 7BS.

John Peniston, founder of a dynasty of architects in Salisbury, was a prolific correspondent, and the present volume contains nearly 1,700 letters written over a period of seven years. From a Catholic viewpoint the letters of 1826 are especially important, written as they were in the period immediately before Emancipation and being concerned with negotiations over the appointment of a priest to the Salisbury mission after the death of its long-serving French émigré pastor. Other letters highlight Peniston's links with the Jesuits at Wardour - Peniston's second son entered the Society of Jesus in 1838. The Peniston letter-books were once part of the Salisbury Diocesan Registry collection but are now deposited in the Wiltshire Record Office. This edition is well produced and boasts detailed indices. From an archival perspective it stands as a good example of making available to a wider scholarly public what might otherwise remain an obscure collection of early nineteenth-century letters.

THE CATHOLIC ARCHIVES SOCIETY CONFERENCE, 1996

The seventeenth annual conference of the Society was held at All Saints Pastoral Centre, London Colney, from 28 to 30 May.

The first paper on the Tuesday afternoon was given by Miss Marianne Cosgrave, Secretary of the Association of Church Archivists of Ireland. Her well-illustrated and interesting talk concerned the use of computer databasing in archival work, both the advantages and the problems encountered. The evening session was devoted to a lively slide presentation of the Catholic Archives Society's visit to Rome in October 1995. One of the outstanding features of this trip was the very warm welcome given to our members by the custodians of the different archival repositories visited and by Archbishop Marchisano, President of the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church.

The Wednesday morning talks were both very useful to what is primarily a gathering of part-time archivists, many of whom are only just beginning to come to grips with the task entrusted to them. It was the conference's honour, therefore, to be addressed by Dr Kate Thompson, Chairman of the Society of Archivists and County Archivist of Hertfordshire. Her paper was entitled 'Archives and Archivists' and offered much encouragement to our members. Likewise the next speaker, Mr Topping, Senior Curator at Lambeth Palace Library. His talk was much appreciated for its straightforward approach to the art of conservation.

The Wednesday afternoon visits to the Hertfordshire County Record Office at Hertford (for a group of twenty), and to St Edmund's College, Ware (for the remainder of the participants), were once again very successful. The first group was given a comprehensive tour of a major county repository, while the second enjoyed making the acquaintance of one of the chief sites of post-Reformation Catholic interest in Southern England, including as it did visits to the Pugin chapel and to the college museum.

The remainder of the conference was taken up with a discussion on 'Archives and Education' (Wednesday evening) and the by now customary Open Forum on the last morning of the gathering, followed by the Society's Annual General Meeting. The 1997 conference will take place at Upholland Conference Centre, Wigan, from 26 to 28 May.

EDITORIAL NOTES

For the Catholic Archives Society the highlights of the past year were two-fold. Firstly, the visit to England in the spring of Archbishop Marchisano, President of the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church; and secondly, the Society's own visit to Ireland in the summer.

Accompanied by Dr Carlo Stella, Archbishop Marchisano attended the Annual Conference at Upholland and, in the presence of the Archbishop of Liverpool, addressed the members of the Society on the Commission's recently-issued document, The Pastoral Function of Church Archives. This talk is reproduced as the first article in the present edition of Catholic Archives. The Society's visit to Ireland is recalled by a summary of the holdings of the National Archives in Dublin, as well as by further contributions of Irish interest: Sister Pius O'Brien's charming reflections on the archives of the Mercy Convent in Ennis, and Sister Christine Loughran's account of the Presentation Sisters' educational work in Madras.

The variety of religious life in the Church is represented by Brother Jonathan Gell's article on Mount Saint Bernard Abbey and its archival holdings, a contribution followed by that of Patricia Vaultk on the Daughters of the Heart of Mary, an altogether different expression of the consecrated state which owes much to the circumstances of the Church in Revolutionary France. Lastly, John Davies offers a summary of archival material in the Public Record Office relating to the Catholic Church and the 1944 Education Act.

Each of the contributions to this year's journal will widen our appreciation and knowledge of the world of Catholic archives and archivists. Indeed, it is the Editor's sincere hope that the variety of content and style represented in Catholic Archives 18 will appeal to the ever-increasing readership of this publication: clerical and religious, lay, Catholics and those from other Christian traditions, professional archivists and those who work on a voluntary or part-time basis. On behalf of the Officers and members of the Catholic Archives Society I wish to thank all those who have written for this edition of the journal. Each and every such contribution serves to deepen our understanding of the value and importance of the cultural heritage of the Church, and as the Conclusion to the Pontifical Commission's document states, 'Archives, as part of the Church's cultural heritage. . . can really bring about a valid contribution to the process of new evangelization.'

ARCHBISHOP MARCHISANO'S ADDRESS TO THE CATHOLIC ARCHIVES SOCIETY

Given at the Annual Conference, Upholland, 28 May 1997

I want to thank whole-heartedly the Chairman, Mr Robin Gard, and each member of the Society for inviting me here today to take part in this important Annual Conference, as well as my brother bishops in Christ who honour me with their presence. I am particularly glad to be here with you because it gives me a chance to see many of you again after your visit to our Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church in Rome. This time I am in your lovely country of which I have fond memories dating back to when I was working at the Pontifical Congregation for Catholic Education.

Just like the previous occasion, this is also quite a memorable event for me since it gives me the opportunity to express to you all our gratitude for your work and dedication. It allows us to learn more from your expertise and to work together on special concerns in an area of the Church's cultural heritage - viz. church archives - which is truly fundamental to her very existence and her mission of evangelization.

But there is also another reason why I hope we will look back to our meeting today as a significant landmark in our day-to-day work. As you know, the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church has just issued a specific document on archives (The Pastoral Function of Church Archives) and I am here to present it to you. I will give some background information on how it evolved, and will present its major points, what we hope it will mean for the particular churches in every nation, and its general significance within the context of the activities and projects - past, present and future - of the Pontifical Commission.

Let me begin by saying that this document could not have been conceived without your precious contribution and that of those who have gone before you and who have kept alive, through generations in time, this important vocation to search out, collect, protect, conserve, and pass on historical records and documents as part of a written and oral tradition which is embedded like a foundation-stone in every ecclesial community and family. Indeed, it is your daily and often tedious work, carried out in silence and often unnoticed, your loving care and concern, as well as your patience and timely efforts, which has permitted us to even address this issue.

THE PASTORAL FUNCTION OF CHURCH
ARCHIVES

VATICAN CITY, FEBRUARY 2, 1997

COVER OF THE NEW VATICAN DOCUMENT

But why has the Holy See decided to address the topic of the role of archives with a specific document at this particular moment in time? Some will say that in a worldwide society where so many countries are facing major economic crises, and some serious political instability, social issues should be at the centre of attention. Yet we know from our forefathers in the Faith that there is a proper time for everything, a Kairos born from the development of human events and from divine supervision of our spiritual beings. Bearing in mind that numerous reminders have been issued through the ages by the Church regarding the mandatory and fundamental task of diocesan bishops and their community to look after their archive collections in an adequate way - as reported in our document - I believe that developments and attitudes in recent years within our contemporary society have now prompted the Holy See to underline a special concern for this area as a vital part of the Church's pastoral mission. I do not want to sound over-critical of modern society, but I think we can observe objectively one major fault with it: a general lack of knowledge of history which leads to a very superficial interpretation of political and social events. Mass media and technological developments have contributed to shading our daily reality with the ephemeral, the spectacular, a 'use and throw away' mentality. In a society where reproductions of all kinds (forgeries, recyclable materials) are invading a fast-growing and demanding market, where has the value of the authentic and genuine gone?

We who have experienced the joy of receiving a handwritten letter from a distant family member or a dear friend, especially during time of war when communications were difficult, are, I am sure, wondering how these manuscripts will be considered fifty years from now in view of the fast spreading instantaneous messages travelling through our polluted ozone atmosphere and onto our computer screens. What is to become of that pleasure we have all felt as researchers find that lost clue to our quest in the pages of a dusty old volume or by unrolling a precious yet forgotten manuscript? And I am sure that some of you have also experienced finding a parchment or document whose value was completely ignored and saving it from total destruction. With this in mind, I think we can say that there is a real need to strengthen an overall consciousness of the intrinsic value of learning about, conserving, and protecting historical documents, records, and manuscripts within our society in general. And many governments, I am glad to say, are beginning to strengthen their efforts with regard to the conservation and promotion of their national archive collections (as for example in France, Italy and Spain). Within the Church, the tradition of this kind of attention to archival material is also based on theological considerations, some of which I will just briefly mention.

Following the mystery of the Incarnation (the Word made Flesh) whereby God the Father has wanted to entrust His Truth to a history, an experience, a Revelation, the concept of Memory has assumed a very special significance within the Church. Through the words and deeds of our Lord Jesus Christ, who is the source of mankind's Redemption, and as recounted by our forefathers in the Faith and the first Christian communities, man has been called to be a witness of His Memory: 'Do this in memory of me. . . ' as Jesus has said. This also implies that we must perpetuate and translate that Memory and Tradition through time by our own words and especially our actions which, inspired by the Holy Spirit, makes Revelation evolve and unfold continuously. '... I shall ask the Father and he will give you another Paraclete to be with you forever. . . I shall not leave you orphans. . . ' (John 14:16). Thus the attitude of remembering, of fixing that Memory and Tradition, handing it down to future generations, is an intrinsic attitude of the Church because it means unravelling the transitus Domini in human history. It becomes a source of spiritual renewal and growth as the semina Verbi becomes implanted in our soul and intellect.

As important as it is to keep in mind these theological considerations for anyone working with church archives, they also reveal how fundamental it is to consider the pastoral perspective associated with this very view. This is precisely the major concern of our document, as its title implies: The Pastoral Function of Church Archives - in other words, their meaning and practical use within the daily reality of the Church. This same perspective also reflects a more modern and comprehensive definition of what it means to conserve the cultural heritage in general, whereby efforts at conservation are tied to a more general intention of spreading a real awareness in society. As we all know, the Church, throughout her history, has imbued her cultural heritage with a precise didactic function which has its origin in the fundamental concern of perpetuating the Memory and Tradition through the work of evangelization. The Holy Father has insisted time and time again on the need to recover and strengthen this functional role in today's society, precisely within the context of that 'new evangelization' which should increasingly become a primary concern of each particular church as we enter into the Third Millennium. We therefore inserted this particular pastoral aspect within our very definition of 'archives' as 'places of memory of the Christian community and storehouses of culture for the new evangelization.'

And you will find that throughout our document a precise dichotomy has been stressed: conserve but also put into use; protect but also make accessible; store but also display. Before I mention what we consider to be some of the most important points, I want to give you some background information on the nature and iter of the document itself. As a document issued by a dicastery of the Holy See, it must reflect the universal character of the Church. Thus, it must take into account the various situations and conditions faced by the particular churches of every nation around the world. In consulting these types of documents, each particular church must feel that it can identify in some way with the issues and aspects treated.

The drafting procedure usually involves starting out with a very basic text prepared by a small and selected group of experts in the field. This text is then sent out to specialists in various particular churches around the world who are asked to comment, amend and evaluate. According to their feedback, a second draft is prepared and sent out again for evaluation both to the group of experts and the group of specialists. Based on the latter, the final text is then issued. Our document has followed this normal procedure. The specialists selected, some of whom I am glad to say are honorable members of this Society, represented various types of individuals working with church archives: diocesan administrators, clergy, religious, laypeople and historians. To all of them goes my profound gratitude for their precious contribution. Of course, it was not easy to include and synchronize all the suggestions and comments sent in. Let me just say that the finished product which you see here today has represented for us nearly a three-year project. For this reason, while the document intends to touch upon most of the major areas of concern, it does not by any means presume to be a technical handbook (for example, we have at times purposely avoided using a strict technical vocabulary because it would prove to be inapplicable to conditions and situations found in quite a few particular churches in the developing world). And we do not pretend to have covered all issues exhaustively.

The document, as stated in the Introduction, is simply meant to provide each and every diocese and ecclesial community around the world - since it is being sent to each individual bishop as well as religious families - with some general guidelines to deal with common concerns faced today. Furthermore, it is intended to stimulate each diocese and each religious family to concentrate efforts and initiatives on those aspects which better characterize the nature and type of their archive collections as well as their ecclesial community, keeping in mind the need to look after some major and basic issues.

Let me now summarize for you what some of these are. First of all, we have wanted to open up the range of definition of archive collections in order to emphasize their wide variety and types, so that each may receive the due attention it deserves on an equal basis. In addition, special emphasis was placed on the following:

- the importance of maintaining and properly managing the archive for current affairs as well as parish archives;
- the need to gather minor archives together, whenever possible, in order to prevent dispersal and loss of documents, particularly when the original premises have fallen into disuse or are unprotected and unguarded, while carefully recording the original provenance and location;
- the need to entrust the care and management of archive collections to properly trained professionals and make use of the counsel of experts in the field.
- the need to make proper use of the new technological means available in order to conduct systematic and coherent inventory and cataloguing procedures;
- the need carefully to evaluate storage spaces and their suitability and to ensure in them proper protective measures (as for example temperature and atmospheric control, fire prevention, burglar alarms etc.);
- the need to develop a working policy for access, consultation and research;
- the need to make every effort to develop a wide range of outreach activities in order to promote the potential use of archives as part of the pastoral mission of the local Church;
- the need to encourage archivists to remain in contact with and participate in national and international archive associations so that they may receive updated information and professional training offered by these important organizations;
- the need to harmonize efforts and co-operate with national civil entities working in this field so as to make use of their available resources;
- the need actively to involve archives as an instrument of evangelization and catechetical training within the Church but also as an important vehicle of inter-cultural and inter-religious dialogue.

As we mentioned at the end of our text, the document is intended to stimulate a productive dialogue with each particular church so that resulting comments, suggestions and information may work towards strengthening a raising of awareness within every local ecclesial community. When one is more aware and knowledgeable of the value of the material at hand, and is willing, as a responsible member of the Church, to contribute one's energies to the service of the good of the universal Church, then I am sure that in future years we will witness a real renaissance of the Church's cultural heritage founded on a real sense of caring brotherhood which in itself is the best way to evangelize. As our Lord said, 'Love one another as I have loved you, so others will know you are my disciples.' Our document is meant to represent a small step, to provide a stonger stimulus in this direction which we hope will bear good fruits. Initiatives like these - conferences, seminars, regular assemblies - enable an exchange of information and opinion on various pertinent matters applicable to this field of work. The wonderful fraternal spirit of co-operation which is present among you constitutes a truly exemplary and precious contribution which the Church in Great Britain - a country in which there is a strong tradition of archival care and management - continues to make towards the realization of the Holy Father's wishes that the cultural heritage of the Church becomes a primary vehicle to plant our Lord's message in the hearts of each of the faithful.

I say this not as a mere compliment, but based on facts regarding the enthusiastic response we have received in these past few years when we reached out to contact individuals in their own diocese who are working in the field of archives and other areas pertaining to the Church's cultural heritage. Through that project, which we named 'International Information Exchange Network', some of you have made our acquaintance long before this meeting and have contributed a plethora of useful information on your archive collections. This information has been recorded, and continues to be, as we slowly reach all the dioceses around the world. As soon as we reach a good representative amount of data, we will begin phase two, which will invole the actual exchange process.

Some of the comments we have received from you through this project reflect problem areas which are being worked out and discussed in other particular churches. In these past few years, in fact, exciting initiatives have taken place in order to co-ordinate efforts on a national and international level, so as to come up with general criteria as well as to establish data banks as support aids. I am sure that most of you are familiar with the work carried out by your fellow archive associations elsewhere - as for example, and just to mention a few, the ACDA in the United States, national archive associations in Germany, France and Italy, and the International Council of Archives (ICA), an organization affiliated to UNESCO. As you probably know already, a new section has been established within the ICA for archives of churches and religious denominations. As major goals they plan to create provisional educational and publishing programmes, as well as develop a number of archival description projects.

We highly encourage all these initiatives but also those sponsored by individuals in their small communities, often with limited resources. Sometimes it takes just one motivated individual to make all the difference. While our document stresses the need that professionally-trained people be involved and consulted for diocesan and religious archives, we certainly do not want to underestimate the fantastic and precious contribution offered by volunteer groups of archivists (as for example the one working in the Diocese of Syracuse in the United States; and others operating in so many dioceses around the world such as in the Archdiocese of Manila in the Philippines). They carry out their work with a true sense of pride and responsibility but most of all with a really generous and charitable attitude. And I may say that we are highly encouraged in our own work by their and your example.

The efforts carried out by your Society are particularly important. And I want to compliment you for the useful studies and publications you issue - for example, your journal Catholic Archives - the initiatives sponsored by some of your individual members, such as handbooks and guides on entire collections or special ones, as well as seminars on specific areas (e.g. the one for monastic archivists organized not long ago) etc.

As a follow-up to the document we have issued, a document which brings to the fore the pastoral dimension of church archives, maybe each of us can further reflect on how to promote archives within their diocesan or religious community and within their local society overall. For example:

- through a better and closer participation in your Diocesan Committee or Commission for Cultural Heritage, if it exists, and the planning of common projects. If it does not exist, to work towards the establishment of one;

- to intensify outreach initiatives, some especially aimed at the younger generation, in order that the entire local church and civil community may become better aware of your work and the important role played by your archive collection (through descriptive brochures and other material, calendars, posters etc. - issued to commemorate special occasions).

And of course I invite you all to continue to let us know what you are doing - your initiatives, any particular problem areas, specific projects planned etc. The more we share with and support one another, the more productive our efforts will be. Please forgive me if I say that this is the attitude I have wanted to impose on the type of activities carried out by the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church: viz. to be of service to the particular churches, to assist, encourage, and stimulate them to renew their efforts and interest in this important area of the Church's pastoral mission.

As mentioned in the brief Introduction to our document (page 10), we have already issued numerous circulars regarding the importance of cataloguing and inventory procedures for the particular churches in Europe back in 1991; the need to train future priests and religious in the field of the Church's cultural heritage in 1992; and the important role of ecclesiastical libraries in 1994. But this represents just a small part of the work carried out by the Commission since it was founded in 1988. Overall, a total of thirty-five circulars have been sent out during this time, each dealing with a particular concern. Our next project, following The Pastoral Function of Church Archives, will be a document devoted to the methodologies and techniques of inventory and cataloguing applicable to church collections of artistic and historical material.

In addition to this, we have been active in distributing information regarding special initiatives sponsored by individual dioceses to all the episcopal conferences around the world: e.g. training programmes for the protection and conservation of church monuments; seminars on paper conservation etc. As I mentioned earlier, the 'International Information Exchange Network' represents an on-going project. We are in close touch with various international associations, not only archival, but also, for example, FIUC in order to stimulate initiatives within the Catholic university system. In this same realm, back in 1992, our Pontifical Commission sponsored and encouraged the institution of an Advanced Studies Programme in the Cultural Heritage of the Church at the Pontifical Gregorian University of Rome. The Programme has been quite successful and has been offered each year. Other particular churches have followed this through and have launched similar initiatives, e.g. in Portugal and France.

We hold regular contacts and participate in meetings and initiatives sponsored by international organizations active in the field of cultural heritage: e.g. the Council of Europe, UNESCO, CCIC, OCVF etc. All of these activities are to be seen as part of our pledge to spread a world-wide awareness-raising campaign within the Church but also within society as well. This is because Christ's presence through the Church has reached just about all the corners of the earth. Indeed, the primary role of the Church remains a missionary one.

Society can hardly be conceived without a Church to fulfil man's spiritual needs, just as the Church cannot be conceived as detached from society or a social component, and just as man can hardly be conceived deprived of a soul or a body. As St Paul tells us in 1 Corinthians 12:12: 'For as with the human body which is a unity though it has many parts - all the parts of the body, though many, still make up one single body - so it is with Christ. We were baptised into one body in a single Spirit, Jews as well as Greeks, slaves as well as free men, and we were all given the same Spirit to drink. And indeed the body consists not of one member but of many. . . '

Let me propose that we all join forces to apply this model as our model so that each sector of the Church's cultural heritage be completely integrated in one body, articulated by co-ordinated efforts and guided by only one central aim: to bring about the flourishing of His loving and saving Gospel for the Glory of God and at the service of the universal Church.

As a concluding remark, let me say that we have just received a letter from the Holy Father, who had been informed in detail about our document on church archives. In this letter the Pope expresses his enthusiasm and congratulations for this important initiative, and has asked me to inform all those involved in this field of work that he imparts upon each one a very special blessing.

THE ARCHIVES OF MOUNT SAINT BERNARD ABBEY

Brother Jonathan Gell OCSO

LULWORTH

One of the chief areas of special interest in the archives of Mount Saint Bernard Abbey is the collection of records from the present monastery's immediate predecessor at Lulworth, Dorset. Before settling near Coalville, Leicestershire, in 1835, the White Monks, as the Cistercians are often known, returned to these shores in 1794 from Switzerland and took possession of the cottage made famous as the dwelling of the spiritual writer Père Grou. A local Catholic benefactor, Thomas Weld, soon built the monks a group of conventual buildings which resembled La Trappe in miniature. English novices began to enter the community from 1795 and soon the Cistercians of Lulworth had gained both the fame and mystique of a 'Roman' monastery. The monks were very enthusiastic and were devoted to the Trappist reform of Cistercian life, but equally they found great joy and happiness in their austerities.

The Trappistine Nuns also arrived in Dorset and established Holy Cross Abbey, Staphill. The two communities encouraged each other. Lulworth, after confrontation with the government, came to an end in 1817 when the whole community of sixty-four monks returned to France for a number of years. The nuns, however, succeeded in remaining at Staphill and continued to be served by Trappist chaplains. Today the remains of Lulworth monastery are recognised by the County Council, and English Heritage has helped in the preservation of some of the buildings.

MOUNT SAINT BERNARD

The majority of archival holdings refer, naturally enough, to the community's permanent home in Leicestershire. The monks found their way to Charnwood Forest, in 1835. A permanent home was given to them by Ambrose March Phillipps de Lisle and was named 'Mount Saint Bernard.' The first superior, Dom Bernard Palmer, was the first mitred abbot in England since the Reformation. He was a true contemplative and claimed to have learned more from the beeches and the oaks than from books. He was very loyal to the Trappist way of life and taught charity by his deeds, which were sometimes very remarkable.

The buildings at Mount Saint Bernard became a centre of attraction because they represented Augustus Welby Pugin's attempt at a purpose-built monastery keeping to the Cistercian plan around the cloister garth and stressing gothic uplift. Many Pugin scholars and enthusiasts visit the Abbey to this day.

The aristocracy gave a strong lead in popularising the Abbey in the first half of the nineteenth century. In 1851 John Wyse's The Monastic Institute commented: 'There can be few people in England, whether Catholic or otherwise, who have not heard of Mount Saint Bernard Abbey.' Marianne, the Duke of Wellington's sister-in-law, encouraged many of her friends to see for themselves, and Ambrose Phillipps de Lisle's enthusiasm gave rise to house parties of gentry visiting the Abbey regularly.

ECUMENISM

De Lisle is also famous for his startling brand of 'ecumenism' practiced one hundred or so years ahead of its time. With a growing interest in monastic life among devotees of the Oxford Movement, the Abbey became a focus for Anglicans curious to learn more; and in 1841 the whole monastic community at Mount Saint Bernard addressed a remarkable letter to 'the Reverend Clergy of the ancient Anglican Church, residing at Oxford and elsewhere', which included an extremely warm invitation to unity. Moreover, it was through its support for The Association for the Promotion of the Unity of Christendom (A.P.U.C.) - by Masses and prayers - that the monastic community fostered an ecumenical spirit. The second Abbot, Dom Bernard Burder, was himself an Oxford convert and a friend of Newman.

FURTHER LINKS

Mount Saint Bernard had close links with each of the famous 'Three Cardinals'. Wiseman happened to be the local bishop before he moved to London and he opened Pugin's new monastery in 1844. He kept in touch with the community until his death in 1865, and the archives possess a most remarkable account of the cardinal's last days and death written by the nurse who cared for him. Newman too was aware of the coming of the monks to Charnwood Forest before the community actually arrived there, and he was in touch with Dom Bernard Palmer, Dom Ignatius Sisk and Ambrose Phillipps de Lisle before his conversion. Newman enjoyed closer links with Mount Saint Bernard than with any other monastic house. He wrote in 1846, 'The Trappists are wonderful', and he always counted on their prayers.

Lastly, Cardinal Manning first visited the Abbey before his conversion, and as Archbishop of Westminster continued to take an interest in the community.

Nineteenth-century England was fascinated by the prospect of life in the newly-established colony of Australia. The monks of Mount Saint Bernard attempted a foundation in Australia on two occasions, at Gawler in South Australia and then at Kincumber in New South Wales. These ventures were both made by the Woolfray brothers, and failed chiefly on account of Dom Odilo Woolfrey's early death. Mount Saint Bernard also entertained an extraordinary number of the first bishops from Australia when they visited England. The bishops were usually invited to address the monks in Chapter. Indeed, the monastery was well known in secular as well as Catholic circles. Gladstone visited Mount Saint Bernard as Prime Minister in 1873 and Disraeli mentions the Abbey in his novel Coningsby.

The monks also had regard for the local community. Leicestershire was an area of great poverty and the Abbey fed and gave lodging to many people - The Tablet reported that thousands were given such help and Abbot Palmer was especially concerned to assist the needy. The Leicestershire villages were the scene of Father Gentili's apostolic labours and many of his poor converts came to the almshouses at Mount Saint Bernard.

MOUNT SAINT BERNARD ABBEY FROM THE SOUTH

NOTABLE MONKS

Abbot Bartholomew Anderson, the third superior of the community and the longest-reigning Abbot, was a remarkable man from a remarkable family. His background was one of humble origins in Worcestershire, with four brothers entering the monastery at Mount Saint Bernard. Bartholomew was elected Abbot but his three brothers were lay monks.

Dom Anselm Baker was a very well known artist, an expert in heraldry, who pioneered new methods in that field and who became much respected by the College of Arms. In his obituary notice in The Tablet in 1885 his Liber Vitae was described as 'a unique production of the century.'

Henry Collins was a Yorkshireman and a convert Anglican clergyman renowned as a hymnwriter. He continued his literary work as a monk of Mount St Bernard, producing some twenty-six books. He was a founder member of the A.P.U.C. and wrote on the question of Anglican Orders. He was appointed Prior of the community at the age of eighty.

THE ARCHIVES OF THE DAUGHTERS OF THE HEART OF MARY IN BRITAIN

Patricia Vault DHM

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND: FOUNDATION

The Society of the Daughters of the Heart of Mary was brought into existence in 1790 as a result of two contemporary inspirations which were received separately by its two founders, Marie-Adelaide de Cice and Pierre Joseph de Clorivière SJ. These inspirations were then united in one comprehensive plan.

Marie-Adelaide (b. Rennes, 1749) was the first to conceive the idea of this new form of religious life. While still living with her family, she gave herself increasingly to relieving the material and moral miseries of the urban poor. From this attraction, she began to envisage a group of women consecrated by vows of chastity, poverty and obedience and devoted to serving the poor and needy. But contrary to all the restrictions imposed on women religious at that time, they were to wear no kind of religious costume, have no conventual enclosure, retain their own property (though not the free use of it) and keep their secular names. In 1785 she wrote an outline plan for this project. In 1787 she met Father de Clorivière and presented her project to him.

Pierre Joseph de Clorivière (b. St Malo, 1735) entered the Society of Jesus in 1756, making his final vows shortly before the suppression of the Jesuits in 1773. After exile in Belgium and England, he returned to France, was appointed as parish priest of Parame and then rector of a college at Dinan, where he met Marie-Adelaide for the first time.

Meanwhile in France the first rumbles of the Revolution were to be heard and came to a head in 1789. The aims were not only to destroy the old system of government, but also the rights and freedom of the Church. The persecution of the Church included laws which closed monasteries and convents, forbade religious vows and made priests the paid servants of the state. Father de Clorivière refused to take the Civil Oath accepting these measures and for some years went into hiding.

In 1790 Father de Clorivière was inspired by the idea of meeting the extraordinary needs of the time by forming a society of men who would supply for those religious congregations which had been suppressed by the civil power. They would live simply 'in the world', with no distinguishing sign, but consecrated by the three vows of religion. This was to become the Society of the Heart of Jesus.

No sooner had Father de Clorivière sketched out a plan for a society of men than he felt moved to do the same for women. His ideas were similar to those of Marie-Adelaide, but he widened the structure, enabling members to live their religious life with greater flexibility and so be able to insert themselves naturally into any society or culture, even one opposed to Christianity. Marie-Adelaide was happy to recognise her own project and so the Daughters of the Heart of Mary came into being.

On 2 February 1791 Father de Clorivière and five others made their first act of association in Paris and, on the same day, Marie-Adelaide and a small band of women did likewise. Marie-Adelaide was asked to take charge of the female group. This she did, but with some trepidation. Slowly the two societies grew in France, and in 1801 received approval from Pope Pius VII. After the restoration of the Jesuits in 1818, the membership of the male branch dwindled, but exactly a century later it was revived as a secular institute, eventually taking another name. By the 1990s the Daughters of the Heart of Mary had spread to 31 countries. The Anglo-Irish Province was the first to be established outside France and it was from this foundation that missions were opened in India and Pakistan.

THE SOCIETY IN ENGLAND

The first foundation in England was made in 1846 at the instigation of Mme.de Saisseval, the second Superior General. She had fled to England with relatives and friends¹ to escape the Revolution, and when she returned to France in 1800 she retained grateful memories of the generous welcome received across the Channel. There was already in France an English-born member, Lucy Gressier, who had kept in touch with friends at home and who even had a London residence.² It was she who was sent to England to investigate an offer by Rev. John Jones who had property near Hastings which he wished to be used for charitable purposes. Although this offer proved unsuitable, Bishop Wiseman thereupon invited the Society to London itself.

Various addresses emerge at this point, being either the homes of prospective members or rented accomodation. Nothing permanent was found, and thus in 1847 a move was made to Clapham where 8, Old Town was bought as a centre for the community. Here Mass was said, converts were instructed, and help given to the poor. In 1848 the Redemptorists came to Clapham, followed soon after by the Sisters of Notre Dame. It was then that a further address for the Daughters of the Heart of Mary appears: Britannia Square, Worcester, where a Miss Caroline Walsh had started a small Catholic school. After entering the Society she was assisted by other members and the school continued until 1878.

Meanwhile another attempt was made to find a centre in London, this time successfully. Beginning in 1850, houses were bought in Kensington Church Street, Vicarage Gate and Kensington Park Road. St Vincent's Orphanage was opened in 1851 and continued there until 1914. Other works included hostels and classes for girls, a centre for poor men and a hospital visiting society. In all of these works the members continued to remain 'incognito' as religious, keeping their secular names, wearing secular dress, and with many living in their own homes as had been the custom since the foundation of the Society. For this reason, and because many members were engaged in individual apostolates, it is sometimes difficult to identify the principal centres of the community and its works, and all this at a time when membership of the Society was increasing rapidly and the needs to be met were many.

After Kensington the most important centres were:

1851: Hanwell - convalescent home

Preston - teaching, clubs for working girls, prison visiting

1857: Brook Green, Hammersmith - St Mary's Orphanage and (later) residential homes

1863: Central London (various addresses) - aid to refugees and converts, protection of young girls, employment bureau

1896: Westminster - association for young girls

Southwark (107-111, St George's Road) - St Mary's Home for young workers, other social work

1897: Blackpool - centre for aid to discharged prisoners

1900: Rotherhithe - St Margaret's Centre (aid to the poor)

1902: Wapping - Nazareth Society for dockers' families

1908: Liverpool - hostels for working girls and discharged prisoners, Catholic Aid Society, social work in courts

1911: Vauxhall - St Anne's Centre

- 1928: Greenford - Mass centre, teaching etc.
- 1932: Edinburgh - hostel and shelter for girls in need
- 1935: Wimbledon - hostel for girls
- 1936: Bloomsbury - university hostel
- 1944: Warrington - hostel for women, social service centre
- 1966: Kensington (Cottesmore Gardens) - hostel for girls

Most of these were eventually closed according to circumstances, as needs changed or other organizations provided for them.

THE SOCIETY IN IRELAND

The Irish branch of the Province was founded directly from Paris in 1856. The two branches, English and Irish, were united in 1863. Under the initial leadership of Miss O'Farrell the works undertaken grew rapidly, as did the numbers of Irish members, most of whom lived in quite large communities in Dublin and Dun Laoghaire. In Dun Laoghaire a home was opened to care for the orphans of the Famine, and in Dublin there was a centre for Perpetual Adoration (transferred later to the Sisters of Marie Reparatrice), as well as hostels for discharged prisoners and working girls. Dun Laoghaire also saw the establishment of a retreat house, a guest house, a hostel and a primary school.

As in England, some of the Irish works were phased out as time passed. Changes in public policy and a shortage of personnel resulted in the closure of the orphanage, but the use of the building by the Health Board has opened up a fresh apostolate among the elderly mentally handicapped. Similarly the retreat house gave way to prayer groups. The primary school, however, continues to serve the local community, particularly children from deprived backgrounds.

Archives relating specifically to Ireland are kept in Dun Laoghaire. This is due to historical circumstances, convenience, organization and use, and also because Ireland has its own national association of Church archivists. The greater part of our provincial archives is kept in London, but there is a degree of overlap.

THE PROVINCIAL ARCHIVES IN LONDON

The general archives of the Society are kept in Paris where the original writings and correspondence of the founders are to be found, together with artefacts associated with them and documents covering the early history of the Society and its subsequent development.

The foregoing account of the history of the Society in England will give an idea of the scope of the provincial archives in London. There has never been a full-time archivist, but from about 1970 an attempt has been made to collect and organize relevant material. Other problems, apart from the lack of an archivist, have arisen because:

- a) The Provincial House in Wimbledon was destroyed in an air-raid in 1944 with the consequent loss of much archival material.
- b) The 'hidden' nature of the Society in the past has meant that many records of its involvements do not remain in our possession.
- c) Finally, the removal of the Provincial Centre to a much smaller house in 1996 (with all that followed from hurried packing and diminution of storage space). Most of the material is now in some kind of order but little is listed. Several large bankers' boxes are still labelled 'to be sorted'

I suspect that many congregations face these or similar problems, so it may be of some comfort to share our frustration.

The archives are classified as follows:

A: Founders - Biographies and writings by or about the founders

B: Society (General) - History of the Society, Constitutions and related books, Annals vols. I-VI (1790-1935)

C: English/Irish Province - History of the Province, apostolates, old registers (i.e. diaries, council minutes etc. dating from 1847, being a mine of information although not always easily legible), personnel

D: Books - Books written by or about Daughters of the Heart of Mary

E: Chapters and Assemblies - General and Provincial

F: Newsletters - General and Provincial

G: Celebrations - Bicentenary of the Society, other celebrations and special Masses

H: Other Provinces - mainly those which are English-speaking

I: Organizations, Persons and Places - (not Society) i.e. those having links with the Society

J: Audio-Visual Material - Photographs, tapes, films

K: Artefacts

L: Buildings

M: Financial and Legal - Old account books and other records

V: Vocations - Vocation promotion material and records

S: Special Collection - Books, documents and objects of special value or interest. These include e.g. letters written to Lucy Gressier at 12, Maddox Street in 1864, also letters from Cardinals Wiseman and Manning and Father Faber.

USE OF THE ARCHIVES

In practice the use of the archives falls into two categories:

a) requests which come from members of the Society. These are sometimes in preparation for celebrations such as the bicentenary of the Society in 1990 and later the 150th anniversary of the English foundation in 1996. Considerable research was involved in providing English/Irish material for the next volume of the Society's Annals (1935-47). Currently, material relating to Father de Clorivière's year in England (1766-67) is being provided for a 'workshop' taking place in Paris. Finally, the archives are always available for the formation of new members of the Society.

b) enquiries from individuals, parishes and other congregations. These often extend our own knowledge of our history. They can also provide some surprises for the enquirers and to the uncovering of the religious identity of our members who had so strictly remained 'incognito' until comparatively recently.

One such enquiry was initiated by a lady, researching her family history, who had discovered that a certain member of her family had died in St Vincent's Orphanage, Kensington, in 1899 - a fact which led her to us. As she wrote, 'It seemed a slightly odd place for an old lady of 78 to die in.' Our subsequent correspondence and sharing of information revealed that two members of the family had been Daughters of the Heart of Mary: Annette Doyle (b. 1821, first vows 1853) and Anne Conan (b. 1807, first vows 1855). Annette had a favourite nephew, Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, whom she patiently supported through his sad quarrels with the rest of the family³. During the first thirty years of her religious life Annette Doyle lived with her father and brothers, the life of unselfish care of the family which was expected of a single woman at that time. When she was free of her responsibilities she came to live in one of the Society's houses and was able to devote herself more fully to works of charity. Such a life was typical of many of our members in this period.

ANNETTE DOYLE

ADA CAROLINE VERTUE

Another member, unknown as a religious during her lifetime, was Mrs Vertue (Ada Caroline Vertue DHM) who, on the death of her husband, entered the Society. She later became Provincial Superior and eventually gave her house at Grayshott, Surrey, to be used as a retreat centre. Not many people, seeing the photograph which hung in the entrance of the retreat house – a portrait of an impressive old lady in Victorian garb engaged in feeding her poultry – will have guessed that she was a religious. Research into her life developed from an enquiry by a parishioner writing the history of the Grayshort parish.

Enquiries from parishes often arise in connection with the commemoration of the foundation of the parish or the construction of a church in places where our members had first established a Mass centre. Such was the case at Greenford⁴ and at Clapham, and also at Wimbledon, where the Church of the Sacred Heart was built through the benefactions of Edith Arendrup DHM⁶. Other members of the Society whose hidden lives have come to light through parish celebrations have been Kate Looney DHM who, with her friend Elizabeth Twiddy, established St Mary's Orphanage, Hammersmith, in 1857, and Miss Looney's successor, Fanny Wilson.

Other members are better known and their lives are already well documented. Enid Dinnis (Provincial Superior, 1935-42) wrote many books, popular in their day but now rather 'dated'. From time to time suggestions for selective republication and other enquiries reach us, mainly from the United States.

The most fully documented life of any Daughter of the Heart of Mary is probably that of Maude Petre. Indeed, there is now little new material that our archives can supply. She entered the Society in 1890 and was Provincial Superior from 1901 to 1905, but eventually left on account of her involvement with the Modernist movement. Maude Petre's life is covered by her autobiography⁷ and other studies of her thought and writings.⁸ However, we do still receive enquiries relating to her life in the Society and the places where she lived.

Having assumed the care of our archives after an active life in other fields, and being only a very 'part-time' archivist, I am very grateful for the help I have received from other archivists and also through the Catholic Archives Society's publications and conferences. As I work through our collection I am constantly making new discoveries. I would welcome copies of any letters or documents relating to the Society and its works, and would be interested to explore with others the links we find in our respective histories.

NATIONAL ARCHIVES OF IRELAND

The very successful visit of the Catholic Archives Society to Ireland in the summer of 1997 included a tour of the National Archives. By kind permission of the Keeper, Catholic Archives has been able to reproduce some of the 'Reading Room Information' issued to visitors, in the hope that those outside Ireland - in particular members of religious congregations with links to that country - may be encouraged to make use of this rich repository.

GENERAL

In June 1988 the Public Record Office of Ireland and the State Paper Office were amalgamated to form the National Archives. The headquarters of the National Archives is located at Bishop Street, Dublin 8. The National Archives also has premises at the Four Courts, but they are not open to the public. The reading room in the former Public Record Office at the Four Courts closed in August 1992 and the most frequently used archives held there were moved to Bishop Street. The reading room of the former State Paper Office in Dublin Castle closed in December 1990 and the archives held there were moved to Bishop Street. When a reader orders archives which are still held at the Four Courts, they are normally produced in the reading room at Bishop Street at 1.00pm on the following day. Some archives in temporary storage are not available for immediate inspection.

The reading room at Bishop Street is open to members of the public holding a current Reader's Ticket, which can be applied for on the day of their first visit. Readers must observe the Rules for Readers. The reading room is open from 10a.m. to 5p.m. Monday to Friday, excluding public holidays. Archives are produced to readers between 10a.m. and 12.45p.m. and between 2p.m. and 4.30p.m.

THE HUMAN FACE OF ARCHIVES

Sister Pius O'Brien RSM

We celebrated the centenary of St Xavier's Convent of Mercy, Ennis, Co. Clare, in 1954. I was then a novice and was taken aback one day when the Superior handed me the first volume of the Annals and asked me to write a short article for the forthcoming centennial magazine. This was quite a task, particularly as there were many gaps in the entries. In those pre-Vatican II days doing more research on the subject was out of the question, and need I add, my article was not printed.

In the late 1970s I was asked to write the Annals and I then resolved to satisfy my curiosity of some twenty years and probe more deeply into our past. The word 'archives' had not entered my vocabulary at that time. I simply wanted to accompany the early Sisters on a voyage of discovery. What were considered the essentials of our heritage were kept in the safe in the Superior's office. The remainder was stored in presses throughout the convent. These yielded boxes of unsorted material: letters, rentals, rate receipts, accounts, leases, building contracts etc. Sorting it was like doing a giant jig-saw puzzle, but the measure of enjoyment derived from each new morsel of information spurred me on to keep going until the last piece was filed away.

In a timely move in 1990 we engaged a professional archivist, Marianne Cosgrove, who was asked to catalogue our collection. Consequently, when St Xavier's Convent closed in 1994, there was ease of transfer to the new smaller convent where an archives room had been specifically designed. The archives came alive for me in the intervening years as I became acquainted with the Sisters of our past, journeyed with them to various foundations, rejoiced with them in celebrations, sorrowed in their grief, and engaged in dealings with landlords, bishops and builders.

Our Registers are a rich source of information, detailing the birthplace and parentage, as well as the relevant dates, in the life of each Sister. A sociologist would, in fact, find them compelling reading, particularly in the last century when many members of the same family entered in Ennis. Mother Vincent McMahon was the first Superior of St Xavier's, appointed to that position by Mother Elizabeth Moore of Limerick. No fewer than five of her nieces joined her in Ennis, while many of the early Sisters were also from Limerick. Between 1871 and 1884 seventy-six women entered St Xavier's. Why did so many enter at that particular time? Was it regarded as an acceptable way of life for young ladies or did they find the prospect of going on the missions a compelling motive?

Fifty-four Sisters left Ennis in those same years to establish convents in Meriden and Middletown in Connecticut, Singleton in New South Wales, and Hokitika in New Zealand. Theirs was a one-way ticket, and while no mention is made of the pain of departure, a sentence in a letter of later years from one of the pioneers sums it up for me: 'When my soul is on its way to Heaven I shall ask the Lord to let me have one peep in at loved St Xavier's.'

I empathise with Michael and Honoria Molony as they bade goodbye to their only child, Katie, when she went with the founding group to Hokitika. Laura Von Troll, too, left Rattenberg in the Austrian Tyrol to teach German in our Pension School. She entered the community in 1877 and like her Irish Sisters in foreign countries she never forgot her homeland. Her file contains an album of cards depicting the Stations of the Cross with the prayers in German and English. There are also letters in German, some of which are translated as they dealt mainly with inheritance. In one of these she is upbraided for 'forgetting by degrees your beautiful mother tongue', and she is encouraged 'to employ as much time as possible to German lecture' so that she can more effectively teach it.

That particular decade had its sombre side too. Consumption had found its way into the convent and many of the Sisters - for the most part those in their early twenties - succumbed to the ravages of the disease. Yet, I marvel that despite these losses there was never a thought of abandoning the foreign foundations. It seems that these Sisters were in the mould of Catherine McAuley, single-minded in their intent to carry Mercy to the ends of the earth.

A letter from Bishop Redwood of Wellington in April 1878 accepted unreservedly the conditions laid down by Mother Vincent McMahon in making a foundation. They included 'the full exercise of the customs peculiar to your Order, in accordance with your Rule and Constitutions without any interference from Ecclesiastical or secular government.' This request challenged the status quo of the time and displayed courage and a degree of independence which we would expect of religious in post-Vatican II years.

The diaries written on their travels tell us much about the Sisters, giving us in Mother Stanislaus' words, 'the feelings and actions of each day.' They reveal women of quick minds, well versed in languages and interested in the people on board as well as in ports of call and views from the steamer. They sketched the Rock of Gibraltar and the Suez Canal, and painted pen pictures of scenes such as that from the docks in Malta:

We are about 1/4 mile from the shore in what is called the quarantine harbour. Phaetons, foot passengers with umbrellas, bread carts, women with loads on their heads, cars and what seems to be a description of curricule-flat, all before me.

Mrs Grierson, the head stewardess, took them on a tour of the ship, visiting the engine rooms, the kitchen, the bakery and 'immense sheds in which cattle are kept, sheep, black and white, five cows and as for cocks, hens, ducks, turkeys, rabbits, pigeons and canaries etc. they are innumerable.' With modern technology providing cold rooms and freezers, it would not occur to us that a steamer of that time would have to carry its food on the hoof. The passengers certainly enjoyed fresh milk and meat. I wonder how they fared for vegetables?

Two portraits hold pride of place in our new convent. They are of Dean John Kenny and his sister, Catherine. Experts inform me that neither portrait was by a professional but that they were, more than likely, the work of the Sisters.

The stern appearance of the Dean belies the kindly man who invited the Sisters to Ennis and who, throughout his long life, was friend and benefactor to the community. Our museum treasures, among other things, his bible and crucifix as well as a silver jug and bowl presented to him by the parishioners of Kilrush in 1848 when he was transferred to Ennis. When I look at this set I am immediately transported back to Famine times and to Kilrush which suffered more than any other area in the country at the time. Yet in that era of hopelessness, homelessness and starvation these people somehow managed to purchase what they considered an appropriate farewell gift.

From her position on the landing Catherine Kenny, in her Victorian dress, looks out at me with kindly expression, just what I would expect of the gracious lady who visited the Sisters on their first Christmas Day in Ennis to present them with a beautiful silver chalice.

THE FAMINE IN KILRUSH

A ciborium donated later and a collection of plate and 1825 fiddle-pattern cutlery bequeathed to the community serve as a reminder of the gentle Catherine.

Archivists of future years will find our present computerised accounts dull and boring by comparison with those of the past, where figures told their story but were enlivened by the language and even at times (particularly on the acquisition of a house) by a short history of the building. One of the entries in our 1880 ledger reads: 'Arm chairs for the pleasure grounds.' They cost only £5, but language conjures up an age of gracious living, comfort and the luxury of a well laid out old-time garden.

On the other hand I pity poor Dan who built our chapel. He was unfortunate enough to fall foul of the architect who refused to sanction payments to him because of the unsatisfactory quality of his work. Dan became bankrupt, lost his business, and when he sent his final bills to the Reverend Mother he poignantly added: 'Is a poor man like me to suffer this loss through the neglect of a tyrannical architect?'

The complexities and insecurity of the land system are brought home to me as I peruse rentals and leases of the last century. The Sisters were simply tenants at will in their first home in Ennis. The Gale days, 1 May and 1 November, when £25 rent was paid, always posed the threat of termination of the lease. The pages of history are rolled back to the seventeenth century as I read the lease of one particular property. There I meet Brigadier General Gore of Cromwell's army whose faithful service earned him as a reward much of the lands around Ennis. However, all leases were not as simple as that one because very often the property was let and sub-let, a practice which caused many problems when we were buying out the leases and establishing titles in this century.

The main staircase of the new St Xavier's holds a special attraction for me. Displayed there are the illuminated works of the Sisters of the 1880s, a living testament to their talent and a priceless cultural legacy. They encapsulate for me the story of the day to day lives of the Sisters as they depict the horarium of 1894, excerpts from our Rule, days of Benediction and sayings of our Foundress. In the midst of a busy life these artists spent many hours at their craft, but not one of them signed their masterpieces. That they will forever remain anonymous is a source of great regret for me.

In today's world of rapid change and uncertainty I come away from even a short journey through the archives with courage and a sense of hope, because there I have walked with women of zeal whose whole trust was in Providence. Without counting the cost they undertook daunting tasks and never gave in despite difficulties and misunderstandings. I salute these women of our past and express my appreciation of all the Sisters who, down the years, collected and stored the documentation and artefacts which comprise our present archives. They have ensured that we will not fall into the category of people described by Cicero: 'Not to be aware of the past is to remain forever a child.'

THE PRESENTATION SISTERS IN MADRAS

Sister Christine Loughran PBVM

INTRODUCTION

The Presentation Sisters' links with Madras date back to 1842. My own association with our High School there began in 1945. I am one of the early vocations from the Presentation Convent School at Matlock, Derbyshire - a community founded in 1927 from India in order to encourage missionary vocations for that sub-continent¹. I taught in Madras until I returned to England in 1970, but in 1983 I visited India again while on sabbatical. Since I knew the Archbishop of Madras-Mylapore, I asked him if I could browse among his historical books, papers and records to see if I might find some mention of our early Sisters.

OUR PIONEERS

The story of the opening of the Presentation Mission in Madras begins with the convents at Maynooth and Rahan. Sisters from these houses were the first to volunteer to go to India, with Mother Francis Xavier Curran of Rahan as their first Superior. The Maynooth convent gave three professed Sisters to the venture, and it is to its credit that five of its members worked in Madras during the first twenty years of the foundation. A fifth member of the pioneering group was a young postulant from Kilkenny. Together with Dr John Fennelly, a Maynooth priest who had been appointed Vicar Apostolic of Madras, they sailed for India aboard The Lady Flora in September 1841. Bishop Fennelly had visited Rahan and Maynooth in search of Sisters to work in Madras.

There were many joys and sorrows during those early years. Perhaps the first disappointment was when one of their number, Sister Ignatius Healy, decided that the climate and conditions were more than she could bear. After just thirteen months Sister Ignatius, with permission from Bishop Fennelly, 'removed' to the convent in Calcutta.

The Loreto Sisters from Rathfarnham had sailed to India at about the same time as the Presentation Sisters, but their voyage was faster and they reached Calcutta two weeks before our own Sisters reached Madras. Dr Carew, the Vicar Apostolic of Madras, had been translated to Calcutta, and under his firm hand the Loreto Sisters functioned with great difficulty in their new mission. Sister Ignatius had surely met Bishop Carew when he visited Maynooth to look for Sisters for India. There was thus no hesitation in her application to transfer to a convent under his jurisdiction. The Loreto annals refer to the event as follows: 'The nuns accomodated themselves to the vagaries of the Bishop's policy. . . The Bishop insisted on their accepting candidates for the Noviceship whom the Superior considered quite unsuitable. The first was a professed nun of another institute who had come up from Madras and asked to be transferred to Loreto.' Sister Ignatius Mealy was professed as a Loreto Sister but lived only for six more years. Her death is recorded in the Loreto annals in 1849.

A second great hardship for the small band of Presentation Sisters in Madras was the untimely death of their Superior, Sister Mary Regis Kelly, who succumbed to cholera in July 1844 aged only thirty-three. Two years later the Sisters buried a second pioneer, Sister Martha Kelly. This was a great blow to the small community, but fortunately help was at hand with the arrival of a second party of Maynooth nuns in February 1844. Mullingar came forward in 1850 with more Sisters to help the struggling mission, and in 1880 the Limerick convent joined the Indian venture, followed by Kilcock in 1890.

These pioneers are indeed the unsung heroines of the Presentation Convents of Ireland who risked everything to spread the Gospel in distant parts. There was no hope of return to their native land. Theirs was the supreme sacrifice. Dr Fennelly was a courageous man who needed nuns to open schools for neglected Catholic children, many of whom were orphans of Irish soldiers and Indian mothers. Details of the journeying and arrivals of these nuns are given by Dean Hutch in Nano Nagle: Her Life, Her Labours and Their Fruits, a volume which celebrated the first centenary of the foundation of the congregation in Cork.

MADRAS SCHOOLS

Among my discoveries was a set of records giving details of the schemes of work followed by each teacher in her classroom in 1867 - even the pages of the textbook to be studied are given - and the examination results in 1869. These papers give an invaluable insight into what was then taught in English medium schools to orphans and the Anglo-Indian children of the English and Irish soldiers stationed in Madras. The results, published in The Madras Catholic Directory, reveal the high standards achieved, and I was particularly fascinated by an account given in The Madras Mail of the examination results and prize-giving.

In an era when there was the practice of payment by results, we gather from the long list of Premium Awards that the school fees of many of the pupils would have been paid by the government. Block grants would have helped the Sisters to cope with financial worries which must have posed continuous problems for them. The results were definitely gratifying.

During the years these results were attained Mother Francis Xavier Curran would not have been teaching because by then she was a great age. She would, no doubt, have played an active part behind the scenes, for she was at that time Mother Assistant to Reverend Mother Ignatius Murphy, herself a member of the Mullingar community, who was responsible for the Presentation Schools in Blacktown, Madras.

The School Inspectors at this time were all English, graduates of British universities, and selected for their excellence in the field of education. There were many applicants for these well-paid colonial posts. Most of them would have been non-Catholics with little sympathy for those engaged in Catholic missionary work, but they were nevertheless just and fair in their work, and did not fail to recognise and approve of the complete dedication of the Presentation Sisters.

The nineteenth-century method of conducting examinations may come as a surprise to teachers today. The tests were both written and oral, and covered all classes from the youngest to the oldest children. The curriculum was wide and the standard expected high. The oral examination took place in the presence of the bishop, priests, parents and School Inspectors, and must have been a daunting experience especially for the younger teachers. The high standard of music attained reflects the talent of Anglo-Indian children.

CONCLUSION

The Presentation Sisters now have an Indian Province with more than two hundred Indian members. There are very few Europeans attached to the Province. The study of the archives of the Archbishop of Madras-Mylapore has revealed just how important a contribution the Sisters have made to the progress of education in India. As our Indian Sisters look back to their roots, Rahan, Maynooth, Mullingar and Limerick are known and loved by them.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH AND THE 1944 EDUCATION ACT: MATERIAL IN THE PUBLIC RECORD OFFICE

John Davies

INTRODUCTION

Whilst working on a number of articles on the Catholic Church and the 1944 Education Act¹, I found a wealth of material in the Public Record Office at Kew. I prepared a working calendar/rough guide to the material which I offer here in the hope that it may be of value to others. It could also be argued that some record of this material should be easily accessible in the Catholic domain. At Kew there are four files which record the negotiations between the Board of Education and the Catholic Church from May 1941 - when the Catholic authorities made their first response to the Board's Green Book on educational reform - until July 1944: Ed 136-271 (discussions over the Green Book proposals, May 1941 to January 1942); Ed 136-226 (October 1941 to April 1943); Ed 136-412 (July to December 1943, with Archbishop Downey of Liverpool taking a leading role during the vacancy at Westminster following the death of Cardinal Hinsley); and Ed 136-458 (January-July 1944, by which time Archbishop Griffin had been appointed to Westminster and had taken charge of affairs).

ED 136-271

- Catholic Hierarchy and Catholic Education Council (hereafter CEC) to Board of Education (hereafter BOE), 21 May 1941: request for deputation to meet President of Board to respond to Green Book.
- Bishop William Brown (Pella) to Cleary (BOE official), 20 May 1941: agreed syllabus might satisfy Anglicans but not Catholics.
- CEC to BOE, 29 May 1941: re-date for deputation; memorandum enclosed.
- BOE comment on CEC memorandum, 25 June 1941: admission that Catholics were already unable to shoulder the burdens of voluntary elementary schools. Plea for further aid. Likelihood that deputation will press for adoption of Scottish system (whereby voluntary schools were funded by Education Authority); arguments against this.
- CEC deputation, 13 June 1941: presented memorandum stressing burden of expenditure on schools and poverty of Catholic community. Sympathised with BOE's attempt to establish national education on 'a definitely Christian basis.'

- BOE, 25 June 1941, report of meeting with CEC deputation (13 June): Hinsley wanted full equality for Catholics, who should have a say in any reform of the dual system. Brown saw a gloomy future for Catholic schools. Sir John Shute M.P. (Liverpool Exchange) asked for guarantee that damaged schools would be rebuilt after the war. Lord Rankeillour advocated Scottish system while R.A. Butler (President BOE) thought nothing would be settled without the 'advice of the religious bodies'. Scottish system could not be adopted because of different conditions. Appreciated difficulties of Catholics but more aid would mean more control. Catholics would benefit from transfer of all children over eleven to secondary schools.
- Note by Butler, 7 November 1941: account of meeting with Hinsley, who was disturbed by Green Book's raising of 'the whole religious question.' Butler assured him that Green Book was in no sense government policy. Hinsley asked for another Catholic deputation, to include Bishop Brown and Mgr Vance (Westminster), to meet BOE. Hinsley was concerned that suspended Catholic proposals under 1936 Act would still qualify for grant aid and sought continuation of Catholic teaching without interference. Catholics wished to stay in state system.
- Note by Butler, 19 November 1941: Account of meeting with Vance, who called Green Book 'a shame and iniquity.' Catholics could not afford to build new schools and Green Book ruled out capital grants for such. Butler said plan was fairer to Catholics than any other which could be devised. Had Vance assessed the value to Catholics of the aid for maintenance offered by the Green Book? He assured Vance that the Green Book had not 'torpedoed' 1936 Act. Vance rejected suggestions about wealth of Catholic community, which could not reorganise to the extent wished by government. Butler concluded that Vance was influential with Hinsley and was determined to obtain extra state grants for Catholic schools. It was important that England's 4m Catholics 'should be carried along with us.'
- Sir Maurice Holmes (Secretary of BOE) to Butler, 21 November 1941: comment on Butler's meeting with Vance. Green Book attempted a 'permanent solution', which, as a matter of practical politics, could not include capital grants to non-provided schools. Drew Butler's attention to opposition to concessions to Catholics. Butler noted: 'In so far as raising the age and the difficulties of reorganisation will still be a problem, the R.C.s have a case.'

- BOE, 25 November 1941: report of meeting with Bishops' Committee of CEC. Re-Green Book, Brown saw three issues as predominant, viz. character of religious instruction in schools, appointment of teachers, and provision of adequate buildings. Vance regarded the printing and issue of Green Book a dangerous precedent. Its proposals for children at 11+ were wholly unacceptable. Catholics could not afford to build new secondary schools. Impossible on financial grounds for Catholics to accept Green Book. Mgr Traynor (Liverpool) re-Liverpool Education Act 1939: had adopted new principle. LEA could provide accomodation for denominational bodies in return for rent. Act could be extended nationwide. Butler: fortunate that negotiations were confidential for 'the publication of some of the statements. . . would hurt the Catholic cause. . . ' Would need time to study representations. Holmes: Green Book was a new departure insofar as it had been printed as an economy measure. It proposed definite offer of financial help for denominational schools. J. Chuter Ede (Parliamentary Secretary): Catholics at 11+ in provided schools would be able to receive Catholic religious instruction. Vance considered this insufficient: Catholics wanted their own secondary schools.
- Brown to Holmes, 29 November 1941: 'Since Tuesday I have been thinking over the incident at the deputation and I feel I should tell you it was quite unexpected by the other members.' Had always had good relations with BOE.
- Holmes to Brown, 2 December 1941: puzzled by reference to 'incident'. Must refer to Vance's attack on Holmes for printing Green Book. Had not marred good relations between BOE and Catholics. Wondered whether proposals on secondary education were so disadvantageous as deputation seemed to think. Enlarged on proposals for financing new 'modern' secondary schools.
- Note by Holmes, 16 December 1941: report of meeting with Brown. Discussed appointment of Catholic teachers and Holmes' suggestions for financing secondary schools. Butler and Chuter Ede noted these developments with interest but Ede doubted whether Brown's influence in Catholic community was as great as ten years ago.
- Brown to Holmes, 18 January 1942: suggests writing to Viscount Southwell (Chairman, CEC) re-his proposals for financing secondary schools but without referring to his meeting with Brown.

- Holmes to Brown, 20 January 1942: could not write to Southwell out of the blue.
- Brown to Holmes, 21 January 1942: reluctantly agrees his name can be used in any letter to Southwell but hopes 'there will be no broken china.'
- Holmes - Draft letter for Butler to Hinsley: had met the Archbishop of Canterbury and advisers about Green Book. Did not wish to hurry Catholic deliberations but would be happy to meet Hinsley and his colleagues as soon as 'you think the time is opportune.'

ED 136 - 226

- Hinsley to Chancellor of the Exchequer (copy: date?) protest at cost to Catholics of Green Book proposals. Would end dual system.
- Note by Holmes, 23 October 1941: Hinsley's protest premature. BOE in no way committed by Green Book.
- Note by Butler, 27 November 1941: report of meeting with Major Desmond Morton (Prime Minister's Office), a useful contact on Catholic matters. He was impressed by Green Book.
- Hinsley to Butler, 11 June 1942: had arranged full meeting of Hierarchy for 24 June on education question.
- Butler to Hinsley, 22 June 1942: re-meeting that day. Glad to confirm Hinsley's impression that BOE wanted to continue (revised) dual system to suit the necessities of the day. Butler would avoid hurried discussion. Requested collaboration of Hinsley and his colleagues, but there could be no indefinite delay.
- Hinsley to Butler, 23 June 1942: convinced of his sympathy and good will.
- Note by Butler, 25 June 1942: report of meeting with Hinsley at Buntingford (Archbishop of Westminster's country house) after Hierarchy meeting of 24 June. Hinsley wanted Catholics included in state system and did not want Catholic children disadvantaged, nor Catholics to delay educational reform. Would appoint small group to negotiate with BOE. Catholics '... desire to be as closely associated to the state as possible in order, presumably, to get as much money as possible.' Afternoon discussion (Butler, Hinsley, Mgr Elwes) on financial resources of Church. Butler referred to money spent on Liverpool Cathedral. Hinsley disapproved of Liverpool plan as financially unsound. Hinsley said Church urgently needed financial help for educational development. Raised question of existing secondary schools run by religious orders.

- Chuter Ede to Butler, 26 August 1942: Butler's meeting with Hinsley had brought problems into focus. Uneasy that only one layman, Rankeillour, likely to be member of Catholic delegation. Recommended J.T. Tinker, M.P. as a member.
- Butler to Hinsley, 27 August 1942: would meet Catholic delegation on 11 September. In national interest to find solution. Suggests Tinker and Shute join delegation.
- Note by Cleary, 10 September 1942: discusses possible ways of including Catholics in state provision. Could not see Catholics conceding greater powers to LEAs. Did not think 50% grant proposal sufficient to put Catholic schools right and carry out reorganisation.
- Paper by J. Williams (BOE Official) for Butler: Catholic schools and dual system. 60,000 extra places would be needed for secondary children in post-war period. Catholics would find difficulty in raising 50% required of them. Threat of controlled status and syllabus teaching would, however, be a potent spur. Liverpool Act not a solution as it failed to relieve churches of burden of raising large capital sums in limited time.
- BOE Note, 7 September 1942: summary of position and proposed rough lines of policy re-Catholic secondary schools. Useful to obtain Catholic view of financial position of religious orders and attitude towards system of aid via LEAs on terms envisaged in dual system proposals.
- Note by Williams: Catholic secondary schools. 1936 Act a recognition that public authorities could no longer remain indifferent to condition and adequacy of denominational school buildings. Discussion of Direct Grant system, possible changes and likely response of Catholics. Disadvantage of Direct Grant to state.
- Note by Butler: Draft to be put to Catholic delegation. Outlines scheme. Two alternatives for Catholic elementary schools, viz. 1) controlled; 2) voluntary. Under second alternative managers of non-provided schools would keep all existing rights and privileges while halving their statutory liability.
- BOE report, 15 September 1942: re-meeting with Catholic delegation. Archbishop Amigo (Southwark) said Catholics would continue to make sacrifices to have children taught in Catholic atmosphere by Catholic teachers. Bishop Flynn (Lancaster) deplored fact that Catholics were forced to fight perpetual rearguard action. Rankeillour said Catholics wanted to be part of homogeneous state education system. Brown favoured something on lines of Scottish system. It was hopeless to assume Catholics could find money for school buildings. He suggested conference of all interested parties but did not think confidential conversations furthered agreement. Butler thought understanding could emerge from private talks and form basis for joint conference. He was impressed by Catholic insistence on being part of state system and set out alternatives of controlled or voluntary status. Brown believed second alternative to offer Catholics less than the first offered Anglicans. Chuter Ede thought the offer of 50% grant courageous on part of Butler. Amigo said Catholics felt they were being penalised for their conscience. Butler replied that Church of England was giving up much under first alternative and that he must be even-handed in treatment of denominations. Many currents were running against denominational schools. Amigo said 50% grant was a help but not enough. Would higher grant be forthcoming if Catholics yielded on appointment of teachers? Shute raised the question of replacement of voluntary schools destroyed by enemy action. Butler spoke about Catholic secondary schools. Brown said that some religious orders were very short of funds.

- Butler to Amigo, 16 September 1942: Outlines alternatives 1) and 2). Anxious to help Catholics but had to be 'realist.' No hope of carrying through a policy of 100% grant while leaving school managers their present powers.
- Hinsley to Butler, 3 November 1942: response to telephone call from Butler after letter from Hinsley had appeared in The Times. Hinsley had assumed Butler's proposals as outlined to Amigo (16 September) were not absolutely definite and not intended for the public. His main reason for publishing the letter was to allay Catholic uneasiness caused by T.U.C. resolution at Blackpool conference.
- Butler to Hinsley, 3 November 1942: Hinsley right to assume Butler's proposals were not definite and thus not intended for public. 'It is our desire to do our best for your schools within the framework of our homogeneous plan.'
- Sylvia Goodfellow (BOE Official) to Morton, 7 November 1942: Butler appreciates offer of help in working with Catholics. Butler expected Hierarchy's reply to his proposals.

- Morton to Goodfellow, 9 November 1942: As Anglican convert to Catholicism he was glad to be of service. He knew most of the Catholic clerics involved in discussions 'and do not close my eyes to their shortcomings when they exist.' Bishops believed in Butler's sincerity but doubted whether government really understood 'their outlook in matters of principle.' Did not think Catholics were being well served in negotiations. Should appoint one negociator to speak for all and avoid confusion. Amigo was too old for this task.
- Cleary to Butler, 11 November 1942: report on telephone conversation with Elwes re-delay in Catholic response to Butler proposals. Reply approved at Bishops' meeting three weeks ago. Delay due to muddle on part of Amigo 'who was now getting a very old man.'
- Amigo to Butler, 12 November 1942: reply to proposals. Alternative 1) unacceptable as it would 'destroy Catholic character of our schools.' Careful consideration given to 2), which would leave Catholics with unsupportable burden. Recognised proposal was an unprecedented step 'towards a sympathetic appreciation of our needs' but would leave Catholics with 100% burden for new schools, and the grant of only 50% for cost of repairs, alterations and improvements nullified the offer 'as a practical basis of co-operation.' Bishops hoped government would amend offer. 'While not abating our claim to that full support which we consider to be our right we are eager to co-operate with the Government in any scheme which will help all the interests concerned, be acceptable to the country as a whole, and at the same time enable us to give our children the best possible education in that Catholic atmosphere which our conscientious conviction demands'.
- Morton to Butler, 18 November 1942: Had discussed bishops' response with Brown. Thought it was 'over simplified'. Conceded that dispute with government was 'financial', not 'doctrinal.' Claimed Catholics still had a card or two to play but had not indicated what these were. Hinsley's Times letter had been prompted by T.U.C. Bishops would have appointed a single negociator if doctrinal matters had been involved but, as it was, it was to their advantage to 'keep things nebulous.'
- Note by Holmes, 23 November 1942: report of meeting with Brown. Amigo's letter of 12 November drafted by Flynn. Brown thought it 'incomplete and indeed jejeune.' Had wanted full statement of Catholic difficulties. Hinsley had decided against elaboration of Flynn's draft after hearing Butler was disturbed at delay. Brown compared treatment of Catholics and Anglicans, restated Catholic opposition to 'syllabus', and discussed possible Catholic concessions on appointment of teachers in return for further concessions. Holmes thought Brown was anxious to find solution, not pursuing wrecking tactics, and suggested possibility of raising grant to 60% and revival on generous scale of 1936 Act.

- Note by Butler, 25 November 1942: account of meeting with Amigo, who had apologised for delay in response to proposals. Accepted government offer was an advance, but Catholic community was poor and could not bring schools to standard envisaged by government on 50% grant. No question of doctrine, merely 'ways and means.' Butler restated promise of review of Catholic schemes under 1936 Act. Amigo had always hated this Act because it involved dependence on goodwill of LEAs, and had suggested Labour was better disposed to Catholics than Conservatives. Butler thought this view was outdated and discussed possible extension of definition of the term 'maintenance.'
- Note by Holmes, 27 November 1942: re-'repairs, alterations, improvements.'
- Note by Butler: 'The clean way is to extend the 36 Act to cover improvements and alterations as well as reorganisation.'
- Note by Holmes, 4 December 1942: 1936 Act already covered 'alterations and improvements.'
- Note by Chuter Ede, 7 December 1942: report of meeting with Brown on cost of bringing Catholic schools up to standard. Pastoral letters of some bishops unhelpful. Brown indicated they were directed at T.U.C. Chuter Ede again pressed that Tinker be a member of Catholic delegation.
- Note by Chuter Ede, 8 December 1942: report of meeting of Hinsley and Arthur Greenwood (Labour leader in Commons). Hinsley had pressed for revival of deferred 1936 Act schemes. Catholics needed financial help to maintain their schools. Had assured Greenwood that the Times letter was because of T.U.C. attitude and not attack on Labour. Greenwood was prepared to meet Brown and agreed Tinker a suitable person to be involved in negotiations.
- Note by Chuter Ede, 2 January 1943: report of meeting with Brown (1 January). Surprised to hear Vance talking of denominational technical schools. Brown was interested to know how Anglicans would settle. Chuter Ede concluded Brown would not like Catholics to be blamed for wrecking settlement but feared 'some of his colleagues in the Hierarchy may be less unwilling to accept responsibility.'

- Amigo to Butler, January 1943: report of meeting of Committee for the Catholic Schools chaired by Downey (7 January). Decided against any 'agreed syllabus', demanded 100% grant: 'We cannot let Catholic children be penalised on account of their religion.' Amigo wanted BOE to meet Committee.
- Note by Butler, 15 January 1943: report of a meeting requested by Hinsley, who had always wanted to negotiate directly with Butler. No progress being made. Butler surprised at Amigo's reference to 100% grant ('unrealistic'). No attempt by government to impose 'syllabus'. Butler confused by emergence of new Catholic Committee chaired by Downey. Hinsley referred to his recent ill-health. Downey was deputising. Suggested that Brown's and Chuter Ede's discussions continue to supplement any negotiations between BOE and new Committee. Hinsley asked whether 75% grant was a possibility. Butler replied that there was no question of exceeding 50% for repairs etc., but might give some help to 1936 schemes. Butler said pastoral letters might give impression that Catholics wished to stand in way of progress. Hinsley said pastorals were directed at T.U.C.
- Note by Chuter Ede, 19 January 1943: meeting with Brown at which latter produced estimates from some dioceses of cost of BOE proposals. He thought Church of England had prejudiced its position by suggesting 'syllabus instruction' as basis of instruction in church schools.
- Note by Chuter Ede, 27 January 1943: meeting with Brown, who produced estimate for Southwark. Only Liverpool and Lancaster now outstanding. Brown disturbed by Downey's arranging of delegation to meet BOE on 3 February. Had not invited all 16 members of committee. Rankeillour, David Logan M.P. (Liverpool, Scotland) and representatives of nuns excluded. Logan informed Chuter Ede that after indignant telegram to Downey he had been included. Chuter Ede suggested to Brown that Tinker should be a member.
- Catholic Deputation to BOE, 3 February 1943: Amigo stated need for 100% grant. Flynn said Catholics would not be able to raise their 50% and asked re-possibility of interest free loan. Downey thought 1936 Act had not been fully effective, with voluntary schools left to 'tender mercies of a Local Authority like Liverpool.' Bishop of Clifton said grant should be raised above 50%. Shute believed Catholics were prepared to make concessions on appointment of teachers. Logan also thought the 50% grant insufficient. Vance said there was alarm and concern in Catholic community over secondary schools. Mrs Bower (U.C.M.) said that, in asking for provision of schools out of public funds, Catholics were asking nothing more than their due. Downey believed Catholics unable to raise 50% and hinted at Scottish system. Butler informed the meeting that there was no possibility of 100% grant. He would welcome memorandum on direct grant schools. Grant aided schools could be treated in the same way as elementary schools under second alternative. Flynn thought Catholics were being asked to bear impossible burden.

- Hinsley to Butler, 15 February 1943: Butler may have misrepresented his views to deputation. Wished to remove any ambiguity over his attitude to proposals. Accepted complexity of Butler's task, but that should not be construed as approval of government plans. Catholics were in justice entitled to equal treatment with other sections of community; they were willing to make sacrifices for conscience sake, but there was a limit. Government's financial offer inadequate. Proposals re-new schools meant Catholics would be squeezed out of new system. Bishops did not accept a Bill which discriminated between citizens, penalising religious convictions of Catholics. Hinsley anxious to avoid revival of controversy but Agreed Syllabus religion was as denominational as any church programme of instruction. Catholics should have right and financial assistance to establish new schools where population justified them.
- Butler to Hinsley, 17 February 1943: had investigated issues raised by deputation and had done nothing privately to deputation nor publicly to compromise Hinsley's position. When meeting delegation had merely referred to conversations with Amigo and Hinsley, and was fully aware of Catholic position, which demanded full cost to be borne by state without any restrictions on Catholic liberty within schools. Did not accept that Anglicans were receiving better treatment than Catholics.
- Note by Butler, 18 February 1943: report of meeting with Mrs Bower. Downey had prompted and probably drafted Hinsley's last letter. She and other members of deputation did not believe Butler had misrepresented Hinsley. Mrs Bower said doctrinal teaching essential if Catholic position on family and birth control to be maintained. Butler should provide loans for new schools. Butler referred to 1936 Act in cases of population transfer: 'I think we should keep our minds elastic here on the subject of loans.' Bower said northern bishops had been instructed by Hinsley to give series of six sermons on attacks on their schools.

- Richard Stokes M.P. to Butler, 5 March 1943: requests meeting of Editor of Catholic Herald with Butler and Chuter Ede, as newspaper was only really independent Catholic journal and had taken strong line on educational questions. Comments in several hands on above. Stalling response.
- Note by Chuter Ede, 9 March 1943: meeting with Brown re-Anglican attitudes to BOE proposals which, Chuter Ede thought, Downey misrepresented in Universe article (5 March), wrongly suggesting they were financially less satisfactory than 1936 Act. Brown to inform Chuter Ede of results of meeting of Downey's committee (11 March).
- Robert Mathew (Secretary, CEC) to Goodfellow, 15 March 1943: enclosed memorandum on secondary schools agreed (12 February) by representatives of convent schools and Catholic colleges, laying down principles and making proposals for grammar, independent, multilateral and technical schools, 11+ transfer and direct grant.
- Note by BOE, 17 March 1943: G.G.Williams (BOE official) asked to draft reply to above.
- Morton to Butler, 31 March 1943: meeting with Brown, who said Catholics, while recognising Butler's goodwill, united in conclusion that they are unable to accept 50% proposal. Claimed Labour leaders, as trustees of working class children (majority of Catholic children in this category), prepared to go beyond 50%.
- Chuter Ede to Butler, 1 April 1943: had met Greenwood to explore Brown's claim that Labour not content with Catholics receiving only 50%. Greenwood denied such conversation had taken place. Brown may have spoken with Stokes and Cove but no one speaking for Labour made promises. Greenwood finding difficulty persuading Labour to agree to 50%.
- Deputation of Education Committee of Catholic Hierarchy (?date): discussion of Catholic memorandum on secondary schools. Butler's response 'profoundly unsatisfactory' No financial help for new grammar schools, grant for existing ones insufficient, parental rights only partly taken into account, only non-Catholic schools offered for technical education. Cases of conscience had not been met. Further discussion of technical schools and provision of new schools: Abbot of Downside said, 'Catholics wanted to help Butler and work in harmony with him but they could not be expected to do that on the terms proposed. . . Unless Roman Catholics got a square deal there was nothing to expect but a bitter fight.' Butler said ' . . . no question about the government's desire to maintain Roman Catholic schools. . . aim was to ensure complete liberty to Roman Catholics in their schools of conscience, teaching and doctrine.' Question of ways and means. All denominations had to be treated alike. Difficult to secure all round agreement except on basis of proposals such as BOE's. For secondary education BOE aimed to secure 'social equality of choice.' Thus it was necessary to secure approximation of conditions in modern, technical and secondary schools. Butler promised to examine secondary school transport. In 'industrial areas' Catholic secondary schools could be developed with a technical bias. Brown replied that many Catholic schemes under 1936 Act had been affected by Blitz and population movements. Butler was prepared to discuss ways of dealing with this and Chuter Ede welcomed Vance's support for multilateral schools. General discussion on agreed syllabus and likely cost to Catholics of extension of secondary education. Butler concluded: 'There was no desire to penalise Roman Catholics but there was no hope of getting state money for denominational teaching.'

BOOK REVIEW

Starting An Archives by Elizabeth Yakel (The Society of American Archivists & The Scarecrow Press, 1994, pp.99: £23.75 available from Shelwing Ltd, 127 Sandgate Rd, Folkestone, Kent CT20 2BL).

This book is 'designed for institutional administrators, archivists and record managers thinking about beginning a historical records program in their organization', and largely addresses the theoretical and practical considerations involved in establishing one. Even so, it covers almost all aspects of archive administration and provides salutary reading for all practising archivists, especially for those in our own Society who have had to start from scratch with few resources and limited vision.

Dr Elizabeth Yakel, an experienced American professional archivist and consultant, who, incidentally, has contributed two articles to this journal, uses American models throughout the book, but the archival advice given is of universal application. An archival programme must encompass three definitions of archives, namely the actual records themselves, the agency responsible for them, and the place where they are preserved. Initial plans must thus satisfy such factors as what records are to be collected, the administration of the agency, the physical conditions of record preservation, and the ongoing support for the archives. The programme must likewise be strong enough to outlast the initial reason for its establishment by showing that it can be an integral part of the institution and contribute to its overall mission, and not become just 'an executive broom closet.'

The book covers the decision-making process before an archival programme is begun, the first steps to be taken, and describes fully the basic functions of an archives, including archival administration, collecting policy, appraisal, records management, arrangement, description, outreach, preservation and the planning of facilities. The book's format, layout, sequence of and sectional divisions within chapters, clear language and a good index make it easy to use as a manual. American readers will derive much help from a bibliographical chapter identifying useful further reading on most of the topics covered, an aid which our Society might conveniently provide for its own members.

Dr Yakel's personal credit is sufficient guarantee of the merit of the book but, additionally, it has the warranty of publication by The Society of American Archivists, and is among the best handbooks on archival theory and practice published in recent years.

THE CATHOLIC ARCHIVES SOCIETY CONFERENCE, 1997

The eighteenth annual conference of the Society was held at Upholland Conference Centre, Wigan, from 26 to 28 May.

The first talk at this year's conference was given by Mrs Valerie Bonham who has spent fourteen years working on the history of the Anglican community of St John the Baptist at Clewer. Her trilogy of books on the Clewer sisterhood has involved much research in the community's archives. Likewise the second speaker, Dr Margaret Thompson, shared many of her experiences in studying the archives of women religious in the United States. She had a number of very helpful suggestions concerning the ways in which religious congregations might develop their archival holdings.

The Tuesday morning of the conference began with Anna Watson of the Lancashire Record Office speaking about Catholic records kept in that repository. The wealth of material housed at the L.R.O. represents a very significant portion of English Catholic heritage. Her talk was followed by the address given by Archbishop Marchisano, President of the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church. His talk encompassed a commentary on the Commission's recent document (The Pastoral Function of Church Archives) as well as a personal testimony to the importance of the archivist's work in the Church. After Mass, at which the chief celebrant was the Most Reverend Patrick Kelly, Archbishop of Liverpool, the afternoon was given over to a visit to the Talbot Library and St Walburghe's Church, Preston.

The conference also included another very useful 'Open Forum', at which the following topics were among those discussed: the work of the Catholic Record Society; the future of the Catholic Central Library; the history of Oscott College; the CAS Directory and other publications; training sessions. The 1998 conference will take place at High Leigh Conference Centre, Hoddesdon, Hertfordshire, from 25 to 27 May.

EDITORIAL NOTE

The full text of Archbishop Marchisano's address may be found on pages 3ff of this edition of Catholic Archives. A summary of each talk given at the 1997 conference appears in CAS Bulletin no.19 (Autumn 1997).

EDITORIAL NOTES

The present edition of Catholic Archives, being the last before the new Millennium, seeks to look to the past and very much to the future. The world of the archivist is always a blend of both past and future.

The past is very well represented in the articles by Edward Walsh on Father Tuomey and Dr John Davies in the conclusion to his previous contribution (Catholic Archives 18) on material in the Public Record Office relating to the Catholic Church and the 1944 Education Act. Likewise Professor McClelland offers a timely synopsis of the position of Cardinal Manning's papers.

The future is to the fore in Dr Brenda Hough's stimulating article on possible ecumenical co-operation in archival matters, while Dr Christopher Kitching sheds light on Catholic archives as they relate to the wider archival context.

One of the chief purposes of this journal is to make available descriptions and assessments of current archival holdings. The Editor is particularly pleased to be able to publish four such descriptions in this edition of Catholic Archives: Dr Meg Whittle's report on the Liverpool Archdiocesan Archives; Robin Gard's incisive account of the Hexham and Newcastle Archives; and Sandre Jackson's timely summary of the holdings of one of the more recently-established English dioceses, Arundel and Brighton. Robert Johnson-Lally's most welcome contribution from the Archdiocese of Boston helps to maintain the journal's international flavour.

Monsignor Michael Williams (and we congratulate him on his recent Papal honour) offers a thought-provoking reflection on 'making connections' in archival matters in the context of his own current work, while Sister Alice Lechnir's poem captures the more reflective side of the archivist's lot. On behalf of the Catholic Archives Society the Editor thanks all the contributors to this year's journal.

If the Editor may be permitted to offer his own short reflection, it is simply this: Catholic archivists, and indeed all concerned with the archives of the various Christian traditions, will enjoy a remarkable opportunity during the coming Millennium celebrations to reiterate the true meaning of the Jubilee. The two thousandth anniversary of the Birth of Christ is the very reason for the existence of the archival heritage of the Church, and for the Church herself. The Mystery of the Incarnation permeates all that the Christian archivist seeks to achieve.

LOOKING FORWARD TOGETHER: THE FUTURE OF THE CHURCHES ARCHIVES

Dr Brenda Hough

INTRODUCTION

The apostrophe in my title is a plural one: I really am having the temerity to try to reflect on what we can all do together to foster the archive of the religious life in Britain. I mean 'religious life' in the general not the specific sense: not, this time, members of religious communities, but the life of everyone who still holds that unfashionable view that God, however you define the term, is a living and powerful force in our everyday lives. All our churches are recording what it means to be a Christian in the late twentieth century in our corner of Europe, as well as preserving the records which have survived of earlier generations' efforts in the same direction. My only real qualification for the task of 'Looking Forward Together' is that I care very much about it; and that I have spent some time in recent years thinking about ways in which we can perhaps work more closely. I am now just three months from my retirement, which I interpret as giving me a good excuse to ponder a little on both past and future.

This is not a paper offering a great vision for the future. There have been exciting developments in thinking in recent years which have offered vision – your own Pontifical Commission's letter, The Pastoral Function of Church Archives, is the leading example. Statements like that (so ably summarised for us recently by Robin Gard in the Journal of the Society of Archivists) will be key documents in formulating a new attitude to archives in all levels of administration in our churches, and are as welcome as the sunbeams from heaven. The official recognition that archives have their part to play in the mission of the Church will give strength and significance to everything we try to do for the records in our care. But today I want to suggest a few practical steps we, as the people at the sharp end, can begin taking. The aim will be to prepare ourselves for the new responsibilities which will, I suspect, come our way in the next decades. If we can begin to work more closely together, we shall indeed also be playing our part in the ecumenical movement, another area where I fully hope to see great strides in the years to come.

THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND RECORD CENTRE

But first, a word about how my own work fits into the general picture. I last spoke to the Catholic Archives Society in 1984, long before my present organisation, the Church of England Record Centre, came into being. Robin Gard has asked me to say a little about what has happened in the years since then. In 1984 I was the archivist to the General Synod, the Church of England's Parliament. Some four years later it was decided that we should join forces with the Church Commissioners, the other main administrative organisation in the central Church of England as well as with the National Society, the body which looks after the church's interests in education. The archives of the three bodies together moved out of their expensive Westminster storage and were found a large warehouse on the edge of London's Docklands: and in 1990 we went into joint operation. Some of you may have heard about the structural changes in the Church of England's administration which are under way at present. Those of us who work in the archives take great pleasure in telling the rest of the Church of England that we got there first. Being a pioneer is not easy, so we deserve some kind of perk for putting up with the role for ten years.

Our main work, of course, is that of providing a service to our parent organisations. The business of locating the files and information needed by our administrators, together with the provision of finding aids, keeps about twelve of the twenty-one staff fully occupied. We also have two specialist records managers who try to keep the growing paper mountain in the central offices under some sort of control. Some of the rest of our time goes on looking after members of the public, from professors of ecclesiastical history to the inevitable family historians, who want to carry out research into the records whether in person, by 'phone, or by letter (or often, these days, by FAX or e-mail).

In any time that is left, we try to give advice to other parts of the Church of England. Sometimes the dioceses look to us for help with their record needs though the storage of those records, and indeed much of the day-to-day advice and support, is the work of the local authority record offices. This is a long-established arrangement between the Church of England and the record offices and, generally speaking, works to the advantage of both parties. The record offices become custodians of an historical resource which is in great demand, thus ensuring high reader figures; and the Church of England is saved what would otherwise be a hugely demanding and responsible task. There are also numerous surviving voluntary societies in the Church of England, though much reduced from the hundreds which were in existence a century or so ago. Sometimes they have archive collections of a size and importance out of all proportion to the societies' present scale of activity. Many of those collections have now been deposited in record offices, but there are still occasional requests for advice on sorting, listing, storage and so on. It is part of our role at the Record Centre to help such societies, though always working in tandem with the other Anglican offices, and with the other organisations represented at this conference by Amanda Arrowsmith and Chris Kitching¹.

As one part of our work with the large 'voluntary sector' of the Church of England, the Record Centre has, through the years, held occasional one-day meetings for members of Anglican religious communities. Sometimes we have been pleased to welcome members of Catholic orders too, especially those working in our own area of London.

This work has made me realise just how much all 'religious' archivists have in common, yet how many work in isolation. Your own society is a splendid example of mutual support and sharing of information, and I have had reason through the years to appreciate the welcome you have always extended to archivists from other traditions. The Society of Archivists' Religious Archives Group has also provided a forum for discussing matters of mutual interest. But such meetings are inevitably special events, something which happens by careful planning and pre-arrangement, and in a relatively formal way. Do we perhaps need other ways of keeping contact with one another? We also tend to have to fight our battles for recognition and resources as lone voices, whereas a joint appeal would sometimes give us greater strength both in relation to our individual churches and in the eyes of the archives world as a whole.

A large feature of life since we moved to Bermondsey has been a daily tussle with an unfortunate building – huge, but unsuitable in almost every other way for the storage of archive material. This is not exactly a criticism of my church, since the building had to be bought very quickly, and no-one could tell in advance just how well it might serve our purposes. All will, we hope, come right in the end, since a new building is planned for sometime in the future. Even at present prices the venture is likely to cost something like £6 million, a lot of money by any church's standards, and it is vital to get it right. Preliminary planning for this building has also made me think long and hard about the function it should serve; and whether, in these ecumenical days, it betrays narrowness of vision to be thinking about a resource to serve one church alone.

THE CHALLENGE OF ECUMENISM

I see occasional nods, and I am in no doubt that we have everything to gain by working together. I will come later to some specific suggestions. But for the moment let us look at the difficulties. Unless we face up to them honestly, any attempts we might make at common enterprise are doomed to failure.

There is the doleful and cruel history of opposition between our churches. I, as an Anglican, stand here covered with bitter shame at what members of my church have done in past centuries to members of yours. Yes, it is history: we cannot conceive of a similar situation today. But we do not have to look beyond the British Isles to know that such things are still all too possible, and so often done in the name of the God we all claim to serve. Past warfare leaves its blood running down the paths of the future, and unless we make a conscious effort to staunch the wounds they will continue to burst open and stain all that we try to do. Could it be that the decline in numbers many churches are experiencing, at least in England, is just what we need to heal our differences and make us see what we have jointly to offer to the sad world around us? Could it even be that church archivists, by proving that it is possible to work together on a day-to-day basis, can provide our leaders with a useful example of co-operation?

The long years of suspicion will need to change gradually into a shared experience of working together. We shall need to challenge each other's perceptions of what is public material, and what should be kept closed. Of course it is right and proper to keep some material from public view for a time – e.g. personal material or anything which might influence the course of negotiations internal or external. No church is going to reveal the personal files of those offering themselves for the priesthood or other ministry, or for the religious life, until a very long time after the death of the individuals concerned. With policy files, too, I would far rather accept a long period of closure than have my administrators decide it was safest to do all their business by 'phone, or to destroy the papers before they ever came into my care. But we learn about each other from the records of our administrations, as does the non-church world; and I would personally favour as open an approach as possible on access to papers. Closure always invites criticism and suspicion from historians outside the churches; and in truth probably none of us has a large proportion of records which need to be kept secret. Perhaps this is an instance where archivists can gradually break down the traditional views in our churches and encourage less stringent control over papers which it is not strictly necessary to keep closed for long periods.

Our different histories have led to very different structures within our churches, and this is reflected in the arrangements made for our archives – again, something which needs to be understood emotionally as well as intellectually before closer co-operation between us would be possible. The Catholic Church is diocese-based, and this, together with your enormously important records of the religious life (and here I do mean the life of congregations and houses) forms the basis of your archival arrangements. The ‘Free Churches’ in England – Methodists, Baptists and so on – are congregational churches, by which I mean that the individual worshipping community is the basis of administration and decision-making. The Free Church records tend to be organised by larger groupings of these individual congregations, e.g. the Methodist ‘Connexional’ archives, as they are known. In the Church of England there has always been something of a centralising element: but to all intents and purposes until this century, the bishop and diocese, and for certain purposes the parish too, were largely autonomous. All that has changed with the advent of synodical government and the inclusion of the laity in the decision-making processes. The records of the central administrations are where you would now look for evidence of the policy-making process, though there is of course still a three-way process of information-sharing and opinion-gathering between centre, diocese and parish.

THE QUESTION OF ESTABLISHMENT

One particular problem about co-operation is the whole question of the ‘establishment’ of the Church of England, that special status of being the legally-recognised manifestation of Christianity in England. This is not the place to go into a consideration of all the pros and cons of establishment, even if I were qualified to do so; but it is, again, a fact which influences our archival co-operation. The other churches will, quite rightly, look for any signs that the Church of England thinks it is the ‘boss’ church. Any offers we make to lead in a particular area can so easily look paternalistic or insensitive. If I, or my successor, were to offer cheap archive storage space in a new building to another church, could this be interpreted as a wish to help the poor relations? (It wouldn't to anyone who knew anything of the Church of England's finances, but that is another matter). Even more worryingly, might it look as though the Anglicans wanted to see what the other churches were up to; get the low-down on what was really behind that business we have always wondered about . . . ?

The diversity of structure of our churches has had a powerful impact on the location of our archives, which again makes it difficult for us to relate directly to each other. The central Church of England is London-orientated, again partly because the establishment links make it necessary to have easy access to Government offices. It shares with the Catholic Church a strong diocesan basis too; whereas the Free Churches have on the whole gone to provincial centres for administrative purposes. This means that we, the religious archivists, are a widely scattered group of people; and meetings are expensive and time-consuming.

People fall out sooner about money than about almost anything else, and another difficulty about archive co-operation is the whole question of who pays for what. Splendid schemes for co-operation between archives in the Church of England have before now bitten the dust once the stage of financial allocation was reached. It would not be easy to find a scheme which helped everybody but penalised no-one; but if we are to get the full advantages of bulk purchase, still more of shared facilities, then it is a nettle which has to be grasped sooner or later.

WORKING TOGETHER

So, after much warning about difficulties, what do I think we could do to begin to draw closer together? I have five suggestions to make, ranging perhaps from common-sense to cloud-cuckoo.

1. Do religious archivists need something akin to the Society of Archivists' register of specialist expertise? Many of the archivists in the Catholic Archives Society, both diocesan and religious, have built up some very real specialisations through the years. The Society of Archivists' enterprise, for those who do not know about it already, aims to provide an uncomplicated way of finding out who can help with a problem. Is something of the same kind needed for the archivists in the churches? Suppose someone in the Catholic Archives Society has undertaken a study of community annals or journals. It would be tremendously useful to have a phone number so that you could ring up and ask about the best ways to catalogue or index such a volume. Many Anglican archivists have profession rolls which are treasured in the same way as your profession registers. There might be useful skills to be shared, in one direction or the other, on handling or storing a fragile roll or register. Perhaps you could find out what it might cost to have it brought back to pristine condition, so that you or your Anglican counterpart can plot how to break the news to Mother without inducing a heart attack. There must be expertise out there on all the issues which cause you problems, from photographic conservation to how to identify that nasty little creepy-crawly you found last week in one of your archive boxes. Do we need to discover if we could all have access to the Society of Archivists' list, whether or not we are members? Or could that useful section at the end of your own membership list perhaps be expanded to include such information? If so, what is the best way to get it to religious archivists from other traditions?

2. The idea of an information resource leads into my second question: whether we need a further forum for exchange of ideas and information across the denominations. Now I know the thought of yet more meetings fills most of us with something akin to desperation, to say nothing of the cost of getting to meetings, and the time cost involved in being away from our workplace. The forum would not have to involve meetings – we could have a religious archivists' newsletter, something a bit more specific to our needs than the papers which come from the Specialist Repositories Group. Yes, we should have to find an editor, and make sure he or she did not have to write the entire thing single-handed; and someone has to meet the costs of printing and postage. But it might fill a gap. We need to think what shape the gap is – if indeed I am right in thinking there is one – and whether an occasional newsletter would fill it. On the other hand, if there were to be meetings, these do not have to be full-scale efforts miles away from home. How about a North-West regional meeting of archivists with an interest in religious records? Representatives from the Lancashire Record Office could talk over matters of mutual interest with archivists and historians from Ushaw and Ampleforth; Catholic and Anglican diocesan archivists could compare notes; we could lure over the Methodists from John Rylands Library in Manchester to swap tips with local Friends' branch archivists. We should all at least get to know one another better, and next time there was a difficulty there might be someone not too far away who could offer ideas on a solution, or even come over to lend a hand.

3. Is there any future in exploring the possibilities of joint purchase of items which we all use regularly, such as archive boxes or photographic wallets? One of the problems for the budgets of religious archivists is that they need to buy just a few of any one item, and that is usually a very expensive thing to do. There are very considerable savings for large orders of items such as boxes which are made up to customers' requirements. Buying in bulk would not harm the interests of suppliers since their unit costs are considerably reduced when larger orders are taken, presumably leaving a similar profit margin. There would be some problems to sort out, such as VAT, and transport from the delivery point to other offices; but with goodwill it ought to be possible for the churches to work out a mutually helpful arrangement.

4. My two final ideas are perhaps more from the realms of fantasy, for the present anyway: but why should we not at least begin to think about the possibility of sharing certain kinds of storage, to the advantage of the pockets of all our church members? Could we not even begin to contemplate employing a few joint staff? Why do something separately which could perhaps be done together more efficiently, as well as more economically? Few of us in the churches can afford specialist conservation staff. Jointly, we could perhaps set up a properly-equipped conservation unit, with its own staff and a collection and delivery service, and work carried out on a basis proportional to the financial contribution of the church in question. Records management, too, is something which we shall increasingly be drawn into. How many of us have the expertise to deal with these issues ourselves? Wouldn't the answer be to buy in the temporary services of a records manager to work with us on a scheme for our organisations? How about a religious archives computer expert who could trouble-shoot all those day-to-day difficulties, as well as give us objective advice when we needed to extend our systems? With common employees or access to specialists on a fee-paid basis, there would, again, be questions of who would act as employer, provide pensions, arrange insurance, pay salaries if work ran low, and all the million and one other considerations involved in such an operation – but none of them unanswerable if only the will is there to make the scheme work.

5. As for joint storage, don't most of us have too little space? Don't we also have some semi-current records which are only needed once in a while, and which could perhaps be kept away from our main office, provided that information from them could be speedily retrieved? With modern technology developing at the rate it is, the need for physical proximity to our records is diminishing by the day. Of course we shall want to keep by us the most precious parts of our archival heritage. But the Bursar's accounts from six years ago – perhaps that is another story. A record centre owned by all the churches, or perhaps by one renting out space to others, could maintain more adequate environmental conditions than most of us can manage individually, and supply a retrieval system which made it irrelevant whether the building was five miles away or five hundred.

These suggestions about possible joint storage or specialist staff would in no way undermine the place of the religious archivist. It would still be your task to use all your hard-won skills to select the record of the past for the future, and to prepare your papers in the ways which make them accessible and able to serve your churches well. No-one but you could fill that vital role as the link between church, archive and archive-user. But to have some of the more mundane tasks taken from us, and to be able to call on help for the tasks where we feel out of our depth . . . perhaps a pipe-dream, but one I think worth a little pondering.

CONCLUSION

Religious archivists are, perhaps, a slightly unusual breed in that most of us are enthusiastic members and supporters of our organisations. I do not mean, of course, that archivists outside the 'religious' world are not whole-hearted advocates of the good of their employers. Nor do I mean to imply that archivists in religious organisations are any less objective or professional in their aims and standards than those working in the secular world: indeed those of you in the Catholic Church are blessed with specific archival responsibilities bestowed by Canon Law. But many of you here are, first and foremost, members of a religious congregation, with the responsibility for archives given to you as an additional charge. And many archivists in other churches are men and women who have consciously chosen to ply their trade in an organisation whose view of the world they personally share and promote.

In my view, our close involvement with our parent organisations brings both risks and rewards. We need to ensure that our professional standards are not compromised by our affection for the bodies we serve. Take an example such as confidential material. Our authorities might well feel that the risk of papers relating to a dispute getting into the public arena make it better to destroy the material. Perhaps, as archivists, we can see that that the papers might, in a hundred years' time, provide a fascinating insight into an important controversy. I think our duty in a case like that is to use every means in our power to ensure the preservation of those papers. Of course, in the last resort, our superiors will make the decision – it is a key element of our relationship as employees or servants that they have that power; and I do realise that many of you are under vows of obedience, which is an added imperative to conform. But that does not mean we cannot cajole, plead, argue, promise and generally pester until we get our own way whenever we can. The guile of the serpent has, after all, official backing, and a useful part to play in archival science.

As for the rewards: one of them is, I think, the chance to influence, just a little, the future development of our churches. If the religious archives world could set a shining example by working closely together across the differences of our heritage and traditions, who knows what might follow? Even if the attention of our various authorities is first drawn by reduced costings, the deeper message might get across too. It might seem fanciful that a cut-price archive box could bring church unity just that shade nearer: but, in God's mysterious ways, stranger things have happened.

THE WIDER CONTEXT OF CATHOLIC ARCHIVES¹

Dr Christopher Kitching

Archives serve to document the activities of individuals, organisations and communities of all kinds.² A single document, if you know enough about its context, can often be of historical significance. There is no better place to start our discussion than where we are. In one of the corridors at High Leigh there is a note on the wall that 'the earliest recorded settlement at High Leigh, shown on a deed dated 1403, is of a group of farm buildings then known as High Wyches.' This single document assumes more importance the more you know about the place and the people who have lived here down the ages. It is just one piece of a much larger 'jigsaw' of the history of High Leigh. That in turn is only a small part of the history of the county, and so on: the image can be applied at several different levels.

This can stand very well as a model for what I want to say about Catholic archives. Each individual document in your care as archivists has some significance in the context of the whole picture or 'jigsaw' which the entirety of your archive would represent. But you must resist the temptation to regard the entirety of what is in your charge as the end of the story. Instead, go upwards or outwards a 'level' (or two or three). For what you each have in your charge is in its turn only a small piece of the wider picture constituted by the archives of the Catholic community in this country as a whole. That in turn is only a part of the picture of the worldwide Catholic community. Perhaps even more importantly, the Catholic communities, whether locally, nationally or internationally, are themselves only a part of a wider series of communities. And I should like to suggest that, on the one hand, we shall not fully understand the history and archives of those wider communities if we do not see the Catholic parts of the jigsaw and, on the other hand, you will not fully understand your Catholic archives and their significance in the broader scheme of things, if that is the limit of your horizons.

A major question I should like to sow in your minds for further meditation and discussion is the extent to which you should continue to think of 'Catholic archives' as something distinct and separate, differentiated from the whole wider body of archives. The good reasons for doing so could not, I think, be better formulated than in the recent circular letter from the Pontifical Commission.³ Here you have, clearly spelt out, a raison d'être for 'Catholic' archives. For some purposes it is certainly helpful to categorise archives (and communities) in watertight compartments. This might serve, for example, to define or limit the challenge of managing them, or to facilitate specialist research.

But for many purposes it is not helpful. You have things to learn from, and in turn to teach, archivists and scholars from other backgrounds. You will have many insights in common, but also some that are distinctive. But we shall not see the whole potential 'jigsaw' if some of the pieces are closely guarded. It can be argued that the work of historians and researchers is facilitated by assembling as many archives under one roof as possible. By this means they achieve a much greater 'critical mass' than when they are separately housed, and new, sometimes unexpected, avenues of research can be opened up as they are studied in a wider context. For this wider vision, watertight compartments become counter-productive. With this in mind, it was particularly refreshing to see that you had invited a representative of another church, and myself as a representative of a secular national organisation, to address the Society's conference.

It may be easier for me to say all this than for you to comprehend it. The Royal Commission on Historical Manuscripts has been trying since its foundation to build up a comprehensive picture of all the archives there are in this country, so that they may be of use to the widest possible readership. We collect catalogues and make them available in our public search room.⁴ Where we do not yet have catalogues, we look for other clues and pointers, including published references. And here I must pay tribute to your Society's journal Catholic Archives for all it has done to spread a wider awareness of your respective holdings. Yet it is very noticeable that in the National Register of Archives we hold remarkably few original lists and catalogues of Catholic archives, and we would welcome more. This is a good way to bring your holdings to wider attention. We are not yet clairvoyant, and if you do not tell us about your archives we cannot take notice of them and their needs, or in turn tell other people about them. (If they remain confidential, we will respect that and keep the list in our own confidential files until instructed otherwise).⁵

We do, of course, appreciate the constraints under which many of you have to work, including the need to respect confidentiality, and the lack of facilities for study of the records. But I would encourage you to challenge some of the old assumptions on these fronts and ask, for example, how your archives might be made more widely available, even if this means coming up with imaginative new solutions for access. Archives are not much use either pastorally or for the underpinning of knowledge of the faith and history of the community if they are locked away indefinitely. Should not terms be set and arrangements made for their eventual release? If not, might they not as well never exist as far as our 'jigsaw' is concerned? Do your archives all need to be retained in situ, or even by Catholic custodians? It is very expensive to look after archives properly according to today's best standards, in controlled environmental conditions with appropriate preservation and access provisions. So is there not a strong case for bringing them together in a few centres as possible, whether these are local, regional or denominational, and doing the job properly?

There is a substantial network of local authority and university archive repositories,⁶ and many of these have gladly taken in for safe-keeping the records of Catholic families, parishes and communities. Could these links be strengthened, to mutual advantage? There are also many organisations operating at national level in the field of archives. The National Council on Archives,⁷ which usually meets twice a year, brings together representatives of many such bodies, and a list is appended to this article for reference. As you will see, membership of some of these is open to anyone, and if members of the Catholic Archives Society are interested in developing a wider interest in archives they might, for example, consider joining the British Records Association.⁸

If I could leave you one pithy piece of advice it would be that of an amusing doodle recently reproduced in the admirable Dodo Pad diary for 1998: BE INDEPENDENT, BUT NOT TOO INDEPENDENT. Or to put it another way, see how your part of the jigsaw fits into the main picture.

LIVERPOOL ARCHDIOCESAN ARCHIVE

Dr Meg Whittle

INTRODUCTION

In April 1997 I was appointed as Archivist by the newly-installed Archbishop Patrick Kelly of Liverpool to work on the papers of the late Archbishop Derek Worlock. These were deposited at St Joseph's College, Upholland, where for some years I had been a volunteer archivist listing and boxing the archive of St Joseph's Seminary. I was informed that the Liverpool Archdiocesan Archive would also be sent to Upholland to relieve the pressure on available space at the Curial Offices at Brownlow Hill, and this deposit of material duly arrived in November 1997.

My brief was to prioritise the listing of the Worlock Collection in order to facilitate the work of the appointed biographer, Mr Clifford Longley. In Phase Two my brief was to assemble the archive in one location, to establish a system for retrieval for research purposes, and to attend to any conservation work required. Because of these priorities what follows appears, chronologically, in reverse order.

THE WORLOCK COLLECTION

The Worlock Collection was deposited at St Joseph's some time in the autumn of 1996 when I was still a volunteer and unable to allocate more than one day per week to the project. Fortunately, Archbishop Worlock had a meticulous filing system which had all been labelled and stored. Unfortunately, he had a habit of preserving every document, often in duplicate or triplicate, so that the volume of his papers looked an overwhelming task.

Some judicious 'weeding' of duplicates reduced the volume and familiarity with the collection soon dictated a logical order for archival purposes. The papers have been categorised in fourteen series:

1. Private and Family Papers
2. Westminster Years (including his first parish in Commercial Road)
3. The Second Vatican Council
4. Archbishop Worlock & International Forums (e.g. Synod of Bishops & Council of the Laity)

5. Archbishop Worlock and European Forums (e.g. CCEE & OCIPE)

6. Archbishop Worlock & National Forums (e.g. Bishops' Conference, National Catholic Fund etc.)

His involvement with these various international and national organisations spanned his episcopates in both Portsmouth and Liverpool, so chronologically Series 4-6 coincide with diocesan papers.

7. Portsmouth Papers (mostly personal correspondence/sermons/pastorals)

8. Liverpool Papers: Archdiocesan Administration

9. Liverpool Papers: Ecumenism

10. Liverpool Papers: Education

11. Liverpool Papers: Secular/Religious Organisations

12. Liverpool Papers: Secular Matters

13. Liverpool Papers: Miscellaneous Correspondence

14. Liverpool: Personal Memorabilia

Thus far Series 1-7 have all been listed and boxed. Box lists have been made for Series 8-14 and the materials stored in archival quality boxes. Detailed listings for the Liverpool papers comprises my main work in progress at the moment. The Worlock Papers are, of course, the historical documents of the future and the normal embargoes on modern and recent documentation apply.

ARCHDIOCESAN ARCHIVE

In some ways the Archdiocesan Archive presents even more of a challenge than the Worlock Collection, containing as it does some distinctive collections charting both religious and secular developments. For instance we have a large collection of Archbishop Beck's papers (1964-76) which coincide with the changes associated with the Second Vatican Council and the implementation of the comprehensive education system. In due course these will form an important record of twentieth-century Catholic history. We also hold a large collection of Archbishop Downey's papers (1928-53). His episcopate spanned the Second World War, the post-war implementation of the social welfare system, and compulsory secondary education. These papers have already been accessed by scholars from Cambridge and from Edgehill College.

THOMAS WHITESIDE
FOURTH BISHOP AND FIRST ARCHBISHOP OF LIVERPOOL
1894-1921

Other collections include a newspaper cuttings library in bound volumes (1928-76). These cuttings are entered in chronological order, but are subject-indexed at the front of each volume. As a research tool it is excellent and appears to be in a fairly good state of preservation at the moment. However, knowing the fragility of newspapers this will have to be kept under review. We also have a newspaper cutting library in three volumes for the late nineteenth century. This is collated in subject order covering: wills and law suits; Poor Law institutions; burial of paupers; Church census; education. This collection is less robust than the twentieth-century run and has been restored using archival quality paper and tape.

The Archdiocesan Archive also includes a library of bound volumes started by Bishop Bernard O'Reilly in 1873 and running to 1970. Entitled Liverpolitana, these volumes contain pastoral letters, ad clera, Diocesan Mission Fund reports, Ecclesiastical Education Fund reports, joint pastorals and encyclicals in chronological order and again are subject-indexed.

The archive also includes a distinctive collection of films. These have been identified as a record of every parish register for every church in the Archdiocese commissioned by Archbishop Downey during the Second World War. It has been customary for registers belonging to parishes within the city boundaries to be deposited at the Liverpool Record Office and those belonging to parishes outside the city boundaries to be deposited at the Lancashire Record Office. This system works well for genealogists and I see no reason to alter this well-established system. These films have thus been allocated to these two depositories.

FORWARD PLANNING

Some material has been retained by the Chancellor at Brownlow Hill. The parish boxes are still there although we have an index of contents. The Chancellor has also retained all files on individual priests and the Secret Archive. Other material concerning the building of the Metropolitan Cathedral has been retained at the Cathedral itself, where it is displayed and used for educational purposes. This has also been indexed and a copy is held in the Archdiocesan Archive.

As for the rest of the Archdiocesan Archive, we hold a full index of material held at the Lancashire Record Office and of registers held at Liverpool. Other material, e.g. the correspondence of the Vicars Apostolic of the Northern District, is deposited between Ushaw, Leeds and the Lancashire Record Office, but sadly there are some gaps in our holdings. Surviving records for our early bishops (Brown-Whiteside, 1850-1921) are sparse, and I have been unable to locate any Chapter records for this period. There are also few papers surviving for both Archbishop Godfrey (1953-57) and Archbishop Heenan (1957-64). Whether these have been destroyed or deposited elsewhere has still to be determined.

Our holdings will thus be accessed under the following ten collections:

1. Northern District/Early Bishops (Brown-Whiteside) Collection (1850-1921)
2. Archbishop Keating Collection (1921-28)
3. Archbishop Downey Collection (1928-53)
4. Archbishops Godfrey/Heenan Collection (1953-64)
5. Archbishop Beck Collection (1964-76)
6. Archbishop Worlock Collection (1947-96)
7. Auxiliary Bishops' Collection (1976-96)

Categories where there is no clear break between episcopates and whose function continues without apparent interruption will be kept as separate collections. These include:

8. Chancery Collection
9. Finance and Development
10. Parish Material

The collections will be organised in a series of categories in the same way as the Worlock Collection and based roughly, but not exclusively, on the classifications devised by the Working Party on Diocesan Archives (1980):

- The Bishop and relations with Rome & the English Hierarchy
- The Bishop and Diocesan Clergy
- The Bishop and Diocesan Administration
- The Bishop and Education

HOUSING

Finally, the suitable housing of the collection has also been part of my responsibility. The archive is lodged on the third floor of the West Wing of St Joseph's College. The ground floor houses various administrative offices for the college, CAFOD, diocesan services etc., and is thus always heated and the temperature is maintained at a suitable level between 15-20 degrees centigrade. The solid stone Victorian structure of the college also results in fairly constant humidity, within the 50-60 per cent recommended limits. As with most 'conversion' plans there are some difficulties with the archive. It is glazed along both walls with neither curtains nor blinds, and these have had to be treated with U.V. filter material. The archive is equipped with strong metal shelving and all materials are boxed in archival quality boxes.

Like most archivists I find I am taking more and more time to effect researches for postal and telephone enquiries, and we are now receiving regular E-mail requests. These and listings of the Worlock Liverpool Series are priorities at the present, but I hope to devote one day each week to making a start on the Early Bishops Collection. Clearly there is still much work to be done.

Robin Gard

It is now almost a truism to say that no single diocesan archive is quite like another, and this would seem to be borne out on reading the articles on different diocesan archives so far published in Catholic Archives. That this is at least partially true justifies the publication of a description of each archive because it highlights individual strengths and reveals weaknesses. Even so, the writer still believes, perhaps perversely, in the general proposition that after the Restoration of the Hierarchy in 1850 the bishops and their officials are likely to have conducted their business along similar lines determined by their canonical, pastoral and spiritual responsibilities, outlined in Provincial Councils, as well as by their own like practical experience. From this it would seem reasonable to suppose that the records created would have been similar in character and, further, that differences between diocesan archives would stem from losses of records rather than a failure to create them in the first instance.

This thinking was behind the drafting of the Scheme of Classification for Diocesan Archives prepared by a Working Party appointed at the Society's first annual conference at Spode House in July 1978, published in Catholic Archives, No.1, 1981, and re-issued, together with a Scheme of Classification for Archives of Religious Orders, as a separate booklet in 1988. Whatever diocesan and other archivists may think of the Scheme, it is not without merit and has had an influence in the arrangement of diocesan archives. Anyone interested in the preparation of the Scheme is recommended to read the preamble, but one paragraph alone summarises the conclusions of the Working Party:

The Working Party hoped that the final scheme might provide a framework for a survey of diocesan records throughout England and Wales and might encourage the adoption of common procedures so as to ensure that all post-1850 archives and records of long term value would be dealt with uniformly for the mutual benefit of administrators and historians. However, while this remains a desirable objective, the experience of revising the first draft six times, following discussions with various diocesan officials and archivists, has convinced the Working Party that no single scheme could accommodate the differences of administration and record keeping practice from one diocese to another. This latest draft is therefore published primarily as an aid to officials and archivists in identifying diocesan archives and not as a blueprint for their arrangement.

The writer had a part in the formulation of the Scheme but at that time had practical experience of only part of the Hexham and Newcastle diocesan archives, albeit some of the earliest records of the diocese to have survived. However, since about 1987 he has been engaged in sorting, arranging and listing an extensive range of records, both old and new, kept at Bishop's House, from which the older diocesan archives had been separated many years before. These older records have been retained as a separate group so as to preserve their archival history and, not least, because following their deposit in the Northumberland Record Office in 1975 they have been known to scholars by their Record Office arrangement and listing, as described in Northern Catholic History, No.7, Spring 1978. These records will be described briefly in the first section (I) below.

The process of collecting, sorting and listing the records and papers of the bishops and those officials who have worked at Bishop's House has been a lengthy one, due mainly to the archivist spending just one day a week on the work. The present situation is that almost all the records of the bishops' personal and central role in the administration of the diocese have been listed in their distinct categories in a preliminary way but await final classification, sorting and listing in detail. Some categories will require little more than numbering or re-numbering but others, notably the most extensive series, that of the bishops' correspondence, need considerable attention, in effect retrospective filing.

In an effort to sustain the writer's confidence that diocesan archives are broadly similar and reflect, if not conform to, the Society's Scheme of Classification, the main body of the diocesan archives will be described in the second section (II), following the categories set out in the Scheme, but it is emphasised that this is something of a trial classification, and certainly only an interim one. This treatment will at least have the merit of identifying all the main classes of records which have so far been found and will reveal lost or missing records.

The third section (III) will deal with a few deposited archives which are not, strictly speaking, diocesan but which have been received in accordance with Canon Law and the advice of the circular letter on

The Pastoral Function of Church Archives published by the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church in February 1997. So far as the accommodation of, and access to, the archives are concerned, the facilities fall very short of the high standards set by the Commission, a situation doubtless shared by other diocesan archivists. However, there is secure strongroom accommodation both at Bishop's House and in an outstore for listed and less used archives, while those still at Bishop's House which are being sorted and listed, as well as those still referred to at times for current administrative purposes, are kept in the archive room, where searchers may study them by appointment. Thus, while there is room for improvement in the facilities provided, not least in the use of technological aids, what is important is that the archives are recognised as an essential part of the heritage of the Church and are preserved as well as circumstances permit, and certainly much better than heretofore.

The letter of the Pontifical Commission recommends that diocesan archivists engage in what is familiarly termed 'out-reach', but soliciting deposits of records kept elsewhere and seeking to advise other record keepers can surely be undertaken only when one's own house has been put in order. Even so, since the records of the diocesan commissions, committees, working parties and advisory bodies based elsewhere form part of the overall administration of the diocese, it is hoped to receive their older records in due course, and there is a need to search for the records of defunct or superseded bodies and branches of national societies once active in the diocese.

THE OLDER DIOCESAN ARCHIVES

In 1975 Bishop Hugh Lindsay (1974-92) transferred to the Northumberland Record Office on loan certain records relating to the diocese and to the Church in the North East prior to 1850, and these were then listed by that Office and made available for public research. The records are, in the main, those which Fr W. Vincent Smith (1900-85), the very knowledgeable historian of the Church in the North East, had collected at Bishop's House, Tynemouth, as being of particular historical interest, and which came to be regarded as constituting 'the Diocesan Archives', by which term they were commonly known. The deposit in 1975 included some records additional to those assembled by Fr Vincent Smith but, regrettably, omitted some which he had found and in some cases transcribed.

These records include a few papers dating from the 17th century and others which are among the earliest evidences of the later history of the Church in the North East. Church historians are very much indebted to Fr Vincent Smith for preserving these records and especially for transcribing so many and interpreting them in various publications. The records are largely the papers of individual bishops and clergy, many relating to mission funds, and those dating before 1850 may be regarded as part of the archives of the Vicars Apostolic of the Northern District. In 1840, the old Northern District, established in 1688 and covering the whole of England from the Humber to the Tweed, was divided into three new districts: Lancashire and Cheshire; Yorkshire; and the new Northern District comprising Durham, Northumberland, Cumberland and Westmorland. East of the Pennines, Bishop Briggs became Vicar Apostolic of Yorkshire and Bishop Mostyn (1840-47), Bishop Riddell (1847) and Bishop Hogarth (1848-50, later Bishop of Hexham and Newcastle, 1850-66), successively Vicars Apostolic of the Northern District.

Many of the pre-1790 episcopal papers were collected by Thomas Eyre, first President of Ushaw and now form part of the Ushaw Collection of Manuscripts (described in Catholic Archives, No. 4, 1984). In 1836, Bishop Briggs moved to York taking with him the papers of his four predecessors, Matthew Gibson (1780-90) William Gibson (1790-1821), Thomas Smith (1821-31) and Thomas Penswick (1831-36), but these relate as much to English affairs generally as to Northern District business (described in Catholic Archives, No.2, 1982). Few papers of Bishops Mostyn and Riddell have survived but these older diocesan archives contain many of Hogarth, who had been Mostyn's Vicar General before appointed Vicar Apostolic. The following is a summarised description of these older archives, which are listed more, fully in Northern Catholic History, No.7, Spring 1978, and in still greater detail in lists in the Record Office and in the Diocesan Archives. While in the Record Office the archives were given the code reference RCD, followed by sub-numbers representing their distinct classes, as below. Items asterisked were transcribed by Fr Vincent Smith, and are available in copy form. These older archives have recently been withdrawn from the Record Office and re-united with the rest of the diocesan archives. The listing and careful preservation of these records by the Northumberland Record Office over thirteen years is gratefully acknowledged.

1. Letters and papers of the Vicars Apostolic of the Northern District and of the Bishops of Hexham and Newcastle, 1790-1909.

These include letters (95) to Bishop William Gibson re. Catholic Emancipation, 1790-1814*; letters and papers re-accounts and financial matters, 1790-1874*; copy out-letter books of Bishops Riddell, 1844-47 (1), Hogarth, 1841-57 (7), and Preston, 1904 (1); pastoral letters, fund accounts, and papers of Bishop Hogarth, including pastorals of other dioceses, 1849-64 (6 volumes); pastoral letters and ad clerums of Bishops William Hogarth (67), James Chadwick (98), John William Bewick (92), Henry O'Callaghan and Thomas William Wilkinson (78), 1849-1909.

2. Status Animarum records, 1847-1912.

Two volumes (with duplicates) of tabulated diocesan statistics, 1847-1912 and 1886-1904, transcribed by Fr J. Lenders from original returns, no longer extant, in 1930.

3. Records of the Bishops' Treasurers 1860-1905.

Copy out-letter books of A. Watson and J. W. Bewick, 1860-86 (4), and G. E. Howe, 1883-1905 (2), volume of duplicate accounts and papers of Bewick and Howe re-diocesan funds, statistics, missions and schools, 1871-86.

4. *Papers relating to Northumberland Durham missions, 1651-1897.

Letters and papers arranged by Fr Vincent Smith by missions, and many transcribed by him.

5. *Papers relating to Northumberland and Durham mission boundaries, inventories, religious orders, returns of papists, colleges, missions in other counties, etc., 1630-1877.

Likewise arranged by Fr Vincent Smith by place or subject, and many transcribed by him.

6. Lists and calendars of diocesan and other records made by Fr Vincent Smith, 20th century.

These include not only the transcripts of diocesan and other records asterisked above but also copies of papers held elsewhere, e.g. the Eyre Papers. and other papers at Ushaw College, extracts from Quarter Sessions records, lists of papists, transcripts of mission registers, and extracts from Benedictine and Jesuit archives. Also in this section is a note of the contents of the Slater Collection, Vols. I and II, 1823-52, comprising letters and pastorals of the Vicars Apostolic, petitions, decrees, elections, statutes, indulgences, district and mission funds, encyclicals, annual meeting papers, etc., 1823-52, the originals of which are not among the archives.

II THE MAIN DIOCESAN ARCHIVES

The main body of diocesan archives comprises an extensive quantity of records which are essentially the surviving books and papers of successive bishops and their officers when these were based at Bishop's House. Although mostly dating from the second half of the 20th century, they do include some from before 1850 and many from the late 19th century. Despite periodic moves of episcopal residence, a surprising amount has survived. Bishop Hogarth (1850-66) lived at Darlington, Bishop Chadwick (1866-82) in Newcastle, Bishop Bewick (1882-86) at Tynemouth, Bishop Wilkinson (1889-1909) at Ushaw and elsewhere, Bishops Collins (1909-24) and Thorman (1925-36) at Tynemouth, Bishop McCormack (1937-58) lived first at Tynemouth, then at Sandyford House, Newcastle, before moving to the present Bishop's House, East Denton Hall, Newcastle, where Bishops Cunningham (1958-74), Lindsay (1974-92) and Griffiths (1992-) have since lived, and from which the diocesan administration has mainly been conducted, although the Commissions and diocesan officers are now based elsewhere. The records thus represent the bishop's central role in the life of the diocese. As already indicated, the diocesan archives will be described according to the headings (here abbreviated) of the Scheme of Classification for Diocesan Archives.

A. THE BISHOP AND DIOCESE IN RELATION TO ROME AND THE ENGLISH HIERARCHY.

A1. Papal bulls and other Roman documents. Bulls or letters of appointment exist for most of the bishops, the earliest being a letter appointing Francis Mostyn as Vicar Apostolic in 1840. Petitions to, and faculties and rescripts granted by, Rome for a wide variety of causes, e.g. property sales, binations, reduction of Mass obligations, etc., survive for various dates from 1847, but are not in a separate series. There are many dispensations in marriage cases and doubtless more are held by the Marriage Tribunal. Files of correspondence with the Apostolic Delegate, now the Nuncio, date from 1951. Bishop Chadwick attended the First Vatican Council, for which there are his copies of the official documents and also letters written by him from Rome, though mainly on diocesan business. Bishop Cunningham attended the Second Vatican Council, for which there are likewise his copies of official Council documents and related papers, including material concerning the drafting of the Epilogue to the schema De Ecclesia on De Beata Maria Virgine. In November 1985, twenty years after Vatican II, an International Synod of Bishops was held in Rome and the archives contain the reports to the Diocesan Special Synod Preparation Group from deanery pastoral councils, deanery conferences of priests, diocesan bodies and individuals, but no final report or summary.

- A2. Meetings of the Hierarchy and Bishops. A good series of Hierarchy acta and papers exist from 1959, and also minutes and papers of meetings of the Northern Bishops relating to Ushaw, Upholland and other clergy training colleges.
- A3. Papers of Hierarchy Commissions, Committees, etc. Only those on which Bishops Hugh Lindsay and his Auxiliary Owen Swindlehurst (1977-95) can be readily distinguished within A2.
- A4. Quinquennial reports. Copies of relatios, or quinquennial diocesan reports to Rome, exist from 1850, relatios for Ushaw, 1932-51, and for Christian Doctrine, 1926-71 (gaps).
- A5. Personal papers of Bishops. Bishops' correspondence is the largest class within the archives and the least sorted. The earliest letters are those in the out-letter books of Bishops Riddell, 1847, and Hogarth, 1841-57, but there are no similar books or copy letters, nor indeed more than a few personal papers, of Bishops Chadwick, Bewick and Wilkinson. Folders of letters and papers found numbered but in no obvious order in an old filing cabinet include some from the early years of the 20th century and are particularly useful for the inter-War and 1939-45 War years. Bishop Richard Collins (1909-24) made brief notes on some incoming letters but few evidences of Bishop Joseph Thorman's (1925-36) responses have been found. Collins was ill during his last years and Canon James Rooney, his Vicar General, tended diocesan business, and it was during the inter-regnum between Collins (d.1924) and Thorman (appointed 1925) that the Cumberland and Westmorland parishes were detached to form part of the new diocese of Lancaster on 24 November 1924.

From Bishop Joseph McCormack's time (1937-58), the volume of correspondence increases considerably. The correspondence of each bishop has been kept and listed in the order in which it has been found, although there is an overlap in Bishop James Cunningham's episcopate (1958-74) after Bishop Hugh Lindsay was appointed as his Auxiliary in 1969. There seems to have been no filing system in Bishop Cunningham's time, incoming letters and some copy replies being found in folders just as they had been received. Much retrospective filing is thus required before these papers can be intelligently listed and indexed, but their present order preserves their original 'arrangement'. Although this section is headed 'Personal Papers', the contents are essentially letters and papers on diocesan business, and any papers of a purely personal nature have been kept separately.

Since this class of records is one likely to be of interest to researchers, for example on the response to liturgical, moral and pastoral issues arising from Vatican II and Papal encyclicals, it may be helpful to note that, while the Bishop encourages research and in most cases a thirty-year rule would be applied to access to the archives generally, certain records may be reserved for approved study only.

- A6. Bishops' correspondence with government and civic bodies. Any such papers have not yet been distinguished from A.5.

B THE BISHOP AND THE DIOCESAN CLERGY

B1.2. Clergy lists, ordinations and appointments. The names, details of ordination and appointments of priests in the Northern District and in the early decades of the diocese occur in the Catholic Directory, of which there is a fairly full set from the 1820s (with Ordos from 1777), and in the diocesan yearbook, the Northern Catholic Calendar, first published in 1869. There are two clergy registers: the first started c.1905 but including details of many priests ordained in the 19th century, even as early as 1856; the second begun shortly after the first, but continues to date. Stub books of certificates and other documents issued for ordinations, testimonial letters and related enquiries, and similar, exist from the 1930s. There are also stub books of appointments to parishes, professions of faith, canonical possession, faculties, celebrants, etc., and also priests' returns and correspondence relating to parish work. For deceased clergy there are obits in the Northern Catholic Calendar, ad clerum death notices, and files of papers separated from current filing on a priest's death. Thus, a complete listing of all diocesan clergy is possible.

- B3. Ad Clerum letters. The earliest ad clerums found so far are those of Bishop Collins (1909-24) and are mounted in an album. Those of Bishops Thorman and McCormack, 1925-43, are similarly mounted in an album and indexed. Thereafter, there is a file of ad clerums of McCormack, 1944-54, none for Cunningham, 1958-67, but an unbroken series from 1968.
- B4. Pastoral letters. Rev. Robert Hogarth, brother of Bishop Hogarth, collected and had bound two volumes of his brother's pastoral letters, covering 1823-49 (119 items) and 1851-2 (c.100) respectively, and these include many pastorals of wider interest relating to the English clergy and Rome, among them the Apostolic Letter of 29 September 1850 restoring the English Hierarchy. Loose folders of pastorals of Bishop Hogarth and his 19th century successors occur in the old diocesan archives (RCD.1), but the main archives also contain bound collections from 1867 to 1947. Thereafter, the Lenten and Advent pastorals, letters on the Priests' Training Fund, etc., are in files or bundles, and there are some letters addressed to the children of the diocese in the 1940s.
- B5. Status Animarum records. Statistical details for the years 1847-1912 were extracted from the original returns in the 1930s and these are contained in two volumes in the old diocesan archives (RCD.2). Similar details of baptisms, marriages, deaths, the estimated Catholic population, Mass and Easter duty attendance numbers, school numbers, converts, etc., are in two large volumes covering 1917 to 1971. The actual parish returns exist from the late 1950s, and there are also copies of the yearly entries in parish registers on large proforma sheets for 1962-3 and 1965-6.
- B6. Diocesan Synods. Copies of all or some of the printed papers of the seventeen synods held between 1854 and 1961 survive. The early synodal papers mainly register the holding of the synod, with the names of officials (including an archivist, ref. Westminster Provincial Council I, XIV, para 7), and the confirmation of Provincial Council decrees, which were re-affirmed in synods as late as 1961, 'except in so far as they may have been abrogated by later law of the Church'. However, the later synods made decrees on a wide range of matters, including clergy and laity discipline, and on social, educational, marriage and moral issues. The Seventeenth Synod of 1961, the last to be held, included statutes on the clergy and laity, the sacraments, churches, worship, teaching authority, and church property, with numerous appendices, for example on deanery conferences, attendance of Catholic children at non-Catholic schools, etc. Some synod papers contain a printed or handwritten copy of the Bishop's address to the clergy, providing a valuable insight into their pastoral work and spirituality, as well as referring to the practical and social problems faced by the Catholic community of the day.

- B7. Deanery Conferences. Conferences of priests were held in each deanery from the 19th century at which topics of a theological, pastoral or social nature were discussed. A few minute books, the earliest dating from 1865, were found during the recent survey of parish records carried out by the local record offices and these have been transferred to the archives. There is also a series of summaries by the deans of the conclusions of the several conferences held each year, some with statements by individual priests, dating from 1944 to 1981.
- B8. Meetings of Diocesan Clergy. Agendas, minutes and papers of the annual meetings of the Council of Priests exist from the first meeting in 1967, and also papers of the National Conference of Priests from 1972.
- B9. Visitation Records. The practice of the periodic inspection of missions (later parishes) derives from decree 29 of the 1852 Westminster Provincial Council, while decree 18 covered the bishops' spiritual and pastoral jurisdiction in missions served by regular clergy. The practice of five-yearly visitations does not appear to have been adopted in the diocese until the 1930s. No records of any visitation in Hogarth's time (1850-66) or during Wilkinson's first thirteen years (1889-1901) survive, but there is almost a full series for 1902, perhaps carried out by Bishop Richard Preston (1900-05), Wilkinson's first Auxiliary. The returns are then desultory until 1925, from which date they are nearly complete.

The Visitation records mostly comprise a return giving comprehensive and precise information about the parish, services, fittings, statistics, etc., and an inventory covering the church, presbytery and parish property, both on printed questionnaire forms sent out ahead of the visitation, and from the 1960s also a surveyor's report on the condition of the church and property. The records thus provide a wealth of detail which would certainly be of interest to the parish historian, but they do not, on the whole, convey any general impression of parish life. A notable exception to this, however, are the forty-six surviving returns to the Visitation of 1868-9, which may be regarded as a stocktaking by Bishop Chadwick soon after his appointment. The priests on this occasion were presented with an enquiry booklet of formidable proportions, a veritable broadside of endless questions, not alas numbered individually and only broadly classified in sections for: I. Personal; II. Property, Finance and Discipline; III. Inventories of Church, Presbytery and Schools; and IV. Mission and Schools Accounts. While headed sheets were provided for the answers, these have to be interpreted by reference to one of the few surviving enquiry booklets. These 1868-9 Visitation returns provide a vast corpus of detailed information, some descriptive, which presents an intimate picture of the clergy, the churches, services, schools, and church life generally, and have already been gleaned by researchers into aspects of parish life in Victorian times.

- B10. Papers relating to Individual Parishes. No separate series of parish files has been kept in the past, but correspondence and papers relating to parishes, including parish histories, are now being filed, many being transferred from the general correspondence and from non-current filing.
- B11. Papers relating to Religious Orders and Congregations. Annual returns (with gaps) of men and women religious exist from 1968 to 1992 and, as with parish papers, files of correspondence and papers found loose are being created for each community which has worked in the diocese. There is a register of sisters in several convents for 1929-34, a census of nuns in 1947, and reports on canonical visitations of certain convents in 1965-6. There is considerable correspondence with the Carmelite Convent and St Clare's Abbey respectively, both in Darlington, from 1925.

C. DIOCESAN ADMINISTRATION

- C1. Deeds of Property The deeds of diocesan and parish properties are kept by the Diocesan Solicitors and the Treasurer, though a quantity of draft deeds have found their way into the archives. There are four registers of property, the first covering the years roughly from 1840 to 1876, but including details of deeds from the 18th century, and the second two begun around 1868. The writing of the first entries in these two latter volumes is that of John William Bewick, Bishop Chadwick's Secretary and Treasurer, and later Bishop (1882-86), who was clearly, from the evidence of other records, responsible for introducing procedures and practices which combined to establish an effective diocesan administration. In several entries in these registers Bewick also identified himself as Diocesan Archivist. His hand also appears in a description of the boundaries of the diocese in 1876, followed by the boundaries of each mission, these in the second book. All four volumes of course contain details of property of the Cumberland and Westmorland missions, as well as those of Durham and Northumberland, and certain deeds and papers regarding one or two of those missions are still among the archives.

- C2. Diocesan Financial Records. These are extensive and as yet not finally sorted, so that it is not possible to categorise them in the four classes (a - d) set out in the Scheme, though all four are represented. The following is merely a brief sketch of the main series of account books and other financial records.

Some records relating to the Northern District and to individual missions and funds prior to 1850 survive in the form of account books and bank pass books. Thus, there are three account books of mission funds, investments and expenses, 1827-48, and three 'day books' of mission receipts and payments, 1827-61. Several account books overlap 1850, including a cash book and a ledger of the treasurer of the 'Northern District Fund', 1841-64, and six bank pass books of Hogarth or the diocesan trustees, 1854-66. A 'Diocesan Fund' was established in 1851 to assist missions in building churches, schools and presbyteries, the income for such loans coming from a levy on missions based on the number of baptisms, plus donations and bequests. Any mission not contributing its quota was 'put out of benefit'. The fund was administered by the Bishop and a Council of Administration. Details of loans and other matters are contained in a Finance Committee minute book, 1854-68, continued in eight minute books of the Council of Administration, 1869-1958, after which similar matters have been dealt with by the Finance Committee, the agendas, minutes, correspondence and plans of which exist in quantity. Allied to these are books recording mission debts at various dates, and one or two treasurer's letter books relating to loans, etc.

The primary financial records, however, are parallel series of cash books and ledgers dating from 1865, to 1972 in the case of cash books and to 1957 for ledgers. A large album contains printed statements of annual and occasional collections from each mission, 1850-86. Draft diocesan accounts exist for 1889-97 and similarly for 1948-88, while statements will doubtless be found in the ledgers throughout the years. Among miscellaneous account books are two small personal expenses books kept by Bishop Hogarth, 1852-63, and an account book of Bishop Chadwick of monies at his 'Episcopal Disposal', 1866-80. Mission accounts occur in the 1868-9 Visitation returns and parish accounts, 1929-33, are among the Visitation records.

It need hardly be said that these financial records offer scope for studies in the history of the diocese and individual missions. Diocesan accounts are now published yearly and further records are likely to be held by the Treasurer.

- C3. Parish boundary documents. The first effort to determine mission boundaries appears to have been Bewick's descriptions in 1876 (see C1.). A series of formal statements of boundaries occurs in the 1950s, and there was a boundary revision in 1979/80. These papers and related O.S. maps have yet to be listed.
- C4.5. No records relating to Diocesan litigation or the Chancery are among the archives.
- C6. Marriage Tribunal records. The earliest records in the archives are petitions from parish priests and related papers concerning dispensations for mixed marriages, dating from 1932, stub books of dispensations granted from the same date, and index books from 1959. There are also stub books for dispensations from canonical form, disparity of cult, consanguinity and affinity, while there are papers relating to testimonial letters, freedom to marry declarations, convalidations, etc., including petitions to and rescripts from Rome, mostly dating from the late 1950s. Marriage dispensation papers will also be found among parish records. Marriage records are not open to public access, except in approved instances.
- C7. Diocesan Schools Commission records. The Scheme of Classification sets out six distinct categories of diocesan educational records, but these cannot be readily distinguished in the archives. Thus, there was no Education Committee, c.1870-1902 (a), no series of reports of Diocesan Inspectors of Schools (c), no separate records of Secondary Schools (d), no papers regarding either parish schools (2) or correspondence and papers concerning relations with teachers' professional bodies, parent/teachers' associations, etc. The Diocesan Schools Commission retains its own records, although the archives do include files of papers on the work of the Commission from 1970 or so. Nevertheless, there are many records relating to the provision of Catholic education in the diocese from 1850 to be found in the Visitation returns, pastorals, Hierarchy papers, correspondence and papers of the Catholic Education Council, and with government and local authorities on support for Catholic schools, papers re re-organisations, etc. At the diocesan level, too, there are statistics of school attendances in the status animarum and parish returns, religious inspection reports, lists of student teachers, and similar. An interim list of Education records is available.

Bishop McCormack (1937-58) played a prominent role in the Catholic response to the 1936 and 1944 Education Acts and his papers include correspondence with the Board of Education, the Durham and Northumberland County Councils, parish priests and others concerning the re-organisation of schools under these Acts. There are parochial files of replies to a questionnaire eliciting details of every school in the diocese in 1945-6, typescripts of the Bishop's speeches, and a notebook and papers recording the attitude of MPs and Parliamentary candidates to proposals to assist Catholic schools, c.1950-1. Similar papers regarding more recent re-organisations of schools occur elsewhere in the archives and are noted in the interim list.

Records of religious instruction appear in the returns of Religious Inspectors, 1955-76, in the papers of the Religious Education Centre, 1967-94, and in the reports of the Centre in the 1990s. St Mary's College, Fenham, features largely in the Bishops' correspondence, and there are various records of student teachers.

- C8. Other Diocesan Commissions. The Scheme identifies Social Welfare, Vocations, Missions, and Liturgy, but these are not represented in the archives, or not at least under these titles. Numerous Commissions, Councils, Committees, Ministries, Teams, and Leaders are identified in the Northern Catholic Calendar, and it may be assumed that each retains its own records. Even so, as with the Schools Commission, the Bishops' correspondence and papers contain files for many of these diocesan bodies, including the Ecumenical Commission from 1977, the Liturgical Commission from 1963, Justice and Peace from 1975, and the Diocesan Pastoral Council from 1984. There is little, however, concerning the former Diocesan Rescue Society, now St Cuthbert's Care, which holds registers and other records of the former Diocesan Industrial Schools and Homes established in the late 19th century. Files also exist for several inter-Church and ecumenical bodies in Newcastle and the North East generally, including the North East Ecumenical Group, the Northumberland and Durham Industrial Mission, and the Newcastle Church Relations Group, dating mostly from the 1970s.

C9. Church Building. The main evidences for churches, schools and other property are in the Visitation returns of 1868-9, the minute books of the Council of Administration, 1854-1958, the minutes and papers of the Finance Committee from c.1960, among which are many detailed plans, sketches, tenders, estimates and other architectural records, while the Visitation returns from the 1960s include a surveyor's report on parochial property.

CI0. Photographs. There has been no systematic attempt to collect photographs and the small collection in the archives awaits examination and listing.

ARCHIVES NOT COVERED BY THE SCHEME OF CLASSIFICATION

By and large, most of the diocesan archives can be fitted into the Scheme. Thus, records relating to prospective and actual clergy students could be described under Clergy (B above), where papers concerning Mass obligations could also be included. Certain special topic papers were kept separate at the outset, for instance those relating to the introduction of the vernacular in the Mass, but these are not essentially different from other topic files within the Bishops' correspondence series. No provision seems to have been made in the Scheme, however, for records relating to the laity, such as converts, which date from 1946 in the archives, and more recently those regarding special ministers. Hexham and Newcastle are probably not unusual in retaining the now obsolete service books used by the bishops, and housing a variety of paintings, relics, small church furniture and other artefacts, but the few personal artefacts of bishops are much prized.

The archivist and researchers are fortunate in having access to a set of Ordos, from 1777, and The Catholic Directory, from 1821, and a small library of the older standard Catholic historical books, including Catholic Record Society volumes. The Northern Catholic Calendar, first published in 1869, contains articles on missions, on diocesan saints and martyrs, obituaries, and in its earlier years a chronicle of the previous year's events in the diocese, and other useful background information. Unpublished sources include 'Notes on Durham and Northumberland Missions', by C. R. Baterden, c.1912-16, and 'Notes on Durham Missions', by Fr W. Vincent Smith, c.1945.

RELATED RECORDS

Clergy Fund Records. The records of the Northern Brethren Fund are deposited in the archives. These include a minute book, 1820-85, registers of members, deceased clergy and benefactors from 1705, account books from 1810, rules from 1924, and other records. A full list and a printed history, The Northern Brethren Fund 1660-1960, are available.

- E. The Chapter. St Mary's Cathedral Chapter was erected in 1852 and its minute books, account books, correspondence and surviving papers, from 1854 to 1985, are in the archives. Early papers include the decree of Propaganda setting up the Chapter, a letter of Pius IX on the Restoration of the Hierarchy, and a letter of Bishop Hogarth appointing St Mary's as his cathedral, all 1852; the decree of Propaganda changing the name of the diocese from Hexham to Hexham and Newcastle in 1861; appointments of Bishops Wilkinson in 1889 and Collins in 1909; and numerous papers concerning Chapter appointments and its role during episcopal vacancies.
- F. Diocesan Societies. Only two major deposits have been received so far, the records of the Apostleship of the Sea, from 1946, and of the diocesan branch of the Catholic Women's League (established in 1911) from 1934, lists of which are available. Over the years the bishops have received innumerable requests, appeals, reports and letters from national and local lay societies for support or giving information, and these have been sorted into their respective files, or indexed if remaining in previously listed filing.
- G. Parish Records. The 1983 Code of Canon Law (c. 535) requires the careful preservation of registers and other parish records and this obligation rests with the priest and the bishop. In 1987 a Working Party of our Society considered the problems faced by priests in ensuring the safe keeping of their records and submitted a Memorandum on Parish Records to the Bishops' Conference in November 1988. The Bishops responded by 1) commending the practice of depositing older records and registers in 'an established church archive' or local record office; 2) recommending that registers be made freely accessible after a lapse of 100 years; and 3) recommending the microfilming of registers. (The text of the Memorandum and Bishops' response is printed in Catholic Archives, No.9, 1989, pp.62-3).

While other dioceses have followed alternative policies, some even being able to receive parish records into their diocesan archives, Hexham and Newcastle has followed the Bishops' recommendations of 1988. In 1994 it was agreed by the Bishop, the Council of Priests and the four local record offices within the diocese that the record offices would undertake a survey of the records of parishes established before 1900, later 1920, and receive deposits of older registers and records of historical value. This survey has now been completed and in most cases substantial records deposited in the relevant record office. Many of the registers have already been microfilmed or microfiched, so saving wear and tear on the originals. The agreed closure period is 75 years for baptisms and marriages but deaths registers are open to inspection. The record offices also undertake to provide clergy with copies of entries from closed registers which may be required for canonical purposes, to make the open registers available for public research, and to undertake postal enquiries on the terms applied to searches in the registers of other churches. The benefits of this policy to the diocese, to parishes, to the local record offices, and to family historians are self-evident. This policy also accords with the spirit of the circular letter of the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church on The Pastoral Function of Church Archives in 1997.

The Classification Scheme identified the following main classes of parish records: 1) Registers; 2) Church minutes and accounts; 3) School records, especially managers' minute books and logbooks; 4) Records relating to the upkeep of the church and parish matters; 5) Notice books; and 6) Copies of returns to the Bishop, etc. The 1994 survey revealed that most of the register had survived; that very few parish minute books or old account books have been kept, if ever made; that some managers' minute books had been kept with the parish records but that school logbooks were thought likely to be still with the school or with the local education authority; that most papers relating to the upkeep of the church and to do with parish matters are of comparatively recent date; that few notice books, except perhaps those immediately before their replacement by parish newsletters, have survived; but that copies of parish returns have been kept. An additional class found is that of the parish copies of marriage dispensations, some being deposited and some retained in the parishes, but in either event they are of course confidential.

The diocesan policy has, on the whole, been fully justified, but concern also needs to be shown for the records of post-1920 parishes, which are subject to the same dangers as those of the older parishes, particularly as the present shortage of priests has led to more frequent change of clergy and the uniting of parishes. Another danger inherent in any practice of listing of records on site followed by selective deposit is that any records not deposited may be regarded in the parish as of no historical interest, even though the decision to leave them in the parish may have been one of date or contemporary reference need, and thus 'at risk' of disposal. A general policy for the standardization of practices in the preservation of parish records is much needed, and perhaps the Association of Diocesan Archivists might take a lead in this on behalf of the Society. For a working model one need look no further than the Church of England's Parochial Registers and Records Measure of 1978 (revised), which required the deposit of all records over one hundred years old in approved record offices and instituted five-yearly reviews of records retained in parishes, leading to subsequent deposits and checks on storage conditions in the parishes.

ARCHIVAL HOLDINGS OF THE DIOCESE OF ARUNDEL AND BRIGHTON

Sandre Jackson

The Diocese of Arundel and Brighton was formed on 28 May 1965 by the division of the Diocese of Southwark and consists of the three counties of East Sussex, West Sussex, Surrey outside of the Greater London Boroughs, and the Unitary Authority of Brighton & Hove.

The archives for the diocese are housed in Bishop's House, Hove, East Sussex - home of the diocesan curial offices. Archival holdings are divided and housed in four separate parts, viz:

- 1) The historical archive
- 2) The matrimonial tribunal archive
- 3) the finance office archive
- 4) the schools commission archive.

The first of these, the historical archive, is by far the most interesting, and is housed at present in the mezzanine room above the main hall of Bishop's House. Catalogued mainly according to the schema devised by the C.A.S, the overwhelming bulk of the material consist of Class B.10, a series of (aptly named!) Digby Collapsible Box Files containing the holdings of each Parish within the Diocese. The second largest holding is Class B.11 - miscellaneous correspondence relating to both the existing and extinct religious orders in the diocese. Sadly, the fastest-growing Class is B.12 - Dead Clergy Letters, which now number some 8 large box files.

Arundel and Brighton is fortunate to be rich in archival holdings of parishes of historical interest, for example, that of St Edward the Confessor, Sutton Park, nr. Guildford, Surrey, which remains, uniquely, a public church inside a private park. St Edward, the last Anglo-Saxon king (and the last English king to be canonized), who died on 5 January 1066, had a hunting lodge where the present church now stands. The king hunted frequently at Sutton Park and heard Mass daily in the chapel when resident there. In the early 1500s Sutton Manor came into the possession of Lady Margaret Beaufort, mother of Henry VII and benefactress of St John Fisher, who was also her confessor. When she died in 1509 she left the Manor to her grandson, Henry VIII, who subsequently gave it to Sir Richard Weston in 1521. In c.1525 Sir Richard built a new house, Sutton Place, about half a mile to the south of the old one. The Westons continued to hear Mass during penal times in the private chapel, and kept their chaplains disguised as bailiffs or tutors. The letter overleaf was copied in the late 19th century from the original Loseley MSS of Recusant Papers relating to Sutton Place by a Captain Francis Salvin who then owned Sutton Place. The letter, entitled Search Warrants for Priests, is dated 5 September 1578, and tells of the 'Popish Priests who remayne obscurely in secret places'.

The archival holdings for the Parish of St John the Baptist, Brighton, are of some note, for it was from the Brighton mission that Catholicism was reinstated in the town and its environs after the Reformation: the returns for a Commission for April 1724 issued by Thomas, Lord Bishop of Chichester state that in Brighton there were 'no Papists'. Bishop Challoner, in 1773, reported to Propaganda that there were only 700 Catholic laymen and 7 priests in the whole of Sussex. Before the Relief Act of 1791, the founding of a mission was usually the work of a layman (who also appointed the chaplain). The Vicar Apostolic granted him faculties and intermittently visited and conferred the Sacrament of Confirmation. The first entry in St John the Baptist's Baptismal Register is 1799, and this is the generally accepted date of the establishment of a mission in Brighton. Mass was said occasionally locally, but it was not until c.1806 that Mr Hallett built, to the order of a Father Mouchel, not only Brighton's first public post-Reformation Catholic church, but also only the fourth post-Reformation Catholic church in England to be consecrated, viz.:

Winchester (the old Chapel), 5 December 1792

Fernyhalgh, near Preston, Lancs, 12 August 1795

Stonyhurst (College Chapel) 23 June 1835

Brighton, St John the Baptist, 7 July 1835

The consecration certificate (translated) reads: 'On the seventh day of July, 1835, I, Thomas, Bishop of Oleno (Dr Griffiths), consecrated this church and altar, in honour of St John the Baptist, and in it enclosed relics of St Clement, Martyr, and granted to all the faithful of Christ who visit the church to-day 100 days and to those visiting the church on the anniversary day of this consecration 40 days of true indulgence in the usual form of the Church.'

The church of St John the Baptist is also notable inasmuch as it contains the body of Maria Fitzherbert, Morganatic wife of George IV.

A COPY OF THE SEARCH WARRANT FOR PRIESTS (1578)

Born on 2 July 1756, she married Edward Weld of Lulworth Castle, Dorset (uncle of Cardinal Weld) in July 1775, but he died within the year. She subsequently married Thomas Fitzherbert in 1778, but he also died, this time within three years of the marriage. It was about four years after her second husband's death that Maria Fitzherbert first became acquainted with the Prince of Wales: she subsequently married the heir to the throne on 21 December 1785. The marriage was not recognized by the State, and Maria died on 6 April 1837. A copy of the following document shows the cost of her funeral:

ARCHIVES OF THE ARCHDIOCESE OF BOSTON

Robert Johnson-Lally

When Pope Benedict XV promulgated the New Code of Canon Law in 1917, containing canons requiring maintenance of an archives in each diocese¹, the Diocese of Boston was already well advanced in historical awareness. From its origins in 1808, the see has enjoyed the leadership of many who have emphasized the significance of the historical record. This penchant for history and documentation appeared most fully developed in the person of the second Bishop of Boston (1825-1846), Benedict Joseph Fenwick. Fenwick, a committed creator and keeper of records instituted the recording of daily events in a diocesan journal and compiled a manuscript history of the diocese, Memoirs to Serve for the Future Ecclesiastical History of the Diocese of Boston.

Thus Fenwick set an early high standard for maintaining the fabric of history. That standard found renewed and refined expression during the episcopate of William Cardinal O'Connell. O'Connell (Archbishop 1907-1944, Cardinal 1911), insisted on extensive documentation of archdiocesan administration. Cardinal O'Connell also commissioned a comprehensive history of the see: The History of the Archdiocese of Boston, published in 1944. The authors, Fathers Robert H. Lord, John E. Sexton, and Edward T. Harrington compiled a considerable amount of material; furthermore they catalogued and arranged many of the original diocesan documents.² The work done by the archdiocesan historians combined with Cardinal O'Connell's administrative style laid the groundwork for much of what is now the archives of the Archdiocese.

For the remainder of the 1940s and into the following decade the archives collections were under the care of the seminary librarian who added to the existing records and began the practice of collecting sacramental records from the parishes.³ By the close of the 1950s custody had passed to a vice chancellor who employed a lay assistant to handle the day to day tasks. So well did they perform those tasks that in 1959, a visiting archivist from the Archdiocese of St Louis lauded the efforts of these proto-archivists, stating that, 'There is much to be praised in the operation and maintenance of the archives of the Archdiocese of Boston.'⁴

Over the next twenty years several of the chancellors took an active interest in the archives ensuring that the holdings would be properly maintained and that the archives would remain accessible for both administrative use and scholarly research. Boston's archives was blessed with support from highly placed administrators, but the programme had developed enough in both size and scope to require the attention of a professional archivist.

In 1974, the impetus toward professionalization came from the National Council of Catholic Bishops, (NCCB), in the United States. That year the NCCB published A Document on Ecclesiastical Archives, which called on each diocese to appoint an archivist.⁵ The Archbishop of Boston, Humberto Cardinal Medeiros, and Thomas V. Daily, Auxiliary Bishop and Chancellor, actively supported the establishment of a professionally-run archival programme. In 1976 and 1977, sufficient funding was secured from local and national granting agencies to allow for the hiring of a professional archivist in 1978.

After establishing intellectual control over the records the archivist and a rotating staff of graduate student interns began to access new material, to arrange and describe the holdings, and to initiate procedures for reference, outreach and preservation. Thus established, the Archives of the Archdiocese of Boston became, and has continued to be an important component of archdiocesan administrative machinery. The following is a brief description of the archives, its holdings, and the research conducted in its collections.

The present location of the archives is in a building that was constructed as a library. That gave the facility the advantage of already having stack space and a reading room in place. Recently, temperature and humidity controls were installed in the stacks. While the building is not perfect, it is more than suitable for use as a space for the archives.

Staff consists of four: the archivist; associate archivist; and two part-time staff assistants. These last serve as reading room attendants and also perform most of the genealogical reference work. The archives is open to the public Monday through Friday by appointment.

Records in the custody of the archives amount to more than three thousand cubic feet of material which dates from 1774-present, with the greater portion dating from 1907-present, and which document the origin and growth of the Catholic Church in Eastern Massachusetts. Holdings are comprised of the records/papers of the bishops and archbishops including auxiliary bishops; records of the vicar general/moderator of the curia; records of the chancellor and offices of the central administration. The archives also collects: parish materials (including sacramental records); institution, agency and bureau records; building plans and blueprints; photographs, films, videotapes and audio recordings. There are in addition a few small collections of personal papers, diaries, and records of Catholic organizations not affiliated with the Archdiocese. Records are arranged according to office of origin, using the filing systems of those offices, thus preserving the integrity of the records and indicating the function of the creating entity.

Access is gained through the archivist. Researchers not affiliated with the administration must submit a research abstract, a written request and/or take part in a reference interview, depending on the type of research. While access is as open as possible certain canonical restrictions apply as well as any other policies or laws that regulate access to archival collections. Such restrictions as exist are applied fairly and uniformly.

Use of the Archives falls into three types: administrative, historical, and genealogical. Users are numerous, averaging over 4,900 per year for the past five years, a figure which includes personal, mail and telephone enquiries. Researchers employ the records in different ways, some using one type of record almost exclusively, while others may utilize similar records in different ways. Still others use a wide range of records.

The Archives' principal clientele is, of course, the archdiocesan administration. It is for administrative purposes that the Archives was created and those purposes remain the primary reasons for its continued existence. Administrative use accounts for nearly one-half of all requests. Records most frequently requested include: building plans; official correspondence; reports; property records; parish boundary and census data; organizational records and financial information. Requests are for the most recent material – from the past twenty years. Working well with the administration certainly has its advantages. Archivists have been able to persuade administrators of the integrity and importance of their records. This in turn helps archives staff locate material more readily which elicits a good deal of respect for archives that can translate into more tangible benefits when resources are allocated. In addition most administrators justifiably view archives as a unit of archdiocesan administration and valuable beyond its role as an historical agency.

This is not to cast aspersions on historians – far from it – historical researchers constitute an important part of our user base. While historians provide only about 15% of our annual enquiries, they use records both extensively and intensively. Their research encompasses projects as diverse as parish histories, theses and dissertations, and scholarly historical publications. They may be informed amateurs, university students or academics. Church records have been used to great effect by historians even if they are not directly engaged in church history; there is much to find using the records of the Church for broad-based historical research.

The final user category under discussion – genealogists – account for nearly 35% of archives use. Genealogists perform research in order to compile family trees, write family histories, and in numerous other creative ways such as applying for dual citizenship or medical information gathering. Clearly, genealogical research may be as unusual or varied as any other enquiry. In return for what they find in the archives, family historians and genealogists provide much support, either financial or in other undefined, but no less important ways.

Genealogists use sacramental records almost exclusively. There are over one thousand volumes upon which they may draw to compile their data. Sacramental records date from 1789-present, but records dated after 1920 (the date of the most recent U.S. Census open for research) are closed except for canonical use.

The future of the Archives of the Archdiocese of Boston holds much of the old as well as some of the new. The age old tasks of acquisition of records, arrangement and description, reference, and outreach continue as ever. To this we must now add records management, electronic records concerns, and new ways – such as the World Wide Web – of reaching our clientele. In Boston, as in other places, diocesan archivists must consider and confront these challenges to continue contributing to the Church, the diocese, and the greater research community.

FATHER WILLIAM TUOMEY PP CHURCHTOWN & LISCARROLL AND BISHOP BRIGGS' NUNS

Edward Walsh

Diaries are always fascinating. What might initially be perceived as idle jottings often demonstrate a sharp understanding of events, and make incisive comment on current happenings which provide a valuable insight on things long past. In Boswell's Life of Johnson, Samuel Johnson remarks that 'keeping accounts Sir is of no use when a man is spending his money, and has no one to whom he is to account. You won't eat less beef today, because you have written down what it cost yesterday.' The arid minutiae and detail of accounts when supplemented by comment, the mixed flashes of emotion and humour, invective and indignation, often fill out a more complex and complete picture.

William Tuomey (1804-1872) was parish priest of Churchtown and Lisscarroll in the Diocese of Cloyne north County Cork, from 1859 until his death thirteen years later. His personal account book and occasional diary was found among the papers of the celebrated Vincent Casey O.P.¹ This is a most interesting document to have from any one priest from ordination to death. But how did the literary Dominican, a one time editor of the weekly Catholic News in Port of Spain, Trinidad, and the monthly Irish Rosary in Dublin, come by this particular book? More often than not this sort of account book was deliberately destroyed either by immediate family or fellow clergy as a possible source of scandal. This unique little volume was initially deposited by Senan Crowe² in the Irish Dominican Archives at St Mary's, Tallaght, Dublin 24, and then given on extended loan to this writer to be transcribed. The fine spidery calligraphy was at times difficult to decipher.

Initially there were few if any clues other than the surname Donegan which occurred seven times on five different pages. Reginald Harrington O.P.³ was well versed and immensely knowledgeable on extended family relationships and it was a topic about which he loved to expatiate and reminisce; he was known to comment that Vincent Casey and Humbert John Donegan⁴ – the latter a native of Cork city – were possibly first or second cousins, 'a nephew or something.'⁵ A somewhat tenuous connection perhaps, but the discovery of another family diary (also found among the papers of Vincent Casey) containing some of the identical family data as in the opening pages of William Tuomey's diary could not be considered as only circumstantial evidence or sheer coincidence. This latter diary makes mention on a number of occasions of Father John Donegan O.P. and specifically 'cousin Father John Donegan.'⁶ John Donegan (in religion Humbert Mary) was the son of John Donegan⁷ and Helen Tuomey⁸ born in Cork on 21 August 1851, received the Dominican habit at St Mary's, Tallaght 29 September 1872 and was professed there on 23 January 1873.⁹ It is presumed that his mother Helen is the Ellen referred to in this account book and diary.

The surname spellings are of interest for while William always uses Tuomey, his sister is referred to as Tuomy and it appears that Tuomey, Tuomy, Twomey, Toomey are all interchangeable. So the outline Tuomey-Donegan-Casey family kinship and relationship was traced. Father William Tuomey was an uncle of Humbert Donegan, and Vincent Casey was a nephew (?) or cousin of the latter and thus it was possible to account for the book passing to Vincent Casey.

This account book/diary is 15.3mm high x 9.5mm wide, 2mm at foreedge, 2.5mm thick at spine, original vellum over boards grime and age stained, with some wear at head of spine in one place along top joint and corners; spine rounded with no label; brass clasp. Paper ruled faintly in blue horizontal lines, and in light red vertical lines, as for an account book; edges marbled. There are 90 leaves gathered irregularly in 1x8 leaves, 6x12 leaves and 1x10 leaves with 18 blanks. It is unpaginated except for one section, pp. 13 - 15. Writing begins on the front paste-down end paper with '1836 June 22 My Mother died' and continues for 35 pages in clear, neat and well written script recording dates, events and monetary accounts; 4 pp blank and then writing continues as before to 1857; 1 p blank; 7 pp of writing 1857-1859 accounts; 1 p blank; 24 pp of writing; 1 p blank; 21 pp of writing (records of events and accounts 1849-1871); 20 pp blank; 4 pp script; 22 pp blank; the writing now begins at the lower paste-down end paper; 10 pp script; 2 pp blank; 16 pp script including 3 in Latin; 1 p blank; 8 pp script; the writer's obituary card is loosely inserted.

William was ordained priest by Dr Crotty¹⁰ in Cobh on 22 December 1838, receiving all minor and major orders within a space of five days. His priestly life was spent in widely disparate areas of County Cork, starting in Skibereen in 1839, moving a year later to Shirkin Island¹¹ which also included the pastoral care of Cape Clear. In 1843 to Barryroe East, 1849 to Killavullin and then Cloyne before going in 1850 to the old and flourishing port of Youghal. Six years later Tuomey moved to the garrison town of Fermoy and finally in 1859 at the age of 55 as parish priest of Churchtown and Liscarroll.¹²

It seems that William Tuomey came from a family of six children, three sisters and three brothers. He was aged 32 and still a student when his mother died on 22 September 1836. His sister Catherine and father died within four days of each other in September 1843, and brother Michael in December of the famine year 1847, eliciting the comment 'may God Have mercy on him'.¹³ His sister Anne died in 1855 and his priest brother Cornelius (who received minor orders in Paris and was ordained by Dr Delaney¹⁴ on 18 December 1852) died on 6 July 1855 on Spike Island in Cork Harbour where he had been sent three years earlier as chaplain.

What sort of a person was William Tuomey? Meticulous in his accounts (the detail of income and expenses stated by baptisms, marriages, offerings, town and country stations, sick calls, military and civilian hospitals, military barracks, poor houses, nuns' convents, Easter and Christmas collections) with the financial year running from 1 October of one year to 30 September of the next. A system of abbreviations is sometimes used to designate origin, such as SC/sick calls, Int/intentions, Bap/baptisms, Mar/marriages. Obviously zealous, with well prepared sermons both in Irish and English as revealed by the detailed index list of 82 titles from his copybooks and manuscripts; shrewd in his investments, solicitous for the welfare of his brother Cornelius, his sister Ellen and her husband John. Income diminution is evident during the famine years of 1847-1848 and in the immediate aftermath. The detail is bleak. There is exasperation in being reported to the bishop 'that he did not speak Irish'¹⁵ – an allegation which drew the retort 'the greatest lie out' – and not a little humour at finding himself in debt for the 'excess of expenses over receipts' remarking 'so much for discrepancy of accounts,'¹⁶ and whilst in Fermoy commented somewhat pompously after the arrival of a new curate 'I have been exempt from s.calls, to say first mass on Sundays & Holidays, now indeed Admr.'¹⁷ Bishop Murphy's¹⁸ paralysis, illness and death are commented on in October 1856¹⁹ and the detail of the Chapter voting for Bishop Keane²⁰ in Cobh in January 1857 follows. ²¹ There is note of a journey to England between 17 August and 11 September 1867, without any indication as to why or where the traveller went.²² And who said accounts never make interesting reading?

The purchase of clothes, acquisition of household items including furniture, bed linen, delph and cutlery as well as food and drink are covered during the years 1856-1865 and provides a stark contrast with earlier years and the brief note of five shillings paid in for the 'Cape Fund for carriage.'²³ The Capers were an isolated but unified Irish speaking community with their own king, and down to 1730 their own code of laws. It was a way of life similar in many respects to that which prevailed on An Blascaid Mor, in a community which depended principally on fishing and whatever the sea threw up from shipwrecks.²⁴

Suffrages are listed, and the practice of the time is evidenced by the noticable increase in weddings at Shrovetime – after Advent and before Lent. Investments are in British and Irish debentures with a specific flutter in the Cork Wide Street Commissioners stock.²⁵ A gallon of whiskey cost 5/8 in 1856²⁶ while a decade later income tax stood at 4d in the pound.²⁷

There are two intriguing entries. The first in 1858 while Tuomey was still in Fermoy recording the charitable collection made for among others Michl. Barry of All Hallows, St Colemans College Fermoy, St Vincent Paul and 'Dr Briggs nuns'; the second entry '1859 Sepr Dr Briggs nuns 14.10.0'²⁸ was made after Tuomey had moved to Churchtown. Dr John Briggs 1799-1861 was Bishop of Beverley, North Yorkshire. But who were his nuns? There were no clues. It was easy to wonder and tempting to conjecture, but could it be that Dr Briggs' nuns were the Cross and Passion Sisters whose foundress Elizabeth Prout²⁹ visited Fermoy and stayed with the Presentation Sisters as she quested and begged for alms in the town and surrounding countryside during the 1857-1858 winter? Elizabeth Prout's biographer says Elizabeth Prout and her companions were certainly 'not Bishop Briggs' nuns.'³⁰

Sister Cabrini Delahunty, Cloyne diocesan archivist came across a first draft of my transcription document among the papers of Donacadh O Conchuir PP Kilnamartyra (West Cork) who was tragically killed in a car accident in June 1997. Sister Cabrini was and is engaged in sorting and indexing Dr Keane's correspondence. Canon Troy's booklet The Great Famine in the Dioceses of Cork and Ross – a collection of letters and reports from that time – quotes a number of letters to Dr Briggs either asking for help and/or thanking for help.³¹ So before asking for help Briggs was giving it. Sister Cabrini remembered '... coming across

My dear Lord,

Will your Lordships allow a poor Saxon (but a Saxon declared to be Hibernior Hiberniis) to presume to ask you whether you think it well for the Irish Prelates to send conjointly a memorial similar to the enclosed copy. If your Lordships should approve of this my humble suggestion, will you take steps to have it carried into effect?

Truely I am faithfully yours

We, the Roman Catholic Archbishops & Bishops of Ireland, beg to lay before your Lordship, as Her Majesties Prime Minister,³⁴ the following Memorial.

There exists, and we sincerely believe with good reasons, a universal and strong feeling in the Roman Catholic Body in this Kingdom, that the Roman Catholic soldiers now engaged in the bloody war in India, have not their spiritual wants supplied. Their numbers and their dangers, call loudly for a considerable increase of Priests to minister to these their spiritual wants. These spiritual ministrations the Roman Catholic Soldiers most highly appreciate, and consider that they are justly entitled to receive them from their country, for which they are shedding their blood and giving their lives. We, the Roman Catholic Archbishops and Bishops of Ireland, deeply interested in the spiritual welfare (sic) of the majority of the Roman Catholic Soldiers in the British army beg to submit to your Lordship's kind & immediate attention this our humble & earnest Memorial. If it should, contrary to our hope & prayer be unattended to, we shall in our deep anxiety for the eternal salvation of this portion of our flocks, be reluctantly compelled not to advise Roman Catholic young men to enlist, until they see that they shall have the consolation and support of their Religion when they are on the battle field or lying wounded and dying in the Military Hospital.³⁵

After four years work the transcription of the William Tuomey account book and diary was completed in 1989 and the document itself was returned to the Irish Dominican Archives at Tallaght. Historian and provincial archivist Hugh Fenning was of the opinion that since this document was directly connected with the Diocese of Cloyne rather than the Dominican Order itself, it would be proper for it to be deposited in the Cloyne archives. So during a holiday visit to Ireland in October 1998 it was a pleasant commission for this writer to take this marvellous little book from the Tallaght archives and put it into the hands of diocesan archivist Sister Cabrini Delahunty in Cobh.

Footnotes

1. Vincent Casey O.P. 1874-1967. Fearless and vindicated editor of the Irish Rosary was the defendant in a libel action brought by the writer Peadar O'Donnell. Casey had called O'Donnell a communist and in court O'Donnell denied that he had ever been in Russia. But there was a witness (a youthful Dominican student Gerard Gardiner) who would testify in court that in his own home at Dungloe, County Donegal, he had heard Peadar O'Donnell talking about his journey to Russia.

The surname Prout is somewhat unusual in Cork city and county, but not unknown since one bearer in an age of larger than life personalities was the eccentric Father Prout parish priest of Watergrass Hill between Cork and Fermoy. 'Father Prout' was the pseudonym assumed by Francis Sylvester Mahony (1804-1866) priest, writer, humorist, who abandoned the priesthood for a literary life in London and Paris, but made a death bed reconciliation with the Church. Known to most Corkonians as the author of the popular poem The Bells Of Shandon.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH AND THE 1944 EDUCATION ACT: MATERIAL IN THE PUBLIC RECORD OFFICE (CONCLUDED)¹

John Davics

INTRODUCTION

Whilst working on a number of articles on the Catholic Church and the 1944 Education Act², I found a wealth of material in the Public Record Office at Kew. I prepared a working calendar/rough guide to the material which I offer here in the hope that it may be of value to others. It could also be argued that some record of this material should be easily accessible in the Catholic domain. At Kew there are four files which record the negotiations between the Board of Education and the Catholic Church from May 1941 – when the Catholic authorities made their first response to the Board's Green Book on educational reform – until July 1944: Ed 136-271 (discussions over the Green Book proposals, May 1941 to January 1942); Ed 136-226 (October 1941 to April 1943), Ed 136-412 (July to December 1943, with Archbishop Downey of Liverpool taking a leading role during the vacancy at Westminster following the death of Cardinal Hinsley); and Ed 136-458 (January to July 1944, by which time Archbishop Griffin had been appointed to Westminster and had taken charge of affairs).

This file is entitled 'Education Bill 1943: White Paper on Educational Reconstruction. Public agitation by Roman Catholics against the White Paper.'

- Newspaper cuttings from October 1943: accounts of protest rally in Manchester. Anonymous notes on above from anti-Catholic viewpoint: 'Romanism in England is exactly Iraperjure in Imperio.'
- Butler to J.H.F. McEwan M.P., 15 July 1943: current proposals give more help to voluntary schools than ever before.
- E. Keiling (Board of Education official) to Butler (?date): report of meeting with Archbishop Godfrey (Apostolic Delegate) who said that northern Catholics felt deeply on the issue. He would advise Hierarchy against any precipitate rejection of Butler's scheme, but understood that some Irish priests had made violent and ill-timed attacks on it.
- Butler to Morton, 19 July 1943: recent contacts with Hierarchy indicated they were taking a 'most moderate and sensible line.'

- Father E. Sutton (Ruislip) to Butler, 22 June 1943: Suggests system of long-term, low interest loans to finance Catholic school building. Enclosed resolution of Catholic parents of Ruislip and Eastcote, Middlesex. Duty of state to provide schools without financial discrimination.
- Note by BOE (n.d.): comments on Sutton's proposals; concluded that cost to Catholics would be more than 50% grant scheme.
- Morton to Butler, 22 July 1943: Meeting with Bishop Brown. Hierarchy dissatisfied: on grounds of equity felt they had been unfairly treated. Would try through Catholic M.P.s to move amendments at Committee stage of Bill. Line of approach 'will be confined to intellectual argument . . .'
- White Paper should have been delayed until after reports of McNair (qualifications of teachers) and Norwood (curriculum) Committees.
- Butler to Morton, 27 July 1943: glad that Hierarchy was to approach matters 'intellectually' and not filibuster. Inconceivable that McNair & Norwood would produce proposals at odds with White Paper.
- Sir George Shuster M.P. to Butler (?date): memorandum on financing of Dutch schools. Religious schools had equal rights to state support.
- Butler to Shuster, 23 October 1943: any proposal to place whole cost of denominational schools on state would stand no chance of acceptance.
- Lord Perth to Butler, 5 August 1943: White Paper proposals not in accordance with Minorities Treaty.
- Holmes to Butler (?date): Legal advice states that nothing in Minorities Treaty requires state to provide denominational schools from public funds.
- Butler to Perth (draft), 7 August 1943: Response to Lord Russell's statement in Lords that Catholic schools would be forced back to alternative A. No such idea entertained by government or Hierarchy. Speeches in Lords did not show that government's offer was the best ever to Catholics. Speakers were unaware of detailed Butler-Hierarchy discussions. Suggested further government contacts with Catholics be with laity as well as Hierarchy.
- Butler to Lord FitzAlan (draft: not sent): Catholics free to criticise government offer but should be aware of forces which would like the offer to fall and be replaced by 'a purely secular settlement'. Was consulting Archbishop Downey re-best way to maintain contacts with Catholic politicians and laity as well as Hierarchy during public discussions.

- Butler to Downey, 11 August 1943: In Downey's absence in Ireland (convalescing) Catholic case gave impression of there being a threat to liberty of conscience. Benefits to Catholics had been 'inadequately assessed.' Had met Duke of Norfolk and FitzAlan. Useful if government had contact with prominent laymen as well as with Hierarchy. Attached aide memoire: Advantages to Catholics of White Paper proposals.
- Downey to Butler, 13 August 1943: had stated (23 June) financial objection to Bill, 'not with regard to religious principles other than that we are being penalised for our freedom of conscience.' Had stated this publicly in speeches & press. There were lay members of Catholic Deputation. Responded to aide memoire: Catholics asked to pay 50% of a large but unknown sum and were being offered no aid for new schools.
- Goodfellow to Downey, 14 August 1943: Butler glad to know issue between Catholics & government did not hinge on question of liberty of conscience and freedom to give religious instruction.
- Southwark Catholic Parents & Electors' Association, 11 August 1943: copy of leaflet ('A Respectful Challenge').
- Butler to Downey, 12 August 1943: Above leaflet illustrated misunderstanding of government's policy by Catholics who failed to understand benefits of proposals.
- Downey to Butler, 21 August 1943: regretted 'misstatements and exaggerated expressions' on education question but it was 'a complex one.' Had some sympathy with some of the fears raised in Southwark leaflet.
- Note by Holmes, 26 August 1943: telephone conversation with Morton in which Holmes told him it was clear that Catholics did not fully appreciate advantages they would gain from White Paper proposals. Assured Morton that government was not the source of a recent article in The Times (14 August) which Brown thought was 'an inspired attack.' Morton agreed it was likely that Catholics did not fully appreciate advantages offered by White Paper. He felt that Catholic criticism could be undermined by increased offer of 5%.

- Other points made by Morton: Brown was 'flaring up' politicians. Would have been advantageous to Catholics to have had a single negotiator but each bishop was supreme in his own diocese. They were 'a poor lot of bishops.' Catholics had no adequate vehicle to present their views. The Catholic Herald was a purely money-making concern, The Universe was a bourgeois production, and The Tablet was entirely wrapped up in foreign affairs.
- Chuter Ede to Brown, 19 August 1943: no grounds for believing The Times article had been inspired by the government. Requests further meeting with Brown.
 - Butler to Chuter Ede, 20 August 1943: difficulty in dealing with Catholics is that they were nervous of being fobbed off and told nothing until it was too late and the Bill was passed.
 - Butler to Heaton (BOE official) (?date): thanks him for arranging meeting with Downey (27 August).
 - Butler to Downey, 23 August 1943: thanks him for adjusting schedule so that they might meet on 27 August. Objections to White Paper proposals would be reviewed carefully before the legislation was introduced. Chuter Ede had discussed many of the Catholics' problems with Brown.
 - Duke of Norfolk to Butler, 25 August 1943: must await bishops' decision. Commented that Amigo never had any tact, is always difficult and is too old. Duke would be away for one week but would speak to Butler on his return.
 - Downey to Butler, 25 August 1943: will bring Myers (Vicar Capitular, Westminster) to the meeting on 27 August.
 - Morton to Heaton, 26 August 1943: thanks him for copy of Agreed Syllabus for Surrey - compiled with sincerity but doctrinally unsuitable for Catholic children.
 - Chuter Ede to Morton, 27 August 1943: explains background of Agreed Syllabus for Surrey.
 - BOE Report, 27 August 1943: Meeting of Butler & Downey. Downey asked how far the Bill would be mandatory on LEAs and raised the question of the cost of school transport for Catholics. Discussion followed on cost to denominations for non-provided elementary schools, closure of redundant schools, machinery for establishing new Catholic schools. Downey asked about possibility of interest-free loans from government for new Catholic schools. Butler replied that this would be met with strong protests.

- BOE Report, 30 August 1943: Meeting of Butler & Archbishop Godfrey (Apostolic Delegate), 18 August. Did not pursue the 'intriguing question' of who would be the next cardinal. Butler found it difficult to negotiate with Catholics as each bishop spoke for himself. He lamented the death of Hinsley and the illness of Downey during the critical phase when the White Paper was about to be published. Godfrey hoped Butler would concentrate his attention on Downey. Butler said he would be glad to maintain contact with Downey but he and the other bishops 'when released from the friendly atmosphere of conversations with us, were stirring up agitation in the country.' Godfrey reported that the Pope had congratulated the bishops on their firm stand, to which Butler felt 'a certain element of nausea' in view of Vatican ignorance of the Church school question in England. It would be impossible to concede the full Catholic claim. Godfrey was concerned about LEA powers re-BOE & sought to examine the pressures on Butler, viz. teaching profession, LEAs, Exchequer. Butler responded by saying that the chief pressure was the fact that most people wanted a unified education system, which at the same time gave denominations the right to religious teaching. Catholics were a minority and the state could not be responsible for paying in full for personal religious requirements of any particular group. Godfrey informed him that the Hierarchy failed to understand why the government was unable to pay the full costs for Catholics to provide their form of teaching just as it paid for Agreed Syllabus teaching.
- Summary (signed Downey & Myers), 30 August 1943: meeting with Butler & Chuter Ede, 27 August 1943 (see above).
- Morton to Chuter Ede, 30 August 1943: reply to letter of 27 August. No Catholic compromise with Agreed Syllabus was possible. He had tried to act as a 'small additional bridge' at Butler's request.
- Heaton to Wing Commander A.W.H.Jones, 23 August 1943: discusses cost to Catholics of alternative B and revival of 1936 Act schemes.
- Note by Heaton (? date): telephone conversation with Brown, who had had nothing to do with Southwark leaflet. Discussed details of 50% grant.
- Sir Robert Topping (Conservative Central Office) to Butler, 26 August 1943: enclosed copies of correspondence between Brown & Charles Pearce, General Secretary of London Teachers' Association, re-Catholic opposition to Education Bill and the likely continuation of this opposition into post-war period.

- Butler to Topping, 30 August 1943: not surprised by Brown's views. Found him 'highly political in outlook.' Inevitably a certain amount of political trouble. Catholics would use whichever M.P.s would do them most service.
- Butler to Downey, 1 September 1943: had given much thought to meeting with Downey & Myers. No real difference between him and those Catholics who took a realistic view of what was and was not possible. Point at issue was whether Catholics would be able to shoulder financial burden. Requested Catholic estimate of what educational proposals would cost. Discussed Catholic fears about LEA powers.
- Butler to Downey, 1 September 1943 (private & confidential): government aware that Hierarchy supported public campaign against educational reform plans. Government's proposals being misrepresented at Catholic protest meetings.
- FitzAlan to Butler, 31 August 1943: many Catholic difficulties with proposals were financial.
- Butler to FitzAlan, 1 September 1943: Government did not wish to prejudice future of Catholic schools or force Catholic children into an atmosphere which did not suit them.
- Note by Chuter Ede, 30 August 1943: Much Catholic propaganda centred on argument that denominational schools unable to find the money required under Alternative B would have to accept Alternative A, which was offensive to them. BOE must make it clear to denominations that they will not be forced to accept what they describe as 'an atheist form of solution.'
- Note by Holmes (?date): nothing new in proposition that if Catholics wanted Alternative B they must raise their share of the money. Butler commented: 'This does not mean the Catholics' point that they are being asked to meet an unknown and astronomical commitment. How can we put a 'ceiling' to their fears?'
- Holmes to Butler, 2 September 1943: only way to dissipate Catholic fears is assurance that the extent of commitment will be limited by BOE's new building regulations and that it will not be astronomical because neither BOE nor LEAs were in a financial position to indulge in extravagant building.

- Downey to Butler, 3 September 1943: reply to Butler's letter of 1 September. Downey not responsible for 'public utterances of any individual bishop.' Had done his best to advocate temperate language and accurate statements. Would continue to do so but feeling was running high in many parts of the country. Without some concession on new schools there was bound to be a determined opposition to the Bill. Reply to official letter: FitzAlan and Rankeillour had suggested Catholics appoint two chartered accountants to meet two appointed by government to discuss cost of proposals.
- Butler to Chuter Ede, 9 September 1943: Lord President and Chancellor think Butler should 'take his troubles to ministers.' This would entail a statement of Catholic attitude and the way the BOE intended to deal with Catholics. BOE could not depart from main lines of settlement but could attempt to relieve Catholic anxieties, attempting to get from them a statement of financial implications as they saw them.
- Note by Butler, 9 September 1943: account of meeting with Archbishop Williams of Birmingham and Mr Rigby (a Catholic), Chairman of the Elementary Sub-Committee, Birmingham. Butler had explained principles underlying the proposals for denominational schools. He did not think a 100% grant accompanied by full state control would appeal to Catholics. Alternative B was as generous as he could persuade the country to accept. Discussion of position re-new schools. Williams wanted Butler to meet the Bishops of Salford and Hexham & Newcastle when visiting their areas.
- P.H.Edwards to Butler, 1 September 1943: wanted Butler to meet Catholic representatives when he visited Newcastle.
- Edwards to Butler, 10 September 1943: repeated request for a meeting.
- Edwards to Chuter Ede, 17 September 1943: requests him to meet Catholic deputation when he visited Newcastle.
- Goodfellow to Chuter Ede, 20 September 1943: re-above request. Arrangements for meeting of Butler & Chuter Ede with northern bishops at Ushaw, 29 September.
- Chuter Ede to Goodfellow, 22 September 1943: copy of reply to Edwards. Suggests his group join Catholics of South Shields in meeting him on 30 September.

- Edwards to Chuter Ede, 28 September 1943: had no wish to intrude on meeting between Chuter Ede and his constituents in South Shields.
- Edwards to Butler, 27 September 1943: encloses resolution of Catholic meeting in Hull, 26 September, demanding there be no financial discrimination against those wanting liberty of conscience.
- Butler to Captain J.H.F.McEwan (?date): discusses advantages to Catholics of Alternative B as compared with existing situation. Did not think financial costs beyond capacity of Catholics. No public support for providing new voluntary schools.
- Heaton to Butler (?date): report on contacts with Morton. Morton's position was unchanged.
- Bishop McCormack (Hexham & Newcastle) to Butler, 14 September 1943: encloses estimate for his diocese of cost of Butler's proposals. Suggests Butler address annual meeting of northern bishops at Ushaw. Downey agrees.
- Butler to McCormack, 18 September 1943: hopes to meet bishops at Ushaw. Diocese of Hexham & Newcastle estimates (12 September 1943) amount to be found = £1,479,382.
- BOE comment on estimate: appears to be a genuine attempt to assess cost. Similar estimates from other dioceses would be useful.
- Further examination of Hexham & Newcastle estimate, 20 September 1943: spread over 25 years the annual cost to Catholics would be £1 per head.
- BOE re-Dual System (?date): statement of BOE position.
- McCormack to Butler, 3 October 1943: as White Paper stands Catholics must fight. They were left with a balance they could not find. Encloses copy of his address given in Newcastle City Hall on previous Sunday.
- Butler to McCormack, 5 November 1943: prepared to meet him.
- Bishop Marshall (Salford) to Butler, 15 September 1943: preferred to meet Butler with his fellow bishops at Ushaw rather than privately.
- Topping to Butler, 22 September 1943: copy of letter from Brown to Pearce re- article in The Schoolmaster.
- Shuster to Butler (?date): prepared to put question to Butler re-existing costs of denominational schools. Enlarges on these costs: Shuster wanted 100% grant for Catholic schools.

- Butler to Shuster, 24 September 1943: wanted to examine Shuster's fears. Whole question was very complex.
- Draft letter to Shuster (?date): suggests Butler would be prepared to answer the following parliamentary question: 'What percentage of the total annual cost of non-provided public education is borne by public funds?'
- Butler to Downey, 30 September 1943: thanks him for Ushaw meeting. Will examine points put, e.g. Marshall's suggestion re-limit to Catholic liability. Warns Downey of possible danger to cause of Catholic education of lack of co-operation with White Paper proposals. Government did not underestimate difficulties facing Downey and his colleagues.
- Copy of article from Liverpool Echo, 16 October 1943: account of Downey's public meeting at Liverpool Stadium.
- The Times: account of same meeting.
- Marshall to Butler, 8 October 1943: suggested Catholics pay half the cost of reorganising their existing schools and of building new ones. Total commitment should not cost more than £15 per place. Provided estimate on this basis of cost to Diocese of Salford.
- Note re-Marshall's figures, 11 October 1943: £15 per head suitable for primary schools but would only amount to 12.5% of cost of a new senior school place.
- BOE Notes re-Hierarchy (?date): basis of response to Catholic objections to White Paper. No movement on new schools. Proposes limitation of financial liability of managers for building costs of voluntary schools.
- BOE Note, 15 October 1943: suggests 'ceiling' on costs. Proposes £25 per primary place and £45 for secondary schools outside of 1936 Act. No ceiling for 1936 Act schools. Makes some estimate of cost to government.
- BOE: Discussion of Bill (?date): account of meeting of Butler & Chuter Ede with Hierarchy, 19 October. Downey's Liverpool speech indicated Catholic wish to continue Dual System. Advantages to Catholics of present plan: under Alternative B they would sacrifice none of their freedom in return for increased aid. Ultimate Catholic liability would be £0.5M per annum in loan charges. BOE unable to accept Marshall's figure of £15 per capita ceiling. No public funds for new denominational schools, but formula devised for new schools necessitated by government action or that of planning authorities. Butler believed new educational proposals could be made to work in the interests of Catholics.

- Captain E.C.Cobb, M.P. to Butler, 27 September 1943: had the impression that Catholics had reached limit of their concessions.
- Butler to Chancellor of Exchequer, 14 September 1943: issue of new voluntary schools the most difficult. Free Churches adamantly opposed.
- BOE Report to War Cabinet, Lord President's Committee, 1943: Butler reported on reception of White Paper. He proposed to warn Catholics, at Ushaw, that as a result of overstating their case, there was a risk of considerable reaction among other interests.
- BOE Draft re-Catholics and White Paper (? date): outlines proposals re-Alternative B. Difficulty of fully reviving 1936 Act. Impossible to make mandatory on LEAs.
- Butler to Sir John Anderson (draft), 2 October 1943 (not sent): discusses Ushaw meeting. Desires meeting with Anderson at Treasury. Butler had clear impression that Catholics were determined to go down fighting despite the most emphatic warnings given by him and Chuter Ede. Hierarchy convinced that Catholics were unable to raise their share of the money under Alternative B. They wanted the costs pegged. Butler wished to discuss this with him.
- Rev. J.Coughlan (Principal Catholic Chaplain to Army) to Butler, 6 October 1943: discontent among Catholics in forces over Bill. Interference with their parental rights to have children educated in accordance with Catholic principles. Catholics unable to meet financial liabilities of Bill.
- Shuster to Butler, 14 August 1943: thanks for help with drafting parliamentary question. Would like to discuss the Dutch system with Butler's advisers.
- Butler to Shuster, 16 October 1943: investigating Dutch system.
- Canon E.F.Brale (Principal, Bede College, Durham) to Butler, 21 October 1943: Downey was the 'fighting chief in England of Popish educational policy.' Government should resist Catholic aggression.
- Butler to Braley: difficult to understand Catholic response to White Paper offer.

- Butler to Downey, 20 October 1943: re-their meeting of 19 October. Financial 'ceiling' was being studied by Holmes. Suggests this should remain confidential.
- Downey to Butler, 21 October 1943: accepts discussion of 'ceiling' must remain private. Suggests meeting of episcopal deputation with BOE on 2 November.
- BOE Notes: re-meeting with bishops on 2 November. Ceiling applicable to all denominations for schools receiving 50% grant but not for 1936 Act schools. There should be provision for new schools necessitated by population movement. BOE's objective was to maintain contact and working arrangements with Catholics.
- Sir Robert Carey, M.P. to Butler, 26 October 1943: reports on sense of grievance of his Catholic Manchester constituents. Could Alternative B be completely revised?
- BOE Note (?date): report of meeting with bishops, 2 November. Discussion re-'ceiling'. Butler was sorry to hear the general tone of Catholic criticism, the popular strand of which had been allowed to go too far. The £15 'ceiling' was far too low. Discussion of arrangements for new schools caused by population shifts.
- Butler to Anderson, 3 November 1943: report of meeting with bishops. Downey less desirous of breaking off negotiations with government than some others who appeared frightened of their own supporters.
- Morton to Butler, 1 November 1943: Rankeillour, FitzAlan & Shute had asked to see Prime Minister to discuss Catholic education.
- Churchill to FitzAlan, 4 November 1943: he was too busy to see him.
- Butler to Downey, 5 November 1943: BOE attempting to find rough estimate of costs to Catholics of White Paper proposals. Asked Downey to nominate representatives to facilitate this.
- Downey to Butler, 10 November 1943: restated fundamental Catholic objection to some White Paper proposals.
- Butler to Downey, 12 November 1943: disorientated by Downey's last letter, but would leave no stone unturned to narrow differences between BOE and Catholics. Conscious of Downey's anxieties re-new schools issue.
- Downey to Butler, 17 November 1943: if government moves the population it was incumbent upon it to provide new schools. This left untouched the question of 'brand new' schools. Future of Catholic education depended on this question.

- BOE Note, 19 November 1943: re-'brand new' schools Butler had never concealed from Downey the difficulty of providing money for this purpose.
- Note by Butler, 12 November 1943: lunch with Godfrey. Tone of meeting helpful. The Archbishop tried to explain recent behaviour of bishops and sense of grievance among Catholics.
- Note by Butler, 18 November 1943: account of meeting with FitzAlan, who deeply distrusted Downey. Butler regretted that Westminster was vacant.
- Butler to Downey, 16 December 1943: enclosed copy of Education Bill published today. Hoped Catholics would note concessions to their schools needing to change site because of population movement.
- Butler to Downey, 16 December 1943: estimates of Catholic costs have now been sent to bishops.
- Downey to Butler, 17 December 1948: thanks Butler for copies of Bill. Hierarchy to meet on 4 January to discuss BOE estimates.

ED 136-458

- Archbishop Griffin (Westminster) to Butler, 7 January 1944: report on Hierarchy meeting (4 January): bishops wanted further clarification of 50% grant for 'transferred schools.' All phases of educational reconstruction, including nursery education, would have to be taken into account for a complete estimate of Catholic burden. Proposed new 'ceiling' figures.
- BOE Note (?date): Griffin's 'ceiling' proposals ambiguous.
- Butler to Griffin, 11 January 1944: unclear why Catholics wanted to enter field of nursery education.
- BOE, 21 January 1944: meeting between Butler & Chuter Ede and Griffin & McCormack. Bishops requested further concessions but Butler replied that increased aid meant greater control. Agreed that fixing 'ceiling' was unsatisfactory method of control and that loan system was better. Bill was at Committee stage thus 'hole and corner' decisions taken by BOE and Hierarchy were undesirable. Further meetings not ruled out.

- Catholic estimate of costs of Education Bill proposals, 17 January 1944: annual average cost estimated at £1.8M (eight times previous annual burden).
- BOE (?date): comment on Catholic estimate. Calculation included several irrelevant items & national figures were grossly inflated.
- Note by Chuter Ede, 28 January 1944: report of meeting with McCormack. Discussed question of appointment of teachers to Catholic schools, guarantee of 1936 Act schemes, possibility of government loans for 50% Catholic commitment, powers given to LEA by Bill.
- Note by Butler, 4 February 1944: meeting with Griffin (3 February). Latter wanted to remove any bitterness from the atmosphere. Discussion of appointment of Catholic teachers and possibility of government loans.
- Copy (from Griffin to Butler) of Bishop Moriarty (Shrewsbury) to Griffin, 31 January 1944: special problems of his diocese. Apart from narrow strip south of Mersey from Stalybridge to Wallasey, in the rest of Cheshire and Shropshire there was no Catholic senior school.
- Butler to Griffin, 5 February 1944: 'I am sure you attach as much importance as I do to establishing as favourable an atmosphere for the consideration of our difficulties in the Committee stage of the House as possible . . .'
- Griffin to Butler, 5 February 1944: assumes Butler has no objection to Catholic MPs tabling amendments to the financial clauses of the Bill.
- Butler to Griffin, 8 February 1944: 'impracticability' of altering general basis of proposals.
- Prime Minister's Office to Butler (?date): encloses letter from FitzAlan (2 February) re-position of Catholic schools under Education Bill. Requests draft answer.
- BOE draft letter in response to FitzAlan (?date): precise burden on Catholics uncertain but being estimated. It would not be beyond their means.
- Note by Goodfellow (?date): discusses response to letter from Griffin (10 March 1944).
- Butler to Griffin, 13 March 1944: most 'brand new' schools would be replacements and eligible for 50% grant.

- Griffin to Butler, 17 March 1944: Hierarchy met on 15 March and while pressing claims for justice they accepted that government had gone a considerable way to meet Catholic representations. Added suggested amendments.
- Note by Goodfellow, 18 March 1944: comment on Griffin's 'adjustments'. Added comment from Butler: 'This is all moving the right way.'
- Butler to Griffin, 21 March 1944: reply to Griffin's letter of 17 March.
- Stokes to Butler, 17 March 1944: re-amendment to clause 23 of Bill.
- BOE, Education Bill: notes on Catholic members' amendments to clauses 30-90.
- BOE draft reply to Stokes:
- Copy of speech made by Griffin at Brighton, 19 March 1944.
- Butler to Griffin, 31 March 1944: discusses amendments re-loans.
- Stokes to Butler, 27 March 1944: encloses memorandum from Brown in support of claim that Catholics were only brought into the discussions over education proposals after pledges had been made to Church of England and the Free Churches.
- BOE Note: re-Stokes' letter and Brown's memorandum. Refutes Brown's claim.
- Butler to Stokes, 1 April 1944: Brown had failed to recall negotiations which had lasted over two-and-a-half years.
- Stokes to Butler, 3 April 1944: copy of a further amendment.
- Butler to Griffin, 1 April 1944: indicates form of words he will use in forthcoming debate on grant clauses of Bill.
- Griffin to Butler, 3 April 1944: thanks for above. Refers to suggested loan clauses.
- Griffin to Butler, 20 April 1944: thanks for amended copy of Bill; 'We have not received justice but the Board has gone a considerable way towards meeting Roman Catholic representations.'
- Brown to Chuter Ede, 29 April 1944: re-maximum and minimum distances for which school transport would be provided.
- Chuter Ede to Brown, 1 May and 2 May 1944: avoids committing himself re-maximum & minimum distances.

- Archbishop of Westminster, Memorandum re-Education Bill, 5 April 1944: states what Catholics have received under Bill.
- Butler to Griffin, 9 May 1944: re-school playing fields.
- Brown to Pearce, 13 June 1944 [copy from Topping]: government has got its way and imposed 'intolerable burdens on our working class people.'
- Griffin to Butler, 18 July 1944: re-Rankeillour's amendment to clause 102, loans to voluntary bodies & LEAs.
- Butler to Griffin, 25 July 1944: reassurance re-loans.

In addition, there is in this file correspondence from Stokes during the passage of the Bill through the House of Commons, April to May 1944.

WORK IN PROGRESS

Rev. Michael E. Williams

Following my work on the English Colleges in Rome and Valladolid¹, for some years I have been researching the English College in Lisbon. As the college is now closed it is doubtful whether a book will ever be published. However, the editors of the new and revised Dictionary of National Biography have sent me from time to time entries that require updating and suggestions for new articles. It is surprising how, generally speaking, so much fresh material has come to light since the old dictionary was compiled at the turn of the century. This is due not only to the painstaking work of individual scholars but to the labours of countless anonymous archivists cataloguing documents and making them accessible to scholars. One needs to remember that one hundred years ago the Records Series of the Catholic Record Society had not yet commenced its publication.

Although my own main interest and curiosity is about the past and the contribution of the overseas colleges to English Catholicism at home, there are others who approach the territory from a different angle. As most readers will know, there is something of a crisis in Western Europe concerning the shortage of vocations to the priesthood and consequently the future of the seminary. This has led some to take a look back at the past to find out not only what exactly happened in those days but why certain measures were taken and how we arrived at the present situation. There is a desire to try and locate events within their context. Present day topicality leads to seeking the topicality of the past.

So it must be remembered that archives are of interest not only to the chronicler who wants to record what happened and when – dates, names, college timetables, finances – but also to the investigator who is anxious to make connections, draw conclusions, and discern motives and reasons for why things turned out as they did. Unless he wants to write fiction, he must keep his imagination in check, and so at times has to admit ignorance and leave matters open and undecided. In the desire to penetrate beyond the bald facts, letters and other forms of correspondence can be a great help. But often clues can be found elsewhere. Books of accounts can appear as dreary statistics, but the presence of an overall debit account at a certain time or the purchase of a particular book or painting can have a special significance in a specific context.

That is why the preservation of such apparently useless details might have a relevance for some future investigator.

Lisbon College is now closed and its archives are well catalogued and accessible to researchers. But this does not mean that the Lisbon Collection at Ushaw College holds all the information that there is about the establishment. For example, the Annals of the Lisbon College refer to an official visitation made by Mgr Bernard Ward (the President of St Edmund's, Ware, and the future Bishop of Brentwood) on behalf of Cardinal Bourne in 1915. The Annals state that the results of this visitation have never been made known. However, I discovered a copy of Ward's report in the Westminster Diocesan Archives. A casual browser might easily pass this over as of little interest: never destroy even what appears to be irrelevant to your particular archive.

Often research involves looking through documents that do not provide what you are seeking, and you appear to have wasted hours of your time. But sometimes there are surprises. In 1910 when the Republic was established in Portugal and an anti-clerical government came to power, the Papal Nuncio was recalled to Rome and a charge d'affaires remained to look after the nunciature. This much is known from the English College archives since the Nuncio was not only Protector of the college but was also on very friendly terms with the teaching staff. But what I discovered among Bourne's correspondence in the Westminster Archives was quite unexpected. At the request of Cardinal Merry del Val, the Papal Secretary of State, the Archbishop of Westminster was asked to accept the whole archive of the Lisbon nunciature for safe-keeping in London. Some twelve cases of documents were, with the co-operation of the British Legation in Lisbon, shipped to England. There they remained for several years before being forwarded to Rome, unread, unopened, and with seals intact. The object of my researches, the English College in Lisbon, does not figure directly in this business. It is not mentioned in the Bourne correspondence, nor is there any reference to the negotiations in its own archive. But knowledge of the episode throws a new light on college events: viz. Cardinal Bourne's visit to the college in 1908, when he met the Nuncio and British consular officials, as well as the eagerness with which he accepted the invitation to attend the tercentenary celebrations in 1922. The college was a true catalyst. Without actually doing anything, the existence of an English Catholic college in Lisbon was able to serve the interests of the Holy See.

Finally, the story also tells us something about the preservation of archives. Although British officials felt that the Church's fear of a violation of the Vatican delegation by the new government was ungrounded (and so it proved to be), the transfer of archives nevertheless took place, and it was in the interests of security that they remained for seventeen years in London unconsulted and unread.

POEM

Sister Felicity Moody RJM of the Convent of Jesus and Mary, Felixstowe, has submitted the following poem sent to her by one of her Sisters in Rome:

On Being an Archivist
O ancient One
Let my voice sing a Glory for the histories and stories that are recorded and stored in grey cardboard boxes.

Let my hands be gentle as I touch the fragile letters, dated hundreds of years ago.

Let my hands be loving as I file and store the histories and memories of holy people.

Let my body be reverent
as I walk among the treasures of the great, and not-so-great ones who have gone before.

Let my heart pray for those whose names in a bank of files show only their birth their life and their death.

Let my soul be astounded!

THE MANNING ARCHIVE

V. Alan McClelland

With the recent publication of important new studies into the life and work of Henry Edward Manning, interest has been renewed concerning the locations and dispersal of the extant Manning archive. David Newsome's The Convert Cardinals (1993) and James Pereiro's Cardinal Manning: An Intellectual Biography (1998) have taken their place alongside of earlier revisionist studies by Shane Leslie (1921), myself (in 1962 and 1972) and Robert Gray (1985) in presenting the public achievement and inner spirituality of Manning in terms of a more sustainable historical and theological dimension than that offered by the damaging biography ('malicious' as Wilfrid Ward judged it) by E.S. Purcell (1896) or its direct progeny in Lytton Strachey's Eminent Victorians (1918). Furthermore, Peter Erb's stimulating and important 1996 Thomas Aquinas Lecture at Pitts Theological Library in Atlanta on the politics of Manning's conversion has whetted the appetite of scholars for his forthcoming analytical edition of the extant Manning-Gladstone correspondence, a collection that includes the letters Purcell wrongly alleged were destroyed. Erb's book will present a major aid to Manning studies and will obviate the necessity of working through the Manning letters in the British Library's Gladstone collection.

There are no longer, of course, any Manning papers located at St Mary of the Angels in Bayswater. The Oblates of St Charles were Manning's literary executors and, after the Cardinal's death in 1892, his papers were conveyed to the community house of the Oblates for safe keeping. It was from Bayswater, indeed, that Edmund Purcell succeeded in removing about half of the collection that was to form the basis for his subsequent biography. The limited nature of what he received, of course, explains to some degree the gaps, inaccuracies and misinterpretations of much of what was to be written. After Purcell's death, the Oblates failed to recover all that he had removed and, indeed, some of the papers were offered for sale and have since disappeared from view. It remains possible to find Manning letters for sale at public auction from time to time. To compound the difficulty, the Oblates, as time progressed, lacked the scholarly propensities among their community that had marked the interests of earlier members and, hence, they failed fully to value their possession by taking appropriate care of it. If it had not been for the commitment of a visiting French priest, in 1946-1947, who organized and studied the extant papers for a doctorate he was to obtain some ten years later at the Sorbonne, the collection would have been lost or badly damaged by the ravages of time. Although a substantial number of the letters were catalogued by the Abbé Alphonse Chapeau, the rest were eventually stored in file-boxes and makeshift containers. The papers never became fully accessible, even as a semi-public archive, the Abbé's 'custodial' rôle being confined to the short period each year when he was able to visit London from the post he held at l'Université Catholique de l'Ouest, Angers. The Oblates, as busy parochial clergy, tried to protect themselves, at other times, from the constant stream of casual enquiries and were largely unfamiliar with the detailed arrangement of the archive. This is not to say that, from time to time, access was not permitted to particular scholars who knew what they were seeking. Personally, I always enjoyed a warm welcome over the many years I visited Bayswater.

On the withdrawal of the Oblates from the parish of St Mary of the Angels and the subsequent demise of the Congregation itself, the question of the permanent housing of the collection became acute. By 1981, when the Abbé Chapeau was officially appointed as archivist by the small number of surviving Oblates, a good deal of the post-1865 Manning material (relating to the 'Catholic' life) had been removed to France where, after his retirement in 1982 from the Catholic University at Angers, Chapeau hoped to continue with further work on the papers. This, of course made other scholarly access even more difficult than heretofore.

By 1982, the decision was finally taken to locate those papers relating to Manning's 'Anglican' life (the years to 1851), and to his family, at the Bodleian Library in Oxford where they are now kept as a collection and are easily available for consultation. Particularly interesting are Manning's letters to his brother Frederick between 1832 and 1866, to Archdeacon Julius Hare between 1840 and 1851 and with successive bishops of Chichester. Among other material there are letters to and from Newman (1836-1845), Frederick Oakeley (1844-1845), Pusey (1837-1851) and Samuel Wood (1831-1843). Of especial significance for the development of Manning's religious views are the letters to and from the Wilberforce family and those to and/or from James Hope, T. W. Allies and William Dodsworth. In fact, the Bodleian collection is now the most important archive of Manning material in this country.

In the National Library of Scotland, there is a valuable source of Manning material in the J. R. Hope-Scott papers, covering the period 1838-1872, a collection that frequently escapes the attention of Manning researchers. Again, the bulk of it is concerned with the pre-Catholic period. Particularly important for Manning scholarship are the letters of Pusey to Hope-Scott in the same collection. Manning's letter to Hope-Scott of 23 January 1850 holds the key to the Archdeacon's conversion. Referring to the Gorham case, he writes '... our present crisis forces the whole question again upon us, for believing as I do in the Infallibility of the Church as the only foundation of Faith, I am unable to yield to any other authority a final power to interpret ...'

It had been expected that the papers relating to Manning's 'Catholic' period would have been returned to Manning's diocese on the death of Abbé Chapeau. This did not happen but, through recent negotiations by the diocesan archivist, it has been possible to recover the important correspondence between Manning and Wiseman (1855-1865), Manning and Ullathorne (1858-1888) and Manning and Vaughan (1859-1889). Other material did not return to the Westminster diocese, including that relating to 'the social question' which remains at Angers and the 'missing' Gladstone-Manning correspondence which found its way to the U.S.A.

The Manning collection in the Pitts Theology Library at Emory University, Atlanta, Georgia is an important resource. As the outcome of two initial major purchases (involving the cost of something like $70,000), the university succeeded in acquiring 800 volumes of Manning's personal library from Brian Carter, an Oxford bookseller, and a collection of 1,500 manuscripts, 3,500 books and pamphlets through the agency of Anthony Garnett and Benjamin Weinrab, booksellers of London. The earlier provenance of some of the material is obscure but most of the books came from Bayswater. Emory has made further acquisitions since then, not least that of the Gladstone/Manning material from the original Bayswater collection which Peter Erb is including as part of his edition of Manning-Gladstone documents. Of particular importance in the Emory collection are the drafts of issues discussed at the First Vatican Council, encapsulating Manning's corrections and marginal notes. In the collection there is a substantial number of pamphlets of the 1870 period and a series of Odo Russell's secret reports to the Government on the work of the Council. Correspondence of the period from 1840 is supplemented by a substantial collection of sermon and meditation notes, drafts of articles and other writings. It is sad that Manning's magnificent library should have been broken up in England but a pleasure to acknowledge its reassembly, in almost pristine form, at Emory. In England, however, the Allen Hall Library still retains a good selection, albeit not a comprehensive one, of Manning's major publications.

A further source of importance, still largely unused by Manning students, is that of Manning's correspondence in the archives of Propaganda, Rome. There is also a number of his letters in the Kirby collection of the Irish College, Rome. Cardinal Manning was a prolific correspondent and his letters continue to surface in a wide variety of collections and locations, including less well-known Catholic archives in Ireland and Scotland.

BOOK REVIEWS

Record Repositories in Great Britain (Tenth Edition) edited by Ian Mortimer, The Royal Commission on Historical Manuscripts (PRO Publications, 1997, pp.72: £3.99)

This invaluable resource lists those institutions in Great Britain 'whose objectives include the systematic collection and preservation of written records other than those of their own administration and which also make regular provision for their public use.' National and local record offices and libraries with archival holdings are listed with full details of how to contact the respective institution, hours of opening, restrictions on entry and use etc. For the first time information is given about repositories established as a result of local government reorganisation. The Scottish Catholic Archives and the Westminster Diocesan Archives are among those listed in Part 1 (National, Special and University Repositories).

Record Offices: How to find them (Eighth Edition) by Jeremy Gibson & Pamela Peskett (Federation of Family History Societies, Bury, 1998, pp.64: £3.50)

This publication will act as a companion to that reviewed above inasmuch as its strength lies in providing a sketch map of (chiefly) county and city record offices in Britain, although the section on London does include details of the location of other repositories. Although information about entry and use of each archive is less expansive, the practical advantage of this booklet to those seeking access to record offices etc. is seen by the very clear directions regarding parking, railway stations, and location in relation to other institutions within the same city. Being a resource intended for family historians, the booklet also contains a very helpful Code of Practice for those using archival collections. Indeed, this Code could well form the basis for individual archivists' own 'house rules' for receiving researchers.

Archives, The Very Essence of our Heritage by Christopher Kitching, (Phillimore, Chichester, 1996, pp.80: £14.95)

Dr Christopher Kitching, as Secretary to the Royal Commission on Historical Manuscripts, is uniquely placed to review the activities of the numerous official and private bodies which make up the archive scene in the United Kingdom. He needs no introduction to our members for he spoke at the 1998 annual conference and writes in this edition of Catholic Archives. The breadth of his knowledge, experience and wise counsel is demonstrated in this masterly survey of the archive situation today. In this beautifully produced and lavishly illustrated book, Dr Kitching first explains and emphasises the value of archives as the main source of evidence for national and local history, 'a rich resource and part of our heritage of which the nation can be justly proud.' He then explores the diversity of archives in their official and private custody, revealing the partnerships between owners, custodians and users 'which have opened up to public study an ever expanding wealth of historical records.' The National Council on Archives, which sponsored the book, was established in 1988 to consider (and presumably to attempt to resolve) current issues regarding the care, custody and use of archives, to make the public more aware of these issues, and to co-ordinate the activities of its member organisations, the individual functions and services of which are fully described in an Appendix. When the book was published in 1996, the services of the Catholic Archives Society to the wider public were not sufficiently established to merit any mention, but members will gain much more from reading this valuable survey and identifying the various agencies which serve archive owners, carers and users. Several of the organisations described in the Appendix are open to private as well as institutional membership, e.g. the British Records Association, while those who are primarily engaged in archive work may be eligible for membership of the Society of Archivists, with which our Society seeks closer links. (Here it would not be out of place to urge members to join the Catholic Record Society, with which we share parallel interests). Only by taking part in such well-established national bodies can members widen their experience and in due course be able to introduce to national and local historians the 'rich resource' which Catholic archives can offer. This is one way in which members can seek to implement the evangelising role of archives recommended in The Pastoral Function of Church Archives.

Dr Kitching does not hide weaknesses and dangers (e.g. in the economies forced on public archive services) but shows how these can be overcome, not least by co-operation and combining resources. Above all, he conveys that sense of awe and intrinsic respect for archives which we should all feel and from which we can draw inspiration and encouragement. All who cherish archives are much indebted to for this admirable, scholarly and popular book. Order your copy now.

Robin Gard

Among recent publications in the field of Catholic history there are a number of books which show evidence of having utilised the archival resources of members of the Catholic Archives Society. Dominican Gallery: Portrait of a Culture by Aidan Nichols O.P. (Gracewing, Leominster, 1997, pp.xiii + 433: £30) is a detailed study of seven of the most prominent members of the English Dominican Province of the past seventy years: Fathers Victor White (theologian and psychologist); Gerald Vann (spiritual writer); Thomas Gilby (philosopher); Sebastian Bullough (writer on aesthetics and exegete); Gervase Mathew (Byzantinist and medievalist); Kenelm Foster (expert on Dante and Petrarch); and Conrad Pepler (theologian). Father Pepler will be remembered for his part in the foundation of the Catholic Archives Society and as Warden of Spode House (1953-81), where the first few Annual Conferences of the Society were held. The author has made good use of the English Dominican Archives and acknowledges the assistance given by the archivist, Father Bede Bailey. The book includes two interesting preliminary chapters on the English Dominicans and the wider English Catholic setting. Indeed, the preface (p.xiii note 8) contains a quotation on the philosophy of archivship from an article in this journal written by Sister Dominique Horgan.

Father Martin D'Arcy: Philosopher of Christian Love by H. J. A. Sire (Gracewing, Leominster, 1997, pp.xii + 223: £17.99) is a carefully constructed study of the life and thought of perhaps the best known English Jesuit of modern times. The author pays tribute to the generous help of Father Geoffrey Holt at Farm Street, and an examination of the sources reveals judicious use of Father D'Arcy's papers deposited in the Archives of the British Jesuit Province, as well as the Campion Hall Archives, Oxford, the D'Arcy-Waugh correspondence at the British Library Manuscript Department, and the Shraday Papers at Georgetown University.

Father D'Arcy was a well known figure in America, and a study of another English Catholic figure famous on both sides of the Atlantic is Dana Greene's The Living of Maisie Ward (University of Notre Dame Press, Notre Dame IN & London, 1997, pp. xii+ 255). This study relies on a wealth of interviews, in person, or by 'phone or letter, given by those who knew Maisie Ward and Frank Sheed, and it is significant that in her bibliography the author notes that copies of the interviews have been deposited in the Archives of the University of Notre Dame. In addition to an extensive use of printed material, the chief manuscript sources employed in writing the book were letters from Ward to Dorothy Day (Dorothy Day Catholic Worker Collection, Marquette University Archives) and the Sheed and Ward Family Papers (1832-1982). Not the least interesting aspect of this study is the way in which the history of the Catholic Evidence Guild and Catholic Housing Aid Society feature in Maisie Ward's life, and this in itself should act as an encouragement to the care and development of the archives of lay organisations.

Dr Denis Evinson's Catholic Churches of London (Sheffield Academic Press, 1998, pp.281: £16.95) is an illustrated survey of the Catholic places of worship in the Cities of London and Westminster and the Inner London Boroughs. All the buildings fall within the Archdioceses of Westminster and Southwark. The author is an architectural historian and among his references one sees the use he has made of the Westminster and Southwark Archives as well as those of the Jesuits at Farm Street. This book is a worthy successor to Rottmann's London Catholic Churches published as long ago as 1926. Mention of the Southwark Diocesan Archives leads us to Father Michael Clifton's latest publication, A Victorian Convert Quintet (The Saint Austin Press, London, 1998, pp. 212: £9.95). This book is a study of five Oxford Movement converts from the last century and in each portrait the author has utilized much original archival material, viz. Robert Coffin, a Redemptorist and later Bishop of Southwark (English Province Redemptorist Archives, Clapham; Southwark Diocesan Archives); Frederick Oakeley, a companion of Newman and Canon of Westminster (Balliol College Library; Westminster Diocesan Archives; Bodleian Library); Richard Waldo Sibthorp, an Anglican clergyman who reverted to that communion after reception as a Catholic but who was reconciled to the Catholic Church before his death (Magdalen College Library); Richard Simpson, the famous Liberal Catholic (Southwark Diocesan Archives; Downside Archives); and St George Jackson Mivart, the scientist who was eventually excommunicated for heresy (Southwark Diocesan Archives; Downside Archives; Westminster Diocesan Archives). Although by no means exhaustive biographies, these essays offer a rewarding glimpse into the lives and religious journeys of five important figures in the history of Victorian Catholicism and should encourage further forays into the archival resources of Catholic Archives Society members. Lastly, Canon Maurice Abbott has given us a very useful biographical guide to the clergy of the Diocese of Shrewsbury,

To Preserve Their Memory: Shrewsbury Diocesan Priests (Deceased) 1850-1995 (available from Curial Offices, 2 Park Road South, Birkenhead L43 4UX: £8 incl. p & p). Again fully referenced, and showing careful use of the diocesan archives, this publication will surely prove indispensable to parish historians in the Diocese of Shrewsbury and serves as a model for any similar endeavour in other dioceses.

THE CATHOLIC ARCHIVES SOCIETY CONFERENCE, 1998

The nineteenth annual conference of the Catholic Archives Society was held at High Leigh Conference Centre, Hoddesdon, from 25 to 27 May.

The theme of this year's conference was 'Looking Forward', and each of the three main speakers gave papers which both challenged and encouraged the participants to reflect on the way in which the Society and its individual members might prepare for the future. Dr Brenda Hough, Director of the Church of England Record Centre, gave the first talk on the Monday evening. Her paper, which appears as the first article in the current edition of Catholic Archives, represented an honest and most stimulating survey of the importance of ecumenical co-operation in archival matters. She concluded by offering a number of suggestions to assist a closer relationship between archivists of different Christian traditions.

The Tuesday morning of the conference began with Dr Chris Kitching, Secretary to the Royal Commission on Historical Manuscripts, speaking on the theme of how Catholic archives fit into the larger picture of the archival heritage of the nation. His talk, a version of which is reproduced in the present edition of this journal, was particularly enlightening in that it situated the work of the members of the Catholic Archives Society within the context of the wide range of official and semi-official bodies established to protect and assist the care of archives at the national level.

Dr Kitching's contribution was followed by that of Amanda Arrowsmith, President of the Society of Archivists. Her long association with the Catholic Archives Society, coupled with her presidency of the national body of professional archivists, was admirably illustrated in a masterly contribution on the importance of a professional approach with regard to church archives.

The conference also included a slide presentation by Stephanie Gilluly of the Society's Irish Tour of 1997 and (two separate) visits to the Essex Record Office and the Archives of the Canonesses Regular of the Holy Sepulchre at New Hall. Together with the Special Interest Groups on Tuesday evening and the Open Forum and Annual General Meeting of the Catholic Archives Society on Wednesday morning, the conference afforded ample opportunity for members to meet and discuss matters of common interest, both formally and informally. The 1999 conference will take place at Ushaw College, Durham, from 31 May to 2 June.

CARDINAL BASIL HUME R.I.P.
PATRON OF THE CATHOLIC ARCHIVES SOCIETY
1979-1999

EDITORIAL NOTES

The Holy Year of the Millennium Jubilee has arrived, yet for the Catholic Archives Society the loss of its Patron and President within a few months of one another obliges us to begin with a request for prayers for the souls of Cardinal Hume and Bishop Foley. So much has appeared in the Catholic and secular press by way of tribute to the Cardinal, who was Patron of the Society from its foundation in 1979. The Society was represented at both the Requiem and Memorial Masses held at Westminster Cathedral. We honour the Cardinal's memory and thank God for the support he gave to the Catholic Archives Society. Bishop Foley was President of the Society from its very beginning and once again it was represented at his Requiem Mass in Lancaster Cathedral on 30 December 1999. As one concerned with the care and scholarly use of Catholic archives for more than sixty years, Bishop Foley's death marks the passing of an era in historical circles, and a full tribute to him appears in this edition of Catholic Archives.

Bishop Foley was a great bridge-builder between Catholic and non-Catholic archival and historical agencies, and one cannot help feeling that he would have read with delight Andrea Tanner's article on the British Records Association. Likewise, he followed with interest the Society's concern to respond to the proposed National Survey of Catholic Archives. Anselm Nye's skilful treatment of a fictional congregation of religious sisters offers a very practical introduction to this challenge. The contributions from Sisters Ursula Clarke (Cork Ursulines) and Helen of Jesus (Check-List of Carmels) continue this theme, as does the late Brother Austin Chadwick's summary of the location of archival material for the De La Salle Brothers' foundations. Dom Aidan Bellenger reminds us of English-speaking Catholicism's important links with Flanders, and a talk given by the Editor to students at Womersley is followed by Sister Helen Forshaw's account of the archival material kept at that seminary. It was Bishop Foley who first suggested a 'Work in Progress' section in this journal, and it is the Editor's hope that he would have approved of the present information received from the Wiltshire Record Office and the Catholic Women's League. On behalf of the Catholic Archives Society the Editor thanks all the contributors to this year's journal.

We began with death, so we must end with life. Towards the end of his Apostolic Letter on the Jubilee Year 2000 (Tertio Millennio Adveniente n.59) Pope John Paul speaks of the future of the Church and the world as belonging to the younger generation, of whom Christ expects great things. Catholic and their fellow Christians working in the world of archives have much to offer to young people by encouraging them to reflect on the past and its heritage that the future may be one of Faith, Hope and Charity.

Father Stewart Foster

BISHOP FOLEY: AN APPRECIATION

Father Stewart Foster

Brian Charles Foley was born at Ilford, Essex, on 25 May 1910, the eldest of nine children, two of whom died in infancy. He grew up in Ripley Road, Seven Kings, and his family were parishioners at SS. Peter & Paul, Ilford, where the Parish Priest, the legendary Canon Patrick Palmer, had once been described by Cardinal Vaughan as 'the most remarkable priest in my diocese'. It is estimated that one hundred vocations to the priesthood and religious life emerged from the Ilford parish during Canon Palmer's fifty-year incumbency (1896-1948), and Ripley Road must surely be unique in having produced a cardinal (Heenan), a bishop (Foley) and two priests (Fathers Francis Heenan, brother of Cardinal Heenan, and Alfred Bull, a convert who was ordained for the Diocese of Northampton) The Heenans were neighbours of the Foleys and the families were close friends.

Brian Foley's early education took place at SS. Peter and Paul Catholic School adjacent to the church in the Ilford High Road. His own vocation to the priesthood developed at an early age, and at fifteen he was sent to Ushaw College, Durham, to complete his secondary education as a church student. Ilford had been part of the Archdiocese of Westminster until 1917, when Essex and much of East London was detached to form the Diocese of Brentwood. Bishop Doubleday sent Brian Foley to Ushaw rather than to the nearby St Edmund's College, Ware, owing to a dispute between that seminary and the new diocese concerning the involvement of church students in the military cadet corps at the College. The row had erupted during the episcopate of Bernard Ward (1917-20), the first Bishop of Brentwood and curiously enough a former President of St Edmund's. Ward and Cardinal Bourne had fallen out over the issue, and it was not until after the Second World War that Brentwood sent its students to Ware. Hence Brian Foley, like John Heenan three years earlier, was despatched to the North.

Thereafter he won a scholarship to the Venerable English College, Rome, to complete his studies for the priesthood. He was ordained on 25 July 1937. Rome was to be an enduring passion in Brian Foley's life, a city of which he never tired and which he had last visited only a few months before his death.

THE RT. REV. BRIAN CHARLES FOLEY R.I.P.

Bishop Doubleday appointed the newly ordained Brian Foley as curate to Father William Toft at Shoeburyness, a widely-flung parish at the extreme eastern end of Southend-on-Sea, and taking in the Royal Artillery barracks at Shoebury Fort. Foley remained here throughout the Second World War, acting as chaplain to both German and Italian prisoners of war and to British servicemen in the locality.

Bishop Doubleday was Bishop of Brentwood for thirty-one years (1920-51). Although devoted to his flock and solicitous of the development of the diocese in the inter-war years, he became increasingly infirm and withdrew from much active responsibility for affairs. In 1948 Rome appointed as his coadjutor with right of succession the dynamic George Andrew Beck. When Bishop Beck succeeded Doubleday in 1951 he set about responding to the needs of a fast-expanding diocese, not least by ensuring that the London overspill estates and Essex new towns were provided with churches and schools. Brian Foley was to lead the way. In 1952 he was appointed to the Harold Hill estate on the edge of Romford to establish Holy Redeemer parish. Life began in a wooden hut used for Mass and a council house rented as a presbytery. The priest was as poor as most of his parishioners, and since his own boyhood home was not far from where many of them had come from he had an innate sympathy for them. Five years of zealous pastoral work saw a parish of six hundred practising Catholics, mostly of East End origin, by the time Father Foley was moved from Harold Hill in 1957.

His next appointment was to a new town, Harlow, built some twenty or more miles from London on the Essex-Hertfordshire border. Brian Foley began all over again: temporary church and presbytery, permanent buildings, a school, and within five years a parish (Holy Cross), one of five in Harlow, of one thousand Mass-goers. He was made a Canon of the diocese by Beck's successor, Bishop Wall. In his own autobiography Bishop Holland of Salford mentions how, when working for the Catholic Missionary Society, he came to value Brian Foley's pastoral zeal: '...from the lips of a priest with unique experience of New Towns I had learned the secret of pastoral success in that challenging environment. "Get them as soon as they arrive," was Father B.C.Foley's advice, backed by his own heroic example. We were campaigning in Essex New Towns – Basildon, Harlow and others. Brentwood diocese was honeycombed with them. We met many a priest committed to old time principles: 'Better to ring doorbells than churchbells.' "A house-going priest means a church-going people." Certainly England and Wales owe much to these old timers.' Brian Foley, like many of his confreres in similar situations, led a very frugal existence, but with him there was a particularly ascetic quality, an austerity of life so rooted in personal prayer, spiritual reading, dutiful pastoral visiting that his self-effacing humility tempered by great gentleness and patience proved attractive to all manner of people. His curate at Harlow later recalled how in four years the Canon had only reprimanded him once, and how his own good example was always an encouragement to the younger priest. Known as 'holy Foley' by his parishioners, Brian Foley himself would be the first to point to the priestly example he had received from Canon Palmer as a boy. As an altar server at Ilford Foley had often heard Palmer instructing the boys on priestly duties 'so that you will know how to do it when you are ordained', and when after Christmas the many Ilford-born priests returned home for a holiday, the Canon would ensure not only that there were enough servers for all the private Masses, but that these boys got to know the young priests so that they might follow in their footsteps. As priest and bishop Brian Foley was a great encourager of vocations.

On 26 April 1962 Canon Foley was named Bishop of Lancaster by Pope John XXIII. The news was made public on 1 May and the consecration took place at Lancaster Cathedral on 13 June. The principal consecrator was none other than his boyhood friend and neighbour from Ripley Road, John Carmel Heenan, Archbishop of Liverpool. Indeed, for a few months in 1962-63 the entire North-West of England and much of Wales was governed by Brentwood bishops: Heenan in Liverpool, Foley in Lancaster, Petit in Menevia, and Beck (an Assumptionist, but formerly Bishop of Brentwood) in Salford. For a small and relatively new diocese this was a remarkable feat.

As Bishop of Lancaster Brian Foley soon threw himself into the daunting task that faced him. His diocese covered a vast area (Northern Lancashire, the Lake District and Cumbria) and required an expansion of parishes and schools akin to what he had left behind in Essex. Although no stranger to the North in that he had been educated at Ushaw as a junior seminarian, Brian Foley was very much a southerner, yet he soon won the trust and affection of his priests and people who recognised his pastoral and spiritual qualities.

From 1962-65 Bishop Foley attended all four sessions of the Second Vatican Council, and at the time of his death was the last survivor among the English bishops who had taken part in the Council.

He was acquainted with Pope John XXIII, and his interventions at the Council were concerned with the priestly ministry and especially the importance of pastoral visiting. For five years he served as a member of the Congregation of Propaganda Fide, while at home he was appointed to the Bishops' Commissions for Missions and Youth.

The active pastoral life of Brian Foley both as priest and bishop was complemented by equally dynamic intellectual activity. His contribution to the field of English Catholic historical studies, both locally (Essex and Lancashire) and nationally (his scholarship with regard to the English Martyrs) was quite outstanding. From the recusant period of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries to the revival of Catholic fortunes in the nineteenth, Brian Foley's breadth and depth of knowledge and enthusiasm knew few rivals.

The roots of such historical interests were many: Ushaw and Rome, ordination into a diocese whose first bishop was Bernard Ward the historian; appointment to a parish where his next-door neighbour at Southend was Canon Joseph Whitfield, another enthusiast on the Martyrs, a student under Ward and Edwin Burton at St. Edmund's... Such were the influences which led Brian Foley to develop a deep and lasting interest in post-Reformation Catholic history. But it was at Shoeburyness as curate that he first found the opportunity to begin his many years of painstaking research and transcription of original documents. This was particularly true during the war years, for despite his many duties among the military, parish life was somewhat curtailed in that the Essex coast was a restricted zone (for fear of invasion) and many people were evacuated inland, thus reducing the overall number of parishioners. On a day off he would take a train to London and there immerse himself in the Westminster Diocesan Archives, or he would make for Chelmsford where F.G. Emmison presided over the newly-established Essex Record Office. Here the archives of the Petre family, Quarter Sessions Rolls and the like occupied him in hours of research for recusant material. Many discoveries were made, and when local Catholic history societies began their own investigations in the post-war years, it was often the case that Brian Foley 'had been there before' – although his own humility and genuine delight in others' scholarly labours would never issue in anything approaching academic one-upmanship. Indeed, Brian Foley was ever one to encourage the research of his fellow scholars.

Among the early results of Foley's labours was a series of articles on aspects of the history of Catholicism in the diocese which appeared in the Brentwood Diocesan Year Book from its first edition in 1951. Many of the missions and parishes warranted a closely-researched essay covering the recusant and post-Emancipation periods: Ingatestone, Colchester, Southend, Chelmsford, Romford, Stratford... 'Old Catholic Essex' became one of the most eagerly awaited aspects of the fledgling annual. It was hardly surprising, therefore, that in June 1958 Brian Foley, along with Mgr Dan Shanahan, John O'Leary (Librarian at Dagenham), Ted Worrall and others, was among the founders of the Essex Recusant Society. The Society met at the Ursuline Convent, Brentwood, and published the first number of its journal Essex Recusant in 1959. Canon Foley's article on the Hale family of Walthamstow appeared in that inaugural number, and to the first four volumes (1959-62) he was a regular contributor. It was here that Foley's transcripts came into their own, opening up new horizons in local recusant research. And when appointed Bishop of Lancaster Brian Foley brought with him to Lancashire a similar enthusiasm for local historical research: he was a founder of the North West Catholic History Society and in 1977 published Anne Fenwick of Hornby.

At the national level Bishop Foley played a leading part in promoting Catholic historical studies. He was President of the Catholic Record Society from 1964 to 1979, and President of the Catholic Archives Society from its foundation in 1979 until his death. Indeed, the present writer had asked him to supply a Foreword to Catholic Archives 20, and a few days before he died the bishop sent a Christmas card to the Editor enquiring by when the requested piece should be sent in. In the absence of that Foreword, it is well to recall Bishop Foley's words written by way of introduction to the first edition of Catholic Archives in 1981:

I warmly welcome this new publication... When I first learned of the founding of the Catholic Archives Society I felt a sense of deep relief... Every now and then one had heard of the irreparable loss of Catholic documents and wondered what future generations would think of us for allowing such things to happen... I offer congratulations to all those who have inspired and supported the new venture and the publication of Catholic Archives. It will be a notable addition to the scholarly volumes which the Catholic Record Society continues to issue annually to its members.

Bishop Foley was an untiring supporter of both societies.

It was, however, to the Catholic Martyrs of England and Wales that Brian Foley enjoyed particular devotion, spiritually and as a scholar. Canon Whitfield had many years before told the young curate at Shoeburyness of his desire to see published biographical studies of all the martyrs and confessors, and to this end Brian Foley devoted much of his life, adding to the list other prominent people from the Penal Days. Blessed John Paine (1961) was a pamphlet written as part of the vice-postulation of the Forty Martyrs canonised by Pope Paul VI in October 1970. Playing no small part in the movement to secure their canonisation, Brian Foley was an expert on the lives of the English Martyrs, but perhaps it was to John Paine, chaplain to Lady Petre at Ingatestone Hall and put to death at Chelmsford in 1582, that he looked in a special sense in terms of his own priestly inspiration: '... one of the glories of the secular priesthood of England' was how Foley described Paine. Much of the evidence for his research, and material used subsequently in the preparation of the cause itself, came from those hours of study at Westminster, Chelmsford and in the Public Record Office, where Foley discovered the original indictment of John Paine. In 1963 Bishop Foley produced two companion volumes detailing the lives of the martyrs and confessors of Essex, material largely pieced together from manuscript and archival sources, especially wills. Equally scholarly were his pamphlets written for the Catholic Truth Society: The Eighty-Five Blessed Martyrs (1987) and Blessed Christopher Robinson (1987). Robinson, a Cumbrian priest martyred at Carlisle in 1597, was among those beatified by Pope John Paul II in 1987.

His interest in biographical studies prompted Bishop Foley to lend great support to Father Godfrey Anstruther O.P. in the latter's ground-breaking research which resulted in the four-volume The Seminary Priests, the first volume of which (1968) was published to coincide with the fourth centenary of Cardinal Allen's foundation of the English College at Douai. Together with Mgr Dan Shanahan, who secured much of the financial backing for volumes 2-4, Bishop Foley did a great deal to promote Father Godfrey's access to the Roman archives, although not even he and Cardinal Heenan combined could manage to secure entry to the Holy Office. Bishop Foley and Mgr Shanahan told the story of how The Seminary Priests came to be written in the first essay in Opening the Scrolls (1987), a collection edited by Dom Aidan Bellenger to mark Father Anstruther's scholarly achievements. Three years earlier Bishop Foley had himself been the recipient of a collection of essays (Catholic Englishmen, edited by J.A.Hilton) published to mark the diamond jubilee of the Diocese of Lancaster. The contributors managed to combine the three great geographical loves of the bishop's life: Essex, Lancashire and Rome.

Bishop Foley retired as Bishop of Lancaster on 22 May 1985. He went to live at Nazareth House in Lancaster, where the sisters and staff cared for him with great kindness, but from where he also maintained an active scholarly and pastoral life until the very end. In the early years of his retirement he was much sought after as a supply priest around the diocese, and eager to maintain the pastoral ministry to which he had devoted his priestly life, he was given an area of the Cathedral parish to visit. The Catholics of the Ridge Estate became familiar with the house calls of the retired bishop, just as those in Harold Hill and Harlow had welcomed Father Foley in the post-war years. Being based in Lancaster meant that the bishop was able to retain his links with the Lancashire Record Office at Preston, where he had done much to promote the care and preservation of Catholic archives, and he became a familiar figure in the University Library at Lancaster, where he was sought after for his historical knowledge and expertise by scholars of a younger generation. Dr Michael Mullett, Senior Lecturer in History at the University of Lancaster, published Catholics in Britain and Ireland, 1558-1829 in 1998, and first among the acknowledgements to those involved in Catholic historical research in the North West is the name of Bishop Foley. Indeed, there could have been no better place for a recusant scholar to live than the City of Lancaster, and Bishop Foley took great delight in showing visitors the Castle where so many martyrs were tried and executed. The present writer recalls a trip to Lancaster a few years ago. The bishop was waiting at the railway station in his mini – he only learned to drive when appointed a bishop, and his skills on the road were self-confessedly limited – and the tour progressed towards the castle, driving somewhat nearer the middle of the road than allowed in the Highway Code, with some attention paid to the highway, but more to the castle walls and the exact spot of the martyrdoms.

In his years of retirement Bishop Foley published three further studies: Some People of the Penal Times and Some Other People of the Penal Times commemorated the bicentenary of the Second Catholic Relief Act in 1791. In many ways these volumes marked the achievement of what Canon Whitfield had long ago desired. In his Introduction to the first volume, Cardinal Hume wrote: 'Throughout his busy pastoral life Bishop Foley has never lost his deep scholarly and devotional interest in our Catholic heritage. He has an intimate knowledge particularly of recusant history. Once again... he has placed us in his debt.' To mark the Holy Year of 2000 Bishop Foley produced a third volume, The Story of the Jubilee Years 1300-1975 (1998). In the autumn of 1999 he paid his final visit to Rome, the last of many forays into the archival holdings and libraries of the Eternal City, and a time to reacquaint himself with the architecture and history of a place he loved so well.

A life spent in prayer, spiritual reading, study (he was more familiar with The Catechism of the Catholic Church than many of his fellow bishops, remarked Archbishop Kelly in his homily at Bishop Foley's Requiem Mass), scholarly research and pastoral work... such were the achievements of Bishop Foley when called from this life on the morning of 23 December 1999. At the Requiem Mass in Lancaster Cathedral on 30 December Archbishop Kelly of Liverpool, himself ordained a priest for the Diocese of Lancaster and once a curate at the Cathedral, spoke movingly of Bishop Foley's life. The Archbishop read a statement from Bishop Foley which he had directed be given at his funeral. After asking forgiveness for his failings, he commended the clergy, religious and laity of his two dioceses, Lancaster and Brentwood. His body was taken for burial in the cemetery behind Lancaster Cathedral to the strains of the 'Ushaw Salve', the hymn 'Hail Queen of Heaven'. That hymn had been written by a priest who laboured for forty years (1811-51) at nearby Hornby - John Lingard, another historian. R.I.P.

In the archive community today, there are many societies, most of them small, which aim to protect and promote our written heritage. Compared to the contents of museums, archival collections are not, to use a favourite word of the Prime Minister's, 'sexy'. The delights of the parchment or paper record are not immediately obvious – it is in the reading and studying of the document that its richness is revealed. The almost secret nature of the importance of our archives makes it difficult to proselytise on their behalf; it is far easier to bang the drum on behalf of Canova's Three Graces or a Constable painting about to leave the country, than it is for the millions of written records of our ancestors. These may be as important, if not more so, than the works of art whose preservation gain all the publicity, but it is a difficult task to ensure that they are given their rightful prominence in these days of soundbites and photo-opportunities. One of the loudest voices in defence of Britain's archival heritage is the British Records Association. Founded in 1932, it has continued for nearly seventy years, 'to encourage and assist the preservation, care, use and publication of records'. It is unique, not so much in its longevity, but in its composition, for it is the only national organisation which brings together owners of archives, keepers of archives, and users of archives.

The BRA is a voluntary organisation, financed by membership subscription, the revenue from publications and conferences, voluntary donations, and contributions from repositories who receive archives through the Records Preservation Section. With a small, though dedicated staff, qualified archivist, Sarah Henning, and administrative assistant Fateha Khatun, most of its work is undertaken by the membership. The council of the BRA has representatives from bodies who keep archives, (both in the public and private sector) and from users of archives, both amateur and professional. In 1997, the BRA moved its base from (frankly) squalid surroundings into the London Metropolitan Archives in Clerkenwell, thereby ensuring that it was operating within the heart of the archival community.

The work of the BRA is multi-faceted. Its most public face is represented by its publications, in particular the journal Archives, which is produced twice a year. Archives is a scholarly publication, with contributions from archivists and scholars all over the world. A recent issue included a fascinating study of an inventory of the archives of the Stuart Court at Saint-Germain-en-Laye between 1689-1718 by Edward Corps of the University of Paris. The article unravels the tortuous arrangements that were made to secure the private and official papers of James II, and the tragic destruction of many of them during the French Revolution. They included an undated manuscript entitled 'Advice to Converts', papers of devotion in the handwriting of Mary of Modena, and 'Bundles of Relations of Miracles by the late B. Kings Intercession'. This last was copied by David Nairne, the cartulary now residing in the Bodleian Library. Also twice yearly, and free to all members, is the Newsletter, which keeps members up to date with developments in archives, has features on less well-known archives, and news on the work of the Records Preservation Section. In addition, the BRA publishes a series of books under the general title of Archives and the User. These include Dorothy Owen's classic Records of the Established Church of England, and Roy Hunnisett's Indexing for Editors, which are 'must-haves' for many postgraduate students. Publications of particular interest to those researching Catholic history are Alice Prochaska's Irish History from 1700: A Guide to Sources in the Public Record Office and W. B. Stephens & R. W. Unwin, Materials for the Local and Regional Study of Schooling. In recent years, these traditional titles have been supplemented, to reflect the wider interests of archive users, the most recent title being Heather Creaton's Sources for London History, 1939-1945.

So much for the users of records, but the BRA also has a series of publications for keepers of archives. In line with the government's commitment to life-long learning, and greater openness, many institutions and organisations have realised that their records should be preserved, and there has been an enormous increase in awareness of the importance of the past as seen through the written record of organisations, both large and small. My own experience of just one organisation which has recently sought advice and guidance on what to do with their records could not reflect this better – a small reminiscence and community history group in Kensington's interest in local history has awakened the realisation among other organisations locally (including a public school mission and a housing trust) to the importance of their history. The mission records were rescued from a coal bunker under the Westway flyover and are currently undergoing conservation, and the housing trust is arranging to place its collection on permanent loan with the local studies library. In order to assist those who need advice on how to preserve and catalogue their records, the BRA produces a series of leaflets, entitled Guidelines, which give practical advice on the care and management of records. The most popular title in the series, unsurprisingly, is Care of Records: Notes for the Owner or Custodian, a four-page leaflet which sets out in simple terms the principles of accommodating archives. The optimum conditions for storing, arranging and allowing for access to archives are set out clearly, with advice on how to look after documents which have been damaged either over a long time or as a result of flood or fire. The advice leaflets are free of charge to enquirers, whether members of the Association or not.

In recent times, St Mary's Convent in Brentford and a London Catholic parish have been in touch with regard to the care of their records. The convent needed more expert advice on the conversion of a building into a record store than we could provide, so the BRA put them in touch with the Historical Manuscripts Commission for further assistance. The principal of mutuality and co-operation is well established, and the BRA is an effective conduit to experts of all kinds in the archival world.

The BRA annual conference is a popular fixture in the archival calendar. Covering two days, it takes place in early December, and addresses a specific theme. The most recent conferences have been on the performing arts, childhood, women, ethnic minorities and law and order. The conference on childhood was one of the most colourful, and delegates enjoyed the opportunity not only to hear old songs and rhymes, but to handle an astonishing range of artefacts from the Boy Scout archive, including a boomerang. The pivot of the conference is the Maurice Bond memorial lecture, given by an invited speaker of national prominence, and generally chaired by our President, the Master of the Rolls. Recent speakers have included Mrs Sarah Tyacke, Keeper of the Public Records, and Mark Fisher, Parliamentary Under Secretary at the Department of Culture, Media and Sport.

In addition to the conference, workshops and seminars are held, generally in collaboration with other organisations. In 1996, for example, seminars were held in London and Glasgow, in conjunction with the Scottish Records Association, on the development of Information Technology and the archive user. Readers will be aware of the great strides being made in this field, and the seminars were a unique forum in which archivists, IT specialists and readers could air their concerns, learn of the latest developments, and place on record their requirements for the future. In 1998, the HMC launched a major new enquiry to determine whether adequate provision was being made for the care and consultation of the nation's archives and manuscripts in the approach to the Millennium. The BRA has contributed to this review, and has put forward proposals to protect and make more accessible the immensely rich written record of our national heritage. The revolution in technology offers great challenges to archivists and readers, but also great opportunities. Perhaps in the near future it will be possible to discover through archival Internet gateways the whereabouts and nature of all the written records of religious orders, whose activities have crossed national boundaries for centuries. Who knows, the Holy Father's website might one day open up the unrivalled historical importance of the Vatican archive? The BRA, in facilitating contact between all members of the archival community, is in a unique position to assist in these exciting possibilities.

Publications, conferences and seminars are the stuff of voluntary organisations, but the BRA has one feature which is uniquely valuable to the national heritage, and is recognised as such by the HMC, which awards an annual discretionary grant to aid this aspect of the Association's work. This has been referred to above, and is known as the Records Preservation Section. The Section does exactly what its title suggests – it acts as a clearing house for unwanted archives, most particularly from the offices of London solicitors. In the past seventy years, more than a million documents have been received, processed and allocated to record repositories throughout the world. The range of records thus dealt with is extraordinary, from thousands of title deeds, to family papers and a warrant from Henry VIII ordering clothes for himself and his three children. This document, once identified, was placed with the Victoria and Albert Museum's manuscript collection, where researchers are able to study it.

The BRA archivist visits London solicitors who wish either to surrender records, or to have advice on how to preserve those in their custody. Once surrendered to the BRA, the archivist sorts through them, identifies the most appropriate place of deposit, and makes contact with the repository. With cuts in local government funding, and reductions in archival staff throughout the country, it is often no easy task to persuade repositories to accept such deposits, and imaginative measures must often be used. The business papers of the thespian Sir Henry Irving recently came into the hands of the BRA, and were given to the Theatre Museum for safekeeping. These belong to Sir Henry's descendants, with whom the museum has a good relationship, and it looks as though they will be ultimately gifted to the Museum.

The BRA has dealt with papers from several denominations, most recently with duplicate Nonconformist registers. Records of interest to Catholic historians have also been recovered and redistributed. The Duke of Norfolk's archive at Arundel Castle now houses documents relating to the estate of Cardinal Edward Henry Howard, thanks to the RPS. While these late-nineteenth-century documents provide additional information on a prominent family member and cleric, other records which have been discovered, catalogued and for which a new home has been found, are of more ancient origin. These include a receipt book for the Manor of Bromfield in Shropshire, dating from c. 1541-1626. It is a rather intriguing document, as it probably relates to the estate that had belonged to the dissolved Bromfield Priory, a cell of St Peter's of Gloucester, which had been leased to Charles Foxe in 1541. There is a statement of account in the book from when the Priory was taken over by Foxe, the book itself being bound in two folios from a liturgical manuscript dating from the thirteenth century. It is likely that the manuscript had belonged to the Priory, but this cannot be proved.

The BRA plays a vital part, not only in preserving the national heritage, but in providing a unique forum for all sections of the archival community to meet and exchange views and information. Membership offers unrivalled opportunities to all archive holders, no matter how small, for advice, assistance, and co-operation. Further details may be obtained from : the BRA, 40 Northampton Road, London, EC1R OHB.

GETTING SORTED: THE ARCHIVES OF RELIGIOUS WOMEN & THE SURVEY

Anselm Nye

My own experience both as a researcher and an archivist has been concerned largely with the archives of religious women. What I have to say, however, may as easily be applied to institutes of men, clerical or otherwise. Like all the best stories the one I am going to present today is a mixture of fact and fiction. For this reason it is prudent to begin with a double caveat. The first part is the standard disclaimer with which you will be familiar from modern film and fiction; the second will be familiar to many of you from the biographies you doubtless read in your noviciate days, or heard read in the refectory when such was still the custom. [Appendix I]

A HYPOTHETICAL CASE

I don't know whether you know the Sisters of Our Lady on Saturday. The congregation was founded at Coblenz in Germany in 1852 and made its first foundation in Britain during the Kulturkampf of the 1870s. At the turn of the century they went on the missions to the German colonies in Africa and the Pacific in what are now Tanzania, Papua New Guinea and Samoa. After the Great War some of the European houses found themselves in Polish and Czech territory and the mission houses under British dominion. Between the Wars there was expansion into Slovenia and Brazil and in more recent years to Kenya and Paraguay. From the beginning their apostolate has been primary education – no boarding schools – and home nursing. They have also been involved in residential special education, institutional care of the terminally ill and relief centres for the homeless.

The congregation, like so many others, is undergoing numerical decline in Europe while the reverse is the case in the other areas where it is established. We will have a look at some of the problems the Sisters are facing in regard to record keeping and archives as they probably have much in common with situations you are facing or have faced in the recent past.

The general administration and the larger number of Sisters have, with a few recent exceptions, always been solidly Middle European. A thorough, systematic approach which might be said to be characteristic of the Germanic peoples, is much in evidence in the administration and structures of the congregation. At times this can be just a little bit disconcerting for the British Province! The congregation's Directory is all encompassing, circulars emanate from the generalate on every conceivable subject. The fewer Sisters there are, in fact, the more paperwork there seems to be, and this is where the problem begins.

Every human organisation generates records and today's records are tomorrow's historical documents. There is a tendency to regard modern records as something distinct and separate from historic records and the constant danger that yesterday's records will be seen as old papers, no longer of value, taking up space. The Sisters of Our Lady on Saturday, like so many others, rely on a smaller number of women taking on a greater burden of administrative responsibility, often at an age when their contemporaries have long since taken early retirement.

The last General Chapter issued several ordinances directly related to archival matters. First of all, each province of the congregation has been asked to prepare a sound, critical history for the 150th anniversary of the foundation in 2002. As an aid to this undertaking the provinces have also been asked to submit an annotated list of its archival holdings to the General Archivist. Now, the archives at Coblenz are magnificent. A purpose built facility with a controlled environment was set up thirty years ago and there is also a well-appointed heritage room. The other European provinces, erected as recently as 1920, have their own small collections. It is generally recognised that the small vice-provinces in Africa and South America are too small and too new to do this on their own, as are the houses in the Pacific which are currently attached to the British Province. Much of the early material concerning these foundations is held in Europe and a twinning arrangement has been set up to make available to the non-European Sisters the resources in finance and personnel that the project will require.

As provincial, Marie Vianney, feels a keen responsibility for carrying out the project. In her own estimation Vianney was 'never much good at history' – despite being a born raconteuse with a fund of community anecdotes. She would very much like to ask one of the councillors to act as co-ordinator. Maureen is perhaps the best suited in terms of academic background but is both too valuable in her current role as co-ordinator of the Province's welfare works and admits to being more of a here and now person than a hoarder and despoiler of records.

After a period of animated discussion a consensus has been reached which will involve the youngest and oldest members of the team developing the project between them. Justina is the novice mistress as, after a gap of several years and a number of false starts, there are now four novices: two from England and two from Samoa. Justina feels there will be something in it for them. Akanesi is the first Samoan elected to office. Like all Polynesians she has a deep feeling for the past, which in her own culture is transmitted through the oral tradition. Polynesians can be rather laid back but Justina, who was Akanesi's novice mistress twenty-five years ago, is something of a stickler – they should make a good team. Their first concern is the Provincial Archive. We will see how they progress through their first tentative efforts at archival organisation.

St Gertrude's Convent has been the headquarters in Britain since 1888. The Peckham side of Camberwell will never be gentrified. Between what has been bombed and what has been pulled down there is not much of the historic fabric left in this part of South London. Perhaps this explains why the building has been Grade 2 listed by Southwark Council for it seems to lack any startling architectural merit. The house is difficult to maintain but impossible to pull down and not in the part of town where alternative uses could easily be found. No one would market luxury flats on the edge of the North Peckham Estate!

Although the Constitutions approved in 1922 make explicit mention of the general archives, they do not mention provincial ones. The 1987 revision does mention them and, to be honest, they have always existed. On the top floor of St Gertrude's, in a horrid little room too awful to be used for any other purpose, are the provincial archives. They are kept in an assortment of containers: metal trunks, shoe boxes, grocers' boxes and old sheet boxes acquired in great quantity when the Sisters were offered first pickings after a local draper closed his doors in the late 1970s: reliable goods, reasonably priced, pleasantly sold! The recent closure of four houses in an effort to consolidate local communities has seen further boxes somewhat unceremoniously manoeuvred into a space which already precludes anything but the most discreet sideways movement.

Your own situation may not be quite so dire as that of the Sisters of Our Lady on Saturday. It is surprising just how readily a horrid little room can be adapted for archival storage. It may not be possible, particularly in the transitional phase, to offer archives accommodation in conformity with British Standard 5454. Some simple, common sense rules of thumb, however, will protect records from further deterioration. There are two trinities: the unholy three of damp, sunlight and excessive heat must be avoided. The holy trinity comprises reasonably constant temperature, reasonably constant humidity and adequate ventilation.

The best thing Akanesi and Justina can do to get to know the collection is to have a preliminary sort in order to ascertain what types of material the collection contains. This may differ substantially from one congregation or community to another with differences in history and structures. In sorting archives the question of provenance is the foremost professional concern as knowing how the material came together helps us understand the body which created it. But provenance is not always obvious especially when collections have been thrown together on an ad hoc basis. Here then, is the list of what our Sisters found. I have organised this list working from the most general to the most particular. This may demonstrate my professional training as a librarian imbued with the principles of scientific classification but I think it also reflects the organic structure of a religious congregation.

Justina and Akanesi also stumbled across a number of other odds and ends. They found two boxes of 1950s vocations promotion literature. There were four more boxes of letterhead from the Walsall house which closed in 1980; a bolt and a half of good quality linen formerly used for making guimpes and bandeaux; and dozens of reels of black tape which was once used to secure choir veils over house veils. You never know when things might come in handy!

THE PASTORAL USE OF ARCHIVES

Those of you who had the good fortune to attend the Conference at Upholland two years ago will recall how Archbishop Marchisano spoke to us with such feeling of the work of the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church. I am sure that those of you who have read the Commission's document The Pastoral Function of Church Archives will not mind if I emphasise several of its more salient points.

Our archives have no purpose if they are simply stored under lock and key. In his first address to the Commission the Pope made it quite clear that archives, as part of the Church's cultural heritage, are at the service of the Church. However, a dichotomy may be drawn between the particular and the general. Although the archival deposits of religious communities may quite rightly be considered a part of the human heritage, they are primarily at the service of the community which created them. In other words their primary pastoral function is directed towards the members of the community themselves. They are the primary source for the renewal of religious life. I would contend that there can be no authentic renewal without reference to our archival deposits. Where else is the spirit of the founders so eloquently expressed as in the documents preserved there? Where else will you find the formative documents of the congregation; the chronicles of its early development and apostolate?

ARCHBISOP MARCHISANO AND DR CARLO STELLA

On several occasions in the recent past I have heard religious women say that, despite the efforts and good intentions of their provincial or general councils and chapters, they often find it difficult to 'own' the documentation these bodies produce. For no matter how carefully crafted the mission statements and circulars, they tend to have the air of committee formulations. They are often the fruit of compromise, perhaps more so in an international congregation where differences of language and culture must be taken into account.

I do not mean to denigrate such statements for they are both good and necessary and are proper matter for your archival collections! It should not be forgotten that in your archives there are other documents, which can much more easily be owned and internalised by your members. They can do this because they speak to the human condition directly, and in a manner that is accessible and easily comprehended. These documents include the personal witness and fidelity of so many Sisters over so many years. They can, in just the way the document The Pastoral Function of Church Archives suggests assist the sense of belonging. In addressing a group of archivists early in his pontificate that great pope, Paul VI spoke of the historical papers preserved in the archives as being part of the transitus Domini through human history, traces of the passage of the Lord Jesus in the world. They are the footprints of Christ. But they are not His alone.

They are the footprints of Mary Ward, Barbara Babthorpe, Winifred Wigmore and all the other galloping girls as they wend their way through England and the rest of Europe proving that women too can do great matters. They are the faithful footprints of Julie Guillemet setting up a network of schools from London to Lancashire in the very wake of Catholic Emancipation. They are the footprints of Thérèse Emmanuel O'Neill coming from Paris to establish her community in remote North Yorkshire in the full heat of anti-Catholic fury following the Restoration of the Hierarchy in 1850. They are the footprints of Syncretica Smarius struggling with linguistic difficulties: a Dutch nun in North Wales having, on one occasion, to show a Danish diplomat over her orphanage and schools. They are the footprints of a Marie Chaätelain picking up abandoned babies as she laboured amongst the poor and rejected scourgings of inner London. They are the footprints of Mary Wilfrid Hibgame engaging an atheist intellectual in exegesis of the Greek text of St John's Gospel during her rounds of visitation in the Cotswolds – a true Dominican preaching in season and out of season.

The tread is not always light. There are the footprints of Emily Bowles struggling to realise grandiose plans for a training college built on a foundation of imprudent finances and seeing all collapse in recrimination and alienation from her foundress and community. There are the footprints of the Franciscan Sisters of the Holy Ghost – whose congregation collapsed in a welter of civil and ecclesiastical litigation – listing their way through the archives of the Dioceses of Salford, Menevia, Plymouth, Wrexham, Portsmouth and Nottingham in their search for a sympathetic Bishop and a safe resting place.

There are footprints heavy with a sense of personal loss such as those of Mary Laurence Kelly accompanying her former noviciate companion to the station after she has signed her dispensation. We find her sitting in the waiting room while Annie Arch talks of marrying a wealthy man and visits the hairdresser to have her hair bobbed and her neck shaved à la mode.

But there is also humour to be found as in the house chronicle from a Kerry convent relating the visit of a superior general from France. The parish priest, driving her in his trap, desperately searching for some long lost phrases in a bid to make the guest feel welcome, exclaims several times 'Mon âme magnifie le Seigneur!' Then, in an attempt to make the conversation less monotonous proceeds to inform the Good Mother in her own tongue just what it was that Tellemachus said to Ulysses!

In more serious vein the treasures in our archives can offer some uncomfortable challenges. How do our notions of radical poverty stand up against the witness of our forebears? 'We are living in the sacristy... this place is most awfully cold... when we are dressing in the morning our clothes seem frozen and we ourselves frozen also... We have everything we want and are very happy.'

How does one's sense of obedience, mission or availability compare to that of Anne-Marie Javouhey's first Sisters dropped on an island in the middle of the Indian Ocean literally thousands of miles from the nearest women who shared their linguistic and cultural background? There they stayed without a visitor for six years. Or closer to our own time we hear the confident banter in the community room of a convent at Golders Green as a group of missionaries are fêted on the eve of their departure for Malawi. Teased with tales of meeting marauding natives and man-eating lions on the morrow the young Hêlène Marie du Sacré-Coeur replies: 'I'm not afraid of what may befall me tomorrow!' And tomorrow? Tomorrow her ashes rest with those of her two companions in the wreck of the Spencer Airways Dakota, which crashed on takeoff from Croydon airport.

In all of your archives I am sure you can find the most inspiring statements of faith, however overlaid with the piety of other times and places, which demonstrate basic truths and simple, unaffected holiness. These also can be quite a challenge to our modern day sophistication.

Not long ago I heard a religious who had passed her golden jubilee say that, if she were a young woman now she would not enter religion. Not for a moment do I suppose that this Sister was repudiating the decision she had made in her own youth. Still the statement left me with a sense of sadness. It seemed to say that, in her estimation, the charism she shares, the charism of her founders, is no longer a dynamic or valid thing. I am convinced she would have thought otherwise had she been made more aware of the living proof through the historical material in her congregation's archives.

Authentic renewal, the refounding or revitalisation of religious institutes, depends to a great extent on the fruitful exploitation of archival holdings; of making their riches accessible to your Sisters and those who may chose to follow you. It is my personal opinion that if the lives and works of your Sisters were better known more women would feel the magnetism of their personalities and be attracted to their way of life. This is the other side of the pastoral function of our archives; the universal destination of our archival heritage.

At home I have a research library of over 2000 books dealing with the history of women religious of almost every tradition and almost every part of the globe. Every year good, solid, critical histories and biographies roll off the press in France, Québec, Spain, Italy, the Netherlands, the USA, and even Australia and New Zealand. Very recently comparable works have been appearing in Ireland. In some of these countries the story of women religious and their unique contribution is recognised in the historical mainstream. This could not have occurred without the disinterested openness, kind welcome and competent service that the document enjoins on religious archivists.

But in Britain we are sadly behind. Radegund Flaxman's biography of Cornelia Connelly and Dominic Savio Hamer's work on Elizabeth Prout – which formed the basis of her paper when we were last here at Ushaw – are the only significant books on women religious in the Roman Communion, published in Britain in the last twenty years. There have also been several excellent articles by Susan O'Brien and fine work on Anglican religious by Valerie Bonham – whom we have also heard speak – and Susan Mumm. Genuine interest is growing and there seems to be a much greater willingness on the part of women religious to encourage research by scholars who are neither members of their communities nor, in some instances, members of the same faith. All this is for the good, for it makes these countless thousands of women known, appreciated and respected.

A SURVEY OF CATHOLIC ARCHIVES

Where does the survey fit into all this? A comprehensive survey of Catholic archival holdings, followed by a descriptive catalogue, would be the best single means towards exploiting – in the very best sense of the word – the wonderful material we have preserved. It would also, I think, be an aid to preserving material in the future.

The 1966 Catholic Directory records 1249 religious houses of women in England & Wales. Can you guess how many of these are no longer recorded at the same address in the 1998 edition? Some 781 have either been closed or transferred from large institutional premises to smaller residences. Of these 39 were contemplative houses. I suspect strongly that this pattern has not assisted the preservation of archival material.

What has happened to the historical records of their apostolate in Britain of the 70 odd congregations who have worked here at some point since 1850 but do so no longer? Many of these were of foundations of fleeting duration, others laboured here for many years. How many of you have heard of the German Sisters of St Catherine Virgin & Martyr who assisted the German and Polish communities of Merseyside and taught in schools and cared for orphans in Liverpool, Wigan and Lancaster for more than 40 years. Or the Sacramentine Nuns whose lives of Perpetual Adoration in their monastery at Taunton from the 1860s until the 1930s have left not a trace in the archives of the Diocese of Clifton. A comprehensive survey would, ideally, need to be far ranging.

Already the preliminary sample we have sent out has shown that very few communities are assured of an annual budget, have a disaster plan or contacts with other professional bodies such as local County Record Offices. Very few consider their repositories to be better than adequate. The question of the future of religious archives, given the prevailing demographic structure of most communities, also gives rise to concern. Most international congregations will presumably send their archives to a generalate elsewhere in Europe should their local numbers no longer make a separate archive in Britain feasible. But what about small local congregations and autonomous houses? To perceive the problem – and a survey will help us to gauge its extent – is to begin solving it.

HAPPY ENDINGS

How have things developed for the Sisters of Our Lady on Saturday? Like so many other communities they have found 'doing the archives' can become a major task. Justina and Akanesi have made contact with Mechtildis, the general archivist in Coblenz. In January Vianney attended the COR meetings at Swanwick, met Mary Campion McCarren at the CAS stall in the market place and joined up. The Provincial Team has been to visit Judith's archive at Mill Hill and now the process of sorting and listing has begun. The novices are playing their part in this as well and have already been delighted by the personalities of many of their forebears as they spring to life from the paper.

A basic assault plan has been worked out. Justina calls it the as soon as possible plan and it is a very basic policy document on the archive's function and future. Justina and Akanesi have also begun reading other congregational histories and have been amazed by both the differences and the common strands which link these stories to their own. A letter of enquiry from Winnie Wetbird, a doctoral student interested in communities coming to Britain from abroad last century, has elicited interest. A year before it might have been met with a certain incomprehension and caution. Her own enthusiasm and historical rigour have been caught by the whole team and even Maureen admits that the here and now owes much to what has gone on in the past. So, like all good stories this one ends happily.

APPENDIX I

Any resemblance between persons living or dead and persons depicted in this presentation is entirely coincidental

In conformity with the decree of Pope Urban VIII we thereby declare that only a mere human authority is attributed to the appellations contained in this presentation. Likewise in regard to facts and events herein recorded we declare that there is no intention of forestalling the judgements or decisions of the Sovereign Pontiff, to whom we submit wholeheartedly and unreservedly.

URSULINE CONVENT, BLACKROCK, CORK: ITS ARCHIVES AND A NOTE ON ITS HISTORY

Sister Ursula Clarke OSU

THE ARCHIVES

The archives of the Ursuline Convent, Blackrock, Cork, span the years from the late 1760s to the present day. Apart from the many printed books in the convent library – works of spiritual, pedagogical, academic and historical interest either written by or relevant to the Cork Ursuline community – what may be termed the archives proper comprise a number of handwritten books recording personal and community affairs and events in Cork Ursuline life. They are stored for reference in two separate places in the convent.

CONTENTS

Book recording details of Novitiate entrances from 1767 to date.

'Novices' Exam Book' records pre-clothing and pre-profession candidates' individual interviews with the bishop or his delegate.

Copy of the Deed of Foundation

Copy of the Apostolic Brief of Pope Clement XIV, 13 January 1773, confirming the erection of the Ursuline Monastery, Cork.

Visitations, from January 1775 and Triennial Elections from September 1775.

Two Profession Books: 1773 onwards.

The Community Annals: 1771 onwards (eight volumes).

ACCESS

All are located within the convent. Access is confined to those engaged in serious research. Such reading or study must be done on the convent premises.

CORK URSULINE HISTORY: A NOTE

The Cork Ursuline Convent traces its origins directly to the Company of St Ursula, founded in 1535 by St Angela Merici at Brescia, Northern Italy. Members of this Company lived in their own homes, met together for prayer, and taught Christian Doctrine locally to girls. They followed the Primitive Rule of Angela Merici. In 1592 this Rule was adopted as a way of religious life by Françoise de Bermond and her companions at Avignon, France. Soon they opted to live in community.

Thus came about the first Ursuline Congregation (congrégée). In 1608 de Bermond was invited by a group of aspirants to establish this Ursuline way of life in their house at the Rue St Jacques, Paris. She spent two years there and in 1612 the convent was erected into a monastery by Pope Paul V. In due course, the Cork convent became a filiation of the Rue St Jacques.

In 1767 Eleanor Fitzsimons of Dublin entered the Ursuline novitiate at the Rue St Jacques to prepare for a religious foundation in Cork. Two years later she was joined by two Cork ladies, Margaret Nagle and Elizabeth Coppinger, both having the same intention as Eleanor. The fourth postulant for Cork was Mary Kavanagh of Borris-in-Ossory who came in 1770.

All four, with a French Ursuline who was Irish-born as their superior, landed at Cobh on Ascension Day, 9 May 1771, under the escort of Father Francis Moylan, the Cork diocesan priest who was largely responsible for bringing the Ursulines to the city. Later he became Bishop of Cork. The French superior was Mother Margaret Kelly from the Ursuline Convent, Dieppe, who stayed with the new foundation until 1775 when she returned to her original convent.

Ireland in 1771 was a dangerous place for Catholics. The Church was still being persecuted under the Penal Laws. There were no Catholic schools and thus Catholic education was not available. Neither was there freedom to worship. However, a brave Corkwoman named Nano Nagle had defied the law by opening seven schools around the city for the education of poor Catholic children. She escaped censure because her venture was considered a piece of useful philanthropy which had cleared the streets of Cork of the gangs of children roaming them every day. But she needed permanency and continuity for her work and wished for a community of nuns who were educators. The Ursuline Constitutions oblige the sisters to teach all classes of children, poor and rich alike. Miss Nagle had built a house near to her own cottage at Cove Lane. This house was for the Ursulines. At once, they began to teach in the adjacent Poor School, which was within their enclosure. Because the Ursulines professed solemn vows and had Papal enclosure, pupils had to come to them for instruction. This was not at all what Nano Nagle had envisaged. She wanted teaching nuns who were not bound by cloister and who could work in various parts of the city as well as visit the sick and aged in their homes. The Ursulines flourished as numerous postulants offered themselves and gradually the penal climate began to soften. These laws soon became irrelevant. In 1772 the Ursulines took in their first twelve boarders. Between then and 1790 they extended their premises by building on three new additions. In 1787 and Ursuline foundation began in Thurles, Co. Tipperary, another in Waterford (from Thurles) in 1816, and one in Sligo (from Waterford) in 1850. These convents in turn all founded other houses, which maintained their dependence on the mother-house. The four major houses were all autonomous. In 1978 they amalgamated as the Irish Ursuline Union.

MISSIONARY UNDERTAKINGS FROM CORK

- 1812-1815 Three Ursulines from Cove Lane opened a convent and school at Bloomingdale, New York, U.S.A.
- 1825 Ursuline community, numbering 42 sisters, and their boarders move to Blackrock, a few miles from Cove Lane. They open a school for the poor girls of Blackrock without delay. The convent at Cove Lane is taken back by the newly-founded Presentation Sisters for a small sum of money.
- 1834 Three Ursulines from Blackrock founded a convent and school in Charleston, South Carolina, on the invitation of Bishop John England. Thence they went to Cincinnati and from there to Springfield, Illinois.
- 1887 The Blackrock community responds to the request of Bishop O'Callaghan of Cork to open a Secondary Day School for Girls in the city. This becomes St Angela's College, St Patrick's Hill. It is still thriving.
- 1960-1997 Four Blackrock Ursulines open and staff a school in the newly-formed parish of Columbus, Georgia, U.S.A. They were forced to withdraw in 1997 due to lack of religious personnel. The school is now under lay principalship.

IMPACT OF THE CORK URSULINES

Present-day researchers believe that the Cork Ursulines led the revival of Catholicism in Ireland in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Though relatively few in number, their influence was powerful. Among their achievements were:

1. The revitalising witness of their own lives of prayer and consecration, albeit in many ways an underground witness for some years from 1771.
2. The religious and academic excellence of the education they imparted. Many of their pupils themselves became religious educators in the Ursuline and other congregations.
3. Their writings. Nineteenth-century publications by Mothers Ursula Young, Borgia McCarthy and Gonzaga Kenneally, both spiritual and academic, were known throughout Ireland. The Ursuline Manual was distributed all over the world.
4. The fact that the Ursuline Rule and Constitutions, brought from the Rue St Jacques and confirmed for Cork by Pope Clement XIV, became the basis of the Constitutions drawn up by the emerging Irish religious congregations, e.g. Presentation, Mercy, Brigidine.

THE CARMELS OF GREAT BRITAIN: A CHECK-LIST

Sister Helen of Jesus ODC

The following is a list of all the Carmels founded in Great Britain since their establishment became possible in the period after the end of the Penal Laws and Catholic Emancipation.

A. I have checked all the available sources with regard to the details and what is given below would appear factual as to dates and locations. Of the forty-three Carmels listed, twenty-four now survive (bold type). There have been twelve dispersals (italics), leaving thirty-two Carmels, with a further seven amalgamations (CAPITALS). This disposes of eighteen of the original forty-three foundations.

B. There has been no policy about housing the archives of monasteries which have been closed: each makes its own arrangements, in contrast to a centralised religious congregation with a provincial structure. The Second Orders of contemplative nuns, belonging to the pre-Tridentine religious families (e.g. Benedictines, Augustinians, Franciscans, Dominicans, Servites and Carmelites) do not have a 'Mother General', and their relationship with the General Curia of their respective (male) First Orders is often tenuous. For the Discalced Carmelites it would be no exaggeration to say that such a link has been non-existent for some countries and for certain periods. The accepted legal autonomy of each monastery was, or developed into, a major force, and Canon Law could be something of a closed book unless the local bishop went to the trouble of informing the nuns of a particular ruling. Thus outstandingly holy women in all good faith often acted autonomously, and often to good purpose. It has been said that the superiors of enclosed monasteries actually had greater authority than bishops in certain areas. As a result, a Carmel might decide to disperse, having gained all the necessary canonical approval and fulfilling all financial, material and spiritual obligations, but without any idea about responsibility for archives. The chief reason for dispersals in recent times has been a depletion in numbers, old age and infirmity, and thus it is hardly surprising that mistakes have been made in disposing of such material.

C. Sister Mary of St Philip, the archivist at Notting Hill Carmel, is willing to give any help in the meantime. Material from most of the dispersed Notting Hill (NH) foundations has been deposited at Notting Hill, and although there is no way of knowing whether all such archival material has been received, contact can often be made with the former Prioresses and Bursars of dispersed monasteries. For amalgamated houses, information, if not records, will be available from their present location.

DE LA SALLE BROTHERS: HOUSES AND LOCATION OF ARCHIVES

Brother Austin Chadwick FSC

EDITOR'S NOTE: The late Brother Austin Chadwick sent the following list of houses of the De La Salle Brothers for publication in Catholic Archives. Some details have been added to his original notes. For further information see Brother Austin's article 'The Archives of the Great Britain Province of the DeLa Salle Brothers' in Catholic Archives 15 (1995), pp.25-28.

The De La Salle Provincialate Archives (140 Banbury Road, Oxford OX2 7BP) hold archival material relating to most of the communities (house histories, personnel lists etc.), but for the Home Office schools staffed by the Brothers – these schools were closed as a result of legislation from the 1970s onwards – records are kept either in local record offices or at the Home Office or Scottish Office. For some of the communities of Brothers, where material in the Provincialate Archives is thin, this can often be supplemented by the Generalate Archives in Rome, and likewise information on individuals.

The Provincialate Archives house a wealth of reports from Councils, Economic Councils and Chapters, as well as material relating to the eighty or more countries in which the Brothers have made foundations, necrologies, finance books, Institute bulletins, provincial newsletters etc. With the closure of houses fresh material is always arriving.

In addition to the communities mentioned there is also a house at Pendleton (Salford). The existing community (whose records are at Oxford) was attached to De La Salle Grammar School, subsequently Sixth Form College and thereafter merged with Pendleton Sixth Form College. A new community was opened nearby (records with community).

Some important dates for the De La Salle Brothers in Britain:

- 1855 French Brothers opened St Joseph's College, Beulah Hill (then situated in Clapham).
- 1860 St Joseph's Academy opened in Kennington (now at Blackheath).
- 1867 Brothers in Liverpool: 10 Junior Schools & Industrial School/Orphanage.
- 1880 Brothers made first foundation in Ireland.

- 1880-1947 Many Irish Brothers working in England.
- 1881-1909 England part of Anglo-Irish Province.
 - 1909 St Joseph's, Beulah Hill transferred to Nantes Province
- 1909-1945 Schools founded at Southsea, Plymouth, Guernsey, Jersey, Southbourne, Ipswich (and later Basildon) by English section of Nantes Province.
 - 1945 English section of Nantes Province granted autonomy as London Province The Maltese houses were already part of this English Section.
- 1947 Other British houses of the remaining Anglo-Irish Province separated from Ireland and formed the Province of England.
- 1985 Provinces of London and England amalgamated to form the Province of Great Britain, Guernsey reverting to Nantes.

CATHOLIC FLANDERS REMEMBERED

Dom Aidan Bellenger OSB

Flanders, the borderland between present-day France and the Netherlands, has always played a crucial part in the history of the British Isles. The eightieth anniversary of the end of the Great War in 1998 renewed memories of the killing fields, and Brussels is never very far from the news. Its role was no less central in the formation of the English-speaking Catholic community. From the Reformation to the French Revolution numerous clergy, both secular and regular, and many members of the laity, were educated and formed in the cosmopolitan cities and towns of Flanders, Europe's melting-pot. Two recent exhibitions have highlighted both the debt owed to the area by the British Catholics and the rich cultural heritage in which they participated.

The first, in Douai, now in France but until the reign of Louis XIV under Spanish hegemony, was held from 8-30 November 1997 in the Halle-aux-Draps, the cloth hall, a handsome medieval chamber at the heart of the Hotel-de-Ville, dominated by its belfry, the most important visual feature of the town. Douai, with its Counter-Reformation university founded in 1562, had five English-speaking establishments: the English College established in 1568 by Cardinal William Allen, a cross between an Oxford college and a Tridentine seminary, and destined to become the most important of the English secular colleges; an Irish College; a Scots College; an English Benedictine priory, the first for men to be established since the Reformation and appropriately dedicated to St Gregory the Great; and an English Franciscan friary. All were founded before 1620. The establishments were suppressed at the Revolution, their properties dispersed, their buildings demolished, and forced repatriation making them the ancestors of several modern English colleges and communities. The name of the Franciscan friary survives in the church of St Jacques where the London-made tabernacle from the English College is to be found in a side-chapel. The late eighteenth-century buildings of the English Benedictine school are now used by the Lycée Corot. These premises were in the possession of the English Benedictine community of St Edmund from 1818 to 1903 (now at Douai Abbey, Berkshire) and kept the English presence alive until the last century. Their monastic church, designed by Pugin, and still intact, if rather battered, was opened in 1843.

The exhibition featured a show-case for each of the foundations and contextual material on the town and university. What was interesting from an archival point of view was the bringing together of English and continental material. The study of so many English Catholic institutions makes much more sense with reference to continental deposits. Despite revolution and war much survives. The bombardment of Arras in the 1914-18 war led to the loss of much important material on the English foundations (although calendars exist for some, and transcripts, notably those held at Downside Abbey, were made for others) but the Lille (Departmental) Archives, and the Municipal Library (BM, Douai) and Archives (AM, Douai) contain much rich and, from an English point-of-view, underrated material. Among items – taken at random – on display at the exhibition were Lecons dictées par William Allen (BM, Douai, MS 473), Correspondance adressée au père Grant par les évêques d’Ecosse, 1771 (AM, Douai, G.G.Layette 180), Homage and Permission accordée par le Magistrat aux bénédictins anglais d’établir une brassère dans leur jardin, registre aux mémoires, 16 juin 1779 (AM, Douai, B827 f 212v). There were many more.

With the exception of Allen’s college all the other English foundations were made possible by the benevolence and patronage of the Archduke Albert and Archduchess Isabella. Coming to power as semi-autonomous rulers of the Southern Netherlands in 1598 (the Protestant Northern Provinces had broken away from Catholic Spain), the height of their influence, the heyday of the Spanish baroque, was in the period of the Twelve Year Truce (1609-21), the years in which English Catholic Flanders reached its maturity.

The second exhibition, held from 17 September 1998 to 17 January 1999 at the Cinquartenaire Museum, Royal Museum for Art and History, Brussels, commemorated the reign of Albert and Isabella. It was a magnificent reflection of the period which set the Douai exhibition in its context. A handsome catalogue was printed, alongside a book of essays. These essays include one by Paul Arblaster of St Peter’s College, Oxford, on the key role played by Albert and Isabella and their court in Brussels in the northern Counter-Reformation strategy of re-catholicising Europe. From 1596 until the foundation of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith in 1622 England’s Catholics came under the Brussels nunciature. The influence of Flanders was not one-way. The English composer Peter Philips was one of the great luminaries of the musical life of the Brussels court.

European integration remains a controversial political debate, but these two recent exhibitions suggest that however Eurosceptic their politics, English archivists and historians cannot understand their heritage without reference to the mainland of Europe.

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTE

The indispensable introduction to the English Catholic exiles in Europe remains P. Guilday, The English Catholic Refugees on the Continent, 1558-1795 (London/New York, 1914). The Association William Allen published a pamphlet (1997) on the English in Douai, translated into English and appearing as Number Fifteen of South Western Catholic History in the same year. The Brussels exhibition issued in two volumes, a catalogue and a series of essays, both profusely illustrated, and both edited by Luc Duerbo and Werner Thomas (Brussels, 1998).

THE PRIEST AND ARCHIVES

Rev Stewart Foster

A SUMMARY OF A TALK GIVEN TO STUDENTS AT ST JOHN'S SEMINARY, WONERSH

The Pastoral Function of Church Archives, a document issued in 1997 by the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church and published by the Catholic Archives Society in the booklet Church Archives, places great emphasis on the role of archives as part of the Church's mission to evangelise. This may well come as a surprise to many of you. Perhaps you have always thought of archives, and indeed archivists, in terms of something rather erudite, even obscure, and if useful then in historical rather than pastoral terms. And yet for priests and for those training for the priesthood the heritage and cultural riches of Catholicism are an essential ingredient of one's theological and therefore pastoral education and experience. In his own life, and in the ministry he undertakes in the Church, the priest is a figure of continuity.

Archives – manuscript, printed, and audio-visual – are to be found at all levels within the Church: diocese, parish, personal and institutional. Priests will undoubtedly find themselves as custodians of archives, and sometimes archives of great importance, and for this reason it is important that seminarians should have some awareness and understanding of their value and significance before they find themselves appointed to their first parish as a curate, let alone as a parish priest with full responsibility for the archives and material patrimony of a parish.

Ecclesiastical archives can be categorised under two broad headings: historical and current. The first category includes written documents and manuscripts, printed material, parish and other pastoral records, and cannot (in the average parish situation) exclude both art and artefacts. Not only does a priest in a parish have the canonical responsibility of caring for the documents and other materials entrusted to him as part of his duties as pastor, he must also seek to liaise with the appropriate bodies (diocesan archivist, local record office etc.) whenever he finds himself with responsibility for particularly significant collections, or when advice is required regarding the preservation and conservation of archival holdings. Gone must be the days of 'lose it in the attic' or 'put it on the fire'. Horror stories abound, but there can be no excuse for them to continue.

Current archives are just what the term suggests: documents and other types of material (correspondence, records, photographs, tape recordings, software) which may be very much 'in use' but which will soon become the historical archives of the future. Parishes are increasingly aware of their traditions and history, and jubilees, centenaries etc. will more often than not generate the publication of books, pamphlets and other records. Such productions will falter without the relevant source material. The priest has a special duty (perhaps delegated to a parish secretary but not thereby abandoned) to ensure that his tenure of office is well documented. The diocesan archivist will always be only too happy to advise on what should be retained. Moreover, a growing number of professional academic studies (MA and PhD theses) rely upon local (parish) source material, and such students, together with the ever-increasing army of family historians, should also be given reasonable access to non-confidential material. Again the advice of the diocesan archivist is important.

I mentioned the specifically priestly responsibility for archival material in parishes. Sometimes curates with a sensitivity for such matters report 'horrors' effected by (no doubt well-meaning but nevertheless misguided) parish priests of the 'chuck that stuff on the fire' kind. That is where education, and especially a good knowledge of Canon Law as it concerns archives (cf. the second part of Church Archives) is essential. One is within one's rights to challenge illicit treatment of archives. But prevention is always the best policy, and yet again the diocesan archivist is the obvious and first port of call. It is also important that the priests of the future become aware of the existence of the various organizations working to promote both historical research and the care of archives within the Catholic community. In the British Isles the Catholic Archives Society and the Catholic Record Society, with their respective journals and other publications, together with workshops, conferences and meetings, seek to promote a healthy interest in and understanding of archival and historical matters.

The priest of tomorrow, like his confreres throughout history, will be faced with a great many challenges as he seeks to shepherd the Body of Christ. Each will have his own strengths and talents, and likewise his own blindspots. But archives are important, they have a relevance to the immediate task of evangelization, and whilst acting with prudence when unsure, and seeking advice of those with expertise, the priest should always be mindful of the great privilege which is his when entrusted with the care of a parish to ensure that 'Christ yesterday, Christ today, Christ forever' is reflected in the way that the Church guards and values its archival heritage. I encourage you to develop an interest in the history of your parishes, dioceses, seminary... and please remember something of these few words in the years ahead.

THE ARCHIVES OF ST JOHN'S SEMINARY, WONERSH

Sister Helen Forshaw SHCJ

St John's Seminary was solemnly opened on 8 September 1891, the last of the new, Tridentine seminaries to be founded after the Restoration of the Hierarchy in 1850, and the only one to have survived to celebrate its centenary. The seminary opened with junior students only. For the previous two years a number of boys who aspired to the priesthood had been prepared for this day, under the direction of Father (later Cardinal) Francis Bourne, in temporary accommodation at Henfield, West Sussex. So the Seminary's archives begin with documents from 1889 to 1891.

At the time of writing the Wonersh archives are being reorganised by the Student Archivist, Mr Tim Hunting, under the guidance of Abbot Geoffrey Scott of Douai, and with the encouragement of the Rector, Father Kevin Haggerty. In common with many ecclesiastical institutions (and especially religious communities), the seminary has come late to fully appreciating the importance of archival material and the need to have it adequately housed and catalogued. A particular difficulty has been that, in common with at least one other seminary, looking after the archives (apart from reserved confidential material concerned with the assessment of students for ordination) has been a 'house job' – a student responsibility. Student archivists may well be chosen and keen at the beginning of the tenure of office, but experience shows that, without a clear policy of identifying, categorising, storing and maintaining archival material to guide them, the task of creating and imposing a system and compiling a catalogue has proved impossible.

A further difficulty has been that the archives were stored in several places and have been moved from one room to another over the years. The current reorganisation includes a notable improvement in the housing of archival material. Pending the completion of this time-consuming task, this description of the Wonersh archives is necessarily rather brief and provisional. I have listed broad categories and indicated the kind of material to be found under those headings.

A INSTITUTIONAL RECORDS

1. Academic

This includes:

- (i) Documents from negotiations with various academic institutions concerning the acceptance of seminary courses for certificate, diploma or degree status, beginning with the Institut Catholique in the 1890s.
- (ii) Examination papers.
- (iii) Materials relating to the curriculum and syllabii in both Junior and Senior seminaries.
- (iv) Registers of internal and external examination results.

2. Administrative

This includes:

- (i) Material concerning the purchase of the property, the building, maintenance and development of the seminary, and the changing use and maintenance of the grounds (documents, plans and maps).
- (ii) Rectors' Diaries (appointment diaries) beginning 1889 and from 1924 to 1970 for the Junior Seminary at Mark Cross.
- (iii) Registers of ordinations (from 1896, the first ordinations to the priesthood).
- (iv) Registers of students: from 1899 and for Mark Cross from 1924 to 1970.

3. Collegiate Life

This includes:

- (i) Chronicles: daily records of events kept by the senior student in both the Junior and Senior Seminaeries. The Junior Chronicle begins in 1889 and ends in 1970; the Senior Chronicle (also known as the Dean's Diary) begins in 1893 and continues to the present.
- (ii) Magazines: The Eagle March-October 1908, produced by the Juniors.
The Wonersh Magazine 1933-1950, revived 1997.
The Wonersh Mail 1917-1919, a fortnightly record of events at St John's compiled by Father James Walters and sent to students conscripted into the armed forces during World War I.

- (iii) Minutes of Student House Meetings.
- (iv) Programmes of concerts and plays performed by students.
- (v) Records from student clubs and societies.
- (vi) Rules and Constitutions: successive revisions.
- (vii) Seminary Prayer Books: successive editions.

4. Financial Records

This includes:

records of student societies, book shop and tuck shop.

5. Liturgical Records

This includes:

- (i) Hymn Books.
- (ii) Ordination and feast-day booklets
- (iii) Sacristy Journals.
- (iv) Service Books: Liber Usualis, missals, office books etc.

6. Reserved

This includes:

- (i) Minutes of staff meetings.
- (ii) Records of assessment of students as part of the process of formation.

B PERSONAL RECORDS

This includes:

- (i) Material from the following individuals:-
Father Gordon Albion: notes, lectures, broadcast scripts.
Father (later Cardinal) Bourne: notes for Sodality talks.
Monsignor Philip Hallett: documents relating to the process of canonisation of SS John Fisher and Thomas More.
Father Thomas Hooley: album of press cuttings on the building and opening of Wonerish, 1890-92.

Canon James Walters: notebook compiled when he was Senior Student in 1904.

- (ii) Miscellaneous notebooks including a set of anonymous sermon notes and an anonymous student diary: there is still much to be done in sorting and identifying this material.

C AUDIO-VISUAL RECORDS

1. Photographs: includes albums and photographs (framed and loose).

2. Slides

3. Audiotapes

4. Films and Videos:

includes many made in the Seminary (e.g. on the sacraments for teaching purposes or to record ordinations, celebrations, plays etc.).

D. DIOCESAN RECORDS

Primarily from Southwark and Arundel & Brighton: includes ad clerum notices, diocesan newsletters, pastoral letters.

E. THE MUSEUM

Recently relocated and in process of being completely reorganised, it possesses some medieval MSS and religious artefacts, including sacred vessels and vestments, together with nineteenth- and twentieth-century items. There are also some sixteenth- and seventeenth-century printed books donated by Canon Daniel Rock and housed in the Library.

A final reminder: the above list is in no sense a comprehensive description of what is held at St John's Seminary, Womersley. We eagerly await the completion of the current effort to classify and catalogue this valuable archive illustrating the birth and development of the one nineteenth-century Tridentine seminary in England to have survived into the Third Millennium.

WORK IN PROGRESS

The following information has been received from the Wiltshire and Swindon Record Office regarding a section among the Arundell of Wardour Archives relating to Catholic affairs. The Archivist, S.Hobbs (Wiltshire & Swindon Record Office, Bythesea Road, Trowbridge, Wiltshire BA14 8BS), has contacted Catholic Archives to communicate the nature of these holdings, and to invite those working on this period (Catholic Committee, 1791 Relief Act etc) to make use of them for research purposes. The Editor would welcome contacts from other secular repositories, so that readers of the journal may be aware of the existence of material of Catholic interest elsewhere.

BOOK REVIEWS

English Catholics of Parish and Town 1558-1778 edited by Marie B. Rowlands (Catholic Record Society, 1999, pp.xvi + 400).

Produced jointly by the Catholic Record Society and Wolverhampton University, this volume examines various aspects of recusancy as experienced by Catholics from the middle and working classes. The study is divided into three parts, each containing a number of essays: Part I looks at Catholics in society, Part II has a regional flavour (Yorkshire, London, Westmorland, Shropshire and the North East), while Part III (by Dr Rowlands herself) examines the Catholic community in 1767.

Archivally speaking, there is much to commend this book, in that its contributors have delved widely into primary material housed in various holdings, Catholic and secular: in addition to national repositories such as the Public Record Office and the House of Lords Record Office, material has been researched in the Westminster and Birmingham Archdiocesan Archives, Ushaw College Archives, the Jesuit Archives at Farm Street, and the Record Offices at Carlisle, Chester, Derbyshire, Dorset, Hereford and Worcester, Kendal, Lincoln, Lichfield, Preston, Staffordshire, Shropshire and Sheffield. A number of the contributors give quite detailed treatment to the sources, and overall there is a balance between the different parts of the country examined. The adoption of a team approach, especially when working in various local record offices, has much to commend it.

The Catholic Record Society has also been closely involved in the publication of From Without the Flaminian Gate: 150 Years of Roman Catholicism in England and Wales, 1850-2000 edited by V. Alan McClelland and Michael Hodgetts (Darton, Longman & Todd, London, 1999, pp.xvii + 406: £24.95). A commemoration of the 150th anniversary of the Restoration of the Catholic Hierarchy, this series of essays covers a number of features of the Church's history and its contribution to public life (clerical training, philosophy, religious life, the laity, family life and marriage, schools, politics, literature, culture). Some contributors summarise major trends and events, others make more direct use of archive material. Again one can detect references to both Catholic and secular collections. Susan O'Brien, writing on women's religious life, mentions the importance of the appointment of archivists (p.112) and pays tribute to the work of the Catholic Archives Society (p.137 n.26), quoting from articles appearing in this journal. Both Peter Doyle ('Family and Marriage') and Maurice Whitehead (Catholic schools) make use of much primary material, especially the latter in relation to the Westminster and Salford Archives, and several of the contributors are members of the Catholic Archives Society.

One of the contributors to the collection of essays reviewed above is Father James Pereiro, author of Cardinal Manning: An Intellectual Biography (Clarendon Press, Oxford, 1998, pp.xii + 360: £45). The book traces Manning's intellectual development from his Anglican days through to his role at the First Vatican Council when Archbishop of Westminster. It is a seminal work, drawing together research undertaken in a wide variety of archives. Many Manning papers, and also the cardinal's library, are now housed at Pitts Theological Library, Emory University, Atlanta. Another important resource was the Westminster Diocesan Archive, and the Archivist, Father Ian Dickie, receives special acknowledgement. Following Professor McClelland's article on the Manning Archive in Catholic Archives No.19 (1999), it is worth recording Pereiro's complete listing of archival material used in this study: British Library, Gladstone Papers (Add.MSS 44247-50,44709); Bodleian Library, Manning Papers (MSS Eng.Lett. b.37,c.651-64,d.526-7; MSS Eng.Misc.c.873-6,d.1278-80,e.1393-9,g.355), Wilberforce Papers; Pusey House, Oxford, Pusey Papers, Copeland Papers; Ushaw College, Wiseman Papers, Wilberforce Papers, Gillow Papers; Westminster Diocesan Archive, Wiseman Papers, Manning Papers; Venerable English College, Rome, Talbot Papers; Birmingham Oratory Archive, Newman Papers (especially correspondence with Manning), Ryder Papers; Archives of Propaganda Fide, Scrittura Riferite nei Congressi, Anglia; Pitts Theology Library, Manning Papers (MSS 002, boxes 1-12); St Andrews University Library, Ward Papers (V. Miscellaneous papers, letters and notes; VI. Letters from Ward to different correspondents; VII.Letters to Ward). This volume acts as a worthy complement to McClelland's earlier study of Manning's involvement in social affairs.

Another Oxford convert about whom a major study has appeared within the last year is Frederick Oakeley, sometime Vicar of All Saints, Margaret Street, one of Newman's companions at Littlemore and thereafter Rector of St John's, Duncan Terrace and Canon of Westminster. A Passionate Humility: Frederick Oakeley and the Oxford Movement by Peter Galloway (Gracewing, Leominster, 1999, pp.xi + 316: £25) concentrates overwhelmingly on its subject's Anglican career (Oakeley was received as a Catholic in 1845, aged forty-three, and died in 1880), while the author (p.218) remarks on the comparative paucity of primary material on Oakeley's life after 1845. Extensive use is made of Oakeley's extant autobiographical MSS (Balliol College), prize essays (Bodleian) and history of St John's, Duncan Terrace, Islington (Westminster Diocesan Archives), as well as the Manning Papers (Bodleian) and Newman Papers (Birmingham Oratory). The bulk of the archival research comes from Anglican sources, e.g. Blomfield Papers, Tait Papers and Court of Arches Records (Lambeth Palace Library). It would be interesting to see whether any more primary material from Catholic archival holdings might now come to light.

Public Spirit: Dissent in Witham and Essex 1500-1700 by Janet Gyford (available from the author at Blanford, Chalks Road, Witham, Essex, CM8 2BT, 1999: £13.50) is an enterprising work by a local historian who has used one Essex town to offer an examination of religious dissent from the reign of Henry VIII to the end of the seventeenth century. This study, which is very well illustrated with sketches and line drawings, gives a clear guide to the main archival tools by which the author has conducted her research, and this principally at the Essex Record Office (visited by some members of the Catholic Archives Society during the 1998 Conference). Wills and will preambles, ecclesiastical court records, court rolls etc. have all been used as well Hearth Tax returns for the seventeenth century. The history of Catholic recusancy forms part of a wider picture of religious dissent in the Witham area. The book is to be recommended as a model of its kind, making the history of religious affiliations in a particular Essex market town accessible to a broad readership.

Although not strictly archival in content, The Austin Friars by Father Benedict Hackett OSA (Augustinian Press, Clare, 1998, pp.vi + 30: £3.50) is a succinct history of the Augustinians in Britain from their foundation in 1248 until the present day. From that point of view alone, this and other similar endeavours are a very useful resource for religious (and indeed secular) archivists, providing as they do a readable survey of the history, customs and development of a particular order or congregation. At its peak in 1350, the English Province of the Augustinians numbered 700-800 friars, but by 1500 the total had dropped to about 430. The Province suffered a widespread defection at the time of the Reformation, though it boasts one of the English Martyrs (St John Stone). The booklet charts the history of the English and Scots friars during the Penal Days and the expansion of the Order via Ireland. The first permanent foundation in England since the Reformation was St Monica's Priory, Hoxton (1864), established in great measure out of Cardinal Wiseman's concern to meet the pastoral needs of the growing number of Irish immigrants in London. In 1953 the friars returned to Clare Priory, Suffolk, their very first English house founded in 1248, and in 1977 the present Anglo-Scottish Province was erected. Publications concerning other religious orders of a similar format and equally well-illustrated would be very welcome.

Robert Hugh Benson: Life and Works by Janet Grayson (University of America, Lanham MD, 1998, pp.xxvi + 231) is a well-crafted biographical study of one of the most distinguished twentieth-century clerical and literary converts to Catholicism. The preface reveals not only the author's own breadth of research, but also gives an indication of the variety of archival sources available for the study of a particular individual and, in the context of writing a biography of an English subject (who visited the United States on three occasions and whose works were very popular there), the extent to which American collections now account for so much of the relevant primary material. The Bodleian Library and Magdalene College, Cambridge (diaries of his brother, A.C.Benson) house significant collections, but the American repositories are especially important: the Harry Ransome Humanities Research Center at the University of Texas, Austin (Benson's Rome diary 1903-4); Berg Collection, New York Public Library; Universities of Notre Dame, Princeton and Pennsylvania; Boston College; Holy Cross College; Archdiocesan Archives of Boston, Chicago, New York and Philadelphia; and the Archives of Our Lady of Lourdes Church, New York, where Hugh Benson preached. The author also used Elizabeth Antice Baker's papers at the Dominican Historical Institute in Rome.

Finally, another collection of essays is worthy of mention in terms of its archival interest. Walsingham: Pilgrimage and History (R.C.National Shrine, Walsingham, 1999, pp.164) presents the papers given at the Centenary Historical Conference in March 1998. In addition to the use made by several contributors of the National Shrine's own archives (under the care of Anne Milton), Ethel Hostler's paper on Charlotte Boyd, the nineteenth-century restorer of the Slipper Chapel, reveals a wealth of archival research in national, local and ecclesiastical collections, including in the latter category Downside Abbey and the Diocese of East Anglia. The Downside connection is treated in full by Dom Aidan Bellenger's essay on Walsingham and the Benedictines.

THE CATHOLIC ARCHIVES SOCIETY CONFERENCE, 1999

The twentieth annual conference of the Catholic Archives Society was held at Ushaw College, Durham, from 31 May to 2 June.

The theme of this year's conference was 'Looking at Ourselves', being a response to the proposed National Survey of Catholic Archives. The first speaker on the Monday evening was Tim McCann of the West Sussex Record Office. He gave a masterly survey of the uses and importance of parish records and presented a draft classification scheme for such records (see elsewhere in the present volume). Robin Gard's paper followed later that evening, and he took for his topic the National Survey as it affected the archives of Catholic lay societies, a field in which he has done much work himself. He laid particular emphasis on previous attempts at surveying the archives of such societies conducted by a Working Party of the CAS in 1992-93, and went on to argue for the need for a fresh survey undertaken in a more co-ordinated fashion.

Canon Marmion presented a most interesting account of the Shrewsbury Diocesan Archives, which are now housed in part of a school building in Birkenhead adapted for the purpose. He gave a brief history of how the archives were moved from the Curial Offices, and then offered a more detailed analysis of the contents of their holdings. The fourth main speaker at the conference was Anselm Nye. His paper on the archives of religious women and the National Survey is reproduced in the present volume. Needless to say, it was of great interest and delivered in a lively and humorous way.

A visit to Durham Cathedral Library was enjoyed by a number of the conference participants, and on the Tuesday evening various interest groups met to discuss the following topics: Diocesan Archives; Parish Records and Lay Societies; and Archives of Religious. Such smaller groups are always a very important aspect of the conference because they allow the exchange of information and ideas in a more informal setting. The Open Forum and Annual General Meeting took place on the Wednesday morning, and a full report of these, together with summaries of the papers at the conference, are to be found in CAS Bulletin 20/21.

The conference theme proved to be an excellent complement to that of the 1998 conference ('Looking Forward') inasmuch as it situated that wider consideration of the archival future within the Society's concern to press ahead with the National Survey. This year's conference will take place at the Leeds Diocesan Pastoral Centre, Leeds, from 29-31 May.

EDITORIAL NOTES

Catholic Archives 21 has a particular focus in that a number of this year's contributors write about the life and work of the archivist. Father Joseph Fleming, in the first part of his study on archival theory and standards, offers an overview of some of the professional and technical issues which concern all archivists. Lynda Crawford writes from personal experience as a student for the Society of Archivists' Diploma in Archive Administration, while Sister Mary Coke gives an insider's view of being a religious archivist. Father Holt, himself an historian and archivist of distinction, offers a portrait of Father Joseph Stevenson, a nineteenth-century scholar and archivist who became a Jesuit priest and placed his immense experience at the service of the Church.

The journal continues with its customary selection of articles descriptive of particular archives, and in this edition we are happy to publish a report on the Scottish Catholic Archives by Dr Christine Johnson and Margaret Osborne's contribution on the Northampton Diocesan Archives. Likewise, and in response to the Editor's appeal to the many congregations of religious sisters hitherto unrepresented in these pages, we are delighted to publish the article by Sister Mary Derbyshire on the archives of the Canonesses of St Augustine at Boarbank Hall and that of Cindy Swanson on the holdings of the United States Province of the Bon Secours Sisters. It is the Editor's hope that a greater number of religious archivists (male and female) will consider putting pen to paper, even (and one might say especially) if their holdings are quite modest. There is a real danger in these days of closures and amalgamations that the contents and whereabouts of archival collections will disappear for good. The Catholic Archives Society exists to ensure that such a tragedy is averted. We are also fortunate in being able to publish Sister Dominic Savio Hamer's enlightening insight into the archival preparations for the beatification of Father Dominic Barberi in 1963 and the first part of another contribution from Robin Gard on the archives of lay societies, this time St Joan's International Alliance.

Finally, this edition of Catholic Archives contains a lengthy book review section, since it is the Editor's opinion that those involved in Catholic archives should be aware of the ever increasing literature which makes direct use of the Church's archival heritage. We are also grateful to Robin Gard for his report on the Society's latest Conference. To all our contributors the Catholic Archives Society extends its thanks, and to future contributors offers its encouragement to begin writing.

ARCHIVAL THEORY AND STANDARDS IN ECCLESIASTICAL ARCHIVES: PART I

Rev. Joseph Fleming

INTRODUCTION

Ever since Sir Hillary Jenkinson put forward the twin theories of the moral (1) and physical (2) defence of the archive, it has been seen that an archive must be regulated in order for it to function adequately. This regulation flows from the inherent needs of the archive, both from the general needs of all archives and the specialised needs of individual archives. Again, the needs can relate to the physical preservation and conservation of the records and also to their intellectual control and management. These archival needs can best be expressed as standards which affect and are applicable to the various branches or areas of archival science.

The archival standard should be descriptive rather than prescriptive. It should follow on the reflections of sound archival practice. It should aim to gather up that practice and synthesise it into a clear code. As a professional standard, it should be the academic abstraction of a concrete process which in turn is capable of being applied to the process, the archival practice with the goal of refining it and rendering it more effective.

Without wishing to reduce everything to the simplicity of intellectual and physical control, I wish to examine the various fields of archival administration which must be taken into account when trying to postulate relevant and effective archival standards: viz. listing and arrangement policies, the role of information technology and collections policies. In each case, having put forward the case for standards in these areas, and having looked at some of the more current solutions which are available, I shall (in Part 2 of this article) consider the replies which have been obtained in a questionnaire sent to three particular archives.

Before that, however, I will examine the more physical specifications of archival building and construction, both in the building of new sites and the adaptation of existing constructions, taking into account the practical considerations of the installation of the archive and the relevant industrial and professional norms that apply, as well as the issues of staff training and levels of public access. I will also look at the legal issues involved in dealing mainly with the consequences of Freedom of Information legislation and especially as it applies to Great Britain and the European Community. Given the ecclesiastical nature of the archives, I shall review the innovations in canon law, and with special regard to the archive of the cathedral of Santiago de Compostela, I will attempt to set out some of the more recent Spanish legislation at both national and autonomous level. In the case of the archive of the World Council of Churches, I shall comment on its ecumenical and international nature.

A little background information is required about the three archives studied:

a) The archive of the cathedral of Santiago de Compostela has material which dates from 829 (3), but the date of its actual foundation is unknown. Physically, it is situated in the Chapter House attached to the cathedral. It is subject to the Dean and Chapter and is run by the Canon Archivist. The archivist is a canon, a full member of the Chapter, and thus like all canons must be an ordained priest. Under the 1983 Code of Canon Law all canonries are filled by the bishop. However, the present archivist obtained his post under the previous procedure by public examination (4) which had been advertised nationally. The scope of the archive's collecting policy falls naturally on those records which relate to the functions of the cathedral. However, given the time span and the large number of benefices held by the Chapter, the fonds are particularly rich and important as a primary source for Galician history. It must also be added that there are other ecclesiastical archives which exist within the diocese (5). The principal among these is the diocesan archive which has its own function and staff. The archive of the cathedral of Santiago de Compostela has published an Indice de Legajos (6) and has a brief list of fonds on line on the internet (7).

(b) The World Council of Churches was founded on 23 August 1948 by the fusion of two movements, Life and Work and Faith and Order. It is an ecumenical movement which comprises member churches of both the Orthodox and Protestant traditions, with the Catholic Church as an official observer which participates in consultations. It is based in Geneva, but its activities take place all over the world. The Council has its own press and publishes documents in various languages, principally English, French, German and other languages appropriate to the individual publication. There is a library and archive attached to the institution, as well as on-line search and ordering facilities which are shared with the Bossey Ecumenical Institute. The World Council of Churches describes its library as containing '...more than 100,000 books, periodicals and pamphlets pertaining to the 20th century ecumenical movement, the Ecumenical Centre and the Bossey Ecumenical Institute Libraries house the largest such collection in the world' (8). The extent of the holdings includes '...practically every document ever issued by an ecumenical organisation or movement during the 20th century [e.g. Faith and Order, Life and Work, International Missionary Council, World Student Christian Federation, to name a few]. Researchers have access to most archives and can rely on the archivist's help. Archival documents do not circulate outside the Library, but photocopies can be made of most documents, with the librarian's permission (9). The archive is thus institutional, of an ecumenical and international nature, and is an especially good example of one that is facing up to the challenges of information and communication technology. There is one archivist on the staff.

(c) The Liverpool Archdiocesan Archive is a relatively new creation and the current archivist is the first to have worked at Upholland (10). A decision was made to separate the archives from the direct responsibility of the Chancellor (11), and to appoint a professional archivist, Dr Meg Whittle, to arrange the bishops' papers, principally those of the late Archbishop Worlock, with the intention of aiding historical research. The archive is situated in part of St Joseph's College, Upholland, the former seminary built in the nineteenth century. As regards the scope and function as a diocesan archive, it comes the nearest to the outline of an institutional ecclesiastical archive given by Cox (12) and also has an official relationship to the Liverpool and Lancashire County Record Offices regarding the deposit and cataloguing of parish registers (13).

INTELLECTUAL CONTROL IN ARCHIVAL PRACTICE

From the time of Sir Hillary Jenkinson the problem of listing records has been one of the major issues in the field of the intellectual control of archives. However, Jenkinson was rather more concerned with physical preservation since his view of the archivist's duties excluded all concept of appraisal, but consisted in the continuation of the chain of custody and the preservation of all the records entrusted by the creating body (14).

Although there has been a great increase in the volume of records, especially since the Second World War, due to the expansion in facilities for making copies through electronic printing media, which has brought with it the need to appraise records and to be selective as to which are to be preserved permanently, yet we may note that none of the three archives in question has an appraisal policy. It would seem rather that they view their duty as having to preserve all the records they receive from their creating bodies, thus leaving the selection of records to be preserved to the latter and remaining content to preserve and list their fonds.

In order to gain intellectual control over its deposits, each archive will wish to maintain the original order of its fonds in as far as this is possible. Original order is one aspect of metadata - that data beyond data, other than the explicit content of the record - which gives the reader more information about the record and helps to put it in a wider context. Thus the names of the creator and recipient, the date and place of creation, type of document and original medium are all examples of metadata which should be included in good archival description. But it is the original order that gives an overall picture and intellectual control of the deposits.

The German archival tradition has the theory of Registraturprinzip. In the various government ministries there would be a registry which ordered the records created and received. These records would be sent to the archive as an ordered series or fonds, and it was the duty of the archivist to respect and preserve the registry's ordering. Within the British tradition, and following the principle of original order, is the theory of provenance (15). When ordering deposits, account is taken of the body or department which has created them, and preference is given to the provenance over apparent similarity of type. Naturally, so as to arrange the records effectively, and with due regard for original order and provenance, a system of ordering and description that respects the hierarchical nature of archives must be devised. This system must reflect the function or organization of the creating body and also allow the researcher the opportunity to approach the material in a systematic way. In America archivists have tended to adapt library standards to the archival situation. This is principally illustrated by MARC (Machine Readable Code) which also aims at providing an electronic format that will be acceptable internationally. However, the great disadvantage in trying to adapt library standards for archival use lies in the fact that books are discrete items whereas records naturally form hierarchical groups, and this must be reflected in their description.

In 1994 the International Council on Archives published the General Standard Archival Description ISAD (G). It reflects the hierarchical nature of archival collections and proposes five levels of description: fonds, subfonds, series, sub-series, file and item. Provision is made for adequate description to be given at the appropriate level so that all relevant metadata is included but not repeated.

As a means to creating find aids, in 1996 the same organization published the International Standard Archival Authority Record for Corporate Bodies, Persons and Families ISAAR (CPF) with the aim of standardising indices and guides by the uniformity of description of access points. The National Council on Archives also published its own Rules for the Construction of Personal Place and Corporate Names (1997).

To return to ISAD (G), two principle benefits from the proposed standard may be deduced, which indeed should be contingent on any useful standard. Firstly, each archive should have greater effective intellectual control over its deposits since the norms of ISAD (G) lead to a clearer and uniform description and hierarchical organisation of the deposits. Secondly, if a uniform system is implemented, communication and collaboration between individual archives will be fostered and facilitated. Both these considerations bring noticeable benefits to researchers and other users.

As well as facilitating archival description at a mechanical level, the principles of ISAD (G) are adaptable to electronic use and can benefit from EAD (Electronic Archival Description) which uses SGML format and can be put on to the internet. There are now software programmes, e.g. Calm 2000, which use EAD and are compliant with the norms of ISAD (G).

The Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church, in its circular letter The Pastoral Function of Church Archives, reminds ecclesiastical archivists of the need to pay attention to the methodology used in archival organisation and description, taking into account the latest technologies (16). The same letter favours close collaboration with state and other archives (17) and argues for professional standardisation.

The archive of the cathedral of Santiago de Compostela uses the principle of provenance in listing material. It also uses a functional system which ties into provenance if function is identified with the activity of a concrete body or department within a body. This archive also takes account of national and autonomous legal norms (18). Thus far it has published four catalogues. The Indice de Legajos (Index of Bundles) reveals that the bundles are listed in one series that runs from 1 to 1250. Each bundle is described and dated, and there is the possibility of noting observations. However, the bundles are not described in a hierarchical manner but rather in one continuous series. Nevertheless, within the list several bundles form part of their own series, e.g. Fundaciones de capelánias nos. 1-5, which correspond to bundles 129 to 133 respectively. So within the list there is the possibility, since the collection is physically organised by provenance, to restructure the list to reflect this. Indeed, if we compare this to the brief catalogue given on the diocesan web page we can see that a more hierarchical structure has been set out which bodes well for future developments. The archive is in the process of creating electronic catalogues that will form part of a Galician cultural database with internet access. The national norms set out by the Spanish Ministry of Education and Culture and the Galician authorities are being followed both in the creation of catalogues and finding aids and in the technical specifications of putting these into electronic format and on to the worldwide web. As regards its collecting policy, it must be remembered that the archive is that of a cathedral and its material deals with matters arising from the functions of the cathedral chapter. However, remembering the many benefices that were once appropriated by it, as well as temporal endowments and legacies, and considering its continuity of more than one thousand years and the importance of the chapter in Galician history, its fonds are particularly rich and of prime historical importance.

The archive of the World Council of Churches did not give any information about its listing policies. However, it has on deposit some four million documents, 20% of which have been indexed and catalogued electronically and may be ordered via the internet. This is the only one among the three archives which is part of a library, and so it may be supposed that listing is carried out according to library standards. What is certain is that the internet service supports MARC and is oriented towards a bibliographical service. With regard to a collections policy, records are transferred to the archive after ten years. It might be assumed, therefore, that appraisal is carried out by the departments before the records reach the archive.

The Liverpool Archdiocesan Archive uses the scheme of classification for diocesan records devised by the Catholic Archives Society. This scheme is organised hierarchically and is of course oriented towards diocesan records. At the highest level it has seven divisions, each of which is subdivided into as many as eleven subdivisions. The great weakness of the system is that since it intends to be all-embracing, any documents that are not typical of a diocesan fond have no category (19). As regards electronic sources, the archivist could not justify the expense of an EAD programme. However, the deposit has been catalogued on a word processing programme and is available in printed format. In its collection policy the archive gives priority to episcopal papers, which in practice includes much of the material emanating from the diocesan curia. The archive also houses Mr O'Byrne's art collection, Mr Murphy's photographic collection of Lourdes, and the Catholic Pictorial's audio-visual archive. Until now parishes in the archdiocese within Liverpool deposit material in the Liverpool City Archive, while those outside the city do so at the Lancashire Record Office at Preston. The Liverpool Archdiocesan Archive is committed 'to collate a central record of archdiocesan archive material held elsewhere' and 'to inform parish clergy that all future parish archives should be deposited in the Archdiocesan Archive.'

All three archives are thus aware of the need for archival standards. It is to be hoped that, especially since the use of computers makes consultation easier and ISAAD (G) becomes better known, the growth in interarchival collaboration will foster the acceptance of national and international standards. Thus, if listing and archival description become at least more uniform, it will assist the sharing of information and lead to uniformity of finding aids, which in turn will benefit researchers and other users of the archives.

PHYSICAL CONTROL AND CONDITIONS IN ARCHIVAL PRACTICE

Standards in the physical aspect of archival conservation are not mere academic abstracts, but rather the distillation of sound archival practice. In the physical preservation of archives the nature and composition of the media that support the document must be addressed: the climatic conditions; the possibility of regulating the atmosphere; the adaptation of buildings; the health and safety of staff and the public; and the question of public access. These are among the points that need to be carefully considered if an archive is to function as it ought.

In Britain we have BS 5454, which contains recommendations for the storage and exhibition of archival documents, and there exists a Standard for Record Repositories produced by the Royal Commission on Historical Manuscripts (HMC). There is also a new standard promoted by the International Organisation for Standardisation, Draft International Standard ISO/DIS 11799, which is still at the consultation stage. Dating from 1998, it consists of nine chapters with three annexes. The introduction sets out the aims and needs of archives and libraries and places the standard in its international context. Chapter 1 gives the scope of the draft and warns that certain areas are to be left to local or national standardisations, e.g. security. Chapter 2 refers to another relevant standard, viz. ISO 9706/1994 and Chapter 3 defines its terms. Chapter 4 lists the dangers to be avoided in choosing a site for the building, while Chapter 5 refers to some of the characteristics of the building: it should be self-contained, fire resistant, and possess climatic inertia. The structure should be strong enough to support the weight of records and be divided so as to retard fire. Nor should it attract dust.

Chapter 6 deals with the installation and equipping of the archive. The plant should be in a separate building and supply pipes should be away from the repository. All monitors and systems controls should be connected to the plant room. There should be a fire safety system which is capable of detecting both heat and smoke, as well as manual fire extinguishers located at strategic points. The detection systems should activate local alarms, shut down air conditioning and heating, alert the fire service and sound the alarm throughout the building. The control panel should be located at a point accessible to both staff and the fire brigade. National fire and safety regulations may also apply. It also recommends the installation of an automatic fire extinguisher system designed to minimise damage to library and archive material either by fire or its own use, and such a system is to be maintained at regular intervals. A water mist system is preferred to sprinklers, and each area or compartment of the building must be made waterproof and have rapid drainage. Gas systems may be utilised in small areas, but Halon systems are no longer used, nor should carbon dioxide be used where people may be endangered. Where there is no automatic system, and even when there is, as an extra precaution it is recommended that nowhere is more than 6 metres from the end of an extended hose, and that there are fire hydrants at all strategic points. There should always be an adequate supply of manual fire extinguishers and the staff should be trained to use them. Water should not be used on electrical fires.

The same chapter then recommends the installation of a monitored intruder alarm and advises the use of such lighting as minimises damage to the deposits. Only as much lighting as is needed for the retrieval of documents should be provided. Daylight is to be excluded and older buildings, reading rooms and other places where documents will be handled should be adapted accordingly. Suitable lighting can be provided by fluorescent lamps with diffusers, incandescent lamps with heat-absorbing filters (as long as they are 5 metres from the documents) and fibre optic lighting placed well away.

The next section of Chapter 6 considers ventilation and air quality. The building should allow air circulation and avoid the concentration of high relative humidity. The air should also be able to circulate all around the shelving and the entire repository should be kept free of dust and pollution. A special warning is given about the dangers to photographic and electronic media. The air should be regularly monitored and seasonal changes should be noted. If there is a filter system, this must not damage the documents and should be well maintained. Climatic inertia is recommended and appropriate relative humidity levels, avoiding fluctuations, while temperature and humidity should be consistently monitored by instruments that are both maintained and calibrated. All material which is kept in cold storage must be completely acclimatised before it can be handled.

The final section of this chapter considers furniture, and recommends that only those furnishings and fittings needed to store and handle the records be kept in the repository. No furniture should have sharp edges or be potentially harmful to the records, nor should it be combustible, emit harmful gases in case of fire, or attract dust. Furniture should be kept away from the walls so as to favour climatic inertia, and shelving should support the weight of the records and be deep enough to contain them, allowing the material to be placed upright.

Chapter 7 concludes the standard with a few general recommendations: there should be no smoking, eating or drinking in the repository, nor any irrelevant activity; all rooms should have an intercom or telephone fitted; cleanliness is essential, but cleaning agents must not harm deposits; new acquisitions might need to be disinfected. Documents should be protected in suitable boxes or containers which meet the appropriate standards and must be acid-free. Books must be stood upright, but if they are large they may be stored flat, taking into account the pressure on them. Finally, care must be taken if large sheets have to be stored in a rolled-up position.

Chapter 8 reminds the reader of the need to draw up a disaster control plan (the details of which are given in Annex C). Chapter 9 deals very briefly with the care needed in mounting exhibitions and recommends that facsimile copies be made for this purpose. Annex A gives the maximum tolerated limits for air pollutants, while Annex B details the ideal temperature and relative humidity for the storage of various media.

Although any institution that is compliant with BS 5454 will find little that is new in this standard, nevertheless it aims to establish a basic model that all countries can adopt, while being susceptible to additions in individual countries.

If we return to the original principle that standards should effect sound archival practice and should aim to codify it so that it can be applied universally, it can be deduced that those which relate to the physical conservation of records must take into account the scientific analysis of the media on deposit, the atmospheric conditions, the health and safety of the staff, and the question of security and public access. Parchment, paper, photographic paper and negatives, microfilm, electronic disks, compact discs etc. all have different chemical compositions, some organic and others inorganic. They each have an ideal range of temperatures and relative humidity: e.g. photographic material should be kept slightly cooler than paper. The repository building should thus possess thermal inertia and be equipped to regulate, or at the very least monitor, heat and relative humidity. Geographical location is also important: e.g. an archive in Northern Europe would face very different climatic issues compared with one situated in the tropics. The European archive might need to take care with heating, while the tropical one would need to monitor air conditioning.

Once again there are many issues of health and safety, both for staff and the preservation of the records themselves: e.g. lighting should not be harmful to the records; and the circulation of air should dispel humidity and must be controllable, since the repository and the areas where people work will have different requirements. If areas are to be separated, e.g. a paper repository, photographic storeroom and staff office, then they should each possess an intercom in case of emergency.

The problems relating to the location of the archive should also be discussed if a new building is to be used. Areas susceptible to natural disasters, those near storage sites of dangerous materials, or places at risk from military action or civil disorder must all be avoided. On the other hand, it is advisable to be near good means of communication and travel facilities.

In planning the fire alarm and extinguisher systems thought must be given not only to the preservation of records but also the safety of staff and public. The time taken for the emergency services to arrive, if required, and the possibility of connecting the alarm systems to them directly must also be investigated. The staff must be well trained in fire drill and a disaster plan should be drawn up and staff acquainted with it.

With regard to access, a balance must be struck between ease of access for the public and the security of the records. The public will not normally have access to the repository area, but access to the building for the disabled should be of prime importance in its planning. It should also be remembered that the staff will require adequate working and recreational facilities.

These are some of the conditions which may be deduced from good archival practice and represent the physical requirements of record preservation which should be present in any professional standard for this field. But how do the three archives under consideration meet such standards?

The archive of the cathedral of Santiago de Compostela is situated in the stone-built Chapter House. The climate is typically Atlantic, i.e. damp. The age of the building precludes the application of modern norms, although it has withstood siege in earlier times. However, no environmental dangers are seen to affect it. The whole cathedral complex has its own security service – there has been a trend to stage protest sit-ins in the cathedral itself - and there is night surveillance. The police station is situated on the opposite side of the Plaza del Obradoiro, while the fire and ambulance services are less than 1 kilometre away. The cathedral often has a first aid post. Although no standard has been quoted, the electrical installation is up to date, and it is also interesting to note that the lighting circuits are independent in each section of the archive and that daylight halogen lighting has been installed to favour preservation. The upper storeys and reading room have small windows, but it would be difficult to alter them since the entire building is part of UNESCO's World Heritage Site. Most of the shelving is fitted and wooden, but in some areas it is metal. The wooden shelving is in contact with the wall, and this could lead to problems of circulation. The outer walls are so thick that damp cannot easily penetrate. There is also a strong room for special deposits. Climatic control is achieved through the thermal inertia of the building and dehumidifiers are used to keep the relative humidity at a suitable level. There are gas and smoke alarms which are connected to the fire station and a sprinkler system has been installed. There is also a security alarm system which is connected to a security firm and the police station. The staff comprises the Canon Archivist (who has his own office) and three assistants housed in two offices. The archive is open to researchers on recommendation and there is a reading room which can be invigilated by closed circuit television. It might also be added that there are public lavatories situated next to the archive in the cloister, and that since the cathedral is located in the centre of the city, public access is easy and most facilities are on hand.

The reply from the World Council of Churches was somewhat briefer. Nevertheless, it can be ascertained that no construction norms have been used in the building and that there are some unstated environmental dangers. There is no contact with the emergency services in the town. The electrical installation complies with Swiss norms. No details were given about shelving and lighting, but the temperature is kept at 22 degrees centigrade. The relative humidity is monitored, but cannot be controlled, and is naturally at between 50% and 65%. The fire alarm system is described as basic and the fire brigade must be contacted manually. There are no burglar alarms. The staff consists of the archivist alone and he has no office. The archive is open to all researchers and documents may be ordered electronically. We might add that this archive would benefit from considering the state of its security, undertaking a thorough survey and drawing up a disaster plan.

The first point to be noted about the Liverpool Archdiocesan Archive is that the preparation of a disaster plan forms part of its mission statement. Again we are faced with an old (nineteenth-century) building, part of which has been adapted for archival use. The building is of stone and there are no natural dangers. The archive is situated on the third floor of the west wing and the repository faces east and west. The central administration of the college is responsible for liaising with the emergency services and also provides security. There are manual fire extinguishers and alarms. The extinguishers are regularly maintained and the general staff practice fire drill. The conservator from the Lancashire County Record Office advises on health and safety issues. The electrical installation is up to date and lighting is fluorescent. All the windows in the repository are fitted with ultra-violet filters. Metal shelving is used and is situated away from the wall. The temperature and other conditions are considered ideal, but although they are monitored, there is no way of controlling them. The archive is connected to the main central heating system and individual radiators can be turned off. The staff consists of the archivist and volunteers, and the latter must sign an agreement to respect the confidentiality of the archive. There is an office, lavatory and tea-making facilities for their use. The archive is open to the public and its use is actively encouraged. However, there is seldom more than one reader at a time. There is a reading room and readers' bags may be searched.

Thus it may be seen that at the international level there is an attempt to lay down a basic standard to which all countries can subscribe. This would give room for each country to legislate for its own specific climatic, administrative and economic conditions. It may also be noted that these standards should emanate from, and in turn foster, sound archival practice based on professionalism and scientific observation. Issues concerning the physical environment of archives are dealt with by the three repositories surveyed. Common principles of atmospheric control, electrical safety and fire prevention can be observed, as well as the need to provide a service to the public while taking into consideration issues of public safety and institutional security.

To be concluded

DISTANCE NO OBJECT: STUDYING FOR THE SOCIETY OF ARCHIVISTS' DIPLOMA IN ARCHIVE ADMINISTRATION

Lynda Crawford

Ask any archivist employed in Britain today how they qualified for their chosen profession and the majority will give you the same response: a first degree followed by a postgraduate qualification taken at University College London, University of Wales (Aberystwyth), University of Wales (Bangor) or the University of Liverpool. This is the 'accepted' and, indeed, best publicised route into the profession. A number of archivists, however, will give you a different answer and will tell you that they achieved their professional training on the job, by distance learning, having studied for the Society of Archivists' Diploma in Archives Administration. This in-service scheme, which provides a professional qualification equivalent in standard to those awarded by the universities, has operated since 1979, but still tends to be little known outside the Society itself.

The Diploma Course is open to anyone who is a personal member of the Society of Archivists or who works in an organisation which has institutional membership. Applicants must be graduates (or hold an accepted equivalent qualification) and must have at least one year's experience in archives or records management. In addition, they must be currently employed in an establishment which can provide an appropriate range of experience. Those working in specialist repositories, however, should not be put off by the latter criterion. Usually, if it is felt that a student's employing institution cannot offer the breadth of experience required, arrangements can be made to supplement this with the assistance of other institutions.

The range of students enrolled on the course is diverse: their employers include local government, universities, national repositories, businesses and specialist repositories such as Canterbury Cathedral or the British Antarctic Survey; their geographical spread covers the whole of the British Isles. Numbers fluctuate, but there can be up to fifty students enrolled on the course at any given time. Their reasons for studying can be equally varied. Some may always have intended to become archivists but, for one reason or another, were unable to attend one of the universities for full or part-time postgraduate study; others may have been employed in a repository in an alternative role - perhaps clerical or administrative – and decided the time is ripe for a change of career; still others may inadvertently have found themselves responsible for archives in their employment, and may wish to formalise their position and their training. The beauty of the Society's Diploma, then, is that it provides a route into the profession for all such people, for whom the traditional pathway is either impractical or inappropriate.

Before the Diploma can be awarded, students must complete three specific elements: coursework, a dissertation and final exams. The coursework, which is based on a comprehensive training manual commissioned by the Society is divided into several different modules. Three of these are compulsory and cover the core subjects considered to be essential knowledge for any practising archivist. They are 'Archive Administration', 'Arrangement and Description' and 'Records Management'. Students are expected to complete a further two study modules from a choice of options such as 'Estate Archives', 'Business Archives', 'Ecclesiastical Records', 'Palaeography and Diplomatic', 'Records of Central and Local Government', 'Scottish Law, Government and Records' - even 'Audio-Visual Archives'! With such variety, students can select modules of direct relevance to their own working environment. Alternatively, they may opt to study something completely different in order to broaden their archival experience. In total, the coursework element of the Diploma involves the submission of around 28 written assignments, undertaken at the student's own pace, and in his or her chosen order. The course manual contains all of the teaching materials required for each unit, together with well-constructed reading lists. Many of the assignments are of a theoretical nature, though several do require more practical activity.

The second element of the Diploma, the dissertation, involves the completion of a 5000-word study on a subject suggested by the student and approved by the course director. The dissertation may be practical in nature, or may concentrate on more theoretical issues. Whatever the case, it is intended to allow students to place their particular learning and experience in a wider professional context.

The final examinations conclude the Diploma and are usually held in February. Students must have completed all other elements before being allowed to sit the exams. There are three written papers to be tackled, each lasting three hours, and covering the nature, use and management of records and archives. Exams are usually held in London, though alternative arrangements can be made if necessary.

Having looked at the structure of the course, then, perhaps it is time to consider the 'study experience' itself?. What are the practicalities for those students undertaking the Diploma? What level of commitment is required? What is the impact on working life? What are the ups and downs of distance learning?

Completing the course is certainly hard work. Whilst the Diploma is said to be undertaken at the student's own pace, in practice this means a minimum of two and a maximum of four years' study. Obviously, the sooner the course is completed, the more time pressure a student has to work under. Thus the reality of a two-year completion is one of near continuous study, with an average of one assignment needing to be submitted every three weeks in order to allow sufficient time for the dissertation and exam revision. This is a punishing schedule, demanding a consistently high level of commitment. A two-year timetable does have its advantages, however. The course is soon completed, students are quickly 'on a roll' with their assignments and exams are taken while the information is still very fresh in the mind. With a three or four-year completion there is inevitably less time pressure. Assignments can be completed at longer intervals and it may even be possible to take a significant break from study. On the minus side, however, the gaps between assignments can mean it is a battle to get back into the studying frame of mind, and by the time the exams come around students may be returning to topics which are little more than a distant memory. Weighing all of this up, each individual will have his or her own preferred approach and the flexibility offered is one of the real attractions of studying in this way. The course can be tailored to fit around work, family or any other commitments the student may have. Except in very particular circumstances (for example if an individual is employed on a fixed-term contract) students set their own agenda, and simply inform the course director when they intend to sit the exams. This usually occurs in June, when dissertation proposals are submitted. The only other demand made upon them is that they complete a minimum of eight coursework assignments for every year they are enrolled on the course.

Organisational skills come very much to the fore for all Diploma students. Since they are required to study independently, it is vital that they establish a clear timetable for themselves – and that they are disciplined enough to stick to it in the absence of specific deadlines. In addition, they must continually be thinking ahead in terms of securing the reading material they require. They may be working in an institution without an extensive library of archival literature, and so will have to rely on the Society's library, inter-library loans, or on obtaining books from other students. This demands considerable forward planning, to ensure that materials are available as and when required. The organisational aspect of the Diploma, then, is a challenge in itself!

It is difficult to generalise about the impact of the course on working life, since every student has a different employer and so will have a different experience. Employers are asked to make a basic commitment of support. This involves the provision of study time during the working day, and the standard requirement is one morning or afternoon per week. In practice, students and employers may settle on an alternative arrangement, depending on circumstances – perhaps more concentrated periods of study leave, or allowing the student to undertake practical assignments during normal working hours. Whatever the case, the importance of employer support should not be underestimated. My own employer was very sympathetic, even organising visits to other repositories and encouraging me to attend relevant training courses and events. This certainly added to my learning experience and made me feel much more positive about my employer's attitude towards my studies.

On a more general level, distance learning can be an isolating experience, and this feeling of isolation is a drawback of the Diploma Course – especially for those employed in small repositories, or perhaps even working on their own. There are no peers on hand to offer advice and support, with whom to compare notes, or against whom to gauge one's progress. The Board of Studies is very aware of this, and so has devised a number of schemes to help improve personal contact. All students have a supervisor assigned to them for the duration of their studies. There is an annual 'start-up seminar' for all those new to the course, which provides an opportunity to meet and form contacts with fellow students, and also to obtain advice from course tutors and people who have recently completed their studies. Furthermore, it is a requirement of the Diploma that all students attend at least one seminar or residential course per year, throughout the period of their enrolment. Such arrangements provide an opportunity to learn from others, exchange information, compare experiences and gain some much-needed moral support. Distance learning can be lonely, and any contact with others is a welcome boost.

The student body itself has taken steps to improve and enhance personal contact. Some groups of students arrange occasional 'regional' meetings, where they can get together and discuss things informally. In addition, an electronic mailbase has been established as a general forum for students. Many of the messages posted to this are of a practical nature – requests for reading material or for advice on a particular aspect of an assignment. Others are simply messages of support and encouragement.

A survey of the mailbase messages can provide an interesting insight into how students view the course. The nature of distance learning, particularly that undertaken on the job, means that one person's experience is very different from another's. Aspects which some will find straightforward, perhaps due to the environment they work in or the resources they have available, may prove problematical to others. On the other hand, many of the concerns are remarkably uniform. Students are anxious about the varying expectations of different course tutors, or about perceived discrepancies in their marking systems. The turnaround times for the marking of assignments is sometimes a cause for comment, though of course there is recognition that tutors have other commitments. The dissertation is highlighted as an area for possible re-structuring, with some students feeling it is submitted too close to the exams, and some questioning whether a detailed study can realistically be achieved within a limit of 5000 words.

Raising such concerns is not intended to be negative; they are highlighted here simply because they cast an interesting light on the reality of distance learning. In fact, the experience of studying for the Diploma is really very positive. Of course it is hard work, it can be lonely, and there are times when the student feels as if he or she is on a treadmill. That said, it is an extremely stimulating and challenging experience, there is much to be learned and a good deal to be enjoyed. Those who complete the Diploma will find themselves well prepared for life as a professional archivist. Take the words of one student: 'I have learnt a lot and I do feel that the course has given me much more confidence to deal with issues at a professional level. For example, much to my surprise, the unit on archival ethics had a practical application almost as soon as I had finished the assignment'. This is surely a sound recommendation? But, at the end of the day, the proof of the pudding is in the eating ...

DIPLOMA STUDENTS' SEMINAR

Sister Mary Coke RSCJ

Just before Easter 2000 there was a meeting of the archivists of the Religious of the Sacred Heart in France, at the birthplace of our foundress. Nineteen countries were represented and every continent, so there was a great richness of culture to be shared as best we could, in spite of language differences. We all lamented the dearth of material resources and the increasing lack of records as we move into the twenty-first century, and though we in Europe suffer less, perhaps, from four- and six-legged friends determined to feast on our precious documents than our sisters in Africa, we found we all had our problems, and it was good to be able to share them. Some of the newer provinces have fewer records in any case, but I think we were all filled with fresh enthusiasm and a renewed realisation that 'The archives focus the richness of our heritage and energize us for apostolic life in today's world' (Canadian Province).

More importantly we found ourselves at one in our concern for people and the importance of our documents in preserving their story. Furthermore, there was much serious discussion on the whole question of confidentiality. How many people are lost to living memory yet made their worthwhile contribution to the life of our congregation and the Church, and if we dig down a little in our documents, we may find their story and bring them back, as it were, into memory. We owe it to them that they are not forgotten.

The following example may be helpful. Sorting out some papers belonging to deceased sisters one day, I came upon two grubby little envelopes which contained a few letters and receipts all written in French. They were from a home for the mentally ill and concerned a Sister Madeleine who had been confined there. Our records showed that she was a Breton and had been sent to England after her religious profession. There followed a curt statement; two years later that she had left the congregation. This was not so. Digging deeper I found that they had decided to send her to a home in France as they thought she would be happier there than in England. But the receipts showed that she was still in the charge of the English Province. Each year the bills came, followed by the receipts, and enclosed with them a little note on the sister's general well-being. After nearly thirty years in the home she was well enough to return to a community and for the next six years she is recorded as having rendered humble service helping in the kitchen in one of our French convents before she became ill and died shortly after. A brief life of this sister appears in our Annual Letters, as is customary for all our deceased members. The bare bones of the record card which would 'write her off' did not reveal the whole story of that person.

Some may wonder if this matters; I think it does. The example I have given is not an isolated one. We are members of the same religious family and surely we wish to establish the full truth. We all receive requests from people researching their family history who need our help. Are we to be less zealous in preserving our own family history and the memory of its members ? Each person is unique and our family history is made up of the stories of all those unique persons. And neither should we forget that they all belonged to a natural family which may also be seeking to fill in the gaps in their own knowledge.

As religious archivists we are preservers of the history of our order. There are different levels of time and place in the documents we receive:

a) Time Past - what relates to the foundation and beyond, perhaps up until the post-Vatican II era.

b) Time Present - recent and current happenings.

In the past we had a rich vein to draw upon: journals, annals, circular letters from Superiors General, lives of the dead, account books, letters of superiors and individuals. There is a certain 'knock-on effect' of the Second Vatican Council whereby many of these things were abolished when changes were introduced. Nowadays we have weekly or occasional news sheets, faxes, e-mails and other papers of various kinds, mostly ephemeral. But this is practically all we have. We also need to keep our eyes open for occasional newspaper or magazine articles which may supplement our meagre holdings. If we fail to collect these, who will ? In most small communities much of this material will find its way to the dustbin after a month or two, and for this reason the archives are the only reliable source of back numbers. So much business is conducted over the telephone, and all the added pleasantries and pieces of news that used to be included in letters are now largely absent. That is why we must collect, date-stamp, and file these papers chronologically. We must also remember that today's document is tomorrow's history, and hope that our successors will be able to learn from them something of the kind of life we live today, so different for many of us from that carefully recounted in the old journals. When houses close we may be able to lay hands upon a few diaries and cash books, when people die there are personal papers and perhaps letters, and when superiors reach the end of their term of office we can encourage them to deposit papers, floppy discs etc. under seals marked by them as to when such material may be opened, even though the discs will be unreadable by then and the computers obsolete. I would borrow Father Stewart Foster's remark in his article 'The Priest and Archives' (Catholic Archives no.20, p.50) and say that the archivist is a figure of continuity.

Levels of place may include the following: Mother House (international); Provincial House (national); Institution (local community); or Individual (personal). However, all of these levels may not exist in every case. Each level is mainly concerned with its own archive but must necessarily relate to the others, and may need to be concerned with all lower levels according to circumstances. The provincial archive, for example, need not collect papers emanating from the Mother House, as the latter has its own archive, but it is convenient to do so since it saves having to contact the central archive if some reference is sought. It also provides a useful and immediate source of such documents. If there is no local archive or archivist, then the provincial archive is responsible for institutional and individual ones. It is possible to take positive steps towards creating archival material, e.g. by encouraging the compilation of a Year Book where each community or even individual within the community writes a short account of their collective or personal ministry during the previous years.

There is a wealth of social and family history to be discovered in the papers of our deceased members and much light to be thrown on an individual's spirituality – and by extension on that of the congregation at a given period – through a study of their individual notebooks and retreat notes. An interesting study could be made of the development in the spirituality of our congregations since their foundation by using these papers. It is worthwhile to encourage people to write their memories of the deceased as soon as possible after death. Another positive step is to get the elderly to write their autobiographies or record them on tape or as an interview. We have only to think of what has happened during the lifetime of one of our centenarians, spanning the whole of the twentieth century. A card index of every member kept up-to-date with her changes of work and house is an essential reference.

It is for these reasons that I consider our archive as the collective memory of the congregation, storing anything from the decisions of the last chapter to the current changes in our telephone numbers. Keeping it up-to-date is important since I frequently receive requests from someone or other who needs to refer to a document they have lost – not that I have ever given them the document in question, but rather a photocopy. Within this memory I keep that of those who have left the congregation. Their index cards are retained together with any other information we have about them. This is important as I have more than once been asked to attest to the period a person spent with us for pension purposes. As one may see from the case of Sister Madeleine described above, it was fortunate that papers were kept.

I also consider the archive as a resource centre at the service of members of the congregation and researchers. Where else would one expect to find different editions of rule and custom books, lives and letters of the founder and members of the congregation, decrees of the chapters etc.? There are kept books written by members and background reference books, e.g. the Code of Canon Law, dictionaries, the documents of the Second Vatican Council, and a selected library of spirituality. With the proliferation of small convents such material is not always easily available.

As a result there may be a problem of space, so one needs to distinguish the essential from the non-essential. Some of the points I have suggested as useful may not find room in some archives, e.g. papers emanating from outside sources and background reference material. However, one needs to be wary of casting aside such items as birth certificates of individuals, which in theory may be obtained elsewhere, but in practice may have been among the many records destroyed during the Second World War. Moreover, papers of foreign nationals are virtually unobtainable and discrepancies often occur.

At the beginning of this paper I mentioned the subject of confidentiality. The question was raised by an archivist at the conference I attended: should we keep or destroy the remarks made about individuals in letters from local to major superiors? The archivist in question thought such material should be destroyed on the grounds of damaging someone's character. I note that Sister Helen Forshaw's article on the Womersley archives (Catholic Archives no.20, p.53) states that 'confidential material concerned with the assessment of students for ordination' is reserved but kept. The two things seem to me to be in the same category, and I believe such material should be kept under seal until well past the lifetime of the individuals concerned or that of anyone who may have known them. But the archivist who raised the point was of the opinion that the remarks might cause grave offence in a family which came to learn about them much later, and so perhaps one should recommend that the material be kept under seal indefinitely. I have come across similar cases in school registers where remarks were made about pupils on their leaving school. A recent case concerned a well-known person, a former pupil of one of our schools, whose biography is being written and where the entry in the school register was requested. I knew the way in which this girl had behaved while at school, and sure enough there was a pretty damning remark about her in the last column of the register. I felt that such a remark could be taken up in the wrong way, and thus did not allow the register to be seen. I photocopied the first (factual) part, and gave that to the researcher. It may have been a case of 'not the whole truth', or of being economical with the truth, but I believe it was justified. Our archives are private, we are not funded by the state, and we have the right to refuse access. We are all aware of the abuses of trust suffered by at least one of our members from a television company, and we are wise to be very wary in what we give them. Once we have handed over the material and signed the paper they send us, we have no further control over it. Incidentally, it is always wise to ask for a letter of introduction for researchers who wish to use our archives and to check up on them if we have any reason to doubt that they are bona fide.

Another question that has been raised is that of the deposit of all or some of our archives in public record offices. I have reservations about encouraging deposits of this kind, and I believe that the advantages and disadvantages should be spelt out very clearly. Deposits should not be made without careful consideration. I am no longer as enthusiastic as I once was, even though I have deposited certain documents. There are obvious advantages: security; controlled atmosphere; upkeep and repair; insurance; cost of photocopying etc. But these advantages would seem to be outweighed by the disadvantages in the kind of scenario depicted in two articles in the current issue of Archives de l'Eglise de France, where grave reservations are expressed owing to stringent conditions imposed, including limitation of access and possible breaches of confidentiality by the employees of the record office.

I do not wish to dampen enthusiasm nor to be a prophet of doom, but I have had some experience in these matters. When I first deposited documents, the archivist was a Catholic, knowledgeable and interested. This particular archivist's successor was not, and when I wanted to have the deposited documents out on display in connection with a lecture I was giving to the local historical society, the new archivist did not seem to think there was anything of interest. I was able to give the exact serial numbers of the documents I wanted, and all was well. But what will happen when I have moved on or died ? It seems to me that carefully-worded contracts are a minimum requirement. I think this potential situation could be used as a strong argument in favour of a central depot for English Catholic archives. The French have one, and their membership is only 500.

In conclusion, I recognise that I am expressing my personal views, and that it is in some sense heretical to the professional archivist. Like many religious archivists I have no professional training but had to learn on the job, from books, from colleagues and from the Catholic Archives Society and other archival organizations. Undoubtedly training is very important, but so too are other things such as knowledge of languages, or at least that of the founder. How can one classify what one cannot read ? For many of us French is important, for others Latin or German. We may need to be more familiar with the system of classification used in our own congregation rather than in Catholic Archives Society publications. We are often landed with other jobs which may restrict the time we can give to the archives, but for all of us the grace of our vocation, the love of our order and the inner knowledge we have through living the life go far to make up for our lack of professional skills.

The name of Joseph Stevenson may not be remembered today outside a limited circle but in his life of eighty-nine years he contributed much to studies in British history. Born in Berwick-upon-Tweed on 27 November 1806, he died in London on 8 February 1895. It was a life of many changes and of enormous industry.

His father was Robert, a surgeon, and his mother Elizabeth (Wilson). He was christened in the Church of England in Berwick. His education was at Witton-le-Wear and at the grammar school attached to Durham Cathedral. Looking back on the early years of his life he could recall seeing a Highland regiment being reviewed on its return from Waterloo. He did not, it seems, do particularly well at school but he did acquire the beginnings of an interest in antiquity and especially in the lives of St Cuthbert and other early saints. He proceeded to Glasgow University but there is no evidence to show that he took a degree. In 1829 he returned to Berwick with the intention of entering the Presbyterian ministry and resided there long enough to qualify for service as a Licentiate in the Kirk, but was already showing signs that he wished to follow a literary career. He began an edition of Chaucer (which he soon abandoned) and a glossary of old English words which was later published by subscription. His father having died some years before, Joseph decided that he must try to obtain a situation which would enable him to help his mother and her younger children. In 1831 he moved to London.

At first he found employment working among the public records which were then kept in St John's Chapel in the Tower of London but soon obtained an appointment in the manuscript department at the British Museum. He was fortunate in that he had a letter of recommendation to Mr Madden, then Keeper of the manuscripts, and in the fact that the museum had just purchased the Arundel manuscripts from the Royal Society and extra assistance was needed to put the papers in order. After a week's trial he was given a permanent post in the summer of 1831. In September he married in Glasgow Mary Ann Craig and in August 1832 their eldest child, Robert, was born.

By this time Stevenson was becoming known in London and Edinburgh. His post at the British Museum led to his being acquainted with those historians and students of antiquity who were regarded as leaders in the country and to his becoming a member of learned societies. In 1834 he was appointed a Subcommissioner of the Public Records and began to work on a proposed new edition of Rymer's Foedera. It has been mentioned that he had been a Licentiate of the Kirk before coming to London, but his children were baptised in the Church of England, and Stevenson's gradual abandonment of the Kirk caused displeasure in Scotland. At the time of the death from cerebral palsy of his son Robert in 1839, which was a cause of great grief, Stevenson retired from London, resigned his post on the Record Commission, and returned to Durham to take Anglican orders. In 1841 he became Keeper of the Records and Librarian and Archivist to the Dean and Chapter of Durham. For seven years he catalogued the charters and deeds in the cathedral treasury, and was awarded an honorary M.A. by the University of Durham.

Joseph Stevenson's studies were bringing him closer to Catholicism, though he does not seem to have had any contact with the High Church movement in the Church of England or with the Tractarians. The vicar of the church in which he held a curacy believed that the pope should be converted from popery and went to Rome to make an attempt to bring that about.

In order to support his growing family Stevenson had to look for preferment. Disregarding the views of those who thought he could do better by looking for it at Durham, he accepted in 1849 the living of Leighton Buzzard in Bedfordshire, which was in fact poor. The vicarage is said to have been almost uninhabitable. Stevenson and his family were there for thirteen years, during which time he built the vicarage, repaired the church after it had been struck by lightning, and obtained an extra curate. He continued the work of research and editing of records for the learned societies – for the Bannantyne, Roxburghe and Maitland Clubs, and for the Surtees and English Historical Societies – some twenty-five volumes in all which he had begun in earlier years. He also began a series – The Church Historians of England – of which eight volumes were published between 1853 and 1857.

In 1856, in response to the views of many including Stevenson, the government began to publish the national records. The first volume in the Rolls Series of which Stevenson was editor appeared in 1857 and the second, also edited by him, in 1858. The research involved led him to travel on the Continent visiting archives especially in France, where he and his family made contact with Catholicism. At about the same time he came to see that he could not do the demanding work of a parish and work in the Public Record Office, where he had undertaken the calendaring of the Tudor records. In 1862 he resigned from the living of Leighton Buzzard. He was becoming more and more attracted to the Catholic Church and on 24 June 1863 was received by Father Peter Gallwey at the Jesuit church in Farm Street, London. His wife was received into the Catholic Church in 1865 by the Dominicans at Haverstock Hill. Stevenson's superiors and some of his colleagues at the Public Record Office did not hide their disapproval, so he resigned as a calendarer but kept his post as an editor on the Rolls Series. From London he moved to Birmingham and lodged in the priest's house at Selly Park, his wife boarding at the convent of the Sisters of Charity of St Paul. Here in Birmingham Stevenson continued editing the volumes of the Rolls Series and worked on two volumes of documents of the history of Scotland. He also began working for the Historical Manuscripts Commission reporting on private collections and those of corporations.

When his wife died in 1869 Stevenson decided to become a priest, moving to Oscott for his studies, and he was ordained by Bishop Ullathorne in 1872 at the age of sixty-six. At this time the government was desirous of sending a representative to the Vatican Archives to try to obtain transcripts of documents bearing on British history. Some ill-advised approaches failed to achieve anything and so Stevenson was asked to go to Rome. He had been given a pension in recognition of his valuable services to historical studies. After some difficulty, and with the assistance of Archbishop Stonor who resided at Rome, Stevenson was able to obtain permission to work in the Vatican Archives which were not then open to scholars. He brought back to England four years later thirteen folio volumes of transcripts for the Public Record Office. Moreover, when in England in the summer of 1874 he began work on the cause of the English Martyrs.

Stevenson had been thinking while in Rome that he would like to join a religious order and had applied to the Franciscans. He was told that at the age of seventy-one he was too old to undertake the life. He then tried the Society of Jesus, but with the same result. On his return to England in 1877 he met and asked the help of Father John Morris, the Jesuit historian who was giving a retreat at Oscott, with the result that he was able to join the Jesuit novitiate at Rochampton a month later. For much of his noviceship Stevenson was allowed to work in the library of the house, and on completing it he was sent first to 111 Mount Street (the presbytery for Farm Street Church), then to St Aloysius, Oxford, and finally back to London in 1881, to the house of writers at 31 Farm Street, Berkeley Square. There he remained for the rest of his life.

During the next fifteen years Father Joseph Stevenson continued to write, as the list of his published works shows (see Bibliography below). Notable among these were two volumes on the life of Mary Stuart, Scotland and Rome, his edition of the Life of St Cuthbert by the Venerable Bede, and his Life of Jane Dormer, Duchess of Feria. Many articles on the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries were published in the Jesuit periodical The Month. In 1885 there appeared Stevenson's Supplemental Report on the manuscripts at Stonyhurst College in the Historical Manuscripts Commission's Tenth Report (Appendix 4). He had already (1872) produced two Reports on these manuscripts (in Reports 2 and 3). At the age of eighty-five Stevenson took part in a pilgrimage to Lindisfarne in honour of St Cuthbert. In the following year he received an honorary degree of Doctor of Laws from the University of St Andrews. When he died he had not long finished his last task – identifying in the Bodleian Library a series of despatches of the French ambassador which threw fresh light on the early years of the reign of Elizabeth I. He was arranging these for publication. Joseph Stevenson died at 31 Farm Street on 8 February 1895. As his entry in the Dictionary of National Biography stated, 'From 1831 for sixty years his pen was never idle.' Papers left by Father Stevenson and now in the British Jesuit Province Archives at 114 Mount Street, London W1 include the following: notebooks, diaries, miscellaneous notes, transcripts, a scrap book, newspaper cuttings, pamphlets and correspondence (general, foreign, with the Record Commission, bishops, religious and clergy).

Christine Johnson

In my last article for this journal (Catholic Archives 15), I reported on the work of the Scottish Catholic Archives during the years 1993 and 1994. In particular, I indicated the way in which a variety of deposits from different sources had begun to build up an overall picture of the Catholic Church in Scotland. Over the past six years further new deposits have both broadened the scope of this picture and filled in many more details.

DIOCESAN DEPOSITS

The Diocese of Argyll and the Isles added two categories of archives. The additional nineteenth-century correspondence contained a wealth of detail on the daily life of missionaries in the Highlands and Islands. Bishop MacPherson's files (1969-90) related mainly to legal and financial business, and to modern diocesan administration through such bodies as the College of Consultors and the Council of Priests. The Archdiocese of St Andrews and Edinburgh and the Dioceses of Dunkeld and Galloway also added more modern files to their previous deposits. Those of the Archdiocese demonstrated the change over from one Auxiliary Bishop to a number of Episcopal Vicars responsible for specific areas of administration (Communications, Education, Justice and Peace etc.). The Diocese of Motherwell, which was not created until 1947, unexpectedly deposited early nineteenth-century papers on the Scots foundations in Napoleonic France.

PARISH DEPOSITS

Six years' experience has shown that parish archives run a high risk of being lost or destroyed. In 1995 the parish priest of Galashiels handed in a large suitcase full of parish archives dating from 1852 to 1950. He had discovered the material at the back of a cupboard, where dampness had eaten into the base of the suitcase. The papers inside were, in the main, unaffected. Another few years in that cupboard would probably have seen them damaged beyond recovery. St Patrick's parish, Edinburgh, was served by secular priests until 1988, when the retiring parish priest was replaced by a Franciscan community. The incoming Guardian deposited several deed boxes which he had discovered in an attic. These contained not only further old parish records, but also the correspondence of a former Vicar General of the Archdiocese.

The last secular priest at St Patrick's retired to a bungalow and then to Nazareth House, where he later died. On checking the contents of his bungalow for any books or papers of possible interest before it was cleared and sold, I discovered a quantity of parish papers. They proved mainly to be from St Patrick's, but with a sprinkling of material from the priest's previous parishes. Furthermore, I discovered a large volume of correspondence pertaining to the priest's long held appointment as Archdiocesan Treasurer. A few choice items from St Patrick's later came to light in Nazareth House.

LOSSES

The archives of Galashiels and St Patrick's, Edinburgh, escaped destruction. Others have been less fortunate. The picture built up by the accumulation of archives has areas of blank canvas. In some instances there is documentary evidence of actual destruction; in others such a fate can only be presumed. The following are some examples of missing archives:

Pre-1878

1. The archives of the Vicars Apostolic of the Highland District, 1732-1827.
2. The archives of the Highland District seminaries, 1732-1829.
3. The archives of Bishop John MacDonald, Vicar Apostolic of the Northern District, 1869-78.

Post-1878

1. The archives of the Bishops of Aberdeen, 1878-1950.
2. The archives of Bishop Francis Thomson of Motherwell, 1965-83.
3. The archives of Langbank Seminary, 1961-78 (seemingly damaged by mice and subsequently destroyed).
4. The early archives of Drygrange College, 1953-c.1967.
5. The archives of St Mungo's Academy (opened 1858), destroyed when the building caught fire in 1975.

ST BENEDICT'S ABBEY, FORT AUGUSTUS

Thankfully, no such loss occurred when the Benedictine Abbey at Fort Augustus closed in 1998 and the buildings reverted to Lord Lovat. The contents of the archive room were despatched to the Scottish Catholic Archives and have now been sorted and catalogued. A decision is awaited from the Archivist of the English Benedictine Congregation as to which, if any, should be transferred to the Congregation's own archive. The Fort Augustus archives are extensive and contain much of specifically Scottish interest. They cover the foundation of the monastery in 1878, its elevation to the status of an abbey and its subsequent development, and document the nationality and background of the monks who joined the community, as well as the rule under which they lived and worked. The archives shed light on the impact made on the adjacent village by Fort Augustus Abbey, whether in supplying shops and houses with electricity from its own generator, or putting on cinema shows open to the general public. The Abbey conducted its own boarding school for boys of secondary age, including a number whose parents were living and working abroad. In 1926 a dependent priory was established in Edinburgh, to which was attached a preparatory school. It moved to North Berwick in 1945 and closed in 1977. Thanks to a generous benefactor, Fort Augustus also founded a small priory at Buckie in Banffshire. The benefactor had hoped that this foundation would ultimately develop into an abbey, but this was never practicable. Fort Augustus did, however, establish two daughter houses in the United States: Portsmouth Priory, Rhode Island, which conducted a large and successful school for boys; and St Anselm's Priory, Washington DC, which was affiliated to the Catholic University of America. Both American houses became independent of Fort Augustus in 1949 and are now fully constituted abbeys of the English Benedictine Congregation. All of the daughter houses of Fort Augustus, with their schools etc., are documented in the abbey's archives. So too are the lives and personal interests of individual monks, a surprisingly large number of whom served as military chaplains in the two World Wars. Abbot Oswald Hunter-Blair spent three periods working in a Benedictine house in Brazil, while Dom Cyril Dieckhoff, a Russian by birth, researched and published a pronouncing Gaelic dictionary. Dom Andrew MacDonell was a key figure in the Scottish Immigrant Aid Society, promoting settlement in Canada.

THE FUTURE

Although the Scottish Catholic Archives should continue to receive additions to existing deposits, it seems unlikely that it will receive another major historical collection on the scale of the Fort Augustus deposit. But there is always the possibility that a treasure trove of missing archives may one day be discovered in some forgotten trunk to fill in another section of the picture.

THE NORTHAMPTON DIOCESAN ARCHIVES

Margaret Osborne

EARLY YEARS

In 1983 when I was asked to look up some information in Bishop's House, my experience as an archivist was similar to that described by Sister Dominic Savio Hamer CP in her article 'The Whole Story ?' (Catholic Archives 16, p.30). I too was led '...down the cellar steps... ushered through a creaky door into a room resplendent with cobwebs, dusty cardboard boxes, and rusty iron cases.' I too was invited to help myself. As I had time on my hands, I returned the following week and asked if I could help sort, list and clean the papers, even though I had limited knowledge of the work.

The first task was to preserve and list the papers which had been deposited in the cellar over the past one hundred years. At first glance there seemed to be no logic as to what had been kept; for example, there were cardboard boxes of empty cheque stubbs from the 1880s and yet no pastoral letters (these were later found stored in a cupboard upstairs). Over the years further collections of papers have come to light, from hidden cupboards, the library, old filing cabinets and unused cellar rooms – the recent opening of one such room led to the discovery of some Victorian photographs.

Basic guidelines on the sorting and catalogue systems were acquired from the Catholic Archives Society meetings in 1984 and 1985. The County Archivist from the Northamptonshire Record Office paid two visits to Bishop's House and not only gave advice on the conditions for storage of the papers but also provided acid-free boxes, as well as giving tips on how to set out the catalogue books to ensure easy cross-referencing.

CHANGES IN THE ARCHIVE ROOMS

Following the advice received from the County Archivist, the cellar rooms have been checked for temperature and humidity and have been passed as satisfactory, although not perfect as a storage place for archives. Strip lighting has been installed and the rooms cleaned and painted. The slate shelves, though not ideal, are adequate for placing boxes, and the iron fire-proof door with extinguishers placed outside acts as a protection. The papers are being cleaned where necessary and copies have been made of some which are in poor condition (especially fading photocopies). The papers are stored flat in boxes and newspaper cuttings and photographs are usually wrapped in stout manila paper. Paper clips and staples have been removed.

Each box has been given a number and the papers recorded in a catalogue book set out thus:

Box no.	Page no.	Subject	Place	Person	Notes
---------	----------	---------	-------	--------	-------

From these books place, person and subject indices have been compiled for all the pre-1940 papers. The catalogue system is open-ended and material is being accessioned and added to it continually.

ORGANIZATION OF RECORDS

Some collections of papers were found covering the years of some or all of the Vicars Apostolic of the Eastern District and Bishops of Northampton since 1840. It was decided to keep these collections intact and to list them in the order in which they were found:

A Finance Papers: includes bills, correspondence, minute books. 26 boxes.

B Parish Returns: pastoral statistics etc. 6 boxes.

C Convent and Education Papers: statistics, Schools Commission etc.

D Printed Diocesan Papers: Encyclicals, Synods, Pastorals, Ad Clerum, Chapter etc.

E Clergy Records and Papers.

G First and Second Vatican Councils.

H Diocesan Children's Home. 4 boxes.

Parish Records 1 - 121: miscellaneous collections referring to parochial business. The files for parishes in the Diocese of East Anglia were transferred to Norwich in 1991.

Parish Registers: for a few parishes pre-1900.

The remaining letters have been sorted chronologically and divided into nine broad sections for convenience:

F.i Pre-1850: Provost Husenbeth Papers, Father Ignatius Spencer, Notes on early missions, registers etc. 6 boxes.

F.ii 1850-1858: Bishop Wareing's Papers, a notebook, 'History of Early Missions' 1 box.

F.iii 1858-1879: Bishop Amherst's Papers and Biography. 2 boxes.

F.iv 1880-1907: Bishop Riddell's Papers, including the Pastoral Letters of all the Bishops of England and Wales, Roman Encyclicals, Northampton Diocesan Record, Education papers. 19 boxes.

F.v 1908-1921: Bishop Keating. 6 boxes.

F.vi 1921-1932: Bishop Cary-Elwes. 2 boxes.

F.vii 1933-1939: Bishop Youens. 1/2 box.

Diocesan Magazines: there is an indexed and cross-referenced collection of these (place and person, but not subject). They date from 1865 to 1975, with only a few gaps between editions.

Photographs: these have been sorted into place, persons, groups and events, as well as boxes of unlabelled mysteries. An attempt has been made to match these with named prints in magazines etc. They have been boxed and numbered but are not preserved adequately.

The papers covering the period from 1940 to 1967 have been boxed correctly and catalogued, but not cross-referenced. Those post-1967 have simply been listed.

WORK IN PROGRESS

Father Gerard Collins's extensive collection of papers and books on the history of the Midland District and the Diocese of Northampton (including the present Diocese of East Anglia) is in the process of being catalogued, boxed and cross-referenced. So far the following work has been completed:

A.1-2 Clergy Records: including many obituaries

A.3-4a Father Collins's MSS on Bishop Wareing and the Eastern District and Diocese of Northampton, 1840-1858.

b Chronological collection of papers (from newspapers, archives and books) on diocesan progress, 1840-1858.

A.5a Father Collins's MSS on Bishop Amherst and the diocese, 1858-1879. 2 boxes.

b Chronological collection on diocesan progress, 1858-1879.

A.6a Biographical details of Bishop Riddell. 2 boxes.

b Chronological collection of papers, 1880-1907.

A.7-8a Biographical details of Bishops Keating and Cary-Elwes.

b Chronological collection of papers, 1908-1932.

A.9-10a Biographical details of later Bishops of Northampton

b Chronological collection of papers, 1933-1940.

B.1 MSS and collected papers and time lines re-town of Northampton.

B.2 MSS re-Northamptonshire missions (& Banbury).

B.3 Chronological papers and time lines re-Northamptonshire missions (& Banbury).

B.4a MSS re-Buckinghamshire missions.

b Chronological collection of papers on Buckinghamshire missions (& Tring).

c Datelines re-Buckinghamshire missions.

d Buckinghamshire martyrs and recusants.

B.5a MSS re-Sheffield and Biggleswade.

b Chronological collection of papers on Bedfordshire missions (& St Albans).

c Datelines of Bedfordshire missions.

The boxes still to be tackled include those of Norwich, Norfolk, Suffolk, Huntingdonshire and Cambridgeshire, material on the Midland District, other counties, martyrs, religious orders and general papers.

Access: As a private archive access is restricted and all information is available at the discretion of the Bishop's Chaplain. In general pre-1940 papers may be consulted and likewise post-1940 published papers. There is no reading room and any visits have to be arranged directly with the Bishop's Chaplain. There has been an increase in the number of enquiries both from within the diocese and from private researchers, and as a result a fee has had to be charged for non-diocesan work.

EDITORIAL NOTE

The diocesan archivist, Mrs Margaret Osborne, is in attendance at the archives on Monday, Wednesday and Thursday, and may be contacted at: Bishop's House, Marriott Street, Northampton NN2 6AW.

THE ARCHIVES OF THE CANONESSES OF SAINT AUGUSTINE, BOARBANK HALL, GRANGE-OVER-SANDS

Sister Mary P. Darbyshire CSA

INTRODUCTION

The communities of the Augustinian Canonesses of the Mercy of Jesus, although united in a Federation, remain autonomous. The archives of each house thus have a distinctively 'family' character, and, according to the date of foundation, are comparatively modest. At least for a community such as that of the Convent of Our Lady of Lourdes at Boarbank Hall, Grange-over-Sands, founded in 1921, that is the case.

However, great importance has always been attached to the preservation of the archives. In the Constitutions approved in 1666 it was stipulated: 'In each house there will be a place set apart for the keeping of the archives. The Superior will have one key of it and the Bursar another. In this place there will be a safe where the important papers of the Monastery will be kept. It will be locked by three keys, one of which shall be kept by the Superior, and the two others by the Mother Assistant and the Bursar respectively.' At Boarbank it was the foundress herself, Mother Saint André, who for many years took charge of all that concerned the archives. More recently it was the late Sister Aloysius Byrne who, after attending the conference of the Catholic Archives Society at Ushaw in 1995, began the task of classifying the rich and varied material which had accumulated. Unfortunately, Sister Aloysius died in 1998, and at present I find myself, a veritable novice in the craft, trying to carry on her work. If I talk about classification, storage, preservation etc., it is more in the hope that one day this will be achieved, in a way not unworthy of the material in hand. Last year's session for beginners conducted at the Bar Convent, York, by Sister Gregory Kirkus has given stimulus and encouragement for the task. However, before describing the contents and the classification I hope to follow, a little historical background is necessary.

THE AUGUSTINIAN CANONESSES

The Augustinian Canonesses of the Mercy of Jesus belong to a branch of the ancient Augustinian Order which more than seven hundred years ago began serving the needy and distressed in the expanding French fishing port of Dieppe. In the Hôtel-Dieu, working alongside the Hermits of St Augustine and following the same Rule, they cared for the victims of scurvy, plague, leprosy and fevers of all sorts which were prevalent in the overcrowded town. The Canonesses were also well known in Dieppe itself, visiting and caring for the destitute in their miserable hovels, even those who had lodged in the troglodyte dwellings hollowed from the cliff face. Incidentally, it was within these same cliffs that sisters from the Dieppe community worked in the underground hospital ('La Biomarine') during the Second World War, where thousands of French and Allied soldiers were treated in maximum security.

Following the tradition of the deaconesses of the early centuries, the Canonesses were dedicated to the faithful maintenance of the prayer of the Church, as well as all the activities of Christian charity. They took a vow to serve the poor and lived in community, summing up their ideal in the simple phrase: 'The same Saviour who is adored, hidden under the species of Bread, is served and honoured hidden in the Person of the Poor.' In the fifteenth century the sisters were given complete charge of the Hôtel-Dieu and drew up Constitutions based on the Rule of St Augustine. It was in the seventeenth century that, following the Council of Trent, they began a new era, with fresh Constitutions drawn up in 1631. Many ardent young women, eager to serve others, joined them. Thereafter they were called upon to undertake the care of hospitals in other towns: a foundation was made at Vannes in 1635, while in 1639 three sisters set sail for the new French colony of Quebec. It is interesting to note that these three sisters took with them a heavy wooden chest with a triple lock to house their archives. The chest may still be seen in the museum of the Hôtel-Dieu de Quebec.

One of the first foundations made by the reinvigorated community at Dieppe was at Quimper in Brittany, where a small group of sisters were sent to take charge of the hospital in 1644. This soon became an autonomous house. Ten years later the community at Quimper answered a call for help and established a house attached to the hospital at Tréguier, while in 1664 Tréguier itself founded a community at Guincamp. Meanwhile, other foundations were being made in Normandy and Brittany, each becoming an autonomous monastery but following the Rule of St Augustine and the Dieppe Constitutions (approved by Rome in 1666) with exact fidelity. Although the communities were now enclosed, the links between them were exceptionally close and were maintained by frequent correspondence and practical assistance. During the French Revolution many sisters were imprisoned and one, Sister Marie Monique of the community at Château-Gontier in Mayenne, was guillotined. She was beatified in 1955.

FOUNDATIONS IN ENGLAND

At the end of the nineteenth century, threatened with expulsion from their hospital by the anti-clerical laws of the time, the community at Guincamp began to seek a possible refuge abroad. Thus came to be rounded, in 1902, the community of Our Lady of Hope at Waterloo, Liverpool. The threat of expulsion, however, was never to be put into effect, and the Guincamp community exists to this day. Meanwhile, the seed sown in Liverpool took root, and the small group of pioneers was established as an independent community, serenely carrying on the traditions of their forebears in an English context. They built a hospital where, during the First World War, the military were nursed. Several sisters were decorated for their devoted services. After the war the hospital was closed, but it was later re-opened under the name of Waterloo District General Hospital. The community was subsequently to develop greatly, both numerically and in the field of nursing. Two further foundations would be made in England (Grange-over-Sands and Ince Blundell Hall) as well as a flourishing mission in Nigeria.

It was in 1920 that Archbishop Whiteside of Liverpool was approached by a Mr Wilfrid Rigby from Warrington, Secretary of the Catholic Friendly Society, with a request for a convalescent home for Catholic workers to be opened in the north of England. The Archbishop put the request to Mother Saint André, the foundress who had brought the sisters from Guincamp and who was at that time Superior of the community at Waterloo. The property in Liverpool was too confined to provide the invigorating air and atmosphere required for convalescence, and so the community expressed its willingness to undertake the work provided that a suitable place could be found. Mr Rigby and his associates began their search and Boarbank Hall, Grange-over-Sands, was discovered.

The Convent of Our Lady of Lourdes, Boarbank Hall, was founded on the initiative of the Catholic Friendly Society. Established in 1823, the Society originally had the title of 'The Warrington Catholic Philanthropic Society' At that time the persecution and conviction of Catholics for non-attendance at Anglican services had ceased forty years earlier, but many disabilities still remained. No marriage was recognised as legal unless it took place in the Established Church. No Catholic could keep or teach in any school, nor practise his religion outside a licensed building. Six years before the Catholic Emancipation Act of 1829, the Catholics of Warrington decided to establish a Friendly Society with three objectives: spiritual welfare; education; and the alleviation of material need. The Society was founded on 7 August 1823, in the reign of George IV and thirteen days before the death of Pope Pius VII. Bishop Milner, Vicar Apostolic of the Midland District, was still alive, and Bishop Thomas Smith was Vicar Apostolic of the Northern District. Fifty-nine names were inscribed on the first list of members, together with their chief occupations, which included those of priest, clerk, lawyer, scrivener, farmer, pickermaker, chairmaker, farm servant, colourer, shoemaker, hawker, ostler, blacksmith, cotton spinner, engineer, basketmaker, file-cutter and fustian-cutter. The first Secretary and Treasurer was apparently the Rev Dr Molyneux. The ideal of the Society was 'All according to their ability, to each according to his needs.' There was to be an annual Mass, sermon and feast. Help was to be provided for members in sickness and in times of bereavement and also for Catholic schools. This continued until 1911, when the National Insurance Bill was introduced. Under the inspiration of Mr Wilfrid Rigby, the General Secretary at the time of the foundation of the convalescent home at Boarbank Hall, great work was also done for the founding of the State Section of the Society.

The property discovered and thought eminently suitable by Mr Rigby and his fellow helpers was ideally situated, commanding uninterrupted views over Morecambe Bay, on land which had once belonged to Cartmel Priory, founded by the Augustinian Canons in the twelfth century. It was an encouraging augury. By another happy omen, Boarbank Hall, which was to become the home of the Augustinian Canonesses, had had as one of its first owners a Miss Mary Lambert, a wealthy Anglican lady who was noted for her generosity to the poor and who had provided both the church and the school for the local village of Allithwaite. Boarbank had been prepared already for its role of hospitality and care.

It was on 21 September 1921 that, after Mass and the installation of the Blessed Sacrament, the community was blessed and the Augustinian Canonesses officially took up residence in the new foundation. Of the eight sisters who formed the new community, four were of the original group from Guincamp. On the feast of St Michael, 29 September, the convalescent home was officially opened and the first five patients received.

In spite of its poverty, acute at times, the community prospered. In 1928 a separate convent to accommodate the sisters was established through the generosity of the Catholic Friendly Society and numerous benefactors. This provided greater facilities for the spiritual training of the group of young sisters in the novitiate, while giving more comfort and space to the patients. In 1929 the then superior, Mother Mary of Mercy Couloigner, eager to respond to the ideals of the Church and the reiterated papal appeals for a dignified and meaningful liturgy, obtained the help of an English pupil of Dom Mocquereau of Solesmes in order to form the choir in the traditions of the Gregorian Chant. Miss Vilma Little, who had formerly been a professor at Oxford University and who had renounced her career to devote herself to teaching the Chant, until her death in 1968 spent many months each year training and conducting the choir. Thanks to her dedication and excellent tuition, even after the introduction of the present-day vernacular, the liturgical offices have always played a great part in the life and apostolate of the community.

During the eighty years since the foundation, the sisters have widened the scope of their hospitality and the original house has been extended to provide further accommodation both for patients and guests. A large chapel built in 1961 was in 1994 're-ordered' to meet the needs of the many sick clergy and patients in wheelchairs who participate in the Mass and Divine Office with the community.

In the history of the order there have also been important changes. Under the inspiration of the deeply spiritual and dynamic superior of the community at Maestroit, Mother Marie-Yvonne-Aimée de Jésus Beauvais, a project of federation between the monasteries was mooted before the Second World War, and was finally approved by Rome in 1946. Although still retaining their autonomy, the union between the different communities has intensified and, with the enclosure no longer existing, frequent meetings between the sisters are possible. A General Chapter every four years, an annual Assembly of Prioresses, shared formation sessions etc. are the order of the day. All this, in addition to the renewal following the Second Vatican Council, has significantly changed the face of the small community which arrived at Boarbank Hall nearly eighty years ago.

THE ARCHIVES

These different strands of historical development have led to the classification of the archives in the following manner:

A) The Foundation of the Convent of Our Lady of Lourdes

- 1) Annals
- 2) Correspondence between the Catholic Friendly Society and the community of the Convent of Our Lady of Hope, Waterloo, Liverpool.
- 3) Capitular proceedings.
- 4) Documents regarding the purchase of the property of Boarbank Hall.
- 5) Election of the Superior, Assistant and Council, and nomination of the sisters for the new foundation.
- 6) Financial agreements between the communities of Waterloo and Grange-over-Sands.
- 7) Annals, arrival of the sisters, opening ceremonies, documentation, photographs.

B) History of the Order

- 1) Documents, books etc. relating the history of the Canonesses of Saint Augustine of the Mercy of Jesus.
- 2) Ancient copies of Constitutions, Ceremonials, Regulations.
- 3) Documents relating to the Catholic Friendly Society.
- 4) Documents and books regarding the Canons of Saint Augustine and Cartmel Priory.
- 5) Deeds and documents relating to the property of Boarbank Hall and its former owners, especially Miss Mary Lambert.

C Development of the Community

- 1) Evolution of hospitality and nursing care; extension of the buildings.
- 2) Records of Sisters' entries, professions, deaths, obituaries.
- 3) Sisters' personal files.
- 4) Capitular and Council proceedings, elections, nomination of Sisters to help other communities.
- 5) Parish involvement, catechetics, instruction of converts.
- 6) Aggregation to the Order of Saint Augustine.
- 7) Ecumenical activities.
- 8) Records and copies of the Boarbank Beacon, a former publication circulated among ex-patients and friends.
- 9) Correspondence with Rome, decrees, permissions, dispensations.

- 10) Diocesan correspondence.
- 11) Correspondence with the UISG, Conference of Major Religious Superiors of England and Wales, other religious, friends and benefactors.
- 12) Liturgical documents; formation of the choir.

D) The Federation

- 1) History and development.
- 2) Documentation relating to Mere Yvonne-Aimée, the first Superior General.
- 3) Records of General Chapters, General Councils, Assemblies of Prioresses; correspondence with the Superior General.
- 4) Correspondence with sister communities: (a) Europe; (b) Canada; (c) Africa; (d) South America.
- 5) Documentation concerning the renewed Constitutions approved in 1983.

E) Miscellaneous

- 1) Copies of documents relating to the re-establishment of several communities in France after the Revolution.
- 2) Copy of Les Religieuses Augustines de l'Hôtel-Dieu de Reims (a community which joined our Congregation in 1934, but which traces its origins to the fifth century).
- 3) Photocopies of documents relating to houses of the Order in Paris closed after the Revolution.
- 4) Accounts of the beatification of Blessed Marie Monique l'Huillier of Château-Gontier, France, martyred during the Revolution and of Blessed Marie Catherine de Longprey, who is considered one of the co-foundresses of the Church in Quebec.
- 5) Photographs, press cuttings, recordings, videos of community events.
- 6) Relics.
- 7) Souvenirs of the various stages of the development of the community.

PRESERVATION AND STORAGE

Although the archives are preserved in a very small room, it is well fitted with Metabolt steel shelving, metal filing cabinet and wooden cupboards, where the above material is safely housed and in good order in IBS box files. Much work remains to be done in compiling an index; there is also the formidable task of translation. All the early documentation of the foundation, annals etc. are in French. Photographs, videos, recordings etc. remain to be sorted and classified. The archives thus provide a challenge and are of enormous interest, and of course they are constantly growing. Space is always a problem. In the meantime various publications and periodicals have to be stored in the library. However, books of historic interest regarding the Order, the different communities and the Federation, as well as those relating to the locality, are kept in the archive cupboards (Sister Imelda Gorman).

CONCLUSION

The archives at Boarbank are indeed small, – ‘family size’ – but they have been lovingly preserved by our predecessors. In due course it is hoped that they will measure up to present day conditions for storage. In witnessing to the fashion in which, through vastly differing times and climates, our charism of common life, personal prayer, liturgy with the People of God, and hospitality in its various aspects have been lived through the last seven centuries, they stimulate new initiatives for the future. THE SISTERS OF BON SECOURS: THE HISTORY AND ARCHIVES OF THE UNITED STATES PROVINCE (INCLUDING BRITISH AND IRISH HOLDINGS)

Cindy Swanson

HISTORY

The Sisters of Bon Secours were founded in Paris in 1824, a little over a quarter of a century after the French Revolution. The sisters were not cloistered religious but were engaged in nursing the sick in their own homes, often staying with them for weeks at a time. 'Bon Secours' means 'good help', and the sisters' purpose was and is to bring compassionate care to the sick and dying.

The Sisters of Bon Secours were willing to serve wherever a need was present. In 1827 they were recognised by the civil government of France, and in 1830 they expanded beyond Paris to other French cities. By 1861 a Bon Secours ministry had been established in Dublin. In 1870 the congregation founded a house in London (and expanded their mission to include Scotland in 1948). On their fiftieth anniversary in 1874 the Sisters of Bon Secours received papal approbation.

In 1881 three sisters arrived in Baltimore, Maryland, in the United States, at the invitation of Archbishop (later Cardinal) Gibbons, and immediately began to nurse the sick. The congregation opened its first novitiate in the United States in 1912, its first hospital in 1919, and a School of Nursing in Baltimore in 1921. Throughout the twentieth century the Sisters of Bon Secours expanded their apostolate through a variety of health agencies, hospices, and nursing homes. They expanded geographically to Michigan, New York, New Jersey, Maryland, Pennsylvania, Virginia, South Carolina and Florida. Today the growth of Bon Secours health facilities continues, and compassionate delivery of health care, especially to people in need, remains the priority.

In 1958 the Sisters of Bon Secours in the United States became a separate province. Today, with their headquarters in Paris, members of the congregation minister to the sick and suffering in France, Ireland, Great Britain, the United States and Peru. The sisters also have missions in Ecuador, Zaire and Rome.

THE UNITED STATES PROVINCIAL ARCHIVES

Description: The archives function as a repository for all materials relevant to the Sisters of Bon Secours in the United States. They contain material on the founding history, spirit and growth of the congregation in the United States. The bulk of the material dates from 1881 to the present day. Contents include founding documents, provincial administrative records and documents (vow registers, constitutions, prayer manuals, published and unpublished histories, provincial chapters and general assemblies, goals and objectives, annual reports, task forces, programmes, publications etc.), financial and property records, records of provincial houses and convents, formation, vocation, Associates, jubilees and anniversaries (sisters, provincial, Generalate), records of the Bon Secours Health System and missions and apostolates throughout the United States and Ecuador, and clipping files, as well as photographs, slides, audio cassettes, videos and artefacts (habits, memorabilia, awards etc.).

Some material is also collected about Bon Secours convents in other countries (Peru, France, Ireland, Great Britain). The archive has published histories, such as History of the Congregation of Bon Secours of Paris (includes information on the foundation of the provinces in Ireland and England) and Bon Secours Sisters in Ireland, a history of the Irish Province. Unpublished materials include various General Chapter and Enlarged General Council records, correspondence with the provinces in Ireland and England, Generalate annual reports and newsletters (including information on Bon Secours convents and facilities and sisters in Ireland and Great Britain), some Irish provincial planning documents, reports and newsletters, a memoir by an Irish sister, some English provincial reports, miscellaneous documents/ephemera from the Irish and English Provinces, and photographs of Irish and British sisters and/or meetings held in those countries. With the exception of published histories, most of the aforementioned material dates from the mid- to late-twentieth century, with the bulk of it being from the 1980s onwards.

EDITORIAL NOTE

The author, who is Archivist for the Sisters of Bon Secours in the United States, kindly sent the Editor a copy of a most informative 300-page history of the congregation in America. The Sisters of Bon Secours in the United States 1881-1981: A Century of Caring by Sister Mary Cecilia O'Sullivan CBS, is a scholarly record of the North American foundation.

THE WORK BEHIND THE SCENES

Sister Dominic Savio Hamer CP

On 27 October 1963, the feast of Christ the King in St Peter's Basilica in Rome and during the Second Vatican Council, Pope Paul VI beatified the Passionist, Dominic (Barberi) of the Mother of God. Whilst there are many wonderful archives in England, there are not many that house the documents pertaining to a beatus. The Passionist Archives of St Joseph's Province, however, have that rare privilege in holding records of both the life of Blessed Dominic and the Process for his Beatification. Moreover, these documents are currently held on the same site as his shrine, where his remains are venerated, in the Church of St Anne and Blessed Dominic in Sutton, St Helens, Lancashire. These Barberi Papers consist of originals or copies of Blessed Dominic's letters and of letters sent to him, such as by J.H. Newman, J.D. Dalgairns and others from Oxford, by Ambrose Philipps and by the Passionist Superior General, most of which, indeed, have already been published; originals or copies of some of his spiritual writings; writings about him, such as in articles and newspapers; copies of sermons about him; relevant pictures and photographs; and the massive documentation of the different stages in the Process culminating in the Decree of Beatification in 1963. It is this documentation that records the work behind the scenes in the Beatification Process and that, coupled with the more narrative Platea, or House Records, of St Anne's Retreat, affords a rich, comprehensive picture of all that comprised a beatification process before the changes made by the Second Vatican Council.

The Cause for the ultimate Canonisation of Father Dominic Barberi was introduced in 1889 with the initiation of the Informative Process in all the dioceses in which he had lived and worked. In a letter to Cardinal L.M. Parocchi, Vicar of Rome, on 2 October 1889 Cardinal John Henry Newman formally testified, 'Father Dominic of the Mother of God was a most striking missionary and preacher and he had a great part in my own conversion and in that of others. His very look had a holy aspect which most singularly affected me as soon as I saw him and his remarkable good humour in the midst of his sanctity was in itself a really holy preaching. No wonder, then, that I became his convert and penitent. He was a great lover of England. His sudden death filled me with grief. I hoped, and still hope, that Rome will crown him with the aureole of the saints.' That Informative Process ended in 1893. Five years later, in 1898, Father Pius Devine CP published his Life of the Very Reverend Father Dominic of the Mother of God (Barberi), Passionist, which he had had in manuscript form since 1883 and which was based both on oral history, not always accurate, and on letters in the archives.

The Process Non-Cultu, held in 1911, satisfied Rome that no public acts of veneration or anything savouring of superstition concerning Father Dominic had ever taken place and so on 14 June of the same year Pope St Pius X declared him 'Venerable'. What was called the Processus Inchoativus was then opened. The Barberi Papers record the setting up of the Birmingham Process in 1912 and contain eleven letters, written in 1912-13, from the Passionist Father General in Rome to Father Urban Young CP, the Vice-Postulator of the Cause in England. The outbreak of the First World War in 1914 inevitably affected these proceedings but after 1918 they were continued in various diocesan courts in Italy, Belgium and England. The Barberi Papers contain twelve letters which Father Urban received from the Superior General in 1921, another twelve in 1922, twenty-two in 1923 and thirty-four he received between 1924 and 1926. In the meantime, as recorded in the Platea of St Anne's Retreat, in 1922 Frederick William Keating, the new Archbishop of Liverpool attended a Catholic meeting in St Helens. In the course of his address he said, 'There is still another link which has always been of the deepest interest to me personally, and I am sure to all English Catholics at large, the parish of Sutton. It contains two men's bones who may yet be canonised saints in the near future, two men who sounded the trumpet which announced the birth of a new and better day for Catholics; who were the apostles and the first labourers in the glorious work of the reconversion of England to the Catholic Faith. I am sure I need not mention their names to this audience, Father Dominic and Father Ignatius Spencer. Both these names were household names to me when I was only a child, for I had the happiness of living where they lived and constantly meeting people who had heard and knew their voices and had witnessed their splendid lives. And now to think that so near their bones are resting in honour and that I may before long have the joy of kneeling at their tombs and asking their prayers and blessing upon the great work that has been entrusted to me. Many here present may live to see the name of Father Dominic and I hope also the name of Father Ignatius Spencer upon the roll of the Church's saints. Oh! That that privilege might also be mine! Then I should willingly say my Nunc Dimittis, but I see in the near future those shrines frequented by multitudes of pilgrims from the whole English-speaking Catholic world as the first saints to be canonised, of our blood, apart from the Martyrs, since England was lost to the Faith.' The spark lit by Archbishop Keating quickly caught fire. From 19-27 August 1923 a novena of Masses was made in St Anne's, Sutton for the Cause of Venerable Father Dominic and the Conversion of England. A notification of this novena was made in the Catholic Press and requests made for petitions to be placed at Father Dominic's tomb. The response was remarkable. Intentions, still preserved in the Barberi Papers, poured in from all over England, Ireland, Holland, Belgium, France, Italy and America. In October 1923 a group of fifty people from the Sacred Heart Parish in Darwen made a pilgrimage to Venerable Dominic's tomb. On 24 February 1924 another group of forty from the Catholic Evidence Guild in Liverpool also came on pilgrimage. On 6 April a pilgrimage of five hundred Knights of St Columba came from many parts of West Lancashire. Father Cyril Barker CP preached a sermon, which was followed by a Blessed Sacrament Procession round the grounds. On Ascension Thursday, 29 May another group of fifty came from Thatto Heath. In the same year, 1924, other pilgrimages came from the Sacred Heart, Darwen; from Blackburn; from St Ethelbert's, Bolton; and from SS Peter and Paul's, Bolton, as well as priests and students from Oscott, Upholland and Ushaw. The present practice of setting aside a special pilgrimage day in honour of Venerable Dominic was started on 23 August 1925. The Archbishop gave permission for a Procession of the Blessed Sacrament and teas were provided for 580 people. In fact 2,500 people came, including a band and 325 from St Alphonsus's parish, Liverpool; 80 from St Ethelbert's, Bolton; 60 from St Gregory's, Farnworth; 110 Knights of St Columba; and 60 from St Mary's, Widnes. Eighteen large charabancs came to Sutton that day and St Edward's Orphanage Band played the music. On 27 September 1925 220 pilgrims came from St Mary's, Mulberry Street, Manchester; and on 8 November the children came from the convent at Blackbrook. On 29 August 1926 as many as 2,000 pilgrims came from Liverpool, Farnworth, Bolton, Warrington and St Helens. It was against this background that when the English court closed in 1926, Father Urban Young published his book, Life and Letters of the Venerable Father Dominic (Barberi) CP, Founder of the Passionists in Belgium and England, in which he presented valuable material from the Processes as well as printed copies of a large number of additional letters, preserved in the Barberi Papers and in the Archives of Colwich

Benedictine Abbey. During the next few years a number of further letters came to light, with the result that in 1935 Father Urban Young published Dominic Barberi in England, A New Series Of Letters. Since these letters, however, were mainly from Father Dominic to the Passionist Superior General, the originals are mainly in the Passionist General Archives or the Postulation Archives in Rome.

Some of the more fascinating documents in the Barberi Papers are those that record the various examinations of the remains of Father Dominic, one of which was held in November 1936 in the presence of Archbishop Richard Downey of Liverpool. A newspaper cutting from The Universe for 2 September 1938 records the first public pilgrimage to the place of Father Dominic's death, the Duke of Edinburgh Hotel in Reading, known in 1849 as the 'Railway Tavern'. Given the powerful impetus in demonstrations of devotion to Father Dominic at this time, his Cause might have proceeded rapidly but for the outbreak of the Second World War in 1939. In the years that followed, however, a great deal of work was going on behind the scenes, especially in Rome in examining two miracles attributed to his intercession. As a result, after a long period of little to report in these English archives, in 1962 there was suddenly an explosion of documentation that culminated in the Beatification in 1963. What emerges from these English archives in this period is the nitty-gritty of planning what would have to happen in England, and in Sutton in particular where Venerable Dominic's remains then lay in the crypt, if he were beatified; and how it was all going to be organised.

On 21 March 1962, according to a copy held in the Barberi Papers, the Passionist Father Provincial wrote a letter to Cardinal William Godfrey of Westminster, informing him that on 27 February 1962 the Medical Commission of the Sacred Congregation had approved the two miracles. This letter was followed by another, on 27 April 1962, enclosing a copy of a Memorandum, issued on 10 April 1962 by the Passionist Postulator General, detailing the history of the Cause from 1936. The next stage was to present this evidence to the Sacred Congregation of Rites. Thus in Rome the Process continued according to the time-honoured procedures of the Holy See. On 23 November 1962 the Passionist Superior General sent out a circular letter telling the Passionist Congregation that on 18 December 1962 an important meeting would take place at the Vatican regarding the possible Beatification of Venerable Father Dominic, and stipulating prayers for its success. Thereafter there was silence. The Barberi Papers contain copies of the letters that went to and fro between the Father Provincial of St Joseph's Province and his 'men' in Rome, all intensely exciting for the correspondents but unknown to anyone else. By the end of March 1963 this 'secret' correspondence had become extremely practical: there was a good Italian firm that made medals; a beatus would require a better chapel than the crypt; and a new life would have to be written.

Once again the Records of St Anne's Retreat flesh out the brevity and formality of the letters. On 30 January 1963 the Passionist Provincial in England had appointed a committee to discuss and arrange all sorts of details in the event of Venerable Dominic's being beatified in 1963-4. The Rector in Sutton went to Dublin to see Mr Gerard Earley at the Ecclesiastical Studios. He came, examined and measured the chapel of St Paul of the Cross and designed a new shrine of marble and mosaic. In April the parishioners were invited to make a novena to St Paul of the Cross as usual and a novena of prayer for the Beatification of Venerable Dominic. The death of Pope John XXIII on 3 June 1963 sent a ripple through the proceedings. Would that cause a delay? It was with relief that, on 19 July 1963, the Passionists heard unofficially that on 24 September Pope Paul VI would probably preside over the General Congregation finally responsible for beatifications and that Venerable Dominic would probably be beatified on 27 October. 'It seems incredible', wrote the annalist, 'that the prayers of scores of years and thousands of pilgrims are being heard this very year.' One of the problems, however, was that the people could not be told of these possibilities, or even probabilities, and yet it was essential to start booking accommodation in Rome for those who would wish to go to the Beatification. The committee, therefore, decided to organise a Passionist pilgrimage to Rome for 27 October, without mentioning the possible Beatification. That was one problem solved but what about the possible recognitio and the preparation of a new shrine? How could a new shrine be prepared without the people's cognisance? As it happened, St Anne's church was suffering acute damage from mining subsidence. The alabaster altar in the Chapel of St Paul of the Cross was already broken in several places and so, under the apparent pretext of necessary repairs, this chapel was prepared to become the shrine of the new beatus. Early in August 1963 word came from Rome that the Archbishop of Liverpool could proceed with the exhumation and recognitio and also that the General Congregation would definitely meet on 24 September.

Throughout August and September, as recorded in the Barberi Papers, the committee discussed publicity, a new full life, a pamphlet life, articles in newspapers and periodicals, the pilgrimage to Rome, tickets in St Peter's for pilgrims, local celebrations, TV and radio coverage, medals, pictures, statues, a national celebration with the Hierarchy and, by no means least, finance. The Father Provincial and the Rector of Sutton went to see Archbishop John Carmel Heenan of Liverpool about the exhumation and recognitio. He willingly accepted the task but left the arrangements to the Passionists. Their most formidable problem was how to obtain permission from the Home Office to exhume Father Dominic's remains; to rebury them in a new sarcophagus and shrine; and to extract a number of bones to be taken to Rome as relics. As recorded in the Platea, however, with the willing, joyful and invaluable help of Monsignor Derek Worlock, then Secretary in Westminster, this task was eventually happily and successfully fulfilled. Moreover, as Cardinal Godfrey had died in January 1963, in September Archbishop Heenan was translated to Westminster and Monsignor J.O. Bennett, who was appointed Vicar Capitular for the Archdiocese of Liverpool, then took over all the business concerning the recognitio, even engaging the eminent surgeons who were to assist at it. In the meantime, the committee had been busy, secretly 'shopping' for the many items required: scissors, ribbons, basins, towels, parchment, pens etc., as well as a coffin, a new Habit with Sign, Beads and Girdle, the new sarcophagus and the chapel. Since the whole process had still to remain strictly secret, the area around the chapel and tomb was partitioned off. During September and October Earley's men from Dublin were working almost round the clock to have the chapel ready, not an easy task when no wall was perpendicular and no floor level.

On Sunday, 22 September 1963 there was Exposition of the Blessed Sacrament from 4 p.m. to pray for a favourable outcome of the General Congregation's meeting in Rome on the 24th, the feast of Our Lady of Ransom, or Our Lady of England. 'During the days that followed', wrote the annalist, '25, 26 and 27 September, priests and people waited breathlessly, anxiously, hopefully - for the NEWS.' At last at 2.30 p.m. on 28 September 1963 it came. The Holy Father had ratified the findings of the Sacred Congregation of Religious; the miracles of Venerable Dominic were approved; and he would be beatified on the feast of Christ the King, 27 October. It was then possible to reveal openly that the pilgrimage to Rome was a pilgrimage to the

THE BEATIFICATION OF FATHER DOMINIC BARBERI CP, 27 OCTOBER 1963

Beatification and, at last, with only a month to go, the Beatification Committee launched into full publicity.

The recognitio, of course, had still to be carried out in the strictest secrecy and this was done from 9 a.m. on Monday, 14 October 1963. Otherwise, sixty men and thirty women from the parish formed a committee to organise the celebrations that would take place in Sutton itself. Posters were printed and distributed, leaflets given out and notices put in the newspapers. Contacts were made with radio and television; a press conference was held; and a giant marquee was hired to shelter the pilgrims. In St Anne's church itself, the whole sanctuary was draped in gold satin, whilst drapes in the Papal Colours stretched above the arches and down the nave. Across the entrance of what was to be known as the Chapel of Blessed Dominic a curtain was drawn which would be opened at the Solemn Blessing of the shrine. On Friday 25 October about twenty parishioners left for London to meet all the other pilgrims from Passionist parishes en route for Rome.

Finally, in addition to the numerous Positiones detailing the Cause for the Beatification, the Archives of St Joseph's Province hold a copy of the Solemn Decree pronounced by Pope Paul VI in the splendour of St Peter's, Rome on that feast of Christ the King, Sunday, 27 October 1963 and containing those momentous words: 'We grant by virtue of these letters and Our apostolic authority, that the Venerable Servant of God, Dominic of the Mother of Cod, priest, may henceforth be styled Blessed.'

Now these same Archives await the documentation of his Canonisation and, if God so wills, of his being declared a Doctor of the Church.

THE ARCHIVES OF CATHOLIC LAY SOCIETIES: I ST JOAN'S INTERNATIONAL ALLIANCE

Robin Gard

INTRODUCTION

A preliminary list of Catholic lay societies was published in Catholic Archives 10 (1990), following which a survey of the records of one hundred or so selected societies was undertaken by volunteers. As reported in Catholic Archives 14 (1994), this survey discovered much useful information concerning the whereabouts and nature of these records, and this is still held on file. To a modest extent, interest in the subject was sustained by the publication in Catholic Archives 16 (1996) of a report on the records of certain lay societies deposited in the Westminster Diocesan Archives. The Society is presently engaged, by whatever means it can mobilise, in a comprehensive survey of all Catholic archives, and a new initiative to identify the archives of lay societies is intended as part of this survey. In the meanwhile, in order to show the importance of these records in the life of the Church during the last two centuries, brief histories and summaries of the archives of a number of lay societies are offered. In this issue of Catholic Archives the records of St Joan's International Alliance are considered.

ST JOAN'S INTERNATIONAL ALLIANCE: A BRIEF HISTORY

In 1911 Gabrielle Jeffrey and a number of other women in London founded the Catholic Women's Suffrage Society 'to band together Catholics of both sexes to secure for women the Parliamentary vote on the same terms as it is or may be granted to men.' Hitherto the movement for women's suffrage had been secular, political, and at times militant, and the new society sought to present the Catholic viewpoint. In 1918 the Representation of the People Act enfranchised women aged over thirty who were occupiers or wives of occupiers of property. In response to this the C.W.S.S. resolved to campaign not merely for an equal franchise with men, but also for political, social and economic equality, and generally 'to further the work and usefulness of Catholic women as citizens.' The Society publicised its views through a monthly periodical entitled The Catholic Suffragist, which first appeared in 1915. After the 1918 Act the publication was renamed The Catholic Citizen, and had an English edition and one in French (L'Alliance).

In 1923 the C.W.S.S. expanded its activities to cover all aspects of women's rights and renamed itself 'St Joan's Social and Political Alliance', adopting St Joan of Arc as its patroness. The Alliance soon established international links with members in twenty-four countries, and is now a worldwide organisation called St Joan's International Alliance. Its broad objective is 'to enable interested Catholics to work for equal rights and opportunities for men and women in all fields.' As early as 1924 the Alliance became a founder member of the Liaison Committee of the International Organisations of Women, and later obtained consultative status on the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations. It is officially recognised by the International Labour Organisation, and is represented at UNESCO as a non-governmental organisation.

In the western world the Alliance has sought to secure and advance women's rights in education, working conditions and career opportunities, ownership of property, marital and divorce rights, indeed in all areas of actual or potential sexual discrimination. In Africa, Asia, and elsewhere it has campaigned vigorously for the provision of services for women's health and social needs, and against slavery, prostitution, ritual mutilation and the like, and participates fully with the United Nations and other international agencies where combined action is possible.

The Alliance, through its current periodicals, The Catholic Citizen, L'Alliance (France), L'Alleanza (Italy), and Terres des Femmes (Belgium), states its views forcibly, but while occasionally critical of the Church, it remains constitutionally loyal to the Pope and to the Church's apostolic authority. Although the membership of the Alliance is not restricted to women, it proffers mainly feminist views on many issues on the domestic front, and has in recent years presented, officially and privately, to bishops and to Rome, the claims of women in the ecclesiastical domain, including the question of the ordination of women.

As in most organisations, the work of the Alliance has been sustained and its policies developed to meet changing needs by the commitment of many individuals. In the United Kingdom Section these include Gabrielle Jeffrey, Nancy Stewart Parnell, Dr Fede Shattock, Phillis Challoner, Christine Spender, Vera Loughton Matthews, Florence Batty (who was awarded the honour 'Pro Ecclesia et Pontifice' for her work), Professor Ursula King, Sister Rita Hannon LSU, Sister Kira Solhdoost, and Helen Stewart (editor of The Catholic Citizen). But the Alliance is truly international. Its current President, C. Virginia Finn, and its Secretary, Bernice McNeela, are from the United States, and its Vice-President, Gisele Bwangi-Pirard, its Treasurer, Claude Cury, and its International Agent, Anne-Marie Pelzer (also editor of Terre des Femmes) are from Belgium. Among others who have held office or who have been prominent internationally are the following: Mme Leroy Boy (Belgium); Tira Govaart-Malkes (Holland); Catherine Capell, Maryvonne Stephan, Therese Royer (editor of L'Alliance), and Marie Lenoel (France); Dr Gertrud Heinzelmann (Switzerland); Ida Raming and Dr Josepha Theresia Munch (Germany); Carla Ricci (editor of L'Alleanza) and Francesca Marangelli (Italy); Mother Anna Dengel and Dr Agnes McLaren (India); Pat Fogarty (Australia); and Frances McGillicuddy, Dorothy Awes-Haaland and Frances Sawyer (U.S.A.).

THE ARCHIVES

The archives of the Alliance are deposited in The Fawcett Library, housed in the London Guildhall University Library, and are as complete, and certainly as extensive, as those of any Catholic lay society. They have been listed professionally and may be consulted freely under the Library's usual conditions, although copyright rules apply and permission needs to be obtained for publication of any research or extracts in articles in journals or otherwise. The following is a summary of the detailed list available in the Library.

- A. St Joan's Social and Political Alliance (Catholic Women's Suffrage Society, 1911-22; later Great Britain and Northern Ireland Section of St Joan's International Alliance): minutes, agendas, reports, accounts, membership lists, biographical notices, articles, booklets, newsletters, publicity material, and other papers of annual general meetings, committees etc., 1911-90.
- B. St Joan's International Alliance: minutes, reports, programmes, correspondence, accounts, papers etc. of meetings of the Council in Europe and America, and of executive and other committees, 1965-91.
- C. Correspondence Files: correspondence and files of Lydia Halsey (United Kingdom President, International Treasurer), 1969-81; Agnes Maguire (United Kingdom Treasurer, International Treasurer from 1980), 1971-83; Kathleen Gabb (United Kingdom President), 1972-82; Helen Stewart (International President from 1980), 1976-83; Sister Kira Solhdoost (United Kingdom President from 1982), 1976-87;

- Doreen Barker (United Kingdom Secretary), 1978-83; and Yvonne Sowerbutts, c.1948-77.
- D. Florence Batty (Secretary, United Kingdom Section, 1912-62; Secretary, International Alliance, 1931-62; died 1965): correspondence and papers, autograph volumes, commemorative booklet (1934), papers re-St Joan's Quincentenary (1930-31), awards etc., 1911-62; The Way of Florence Barry by Nancy Stewart Parnell (1973).
- E. Joan Morris (1901-88, writer and film producer): publications, articles, lectures, typescripts, research notes, correspondence, press cuttings, autobiographical notes, and other papers mostly on the role of women in the Church, including The Hidden History of Women, Pope John VIII: An English Woman, The Pentecost, Dual Cathedrals in the Middle Ages, The History of the Role of Women in Church Government, Women Doctors in the Church, Eucharistic Celebration by Women, The True Tradition of Women in the Church, Women in Male Disguises, the Siena Lectures, Damascene Pictures (leaflets), c.1965-88.
- F. Subject Files: on the ordination of women, women in the Church, the revision of the Code of Canon Law, liturgical language, Women's Action Day (1980), International Women's Day, sex equality etc., c.1960-90.
- G. Publications: Bulletin (of the Great Britain and Northern Ireland Section), 1984-90; correspondence, reports, texts, mailing lists etc., 1977-91; NB. Copies of The Catholic Suffragist and The Catholic Citizen are held in the Library.
- H. Other Sections: Belgium; France (including Revue de L'Alliance de Sainte Jeanne D'Arc, 1931-39, and L'Alliance, 1973-87); Canada, United States.
- J. United Nations: correspondence and papers re-participation in United Nations commissions, conferences etc., 1969-85, including the United Nations Association U.K., 1970-86; Conference of Non-Governmental Organisations, 1962, 1976-79; International Women's Year (1975); Commission of the Status of Women, 1980; reports and papers on other issues, 1979-82.
- K. Photographs: of groups, individuals, conferences etc., c.1905-1970s.
- L. Press Cuttings: volumes of newspaper cuttings, 1911-60.

- M. Other Organisations (Religious): publications, newsletters, reports, articles, notices of meetings etc., including Roman Catholic Feminists and the Dorcas Group, Newman Association, Catholic Renewal Movement, Catholic Information Services, World Union of Catholic Women's Organisations, Society for the Ministry of Women in the Church, Movement for the Ordination of Women, Christian Parity Movement, Ecumenical Feminist Trust etc.: mostly 1970s-1980s.
- N. Other Organisations (Secular): minutes, reports, newsletters, papers etc. re-Status of Women Committee, Women's National Commission, Fawcett Society, Josephine Butler Society and other organisations, including National Council of Women, Women's Rights Campaign, Women Against Rape, Commonwealth Countries League, English Collective of Prostitutes, Anti-Slavery Society: all mostly c.1970s-1980s.
- P. Periodicals/Printed Papers (Non-St Joan's Alliance): single issues of periodicals, including Catholic World, Catholic Worker, Diakonos, The Ecumenist, Das Thema, 1971-81; leaflets, including orders of service, works of Alice Stephen, leaflet of The Guild of the Pope's Peace (1915), c.1912-80; conference papers, including conferences at Wood Hall Centre, Wetherby Reports, conferences of secular priests (1970), 1967-70; International Catholic Organisations, 1977; National Pastoral Congress, 1980; Bishops' Conference reports etc., 1982-85.

Artefacts: Catholic Women's Suffrage Society badges; signed menu card, 1918; medals of Popes Leo XIII and Paul VI; medal with royal coat-of-arms and head of St Joan of Arc; another of St Joan of Arc on horseback, undated.

Reader's wishing to obtain further information about St Joan's International Alliance are encouraged to write to: Bernice McNeela, International Secretary, 557 McHenry Road, 407 Wheeling, Illinois 60090-9209, U.S.A., or to Ianthe Pratt, Co-Ordinator Great Britain Section, 36 Court Lane, London SE21 YDR. BOOK REVIEWS

The past year or so has witnessed the appearance of a host of studies which draw heavily upon material from Catholic archival holdings in Britain and Ireland or which touch upon aspects of the Catholic history of these islands. The following are among the publications which have come to our attention, each with a special interest to those concerned with the archival heritage of the Church.

A Tudor Journal: The Diary of a Priest in the Tower 1580-1585 by Brian A. Harrison (St Paul's, 2000, pp. 240: £29.99) is a carefully researched and well illustrated monograph which sheds new light on a journal (written in Latin) kept by a priest imprisoned in the Tower of London during the reign of Elizabeth I. The Latin text is given as well as an annotated translation, and its author is identified not as Edward Rishton, as previously supposed, but John Hart, a convert to Catholicism while studying at Oxford. Hart was ordained at Cambrai in 1578 and arrested at Dover in 1580 as he entered the English mission. He would have suffered martyrdom with Campion in 1581 but pleaded for his life. He later recanted, was sentenced again, but instead was exiled to the Continent and died in Poland in 1586. Brian Harrison, a former Yeoman Warder and Honorary Archivist, has made extensive use of archival material from the Tower, assisted by Sarah Barter-Bailey, historian and Keeper of the Royal Armouries Library. The book is a model of how to produce a critical edition of an original document.

An equally scholarly production is to be found in The Letters of Dr John Lingard to Mrs Thomas Lomax (1835-51) edited by John Trappes-Lomax (Catholic Record Society, 2000, pp.243). Volume 77 in the Record Series of the Catholic Record Society, this is a painstaking edition of ninety-nine previously unpublished letters written by the priest-historian John Lingard to Mary Frances Sanders (later Mrs Thomas Lomax), a convert to Catholicism in 1834. The letters have been in the possession of the Trappes-Lomax family ever since they were written. The editor makes judicious use of Lingard's works and other printed material in his copious notes, and among the archivists and historians acknowledged for their assistance are the following: Mr Leo Warren; Father David Lannon (Salford); Father Peter Phillips (Ushaw); Father F. J. Turner (Stonyhurst); Brother Jonathan Gell (Mount St Bernard Abbey); Mrs Rodger (Arundel Castle Archives); Mrs Jo Ann Haien (Diocese of Jackson, U.S.A.); and Father Payne and Mrs Margaret Osborne (Northampton). It is again gratifying for the Catholic Archives Society to see so many of its members involved in helping such an important volume to see the light of day.

The international reputation of Lingard as an historian forms the centrepiece of Edwin Jones' ground-breaking and controversial study of the concept of nationhood in The English Nation: The Great Myth (Sutton Publishing, 2000, pp.xx + 332: £12.99). A Welsh Catholic and a former pupil of the great Professor Butterfield at Cambridge, Jones argues that from the Reformation onwards English historiography has divorced the study of the country's past from its natural European (and Catholic) milieu in the interests of subscribing to a false view of England as a nation state. John Lingard emerges as the one historian who, until very recent times, was able to situate English history in its rightful context. Jones has made extensive use of manuscript sources in the Bodleian, Cambridge University and British Museum Libraries, and particularly the Lingard Papers at Ushaw College. For an analysis of Lingard to appear so prominently in such a general work can only be welcomed by Catholic historians and archivists.

Another historian of international repute – although of surprisingly slender published output – is the subject of Roland Hill's Lord Acton (Yale University Press, 2000, pp.xxiv + 548: £25.00). Acton, Regius Professor of History at Cambridge from 1895 until his death in 1902, was one of the leading lay Catholics of the Victorian era, indeed arguably the most prominent, but as a critical historian of the papacy and the protégé of Dollinger, Acton's relationship with the Church was anything but straightforward. Hill has produced a very full biography which situates Acton within the various contexts of his life: aristocratic English and European Catholicism; continental scholarship in the age of debate over Papal Infallibility; and the historical tradition of Cambridge University. During the First Vatican Council Acton remained in Rome in order to galvanize the opposition to Pius IX's eventual declaration of Infallibility. A diplomat, courtier and politician earlier in life, Acton did not become a professional historian until 1895, by which time he was 61; but he was always a great advocate of the use of archives in the writing of history and was himself one of the most prodigious collectors of books: by the time of his death more than 70,000 graced his private library at the Acton country seat at Aldenham, Shropshire. Acton read profusely and made detailed notes. His biographer has followed a similar path in that he has spent many years working in archival collections and reading a vast array of secondary literature.

Hill's bibliographical section, which gives detailed descriptions of the archival sources consulted, reveals the use made of several collections familiar to readers of this journal, including the following: the Archivio Segreto of the Vatican (correspondence and also much material on Dollinger); Brompton Oratory Archives (letters of Newman and Faber); Propaganda Fide Archives (correspondence of English bishops with the Vatican); Shrewsbury Diocesan Archives (the Acton seat at Aldenham was in Shropshire); Westminster Diocesan Archives (some Manning papers). The Cambridge University Library, which houses Acton's personal library, is now also the repository for his private papers, which hitherto were housed by the Woodruff family (the late Hon. Mia Woodruff, widow of Douglass Woodruff, Editor of The Tablet, was the grand-daughter of Lord Acton). Among the many archivists mentioned are Monsignor Charles Burns (Vatican), Canon John Marmion (Shrewsbury), Miss Elisabeth Poyser and her successor Father Ian Dickie (Westminster). This is a very well written book and is to be much recommended, especially to students of English historiography.

By contrast to Acton the published output of the polyglot liturgical scholar and ecclesiastical historian Father Adrian Fortescue (1874-1923) was immense: 14 books, 15 pamphlets and countless articles. The Wisdom of Adrian Fortescue compiled and edited by Michael Davies (Roman Catholic Books, 1999, pp. 421) is a collection of articles by Doctor Fortescue (as he was always known) on aspects of the liturgy, preceded by a biographical essay, bibliography and illustrations. Although Davies recognises that a full-scale study of this remarkable priest-scholar is still to appear, nevertheless this volume goes some way to fill the void. Davies has consulted a number of archival collections, including those of the Westminster Diocese (correspondence) and Downside Abbey (Fortescue Papers). The latter include Fortescue's diaries written in several languages in his own superb calligraphic script. In 1908 Adrian Fortescue became the first resident priest in England's first garden city at Letchworth, Hertfordshire, and he contributed a great deal to the cultural life of a town which was very much part of the Arts and Craft tradition.

Maria McClelland, a past contributor to this journal (Catholic Archives 16), has recently published The Sisters of Mercy, Popular Politics and the Growth of the Roman Catholic Community in Hull, 1855-1930 (The Edwin Mellen Press, 2000, pp. xvii + 347). A small group of Mercy nuns was sent from Dublin to Clifford, Yorkshire, in 1855 and two years later established a convent in Hull. It was from here that the 'Great Convent Case' of 1869 took place, legal proceedings which did much to reinforce the negative image of 'nunneries' in mid-Victorian England. Maria McClelland traces the development of the Hull Mercy nuns during the first seventy-five years of their existence, illustrating the way in which their struggle to establish a system of Catholic education in the city often took place against the backdrop of suspicion from the civil (and sometimes ecclesiastical) authorities. This study makes use of a rich array of archival material: that of the Sisters of Mercy at Hull and Baggot Street, Dublin; the diocesan archives at Leeds and Middlesbrough; the Hull Local History Archives and those of St Charles' Catholic Church, Hull; and the Catholic Education Council Archives. Mention is made too of help given by the archivists of the Holy Child and Visitation congregations, as well as the assistance of the Public Record Office, Kew. Moreover, it is a joy to find a bibliography which gives detailed archival information.

Education is very much the theme of a book using archival material of a different kind. The Buildings of St Edmund's College by David J. S. Kay (St Edmund's College, Ware, 2000, pp.128: £10) is a very well produced (and inexpensive) photographic record of the development of one of England's historic Catholic establishments – successor (with Ushaw) to the English College at Douay and for many years the seminary of the Archdiocese of Westminster as well as a school for lay pupils. Although the seminarians have long since departed, the flourishing independent school retains strong links with the traditions of the earlier phases of Edmundian history. This book, which draws upon dozens of photographs from the college archives and is accompanied by a brief history of St Edmund's by Duncan Gallie, the College Archivist, provides a pictorial overview which will be of interest to historians, students of architecture, and all those associated with the college. It serves as a model of what can be done to bring an important photographic collection into the public domain.

The Holy Year and Jubilee of 2000 has done much to stimulate the publication of diocesan histories. Shrewsbury: Millennium Essays for a Catholic Diocese (Downside Abbey Books, 2000, pp.viii + 264) is edited by Canon John Marmion, the Diocesan Archivist. It is a scholarly volume which encompasses aspects of the history and development of diocesan life against the background of the revival of Catholicism in Shropshire and Cheshire from the end of Penal Times. Contributors include a number of members of the Catholic Archives Society: Sister Mary Campion McCarren (women religious); Dom Aidan Bellenger (Acton Burnell, where the Benedictines of St Gregory's, Douai, settled en route to Downside); and Canon Marmion (historical introduction and education). Needless to say, the diocesan archives and the collections of religious houses and parishes in the Diocese of Shrewsbury have been very effectively utilised in the production of this volume.

There are several ways in which a diocesan history may be written. A different style has been adopted by Michael Morris and Leo Gooch, who have collaborated to produce Down Your Aisles: The Diocese of Hexham & Newcastle 1850-2000 (Northern Cross, 2000, pp.288). This lavishly illustrated record of the diocese (which covers Northumberland and Durham) falls into two parts: Dr Gooch's outline of the history of the Diocese of Hexham and Newcastle; and Michael Morris' collection of articles on the parishes published in the diocesan newspaper (Northern Cross) between 1983 and 1999. This is a book which will appeal to both historians and a more popular readership on account of its blend of diocesan and local information. Among the many archivists and librarians acknowledged is Robin Gard, the founding Editor of Catholic Archives and currently Diocesan Archivist of Hexham and Newcastle.

Another diocesan archivist who has been busy in the production of a diocesan history is Father Michael Clifton. A History of the Archdiocese of Southwark (St Austin Press, 2000, pp.95: £5) is a compact volume which seeks to give a general overview of the principal developments over 150 years of this important see. The book is divided into ten chapters which chronicle the episcopates of the eight Bishops and Archbishops of Southwark and cover topics such as education, seminaries, diocesan societies, benefactors and religious orders. The study concludes with a synopsis of each deanery. The advantage of such a book is that it is brief enough not to deter the more general reader, but nevertheless provides a commendable introduction to the history of the diocese written by an archivist who is also an historian.

The same is true of a much longer publication by Father J. A. Harding, Archivist of the Diocese of Clifton. The Diocese of Clifton, 1850-2000 (Clifton Catholic Diocesan Trustees, 1999, pp.294 £7.60 incl. p&p, from Finance Office, St Nicholas House, Lawford's Gate, Bristol BS5 0RE) is a scholarly yet again very readable account of one of the original Restoration dioceses. Dr Harding uses his expertise as Diocesan Archivist to draw upon a great many resources in telling the story of the Catholic community in Somerset, Gloucestershire and Wiltshire.

The Returning Tide: Northampton Diocese 1850-2000 by Father Derek Lance (Diocese of Northampton, 2000, pp.xviii + 86, £8.95) is a large-format and well illustrated chronicle of yet another of the original (1850) dioceses. Incorporating the whole of East Anglia (until a separate diocese of that name was erected in 1976) as well as Northamptonshire, Bedfordshire and Buckinghamshire, this diocese was confronted with developing a system of parishes and schools in the least Catholic part of England. Father Lance has succeeded in presenting an account of the history of the diocese which will appeal to the general reader, but which is nevertheless based on careful scholarship. Among those credited with assisting the author is Mrs Margaret Osborne, Diocesan Archivist, whose own article on the Northampton Diocesan Archives appears elsewhere in this journal. Together with the Shrewsbury, Southwark, Clifton and Hexham & Newcastle volumes, the publication of this book is ample proof that the past year has been most fruitful in terms of diocesan histories.

Clifford Longley's The Worlock Archive (Geoffrey Chapman, 2000, pp.xii + 388: £19.99) is a candid insight into the thoughts and actions of one of the leading English Catholic churchmen of the twentieth century. Based around Archbishop Worlock's hitherto unpublished papers and his 'Vatican II Diary', this study sheds much light not only on the character of its protagonist, but on the development of the Church in the post-Vatican II era. Longley's introduction gives a history of the Worlock papers and their removal to Upholland under the archival care of Dr Meg Whittle, to whom generous tribute is paid on account of her assistance to the author. Whatever one's views on Clifford Longley's interpretation of the Worlock years, this book is essential reading for students of contemporary English Catholicism.

A most interesting study of Scotland's eighteenth-century clandestine seminary is provided by John Watts in Scalan: The Forbidden College, 1716-1799 (Tuckwell Press, 1999, pp.xi + 276: £14.99). The foundation and development of this remarkable institution is charted, and so too are the personalities and conflicts within the Church in Scotland during this phase of the Penal Times. The author has left no archival source untapped in this detailed survey, and once again it is most useful to have a breakdown of archival material. In addition to the Document storage in the Santiago de Compostela Archdiocesan Archives

Scottish Catholic Archives and the Archives of the Scots College, Rome, Dr Watts has worked in many national and local repositories: Scottish Record Office, National Library of Scotland, Elgin City Library (which houses some local Catholic records), and Edinburgh University's School of Scottish Studies. It is particularly interesting to see mention made of the 'Status Animarum' from 1814 kept at the Catholic Church at Tomintoul, and even more so that the publication of this book has been assisted by the Hierarchy of Scotland.

Trystan Owain Hughes of the School of Theology and Religious Studies in the University of Wales at Bangor has published a very informative study of twentieth-century Welsh Catholicism. Winds of Change: The Roman Catholic Church and Society in Wales 1916-1962 (University of Wales Press, 1999, pp.xii + 291: £25) considers the period from the formation of the Welsh Province to beginning of the Second Vatican Council, and the author is particularly adept in his analysis of the reaction to the growth of Catholicism in a predominantly Nonconformist society. The diocesan archives of Menevia, Wrexham and Westminster are the chief ecclesiastical sources used, while the archives at Caernarfon, Cardiff Library, the National Library of Wales, Newport Library, Swansea Library and the University of Wales at Bangor were also consulted. There is an interesting comment made in the Preface (p.ix): 'Although access to the archives of the archdiocese of Cardiff was denied, the abundance of material from other sources, both manuscript and printed, has meant that the balance of the work has not been seriously affected. Correspondence with officials of the Venerable (English) College at Rome revealed that its records contain nothing relating to Wales or the Welsh bishops, while the Vatican archives only allowed material prior to 1908 to be consulted.'

The English College is very much at the heart of Judith Champ's The English Pilgrimage to Rome: A Dwelling for the Soul (Gracewing, 2000, pp.xii+230). The author traces the development of the English presence in Rome from Saxon times to the twentieth century, and draws heavily upon the archives of the Venerabile, as well as material from Oscott College, the Jesuits at Farm Street, the Dominicans at Edinburgh, and the Thomas Cook Travel Archive, Peterborough. This is a particularly pleasing publication for the Holy Year.

Finally, the Hispanic world is represented by two very different types of publications. Elisardo Temperan Villaverde and Antonio Cepeda Fandino are the compilers of Arquivo Historico Diocesano: Fondo

General (Mosteiro de San Martin Pinaro, 2000, pp.248). This beautifully printed and illustrated introduction to and inventory of the historic archives of the Diocese of Santiago de Compostela begins with a quotation from the Vatican document The Pastoral Function of Church Archives and is an excellent example of what it is possible to do in order to make the contents of an important archival collection more widely known. The second publication is the work of the Archbishop Emeritus of Birmingham: The Man Who Founded California: The Life of Blessed Junipero Serra (Ignatius Press, 2000, pp.240) by M. N. L. Couve de Murville is a lavishly illustrated account of the life of the Franciscan friar from Majorca who established Catholic missions in Mexico and California in the eighteenth century. The author has worked in the Los Angeles Diocesan Archives and in Palina, Majorca, the Carmelite Monastery, Carmel, California, the Santa Barbara Mission Archive Library, and libraries at Canterbury, Oxford and San Francisco. The result is a scholarly investigation presented in a very readable fashion.

THE CATHOLIC ARCHIVES SOCIETY CONFERENCE, 2000

The twenty-first annual conference, held at Hinsley Hall, the Leeds Diocesan Pastoral Centre, on 29-31 May, was attended by some 55 members, including three from Ireland.

The conference was opened on Monday afternoon by Father Chris Smith, Chairman, who welcomed members and then introduced the first speakers, Mgr George Bradley and Mr Robert Finnigan, Archivist and Assistant Archivist of the Diocese of Leeds, who described the history, present situation and future prospects of and for the archives, currently well housed in the Centre. After supper, Michael Gandy, in a stimulating and occasionally provocative talk on 'The reconstituted archive: external sources and collection development', recommended many public and other sources which congregational archivists could explore to supplement the information in their archives.

In the first of the morning talks on 30 May, Sister Mary Coke RSCJ, speaking on 'Reflections of a Religious Archivist: a view from within' (reproduced in this edition of Catholic Archives), sought to extend the conventional role of the congregational archivist as simply a keeper of records by suggesting how certain records could be created, e.g. by keeping a log book, recording the memories of older members, and by tracing former members of their congregation. She felt that the commitment of most religious archivists made up for their lack of formal training. Patricia Harcastle of the Catholic Media Office spoke next on 'Dealing with the Media', and urged Catholic archivists to cultivate contacts with the media, and to make good use of every opportunity and media outlet - not least with the diocesan and local public newspapers - to spread the Gospel, adopting where possible 'media speak' in any news items provided.

During the afternoon Sister Mary Gregory Kirkus kindly guided some twenty or so members on a visit to the Bar Convent chapel, library and archives, while those who remained at Hinsley Hall were taken in small groups by Mgr Bradley and Mr Finnigan to see the Leeds Diocesan Archives. After supper the conference divided into four interest groups: Disaster Planning; Parish Records; Millennium Projects; and the services which the Catholic Archives Society provides for new members.

The final morning began with Mass for the repose of the souls of our deceased Patron (Cardinal Hume) and President (Bishop Foley), celebrated by Bishop David Konstant of Leeds, with our priest members concelebrating. Reports from the interest groups and other topics occupied much of the Open Forum. This was followed by the Annual General Meeting. Father Smith reviewed the Society's work and activities during the previous year, thanked the Officers and Council, particularly Margaret Harcourt Williams (Secretary) and Brother Damian Roe FSC (Treasurer), for their efficient work. He congratulated Sister Mary Campion McCarren FCJ, representing the Publications Sub-Committee, and Father Joseph Fleming for the publication of the long-awaited Archive Principles and Practice, as well as Father Stewart Foster for Catholic Archives no. 20 and Sandre Jackson, Editor of CAS Bulletin. The Officers were duly re-elected and three Council vacancies filled. Abbot Geoffrey Scott spoke briefly on the arrangements for the conference in 2001, to be held at Douai Abbey, near Reading, from 28 to 30 May. Proceedings concluded with generous applause for Anselm Nye, Vice-Chairman, for organising the conference, and with thanks to Hinsley Hall for its warm hospitality. A full account of the conference is to be found in CAS Bulletin 22.

Introductory Notes

Traditionally this page has been entitled 'Editorial notes'. Unfortunately the Editor has been unable to see Catholic Archives 2002 to completion - hence 'Introductory Notes'.

Last year, Father Foster pointed out that he was presenting the first part of Father Joseph Fleming's study on archival theory and standards and promised the second part this year. This has been held over once again, this time not for reasons of space but for reasons of time. With the Editor unavailable, it was not possible for others to edit in such a way as to synchronise with the first part before sending the draft journal to the printers.

Catholic Archives 2002 offers T. E. Muir's wide-ranging article on the archival evidence for English Catholic Music, a topic covered with detailed knowledge and infectious enthusiasm. The reports on particular archives are extended by the inclusion of Fr John Sharp's contribution on the Birmingham Archdiocesan Archives and by the second part of Robin Gard's contribution on the archives of lay societies. Four more congregations of religious sisters have responded to the Editor's appeal for reports no matter how brief, and no matter how modest their holdings. May their example be followed by yet others. The text of Fr Peter Phillip's address delivered at Hornby to mark the sesqui-centenary of John Lingard's death is offered here to a wider readership.

The book review section owes much to the kindness of the Catholic Family History Society which readily gave permission for some pieces deemed to be of interest to CAS members to be reproduced here.

Finally, while thanking the contributors, and offering the customary invitation to others who may feel they have something to offer, Catholic Archives Society thanks especially those members who have rallied to ensure the production of Catholic Archives 2002 and wishes the regular Editor a speedy return to health.

NEW CAS PATRONS

Following the deaths of Cardinal Hume and Bishop Foley, for so long the Patron and President of the Society respectively, Council approached Cardinal Murphy O'Connor and Archbishop Marchisano inviting them to become joint Patrons and Abbot Geoffrey Scott OSB was invited to become President. All three accepted. We produce here the letters of acceptance from the new Patrons.

Dear Chris,

Many thanks for your letter. It was good to hear from you and I hope all is well with you. Goodness me, how the years have passed from our happy days at the College! But I am pleased to know that you are Chairman of the Catholic Archives Society and, of course, would want to help in any way that I can.

It is kind of you to ask me to be a Patron and I will be very pleased to accept. I am also delighted that you have asked Archbishop Marchisano who is a friend of mine and I hope he too is able to accept.

Anyway, Chris, give my good wishes to all those at your conference at the end of May and the assurance of my support and my prayers.

With kind wishes

Yours ever in Christ,
+ Cormac

PROT.N.
(Hic numerus in responsiones referatur)

Dear Father,

I was extremely pleased to receive your kind and gracious letter of October 10th along with the Autumn 2000 edition of the CAS "Bulletin", but also surprisingly and greatly honored by your request to become a Co-Patron of your Society. Surprised because I do not know if I'm the right person since I do not hold a specialized degree in archive science per se, even if from the time of my training at the Pontifical Biblical Institute in Rome years ago I was able to cultivate a very special appreciation of paleographical studies and archival research.

If my nomination to this position, as the description you have included of this post seems to indicate, would mean openly expressing my full support and that of this Pontifical Commission to the wonderful work carried out by your Society and helping it further in some productive way to achieve its praise-worthy endeavours, I graciously accept. I'm also honored that I would share this post with a very dear friend and brother in Christ, Archbishop Murphy O'Connor.

If you and the members of the Society are ready to accept my limits but at the same time my complete willingness to assist your work the best I can, I will gladly take on this responsibility.

Again, I wish to renew my sentiments of deep gratitude to you and to all the members for your kind thoughtfulness as well as for the good work carried out last year as reported in your excellent Conference held last summer.

May the good Lord continue to bless and guide your important initiatives with His Wisdom and Love, and keep each one of you in His loving care and protection. Looking forward to cooperate more closely in the near future, I gladly take this opportunity to renew my prayerful and most cordial wishes, as I remain

Yours Sincerely in Jesus Christ,
Archbishop Francesco Marchisano

John Sharp

Twenty years ago, in the first issue of Catholic Archives, Fr Denis McEville wrote about the Birmingham Diocesan Archives. He explained how the archives had been formed and the methods used in sorting and classifying material. As the first archivist of the archdiocese, Fr McEville was a pioneer in the field of diocesan archives and applied methods to his task which have now become commonplace. Unfortunately, he died in the same year as his article and, inevitably, some of his pioneering methods have been superseded; he himself acknowledged, for instance, that circumstances had dictated an unsatisfactory method of classification of documents.

It is, however, his great achievement to have gathered into the archives a number of older parish registers and to have provided calendars of the historical documents, the so-called 'A', 'B', 'C' and 'R Series', which form part of the National Register of Archives Report 8219. They have been widely used by scholars and quoted in their publications and are firmly established in English Catholic historiography. A major disadvantage is that, with the exception of the 'A Series', none of the Series was indexed, so that researchers must trawl through the calendars to find what they want. As Fr McEville also noted in his overview of the archives, he had begun to arrange material from the twentieth century in the same manner to form a 'D' Series, although little progress was made with this beyond putting it into a strict chronological order and producing a rudimentary calendar for the years 1900-11.

In the years that followed 1981 the sheer volume of material deposited overwhelmed the resources of the archdiocesan archives in every way. Although a move was made to more spacious accommodation within Cathedral House in the hope that it would house the growing collections, it left inadequate room for researchers.

The parochial responsibilities of the archivists, combined with an ever-growing number of researchers and genealogical enquiries, meant that much energy was spent in dealing with these to the detriment of proper sorting and cataloguing. Despite heroic efforts on the part of the archivists and voluntary helpers, and given the lack of finance and of staff, it is difficult to see how more could have been done.

By 1997 Archbishop Couve de Murville was anxious that the archival facilities and services of the archdiocese should be improved, in line with the recommendations of the recently-published Circular Letter of the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church, 'The Pastoral Function of Church Archives'. A large space in the crypt of St Chad's Cathedral was made available as a possible new store, and a visit was made by the Director of Advisory Services of the Royal Commission on Historical Manuscripts to advise on possible developments. In the light of his recommendations, the area in the crypt was cleared of rubbish, some remedial work was undertaken to the fabric, and a dehumidifier and a hygrothermograph were installed. The area was then left vacant for over a year, its relative humidity and temperature being monitored on a constant basis to assess its suitability as an archives store. Over a twelve-month period the humidity and temperature were found to be fairly constant and within acceptable levels. An intruder alarm and sophisticated smoke-detection system were then installed and the store was equipped with a combination of fixed and mobile shelving.

During the eighteen-month period that the store was being prepared, a concerted effort was made to sort and classify the large amount of archival material that lay, unsorted, in boxes piled one on top of another. This was a relentless and time-consuming exercise, but the material was organised into different collections. The integrity of deposited collections was maintained. Thus, for example, the large archives of Sedgley Park School and Cotton College and of Besford Court School were treated as distinct collections within the larger archival collection. The same was true of the Papers of Archbishop Grimshaw and of Archbishop Dwyer. In some cases papers from more than one source were integrated to form a single, coherent collection; 'Archbishop's Papers 1929-1965' became one such collection. The provenance of many papers, however, was unknown since no accessions register had been kept. The result was that new, sometimes artificial, collections had to be made; for instance, 'Diocesan Papers' and 'Education Papers' became collections of material that did not fit anywhere else. As the papers were sorted and filed, they were boxed and given reference numbers. To help in the work, computers were purchased, together with an archives software programme, with the intention that nothing would go into the archives store unless it had a reference number which would make possible its retrieval for research-

The process of sorting threw up many curios and anomalies, not least the large number of medieval charters relating to Erdington, the records of the Court Leet of the Manor of Birmingham, and deeds and related documents relating to the Coyne family, which had probably come to the archdiocesan archives from Oscott and had been catalogued as part of the 'C Series' with the reference numbers CD 1a-443. The decision was taken, with the permission of the Diocesan Trustees, to transfer these documents to the Birmingham City Archives on permanent loan. Some other papers which had no intrinsic connection or relevance were similarly donated or loaned to other specialist collections in the country. Fr McEvelly had initiated such a process in 1974 when he had transferred a collection of documents relating to the Priestley Riots of 1791 from the 'C Series' to the Birmingham Central Library.

The time arrived to move the archives to the new store, and to facilitate this, the archdiocesan archives closed to the public for seven months (June-December 1999). The existing archives room was refurbished and converted into a search room with accommodation for 12 people to work comfortably and with access to the reference library and the catalogues (either on computer or hard copy) and to a microfilm and microfiche reader. Security measures were put in place similar to those in public record offices.

We opened again to the public in January 2000. Two open days for clergy were held that month and elicited a single visit from a solitary priest looking for information about his parish! An official launch in March was a little more successful and attracted 57 invited guests, ranging from local academics to locally-based archivists from record offices in the West Midlands. They included the Director of Advisory Services of the R.C.H.M. who commented favourably on 'the transformation of the facilities since my last visit in 1997'.

The investment of the archdiocese in the archives during the period has been enormous, and the allocation of an annual budget to be spent on equipment, materials, conservation and repair is testimony to its continued commitment. We have facilities and equipment of which Fr McEvelly could only have dreamt! Of course, much remains to be done and improvements made, but the initiative of Archbishop Couve de Murville has borne substantial fruit.

In the course of 2000 the archdiocesan archives were visited by 333 people, the majority researching their family history, but also research students and academics. We are open to the public by appointment only on three days of the week from 11 am until 6 pm. Whenever possible, all written and e-mail enquiries are dealt with on the day of receipt, but we have a strict policy of not undertaking any genealogical research; those who cannot come to research in person are put in touch with local members of the Catholic Family History Society.

Although the archdiocesan archives is the only designated repository for the registers and other archival material from the parishes of the archdiocese, our parish collections are relatively poor. A beginning has been made in the task of encouraging parishes to care for their archives and think about their longer-term storage in the archdiocesan archives. A leaflet on Parish Archives was sent to all the priests of the archdiocese, and it is hoped that the system of parish visitation will bring in more material. In the meantime, there is a continuing programme of rebinding and repairing parish registers that have already been deposited and are in need of attention. To date nearly 200 registers have been rebound, the work being greatly boosted by a generous grant from the Marc Fitch Fund.

Only now is it possible to return to the series of early twentieth-century papers which Fr McEvelly intended to form the 'D Series'. A start has been made to the long and slow process of cataloguing them individually. When completed, it is hoped to put the other early series on to computer so that the search engine will make light work of finding whatever a researcher wants. Although this should be the first priority of the work of the archives, it tends to be crowded out by other concerns. But over the last four years great strides and improvements have been made and, if the archdiocese continues to invest in its archival service, much will be achieved in the years to come.

FROM SIGHT TO SOUND: ARCHIVAL EVIDENCE FOR ENGLISH CATHOLIC MUSIC

T.E. Muir

1829-1962.

In general Catholic historians, especially for the post recusant period, have paid little attention to music.¹ Yet the single factor that defines Catholicism - apart from loyalty to the Pope - is its liturgy, especially the Mass; and here, apart from the text, the greatest influence is exerted by music, as official documents have frequently acknowledged.² Music, as Pius X explained, is a vehicle for conveying text; it sets the mood of the service; and at the lowest level it advertises the faith.³ Moreover as a language it can be 'read' like any other form of evidence, often with multiple layers of meaning. For example the Tower Music Room at Downside has a copy of The Ecclesiastical Choir Book: Selections from the Great Masters of the Sixteenth Century.⁴ Published in 1848 it was dedicated to Nicholas Wiseman, the future Cardinal of Westminster, who had strong Ultramontane leanings. Renaissance Polyphony then was an instrument in the campaign to impose 'Roman' order on a wayward English church. Yet the same collection also has copies of Richard Terry's Downside Motets published some fifty years later. Here some of the same pieces are found alongside works by English Renaissance polyphonists. So, as Terry explained in the preface to Volume V, the object was to show that Roman uniformity was compatible with a native English tradition.⁵

This is not to deny though that in all periods people have written about Catholic music; but often such views are really polemical instruction by interested parties. Terry for example in the preface to The Westminster Hymnal under the heading 'The Need for Uniformity' declares that in the matter of hymn performance 'each Congregation is a law unto itself' giving numerous instances of mutilated hymn tunes, but without supplying objective statistical evidence of this happening in particular parishes. He is simply expressing an opinion based on inchoate surface impressions.⁶ This sort of thing is excellent historical evidence for what people thought was happening, or ought to be happening; but it does not tell us what was actually happening. Moreover there has been no concept of English Catholic Music. The assumption has always been that it is, at best, part of an international Catholic scene. The consequences become clear for example when looking at developments in plainchant from the 1880s onwards. The achievements of Solesmes are well known; but there is almost nothing about how, why and to what extent its style spread in England, even though much of the material is readily available.⁷

The aim of my research is to put this right. First, through the study of the collections, publishers' catalogues, diocesan lists and advertisements on the back of sheet music, the basic repertoire will be defined, initially for the years 1903-62 but inevitably, by way of comparison, spreading to periods before and after it. It will then be possible to measure statistically such issues as the impact of particular composers, the relative musical importance attached to different parts of the liturgy and the proportion of music written in particular styles at any one time. Secondly through case studies based on particular collections a start can be made to find out what was happening 'on the ground'. Music may have been written; but that does not necessarily mean it was performed. This can be supplemented by looking at monthly programmes published in parish or school magazines; and in a more general way by a sampling of visitation returns. This is because dioceses sometimes asked how often there was a sung mass and how much money was spent on the choir.⁸ Thirdly the statistical data, when combined with such evidence as official instructions, polemical articles in magazines and private letters, makes it possible to measure the dynamics of change. For example to ask why, in what ways and how successfully there was a revival of plainchant or Renaissance Polyphony after 1850. Inevitably there will be several gaps; and here there is only space to describe the contents of some collections. Nonetheless the matters examined so far do give a good idea of what is there; and for this I am already greatly indebted to the kind help given to me by the keepers of these collections.

THE COLLECTIONS.

AMPLEFORTH ABBEY LIBRARY AND ARCHIVES, NR. YORK YO62 4EN.

Musically this is strong in two areas: first there is a large collection of hymnals going back to the mid nineteenth century; secondly there are the surviving papers of Dom Laurence Bévénat, one of the most important Catholic composers in the Twentieth Century, especially after the Second Vatican Council (it is unfortunate that he burnt so many of his earlier works). Not only do these contain some 300 separate manuscript and published works, they also supply invaluable details about his life, family background and interests. The secondary supporting material, such as biographical outlines and supplementary articles, is very well organised.

DOWNSIDE ABBEY: STRATTON ON THE FOSSE, NR. BATH, SOMERSET BA3 4RH.

In the Twentieth Century Downside's best known musician was Dom Anthony Gregory Murray (1905-92); and the bulk of his boxed papers are stored in the archives. These give first hand evidence of his life, training and multifarious interests. Drafts and printed versions of his articles show how his thinking evolved; for example from being an active promoter of plainchant to arguing that it was too difficult for congregations to manage. There are also a very large number of manuscript and printed versions of his compositions and arrangements (especially for Organ and Recorders). Amongst other things these demonstrate his crucial importance - along with Bèvenot (see Ampleforth) - in popularising Gelineau Psalmody during the 1960s and in the development of simple four part harmony settings of the Ordinary, beginning with The People's Mass of 1950.

The picture can be amplified further from the contents of the Tower Music Room. In addition to a large generalised collection of recordings, there is a mass of variegated material that mainly belonged to him - including several cassette recordings. Most of the sheet music (which is uncatalogued) covers the period c1900-90, the religious elements in particular exposing his early interest in Renaissance Polyphony (following his mentor Richard Terry) as well as his activities after the Second Vatican Council.

Other papers relating to Downside musicians are also held in the archives. In particular C.T. Gatty's papers, assembled in 1925, throw detailed light on the researches and other business preparations behind the production of the Arundel Hymnal.⁹ In the library there is a fair sized music section with, for example, Murray's own 1932 edition of the Westminster Hymnal annotated in Terry's own hand for the revised version of 1940. Its liturgy section is also well worth close study, as there are numerous editions of Graduales, Antiphonales and other plainchant volumes. These can usefully be read in conjunction with the musical provisions of the numerous 'rules' and decrees for different religious orders stored in the vicinity. Scattered throughout the library are numerous, and in many cases comparatively rare, pamphlets and articles, often of primary importance. For example there is a copy of Clifford Howell's translation of An Instruction by the Sacred Congregation of Rites on Sacred Music and Liturgy.¹⁰ Together these materials demonstrate the prime importance of Downside as a shaper of twentieth century Catholic Music.

DOUAI ABBEY, UPPER WOOLHAMPTON, READING, BERKS RG7 5TQ.

Here the relevant musical material can be found in three places. The library has a limited stock of music, but it is of the highest quality. For example there is a complete edition of Palestrina's Werke, published by Brietkopf and Hartel under the direction of F.X. Haberl between 1875-85 in nine double volumes. Secondly the archives contain the papers of Bishop Austin O'Neill (1841-1911) including his correspondence with Bishop Hedley (another musician) and the nuns of Stanbrook Abbey.¹¹ These demonstrate the close connection between developments in the revival of plainchant (especially by Solesmes) and the movement within the English Benedictine Congregation to create virtually autonomous houses concentrating on a monastic life rather than missionary work. There are also some compositions by O'Neill himself and a valuable volume of 'Motets used in St Edmund's Chapel, Douai' associated with O'Neill's music teacher Dom Cuthbert Murphy (1826-91). Thirdly there are well organised stocks of music in the Choir Office, belonging to John Rowntree. This is a practical working collection and should not be viewed as an archive. Nonetheless it has several important historical items rescued at the closure of the school. These include two large volumes marked 'Messés et Antiennes' containing numerous early nineteenth century works. Although these are French publications the balance of material is surprisingly similar to that found in Vincent Novello's publications at about the same time.

ST MARY'S ABBEY, STANBROOK, CALLOW END, WORCESTER WR2 4TD.

This is an enclosed house so an outsider cannot have direct access to the library. Nonetheless the nuns are exceptionally helpful and, as at Ampleforth, can give exceptionally good additional backup in the form of summaries and basic biographical details of key figures in the musical history of the community. It is thus possible to produce some sort of picture of the musical material that is available.

First there is the complete range of Stanbrook's plainchant publications - vital for anyone studying the evolution of plainchant in England after 1890. The real strength of the archives though lies in its voluminous manuscript papers. Of particular importance is the correspondence between Dom Laurence Shepherd (chaplain between 1863-85) and Abbot Prosper Guéranger of Solesmes. There are also the letters exchanged between Laurentia MacLachan (1866-1953) and André Mocquereau, Henry Bewerunge (a plainchant and Renaissance Polyphony expert of Maynooth seminary, Ireland) and numerous other important figures, including Anglican plainchant experts and collectors of valuable medieval music manuscripts. Some of these match up with letters held elsewhere, such as the O'Neill papers at Douai; and as at Douai they demonstrate the close connection between developments in plainchant research and the drive towards autonomous abbeys in the English Benedictine Congregation. The Bewerunge letters also throw important light on the writing of The Grammar of Plain-song, arguably the most influential plainchant training manual in England before the introduction of *Plain-song for Schools*¹², as well as on the violent controversies concerning plainchant performance and the editorial work surrounding the production of the Vatican and Solesmes Editions after 1905. Taken together these papers demonstrate that Stanbrook was a principal conduit through which Solesmes style chant came to dominate the English plainchant scene in the Twentieth century. In addition through discussion of MacLachan's work on the Worcester Antiphoner, they show how a peculiarly English dimension was given in places to these developments.¹³ This though is not the whole story; for like many abbeys after the Second Vatican Council the nuns worked energetically to compose new music for the liturgy - especially the Office; and much of this can be easily found not only in the chant books used in the chapel but also in modern publications and recordings.

LONG CRENDON: PRESBYTERY FOR THE CHURCH OF 'OUR LADY OF LIGHT': BUCKINGHAMSHIRE HP18 9BS.

This very large collection, containing some 10,000 by and large unsorted items, belonged to the now defunct Church Music Association. Beginning as an offshoot from the Society of St Gregory after the War the CMA enjoyed a largely separate identity until re-amalgamation with its parent in the late 1970s. Its collection was then stored in the basement of the St Thomas More Centre in London from whence it was rescued by Mary Pethicka and brought to Long Crendon.

The CMA had its own magazine, Church Music, so its reviews can be profitably studied in conjunction with publishers' specimen copies in the collection. Unfortunately there are not many issues of this at Long Crendon.¹⁴ The evidence of signatures shows that much other music was given by members. This, together with the publishers' tendency to reprint old editions, accounts for the presence of a significant body of older music dating back to the 1900s. There is also a file of music manuscript material relating to the activities of the Society of St John Chrysostom (studying the music of the Orthodox church) in the 1920s and 1930s. A particular feature of the CMA was its ecumenical character - with a strong Anglican wing. So at least half the music - much of it published by the Oxford University Press - belongs to this tradition. It is thus possible to compare Anglican and Catholic repertoires and assess their influence on one another. This is especially important for the period during and immediately after the Second Vatican Council when English Catholics looked closely at Anglican musical approaches to a vernacular liturgy. For earlier periods comparisons between editorial methods - and therefore performance styles - for the same pieces published for the two traditions may prove especially fruitful.

The collection also shows very well how professionally trained Catholic composers, and the major Catholic publishing house - L.J. Cary and Co. - responded to the challenges of the 1960s. Moreover the CMA had its own publishing outlet - St Martins Publications; and its output can be compared with the efforts by the Royal School of Church Music to modernise the Anglican music and liturgy at that time, for which there is substantial material. The long term failure of these responses, in the face of fierce competition from Folk musicians and the St Thomas More group of composers, constitutes one of the most important chapters of recent English Catholic musical history.

STONYHURST COLLEGE, NR. BLACKBURN, LANCS. BB7 9QD.

Here most of the musical material is stored in the Music

Basement. At different times in the College's history it has been subject to considerable reorganisation; so the present picture, from the historical perspective, is somewhat unclear. Basically there are three divisions. First there is a recently rediscovered consignment of about forty volumes of early-mid nineteenth century music stored in a cupboard in the piano master's room. This shows that at that time Stonyhurst enthusiastically performed a repertoire of Masses by composers like Haydn and Mozart on a grand scale. Secondly there is a considerable quantity of material from the late nineteenth century onwards stored in the room formerly belonging to the Director of Music. This includes organ notebooks listing everything that was done in St Peter's Church from 1964 till about 1980 along with various full editions of the Stonyhurst Cationale and other publications specially prepared for Jesuit Colleges by John Driscoll in the 1920s and 1930s¹⁵. These are of inestimable value. Thirdly all the material - secular as well as religious - currently used by the music department is stored in a separate room dedicated for that purpose.

The Arundell Library itself is, at first sight, rather disappointing. However there is a very early version of John Wade's Adeste Fideles and a remarkable set of huge eighteenth century plainchant volumes formerly belonging to the Royal Chapel in Grenada, Spain. More mundanely, there is much ephemeral material - such as concert programmes and service sheets for great occasions. In addition the Arundell Library Annexe has a selection of old hymnals and musical manuals, together with a considerable quantity of liturgical books - so the music can be placed in its proper context. It will be apparent then that much music has been lost; especially that of a more ephemeral nature - such as the music used in the Sodalities or - for the 1960s, 1970s and 1980s - in Playroom Masses (Stonyhurst is organised 'horizontally' into year groups known as 'Playrooms'). However material keeps turning up in the most unexpected places, underlining the vast influence exerted by the College within and outside the English Jesuit world. For example the diary of the nonconformist Moses Heap at Rossendale Public Library contains a remarkable account of the Whitsunday celebrations for 1850.¹⁶ Moreover, for the early nineteenth century a useful point of entry are the contents of chapels owned by Old Stonyhurst, Liege and St Omers pupils, such as those at Lulworth (the Weld family), Wardour Castle (the Arundell family) and Everingham

THE BAR CONVENT, BLOSSOM ST, YORK YO24 1AQ.

[A] THE EVERINGHAM COLLECTION.

Everingham is a large country house mid way between York and Hull. In the grounds there is a large chapel built by William Marmaduke Constable Maxwell, Tenth Lord Herries, which was consecrated in 1839. The Maxwells were keen musicians; and under their patronage an enormous collection of some 3,000 items was accumulated, mainly for the period up to the First World War, but running up till the sale of the house in the late 1970s. At that point the collection was rescued by John Rowntree, sorted in a rudimentary fashion and brought for safe keeping to the Bar Convent.

The material shows very clearly the threefold division into which most nineteenth century Catholic music falls. Beginning with a 1785 publication of Samuel Webbe the Elder's compositions,¹⁸ there is a substantial amount of early nineteenth century engraved music, much of it edited and published by Vincent Novello. Here the predominance of the Classical 'Viennese' style is very apparent. Next, for the mid-nineteenth century there are several Octavo editions published by J.A. Novello together with an almost complete set of manuscript part books. There are also a few original compositions specially dedicated to the Maxwell family. Finally, for the period c.1890-1914 there are numerous sets of mainly Cary editions of Renaissance Polyphonic and original works characteristic of that period. Relatively little material survives for subsequent periods apart from clear evidence for the adoption of Solesmes style chant in the 1930s.

In addition there is a considerable quantity of liturgical books. Vespéral books for the early-mid nineteenth century are particularly important, as they confirm the more widespread use of English suggested by the evidence at St Cuthbert's church, Durham (see below). Moreover there is a volume of 60 Anglican chants composed by Dr Camidge, the eighteenth century organist at York Minister¹⁹. As in Durham then with Vespers there seems to have been a considerable seepage of material from the Anglican tradition, something that was to be eradicated in later decades.

Many of the Maxwells went to Stonyhurst; so, not surprisingly, there is a Jesuit tinge to the collection. For example there is a copy of *Saint Winifrid's Hymn Book*²⁰ compiled by Seminarians of St Buenos and a mid nineteenth century set of Litany chants used at Farm St. Church, London published by John Lambert. However there is also evidence, in the form of compositions by W. Schulthes and an edition of W. Pitts' Oratory Litanies, of influence from the London Oratory.²¹ More significantly though the collection shows English Catholic music at a cross-roads between what was provided in a chapel like Lulworth or Wardour Castle and that in an urban parish like St Cuthbert's, Durham. The Welds and Arundells received their Continental Catholic musical education direct from Jesuit schools on the Continent; but the Maxwells got theirs indirectly via Stonyhurst. This was supplemented by what they picked up in London - but not so much from the embassy chapels, as had formerly been the case - and from Continental tours. For example some music, especially compositions by Louis Lambillotte, was purchased direct from shops in Paris.²² Everingham then is perhaps one of the last of a small group of Catholic household chapels with a really strong musical tradition reaching right back to the Petre household at Ingatestone in the early seventeenth century, where William Byrd had worked.

[B] THE BAR CONVENT COLLECTION.

This moderate sized collection, stored in a cupboard on the chapel gallery landing, contains 58 separate published volumes and a further 112 distinct pieces loosely stored in folders or manuscript books. Much of the music comes in multiple copies or has been duplicated. It covers the period c1890-1980 and reflects the needs of the girl's school and of the IBVM as a religious community of women. Consequently the principal focus is on plainchant, hymnody - including carol collections, and material suitable for Benediction. The plainchant mainly relates to the 1920s; but there is a Pustet publication of 1895. Most of the Benediction material belongs to the period 1890-1910; but at least half of this was copied out after the Second World War. In addition there is a little music arranged or composed by Sister Mary Champion IBVM, but the bulk of her surviving output has been transferred to the IBVM community at St Mary's, Ascott, Berks SL5 9LL.

For the period immediately following the Second Vatican Council there is a fair amount of music which includes some rare and interesting material. For example there are copies of adaptations of Latin chant for the English Mass from St Mary's, Knaresborough and Anthony Milner's Chants of the Ordinary of the Mass specially composed for Catholics at Eton College.²³

THE TALBOT LIBRARY, ST WALBURGHE'S CHURCH, WESTON ST, PRESTON, LANCS. PR2 2QE.

The Talbot Library owes its existence to the remarkable vision and initiative displayed by Bishop John Brewer of Lancaster and Fr Robert Canavan. With a skeleton budget, by the simple expedient of encouraging Parish priests and convents to clear out the contents of their presbyteries and houses an enormous ragbag collection of books and music has been quickly built up and continues to be added to at a hectic pace. For the researcher it is one of the most exciting places to visit. There is always something new to discover as contributions are sorted by its devoted volunteer staff.

Essentially the musical material falls into seven categories. First there is a substantial collection of plainchant volumes dating from all periods beginning with a rare Pustet Graduale of 1875. Secondly there is a large number of Catholic and other denominational hymnals from about 1880 onwards. Thirdly there are fourteen boxes containing sets of some 44 Masses, 50 Motets and a dozen other miscellaneous items of church music. Church stamps and signatures show that at least half (about 25 Masses, 17 motets and 3 miscellaneous items) had been obtained by Bolton le Sands church, Near Carnforth, Lancs. between its consecration in 1884 and the First World War. The number of copies suggests that at its peak it had a choir of about 20 in a church with an estimated seating capacity of 200. This gives an excellent snapshot of what a small congregation could achieve with effective leadership.

Fourthly there are about 400 separate publications of sheet music, some of it in duplicate copies. These are evenly divided between the mid nineteenth century, c.1890-1914 and from the late 1960s and 1970s. With the latter there is a predominance of Gestedner and photocopied material, much of which came from the former convents of Wigton, Cumbria and the Sisters of the Apostles, Leigh. Ephemeral material of this sort is as at a premium for anyone wanting to get an understanding of what was happening immediately after the Second Vatican Council. To the mid-nineteenth century belong some precious manuscript volumes and printed collections from St. Augustine's, Preston and a 'Miss Oldfield' of St Cuthbert's, Bradford and St Ignatius, Preston.

Fifthly and sixthly there is some theoretical religious music reading - such as Chester Walker's *The Plainsong Reason Why*²⁴ - and a good deal of secondary backup in the form of back issues of for example The Westminster Cathedral Chronicle (1949 onwards), Liturgy and Music (known as Liturgy till the 1970s), The Rambler, and The Orthodox Journal. The contents of the latter two are being computer catalogued.

Finally, scattered in boxes and steel cabinets there are large unsorted consignments of old cassettes, LPs and 78 rpm records. Most of these are non religious; and as such they reveal a good deal about the listening habits of Catholic priests! Some though have considerable interest for the historian of church music.²⁵ Of these the most ephemeral could prove to be the 200 or so cassettes dating from the 1970s and 1980s. These are precious evidence of how music from that period actually - according to their publishers - was meant to sound. As with other forms of evidence such music is at its most vulnerable when it immediately falls out of use.

USHAW COLLEGE, CO. DURHAM DH7 9RH.

Although now divided into two parts the Ushaw music collection is really a single entity; one section of it only recently having been removed from the old music room to the dormitories. By and large it is unsorted; but a list of contents is being prepared. The collection contains several thousand items; but many of these are multiple copies. Nonetheless in terms of size, and given the dominant role of Ushaw as the principal Northern seminary, the collection must surely be one of the most important in the country. This is shown by the connections between the Seminary and the parishes served by its alumni, as illustrated by the contents of the collection at St Cuthbert's, Durham (see below) and by the sizeable file of material in the dormitories formerly belonging to the church of Our Lady and St Oswin, Tynemouth. Although, as befitted a Seminary, there is a lot of music for Tenors and Basses, as Ushaw also had a school the majority was composed for mixed voices.

The collection seems to have been assembled in three great bursts of activity. The first of these - between the 1830s and 1860s - is associated with the Presidency of Charles Newsham, a prolific composer whose *Collection of Music Suitable for the Rite of Benediction*²⁶ was the standard work before A.E. Tozer's 1898 publication.²⁷ So, apart from a considerable quantity of music by Haydn and his contemporaries - much of it still in use in the 1880s - there are several manuscript arrangements and original compositions.

The second great burst of activity occurred in the 1900s. It is dominated by Fr Edward Bonney. There is a large collection of organ music belonging to him in the dormitories; and in the Music Room there are several specially bound volumes containing over a hundred Masses by members of the St Cecilia Society from the 1860s onwards. However, since most of them survive as single copies, there is some doubt about how many were actually performed. Nonetheless they do betoken a strong interest in Renaissance Polyphony; a point reinforced by other specially bound volumes of Charles Bordes' Anthologies, produced in the 1890s.²⁸ It is noticeable that most of this occurred before Terry began his allegedly pioneering work in this field at Westminster Cathedral! By contrast, apart from a couple of issues of Paléographie Musicale, evidence for interest in plainchant is meagre²⁹

The third great period - the 1950s-1970s - coincides with the arrival of the Gestedner machine and is associated with another major figure, Fr Laurence Hollis, choirmaster and Vice President up till 1967. Accordingly multiple copies of old Renaissance polyphonic works, small scale Cecilian motets, and Perosi masses were duplicated in the 1950s; and alongside them appeared several locally composed items. This evidence shows that, beneath the placid surface of the 1950s, strong movements for change were developing that do much to explain the explosion of activity after the Second Vatican Council. In the 1960s and 1970s, paralleling the example set by the Church Music Association, numerous Anglican publications were bought, along with numerous new works by Catholic composers including early efforts by members of the St Thomas More Group.

Liturgical music constitutes only part of the Ushaw collection. In the dormitories there are numerous Negro Spiritual and semi-religious settings; several of which were obtained from Robertson Publications in Wendover, Buckinghamshire. There is also evidence here for the large scale performance of oratorios. In the Music Room there are about a hundred settings of music for amateur dramatics, as well as much orchestral and instrumental music - most of which relates to the nineteenth century. This should not be regarded as distinct from the liturgical material. At that time on great occasions Mass settings were accompanied by small orchestras, for which there are even a few sets of parts at Ushaw. Moreover, as the future bishops Cuthbert Hedley and Austin O'Neill recognised at Ampleforth and Douai, musical amateur dramatics was one way of training suitable voices for the choir.

ST CUTHBERT'S CHURCH, OLD ELVET DURHAM DH1 3HL.

The value of the collection is twofold. First it gives an excellent example of the full repertory of a well established Victorian parish (the church was built in 1827). Secondly it reveals the strong influence of Ushaw. Most of its senior priests were trained there; and all of them displayed strong musical interests. This is especially true of Canon William Brown (parish priest between 1887-1924) who, as well as being a composer in his own right, was the most active of the copyists. His Oboe tutor still survives in the Ushaw Music Room.

The Victorian music is stored in a chest of drawers up in the choir loft. It consists of 16 printed and 8 manuscript volumes, 6 of which are part books, the earliest of which were copied in the 1850s. For the period 1920-62 only seven printed volumes survive. Thus, if the hymn books are excluded, this gives a potential nineteenth century repertoire of over 1,000 pieces, 455 of which were copied into the part books and thus, presumably performed. Curiously though the part books contain many pieces that do not appear in the printed volumes. This suggests that either St Cuthbert's had more volumes which have subsequently been lost or the works were copied from materials held at Ushaw. The collection should be studied in conjunction with J.M. Tweedie's parish history *Popish Elvet*³⁰ which supplies a useful chapter on the music and benefits from access to documents (such as the choir rule book drafted in the 1840s) that no longer seem to be available.

A notable feature is the enormous number of Litanies (64), O Salutaris (28), Tantum Ergo (29) and Psalm Settings (131). The latter use Anglican psalmody, and there is some evidence to suggest that they were sung to English words long after the ban imposed by the Vicars Apostolic in 1838. 76 of the chants are by identifiable Anglican composers; and of these 31 are by Francis Lingard, a Durham Cathedral lay clerk. This is clear evidence of the considerable crossover between Anglican and Catholic church music in the 1850s for certain sorts of music; something that was to be increasingly frowned upon by the hierarchy later in the century.

OTHER MATERIALS.

In addition to what has been described so far, a number of other sources deserve mention. University libraries often hold interesting material. For example the Pratt Green collection in the University of Durham contains several old hymnals transferred from Ushaw College's main library. In the Westminster Diocesan Archives (W8 6AF) some of the minutes of the bishops' Low Week meetings deserve careful scrutiny - especially as regards preparations for the Westminster Hymnal from 1905 onwards and responses to the Second Vatican Council, on which further documentation can be obtained from the offices of the Bishops Conference (SW1V 1BX).³¹ The Westminster archives also have a complete set of the Westminster Cathedral Chronicle virtually every issue of which after 1949 (and many before that date) gives a complete programme of the main service music. Similar evidence can be found for certain periods at least in many parish magazines.³² Similar lists can also be found in journals like the Stonyhurst Magazine. Even where this does not happen they often contain invaluable articles of a historical nature or giving 'the state of play' as it were; excellent examples being The Ampleforth Journal, the Downside Review and the Ushaw Magazine. Letters and articles in the Catholic press are also important, as the bitter controversy over plainchant in The Tablet for the 1900s demonstrates. Reference should also be made to the invaluable contents of Music and Liturgy, the periodical organ of the Society of St Gregory.³³ Finally one should not neglect the value of aural evidence, especially from older members of stable religious communities.

It should thus be apparent that the amount of available material is vast; too vast to be fully described in an article like this. Nonetheless it shows that English Catholic music - as a social experience if nothing else - played a vital role in the history of that community in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries.

THE ARCHIVES OF THE CATHOLIC LAY SOCIETIES

Robin Gard

Catholic Archives 2001 contained Part I of this article and dealt with the archives of St Joan's International Alliance.

THE GUILD OF OUR LADY OF RANSOM

The Guild possesses very few archives in the conventional form of minute books, correspondence, accounts, and the various papers which exist for many similar national bodies of like antiquity. Superficially, this would seem strange for such a high profile organisation devoted to the ambitious objective of the conversion of England with a numerous membership throughout the country and engaged in well advertised pilgrimages, lectures, weekly parish appeals, and a well established periodical, The Ransomer, activities which it would be thought would generate many varied records. Their absence is not, however, so surprising when one considers that The Guild, despite its national appeal, has always been directed personally by its Master who from the outset and to this day has been aided by the minimum of secretarial support or national organisation. Thus, such records as have been created over the years have been largely the private papers of its four successive Masters, each of whom has led a missionary life, with limited opportunities of, and indeed little need for, letter writing, arranging meetings, conducting negotiations, making corporate decisions, reporting actions, and the like, which in other organisations create records and archives. While each Master will have corresponded with many notable figures in the Church establishment, as well as with Guild activists and members, very little of such papers have survived, each Master retaining only such papers as he deemed of current use, and it is known that one Master disposed of papers before his time. Even so, the achievements of The Guild since its foundation on 17 November 1887 are probably better recorded than those of many lay societies of like age, and this is because its activities have been thoroughly documented in its publications begun by its first Master, Fr Philip Fletcher, in 1886 and continued in one form or another to the present day.

The early history of The Guild and an account of its publications are given in two articles in The Ransomer, Vol. 26, No.6 [1977] and Vol. 33, No.7 (Easter 1996). Briefly, Fr Philip Fletcher (1848-1928), Oxford graduate and convert clergyman, devoted his whole life to the conversion of England, in which cause he had been inspired by the heroic missionary work of Fr Ignatius Spencer (1799-1864) in his Apostolate of Prayer for the same cause a generation earlier. When parish priest at Uckfield he started in July 1886 a monthly magazine, Faith of Our Fathers, and after the foundation of The Guild in November 1887 this became its periodical. Fr Fletcher funded it himself, edited and indeed wrote most of its contents throughout its twenty or so years until in 1900 it was acquired by Cardinal Vaughan and published under the title of St Peter's Net recording the rescue work of the dioceses of Westminster and Brentwood. As well as being a zealous missionary, Fr Fletcher was a keen historian, with an omnibus mind, a facile pen, and a gift for writing plain and simple language popular with the ordinary reader. Faith of Our Fathers included articles on the lives of martyrs, notes on historic shrines, responses to Protestant objections to Catholic beliefs, catechetical instructions, stories of heroism and conversion, even a series, A to Z, of the causes of lapsing from the faith, a children's corner, and various entertainments. Fr Fletcher lived in an age which was largely unsympathetic, even hostile, to Catholics, who were regarded as a peculiar, alien, people, and whose proselytizing mission was vigorously opposed. The Church had in Fr Fletcher a doughty champion who promoted and defended Catholic beliefs, rebutted Protestant criticisms, informed Catholics of their historic traditions, gave them pride in their faith, the courage to live it, and zeal to proclaim it.

Fr Fletcher also contributed Ransom notes to The Catholic Register and The Catholic News, and when the latter ceased to publish his weekly column in 1893 he started his own weekly magazine, The Ransomer, ambitiously sub-titling it A Weekly Organ of Ransom Work All over the World. This continued until 1897, when it was absorbed into The Catholic Standard, subsequently The Monitor, and later The Monitor and New Era, until 1915, although Fr Fletcher's input ceased around 1900, when he suffered ill health. Recovering, he started yet another periodical, The Second Spring: A Magazine for Ransomers, with much the same mixture of contents as before, and this continued until 1929, when in the year after Fr Fletcher's death, it was renamed The Ransomer and is still published, thrice-yearly, today. In all these publications and in Fr Fletcher's columns in the Catholic papers of the day, including The Universe from 1905, the work of The Guild is well recorded and, additionally, Fr Fletcher's own reminiscences were published in 1928 in Recollections of a Ransomer. Fr Fletcher and the co-founder of The Guild, Lister Drummond, its secretary for many years, C.F. Emery, its treasurer, Charles Rock, its magazine distributor, George Elliot Anstruther, who succeeded Drummond as secretary, W. Vance Packman, J.P.L. Wharton Hewison, F.W. Chambers, and W.J. Blyton, successive editors, were also active in The Catholic Truth Society, The Catholic Evidence Guild, St Anselm's Society for the circulation of Catholic literature, the Historical Research Society, and the Catholic Record Society, so that information on these and other lay societies may be found in The Guild's publications.

Fr Fletcher was succeeded as Master by Mgr John F. Filmer (1928-1951, d. 1959), likewise a convert clergyman, and he was followed by The Guild's third convert priest, Mgr Laurence Goulder (1951-1968), and thereafter by the present Master, Mgr Anthony G. Stark, K.H.S., who has maintained and extended the traditional work of The Guild, notably the Tyburn Walk, the London and regional pilgrimages and excursions, the annual novena and Walsingham Walk, now in its fiftieth year, and of course the Master's weekly parish appeals. To the original aims of The Guild, the conversion of England, the forgotten dead, and the return of lapsed Catholics, have been added prayers for vocations, for priests and religious, greater devotion to Our Lady, increased loyalty to the Pope, the canonisation of the Ven. John Henry Newman, and others. Funds raised by The Guild are almost wholly given to the Bishops for the support of poor parishes.

The Guild is not entirely devoid of archives, and among the records held at its office in Wimbledon are minute books of the annual general meeting (under a new constitution of 1925), 1925-1997; minute books of the executive committee, from 1937; annual reports (bound and loose), from 1925; and some twenty or so spring-back folders of historical notes prepared by Mgr Goulder and Mgr Stark on the history of the Church in England, for pilgrimages to historic places of Catholic interest in London and elsewhere, for Ransom lectures, sermons on appeals, and the like. Mgr Goulder published a series of Pilgrimage Pamphlets on the Medieval Church, the Monasteries, London, Winchester, Norwich, Canterbury, Westminster, and the Universities. Finally, the Guild holds copies of Faith of Our Fathers, The Second Spring, and The Ransomer, other copies of which will of course also be available in The British Library.

Despite its remarkable achievements during its long life, The Guild's missionary work is even more needed today in an increasingly secular world. Readers seeking membership or further information are encouraged to write to The Very Rev. Mgr Anthony G. Stark, KHS, Master of The Guild of Our Lady of Ransom, 51 Southdown Road, Wimbledon, London, SW20 8QJ

THE CATHOLIC SOCIAL GUILD

Leo XIII's encyclical Rerum Novarum [The Workers' Charter] of 1891, which had been inspired by examples of practical social action on the continent, prompted many people of social conscience to seek reforms based on Christian principles. In England several priests and lay men and women met in Manchester in 1909 and founded the Catholic Social Guild. Its primary objectives were to facilitate contacts between students and workers, to apply Catholic teaching in actual social conditions, and to cultivate public interest in social questions. Fr Charles Plater, a young Jesuit priest, was the visionary among the group, Mgr Henry Parkinson, rector of Oscott, its chairman, G.C.King, its secretary, Leslie Toke, a Fabian socialist, its treasurer, and Fr J. Lomax and Mrs Virginia Crawford, the respective organising secretaries of its northern and southern committees. Other founding members included James Britten, founder of the Catholic Truth Society in 1884, George Eliot Anstruther, president of the Catholic Young Men's Society, Margaret Fletcher, founder of the Catholic Women's League, and Mrs Philip Gibbs.

At first the Guild sought to promote its objectives through publishing, circulating pamphlets and leaflets, lending books for study, establishing branches, training tutors, forming study groups, and enlisting influential support. With the encouragement of the bishops, notably Bishop Casartelli of Salford, and with the co-operation of established Catholic lay organisations, such as the Society of St Vincent De Paul, the Catholic Young Men's Society, the Ladies of Charity, the Catholic Federations, the Catholic Women's League, the Catholic Truth Society, as well as The British Institute of Social Service, the Guild soon spread throughout the country. Immediate publicity was obtained through an article by Fr Plater in the November 1909 edition of The Month on 'A Catholic Society of Social Study' and a CTS pamphlet on Catholics and Social Study.

Once established, the Guild soon embarked on several substantial publications. Its first Catholic Social Year Book appeared in 1910, and there followed a series of study manuals, text books, CTS pamphlets on contemporary social problems (23 were issued before 1914), and group study course notes, such as Mgr Parkinson's Primer of Social Science (1913). Spiritual retreats, 'the basis for social work', were also arranged for members. Programmes for Guild action were proposed in such fields as suffrage and representation, old age pensions, worker's compensation, reform of the Poor Law, family health, better housing, a living wage, employment prospects, and training for social work. Among early text books were Ideals of Charity (1908) and The Church and The Worker (1916) by Mrs Crawford, First Notions of Social Science (1913) by Mrs Philip Gibbs, The Gospel and the Citizen (1917) by Fr Martindale, and The Christian Family (1921) by Margaret Fletcher. The year books were transformed in 1916 from collections of essays into volumes devoted to single subjects: National Reconstruction (1916), Catholics in England: Their Needs and Opportunities (1917), A Christian Crusade (1918), A Handbook for Social Study (1923), A Code of Social Principles (1929), and Catholic Social Action 1891-1931 (1933), while the 1931 papal encyclical Quadragesimo Anno was given maximum coverage. The Guild also published a Quarterly Bulletin and in 1921 launched a monthly periodical The Christian Democrat, and from 1935 to 1959 published The Catholic Worker.

Such were some of the early endeavours of The Guild which between the Wars was one of the most active Catholic lay societies engaging thousands of Catholic students, workers and ordinary parishioners learning in formal college education, diocesan and local study groups, and in parish discussions about Catholic social teaching and how it could be applied in actual living and working conditions. But Fr Plater, as early as 1909, had another vision, that of a Catholic college where working men and women could study the Church's teaching at an academic level so that they could return home and provide leadership in their workplaces and in local movements for social reform. The Guild moved its offices from London to Oxford in 1919, Fr Plater died in 1921, and his memorial was the foundation of The Catholic Workers College, which began in October 1921 with Fr Leo O'Hea SJ as principal and three students. From 1922 it occupied houses in Walton Well Road, Oxford, but in 1953 moved to Boars Hill and was renamed Plater Hall. Finally, in 1975 it transferred to its present well-designed buildings and campus at Headington and flourishes as Plater College.

Under Fr O'Hea's guidance (1921-1953), the College developed good relations with Oxford University, allowing its students access to lectures and diploma examinations, and in 1925 it was recognised by the Board of Education. Its students were then mostly working class men and women sponsored by Catholic societies, dioceses, firms, and a mixture of private and parish funds, and many later played a significant role in local Catholic public life, Pat Bartley (1909-1959) being elected MP for Chester le Street in 1950. The annual Summer Schools were popular occasions for re-unions, lectures by leading Catholics, study sessions, and valuable meetings of Guild members throughout the country. Fr O'Hea was also active in fostering international contacts with leaders of Catholic social action in Europe, supporting League of Nations and other initiatives for peace, and combatting Fascism and Communism.

Fr O'Hea was followed as principal in 1953 by Fr Charles Pridgeon SJ (1953-1958), and then by Fr Charles Waterhouse SJ, Denis Chiles, Joe Kirwan and Michael Blades, the present principal, the last two having both been students of the College.

Among notable Guild activists and supporters during the inter-Wars and post-War years were Maurice Leahy, its secretary, Joseph Thorman, Bishop of Hexham and Newcastle, its president in the 1930s, Fr Lewis Watts SJ, Fr Vincent McNabb OP, Barbara Ward, Dr Letitia Fairfield, Margaret Leys, principal of St Anne's College, Oxford, Fr Andrew Gordon SJ, Professor Michael Fogarty, and Fr Paul Crane SJ, who transformed The Christian Democrat into a lively journal.

With the inauguration of the Welfare State after the 1939-1945 War, many of the reforms for which the Guild had campaigned seemed to have been, or were likely to be, achieved, and there were divided opinions as to the Guild's attitude to issues which had become heavily politicised. The purpose of the Guild came to be questioned and after much heart searching the hierarchy decided in 1959 to reconstitute it on diocesan lines. The Guild has since ceased to exist. However, many perennial social problems persist and new ones have emerged and in the absence of a national organisation like the Guild these are being countered by determined Church and inter-Church initiatives. The history of the Guild is well recorded in Catholic Social Action in Britain 1909-1959: A History of the Catholic Social Guild, by J.M.Cleary, published by the Guild in 1961.

When the Guild came to an end Plater College adjusted well to the changed circumstances, broadened its courses, and came to attract a wider range of students. Even so, it continues to fulfil the fundamental objectives of the Guild's founders by providing men and women from all walks of life with the opportunity of understanding the problems of contemporary society through academic study of the social sciences and the application and development of the Church's social teaching.

The surviving records of the Catholic Social Guild and The Catholic Workers College are held at Plater College, Oxford. They are presently being listed but may be inspected by qualified researchers on application to The Principal, Plater College, Pullens Lane, Oxford, OX3 ODT. The following is a select summary of their contents, as arranged at the moment.

DOMINICAN CONGREGATION OF ST. CATHERINE OF SIENA OF NEWCASTLE NATAL S AFRICA

Sister Eleanora Murphy O.P

ORIGIN:

Our roots go back to Augsburg, Bavaria, to the convent of St Ursula. St Ursula's was founded as a Beguinage in 1335 and affiliated to the Dominican Order in 1349. In spite of attempts to make the Sisters apostatise at the Reformation and forcing them to leave their convent they regrouped later and assisted in the restoration of other Dominican convents in Germany. On the 14th of September 1877 a pioneer group left Augsburg for South Africa and reached King William's Town, Cape Province on the 22nd of October 1877. It was at this convent that Agnes Niland, our Foundress, sought admission in August 1880 and was professed on the 25th of January 1882 having been given the name Sr M Rose

Sr M Rose was a great asset to the German speaking King William's Town community being fluent in English, French and Afrikaans. She taught Music and Art, was appointed Novice Mistress and sent to East London and then to the Transvaal to Potchefstroom to a new venture where a school was established. That convent was under the jurisdiction of the King William's Town foundation. Sr M Rose was then asked to establish a hospital at Klerksdorp. Problems of communication and the obtaining of permission for everything hindered the work. The situation worsened and after praying and taking advice Sr Rose decided to seek a transfer. She was warmly welcomed by the Oakford Congregation, an autonomous offshoot of King William's Town. The Oakford Congregation made a foundation in Newcastle Natal in 1891 and Sr M Rose was assigned there but by 1896 the school was in financial difficulties as the expected development of the coal industry had not materialised and a decision was taken to close the school. Bishop Jolivet of Natal knew that would be a retrograde step preventing the growth of the Catholic Church in an area where it had but a tenuous hold. Bishop Jolivet and Mother Gabriel of Oakford went to Newcastle on the 30th of January 1896 and the Bishop records in his

Journal:

"I arrived at Newcastle at about 9a.m. (I held) canonical visitation of the community. The separation of the house of Newcastle from that of Oakford was decided and Mother Rose was elected Prioress of Newcastle."

and so our Congregation was born.

The sisters were asked individually whether they wished to return to Oakford or remain in Newcastle as members of an independent Congregation under Bishop Jolivet. Five sisters chose to remain and three returned to Oakford. It was on the 31st of January 1896 that the new Congregation of Saint Catherine of Siena of Newcastle Natal was launched. Mother Rose was installed as Prioress and the community of six accepted responsibility for the development of the new foundation in Newcastle and for the debts it carried.

Subsequently Mother Rose went to Europe to seek for helpers, financial assistance and contact with the Dominican Brethren in Rome. Postulants came, the work expanded but the outbreak of the Boer War saw the Sisters and children dispersed as refugees. Education was the principal apostolate and subsequently schools were built in the Transvaal and Natal. Mission stations were set up, medical aid given, the kraals visited and catechesis given. The Sisters provided education in South Africa from pre-school to Teacher Training until the Bantu Education Act of 1953 finally led to withdrawal from zoned areas. The loss of grants for the Mission Schools in the Apartheid years curtailed the work and led to closure. Some convents were handed over to congregations of African Sisters that the work might continue.

There was expansion to England, Canada and the United States. Diminishing numbers of Sisters, in the eighties, meant rationalisation of resources and a moving away from previous major involvements. All schools in England were handed over to the local Diocese who became the trustees of what was formerly Congregation property. Alert to the changing needs of Church and people the Sisters in Europe and South Africa have entered into diversified collaborative ministries.

The Congregation has never been large numerically; the total at the close of 1999 was 151 sisters. We are fortunate to have as much as we have in our Archives since Rosary Priory received a direct hit during the bombing in 1940 and our South African Mother House was destroyed in the Boer War.

ARCHIVES: The Archives are housed in the Generalate at Rosary Priory, Elstree Road, Bushey, Watford, Herts WD23 4EE. There is a Heritage Room in Boksburg, Gauteng, South Africa and in the Niland Centre, at Rosary Priory, Bushey containing artifacts and memorabilia.

CONTENTS: The contents of the Archives are housed in steel cabinets and wooden chests and box files in a long bright room which was at one time the oratory. The Inventory is divided into Sections and Sub Headings.

OAKFORD DOMINICANS IN ENGLAND

Sr Carmen Brokamp OP

The Congregation of the Dominican Sisters of Oakford was founded in South Africa in March 1889, at the request of Bishop Charles Jolivet, O.M.I. from Natal, when eight sisters from the Dominican Sisters at King Williams Town arrived in Oakford.

On May 30, 1890 these sisters were declared independent of King Williams Town. Thus was begun the CONGREGATION OF THE DOMINICAN SISTERS OF ST CATHERINE OF SIENA OF OAKFORD, NATAL.

At the first General Chapter of the Congregation in March 1919, the opening of a House in England or Ireland was decided on. It was to serve as a probation House for postulants offering themselves for the religious life in our Congregation.

In 1919 a property had been advertised for sale at Wimborne, Plymouth Diocese, in the south of England. Refugee Nuns from France, who had bought it during the war years, now wished to return home. Mother Joseph Ryan, the Prioress General of Oakford, accompanied by Sr Angela Clare, left in May to inspect the property, but it was found to be unsuitable. As there was nothing else viewed in that Diocese as being suitable, the two travellers left for Ireland. When they alighted from the train in Dublin, Sister Angela was approached by a priest who was on leave from England. He wanted to know all about them, who they were, and why they had come from South Africa. This priest happened to be lodging at the same place as Mgr O'Grady, the Vicar General of the Brentwood Diocese, and as the Priest discussed over dinner table that night his meeting with the two South African Dominicans, Mgr O'Grady pricked up his ears. He was in Ireland for the expressed purpose of seeking a Community who would open a school in a Parish he was planning to form in the small village of Chingford. The next morning he made an appointment to meet our two travellers. That was the remote introduction to Chingford. In a few days time the Sisters returned to England, and when Mgr O'Grady showed them the house in Forest View, he said to Mother Joseph, "this house was made for you, Mother Joseph". The price asked was £4,000 (four thousand pounds). Negotiations began at once with Oakford. It took a few months, the money was not available, until Bishop Delalle O.M.I. from Durban came to England to inspect the house. He cabled to Durban, that the money needed to be raised and sent.

The first four sisters, Mother Joseph Ryan and Sr Angela Clare as well as Srs Francis Xavier Cullen and Declan Hannigan, who had come from South Africa to be the first teachers in the school, took possession of the house in January 1921. The house was dedicated to Our Lady of the Holy Rosary.

CHINGFORD

In 1921, Chingford was founded as a Probation House for applicants for the Novitiate. Permission to open a Novitiate was granted in 1924. By order of the Apostolic Delegate for South Africa, Archbishop Gylswijk OP, it was to be a joint Novitiate for the three Dominican Congregations, Oakford, King Williams Town and Salisbury. Mother Margaret Mary Murphy was sent from Oakford to Chingford as Novice Mistress. This joint Novitiate lasted only for three years.

In 1921 the Convent School was opened, classes with the first eight pupils were held in the Church, as there was no Parish Priest assigned. In 1928 a priest took up his residence and wanted to reserve the Blessed Sacrament in the Church, therefore, the school could no longer be in the Church. The sisters, overnight, removed the furniture to the convent and the 40 pupils were transferred there. The school, known as "St Dominic's Convent School", soon blossomed. In 1929 the Elementary School, known as "St Mary's School", was opened.

During World War II the school buildings were taken over by the military, but they vacated it as unsuitable a fortnight later. But meanwhile the sisters at the Elementary School were evacuated with their pupils to Chelmsford as Chingford was considered very much in the War Zone. Parents of the Convent School Pupils also begged that their children would be evacuated under the care of the Sisters. Eventually a house was secured for their accommodation at Stinchcombe, near Dursley in Gloucestershire. It was the home of Evelyn Waugh, the convert author.

In 1940 a second evacuation took place at Wolverhampton with Sisters and pupils from the Elementary school, but the Convent school carried on at St Dominic's and was miraculously protected from the bombings and raids. On May 7 the announcement was made that the Second World War had come to an end and after that the sisters and pupils eventually could return to Chingford.

In July 1959, St Dominic's Convent School was closed, after it had been open for 37 years. The building was taken over by the diocese, temporarily, and known as St Paul's Modern Secondary School, however, some of our sisters were still teaching there until the new school site was blessed at Woodford in 1964.

1963 marks the beginning of Youth work when Father Brennan brought nine young girls for a five days' Craft and Cooking course. In October 35 young ladies attended a retreat given at the Convent. This was all in the interest of Vocation work for which many prayers were being said at the Convent. In 1964 the former St Dominic's was converted into a Retreat House, known as Walsingham House. On April 2, 1965, Walsingham House was officially opened as a

by Bishop Wall of Brentwood. Youth work began in earnest and without stop, for in no time the whole year was booked.

In 1983 the community at Chingford moved into Walsingham House and the convent was sold.

In 1985 St Joseph's was sold and Walsingham leased to the Diocese for ten years. In 1996 Walsingham was sold to the Diocese.

In April 1986 the community of sisters left Chingford after 65 years of service to the people in the diocese and moved to Burghwallis.

CHIPPING NORTON

In 1949 our sisters took over the parish school of Chipping Norton, Oxfordshire, from the Notre Dame Sisters. It was considered, that there was much opportunity for this kind of work in the poorer districts of England. The sisters served in this district for 11 years. On July 29, 1960 our sisters were withdrawn from Chipping Norton.

KESWICK

On January 2, 1968 four Sisters left Chingford for Keswick, Cumberland, to take up Youth Work in that district, in Lakeside House. They had responded to the invitation of Fr O'Dea. In 1970 the diocese bought the Hotel "Castlerigg Manor" and this became the Youth Centre. The gate lodge became the convent for the sisters. For a good twelve years the sisters were engaged in the work at the Youth Centre and taking care of the house. On May 23, 1980 our sisters were withdrawn from Keswick.

PRESTON

In 1971 our sisters were invited to come to Preston, to assist in serving the new Youth Centre in Preston and teach in the Bl. Cuthbert Mayne School. They first lived with the Little Sisters of the Poor until they were able, in December, to move into a semi-detached rented house in St Joseph's Parish. Soon the sisters were also involved in the Parish work and visiting.

In 1974 the sisters moved into the newly built convent at 150 Fletcher Road. There our sisters are still today, involved in the parish, teaching and nursing.

ASHURST

In 1980 seven sisters requested to separate from the congregation and form their own independent congregation. They moved into the lodge at Chingford, being on "leave of absence".

In December 1981, after many negotiations, the sisters in the lodge were given permission for the establishment of an "experiential community" for some years. With that five sisters moved to Ashurst, to begin their new life. They ran a retreat centre there, belonging to the Montfort Fathers. In 1987 a house was bought at Ashurst, as convent for the sisters there.

After the experiential time, the sisters officially asked for separation, which was granted by Rome in 1994. We wish them well and God's blessing in their new endeavour.

PINNER

In 1983 a house was bought in Pinner and four sisters moved into it. The apostolate was parish work, training of catechists and visiting the people in the parish. A community is still living in 34 Love Lane, Pinner, involved in ecumenical programmes and parish work.

ST ANNES'S REST HOME, BURGHWALLIS

In 1985 it was decided to purchase St Anne's in Burghwallis. St Anne's was a rest home for the elderly and our sisters took over the management and care of the people. The place was also used for retreats, diocesan meetings and prayer meetings of various groups.

In 1993 A Board of Trustees was formed of which the Hallam Caring Services were part.

In 1997 it became clear that we were no longer able to continue our work at St Anne's Rest Home at Burghwallis. It was sold to the Rt Rev Bishop John Rawsthorne of the Diocese of Hallam. On March 6, 1998, a solemn handing over of the keys of St Anne's to the Diocese took place. There are still some of our sisters in the home as residents and/or care-giver. We are very grateful to have this haven of care for our elderly sisters.

ADDITIONAL INFORMATION

The General Administration of the Congregation is situated in Johannesburg, here in South Africa. Here we have details of and documentation of our Congregation.

At present the Secretary of the Congregation is in charge of the archives in the Generalate.

There are other well kept Archives in Germany in our Provincial House in Neustadt / Main.

There are no archives kept in England, except for personal documents of members in the English District, Minutes of Council Meetings, Financial Statements and Title Deeds of our properties.

Another place where historical data, photographs and exhibits are kept is in our Motherhouse at Oakford in Kwa-Zulu Natal in South Africa. This is kept more in a Museum Style.

Our Archives are by no means complete. We would like to have had more time and energy to spend on the project. So any request for possible access for research would have to go via the Secretary of the Congregation at Bedfordview. P.O. Box 48, Bedfordview, Transvaal, 2008, Republic of South Africa

THE CONGREGATION OF THE SISTERS OF ST ANNE

Sister Ethel Hudson S.S.A.

1. Diocesan Congregation
2. Founded January 1927 in the Pontificate of Pope Pius XI
3. Name of Foundress

Secular Name: Florence Grace Gordon-Smith

Religious Name: Sister Mary Agnes. 1st Vows 26/7/27

Born: August 21 1881. Died September 4 1961

4. Second Approbation with Perpetual Vows granted by Pope Pius XII in 1947.

EARLY WORK OF MISS F.G.GORDON-SMITH

In 1905 Miss Gordon-Smith worked as a volunteer social worker and nurse in Hoxton, N.London. (She had previously trained as a nurse in order to fulfil her longing to help those more unfortunate than herself who lived in deprivation and poverty all round her.) She had recently become a Catholic. In 1911 she moved to St. Anne's Parish, Vauxhall and was introduced to Bishop Brown of Pella, Auxiliary Bishop of Southwark, who was also parish priest of St. Anne's. With his permission and under the Patronage of Bishop Brown, she, with some companions around her (trained nurses, social workers and one teacher), brought St. Anne's Settlement into being.

This comprised an Infant Welfare and Children's Clinic, Home Visiting, and Nursing, and a Catholic Women's Guild. A free Refugee Hostel was also opened for needy girls which eventually ran for ten years, in which 2,000 girls were assisted. The work continued until 1927. A suggestion had been made to Miss Gordon-Smith that this work should be made permanent by the formation of a Religious Congregation. Previous to this Sister Smith had tried her vocation twice with existing Congregations but had left, convinced that this was not where she was intended to be. After much soul searching and prayer, and with the assistance of Fr. Steuart S.J., letters of introduction were given to Miss Gordon-Smith, and she and a companion went to Rome. They were received by Pope Pius XI, and the first Approbation for the new Congregation was given, and the name of Agnes given to Sister Gordon-Smith on 21st January 1927, the Feast of St. Agnes. Some others joined them from time to time and numbers increased. The work of the few (now religious) Sisters was continued in conjunction with St. Anne's Catholic Settlement, and the infant Congregation nurtured and sustained by Fr Steuart. This is evident from the numbers of Spiritual Conferences he gave and his wise advice to Mother Agnes in drawing up The Rule and Constitutions.

In 1928 a new Convent was opened at Union Rd, Rotherhithe, at the invitation of Fr Leahy, who knew M. Agnes at Vauxhall. In 1929 Fr Steuart S.J. arranged for M. Agnes to meet M.M. Visitation, a Good Shepherd nun from Finchley. This resulted in M.M. Visitation becoming the Congregation's first Novice Mistress in Harleyford Rd on September 30th 1930.

In January 1932 a House was rented in Lingfield Road Wimbledon to accommodate aspirants to the Congregation. As numbers increased No.14 The Downs at Wimbledon was purchased for them. Plans were considered to extend No.14 and in 1938 permission from Rome was required and given to borrow £2,000. No. 12 The Downs came on the market then and was bought by the Congregation. This House became St. Teresa's Home which was opened in October 1938 to accommodate people of small means suffering from terminal cancer and heart disease. In 1941 a Children's Ward was added there to relieve London Hospitals during the War. In 1948 changes in the NHS resulted in the Home being converted to a Maternity Hospital with 23 beds. Extensions to the (now) Hospital were carried out bringing the number of beds to 70, until in 1967 the NHS terminated their contract with the Hospital on opening their own unit in Roehampton. During its life time St. Teresa's had recognised courses in obstetric training and Pupil Midwives Part 2 Certificate. In 1986 due to financial problems the Hospital closed. 36,945 babies had been born there.

His Holiness Pope John Paul 11 visited Southwark in 1982. He encouraged the Religious 'not to neglect your sick and elderly'

In 1987 The Congregation opened St Teresa's Home for the Elderly in Lansdowne Rd Wimbledon. This house was converted from what was a Formation House. This was moved to 14a The Downs.

A foundation was made in Plymouth in 1932 at the request of Dr Barrett, Bishop of Plymouth. The Sisters started work in six Parishes, and still continue but are limited by lack of personnel.

In 1954 Bishop Cowderoy gave permission for the Sisters to take on a Hospital in the N.R. of Ghana. This was run successfully and became a well equipped 100 bedded unit. Extensive Clinics in Damongo with a forty mile radius were carried out, and the conversion of the people to Christianity followed the good work. The Hospital was transferred to the Sisters of the Holy Spirit in 1976.

A Convent was opened in Menevia Diocese in Wales in 1963, and the Sisters worked on the Travelling Mission. A Convent was opened in Eglwysfach, moved to Machynlleth in 1964, then to Tywyn. A convent at Pontlanfraith was forced to close, and work in Wales sadly ceased in 1986 due to lack of Vocations.

In 1938 the Spanish Recollects at Honiton made an urgent request for the Sisters to open a school, there being no Catholic School in the area. The Sisters opened a small school in Ottery St Mary in 1938, and, as teaching is not a permanent part of their work, handed over the school to the Marist Sisters in 1942, with sixty pupils on the roll.

REVISION OF THE RULE, CONSTITUTIONS AND DIRECTORY.

In 1980 this Revision was delivered to the Archbishop for his approbation. In January 1986 all was received from the printers.

INSPIRATION AND DEDICATION OF THE CONGREGATION

Mother Mary Agnes Gordon-Smith was inspired by Our Lord's own words from the Cross SITIO - I Thirst - a thirst for souls. "Lord, give me souls and take all else" was constantly on her lips.

Conscious of her mission as "being sent" and of her desire to live the spirit of Christ, she wished that those who joined her should, like herself, spend themselves in seeking and helping the poor and suffering, whether this poverty and suffering be of the body or of the soul. This apostolate was to be carried out mainly in the Parish context since the Parish is the nucleus of the Church. But she wished her Sisters to be 'Sisters of the Hour', mindful of changing times, and ever open to the immediate needs of the Church since, as our original Rule says: "The aim of the Congregation is to be broad and adaptable."

We honour St. Anne as our special Patron, and ask her to look upon us as her children, and from her place in Heaven to be mindful of us and help us as on earth she minded and helped her daughter Mary, the Immaculate Virgin Mother of God.

As active apostolic religious, we live in community and take vows of consecrated chastity, obedience and poverty, observing them in the way defined in our Constitutions. As Sisters of St. Anne we seek to understand and grow in the spirit which our Foundress wished to see in those who joined her:

GENEROSITY-

The constant theme of her Conferences from the earliest—"Let us be a very generous Congregation, generous in prayer, generous in the entire gift of ourselves" (1.6.29) to "Gold, the gift of self, to be as great and unreserved as we have the grace to make it" (Epiphany 1960).

GRATITUDE-

This generosity was to find its source in an intense spirit of gratitude. "Quid retribuam?" How shall I repay the Lord for his goodness to me?" was often on her lips, and equally often Julian of Norwich's saying "Love is repaid by love alone."

SIMPLICITY-

Her ideal Sister of St. Anne was to make "simplicity her aim in all things, extending to simplicity in her Convent, Convent Chapel, Habit and way of life"(undated Conference). She declared that "the works the Sisters are doing will only succeed when their lives are seen to be simple" (letter to a Sister 1938); and she left as her final recommendation "Simplicity to be the key and watchword of our dear Congregation".

ATTITUDE TO OUR APOSTOLATE-

She stressed from the beginning that "we have bound ourselves to a life of service, the way of suffering with those who suffer, mourning with those who mourn . We are to do all in our power to fit ourselves to be of real assistance". But first and foremost we are to remember that "if we would wish to bring souls to Christ we must be prepared to follow in His footsteps and grow more like Him, bearing the Cross with and for Him". (All quotations from Conference of 3.8.28). She summed up the ideal we must set before us in the lines:

"May I so fashioned to His likeness be

That men in me my Saviour's image see" (Quoted in Conference of 24/7/53)

CONGREGATION OF THE SISTERS OF ST. ANNE

When engaged in apostolic work and on formal liturgical occasions we wear a habit, uniform in general appearance and a veil "by which we show that we are totally given to Christ the Lord, and dedicated to the service of the Church. Habit and Veil are blue. A uniform silver crucifix is always worn. CONST.22

HOMILY DELIVERED AT HORNBY, JULY 15TH 2001,
ON THE OCCASION OF THE 150 ANNIVERSARY OF THE DEATH OF JOHN LINGARD.

Peter Phillips, Shrewsbury.

John Lingard walked for the last time here in his garden on Easter Sunday 1851, looking at the saplings he had planted out from acorns provided by his oak, itself once an acorn picked up by Lingard on the shores of Lake Trasimene. It has grown hale and hearty in the last hundred and fifty years, as has the community it might be thought to represent. It belongs: it flourishes in the place, in pace with the highs and lows of our British seasons. He would have been glad.

The following day he took to his bed. His last years had been dogged by illness which brought considerable pain, and cataract which made reading in anything but the brightest light more and more difficult. It was met with a characteristic lack of self-pity and a humour marked with what we might now consider an overly brash and Georgian delight in the vagaries of our internal systems. Increasing difficulty in breathing made it more convenient to spend those last days and nights propped up on the sofa in his library and there, amidst his books, he died just before midnight on July 17th 1851. He had been missionary in this parish for forty years and, to the end, he had reflected on Catholic life in this country with a gentle and probing irony. In the months before his final illness, he witnessed the restoration of the hierarchy, and his pupil Nicholas Wiseman - now a Cardinal and Archbishop of Westminster - with wry humour. 'I always thought it ridiculous myself because Westminster was a bishopric created by Henry VIII, and to make it an archbishopric for Catholics would be strange.'

But Westminster and its See is now a familiar part of Catholic, and not only Catholic, life in the country, a result, in some ways, of Lingard's contribution to a subtle redefinition of what it means to be English and a Catholic. The whole course of Lingard's life marked a period of transition for the Catholic community and Lingard himself had played a major part in this. He was born in Winchester on February 5th 1771 before the first Penal Laws had been struck from the Statute Book, and during a summer break from Douai had joined his father in signing the required oath of loyalty to George III in 1791. He was a few years short of fifty before the process was complete and he could write to congratulate Charles Butler on the part he had played in bringing about Catholic emancipation in 1829.

John Lingard had entered the English College, Douai, as a schoolboy of eleven, to escape for home in 1793 amidst the turmoil of the French Revolution and War. He was a key figure in the gathering of the northern exiles from Douai and in the difficult journey towards the setting up of a new English seminary at Crook Hall and Ushaw, the seminary which still contributes so much to the Church in the North. A visit to Rome in 1817 meant that he was at hand to play a part in the reopening of the Venerabile after the ravages of the French occupation of Rome. It was at Crook that he was ordained deacon, but he travelled down to the Bar Convent in York for ordination as priest in April 1795.

At Crook, Lingard wrote his first book, a study of the Anglo-Saxon Church, in which he is at pains to show how Christianity brings culture and civilisation together with its promise of salvation, and is as keen, quietly and subtly to undermine an aggressive approach to the English Church on the part of Rome, as he was to indicate England's long-standing links with the See of Peter. Lingard always preferred to work in the wings than to strut in the lime-light. He found a home and good neighbours in Hornby. He did his most important work here. The quiet daily round of service to his flock and the life of scholarship he found congenial: for this he turned down bishoprics and academic appointments. He was a valued advisor to the bishops as well as to laity, a forthright controversialist, and a warm friend. If he had been prepared to give up Hornby for Rome in 1826, I think there is little doubt that Leo XII would have made him a Cardinal. Whether he became a Cardinal in petto, who knows, he certainly enjoyed sharing the tale in the more expansive mood of old age.

He it was who built the Chapel here, out of the profits of the first volumes of his History. 'Henry VIII's chapel', he joked, because his study of that king had paid the bills. He shared what he had earned generously. He preferred liturgy to be intelligible and attractive both to the Catholic community and to Protestant visitors, disliking repetitious litanies and flowery metaphor. He wanted his congregation to understand and follow the celebration of Mass. There is little doubt that he would have approved the liturgical changes of Vatican II. He sought simplicity, disdaining both the mediaevalism of Pugin's Gothic Revival and the unwarranted pomp that often accompanied the opening of churches, the church being 'turned into an opera house' and the bishop performing as the first dancer in the ballet'. Perhaps he might have approved of this Mass in English, here in his beloved garden. Of course, it is to him we owe one of the most beloved of English hymns, his translation of the Ave Maris Stella, Hail Queen of Heaven, which has survived into our modern repertory of hymns while many a Victorian contribution has been quietly laid to rest.

A public controversialist, an historian who sought to include, rather than exclude, the Catholic in the pattern of our English history, an ironic observer of all types and conditions of people, the most unclerical of clerics. Though he bore not fools gladly, he approached others always with a delicate respect, numbering non-Catholics among friends and correspondents. Both Henry Brougham, who became Lord Chancellor in the Whig administration which saw the Reform Bill through Parliament, and the Tory, James Scarlett, Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer looked forward to the chance of sharing Lingard's table when they were travelling North. It is interesting to compare his support for the convert Mary Sanders in her difficulties with her family with his letters to Hannah Joyce, a Liverpool Unitarian: there is no attempt to convert Miss Joyce, though there is a little gentle teasing of her as a heretic. He liked nothing more than a quiet evening with the Anglican priest across the road, who on his death bequeathed his pets into Lingard's care. Hornby has one of the few Anglican churches where there is a monument to the local Catholic priest and it attests his ecumenical sensitivity. At the end of one of his early works, he wrote: 'Did I want an epitaph on my tomb, it would be. 'Here lies an advocate for the union of Christians' although we must confess that this remark might not be quite what it seems.

As we stand at the foot of this great oak, we give thanks together for the stock whence we have sprung and it is well done. Because of such a one as John Lingard we can acknowledge deep roots. Sure of our past, we have the courage to embrace our future with prayerful confidence.

BOOK REVIEWS

Madeleine Sophie Barat (1779-1865): A Life, Phil Kilroy, Cork University Press, 550pp , £30, ISBN 1-85918-114-7

This biography of Sophie Barat is to be recommended on many levels.

Drawing on the rich archival resources of the Society of the Sacred Heart, the public archives of France and Italy, the archives of the Archdiocese of Paris and the Diocese of Amiens, the Society of Jesus and the Vatican, Madeleine Sophie Barat: A Life is well documented throughout and this historical material serves as springboard for modern psychological insight and discussion of Sophie Barat's painful spiritual journey and mode of governance.

In terms of the historical period there is not only the struggle between Ultramontanism and Gallicanism, but insights into the problems facing the Society of Jesus who feared for themselves if those associated with them fell foul of public opinion, whilst those associated with them feared lest that association damn them too. Most interesting of all is the picture which emerges of the influence on women religious of the Camaldolite monk, Pope Gregory XVI who never concealed his desire to impose papal cloister.

Phil Kilroy's account of the tensions, rivalries and betrayals within the Society of the Sacred Heart in the early years is given in some detail, and the primary sources for the most part speak for themselves. The struggle between Eugénie de Gramont and Archbishop de Quelen on the one hand and Sophie Barat on the other, between P. Rozaven SJ and a group of General Councillors on the one hand and Sophie Barat on the other, are such that reading it for the first time one can only marvel at Sophie Barat's perseverance. The schism plotted by Rozaven and Elizabeth Galitzine moves along inexorably until the death of the latter, a death of such anguish, pain and desolation that its effect on the imagination is well nigh unbearable.

Sophie Barat's journey from a harsh, narrow Jansenism to the warm loving presence of the Sacred Heart of Jesus was not straightforward. The early formation given her by her brother Louis left its mark to such an extent that, although her Constitutions 'contained beautiful sections on the love of God revealed in the Heart of Christ, these had yet to be experienced by Sophie herself in her own life.' (P.215) For a long time she struggled to undo the image of God and herself which had been inculcated.

There is much here for the student of educational philosophy and methodology; much for the student of models of religious governance; much too for others whose Congregations were founded in the early nineteenth century, for names such as Varin, Rozaven, Roothan and Affre abound.

Diocese of Paisley 1947-1997, Rev. Bernard J. Canning FSA Scot. 291pp. 88 photographs £12 (plus p&p) St Paul's Multimedia shop, 5A-7 Royal Exchange Square, Glasgow, G1 3AH

This book, published in 2000, marks the Golden Jubilee of the Diocese of Paisley, and contains a wealth of information and interesting detail, both historical and biographical. The Foreword refers to the work as telling the story of how (the Church's) 'mission and ministry have been carried on in a particular place in the course of about 1400 years.' Clearly modern times are treated in more detail than earlier ones and in addition to the overall sweep there are chapters on the three Bishops of Paisley and sections on each parish in the Diocese; there is too a brief biography of every priest who has served in the last fifty years, and a section on each of the various Religious Congregations.

The Appendices no less than the main text make interesting reading with their sections on Statistical Returns (including Condon's Statistics: 1808-1868), Episcopal Arms, brief tributes to individuals based on the Catholic Directory for Scotland, and a synopsis of some of the Pastoral Letters of the present bishop, Bishop John Mone. The photographs are varied including individuals (clerical and lay), events, celebrations at home and abroad. The Index is a more than ordinarily useful tool since it includes all Colleges, Parishes, relevant Popes, Priests, Religious Orders and Schools.

The bibliography and 'Other Sources' are valuable signposts for others wishing to research this area. The Vatican Archives, the Roman archives of Colleges and Congregations, Glasgow Archdiocesan records (though strangely there is no reference to Paisley Diocesan records), Corporation of Paisley Minutes are only some of the references given.

'Criticism', writes the author in his Preface, 'is usually negative and often from small minds.' Such a statement scarcely emboldens one to write. Nonetheless, the lack of uniformity in the size and font of chapter headings is confusing and a plethora of abbreviations does not make for 'smooth' reading. Only on Page 255 is the mystery of 'Gr'ork' solved. 'Pais', given the title of the book, is perhaps more obvious but it does detract from the overall effect.

Echoes in the Playground - a history of St Peter's Catholic School in Doncaster. Anne Whitehead, Exeter: Bogdanovic Books, 2000

The history of St Peter's School starts with the founding of a Catholic mission in Doncaster, followed closely by the school. The author then relates in detail the history of the school, its teachers, the epidemics, the establishment of the industries which led to a demand for more school places and the further development of Doncaster. The period covered is from 1833 to 1999 when the school celebrated its 125 years within the state education system.

The author was herself a pupil of the school and her mother was a teacher for a time before her marriage. The author was able to visit a number of ex-pupils and brings to the history, in the final chapter, a series of 'recollections' which adds another dimension to this extremely interesting book. It is well-written and illustrated and is useful not only as a history of the school but of the town and the Catholic community as well.

The book has a soft cover, 191 pages and 66 illustrations, is indexed and includes ten appendices and 91 notes and references. It is available from Anne Bogdanovic, 113 Okehampton Road, St Thomas, Exeter, Devon EX4 1 EP, and costs £5 plus £1.80 UK postage and packing. (AGB)

The Story of 'Ince Blundell Hall - a short history of the house and the Weld-Blundell family, Canonesses of St Augustine Hospitallers of the Mercy of Jesus, Privately published, [2001]

This booklet gives a brief history of Ince Blundell Hall which, after centuries in the possession of one family, is now a nursing home for retired priests and laity. The first part gives a description of the various rooms and the modifications which have been made since its purchase by the Augustinian Sisters. There runs through this section the names of the various members of the family and details about them. The second part of the booklet gives a detailed family history of Thomas Weld-Blundell (1808-1887) and his twelve children.

The booklet is forty pages long and has both coloured and black and white photographs. It is available from Sister Laura, Ince Blundell Hall, Back O'Th'Town Lane, Liverpool L38 6JL. It costs £3.44 which includes UK postage; cheques should be made payable to Ince Blundell Hall. (AGB)

Biography of The English Benedictines. Athanasius Allanson OSB, Ampleforth Abbey Library. ISBN 0 9518173 4 5 pp xv + 476. Price £32 or $50. Postage £4.00 (Britain) £7.00 or $12.00 (abroad)

Some years ago the Abbey Library started a small series of pamphlets (The Saint Laurence Papers) to enable them to publish various texts which existed in their archives, or in connection with them, with a view to making them more accessible, and also protecting them to some extent from too much use. They have now added to this series a much larger work, Allanson's Biography, a manuscript dating from the 1850s, which gives an account of all the English Benedictine monks known between the revival of English monasticism (about 1600) and the nineteenth century. It forms a valuable resource for historians and there is much quotation of original documents.

Almost nine hundred monks are included, covering a large tract of English Catholic history. Among them are Feckenham, last Abbot of Westminster, Walmesley, who consecrated John Carroll, the first US Bishop, in 1790, Chandler, perhaps the first American Benedictine (1705), Bride, who wanted to work in Virginia, Brewer, top First in the University of Paris in 1774, Slater, first Vicar Apostolic in South Africa (and theoretically Australia), Marsh, the Prior who swam the Moselle at midnight and escaped right through the French revolutionary army, Stapylton, the poet buried in Westminster Abbey, Davis, who died in a duel, Meutisse who shot a German farmer in a dispute over rents, various monks who formed the royal monastery in St James' Palace under James II, and the confrontation between President Brewer ("Weak government is no government") and Heatley the 'irresponsible' Abbot of Lamspringe, while Europe rocked under Napoleon.

By about 1615 there were over a hundred English Benedictine monks working as Catholic missionaries in England. By the middle of the nineteenth century there had been many more, and they felt a need for someone to write the history of their enterprise.

In 1842 the General Chapter of the English monks agreed to such a proposal and commissioned Fr Athanasius Allanson, a monk of Ampleforth, to undertake the work. It took him fifteen years to write thirteen manuscript volumes; they are now in the archives at Ampleforth, a second copy being kept at Downside. Two of these volumes consist of the Biography, lives of the monks who died between 1585 (Abbot Feckenham of Westminster) and 1850 (President Luke Barber).

The introduction, by the Librarian of Ampleforth, explains the origins and background of the Modern English Benedictines, with a convenient outline of their history. In an appendix are a number of additional or variant texts, an alphabetical list of all the written works which Allanson says these monks composed or published, and sixty columns of index.

Barefoot and Pregnant? Irish famine orphans in Australia, Trevor McClaughlin, Melbourne: The Genealogical Society of Victoria Inc, 1991 (reprinted 1999)

The primary readership of this book will be Australians tracing their Irish ancestry; there is not much of specific interest to a British researcher. However, so much detail is given about so many governmental records, both British and Australian, that anyone might find a sibling of one of their established Irish lines. Altogether this book makes very interesting reading about one aspect of Irish emigration.

The young women who landed at Adelaide, Melbourne and Sydney (over 3,500 in all) were victims of the Great Famine and had been selected from amongst the inmates of Irish workhouses by government officials. They came from as far afield as Belfast, Armagh and Enniskillen in the north, Tipperary, Cashel and Clonmel, Rathkeale, Skibbereen and Limerick, Ballina, Loughrea and Dublin in the south, east and west. Their reception in Australia was not as warm as they would have wished. Single female immigrants were too often looked down upon by religious leaders and members of the upper- and middle-class public for much of the nineteenth century. The young women landing in Adelaide were described as 'dirty brutes'. It was as if the language used by the ships' captains and surgeons about the female paupers in their charge became the accepted way of saying things. In Sydney, as in Melbourne and Adelaide, the arrival of the immigrants was a signal for anti-Irish and anti-Roman Catholic elements in the community to give free rein to their prejudices. Not all the orphans were Catholic but the vast majority were.

This is a very interesting book full of listings of the orphans' names, ages, places of origin, parents' names (if given) and religious affiliation. Where known, details of employers, marriage, children and dates of death are also given and many of these details have been supplied by descendants of the girls.

Details are also given of the ships, the ports and dates of arrival and there is a full index to all the names involved. Of great interest also are the copies of letters from various officials, both governmental and non-governmental, religious and lay who were involved with the organisation, settlement and welfare of the girls. Five pages of photographs, one showing four generations, put the final touch to this very valuable piece of research.

The Blessed Roger Wrennall: The Chorley Catholic Martyr, Tom Arkwright. Chorley Civic Society, 2000.

Roger Wrennall, a secular priest who had studied at Seville, was executed at Lancaster in 1616. He was from Chorley in Lancashire and this booklet, published by the Chorley Civic Society, is a straightforward account aimed at local people who may not have heard of him at all. The facts contained in the main Catholic sources are supported and developed by research into the Wrennall family in general, including material from the 18th and 19th centuries. A booklet of this size (24 pages) could not include a detailed genealogy and, if Mr Arkwright has compiled one, this magazine would be pleased to publish it.

It is good to see the Catholic witness in Lancashire made known to a wider field. The booklet itself is readable and informative, supported by a number of useful maps, though they are all from the 19th century.

A valuable exercise and a useful addition to the martyrs' bookshelf. Available from The Hon Secretary, Hazel Yates, 22 Grove Crescent, Adlington, Chorley, Lancashire PR6 9RJ. price £3.00 + 50p p+p.

CONFERENCE 2001

The 2001 Conference was held in Douai Abbey, Berkshire in May by the kind invitation of the Abbot, the Society's President, Abbot Geoffrey Scott. About 50 members attended, including several newcomers. The Conference had an historical theme and began with a talk by Abbot Geoffrey, on the historian and one time Benedictine monk J.C.H. Aveling (1917-93). Many of Mr Aveling's books are now classics of Catholic history and in the 1970s he broke new ground by writing regional rather than national Catholic history and by studying previously underused sources.

Michael Hodgetts then gave an illustrated talk on priests' holes. Although some were easily discovered, others provided secure hiding places and Mr Hodgetts is sure that some have not yet been discovered. In some houses the visual evidence for a hiding place is clear but others have been found using details from Quarter Sessions or family records.

In preparation for the Society's visit to Douai in Northern France in the autumn the third talk, by Father David Milburn of Ushaw College, consisted of slides of places there with English Catholic connections. Douai was the site both of a seminary for training and sending missionary priests to England in the 16th and 17th centuries and of schools where English Catholics could send their children. It developed into an industrial town and like similar towns in England was extensively damaged in the two World Wars and declined until some restoration began in the 1980s. Much of the information on whereabouts of sites came from archives that were confiscated during the French revolution and are now in the town hall.

Finally, Richard Williams, the archivist at Mapledurham House, gave a wide-ranging and informative survey of the archives there. These range from letters written by Alexander Pope to accounts of English religious communities overseas and include manuscripts of the Blount, Strickland, Tichbourne and Woolfe families.

The outings were to Mapledurham House and to Ufton House, both of which have priests' holes. At Mapledurham, Dr Williams and the owner, Mr Eyson, provided an extensive and interesting display of documents and artefacts. The party who visited Ufton House also went to the Berkshire Record Office, where there was a display of records of Catholic interest, for example entries in quarter sessions records relating to recusants and in parish records recording their burials. The tour of the Office included the strong rooms and conservation rooms and the use of up to date technology for lighting and humidity control was particularly noted.

At the AGM, Father Chris Smith, the retiring chairman, announced that Cardinal Cormac Murphy O'Connor, Archbishop of Westminster, and Archbishop Marchisano of the Commission for the Goods and Cultural Heritage of the Church in Rome had agreed to be the Society's Patrons and that Abbot Geoffrey Scott had agreed to be President. Father Chris outlined his plans for the survey of Catholic archives and proposals for extending contacts with similar organisations overseas and for future training days were also discussed.

A full account of the Conference has appeared in CAS Bulletin Number 23. Conference 2002 is at Ditchingham in Suffolk at the end of May.

EDITORIAL NOTES

It is with pleasure that I write these notes, and it is with gratitude that I recall the sterling efforts of Sister Mary Campion McCarren and Mrs Margaret Harcourt-Williams in producing last year's journal in the absence owing to illness of the Editor.

The first three articles in Catholic Archives 23 are particularly welcome in that they deal with the topical issues of data protection, access and confidentiality with regard to ecclesiastical archives. Monsignor Read and Father Paver write as canon lawyers, David Sheehy as an archivist (with both British and Irish civil law in mind). We are also glad to be able to publish the second part of Father Joseph Fleming's study on archival theory and standards.

The Secretary of the Catholic Archives Society and her predecessor (Margaret Harcourt-Williams and Sister Marguerite Kuhn-Regnier respectively) have contributed articles on the Darlington Carmel (our wonderful printers) and on the dispersed contemplative communities in Britain. Concern for the archival ramifications of the closure and amalgamation of such houses of nuns, as well as the need to catalogue the archives of extant communities, has always been a feature of the Society's work.

Dr Marie Rowlands offers an interesting account of the archives of Oscott College, while Sister Dominic Savio Hamer gives a very practical insight into the value of school log books. Dom Aidan Bellenger's article on printed ephemera will be of great value to archivists who also act as librarians, while Peter Hardwick's memoir of the late Father Freddie Turner, Archivist at Stonyhurst, recalls the very human side of our profession. The Editor represented the Catholic Archives Society at the XXI Congress of Church Archivists at Trent (September 2002), and he and Father Joseph Bezzina of Gozo contribute papers given at that meeting. Finally, the lengthy Book Reviews section bears witness to the ever-increasing volume of publications which relate to or make use of Catholic archival collections in Britain and Ireland. To all our contributors the Editor, on behalf of the Society, offers his warmest thanks.

CHURCH DOCUMENTS: PRESERVATION AND ACCESS

Very Rev. Gordon Read

INTRODUCTION

A number of queries have arisen about the implications for Church Archives of recent civil legislation, e.g. The Data Protection Act and Human Rights Act, and also, more recently, of the recommendations of the Nolan Report. Clearly the topic could be very wide, and this short paper will focus on general principles, and specific issues relating to what might be described as clergy personnel files.

GENERAL PRINCIPLES

The term 'archive' covers many different types of material and storage. It refers to material of historical interest, but also to current working files. These comprise not only traditional paper-based documents, but also electronic records of varying kinds, and materials such as microfilm or microfiche. The Catholic Archives Society produced a useful booklet, Church Archives, in 1997. This contains the text of a Circular Letter from the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church (2nd February 1997), and extracts from the Code of Canon Law, with commentary from The Canon Law, Letter and Spirit, a commentary produced by the Canon Law Society of Great Britain and Ireland.

DIOCESAN ARCHIVES

It is the responsibility of the Diocesan Bishop to ensure that documents pertaining not only to the diocese, but to all the churches and parishes within the diocese, are carefully preserved, and to establish detailed regulations for his diocese (canon 491). In addition there is to be a central historical archive where materials of historical interest are kept.

At diocesan level, each Curia is to have its own archive, which is the responsibility of the Chancellor. He or she may be assisted by a Vice-Chancellor (canon 482), and also professionally trained archivists (Circular Letter, n.2.5). The Archive must be kept locked, and only the Bishop and Chancellor are to have the key (canon 487). Access may be granted by the Bishop alone, or by the Chancellor and Moderator of the Curia jointly. There should be a separate area where documents may be studied under supervision. People are entitled to a copy of documents

“which are of their nature public and which concern their own personal status”, canon 487 §2. This refers to documents such as extracts from baptismal registers. It does not refer to private documents such as letters. Access to these is granted on a discretionary basis.

In addition, there is a Secret Archive. Access to this is granted to the Diocesan Bishop alone. Even when the see is vacant a Diocesan Administrator can have access only in a case of real necessity (canon 490). Certain documents must be stored here: criminal cases concerning matters of a moral nature; documentary proof of canonical warnings or reproofs in the context of canonical offences or scandalous behaviour (canons 489 §2 and 1339); acts of a preliminary investigation for a penal process closed without formal trial (canon 1719); dispensations granted from occult impediments in the internal non-sacramental forum; secret marriages. The Bishop may use it to store other matters of a particularly confidential nature. The only circumstance in which it is foreseen that documents may be removed from the Secret Archive is when needed to complete a penal process (canon 1719).

PRESERVATION AND ACCESS

In general all documents should be kept indefinitely, though there is no need to retain duplicates, e.g. typed copies and original hand written text or notes. Clearly some discretion is needed in this, and in the absence of concrete guidelines, parishes and Commissions will make their own judgement. However even apparent trivia may be of historical interest in the future.

Documents relating to formal canonical processes have set time scales for retention. These are related to the possibility of appealing or re-opening cases. Cases relating to personal status can always be re-opened, even, in certain situations, by the heirs, when both parties are deceased. The acts of such cases must be kept in perpetuity. Civil suits for damages have a more limited life-span, but are extremely rare. Penal actions are extinguished after ten years, and a statute of limitations prevents action being taken over alleged offences that occurred more than ten years before. They are also extinguished by the death of the accused. In consequence documents kept in the secret archives which relate to moral or other accusations of a penal nature must be destroyed on the death of the person accused, or after a time gap of ten years. All that is to be retained, and only where a penal case has led to conviction, is the text of the judgement and a summary of the facts (canon 489 §2).

Since no one else has access to the Secret Archive, it is the personal responsibility of the Diocesan Bishop to go through the Secret Archive annually, to ensure that such documents are destroyed. The only documents retained indefinitely in the Secret Archive, then, are the registers of internal forum dispensations and of secret marriages.

Access may be granted for legitimate reasons to all other documents, subject to guidelines laid down by the Bishop, or custodian of the archive. The policy of the Chancery is to grant access after thirty years, unless a Commission has set a longer period of reservation on a particular document. A reservation of one hundred years is set on Tribunal files. Each Commission has its own policy as to when working documents are transferred from office filing cabinets to the Diocesan Archive.

CHURCH AND CIVIL LAW

Clearly the provisions of civil and canon law may differ. However, as far as possible, Diocesan Bishops, and all responsible should show respect for the civil laws in these matters, and harmonise their own regulations with these (Circular Letter, n. 2.3). From this it will be clear, that, unless there is a clear contradiction, civil law on the retention of documents, and the granting of access to them should be obeyed, not just because civil law requires it, but also the Church's law. This has relevance to the application of the Data Protection Act, and other legislation such as the Human Rights Act.

Data Protection Act 1998

INTRODUCTION

This is a lengthy and complex piece of legislation, amending previous legislation on this subject. It did not enter into effect immediately. Initially only electronically stored data were covered, but as of 24th October 2001, the Act applies also to manual files. This includes both files in the traditional sense, and also card indexes, registers and similar ways of retaining records. Each Diocese and Religious Order must be registered with the Data Protection Commissioner. The responsibility ultimately falls on the Diocesan Trustees. Legal advice has been sought on this subject on behalf of the Bishops of England and Wales, and also from the Data Protection Commissioner. The response of the latter has been totally non-committal on the matters raised. Legal advice is that, in general the Data Protection Act applies as much to the Church as anyone else. However, certain categories of data may be covered by various exemptions contained in the Act. Those with access to the internet can study the full text of the Act on: www.hmso.gov.uk/acts/acts1998/80029-a.htm

MEANING OF THE ACT

Data means information which is being or intended to be processed by automatic equipment, or which is part of a filing system, or forms an accessible record. A Data Subject is any living person who can be identified from the data, or additional information likely to come into the possession of the processor. Processing means any kind of organisation, adaptation, retrieval, consultation, disclosure, or even destruction of the information. Sensitive personal data includes information on religious beliefs, physical or mental health, sexual life, allegations of any offence or proceedings relating to such an allegation.

RIGHT OF ACCESS TO PERSONAL DATA

The Data Controller (i.e. Diocesan Trustees) must inform the data subject whether he is processing any personal data, stating its nature, the purpose for which it is being processed, and to whom it may be shown, the content of the data and its source. However this obligation arises only on the receipt of a written request and the appropriate fee. He is not obliged to comply with the request if this involves disclosing information about someone else without that person's consent. This information must be supplied within forty days of application. If necessary the applicant can seek a court order. The data subject may also require the processor to cease processing such data if this is likely to cause substantial damage or distress. If the processor does not intend to comply, he must give reasons, and again the matter can be taken to court. Note that the court may order the obliteration, amending or destruction of data, or where it is an accurate record of information received, order a supplementary statement of the true facts to be added.

EXEMPTIONS

Personal data processed for certain purposes are exempt from the first principle of the act (see below). This includes: the prevention of crime, apprehension and prosecution of offenders, protecting the public against dishonesty, malpractice or improper conduct, or incompetence on the part of persons authorised to carry on any profession or other activity, protecting charities against misconduct or mismanagement. Data may also be processed for statistical or historical research, in which case it may be kept indefinitely. Information which is of its nature public is likewise exempt (e.g. sacramental registers). Personal data are exempt from non-disclosure provisions when this is required in connection with legal proceedings, or to establish, exercise or defend legal rights.

THE EIGHT DATA PROTECTION PRINCIPLES

1. Personal data shall be processed fairly and lawfully and, in particular, shall not be processed unless-
 - (a) at least one of the conditions in Schedule 2 is met, and
 - (b) in the case of sensitive personal data, at least one of the conditions in Schedule 3 is also met.
2. Personal data shall be obtained only for one or more specified and lawful purposes, and shall not be further processed in any manner incompatible with that purpose or those purposes.
3. Personal data shall be adequate, relevant and not excessive in relation to the purpose or purposes for which they are processed.
4. Personal data shall be accurate and, where necessary, kept up to date.
5. Personal data processed for any purpose shall not be kept for longer than is necessary for that purpose or those purposes.
6. Personal data shall be processed in accordance with the rights of data subjects under this Act.
7. Appropriate technical and organisational measures shall be taken against accidental loss or destruction of, or damage to, personal data.
8. Personal data shall not be transferred to a country or territory outside the European Economic Area unless that country or territory ensures an adequate level of protection for the rights and freedoms of data subjects in relation to the processing of personal data.

DATA PROTECTION ACT AND THE CHURCH

Unfortunately only court cases will establish the extent to which there is any incompatibility between civil and canon law in this area. However, in my view the likelihood of such conflict has been overstated, and can be minimised where the Church acts in accordance with its own laws. For example, in marriage nullity cases both parties already have the right to inspect the acts of the case and make comments to correct anything that appears erroneous. It seems likely that the actual processing of such data would be covered by the exemptions in the act. A potential area of difficulty might be the transmission of a case to the Holy See. If the Church is entitled to hold the data in the first place, it is likely to be entitled to process it in other ways. A Catholic who left the church would be entitled to insist that his details be deleted from parish records, but not that they be removed from a public record such as the baptismal register. He could only insist on a marginal note being added to update the entry.

What of clergy personnel files? Evidently the person in question has the right to know what is in such a file, and insist on the correction or elimination of erroneous or defamatory material. If it is needed for a penal process of some kind then it should be in the Secret Archive, and would be covered by the appropriate exemption under the Act. He would in any case have a canonical right to see the material if it becomes part of a penal process. Should the material not be used for this purpose, the Code already provides for its destruction on an established time-scale, and prevents its disclosure. One would imagine that the Bishop would not, in any case, wish to retain erroneous or defamatory material on file, and that he would wish to obtain the cleric's comments on such matters. Clearly anonymous allegations are of no value, even if the substance should be true, and ought always to be destroyed forthwith.

A cleric, then, has the right to see what is in his own personnel file, and insist on corrections or deletions. He does not have a right to access to the Secret Archive, but if the material in it relates to accusations against him, then he will have a right to see its content in the context of a canonical penal process, and to make appropriate comments. If the case is proven, and he is convicted, then there is a presumption as to the truth of the data retained, and a time-scale set for its destruction. The latter is in accordance with the provision that data be not kept longer than necessary. The data contained in such files are protected from unauthorised disclosure, by appropriate restrictions on access.

THE NOLAN REPORT

The section on records is 2.9.14. The provisions are in accordance with the Data Protection Act and canon law, with the exception of the recommendation that records be kept after the death of the accused, and for 100 years. It is arguable that the Data Protection Act would allow such records to be kept in order to protect the rights of the Church. However, it would be in clear contradiction to the provisions of canon 489 §2 and canon 1719, which require their destruction, subject to the retention of a summary and the judgement in the case of a conviction. The Bishops would need to ask the Holy See for a derogation from the Code in order to comply with this recommendation of the Nolan Report. Here one must note that at the beginning of October 2001 the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith sent a letter to Diocesan Bishops concerning the processing of such cases. If there seems a prima facie case, the Bishop is to refer to the Congregation, who will give precise norms to be followed. It would be appropriate for the Bishop in such a situation to ask for guidance on the question of the retention of such materials in the Secret Archive. It seems unlikely that the Congregation would envisage a general retention for 100 years.

DATA PROTECTION AND CONFIDENTIALITY: CIVIL LAW VERSUS CANON LAW

Rev. Kristian Paver

Not so long ago, it was the accepted norm in the United Kingdom that the state did not intervene in the "internal" affairs of the Churches. However, with the growing interest in human rights in society, together with efforts to set down common fundamental principles for the entire European Union, this has begun to change over the last few years. The two main pieces of legislation which will potentially have the most impact are the Human Rights Act, which made the rights enshrined in the European Convention on Human Rights (1951) directly enforceable in British Courts, and the Data Protection Act which superseded the Data Protection Act 1984 and implemented the European Data Protection Directive (95/46/EC), both of which became law in 1998. The HRA came fully into force on 2nd October 2000 and the transition period to allow compliance with the DPA ended on 21st October 2001. The Church is not exempt from either Act, but just how far they will affect it will remain unclear until test cases have been decided by the courts.

These two Acts are clearly of significance for those who handle personal information and records and conserve them in archives, although neither Act makes specific reference to archives as such.

HUMAN RIGHTS ACT 1998

This Act is primarily concerned with the actions of public authorities and of private persons exercising some public function. Traditionally, the Catholic Church has not been regarded as a public body in English law, but rather as a consensual society, a voluntary religious association whose members are organized and bound together as a matter of contract (Buckley v Cahal Daly 1990). Therefore, the Act will not have immediate effect on the Church's functioning. However, since the courts are bound to act in accordance with Convention rights, it is now recognized that the Act will inevitably have a "horizontal" effect, since courts will be required to apply the rights when deciding cases between private bodies.

Article 8 contains the right which is most relevant to those who work with archives:

1. Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence.

2. There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health and morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.

The effects of the HRA 1998 are impossible to predict. Much will depend on how broad the courts will interpret "respect for private life".

DATA PROTECTION ACT 1998

The Act is applicable to the holding and processing of personal data by all individuals and groups if the data is contained in a "relevant filing system".

The Act defines a "relevant filing system" as "any set of information relating to individuals to the extent that, although the information is not processed by means of equipment operating automatically in response to instructions given for that purpose, the set is structured, either by reference to individuals or by reference to criteria relating to individuals, in such a way that specific information relating to a particular individual is readily accessible". Thus, information which is unstructured does not fall within the ambit of the Act. However, it would appear that one of the aims of an archive is to have readily accessible material and so would have a referenced filing system of some sort.

Note that, although the 1984 Act only applied to computerized files, the 1998 Act applies to manual files as well.

Data controllers are required to notify the Information Commissioner that they are holding and processing personal data in computerized form and detail the purposes for which data is being held. The notification of data held and processed in manual files is voluntary. In dioceses, the data controller is normally the Trustees or related body. The same would apply to religious institutes. All others are data processors.

Data is divided by the Act into two main groupings:

1. General personal data: data relating to a living individual who can be identified, including any expression of opinion and any indication of the intentions of the data controller or any other person in respect of the individual.

2. Sensitive personal data: this data includes information relating to racial or ethnic origin, political opinions, religious beliefs, trade union membership, physical and mental health condition, sexual life, the commission or alleged commission of offences, the records of the proceedings relating to the latter.

This division is extremely important since the obtaining of the consent of the data subject to hold information is one of the central planks of the DPA 1998, found in the First Data Protection Principle. According to the above distinction, in some cases, the consent of the individual to hold and process general personal information need not be obtained or can be presumed (cf Schedule 2 of the DPA 1998). It could be argued that the fact of belonging to the Church implies consent to hold appropriate general personal information concerning an individual, provided that it is necessary and correct. That said, it will always be the safest route to obtain consent whenever possible. However, the holding and processing of sensitive personal data requires the explicit consent of the data subject in accordance with the First Data Protection Principle and Schedule 3 of the Act.

Pending further clarification from the Government or the Courts, however, it would seem that Church archives will fall within paragraph 4 of Schedule 3 which would therefore mean that the explicit consent of the data subject would not be required. The paragraph reads:

The processing:

(a) is carried out in the course of its legitimate activities by any body or association which:

- (i) is not established or conducted for profit, and
- (ii) exists for political philosophical, religious or trade-union purposes,

(b) is carried out with appropriate safeguards for the rights and freedoms of data subjects,

(c) relates only to individuals who either are members of the body or association or have regular contact with it in connection with its purposes, and

(d) does not involve disclosure of the personal data to a third party without the consent of the data subject.

Note that here sub-paragraph (d) might be problematic with regards to the access of third parties to archives. Indeed, the access of third parties to archives should be clearly regulated by means of an established policy.

Data must be processed in accordance with the Data Protection Principles (see appendix for a simplified version - reference should be had to the Act itself for a fuller explanation of the Principles in Schedule I Part II).

Data subjects generally have access rights to the data held concerning them, as long as the rights of third parties are not infringed by the disclosure.

Thus, unless there is an exemption, personal data of living individuals in a relevant filing system must be held and processed in accordance with the DPA 1998. Consequently, purely historical archives, ie containing information about individuals who are dead, are not covered by the Act. However, active files concerning living individuals are subject to the Act.

EXEMPTION

Section 33 of the DPA provides for various exemptions in respect of the processing (or further processing) of personal data for research purposes (including statistical or historical purposes) provided that the processing (or further processing) is exclusively for those purposes and, also, that the following conditions are met:

- that the data are not processed to support measures or decisions relating to particular individuals, and
- that the data are not processed in such a way that substantial damage or substantial distress is, or is likely to be caused to any data subject.

Where the exemption applies:-

- the further processing of personal data will not be considered incompatible with the purposes for which they were obtained.

It is important to note that the exemption does not excuse the data controller from complying with that part of the Second Data Protection Principle which states that personal data shall be obtained only, for one or more specified and lawful purposes.

- personal data may be kept indefinitely despite the Fifth Data Protection Principle, and
- Subject access does not have to be given provided that the results of the research or any resulting statistics are not made available in a form which identifies data subjects.

The exemption will not be lost just because the data are disclosed:-

- a) to any person, for research purposes only;
- b) to the data subject or someone acting on their behalf;
- c) at the request, or with the consent, of the data subject or someone acting on their behalf;
- d) where the person making the disclosure has reasonable grounds for believing the disclosure falls within (a), (b) or (c) above.

Again, this exemption would appear to cover the situation of diocesan/religious archives to some degree, including the access of third parties for research purposes, as long as the results of the research will not be expressed in such a way that a particular individual is identified, unless consent has been obtained of course.

UNLAWFUL PROCESSING

A Court Order can be obtained by a data subject who believes that personal data is being held or processed unlawfully, ie contrary to the provisions of the DPA. This Order can prevent further processing and require the rectification, blocking, erasure or destruction of information. In addition, a data subject may be entitled to compensation for distress caused by unlawful processing.

CONFIDENTIALITY AND PRIVACY IN CANON LAW

Although the 1917 Code contained a number of canons concerning the reputation of individuals, the Second Vatican Council laid the foundations for the present legislation. For the first time, based on the dignity of the human person, the Church formally proclaimed a right to one's good name and to protection of one's private life.

There is also increasing awareness of the exceptional dignity which belongs to the human person, who is superior to everything and whose rights and duties are universal and inviolable. Consequently, everything should be rendered to a person which is required to lead a truly human life, such as food, clothing, shelter, the rights to free choice of one's state of life and to found a family, to education, to work, to one's good name, to respect, to appropriate information, to act in accordance with the right norm of conscience, to protection of one's private life and to a just freedom, including religious freedom. (Gaudium et Spes 26)

This teaching was codified into the 1983 Code of Canon Law, in the section on the obligations and rights of all Christ's faithful:

Canon 220: No one is permitted to harm unlawfully the good reputation which a person enjoys nor to injure the right of any person to protect his or her own privacy.¹

These two rights, which apply to all members of the Church, whatever their status, are also protected by a sanction:

Canon 1390: §2 A person who offers an ecclesiastical superior any other calumnious denunciation of a delict or who otherwise injures the good reputation of another can be punished with a just penalty, not excluding a censure.

§3 A calumniator can also be forced to make suitable reparation.

ARCHIVES

The canon law on archives is contained in canons 486-491:

Canon 486: §2 In every curia there is to be erected in a safe place a diocesan archive, or record storage area, in which instruments and written documents which pertain to the spiritual and temporal affairs of the diocese are to be safeguarded after being properly filed and diligently secured. §3 An inventory, or catalogue, of the documents which are contained in the archive is to be kept with a brief synopsis of each written document.

Canon: 487: §1 The archive must be locked and only the bishop and chancellor are to have its key. No one is permitted to enter except with the permission of either the bishop or of both the moderator of the curia and the chancellor §2 Interested parties have the right to obtain personally or through a proxy an authentic written copy or photocopy of documents which by their nature are public and which pertain to their personal status.

Canon 488: It is not permitted to remove documents from the archive except for a brief time only and with the consent either of the bishop or of both the moderator of the curia and the chancellor.

Canon 489: §1 In the diocesan curia there is also a secret archive, or at least in the common archive there is to be a safe or cabinet, completely closed and locked, which cannot be removed; in it documents to be kept secret are to be protected most securely. §2 Each year documents of criminal cases in matters of morals, in which the accused parties have died or ten years have elapsed from the condemnatory sentence, are to be destroyed. A brief summary of what occurred along with the text of the definitive sentence is to be retained.

Canon 490: §1 Only the bishop is to have the key to the secret archive. §2 When a see is vacant, the secret archive or safe is not to be opened except in a case of true necessity by the diocesan administrator himself. §3 Documents are not to be removed from the secret archive or safe.

Canon 491: §1 A diocesan bishop is to take care that the acts and documents of the archives of cathedral, collegiate, parochial and other churches in his territory are also diligently preserved and the inventories or catalogues are made in duplicate, one of which is to be preserved in the archive of the church and the other in the diocesan archive. §2 A diocesan bishop is also to take care that there is an historical archive in the diocese and that documents having historical value are diligently protected and systematically ordered in it. §3 In order to inspect or remove the acts and documents mentioned in §§1 and 2, the norms established by the diocesan bishop are to be obtained.

(see the booklet Church Archives, published by the CAS in 1997 and 2001, for a more detailed explanation of the canons of the Code concerning archives, taken from the commentary prepared by the Canon Law Society of Great Britain and Ireland, pp.41-54)

Thus, in every diocese, there is to be a general diocesan archive, within which there must be a secret archive. In addition, there are local archives and an historical archive.

In terms of access, only the bishop may enter the secret archive. Access to the general archive is subject to permission from the bishop or the moderator of the curia and chancellor together. Interested parties (ie data subjects and others) have the right to a copy of documents which are either public and relate to their personal status. Access to local or the historical archives is to be regulated by norms established by the bishop.

The Code is silent with regards to archives in religious institutions but, in accordance with canon 19 they should be structured in a similar way to diocesan archives, the place of the bishop being taken by the major superior or equivalent (for fuller treatment of confidentiality in religious institutes see E. Rinere, 'The Individual's Right to Confidentiality', Bulletin on Issues of Religious Law, Canon Law Society of America, vol II, Spring 1995)

CONCLUSIONS AND GOOD PRACTICE

1. The over-riding principle is that personal data should be handled in accordance with the Data Protection Principles whenever possible.
2. Every diocese and religious institute should have a data protection/confidentiality policy setting out basic principles for holding, processing and accessing information.
3. It is important to clarify the distinction between historical and active archives. Historical archives are largely exempt from the provisions of the DPA.
4. Whether active archives are covered by the DPA will depend on whether they contain information which is stored in a relevant filing system, either manual or electronic. Data organized by name will almost certainly fall into this category.
5. Notwithstanding the possible exemptions from seeking the consent of the data subject to hold and process personal data in accordance with the First Data Protection Principles and Schedules 2 and 3 of the DPA, good practice would require that the individual's consent should be obtained whenever possible.

6. Access to active archives is foreseen both in the Code and the DPA. They disagree as to the nature of the information accessible and by whom. The DPA would seem to provide for greater access to information for the data subject, whilst the Code limits the information but makes it accessible to any interested party.
7. Secret archives, to which the data subject has no access, are not foreseen in the DPA, although there are exemptions relating to the prevention or detection of crime, and the apprehension or prosecution of offenders, which may have some relevance to information relating to child protection issues. Great care needs to be taken in this area.
8. It is imperative that a policy relating specifically to archives is drawn up, making particular reference to the purposes for which the data is held, who has access and under what conditions, how and why data may be transferred between data processors and what data will be retained.

APPENDIX

DATA PROTECTION PRINCIPLES

1. Personal data shall be processed fairly and lawfully (including central issue of CONSENT).
2. Personal data shall be obtained only for one or more specified and lawful purposes, and shall not be further processed in any manner compatible with that purpose or purposes.
3. Personal data shall be adequate, relevant and not excessive in - relation to the purpose or purposes for which they are processed.

4. Personal data shall be accurate and, where necessary, kept up to date.
 5. Personal data processed for any purpose or purposes shall not be kept for longer than is necessary for those purpose or those purposes.
 6. Personal data shall be processed in accordance with the rights of data subjects under the DPA 1998.
 7. Appropriate technical and organisational measures shall be taken against unauthorised or unlawful processing of personal data and against accidental loss or destruction of, or damage to, personal data.
 8. Personal data shall not be transferred to a country or territory outside the European Economic Area unless that country or territory ensures an adequate level of protection for the rights and freedoms of data subjects in relation to the processing of personal data.

ARCHIVES AND ARCHIVISTS IN THE SPOTLIGHT: PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICE OF CHURCH POLICY IN REGARD TO ACCESS TO SENSITIVE RECORDS

David Sheehy

PART 1 - PRINCIPLES

ARCHIVES IN THE SPOTLIGHT:

It would be fair to state at the outset that, in general, archives and records have never been more talked about, more the object of public interest and concern and of closer scrutiny than they are today. As recent events have shown, records have recently become the subject of special interest or inquiry whether it be in relation to corporate malfeasance in the United States or regarding the handling by the Catholic Church of allegations of child sex abuse across three continents. One commentator writing about the collapse of the largest construction company in the U.S. had this to say:

The Enron saga and downfall of the company's auditors show that destruction of records can destroy reputations and companies. Even if those responsible can show that the shredding was innocent, or that the documents were not relevant, the damage done by appearing to destroy evidence may be irreversible. Management needs to think about this issue and set down clear policies to guide employees.¹

In recent years records have also become subject to sophisticated legal enactment and regulation, whether it be Data Protection or Freedom of Information legislation, which reflect the increasingly more complex demands which society is making on records and record keeping.

In parallel, the actions of individual archivists have never before taken on such significance or been subject to more critical external examination and none more so in these islands perhaps than Church archivists. What kinds of decisions are archivists taking today in regard to the granting or the withholding of access to sensitive or confidential records? In whose interests are archivists acting when they take such decisions – their own personal interests, corporate interests, or the public interest? Are archivists, and in particular Church archivists, engaged in the deliberate destruction of sensitive records including perhaps documentary evidence of abuse or evidence of a cover up by persons in authority, in order to protect individuals or to safeguard the corporate interests of the institutions they serve? What moral code or set of ethical or professional standards, if any, informs their actions and decision-making processes? These are just some of the questions being posed urgently today and no archivist, Church or secular, can afford to ignore them.

Professional archivists working in the United Kingdom have, for some time, had to face up to the ethical responsibilities that come with a form of employment that routinely involves issues of confidentiality and decision-making in relation to matters of sensitivity. Since 1983, those wishing to join the Society of Archivists, the professional association for archivists working in the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland, must formally sign up to and fully and at all times abide by a professional Code of Conduct.

It goes without saying, surely, that the question of access in its broader context and the vexed question of the granting or the refusal of access to sensitive or confidential records are matters of great contemporary concern to members of the Society of Archivists. Yet, remarkably, the Society's own journal, though replete with articles on technological advances to facilitate access to archives, has not featured, in over twenty years, a substantive article on the vexed question of access policy, confidentiality, and the granting or refusing of access to records of a sensitive or confidential nature. In looking back through the relevant issues for that period I could only find a short article, published in 2001, dealing with confidentiality agreements. Nor has access policy featured as one of the five Best Practice Guidelines published by the Society in the period since 1993.

With all the pressures of law and regulation, demands made by researchers, media scrutiny and general anxiety surrounding the handling of sensitive and confidential records, archivists, and especially Church archivists, have good reason to be anxious. Some might even be at a loss to know how to make just and reasonable decisions on access to sensitive archives in their custody.

FRAMING A POLICY ON ACCESS TO CHURCH ARCHIVES - FUNDAMENTAL CONSIDERATIONS:

(1) The Need for a Policy on Access:

In framing a policy on access to Church archives a number of fundamental considerations arise. The first and most obvious is whether such a policy is actually necessary. The granting or the refusal of access to its archives, to outside persons, by any institution is an important administrative act with significant ramifications. Such decisions, therefore, should not be taken on a haphazard basis but only in the context of a properly formulated access policy.

It might be thought that professional archivists were unanimous in accepting the need for such a policy. However, an Internet discussion on this topic among business archivists in October 2000 revealed that most of those contributing were of the opinion that general guidelines on access were an unreasonable expectation because of the variety of different types of companies holding different kinds of records. These archivists held to the view that decisions on access should be made on a case by case basis.

Acting on such a premise begs many difficult questions. How do you keep track of your decisions so that all researchers are treated fairly and justly? If as an archivist you are constantly looking over your shoulder in fear of the wrath of company executives at what point do you cease to be a professional archivist and instead become a company public relations officer? These are some of the considerations that should persuade archivists of the value of having decisions on access taken in a broader context rather than a narrow case by case basis.

In drawing up such an access policy a number of relevant considerations ought to be taken into account. These include the nature, purpose, institutional ethos and current operational strategy of the agency that creates the records; internal institutional legal codes and disciplines; civil law; the prevailing consensus in civil society with regard to access to archives; the norms of professional archival best practice; the nature and content of the records themselves and their state of preservation.

(2) Defining Access to Archives

Having established that an access policy is desirable the next step is to define what we mean by access to archives. Access to archives is the process by which researchers are permitted to inspect records, which are made available to them. Access involves the granting of permission to researchers to

- (a) examine and study individual documents or collections of documents held by an archival repository

- (b) extract information from archives for the purposes of research or publication
- (c) use the reference facilities of an archival repository
- (d) avail of reprographic facilities in an archive
- (e) to film or make photographic reproductions of archival documents

(3) Who Should Make Policy on Access to Archives?

Because of its importance, an access policy should always be sanctioned at the highest level of executive authority within religious congregations, societies and dioceses. This is not in any way to denigrate the role of the Church archivist. On the contrary, it is essential that Church archivists should have a significant input into access policy formulation, and not just its implementation.

This is especially critical, as there now exists a real danger that misinformed persons in authority may, in the absence of input from Church archivists, take rash if well-intentioned decisions with disastrous consequences. Therefore it is vital that Church archivists take on a lead role in the drafting of such a policy. For example, Canon Law stipulates that the norms to be followed in regard to access to diocesan archives are those laid down at the discretion of the local Ordinary (can. 491.3). However, diocesan archivists have a key role to play in advising bishops before such norms are promulgated or amended. Whether engaged in a diocesan or religious context, Church archivists should be able to present themselves as authoritative sources of knowledge on a range of relevant issues including ecclesiastical and secular law relating to archives and current professional archival best practice.

It is also vital that once an access policy has been worked out it should be made known to all members of the congregation, society or diocese. Church archivists should be to the fore in disseminating such information in a concise, open and comprehensible fashion. This is not to say that this will lead to complete acceptance by all members of such a policy but at least the rationale behind it will have been clearly explained.

ACCESS WITHIN THE FRAMEWORK OF CIVIL AND CHURCH LAW:

The right of access to information or to records is founded in the concept of natural law. Since the end of the eighteenth century, the notion of a universal civic right of access to archives has been widely promulgated in Europe. It was first officially given voice in the Declaration of the Rights of Man adopted in the first year of the French Revolution and in an ordinance passed in 1794 which has since been called the Declaration of Archival Rights. According to the ordinance, access to archives was henceforth to be not a favour, but a civic right.²

In the United Kingdom, government departments are required to make records which are more than thirty years old available to the public through the Public Record Office in London, the National Archives of Scotland and the Public Record Office of Northern Ireland. Similar legislation applies in the Republic of Ireland.

In addition, since 1997 members of the public in the Republic of Ireland have been able to apply to have documents released under the Freedom of Information Act. Similar rights are soon to be extended to citizens of this country under a United Kingdom Freedom of Information Act. Where rights of access have been vindicated by statute in recent times a counterbalancing provision has also been made for the protection of the rights of individuals both within general archival law and specifically under data protection legislation.

As the Catholic Church in the United Kingdom, in purely secular legal terms, is a private institution rather than a public body, it follows that its archives are private records rather than public records. Catholic Church records in contrast to those of the Anglican Church have traditionally been outside the scope of civil law enabling subjects of the Crown to gain access to public records. However, recent legislation relating to records has suggested a trend whereby there may be encroachment by way of extending civil legislation to encompass not only public records but also the records of private institutions including the Catholic Church.

The lead development in this regard has been legislation relating to records, which hold personal information relating to individuals. The most recent relevant statute is the Data Protection Act of 1998. This Act applies to personal information held on hard copy format as well as on computers. Already parish clergy throughout the country have come to grips with this act and have registered as controllers of personal data.

Unlike the Data Protection Act the Freedom of Information Act would appear to be confined to central and local government and quangos and therefore not likely to impinge on Church archives.

However, it may at this stage be prudent to note that solicitors advising the Catholic Church in Ireland have stated that residential child care institutions established by the State but managed by Catholic religious are potentially subject to the Irish Freedom of Information Act. They have also cautioned that Church institutions which are in receipt of State funding may in the future come within the FOI Act. Thus, for example; welfare or educational programmes run by dioceses or religious could come within its scope. It is therefore conceivable that such an argument might also be advanced in the United Kingdom once the FOI Act here has come into force.

External to any considerations about civil law what is most pertinent to note is that diocesan and religious archives are subject to Church law and regulation. Indeed they come under a legal and juridical framework peculiar to the Church itself consisting of the Code of Canon Law, synodal decrees, diocesan regulations and religious constitutions and council decrees.

ACCESS TO THE CHURCH ARCHIVES AND THE NORMS OF PROFESSIONAL ARCHIVAL BEST PRACTICE:

We have seen that in putting together a well-founded policy on access to Church archives cognisance must be taken of the laws of the Catholic Church and of civil society. But another key aspect to be considered, another well to be drawn from if you like, are the norms of contemporary professional archival best practice within the United Kingdom. These standards, as adhered to and promoted by the Society of Archivists, provide benchmarks of best practice which Church archivists should seek to apply, in so far as is practicable, in order to ensure the good management and long-term preservation of their archives. The norms that are applicable to access policy can be reduced to three basic precepts, namely, a predisposition towards openness, a desire not to cause unnecessary distress to persons by the premature release of sensitive records and the application of rules and regulations in a fair and consistent manner. Let us now look at the first of these - a predisposition towards openness.

1. A Predisposition towards Openness:

The predisposition towards openness on the part of professional archivists long predates currently avowed concepts of transparency and openness. It arises from the recognition by archivists that records must not simply be preserved for their own sake but must be made available and be utilised by researchers.

The Catholic Church for its part endeavours to operate in harmony with civil norms regarding openness and access to its archives. The Church has long been anxious, in so far as is practicable, to facilitate the use of its records for scholarly purposes. In this regard, the Circular Letter issued by Archbishop Francesco Marchisano, President of the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church, in 1997, advised that regulations drawn up by Church archives in regard to access 'should be made known publicly and that norms be harmonised with state or civil ones as much as possible'. Archbishop Marchisano's document went much further for, in clear and bold terms, it identified as a key component of good archival management the promotion of the availability of Church archives for research purposes. This is what Archbishop Marchisano had to say:

Archives, as part of the cultural heritage, should be offered primarily at the service of the community which has produced them. But in time they assume a universal destination because they become the heritage of all humanity. The material stored can not be, in fact, precluded from those who take advantage of it in order to know more about the history of the Christian people, their religious, civil, cultural and social deeds.

Those responsible must make sure that the use of Church archives be facilitated further, that is not only to those interested who have the right to access but also to a larger range of researchers, without prejudice towards their religious or ideological backgrounds, following the best of Church tradition yet while respecting the appropriate norms of protection offered by universal law as well as the regulations of the diocesan Bishop.

Such an attitude of disinterested openness, kind welcome, and competent service must be taken into careful consideration so that the historical memory of the Church may be offered to the entire society.³

A predisposition towards openness should not, of course, be confused with the notion of granting unlimited or indiscriminate access to archives. Professional archivists acknowledge that it is proper to curb any unlimited right of access by the imposition of appropriate restrictions to safeguard certain rights and legitimate interests.

2. Protection of the Rights of Individuals:

Archivists strive to balance the interests of the many and those of the few in considering how and when records can be released. It is unprofessional for archivists to release documents without taking into account the likely impact on individuals of the release of such material. In Britain and Ireland protection against distress caused by the release of government records is specifically provided for public archives legislation. For example Ireland's National Archives Act (1986) permits the withholding of departmental records which would or might cause distress or danger to living persons on the ground that they contain information about individuals, or would or might be likely to lead to an action for damages for defamation.

Thus the National Archives of Ireland, in applying this provision, withholds census records, consular files from the Department of Foreign Affairs, files on prisoners in State custody, Garda crime investigation records, files on mental health patients in state care, and social welfare application files for up to seventy years, subject to periodic review.

Just as civil archival law advances measures to protect the rights of individuals so also does the Catholic Church vindicate such rights in similar provisions, which are found in Canon law. Specifically, canon 220 of the Code of Canon Law decrees that no one may unlawfully harm the good reputation, which a person enjoys, or violate the right of every person to protect his or her privacy.

3. Application of the Principle of Fairness and Consistency

(a) Role of the Archivist:

One of the fundamental principles of professional archival best practice is the importance of applying a policy regarding access in a consistent and fair manner; put bluntly, it is unprofessional for any archivist to grant access on a selective basis to any party. To do so places the archivist and more importantly the creative agency that initiates or authorises such access in an invidious position.

A problem sometimes faced by Church archivists is when those in higher authority decide to commission official corporate histories of a diocese, religious congregation or society or biographies of a founder or foundress. In many cases such projects are attended by promises to the commissioned historians concerned that they will be granted access to previously closed records. Those in higher authority find it surprisingly easy to convince themselves that granting one-off exceptions to the existing archives access policy is a risk-free undertaking. They are seduced by the proposition that a single application for access can be considered in isolation from all others.

The dangers attendant on such decisions are all the greater in times of crisis. For example, a branch of the Church structure may apply to another to gain access to sensitive records in its custody such as those relating to residential institutions e.g. orphanages and industrial schools. If in these instances, permission to consult the relevant records is granted to representatives of the Church body responsible for managing such institutions but equal access is at the same time denied to victims of abuse or alleged victims of abuse, then the Church may find itself open to the charge that it is merely acting to protect its own interests at the expense of compounding the original abuse suffered by its victims.

In all such situations the archivist must act as a moral compass for his or her organisation. Of course it is much easier to say this than it is to stand up to those in higher authority who propose violating a formally agreed access policy. But that is the challenge that the conscientious archivist must take up. The archivist is the one person who is alive to the adverse consequences that follow from the granting of exceptional or privileged access. The granting of such exceptions undermines the justification for the original policy and if the researcher thus facilitated publishes his or her work it will be clear that he or she has enjoyed privileged access. This, in turn, may lead to wild and ill-informed speculation as to how that person was granted such access contrary to the previously publicly stated policy of that congregation or diocese. In all of these cases it is the archivist who is left to pick up the pieces and to face the anger of aggrieved researchers.

(b) Vatican Capers:

Applying the principles of consistency and fairness also requires that your access policy be well thought out and that you are able to follow through on publicly announced undertakings with regard to access. Only last year the Holy See got itself into a terrible spot of bother, largely of its own making, in relation to its archives. In 1999 it had invited a panel of Catholic and Jewish historians to investigate the role of the Church and of Pope Pius XII during the Holocaust.

The historians, for their part, assumed that they were going to be given access to previously unpublished archives. However, the Vatican set no new material in front of them but merely asked them to review the previously published 11 volumes of Acts and Documents of the Holy See during World War II. As Vatican archivists had compiled these volumes the suspicion naturally arose that documents that might be harmful to Pius XII's reputation might have been discreetly omitted. As a direct consequence the frustrated scholars publicly withdrew from the project claiming that a true picture of Pius XII's role could not be given without fuller access to the archives.

The Vatican in its defence stated that it couldn't grant access to the 3 million odd post-1922 documents, as they were as yet uncatalogued. But why then did they think that respected academics would be content to work only on material that had already been in the public domain for decades? Why did it invite scrutiny of such a sensitive portion of its archives when it had nothing new to offer in terms of access? Why did it not make it absolutely explicit from the outset that no previously closed material would now be made available? Thus, through muddled thinking in relation to access to archives, the Holy See turned what otherwise might have been another milestone in the improvement of Christian-Jewish relations into an embarrassing fiasco.

(c) Conflict of Interest:

There are, as we have seen, circumstances where archivists quite justifiably prevent researchers from gaining access to certain records. However, there are also circumstances where it is inappropriate to do so. For example, an archivist shouldn't deny researchers access to records on the grounds that the archivist is currently using those same documents for research purposes. A notorious example of this occurred in Ireland some years ago when a diocesan archivist refused access to all applicants on the grounds that granting access would interfere with the archivist's preparation of a multi-volume diocesan history!

(d) Published Information:

Finally, in regard to consistency, it should be obvious that this also should apply in relation to information that is released. Each Church repository should publish or otherwise make known to potential researchers its rules governing access to and use of its archives. This can be done in published guides or in information published on the Internet. Moreover, information that is already publicly available about individuals such as published in a directory or yearbook or magazine should never be withheld from inquirers to an archives service but must be accessible to all.

GRANTING AND REFUSING ACCESS TO DIFFERENT TYPES OF RECORDS:

(1) Defining and Identifying Sensitive and Confidential Records:

The first task in dealing with records of a sensitive or confidential nature is, of course, to identify them. The term confidential implies that information in document form has literally been given in confidence. In recent times its meaning has been extended to encompass a wider range of documents containing personal information relating to individuals. The term 'sensitive' in relation to archives thus overlaps to some extent with that of the term 'confidential'.

Taking the two together under a working definition, we can state that sensitive or confidential records can be defined as those which pertain to an individual, the casual or thoughtless release of which might cause distress, or danger, or embarrassment to that person. Such a definition underpins the provisions found in both canon law and civil archival legislation for the proper withholding of particular records of a sensitive or confidential kind.

The important point to remember here is that the concern of the archivist is not whether the individual documents or files are sensitive per se but rather to consider the likely impact on an identifiable and limited number of individuals of the release of such material at a particular point in time. There is no magic formula that you can apply. It is a question of using common sense and sensitivity. One must always ask who is going to be affected, to what degree, at any given time, by the release of documents? Are documents or files permanently sensitive? No, sensitivity is a condition, which wanes over time.

The rights of all individuals must be protected but perhaps some must be better protected than others. For instance those in the public eye and their families are better able to cope with the impact of documentary disclosures and often have the confidence and the means to assert their rights. Thus, if anything, archivists should be even more protective of the privacy of people who have no public profile, no experience of exposure to the media and who are more vulnerable to the hurt that disclosures might bring.

In the archives of religious orders and of dioceses the Church archivist will encounter on the one hand large collections of records of a generally non-sensitive kind but which may contain occasional individual documents of a sensitive or confidential nature and, on the other hand, files which specifically relate to individuals and which are likely to consist mostly of documents of a sensitive nature. The Church archivist is, therefore, obliged to make a careful examination of the contents of all files in a given collection and to judge each file or series of files or individual documents on their merits.

All that having been said, it is possible to identify certain types of records, such as the following, which are to be found in Church archives and which are likely to contain sensitive information concerning individual persons:

- (a) personnel records such as files on individual members of clergy, religious congregations and societies and lay staff in their employ
- (b) files relating to novices or students training for the priestly ministry
- (c) reports on institutions such as orphanages, industrial schools and asylums under Church management written by staff of the institutions, chaplains or medical practitioners, which refer to either residents or staff members by name
- (d) letters written expressly, or implicitly, in confidence to a bishop, provincial, superior or other figure of authority, referring to matters of conscience or letters containing references to named third parties of a defamatory nature or containing information relating to the personal circumstances of named third parties.

What is an Archivist Do With Records Identified As Sensitive or Confidential?

Having identified records that are sensitive or confidential the next question is what are you going to do with them. We have already established that under both civil and ecclesiastical law good grounds have been advanced for refusing access to such material by researchers such as the need to protect the rights of individuals named or referred to in particular documents or files. There are two strategies by which this can be effected: the outright destruction of such records or their retention for a specified or unspecified period. Let us now look at the first of these.

1 Destruction versus Restriction

Some archivists might argue that in order to deal satisfactorily with confidential records one should not merely withhold them from public scrutiny but rather go one step further and destroy them entirely. Sister Mary Coke of the Society of the Sacred Heart described in a recent issue of Catholic Archives how this very question was raised at a conference of archivists of her Order held in France.⁴ One archivist had argued that documents containing remarks made about individuals in letters from local to major superiors should be destroyed as they were damaging to a person's character.

Sister Mary, reflecting on this proposition later, noted that Sister Helen Forshaw, in another article in Catholic Archives, this time on the archives of St. John's Seminary at Wonersh, had stated that confidential material, held there, which concerned the assessment of students for ordination was reserved but kept.⁵ Sister Mary drew a parallel between the two sets of sensitive records and quite reasonably suggested that rather than destroying such material it should simply be kept closed well beyond the lifetime of the individuals concerned.

The writer went on to stress the importance of preserving the integrity and authenticity of the archives however uncomfortable in the short-term that might be for some. She argued that it may be a disservice to deceased members of religious congregations for religious archivists to record and then publish information concerning them which does not give the full truth while at the same time giving every assistance to lay persons tracing their family history.

The key point here surely is that the impulse to destroy sensitive or confidential records, as a general rule, is in itself a statement of a lack of confidence by Church archivists in their capacity to prudently and reasonably deal with such records. Of course some documents can quite properly be destroyed. Something of a myth has grown up that says that the role of the archivist is to preserve all documents irrespective of their merits or worth. But this is not what the archivist does. In fact the role of the archivist is to appraise records for their evidential value, to discern, discriminate and where appropriate to discard as well as to preserve.

It is perfectly permissible and responsible for the archivist to destroy records but – and this must be stressed – only after the right questions have been asked of the material concerned. For example, one may ask whether the document or documents only relate to an individual, such as a letter dealing with matters of conscience, or whether they shed light on the exercise of authority or the handling of disciplinary procedures or other aspects of the administration of a congregation, society or diocese?

2 Methods for Restriction Access to Records Identified as Sensitive

(a) The Use of a General Closure Date:

The best known mechanism by which sensitive records are withheld from researchers is through the use of a general closure date for all files. In the civil sphere this is popularly referred to as the 'thirty-year rule'. The 'thirty-year rule' is enshrined in national archives legislation regulating access to public records in the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland.

It is now standard practices for Catholic Church archival repositories in these islands to also utilise a general closure date to regulate access to their archives. However, thinking on this subject within the Catholic Archives Society has evolved in recent years. The Society published a set of guidelines for its members in 1978 which included the recommendation that Church archives employ a thirty-year closure rule for most material and a one hundred-year rule for personal material. However, a second edition, published in 2000, retreated from such strictures and instead recommended that Church archives should:

decide upon a date beyond which no material will be available to, or copies for, outside enquirers. This will vary and it is not realistic to suggest one date that is appropriate to every organisation.⁶

Possibilities such as following the Public Record Office's 'thirty-year rule', or adopting a fifty-year or one hundred-year rule were mentioned but it was left to each church archival repository to choose a rule that was suitable for its own requirements.

It is likely that, in the period between the publication of the first and second editions of the guidelines, it was discovered that it is not always practical for Church archives to attempt to rigidly apply a 'thirty-year rule'. For many Church archives, thirty years is just too recent a date for opening up records, especially since many of them are chronically understaffed, and still attempting to clear substantial backlogs in their cataloguing.

There is, in addition, another problem to be confronted when considering applying a 'thirty-year rule' or something like it. A closure date operated in a chronologically advancing manner such as a 'thirty-year rule' may be too crude and mechanistic an instrument to apply to some Church archives. For example, the main holdings in diocesan archives consist of the papers of individual bishops, which are arranged as discrete collections encompassing all records created during a single episcopate. Most diocesan archivists, accordingly, find it makes better sense to open up a complete collection at a stroke rather than be tied to opening a collection in piecemeal and incremental fashion in rigid adherence to a thirty, forty or fifty-year rule.

However dioceses or congregations decide to regulate the opening of their archives, it is desirable that they should operate a general closure date that is not markedly more conservative than the 'thirty-year rule'. Given that, as we shall see, Catholic Church archives can employ appropriate practical measures to selectively withhold files or individual documents of a sensitive or confidential nature while at the same time releasing the vast bulk of a particular collection, the concept of a blanket 'hundred year rule' must now be regarded as outdated and anachronistic.

Sometimes the task of determining the closure period is taken by the agency which deposits the records. In such instances the depositor will specify particular requirements with regard to restrictions on access.

(b) Dealing with a File or Series of Files:

Within a collection can one distinguish between a file or a series of files or even single documents and the remainder of the collection? Can one portion be open while the other remains restricted? Sometimes a file or a series of files presents a difficulty because of the sensitive nature of all or a major portion of the contents of the file or files. In such situations it is appropriate for the archivist to withhold the entire file or files for a fixed period of anywhere from ten to one hundred years or more when the whole file or files can be released, or until a set date in the future when the status of the file or files can be reviewed with a view to their possible release.

(c) Dealing with a Single Item in a File:

Sometimes a file will contain a single document which presents a problem. In such cases, the archivist might be tempted to close the entire file on the basis that the single offending item has contaminated the whole – but such an action is surely a bit drastic. A far more reasonable solution would be to remove the problem item from the file in order to permit the release of the otherwise non-sensitive file to researchers. When in such circumstances an item has been removed from a file, the archivist should replace it with a withdrawal statement informing researchers that at a particular place in a file a document has been removed and indicating either how long the item will remain closed to inspection or the future date when its closed status will be subject to review.

(d) Dealing with a Portion of a Document:

What can you do where only a small portion of a single document causes a difficulty? For example if a person is identified by name or circumstances in a document which if released might cause distress to them or to others but where the remainder of the document could be of real and legitimate interest to researchers. In such cases the document can be removed from the file and photocopied. Then the name of the person can be blocked out on the photocopy by a felt marker and the photocopy can be returned to the file in place of the original document.

(e) Review of Restricted Material:

As we have seen, where files or documents are closed it is usually either for a fixed period or until a date for further review has been reached. If upon reaching the date for review the material is still of great sensitivity then the archivist can fix upon a future date for a second review. If however, the level of sensitivity has greatly diminished, then the archivist can fix a future date for its release. If the sensitivity has entirely dissipated, then the archivist can release the material immediately.

The archivist should periodically review restricted material that is closed either for a fixed number of years or which has been closed pending a review at a specified date. The closure date thus should not be regarded as sacrosanct. It is merely intended to be indicative of the degree to which material was judged to be sensitive or confidential at the time it was first examined and catalogued. The archivist should not adopt a rigidly defensive posture regarding previous judgements made as to the restriction of certain documents or files but instead should take into account changing circumstances which may allow material to be released sooner than previously anticipated.

(f) Disclosure of Restrictions on Access to Archives:

Archivists should always endeavour to be open and transparent about decisions regarding restrictions on access to archives. Some archivists might feel tempted to be discreet if not secretive concerning the withholding of sensitive files or documents in their custody. However, I would argue that the frank disclosure of such information helps to maintain trust between the archivist and his or her researchers. Being open about such a delicate aspect of the archivist's work makes it more likely that researchers will be understanding of the decisions which archivists are obliged to take and have greater confidence that such decisions on access are based on proper professional considerations and procedures.

Being open with researchers of course means communicating information through your finding aids. Thus you should briefly indicate in the descriptive list or catalogue where appropriate that the identified material is closed until a specified date, or its status will be reviewed so many years hence, or that a document has been withdrawn.

CONCLUSION:

The Church archivist need not despair or panic when confronted by sensitive or confidential records. Yes, you will on occasion be faced with difficult choices and with challenging situations. But remember that you do not operate in a vacuum. You firstly have to operate within the laws and regulations laid down by the Church, such as the Code of Canon Law and regulations decreed by diocesan and religious authorities. Secondly, you can draw on the principles governing contemporary professional archival best practice and finally, you can apply the kind of techniques, such as I have outlined, to make the task easier.

You don't have to be an expert to successfully navigate in this perilous ocean – but you do have to apply basic common sense, employ a degree of sensitivity towards others, and be flexible in your approach. The critical thing is not to wait until dilemmas confront you and stampede you into precipitous decisions with perhaps grave consequences. You should, in contrast, be pro-active and put in place a comprehensive access policy as the foundation for all the decisions you or others in authority are obliged to make.

ARCHIVAL THEORY AND STANDARDS IN ECCLESIASTICAL ARCHIVES: PART II

Rev. Joseph Fleming

LEGAL ISSUES

There are various legal sources that influence the function of archives. They can be deduced from the nature and situation of each archive and thus we may consider European Union, British, Spanish and Canon Law. Unfortunately, given that the archive of the World Council of Churches lies beyond the EU, and as an ecumenical, rather than exclusively Catholic institution, lies also outside the jurisdiction of Canon Law, it must be excluded from detailed discussion¹. Nevertheless, it is to be hoped that many of the general legal trends will be applicable, especially in the field of freedom of information.

The principles of current Spanish legislation flow from the Constitution of 1978, article 46 of which guarantees Spanish citizens the right of access to information and culture². Moreover, Spain is divided into seventeen autonomous regions, each of which has its own legislative assembly ('junta'). Santiago de Compostela (the Cathedral Archive of which is here under examination) is the capital of Galicia and the seat of its autonomous government. The region comprises the provinces of La Coruna (in which Santiago is situated), Lugo, Orense and Pontevedra. It is a bilingual region, where Spanish and Galician are spoken and bilingualism constitutionally guaranteed. The Diocese of Iria Flavia was translated to Santiago by Bishop Theodomir in 814. It was a suffragan of Braga, but became a metropolitan see in 1120. Today the Archdiocese of Santiago comprises the cities of Santiago de Compostela, La Coruna and Pontevedra. Its suffragans are the Dioceses of Lugo, Orense, Tuy-Vigo and Mondonedo-Ferrol. The ecclesiastical Province of Santiago is almost coterminous with the whole of Galicia, there being merely a fringe of Orense belonging to the Diocese of Astorga.

Both the national and autonomous governments possess the appropriate authority to enact archival legislation. Two fundamental concepts are constantly present: viz. a cultural heritage which is to be preserved; and public access to that heritage and to personal files. A Council of Historical Heritage co-ordinates legislation at both national and autonomous levels. Law 16 of the Spanish Historical Heritage (25 June 1985) defines what comprises such heritage, and Title vii, articles 48-66 deal with documentary heritage. Article 52 states the obligation of conservation, cataloguing and making archives available for research. Article 57 also deals with the classes of documents open to researchers and allows for the possibility of access to restricted material in certain cases. Articles 59-60 concerns the creation of state archives, while article 62 guarantees public access to the same. In Galicia this legislation is complemented by Decree 307 (23 November 1989) which regulates the system of archives and documentary heritage in the autonomous region. Articles 18 and 105b of the national Constitution refer to public access to archives, while Title iv of Law 30 (26 November 1992) of the juridical regime of public administrations and common administrative procedures makes provision for the citizen's right of access to archives according to the Constitution and law. The following article illustrates these rights and determines those categories of records to which access may be denied: e.g. national security and certain personal information.

Data protection is covered by Law 5 (29 October 1992) which regulates the processing of personal data. Article 4 requires that electronic data be accurate and used only for the purpose for which it was gathered. Article 6 stipulates that consent be given before data is collected, except where it is taken from a public source. Article 7 deals with personal details which may not be asked, those that may be asked if the law requires it, and criminal records which may be kept in state files. Articles 8-9 allow electronic medical records to be kept by the relevant institutions and oblige electronic records to be held securely, prohibiting the creation of non-secure data bases. Articles 10-11 require those responsible for the data bases to observe professional secrecy, regulate the transfer of data, and ensure that the ends are legitimate and the subject is not prejudiced. The next few articles deal with the rights of the individual regarding data which refer to him/her. Article 13 allows the subject the right to know if there is an electronic file on him/her, who has custody of it, and why that file has been created. Article 14 permits the subject to see the file, to receive a copy of it, and guarantees that the file will not be shown in code so as to render it indecipherable. Finally, article 15 allows for inaccurate information to be corrected and/or deleted. This law limits itself to electronic data, but in the light of trends with the EU it is probable that it will be extended to all public files. Moreover, given the legal principle of equality and collaboration between state and non-state archives, even if all such legislation is non-binding on the Cathedral Archives of Santiago de Compostela, it will certainly be carefully considered. The present programme of implementing a gradual computerisation of the archive will naturally encompass Spanish legislation on data protection.

The Archdiocese of Liverpool was canonically erected (as a suffragan diocese of Westminster) on 25 September 1850. It was elevated to metropolitan rank on 28 October 1911 and currently has six suffragan sees (Salford, Lancaster, Hexham & Newcastle, Hallam, Leeds and Middlesborough). The Archdiocese consists of Lancashire south of the River Ribble, the Isle of Man, and parts of Merseyside, Cheshire and Greater Manchester. It is a registered charity and has a diocesan archive (originally separated from the curial archive and located at St Joseph's College, Upholland, but now situated in the crypt of the Metropolitan Cathedral).

No specific archival legislation exists for the Catholic Church in England. However, the request of the Registrar General in the nineteenth century that all Non-Conformist records before 1837 be collected has been largely complied with, and thus the majority of Catholic parish registers up to that date can be found in their respective County Record Offices. Moreover, by analogy with the Parochial Registers and Records Measures (1978), many parishes have deposited registers that are over one hundred years old in their respective Local Record Offices. The Liverpool Archdiocesan Archive follows the practice of the Public Record Office and imposes a thirty-year rule on public access to records. The Data Protection Act of 1998 seeks to conform to the EU Directive 95/46/EC. Some of the provisions of the English Acts are an extension of the EU Act to manually-held data if it constitutes a file or data base. It guarantees the rights of the individual to have access to data concerning him/her and prohibits any use of such data in a prejudicial way. The Act allows for compensation to be awarded to individuals in cases of misuse of data, and also gives the categories of records which may be exempted from the Act, e.g. those which relate to national security. The issue of data protection will thus play an important role in the function of archives, and national legislation is following a common pattern at EU level, giving member states the same fundamental rights.

Both the Santiago de Compostela and Liverpool archives are, as Catholic institutions, subject to Canon Law and the provisions of the Pontifical Commission's circular letter The Pastoral Function of Church Archives³. The canonical regulations concerning archives are easily accessible; here I will make just a few observations:

- 1 Canon 487 n.1 gives responsibility for security to the diocesan bishop and his chancellor: the following paragraph is vital when considering data protection, since it gives the right to the parties concerned to see and receive an authentic copy of data which pertains to their personal status.
- 2 Canon 535 n.5 requires that legislation be enacted concerning the preservation of old parish registers. In the Archdiocese of Liverpool registers were deposited with the Liverpool Record Office or the Lancashire Record Office (Preston) depending on geographical location. They are now to be deposited in the Liverpool Archdiocesan Archive and an inventory is to be made of those registers deposited in the record offices.

The Code of Canon Law considers it the norm that a records centre be established in the curial archive and a more permanent historical centre in the diocesan archive. The chancellor has responsibility for the curial archive but can hardly be expected to assume the duties of archivist. Consequently, it is usual to appoint another person as diocesan archivist. At Liverpool the archivist is a laywoman (Dr Meg Whittle) and a professional archivist. However, dioceses must also consider the financial implications of employing a lay person⁴. At the Cathedral Archive of Santiago de Compostela the post of archivist is a canonry within the chapter. Thus, according to canon 503, the Canon Archivist must be a priest. However, this is not say that he is thus absolved from the obligation of professional competence. The archive is also governed by the capitular regulations in accordance with canons 505-506, although the bishop's overall responsibility as stated in canon 491 n.1 also applies, as does his right, respecting the legitimate statutes of the chapter, to determine the conditions of access and lending in accordance with canon 491 n.3.

The Circular Letter of the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church goes beyond the provisions of Canon Law in order to place the ecclesiastical archive within the mainstream of archival practice. The first part of the document gives a mission statement for all types of ecclesiastical archive: viz. the provision of an historical testimony of the Church existing throughout history as a community of Christ's faithful, and a resource from which the experience of the mission of the Church may be drawn. The second part recommends that an historical archive be established in every diocese in order to gather material from other ecclesiastical bodies, e.g. religious houses, and even gifts or loans from private collections. It also recommends that contemporary records management techniques be used in the curial archive, taking account of the issues surrounding the cataloguing of non-documentary records. The Commission also recommends that Church archivists collaborate with civil archives and national heritage bodies, even to the point of formulating common policies and plans of action, and that the latest techniques be employed and training programmes for archivists be established. Archivists are to be competent, trained professionals and should be given stable employment. The diocesan archivist may also undertake other archival duties within the diocese, and even the curial archive (with appropriate safeguards) may be used for legitimate research. Records are to be kept in suitable conditions and an inventory and finding aids are to be created, especially using the latest advances in technology. Finally, the Commission recommends that norms of access should be uniform and in harmony with civil legislation, and that public use and research should be fostered.

OVERVIEW

Cox has given a recent case study of an ecclesiastical archive⁵. In it he examines the processes of establishing an American diocesan archive on professional lines. He mentions the importance of the records for both ecclesiastical and social history and also their significance for the good government of the diocese. He quotes these reasons as the fundamental justification for the maintenance of a diocesan archive. He then lists six problems faced by an ecclesiastical archive which need to be overcome in order to provide an effective and professional service, viz.: (a) Processing and preservation; (b) Scattered records; (c) Absence of a transfer system to the diocesan archives; (d) Lack of archival assistance for parishes and other ecclesiastical organisations; (e) Lack of funding; (f) Facilities which impede a modern archival programme.

He says that the archive should be at the service of the diocese and the wider community, and that it should thus offer research facilities and an outreach programme. It should be staffed by a professional archivist with adequate funding and should be a member of professional archival societies. In the case study he recognises that the archive building requires refurbishment, i.e. it should be adapted to meet the needs and standards of a modern repository. Ideally, the archive should contain a repository, a reading room, staff facilities and an exhibition space. Another positive step would be to establish effective record management facilities throughout the diocese. Although this is not the direct responsibility of an archivist, he or she would be able to offer valuable advice to the Vicar General, who would have the primary responsibility to issue norms for the uniform processing of records throughout the diocese. Furthermore, norms must be established for the transfer of records from parishes to the diocesan archives, first defining the classes of documents to be transferred and identifying which possess historical value. This would also entail the creation of a retention schedule with destruction dates. The type of documents that would be transferred to the diocesan archive would be parish registers and other key records, e.g. title deeds, architectural plans, censuses etc.

Cox argues that the archivist should also determine the diocesan 'archival mission' and produce a 'mission statement'. However, before this could be done a survey of the records already on deposit – in the curia, in parishes, and in other relevant ecclesiastical bodies – would need to be taken. The archivist should also devise a scheme for the gradual implementation of the aims of the mission statement. Cox also considers it vital for the diocesan archive to make contact with local academic institutions, especially universities. The chief aims would be to encourage research using primary sources and for students to gain practical archive experience. This would also be beneficial to the archive in the form of volunteer work. Cox is convinced that the diocesan archive should give priority to public use of its resources, seeking to create a high profile. This in turn should attract researchers. The archive should also have an outreach programme and organise occasional exhibitions. Finally, he sets out what he considers to be the principal steps in establishing an efficient archival administration: (a) the archivist must decide on priorities and identify which tasks are the most urgent; (b) a survey of parish archives will then be required, with a view to recommending diocesan records management and transfer policies; (c) adequate reprographic services and an outreach programme will be required; (d) financial implications must be considered, but because an archive is an important diocesan service adequate funding should be made available.

Cox has offered a case study not dissimilar to that of the Liverpool Archdiocesan Archive. However, there are points which are applicable to all three archives under consideration: e.g. the historical and research value of the deposits and the concept of public service. Moreover, Cox's insistence that the archivist should be professionally qualified and a member of a professional archival organisation implies that he is aware that there are professional standards to be observed for the smooth functioning of the archive. This is also reflected in his desire to have buildings adapted in order to comply with modern archive standards. The fact that he also proposes the implementation of a diocesan records management system is yet another implicit recognition of the need for standards if a professional level of practice is to be achieved.

THE THREE ARCHIVES

The Santiago de Compostela Cathedral Archive is the working archive of an ancient institution, whereas the Liverpool Archdiocesan Archive is of more recent foundation and deals with records generated by the Archbishop and his curia. Yet another type of ecclesiastical archive is that of the World Council of Churches, which serves to preserve the records of an international and ecumenical body. Despite the different parameters within each, we can see that the three archives have many similarities. While it should never be forgotten that all archives serve their creating bodies and have a unique set of records, nevertheless all archives have the function of conserving the records deposited in them, and thus share some basic features, whether they be the archive of an ecclesiastical body or not.

The Santiago de Compostela Cathedral Archive defines the nature of the post of Canon Archivist and his relationship to the cathedral chapter, while the Liverpool Archdiocesan Archive has an extensive mission statement which sets out the aims of the archive in terms of maximum efficiency. The World Council of Churches did not give any details about its one archivist. At Liverpool a professional archivist is employed, assisted by volunteers and advised by the Lancashire Record Office, while the Canon Archivist at Santiago has more than twenty years' experience and is an active participant in archival work in Spain, both ecclesiastical and secular. He is also able to employ three assistants, and these tend to be history graduates. Both Liverpool and Santiago have maintenance staff: the latter employs its own cleaners and uses the services of a conservator.

In terms of intellectual control, each archive identifies its collecting policy with the production of its respective creating body. Thus at Santiago the 'Indice de legajos' reveals that the collections of documents reflect the records generated by the cathedral chapter, although not necessarily within the cathedral complex, since some refer to capitular property or benefices elsewhere. However, the method of collection is carefully regulated by a series of explicit norms. At Liverpool the mission statement gives a clearly-defined collecting policy and provides for the intellectual control of parish registers deposited in County Record Offices. The archive of The World Council of Churches receives records from the various departments when they are ten years old. It is interesting to note that none of the archives has its own appraisal system.

At Liverpool the archivist is aware of ISAD(G) as a proposal for listing, but she follows the norms of 'The Scheme of Classification for Diocesan Archives' of the Catholic Archives Society, which in turn is centred on the categories of records usually generated by bishops and the diocesan curia. Like ISAD(G), the CAS scheme arranges records hierarchically. However, it has two weaknesses: viz. it presents a closed list of categories, so that some records which in fact exist in a particular archive would not fit into a category according to the scheme; and the scheme only gives guidance at two levels of the hierarchy as opposed to the six of ISAD(G). Santiago's reply does not mention the principle of hierarchy, but it does base itself on that of provenance. Explicit archival norms given by national and autonomous authorities are also followed. Unfortunately the archive of the World Council of Churches gives no details of its listing policies. However, the latter is in the forefront of on-line finding aids. Together with the WCC Library, twenty per cent of the collection is indexed on-line and can be ordered via the internet. The Santiago archive has produced a series of finding aids as part of its drive towards electronic access. These aids are constructed according to national, international and professional archival norms, and it is also hoped to integrate the cathedral document collections into the autonomous region's on-line service. At Liverpool, on the other hand, a word-processed finding aid has been produced and this is available for consultation in printed form. The mission statement aims to address computerisation in the future.

All three archives concur in providing a public service for researchers both in terms of access and facilities. The Santiago de Compostela Cathedral Archive has an outreach programme which involves providing experience for history students. The Liverpool Archdiocesan Archive includes the preparation of an educational outreach programme in its mission statement. Finally, the archive of the World Council of Churches is also open to all interested parties. In all three archives there is a concern to keep the records in optimum conditions and certain standards have been explicitly followed to achieve this end. Ecclesiastical archives, like all archives, thus have the duty to preserve and organise their collections. To fulfil this duty they should be aware of those archival standards which tend towards an efficient practice which favours public access and makes the best use of technological advances.

To be concluded

THE ARCHIVES OF THE CARMELITE CONVENT, DARLINGTON AND THE BACKGROUND IN BELGIUM

Margaret Harcourt-Williams

A few years ago I was asked to visit the Carmelite Convent in Darlington to prepare a catalogue of their archives. This has developed into an ongoing project and I now spend a week there every year.

Most of the Carmelite Convents in England and Wales were founded in the 1920s and 30s by the Prioress of the Carmel at Notting Hill, Mother Mary of Jesus. But there were also three English Carmelite communities founded in the Low Countries in the seventeenth century, that came to England after the French Revolution.

The first was founded in Antwerp in 1619 and dedicated to St Joseph and St Anne. This moved to Lanherne in Cornwall and closed in 2000, when the community and the archives moved to St Helens. The Carmel at Hoogstraten, dedicated to Our Lady of Sichem, which moved to Chichester, was founded from Antwerp in 1678. It closed in 1994 and some of the community and the archives went to the Carmel in Baltimore, USA, which had been founded from Hoogstraten in 1790. Darlington Carmel, which was also founded from Antwerp and which is dedicated to Our Lady of Mount Carmel and St Joseph, still exists.

By the time St Teresa of Avila died in 1582, her reformed (Discalced) Carmelite foundations extended beyond Spain and into Flanders. In the early seventeenth century an English widow, Lady Lovell, who was living in Brussels, and who had herself twice tried to enter religious life, decided to make her own foundation. Three English girls who had already been professed in Flemish Carmels came together to form an English Discalced community in Antwerp and subsequently many young women came from England to enter there. The numbers were such that in 1648 a group of twelve left Antwerp to found a second English Carmel at Lier, a small town on the River Nethe about 20 miles to the south.

In Lier, the sisters occupied three houses in succession, all of which still stand. The first of these, where they stayed when they first arrived, is now fairly derelict. The second, in which they lived in the later part of the seventeenth century, is now two exceptionally well restored family homes, while the third, which was purpose-built as a convent and in which they lived from 1709 to 1794, is a home for handicapped children. This last property has a hermitage or chapel in the garden. This is now being restored and the archives in Darlington have been consulted for chapel plans. Additionally, the archives include information on buying, altering and building these properties, together with details of taxes paid and of other relations with the town.

The Carmelites stayed peacefully in Lier until 1794. Despite the deteriorating political climate, as a foreign house they were not affected when the Emperor Joseph II of Austria suppressed some contemplative religious houses in his dominions (which included the Low Countries) in 1782. However, about ten years later, the situation deteriorated further and French Revolutionary soldiers attacked the convent. They were prevented from getting inside by the chaplain, Father Roby, and the door at which he defended the convent can still be seen. In 1794, when the French advanced again, the sisters, in common with many other English religious communities, decided to leave.

When the community arrived in England they stayed in London for a few weeks, then went north, stopping briefly at the Bar Convent. They then lived at St Helen's Hall near Bishop's Auckland for ten years and at Cocken Hall near Durham until 1830, when they finally settled in what was then open country outside Darlington. When they left Lier, it seems they thought that they might return when the political climate was more settled as the archives include many papers on relations with the town as well as the plans and title deeds mentioned above. This never happened as the French Revolutionary Wars were followed by the Napoleonic Wars and Europe continued to be unsettled, so, despite an exploratory visit to Lier in 1802, the return to England became permanent

The Sisters brought with them to England the bodies of Mothers Margaret and Ursula Mostyn, their second and third prioresses, together with vestments, portraits, sacred vessels, books and a lot of archives. Many of the archives have been folded and wrapped into small parcels, presumably for ease of transport in 1794, the wrappings of which survive, with useful notes of the contents.

However, unlike the community, the archives have not stayed in Darlington since 1830. In the early 1950s many documents were sent back to Lier at the request of a local historian who was writing a history of the town. Although he remained in contact, he had been told that he could keep them as long as he needed to and he still had them when he died in 1970. From 1974 onwards, another Lier historian, M. de Waele, traced as many documents as he could and returned them. But, as there is no comprehensive list of everything that was sent to Lier, it isn't possible to know if it all came back.

In England, community members, chaplains and others have worked on the archives from time to time. Many of the folders and bundles have traces of at least two previous numberings, in addition to the notes made around 1794. These numberings are in red, which are the earlier ones and which sometimes have sub-numbers, and blue. No comprehensive earlier catalogue or list survives although many bundles include useful lists of their contents and many documents have been transcribed and translated into English. Unfortunately, a few of the lists include items that are no longer there. Most of the legal papers and accounts are in Flemish and the correspondence is in English, French and occasionally Latin. In preparing the catalogue, I was, therefore, very dependent on the identification, listing, translating and transcribing done by all my predecessors.

Two professional archivists also began preparing catalogues and generously gave me their notes. Bearing in mind that any original order had long since been lost, I divided the archives into Antwerp, Lier and England and within these categories arranged the bundles chronologically. I made the financial papers into a separate series as the accounts are complete from 1648 to date and are being added to. The Profession Book, begun in 1648, is still in use and therefore is not treated as part of the archives.

The archives consist mainly of accounts, legal papers, correspondence and spiritual writings. They show both the administrative and physical organisation of the community and its spiritual concerns. They begin with some material relating to the community at Antwerp and this is followed by papers on the foundation, establishment and life of the community in Lier. It isn't clear why this Antwerp material is with the Lier archives but its survival is important as there does not seem to be similar material in the Lanherne archives. The bulk of the Darlington archive dates from the seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries although there is later eighteenth century material about the return to England and on the various moves that took place before the community settled in Darlington. Coverage of the rest of the nineteenth and most of the twentieth century is sparse and it does not seem likely that there are more non-current archives elsewhere in the building. However, some papers from recently deceased sisters have been added so a late-twentieth and twenty-first century archive is being assembled.

There are some related papers elsewhere. The diocesan archives in the University of Antwerp contain about one-and-a-half boxes of correspondence between various prioresses and bishops of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. The archives of the Diocese of Hexham and Newcastle include quinquennial reports to Rome from the 1850s onwards and twentieth century correspondence and papers.

As suggested above, it seems likely that the archives brought to England were those that the nuns thought would be needed to re-establish themselves if they returned to Lier. It is therefore possible that some archives were left behind, possibly to be reclaimed on return or on a future visit or possibly just because everything couldn't be carried and some papers were thought to be less important than others. There are probably also some administrative papers in the Lier municipal archives or in private hands. Some papers may also have been dispersed when the archives were temporarily back in Lier.

There is an interest in Lier in the community they call the English Teresians. I went there in autumn 2001 and met the people involved in the restoration of the garden chapel; I was also taken to the house the nuns had occupied which is now two houses. One of these is another former chapel in which traces can be seen of the Carmelites' grille on the floor and of the altar on the dining room wall. The other had been their convent and the garden had been their cloister. The occupants welcomed contact with the Darlington nuns and hope that it will continue.

THE ARCHIVES ARE AS FOLLOWS:

Antwerp, 1620s-40s: letters on the foundation and establishment of the Antwerp community, on disputes with the friars and on the constitutions, list of sisters, spiritual writings.

Lier, 1648-1794: documents of title and supporting papers relating to the community's properties, their relations with the town of Lier, privileges and freedoms eg from some local taxes.

- Accounts.
- Constitutions

- Correspondence on administrative financial, domestic and current affairs.
- Lives of community members, especially of Mother Margaret Mostyn.
- Mass obligations
- Papers relating to disputes with the friars and others.
- Plans, mainly for the convent built in the early 18th century, including plans for the 'garden house'.
- Relic papers
- Spiritual writings

England (Brough, St Helen's, Cocken Hall and Darlington) 1794 - early twentieth century:

- Letters on settling in England.
- Title deeds and supporting papers for the Darlington property, including details of mid-nineteenth century alterations.
- Financial matters: accounts, 1648 onwards and twentieth century financial papers.
- Modern administrative papers (insurance, planning etc.,)

The archives also include a profession book, annals, accounts and correspondence of Wells Carmel, which amalgamated with Darlington in 1972; annals, correspondence and accounts for Branksome Carmel, two of whose sisters moved to Darlington when it closed in 1992; and twentieth century correspondence on foundations in Africa.

The archives from Antwerp and Lier fill eight boxes, the nineteenth century papers fill another three boxes, the Wells, Branksome and Africa papers fill another four boxes and twentieth century papers are being added. They are kept at the Convent and both their physical condition and the storage conditions are good. The sisters will answer enquiries and allow academic researchers access to the older material and the archives have been used recently in a study of the writings of religious women. The pre-1794 papers have been microfilmed for the archives of the Kingdom of Belgium and are described by Pascal Majerus in Ordres Mendicants Anglo-Irlandais en Belgique: Introduction Bibliographique a l'histoire des convents Belges anterieur a 1796, 2001.

There are copies of the films in Darlington.

I hope to continue work on the archives and consider that both the spiritual writings and relic papers would repay further study. Additionally, as modern papers are being added, I hope my annual visits to the north-east will continue.

DISPERSED CONTEMPLATIVE COMMUNITIES

Sister Marguerite-André Kuhn-Regnier

Over the past thirty-five years a number of houses of contemplative nuns have either closed or undergone amalgamation with other communities. The care and preservation of the archives of dispersed convents is a matter of the first importance, both for the remaining members of the convents or orders concerned and for the Catholic Archives Society. Indeed, during the whole of its existence the Society has sought to assist communities faced with closure or dispersal in planning for the safe deposit of their archives. There follows below a check-list of dispersed contemplative communities. Any corrections would be gratefully received by the Secretary of the CAS.

OSCOTT COLLEGE ARCHIVES

Dr Marie Rowlands

St Mary's College, known as Oscott College, was founded in 1794 and located at Old Oscott, Handsworth, Staffordshire, (now part of the city of Birmingham). It outgrew these premises and in 1838 a new college was built on a site two miles away, which became known as New Oscott. The College comprised both a school and a seminary educating both future Catholic priests and future Catholic laymen. Some of the latter distinguished themselves in the army, the professions, especially law, and the civil service.

The seminary was separated from the school in 1873 and removed to Olton, Warwickshire. The school was closed in 1889 and the seminary returned to the main building. In 1897 it became a Central Seminary serving 7 dioceses of southern and midland England including Westminster. In 1909 the Central seminary was dissolved and St Mary's became the seminary of Birmingham Archdiocese. It has continued to accept students from other dioceses.

An important body of archives has accumulated during the two hundred years of the seminary's existence. These have now been transferred to the Birmingham Archdiocesan Record Office where they may be preserved and properly looked after and where they can be made available for scholarly enquiries.

CORRESPONDENCE AND MISCELLANEOUS PAPERS

There are more than 8,000 miscellaneous papers comprising correspondence, correspondence copybooks, rules, examination lists, concert programmes, applications, dimissorials, and memoranda. These date mainly from 1831 but there are some from 1794-1831, and some even earlier from 1684. Papers after 1926 have not been sorted. Essentially the collection covers the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. There is ample material for a study of the influence of successive Rectors and Procurators. Much can be learnt of the social interaction of the students with the professors, of the academic works, of the lifestyle of the students, and the culture of what, for most of the period, was a closed and very specialised community.

The building of New Oscott in 1838-1840 and subsequent extensions and additions are well documented and there is some correspondence from the Pugin and Hardman firms. There is, however, rather more with firms such as Haden and Sons who maintained the boilers. The correspondence and papers before 1897 are mainly concerned with internal affairs of the college. Henry Parkinson was Vice Rector between 1897 and 1924 with full responsibility for running the reorganised Central Seminary. The archive is especially rich during this period. In addition to the day-to-day life and running of the College there are also letters and papers relating to the Catholic Social Guild, the Catholic Truth Society and the Catholic Women's League. The early days of the Catholic Social Guild is particularly well covered. The Rector had regular correspondents abroad, and sought links with the University of Birmingham.

Parkinson was deeply involved with the early phase of the revival of liturgical music both in the College and in the parishes, and was in touch with developments on the continent. The documents relating to St Cecilia's Society are very important in this connection, and former students wrote to the rector describing the improvements in church music they were trying to make in their parishes.

The correspondence of the period 1914-1918 is of especial interest since the College was necessarily engaged in discussion with the War Office about the release and later conscription of College students. Many of the students were on active service, in the armed forces, as military chaplains or as medical workers. They corresponded with the Rector, giving detailed accounts of their experiences. The rector had friends and former students in Belgium and France and followed events there closely. The College took in some Belgian displaced seminary students. It is evident from the correspondence how attitudes changed during the conflict, and the seminary had to adapt to wartime conditions. Some students died on active service and those who returned in 1919 had been through life-changing experiences.

ACCOUNTS

The financial accounts (from 1794), particularly for the earlier years, offer much insight into the costs, sources of income and management of the institution and its relations with local tradesmen, and with its employees. Although there are many gaps in the series, there are ledgers, cashbooks, petty cash books, annual statements, students' accounts and bankbooks showing the management of the College at many levels of administration. There are occasional references to disputes with Sutton Coldfield Corporation and other local bodies. The college continued to manage Oldford (Holford) farm and the estate accounts (from 1842) throw light on local farming. The farm accounts and rent books are a significant addition to the body of documentation of the locality.

The accounts and some other documents which relate to the Seminary when it was at Olton 1873-1888 are separately grouped and cover all aspects of life there, the studies, the library, the examinations, and the priestly formation.

The Oscott Correspondence continues to be an important source through this period for both the school at Oscott and the seminary at Olton.

STUDENTS

There are records of all aspects of student life, examinations, reports, classes, timetables, and holidays. There is much about student societies, excursions and the records of the public man/dean and the junior common room. There is much information about the family background, social status, and aspirations of the students, especially those who were paid for by various scholarships and bursaries. In addition to the major sequences of material there are some individual survivals such as a library fine book, a sickbay notebook and a few student essays.

LIBRARY

There are accounts and other papers relating to the various libraries in the College, the main library, Little Bounds Library, and the students' common room library. The signing out books throw light on what individual professors and students were borrowing. Most of this section relates to the period after 1888.

LITURGY AND PIETY

Throughout the archive there is much to shed light on liturgical and pious practices and there are 23 volumes and 6 notebooks of the day-to-day carrying out of the offices of the church, which throw light on the practice, and development of the liturgy. There are records of confraternities. Parkinson and his colleagues were deeply committed to the foundation and working of the Apostolic Union of the Secular Clergy; this was both important in Oscott and across the nation. There is plenty of material for an assessment of the significance of this body.

THE OSCOTIAN SOCIETY

The minutes and papers of the Oscotian society (from 1840) offer insights into the subsequent careers of the students, both clergy and laymen. The periodical The Oscotian includes much first hand description of Catholic events and controversies and reflects the changing "mindset" of Catholic clergy and laity. It also contains articles on the history of the College, on its architecture and sculptures, church furnishings, stained glass and other matters, together with reminiscences of persons, events and sports. Accounts of the achievements of former students were industriously collected, and memoirs of the more distinguished members were published. Much of this is adulatory as is to be expected but good use can be made of it when it is subjected to critical evaluation.

THE BOARD OF BISHOPS

There are minutes and other records of the meetings of the Board of Bishops for the management of the College, especially during the period of the Central Seminary. In 1897 a detailed survey was made of the work, rules and management of all the seminaries and some other colleges by a sub commission of the Bishops' Committee. The Bishops' correspondence with successive rectors also throws some light on the relations of the seminary with the bishops. The letters of the bishops sending students to the seminary not infrequently refer to the needs of their dioceses. Recruitment from Ireland, especially in the late nineteenth and early twentieth century, had its particular problems and opportunities.

LITERARY REMAINS

There is an accumulation of literary remains (from about 1830), theological notes, lecture notes and a few obituary collections. These provide material for the study of individual professors, and some leading clergy and there is an autobiographical account of life at Sedgley Park and at Oscott. There are lists of students but these add little to what has already been published.

This is a collection that has little to offer the parish or family historian but will be very valuable to scholars researching the history of Roman Catholicism in nineteenth and twentieth century Britain. Taken in conjunction with the diocesan and other seminary collections it will contribute substantially to deepening our understanding of major themes in modern Catholic history.

WHEN THE CHALK DUST SETTLES: THE VALUE OF SCHOOL LOG BOOKS, A CASE STUDY OF SISTER CALASANCTIUS O'SULLIVAN CP

Sister Dominic Savio Hamer CP

Some time ago, when I was writing a little history of the Sisters of the Cross and Passion in Fleetwood, I came across a newspaper account of the funeral of Sister Calasanctius O'Sullivan, who had died there in 1935 after eleven years as headmistress of Stella Maris High School. 'A native of County Cork,' the newspaper read, 'she had a distinguished scholastic career, having been headmistress of schools in several towns in Lancashire.'¹ Intrigued, I set about researching where she had been headmistress and what she had done to merit such a eulogy. Convent records gave me little information and so I turned to school log books and found I had discovered a gold mine. Since their compulsory introduction in 1861-2 school log books have formed an essential item of any school's archives. Examined at regular intervals by both school managers and government inspectors, they have been kept meticulously on a daily basis. Now spanning a period of almost a hundred and fifty years, they present detailed information on the particular school, on the educational system in vogue at any given period and on the policy of each headteacher. Thus I learnt how Sister Calasanctius O'Sullivan's scholastic career was truly distinguished.

Hannah O'Sullivan was born in County Cork on 22 January 1873.² About 1891 she entered the novitiate of the Sisters of the Cross and Passion at Mt St Joseph Convent, Bolton, Lancashire. She received the religious habit, with the name Sister Calasanctius, probably in 1892 and made her vows in 1894. She then seems to have studied for about two years, until, on 4 January 1896, whilst still studying for certification, she was appointed assistant teacher in SS Peter and Paul's Mixed Elementary School in Pilkington Street, Bolton. After successfully sitting her Certificate Examinations in Manchester in July 1897, she left SS Peter and Paul's School on 12 January 1898.³ On the same day, aged almost twenty-five, she became headmistress of St Edmund's Mixed Elementary School, on the opposite side of Bolton town centre.⁴ At first she continued to live in Pilkington Street convent, walking the mile or so to and from St Edmund's each day but on 18 January she went to live at Mt St Joseph Convent at Deane, where she was given charge of the student sisters.⁵ As the annalist in Pilkington Street convent recorded when she died in 1935, Sister Calasactius 'gave of her best to the Congregation. She taught many years in the old school at St Edmund's and numberless were the difficulties she had to put up with. Then after a hard day's work she toiled home to the Mount and taught with fresh energy the novices and postulants, preparing them for the exams which would qualify them for their teaching career.'¹⁶

Sister Calasactius began her career in St Edmund's by examining the whole school. 'The results on the whole', she recorded on 28 January, 'are not discouraging. Some standards [classes] show weak points. These have been shown up to their respective teachers and entries of the same are made in the syllabus book.'¹⁷ She thought that the attendance that week was only 'pretty fair', although she conceded that a number of pupils were absent through genuine illness. She soon experienced the vicissitudes of responsibility, for on 13 May 1898 a second-year pupil teacher who had already been off ill for a week asked for three more weeks' leave of absence and actually took four. During that time her place had to be taken by an unqualified teacher. Sister Calasactius was beginning to keep her finger on the pulse, however, for on 20 May she recorded, 'While conducting the examination of the different standards, I noticed some very bright children who know the work of their respective standards. I have therefore transferred ten children to higher classes today.' The main problem in the school, in fact, was the shortage of space which meant, as the government inspector had reported at the beginning of 1898, that there was 'an unnatural congestion of backward children in the first standard.' The following July the problem remained, for the HMI then reported that he was pleased with everything except the first standard reading and that the boys wanted self-reliance. 'This class', added Sister Calasactius to her entry of the report, 'has been a continual strain throughout the year being so many in number and some of them being inferior in ability but much has been done and is still being done to improve the class.' Her efforts proved fruitful, for in January 1899 the school was awarded the highest grants with the following report, 'The general discipline of the school is good. The standard exercises are carefully practised and the oral instruction, which is given under difficulty, owing to want of classrooms, produces its effect on the whole fairly well.' The improvements were maintained for in January 1900 the HMI reported, 'There is evidence of well-sustained teaching with some considerable general improvement in the children's acquirements', whilst in December the report for 1900 read, 'Altogether very praiseworthy work is being done.'⁸ Sister Calasanctius was finding her feet.

St Edmund's School, however, was in a densely populated area, where sickness spread easily. On 10 June 1901, when the school reopened after the Whitsuntide holiday, only 152 out of 240 children were present, because measles was prevalent. Sister Calasanctius contacted the school board officer as well as the Reverend Manager, Father J.C. Averdonk. 'Active steps' were taken to bring the pupils to school. A week later the average attendance was 209. At the same time, Sister Calasanctius took care to promote the children's health and enjoyment. On 3 July she gave a holiday so that the poorest children could go on a trip to Lytham; and when the school reopened on 26 August 1901 she had already arranged for pupils to go out to cookery classes twice a week. On 16 September she gave special attention to punctuality and cleanliness. In December 1902 electricity was installed in the school. The annual report in January 1903 told its own story, 'The school is in excellent order and taught with exemplary perseverance and endeavour. The progress made during the last two years is most encouraging.'⁹ In July 1906 the pupils were taken to Hall-i'th'-Wood, the home of Samuel Crompton on the outskirts of Bolton. In preparation they read Boys who Became Great Men: The Life of Crompton. During this visit, she recorded, they saw Crompton's mule and Arkwright's spinning frame and their attention was drawn to the style of furniture, the Tudor wainscoting and the Cromwellian chairs. On 27 July she sent some of the pupils out with a teacher to the neighbouring Queen's Park 'to make observations', presumably of botanical and wildlife specimens but she was probably also taking the opportunity to give them some fresh air.¹⁰

By 1904 she seems to have returned to living in the Pilkington Street convent but on 18 October 1905 she and another sister moved to Clarence Street convent near St Mary's church and school on the Blackburn side of Bolton, which was closer to St Edmund's School.¹¹ January 1907 brought unpleasant encounters with the caretaker, who had not cleaned the school in preparation for its reopening. Moreover, as the month progressed and it was bitterly cold, he did nothing to raise the heating. Sister Calasanctius showed him the thermometer. In the summer of 1908 she introduced swimming lessons with the result that some of the children were able to enter a public competition. Since few if any of her pupils would have had baths in their homes, she was doing considerably more than developing their physical skills. Drama was on the syllabus, too, for 1908 closed with a school concert. One suspects that when the medical officer of health called at the school on 15 January 1909 it was at the invitation of Sister Calasanctius, who saw that some of her charges merited a little help in healthy living. The school premises, however, continued to be deplorable, with consequences noted in the school report in February 1911:

As the premises have been fully reported on and are, it is hoped, soon to be replaced, it will suffice to recall the fact that work in this school, particularly in the Girls' and Infants' Departments, is carried on under difficulties as to classroom accommodation, noise and lighting. Owing to the inequality of space the whole of Standard I is at present in the Girls' Department, the boys spending a year there instead of passing direct from the Infants' to their own Department. While this arrangement is convenient, for the reason given it does not appear to work very well educationally since the Standard II boys hardly reach the same level as do the girls in the corresponding class.

All parts of the school suffer to some extent from the migratory character of the scholars; and the home conditions of the children, though apparently improving of late, still leave much to be desired. In these circumstances it is gratifying to find that the ages of the pupils in the various classes of the Girls' Department are practically normal, while in the Boys' Department only about 10 per cent are markedly older than the other scholars in their respective classes.¹²

The Diocesan Report, however, received on 21 January 1913, had nothing but praise, 'I was very favourably impressed by this school. A good even standard of efficiency was maintained throughout and the behaviour of the children was beyond all praise', wrote Father R. Walmsley, whilst Bishop L.C. Casartelli added 'Excellent.'¹³ He would no doubt have been aware that in March 1911 several pupils, miners' children, had had to apply for free dinner tickets because of a coal strike and that Dean Averdonk in 1913 was collecting clothes and boots for the poorer children. When King George V visited Bolton on 10 July 1913, however, there was nothing inferior about St Edmund's pupils. 'There were some novel and tasteful features about the dresses of the young folks', the Bolton Chronicle reported, 'For the most part the female section were clad in white but one school - St Edmund's - presented a pretty picture in blue and white with sailor collars.'¹⁴

The outbreak of the First World War in August 1914 soon brought its own sorrows. 'Several children have made application for free dinners consequent on the war', she recorded on 2 October. 'Many parents and brothers have been called to the front.' A fortnight later she had to record the first death touching one of her pupils, 'The sympathy of the teachers and children has been bestowed on Winnie Howley and her little sisters, pupils of this school, whose father died from wounds received in battle last week.' Yet the children continued to maintain a 94 per cent attendance.¹⁵

Sister Calasanctius continued to be vigilant about health. 'The school nurse examined all the heads today', she wrote on 19 April 1915. 'Only one child was excluded and that was not a case of neglect but of slight eczema.' It was one of her last entries in St Edmund's log book for in early 1915 she had been elected as superior in the convent in Middleton, Manchester and appointed headmistress in St Peter's Mixed Elementary School there.¹⁶ She finished her duties in St Edmund's, Bolton, on 18 June 1915.¹⁷

Theoretically, Sister Calasanctius was headmistress of St Peter's, Middleton, from 7 June 1915 but the Bolton Education Council would not release her until the 18th, when she went directly to her duties in Middleton. Both swimming lessons and medical inspections were already part of this school's schedule. The war had also brought its own agenda, for on 29 July St Peter's celebrated French Flag Day. The staff seem to have made two large French flags and smaller ones for sale to the children. By 4 August their flag sales had raised forty-eight shillings for wounded French soldiers. On 10 August 1916 some of the children were taken to nearby Heaton Park for a lesson on trench warfare. As the sergeant major in charge of the military installations was the father of one of the pupils, he took them on a guided tour and showed them several war trophies in a tent. For 2d. each the children were allowed to inspect fire and gas trenches, a dug-out and breast-works, a listening post, machine gun emplacements, a bombing post, a dressing station, French mortar and shell holes and barbed-wire entanglements. On 21 December that year prizes were distributed before the school closed for the holidays and each child received an orange.¹⁸

Still vigilant about the children's health, when the school medical officer visited St Peter's on 23 March 1917, Sister Calasanctius drew his attention to several cases of deafness. In early July the school held National Baby Week, during which she arranged for special lessons, such as one on Baby's Food and another on Clothing for the Baby, whilst the school nurse gave a demonstration on how to bathe a baby, much to the interest and appreciation of the older girls. In October that year the school won the Swimming Shield in a public competition. On 26 February 1818 a lecture on alcohol and its effects was given to the top classes, whilst two days later, when the school doctor visited St Peter's because of cases of scabies in Middleton, he found only one suspicious case and Sister Calasanctius had already noticed it and reported it to the school nurse. In July - August 1918 all the teachers, including Sister Calasanctius caught influenza. As she recorded on 15 August, 'During the influenza the school has been sprayed and every precaution taken but notwithstanding every one of the staff has been attacked and several of the children. Work has suffered much.' In October, however, St Peter's won the Shield for Swimming for the third time in succession and the attendance at that time was 92 per cent. November proved to be mainly a holiday, first for All Saints' Day; then, on the 11th, for the end of the Great War at 11 o'clock that morning, followed by another half-holiday on the 15th for the peace; and finally from 19 November until 2 December on the orders of the medical authority. On 22 July 1919 no less a person than the Secretary of Education came to St Peter's to present each child with a new sixpence in honour of the peace, whilst on 4 August the Reverend Manager, Father J.F. Hanrahan, treated all the children to an excursion and a nature lesson. 'They also saw some feats of skill and some beautiful animals', Sister Calasanctius recorded. One suspects they went to the circus! Trafalgar Day on 31 October 1919 prompted lessons on Nelson in history, drawing and poetry classes; and at the end of the school term in December all the children took home oranges. They needed them for their families were so poor that on 1 March 1920 it was decided by the Middleton civic authorities that fifteen of St Peter's pupils should be provided with milk and bread and butter every morning at playtime and by 8 April, on the nurse's recommendation, twenty-seven children were being given lunches too. The average attendance continued to be 92 per cent, whilst cookery, woodwork and sports were all part of the curriculum. On 8 April a new lesson was given on eclipses of the sun as there was one that morning. 'Smoked glasses were in readiness', Sister Calasanctius recorded, 'and very good views obtained.' On 5 July, a glorious summer's day, the whole school went to Heaton Park for a nature lesson, tea and sports, with prizes (as well as the tea) provided by Father Hanrahan. The next day, when the Prince of Wales visited Middleton, all the school assembled to see him, to sing God bless the Prince of Wales and God save the King and to give him a lusty cheer. 'He was very gracious', Sister Calasanctius recorded, 'and shook hands with little Hilda Finnegan in the infants' school.' Finally, during that same week, the news came that six out of the eight children presented had won Lancashire County Council scholarships to secondary schools. The HMI's report in November 1921 was laudatory:

Mixed. The work of this department is carried out under very difficult conditions as there are always four and sometimes five classes in the main room. Notwithstanding this however, the general standard of attainment is satisfactory and a surprisingly quiet tone prevails throughout the school.

The weekly records are up to date, notes of lessons are carefully prepared and the various syllabuses of work are drawn up on comprehensive lines. The desirability of including some drawing in pencil and colour for the Girls should be considered when the new Time Table is being constructed.

One of the best subjects in the school is English which reaches a generally high level: the scholars in the upper classes wrote some very good compositions in a test set during the Inspection. The teaching in Geography, History and Nature Study is carried out intelligently and the children are interested and responsive.

Good work is being done in the junior classes although the primary subjects do not at present reach a very high standard. It must be noted however that the school was closed last year owing to an epidemic for over three months and the work, particularly in Arithmetic, is still suffering from this cause.

Std IV is a weak class but it is in capable hands and may be expected to improve. The work of the two upper standards is generally very satisfactory. The pupils in Standard VII, who are under the sole charge of the Head Teacher, are acquiring the habit of self-study and the teaching is largely individual; this is the best class in the school.

All the teachers are most industrious and painstaking in their efforts to promote the welfare of the children and it is pleasing to record that a considerable measure of success has been achieved.

The Head Mistress in particular is to be congratulated on the manner in which she has largely surmounted the difficulties under which the school is conducted.¹⁹

As the convent annalist recorded when this report was received on 22 December, 'It was excellent. The school had attained the highest state of efficiency. Sister Calasactius has every reason to be proud of it.'²⁰ There must, therefore, have been deep regret in St Peter's when Sister Calasactius 'ceased her duties', as she expressed it, on 30 September 1922. On 1 October after eight years in Middleton, 'praised by HMIs and religious inspectors', she went to Mt St Joseph, Bolton, to take charge of the students.²¹ In September–November 1923 she did supply teaching in Larne in County Antrim, Northern Ireland.²² Then, at the provincial chapter on 3 January 1924, she was elected superior of the Cross and Passion convent in the fishing town of Fleetwood. This foundation had been made in 1923 at West Holme, 45 Mount Road, in order to provide Catholic secondary-school education in the town and a private school had been opened, under the title Stella Maris, in West Holme on 10 September 1923. At first the pupils had been accommodated in two large rooms on the ground floor, in the garage and in the garden. On 17 September they had been classified according to their ability and the 'usual branches of a sound English education, with science and languages, were being taught throughout.'²³ Then, to provide for the overflow of St Mary's Primary School, Stella Maris had become an all-age school. By 26 October the garage had been converted into a kindergarten, 'nicely fitted with desks, tables and chairs suitable to babies', whilst from 30 November, the children wore a navy and gold uniform.²⁴ By July 1924 the school, with fifty-two pupils, was becoming well known and both the Fleetwood Council of the Knights of St Columba and the Blackpool Education Committee awarded scholarships for admission. This was the school of which, on 8 September 1924, the highly experienced Sister Calasanctius O'Sullivan became the headmistress.

She soon put Stella Maris on the map. On 29 December 1924 the pupils performed R. H. Benson's Nativity Mystery Play in the Co-operative Hall. The local newspaper enthused over the performance. 'The pupils attending the Convent High School, Fleetwood', it read, are to be heartily congratulated on the success which they achieved on Tuesday evening, when they presented Rev. R. H. Benson's mystery play, The Nativity, before a crowded and enthusiastically appreciative audience in the Co-operative Hall. It is the first time the pupils have attempted anything of a dramatic nature and the proficiency they displayed reflected the highest credit, not only upon the youthful performers but upon the Sister Superior and her staff who have devoted considerable care and attention to their training.²⁵

The production consisted of a series of 'picturesque tableaux' during which the children also sang Christmas carols. Incidental music was rendered by a small orchestra, whilst the dresses, which were very 'artistic' and of 'excellent colouring', had been made by the pupils and their parents 'under the direction of the Sisters at the Convent'. 'When the curtain fell upon the final scene', the paper continued, 'the audience, who, at the request of Dr Cotton, had previously refrained from applause, testified their appreciation of the efforts of the performers by vociferous cheering.' Dean Cotton, the parish priest, then stepped before the footlights and thanked the audience for their attendance and for the appreciation they had shown. He had a pleasing duty to perform, he told them, and that was to thank all the people concerned and first of all the 'good Sisters', who had spared neither time nor effort to train the children. They would all agree with him, he said, that it was one of the best days' work he ever did when he got the Sisters to come to Fleetwood. They had not only done good work in the parish, but they were doing excellent service in educating the pupils. In training the children for the stage, they were giving them practice in elocution, deportment and enunciation.

The school quickly reached high academic standards. In July 1925 two pupils successfully sat for the Junior Oxford Examination, whilst another was presented for a music examination and passed in the first class. Twenty-eight pupils were presented for a drawing examination. Twenty-seven of them passed, twenty-one with honours. On 13 April 1926, three other pupils passed a music examination in Blackpool with first class. By 29 May 1926 Stella Maris had eighty-one pupils and so the Congregation bought 6 Harris Street, adjacent to the playground. With more space at her disposal, Sister Calasanctius was able to organise the first public prize distribution, which took place on 21 December 1926, with special prizes being given by the clergy for Latin, Mathematics and English composition, whilst one of the local councillors donated one for excellent work. The little hall was packed with parents, who thoroughly enjoyed the pupils' presentation of Pearl the Fisher Maiden. By special request it was afterwards repeated in the Co-operative Hall and proved a huge success. Another success was recorded on 1 July 1927 when Father Moah, the Religious Examiner, awarded the whole school Honours in Religious Knowledge. 'Throughout the examination of the four classes', he wrote, 'the catechism was well known, there being but few mistakes altogether. Doctrinal answers were full and sound. The Holy Eucharist and the Mass were the main theme; the examination in one class in a knowledge of the Sacred Vestments showed a perfect acquaintance with every detail. Scriptural narrative was excellently related. The top class shone brilliantly in the complete and accurate telling of Scripture events. The singing of the hymn and the Plain Chant was tuneful and, above all, devotional.' About ten days later the Oxford Examinations commenced, with Stella Maris recognised as an examination centre. Of the eight pupils presented, one passed Matriculation, three obtained honours and three passed; six pupils who had taken a music examination all obtained first class passes. It was typical of Sister Calasanctius that when, on 28 October 1927, during the half-term holiday, a tidal wave caused by a great storm flooded a large part of the town, making many homeless, she immediately offered them shelter in the school. A few days later, on 2 November, her pupils inaugurated an annual event in singing a Requiem Mass in St Mary's.

In 1928 thirteen pupils were presented for the music examination. They all passed, eleven of them in the first class. In May Father Moah again accorded Honours to the whole school for their Religious Knowledge. On 5 June Professor Willoughby from Leeds University came to examine the Oxford Examination candidates in Oral French and the Royal Art Examinations were held about the same time. When the Oxford results arrived in September, five senior candidates had gained School Certificates, one of them with Honours and a Distinction in Latin and five juniors had also passed, one with Honours. In December that year the prizes were distributed by His Lordship, the Bishop of Lancaster. The entertainment was provided by four violinists and a pianist, in addition to a three-act play, A Royal Jester. No wonder His Lordship expressed his entire satisfaction at the progress of Stella Maris! The examination results were again splendid in 1929 and at the Prize Distribution in December, in the Co-operative Hall, the pupils put on the operetta, Princess Chrysanthemum, which was just as much appreciated as its predecessors. It was repeated for a wider audience, again in the Co-operative Hall, on 15 January 1930, when it was followed by a dance organised by former pupils. In his Religious Report in March, Father Moah recorded that parts of the Missa De Angelis, the O Salutaris and two English hymns were sung excellently, the unison and rhythm in the Plain Chant being almost perfect; and the pupils' doctrinal knowledge was excellent. That summer the school had a one hundred per cent pass rate in the Oxford School Certificate. In December 1931 the Bishop of Lancaster again came for the Prize Distribution and, as the local press reported, 'The pupils, who had been trained by the Sisters of the school, went through an excellent programme, every item of which was greatly appreciated by the large audience. Country folk and other dances were gracefully performed by the senior, middle and junior pupils', with violin music supplied by two girls and a boy. Pupils sang several part-songs, 'with sweetness and expression'; there was a piano duet; a recitation; and 'a praiseworthy rendering' of the Marche Militaire and Standchen by the school orchestra. Next the audience were treated to a humorous playlet, Henry VIII and Queen Catherine Parr and to a presentation of the trial scene in the Merchant of Venice. Dr Cotton was again loud in his praises. He said it was not all singing, dancing, music and play at Stella Maris. He was pleased to report that the year had been a very successful one in every department of the school's activities. Former students were now enrolled at Manchester University, at Liverpool Training College and in the Civil Service. In elocution one pupil had been awarded the London College Prize for Outstanding Merit; and the school had also won the Swimming Cup. Following Dr Cotton, Bishop T.W. Pearson OSB said he noted that the Sisters were teaching the children not only to be good inside the classroom but also on the tennis courts, in the hockey field and in the water and he thought that they as parents and he as the Bishop had every reason to congratulate both Sisters and pupils on their successes.

In 1932 the Congregation was able to purchase 43 Mount Road and by the end of the year they had joined it to the original convent-school to provide themselves with a new refectory, as well as having an extra classroom and more general accommodation. In December Stella Maris gave three public performances of the operetta, Laila, the Children's Queen. In the following year, 1933, the school gave another public performance, The Knave of Hearts. At the time no-one would have dreamt that that would be the last operetta that Sister Calasanctius would produce but, after only ten days' illness, she died on 19 January 1935. Her remains were taken the next day to St Mary's Church, where a Solemn Requiem Mass was celebrated on the following morning. The pupils of Stella Maris sang during the Mass and afterwards lined the pathway to the church whilst the coffin was carried to the hearse. Sister Calasanctius had worked until the end and, as the Pilkington St convent annalist recorded, 'Her later years were spent with the same energetic devotion' as she had previously shown in SS Peter and Paul's, Street Edmund's and St Peter's. No doubt many would have echoed the sentiments expressed by the annalist in Clarence Street convent, Bolton, 'May the good God reward her munificently for her generous, self-sacrificing life.'

PRINTED EPHEMERA AND CATHOLIC ARCHIVES

Dom Aidan Bellenger

I

According to The Concise Oxford Dictionary (Eighth Edition, 1990) an 'ephemeron' (generally only used in the plural, 'ephemera') is 'a thing (esp. a printed item) of short lived interest or usefulness'. This paper may seem, therefore, to be somewhat otiose, a diversion from the archives and historical records which form the basis of any archive. I would suggest, however, that 'ephemera' are not only worth considering but are an essential category in any archive, especially a Catholic one. Indeed 'ephemera' is a dangerous concept to use as a reason for dismissal – all archivists are aware that it can take a long time for the usefulness of a record deposit to become clear. Catholic 'ephemera' in particular, reflect the special nature of the Catholic community in Great Britain and Ireland; the materials that are preserved and conserved are distinctive to that community. I would suggest there are at least five reasons for this uniqueness.

In the first place, the Catholic tradition since the Reformation has always been somewhat off-centre. The very word 'recusant', used to describe the Catholics of 'the Penal Times', means 'refusal' and the milieu of the recusant is one of circumlocution and secrecy. The priests' hiding places, the equivocation, the private vocabulary all need decoding. So much in Catholic history is hidden and elusive that it is often in the seemingly ephemeral that the kernel of interpretation is discovered. Grand, formal record-keeping is not the way of a persecuted minority lacking in financial strength and political muscle.

Secondly, while being circumspect and concealed, the English Catholic community was (and is) part of an international Church structure which makes it fit into a much wider ecclesiastical world than its Anglican and Nonconformist equivalents. In terms of archival tradition this marks Catholicism out; while being properly grounded in its national and local context, a Catholic community is never narrowly parochial.

Thirdly, within the national historiographical tradition Catholicism has been presented since the Reformation as an essentially alien force, peripheral to the mainstream, its archives and historic deposit almost by definition ephemeral. The true role of Catholicism in national life is only slowly being rediscovered, not least by such revisionist historians as Norman Davies and Edwin Jones. Catholic historical perspective remains different. A classic case in point is the reputation of Elizabeth I, 'Good Queen Bess' in the Protestant overview, the persecutor of priests and recusants from the Catholic angle of vision. This is symbolised most graphically in the statue of the Vulnerata at the English College, Valladolid: the Vulnerata is a statue of the Virgin hacked at by Drake's pirates', not, from the Catholic view 'singeing the King of Spain's beard' but violating the Mother of God. Spanish Valladolid, by such activity, is, therefore, more truly English than England.

Such counter-cultural insights underline the distinct nature of Catholic archives and artifacts. Thus, fourthly, the nature of Catholic culture is distinct and has numerous levels. Not only is there the refined, polite, aesthetic counter-culture of English country house Catholicism and the Gothic revival of Pugin but also the manifestations of popular culture ('tough' in Scottish terms) which are both neatly reflected in ephemera.

Fifthly and finally the identity of English Catholicism is found on the margins of society and its very liminality gives it its strength. It is at the edges that power often resides. In folklore, for example, if margins are dangerous they are also creative, 'betwixt' and between considered as important zones of transformation. If it is in the liminal that English Catholicism finds its identity, it is often in the ephemera that this identity is preserved.

II

There are many categories of ephemera and the Catholic historian is often reliant on detritus to reconstruct the past. I was recently working on the Benedictine martyrs of the seventeenth century and found that one of the key documents, a charter of 1619, with portraits of five of the martyrs, only existed now in copy form; a photograph, preserved at Downside. Copies of the documents, especially in an era of easy reproduction, are often dismissed as 'ephemera'; perhaps one should check to see if the original still exists.

In the light of my five considerations on the nature of Catholic Archives I would like now to think of some twelve varieties of ephemera, mainly printed, and chosen pretty well at random, which might be worth preserving:

- (i) Mortuary bills and memorial cards. The wording of mortuary bills can tell us much about the person being remembered as well as providing biographical evidence. The mortuary bill of Saint Ambrose Barlow shows how even at his death he was regarded as a martyr worthy of veneration. This item, like all the ones I have chosen, is from the Downside Abbey Archives. More modern memorial cards can illustrate changes in taste from the 'bondieuserie' of the Victorians to the sparer images of today.
- (ii) Duplicates. What may appear as duplicates often have telling differences which may be highly revealing.
- (iii) Postcards. Important from many angles: the philatelic evidence, the context of the message, the subject matter which might illustrate a lost building or, if it comes to church interiors, a liturgical space which has been re-ordered out of existence. Collections of postcards should, if important, be kept together and not just be listed alphabetically by location; often a collection can impart a message of its own.
- (iv) Portraits and photographs. Even when personal identification is impossible a photographic portrait can suggest a way of dress (one thinks here of nuns' habits) or a spirituality which might otherwise go unrecorded. There have been some chance survivors of dolls in nuns' habits, dating from the recusant period (very vulnerable to disposal, I suspect) which now provide similar invaluable evidence.
- (v) 'Holy Pictures'. Again, style and taste are highly relevant, and again, as with postcards, the written messages can be instructive.
- (vi) Ordination cards. Ordination cards, which began to proliferate at the beginning of the twentieth century, are important indicators of both style and a theology of the priesthood. There are numerous similar ephemera including jubilee cards and cards celebrating religious profession.
- (vii) Architectural ephemera. Bills, sketches and architectural drawings often suggest the physical development of a Catholic context, and in the planning of unbuilt constructions often reveal an imagined ideological or visionary architecture as in the Dunn and Hansom sketch of the Downside transept with its very monastic monks [See page 78 Illus 3].

(xi) Tickets. Railway tickets, sometimes perhaps the only remnants of a special excursion, are examples of whole ranges of ephemera which can be highly useful but all too easily disposable. In this category come vehicle information, vehicle licenses, passports, wartime memorabilia and similar items, often destroyed

(viii) Programmes of concerts, parish and school events. Handbills and posters can suggest early evidence for the activity of an institution or parish and can also, at a less important level, hint at taste and agendas. Newspaper cuttings also can provide much information for the historian.

(ix) Menus. Loyal toasts, balance of food, seating plans all tell their own story.

(x) Book plates. As well as being interesting as examples of the printer's or engraver's arts they can also be indicators of status or be heraldically instructive (See Illustration four).

Illus. 4 The Arms of Cardinal

but frequently useful for their social history information.

- (xii) Packaging. Archivists can be either hoarders or clearers, but even the hoarders might be tempted to throw away packaging. If a packet is preserved examination might be worthwhile. An empty tobacco cardboard box at Downside was not only the last remnant of a tobacco 'cooperative' run by the community in Ireland but also retained its distinctive smell.

Ephemera continues to accrue and I have not covered here criteria for selection or preservation, on the one hand, and implications of storage and conservation on the other. I have not looked into the place of personal papers and sermons, newsletters and non-executive circulars. What I have tried to do is to suggest that ephemera reflects culture as well as administration, high life as well as low life, the marginal as well as the central, the exotic rather than the administration round. Ephemera deserves a place in all our archives.

FATHER TURNER: SOME PERSONAL REFLECTIONS

Peter Hardwick

"I have in my time seen a sad decline in manners and morals," – such were the first words I heard Fr Turner utter in public, after which he paused and added, "said Adam to Eve." I came to relish this. The occasion was the Ascensio Scholarum of the bitter January of 1955, and leaving the Academy Room I went to meet the first (and incidentally the ablest) class I taught at Stonyhurst with the warning of the Prefect of Studies still echoing in my head: "If some of them were to pass their exams, Mr Hardwick, it would be administratively convenient; but we must be careful not to over-teach these boys." Fr Turner held by standards in education, but condemned league-tables. High standards encouraged pupils to attain their full academic potential; league tables prompted the distortion of education in the service of prestige and fee-income. In relation to league-tables, undeserved success comes as a lucky break; in relation to standards it is a perversion of truth, hence his response to congratulations proffered on the distinguished results of a moderately able set he had been taking for Ancient History: "This is not a matter of good teaching, Father, but of scandalous examining."

But to return to January 1955: Stonyhurst was at the time a well-disciplined, dull place,

Illus. 5 Father Freddie Turner heavily imposing but not life-enhancing. It could, despite the breadth of its corridors and the width of its windows, feel narrow and gloomy. In this setting Freddie's eyes and wit sparkled and his learning and human sympathy shed a local light and warmth, but it was not enough to transform the scene. His presence at tea in the Square Library at this stage is exactly captured in a poem by Peter Levi

And I should wish to draw you, caught so
Head on one side, hand on the tea-table,
That nervous posture and those bright eyes able To relax in accuracy at a window.... or else exhaling aphorisms like brittle fire of a nineteenth-century rocket,
– by fascination seeming to forget what this lights up so briefly and so little:....

These last two lines point to Freddie's primary failure: he could not, as Headmaster of Stonyhurst from 1961 to 1963, lift the school from its rock-pool of provincial isolation and ecclesiastical formalism and carry it into the mainstream of contemporary English Catholic life – if failure can be predicated when a task is subjectively impossible. For the inertia of the institution was too great; his own experience and energy were too limited; and perhaps he was too kind and sensitive to take on at once the explosive youth of the sixties and the entrenched positions of the Old Alma Materians. Anyway, he could not do the job and should never have been asked to try, and perhaps was not too sorry to leave for Beaumont in 1963, carrying with him his accumulated possessions in a small attache case.

Returning to Stonyhurst four years later, he entered into a time of unqualified success, for he now came in his proper role, as a teacher, and despite his later reputation as librarian and archivist, it is primarily as a great schoolmaster that he will be remembered. I taught alongside him for forty years, on and off, and in that time came across no boy who would not, if the conversation turned in that direction, say that Freddie Turner was the best teacher he had ever had. He was not inspirational, but he communicated as did no one else the excitement of disciplined learning. Nor is my testimony wholly second-hand, for while I was teaching English Literature in one of the flimsily partitioned classrooms of the New Block, my pupils would from time to time lose the thread, fall silent, and tune in to the vigorous prosecution of Latin grammar in process next door, and listening myself, I could understand their preference.

Before it can be communicated excitement must be felt, and at times the precious charge seemed visible as it travelled from the bright eye down the quivering finger to chase an elusive etymology across the pages of Liddell and Scott. Yet his enthusiasm could also culminate in calm and happy silence, and I remember a sunny spring morning in 1969 on which a few of us accompanied him on his ascent of the Acropolis. In those days one could wander at will among the ruins and flowers and Freddie's mind so brimmed with happiness that he grew quiet and smiled and answered questions dutifully but did not otherwise speak.

He never returned to Greece, mistrusting travel in general, and not without cause. At the beginning of the trip he had been lost in Venice: by himself on the wrong island with no money in his pocket and very little Italian in his word-hoard ("approaching the man I said 'Son' perduto', though fearing what it might convey in the colloquial") and the boat due to leave within the hour. But he made it, and I remember him sitting in the cabin on the edge of his bunk, fanning himself with his famous hat and saying ruefully: "I don't seem to get on very well when I go abroad. The last time I went to Paris it didn't really work out." I asked him how long ago. "That was 1940 ... May," he added after a pause. (For the benefit of doubters I mention that he had been seconded as temporary tutor to the son of the American Ambassador.) In 1969, also, things took time before they started to work out and I recall four of us in a very small cabin sitting in tight formation and taking it in turns to be sick into the basin, with Freddie murmuring, "Not illustrated in my brochure."

(He had a reputation for these one-liners, though some knowledge of his manner and profile is necessary for their full effect. One day whilst walking down the Long Room in the late 60's, past desks decorated with pictures of girls in a not quite critical state of undress, in the style then prevalent, his eye was caught by one desk stuck with glossy reproductions of expensive automobiles. "His father sells cars," a colleague explained. "One wonders what some of the other fathers sell," observed Freddie through pursed lips.)

The recollection of 1940 was one of the few small windows he opened onto his early life. Others were travelling down to Whalley by horse-drawn wagon in the dark of a December morning, memories of Henry John, Christopher Devlin, James Monaghan and other Stonyhurst contemporaries of the early 20's, the benign and civilizing influence of Fr Henry Garman, unhappy impressions of clerical life in Rome in the late 30's, and walking from University College, Oxford, up to London in a day. Asked what it had been like, he said, "It was really rather dull."

Yet he kept on walking till the end of his life. His daily round, which used to take him up onto the fell road when I first came to Stonyhurst, was later shortened to the length of the avenue and then to the white gates and back. But he always went. Indeed in this and in other ways his habits were reassuringly constant. He read Jane Austen annually, and when such high midsummer pomps as reach the north came on, it was Thyrsis and The Scholar Gipsy. But above all he loved the Greek classics. The one day of his life passed in Istanbul he spent in his cabin reading The Republic. Homer he read continually, and well on in the last year of his life he was, I think, expressing gratitude rather than self-satisfaction when he confided, quietly, "I think I know more Greek now than ever before."

The last time but one I saw him was about a fortnight before his death. I was looking for a book which I knew to be in the Ryan collection but could not trace. I walked down the Bay Library from the far end and came across him sitting at the first desk, asleep. Seeing Freddie asleep in a library, one knew that the end could not be far off. A few days later, still in pursuit of the same book, I found him in the corridor outside his room. He roused himself one last time for the chase, took down the details and said he would find it for me but it might take time. He ran it down of course, but when I took the volume from my pigeon-hole, together with an undated note, which I shall keep, Freddie was already dead and his librarian's knowledge, so many years in the gathering, lost to us.

The Monday after I saw him, New Year's Day, he was taken to Clitheroe Hospital suffering from angina. In the afternoon he was visited by a fellow Jesuit. Freddie requested the last rites. Asked which of the considerable selection he thought appropriate, he replied, "I think I'll have the lot." After which, said his confrere, "he asked for his walking-stick to be brought next day and then started to talk so volubly that I could see that the only way of ending it was to go". It seems that the same thought touched Freddie himself a little later, and shortly after midnight he died.

XXI CONGRESS OF CHURCH ARCHIVISTS

Revv. Joseph Bezzina and Stewart Foster

The XXI Congress of Church Archivists of Italy was held at Trent from 16 to 20 September 2002. In addition to the delegates from dioceses and religious orders in Italy, invitations had been issued to representatives from ecclesiastical archivists' associations from a number of other European countries, including Hungary, Austria, Portugal, the United Kingdom and Ireland, Poland, Malta, Croatia and Spain. The non-Italian participants were the guests of the Associazione Archivistica Ecclesiastica, and grateful thanks must be paid to that society for its hospitality, and especially to its President Don Salvatore Palese. Archbishop Francesco Marchisano, President of the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church, attended the Congress.

The theme of the Congress was 'Archival Training for Church Archivists'. The opening paper was delivered by Dr Paola Carucci, Superintendent of the Central Italian State Archives in Rome, in the magnificent Castello di Buonconsiglio in the presence of Archbishop Luigi Bressan of Trent. It was a reflection on the role of the archivist in the third millennium. Other speakers were: Don Carlo Chenis SDB, Secretary of the Pontifical Commission, who spoke on new models and methods of training archivists; Dr Francesca Cavazzana Romanelli, Director of the State Archives in Padua, who addressed the issue of ecclesiastical archives as cultural centres; and Professor Vitantonio Russo of the University of Bari, who took as his theme 'The new place of archives within the local cultural scene'. Together with Mass celebrated in the cathedral which formed the meeting-place of the great Council of Trent, a tour of the city, and a final dinner held in a spectacular mountain restaurant, the most memorable part of the Congress was the marvellous opportunity afforded to make and renew contacts and friendships among Church archivists from all over Italy and Europe. It was a happy coincidence that the Congress coincided with the local apple strudel and wine festival.

The overseas delegates were asked to contribute two papers to 'round table' discussions. Those presented by Rev. Joseph Bezzina, Archivist of the Diocese of Gozo, and Rev. Stewart Foster, representing the Catholic Archives Society, were given in Italian but are reproduced overleaf in their original English form.

ARCHIVES AS CULTURAL CENTRES the Malta experience

Rev. Joseph Bezzina

- ARCHIVISTS or RECORD KEEPERS are responsible for culturally valuable material and for this reason archives are to be transformed into cultural centres. Besides identifying, acquiring, and preserving evidence of lasting value, the archivist is to widen his mission by making the documentation and information that it conveys available for continuing use, turning, in this way, the archives into a place for the dissemination of culture.

- This new FRAMEWORK is necessary to reinvigorate archives:
 - it is clear that culture will continue to grow in its economic significance, though it is still difficult to measure, describe, value, and mobilise this economy of ideas and imagination;
 - as a result, archives and similar institutions will become more needed, vital, and respected because they play a more central role in the economic and social life of a community;
 - such a transformation will help to overcome the many obstacles in the relationship between the main body and the archives that it funds;
 - a new framework that should be based on mutual trust.

- The task of turning archives into cultural centres or centres inspiring learning is to take into consideration FOUR AREAS OF ACHIEVEMENT or key principles: people, places, policies, and partnerships:
 - people: providing effective learning opportunities: by identifying needs, maximising access, stimulating and supporting learning, involving users, and reaching out to new users;
 - places: creating a welcome that inspires and supports learning;
 - policies: plans, and performance: identifying how your work contributes to the wider world and ensuring that your organization has learning at its heart;
 - partnerships: working creatively with partners to deliver learning opportunities.

- The designation of this new framework and the fulfilment of this mission cannot be achieved without understanding ADVOCACY – the arsenal of expertise that positively influences the destiny of (a) host organizations, (b) the collections themselves, and (c) the archivists' professional career. Advocacy is an integrated process that motivates people to achieve particular goals. It is thus of the utmost importance to communicate the value and explain the consequences of record keeping to management and to the community in the dissemination of culture; to the first in order to finance programmes, to the second to instill interest in them. Failing to understand advocacy will result in a cultural programme that struggles or fails to fulfil its aim.

- Advocacy initially provides a framework of attitudes and infrastructural tools which are then applied to create PUBLIC PROGRAMMES and OUTREACH ACTIVITIES that help in turning archives into cultural centres. The following is a portrayal of the Malta experience.

(1) Those forming the archives and working within (conscious that without internal support no cultural programme will succeed) are trained and urged:

- to increase knowledge that is to be applied in research activities, and
- to broaden the benefits of research results and the base of support.

(2) Those interested in research and the eventual diffusion of culture are provided with:

- welcoming and comfortable centres,
- helpful staff, and
- a proper guide to all deposits; a short, clear, and precise descriptive hand-list.

(3) Students are initiated in the knowledge of archives:

- by arousing interest in the past in social science lessons through the now standard write-up of a life-history, basing themselves on an old family photo and an interview with their elder relatives. This is followed:
- by promoting knowledge on archives as cultural institutions; that is their meaning, role, and function, with special reference to the complexity of research. This knowledge is further widened
- by visits to archives. The ensuing surprising shock of shelves crammed with dustladen volumes is used as a springboard for deepening the students' knowledge of the actual deposits and explaining the rewards of research.

Except for step one, the process requires specially trained teachers, that in the majority of cases are wanting. Archivists are obliged to take the initiative to promote such knowledge and culture.

(4) The general public is being made aware of the cultural value of archives by:

- exhibitions that aim to educate, inform, entertain, and delight; exhibitions that are held on special occasions and anniversaries;
- talks illustrated with documents from the archives;
- special television documentaries;
- tours within archives, popular with older people;
- by employing special interest in a theme, for example, genealogy, to widen interest in other themes, for example, expanded genealogy of local history.

(5) The cultural-minded tourist is being satisfied by:

- archival itineraries that point out the most significant possessions;
- publications that answer related queries.

(6) Web surfers are helped:

- by virtual cultural guides
- by descriptive hand-lists, and
- by providing the possibility of downloading documents of a great historic and cultural interest.

• It is important that, from time to time, the archivist REVIEW the developing framework:

- by analysing the overall performance in order to identify its strengths and development needs;
- by seeking feedback from peers and users on how well they are doing;
- by developing and improving their practice to build on their strengths and minimising any weakness;
- by documenting the activities undertaken to facilitate evaluation procedures and generate evidence.

EUROPEAN CONFERENCE
Association of Ecclesiastical Archivists
GENERAL PROPOSALS

Rev. Joseph Bezzina

The following general proposals attempt to endorse developments in archival science in the past years, as well as to include norms relative to the archives of the future.

1 • Statutes of archives

It is suggested that statutes are to be based on the TWO-FOLD SCOPE of an archives:

- a repository for an organized body of records and papers produced or received by, in this case, an ecclesiastical entity, in the transaction of its affairs and preserved by it or its successors; and
- the accessibility of the material and information therein available for continuing use both by the entity itself, as well as by any interested party.

• From this two-fold scope follows the two-fold mission of the ARCHIVIST or the RECORD KEEPER, the professional responsible:

- for the identification, selection, protection, organization, and description of archival records and papers and, eventually,
- for making the material and information that they convey accessible to any user.

• The term ARCHIVAL RECORDS AND PAPERS encompasses:

- all recorded information, regardless of physical format or type of creator (public or private), that is created or received by an individual or organization carrying out its activities and that is set aside for preservation and future use;
- all media, that is paper, digital, audio, and visual, and in any format.

• As regards the first scope and mission, that is IMPROVING RECORDS MANAGEMENT, statutes should lay down that the repository is:

- to meet building code standards,
- to have adequate storage needs, for current and future records,
- to ensure long-term preservation of records housed therein, and
- to provide for an electronic record archives (ERA), the archives of the future, so as to preserve the rapidly growing number of electronic records and provide access to such documents to anyone, anywhere, anytime.

- As regards the second scope and mission, that is INCREASING RECORDS ACCESS, statutes should lay down;

- the introduction of an automated pull-and-refile tracking system at the archives;
- the consolidation of finding aids in researcher-assistance areas,
- the hiring of more reference specialists to provide research-room assistance;
- the description of more records in automated formats; and
- the publication of catalogues and guides relative to the deposits.

- Statutes should emphasise that archives are ESSENTIAL in a democratic and educated society.

- Without a careful selection of records, social, cultural, institutional, and individual heritages will be lost.
- Without the preservation of legal documents, individual and institutional rights cannot be preserved and protected.
- Without the proper management of administrative records, church and organizations cannot be held accountable.

Archival records and papers are instrumental for evidence and accountability as well as for social and cultural memory.

2 • Effective record management

Effective management needs professional archivists to manage the archival records and papers.

- The archivist or record keeper is fulfilling a very IMPORTANT MISSION:

- helping to secure society's cultural heritage,
- protecting legal rights and privileges, and
- contributing to the effective management of a wide range of institutions.

• So as to fulfil this important mission, archivists are to be TRAINED in both:

- core archival knowledge, that provides the theoretical and practical basis necessary to work as a professional archivist; and
- interdisciplinary knowledge, that introduces one to other disciplines; knowledge of which will deepen the understanding of archival work and will allow one to specialize in specific aspects of archival work or to function in truly cross-disciplinary settings.

• TRAINING PROGRAMMES should achieve the following goals:

- provide participants with a solid foundation in the theory, methodology, and practice of archival studies, and in the scholarship of their discipline;
- strengthen this foundation by giving them the opportunity to acquire knowledge from other relevant disciplines;
- assist them in developing critical thinking and decision-making skills for records and papers as part of the larger cultural heritage;
- prepare them to conduct and communicate scholarly research for the enrichment and development of their own discipline; and
- inculcate them with the sense of their professional and social responsibilities and the knowledge of ethical and legal dimensions of their work.

• Effective management is to take into consideration the FOUR MAIN OUTPUTS or resources that archivists have identified to be on offer for exploitation by its clientele:

- holdings, the bodies of records and information contained therein;
- services, the storage, preservation, reference, disposal activities, and facilities equipment;
- expertise, technical consultancy, training, advice, and assistance;

- experiences, learning to use sources, equipment and facilities to solve problems or perform tasks, thereby gaining new benefits, knowledge, insights, and enjoyment.
- As regards holdings, the archivist-manager, in line with the two-fold mission of archivists, is:
 - to identify, acquire, and preserve evidence of lasting value;
 - to make material and information therein available for continuing use.
 - As regards services, one point is to be emphasised: disposal activities due to the sheer volume of records produced. So as to cope with the growing quantities of records, the archivist-manager is to see to:
 - the necessity of records analysts
 - the necessity of a comprehensive re-evaluation of records, and
 - the necessity of a disposal schedule.
 - As regards expertise, the archivist-manager has to seek more and more expert advice in the field of modern technology. This is indispensable:
 - in solving electronic record problems
 - in assessing electronic generated records for preservation or disposal.
 - As regards experiences, the archivist-manager is to employ his savoir-faire:
 - within the archives to preserve records that are now at risk and to improve public access to records; and
 - outside the archives, to help entities manage records better, especially records that will eventually finish in the archives.
 - It is of the utmost importance that the archivist-manager records results through STATISTICS and other measurable indicators:
 - accurately, to reflect and document the work done;
 - efficiently, so that the information gathered can be accessed easily, preferably automatically; and
 - clearly expressed, to be understood by those that supervise and fund.

3 • Harmonization of on-line Systems

The age of digitized information poses two problems: (1) the preservation of such records both as regards contents as well as appearance and (2) their harmonization.

- There is no doubt that an unknown amount of potentially valuable records are being lost. For while neglected papers could sit around in boxes for centuries, neglected electronic records can disappear in seconds. The enormous challenge of the PRESERVATION OF ELECTRONIC RECORDS is brought about.
 - by the sheer volume of such records;
 - by the special problems that these records pose: they are easily deleted; tapes and disks quickly deteriorate; hardware and software systems rapidly become obsolete; and systems crash.

- Solutions are to be found by working in ACTIVE PARTNERSHIP with the archive makers, the entities producing such electronic records:
 - to assure that essential evidence is created, identified, maintained, and appropriately scheduled for as long as needed;
 - to work with agencies to make current scheduling and appraisal processes more effective and timely;
 - to ensure that electronic as well as paper records are created and preserved for access as long as needed.

- It is only when the problem of preserving digitized information is solved, that it would be possible to pass to the next step: some form of HARMONIZATION OF THE WEB-SITES of, in this case, ecclesiastical archives on-line. Such web-sites should, ideally, have at least five basic parts:
 - a description drawn on the model set by the Conseil International des Archives;
 - a list of norms governing that particular archives, such as the Code of Canon Law and particular legislation;
 - a historical outline of the entity or entities that produced the archives, for without this background it is not easy to comprehend and describe archival records and papers;

- another historic outline, for the same reason, of the single entities, administrations, and groups that actually produced the different sections of the archival records and papers;
- a descriptive hand-list.

4 • Partnership Church-State and Church-local authorities

Any partnership to be successful and fruitful is to be based on mutual trust. This should overcome the sense of intrusion of two autonomous bodies in each other's affairs that many times prevail in such circumstances.

- A PARTNERSHIP WITH THE STATE is to reflect this trust, as far as archives are concerned, through periodical reports:

- with detailed information on what is being done; and
- with clear evidence of the accomplishments and benefits achieved: it is important to emphasise the worth gained, the savings achieved, and the risks that have been minimised in the administration of an archives.

- A partnership is welcome and even sought if it promotes an INSPIRING LEARNING FRAMEWORK. So, in such reports, it is necessary to point out:

- outcomes, the effect that work carried out in an archives has had on learners in general;
- indicators, suggestions on how the organization and staff of an archives are likely to deliver and better these outcomes; and
- evidence, the tangible results of the activities undertaken and the further promotion of a learning strategy.

- The information conveyed and the evidence put forward promotes state partnership. Seeking financial support through this partnership would also need ENLIGHTENED MARKETING, an adaptive form of strategic planning and marketing that is to exhibit the following characteristics:

- inclined towards relationship, rather than transaction oriented;

- innovative;
- striving for value;
- tied to a sense of mission;
- societally responsible.

• A PARTNERSHIP WITH LOCAL AUTHORITIES is to emphasise the idea of expanded genealogy that cuts transversally through the linearity of the sources and open as many windows as the lives, environments, and situations it encounters. Ecclesiastical archives that, in several cases, are of an earlier origin and better preserved than those of local authorities, can be instrumental:

- in recovering the memory of lived experience;
- in instilling a nostalgia for creating and supporting structures and activities;
- in enhancing publications and books on local histories.

NEW MANAGEMENT OF ECCLESIASTICAL ARCHIVES: CULTURAL CENTRES

Rev. Stewart Foster

cf. The Pastoral Function of Church Archives 4.

In England and Wales the majority of diocesan archives function on a limited financial budget, and for this reason the development of archival-cultural links is often minimal. However, the Bishops' Conference has recently undertaken an initiative (in which the Catholic Archives Society is/will be much involved) to compile an inventory of ecclesiastical archives. Also, in some individual dioceses, there are schemes to list the architectural, liturgical and printed treasures of parishes, churches and institutions. From the wider cultural perspective, this will enable the Catholic Church to become more conscious of its patrimony (archival and otherwise), and will also help to prevent any recurrence of instances of illicit sale or destruction of papers, artefacts etc.

'The archive as cultural centre' is still in its infancy in many respects. Individual archives and archivists have co-operated with scholars, researchers, organisers of exhibitions etc. to convey to a wider public, Catholic and non-Catholic alike, the cultural and historical importance of the Church's patrimony. The Bar Convent at York (Institute of the Blessed Virgin Mary), which is the oldest religious house for women in England, dating from the seventeenth century, has opened its own museum and exhibition area in conjunction with its archival collection. A number of religious congregation archives (e.g. the Daughters of Charity of St Vincent de Paul, Mill Hill, London) have developed heritage rooms adjacent to their archive storage areas and search rooms, while some of the monastic houses (e.g. the Benedictine abbeys of Downside and Ampleforth) have a long tradition of co-operation with local and national cultural institutions. But the overall picture is somewhat uneven.

The archivist's contact with individual researchers is often the principal means to developing cultural links on a wider scale. In my own diocese (Brentwood) we have been co-operating with the editors of a national series of published architectural guides, and documents relating to diocesan buildings (churches, schools etc.) and their architects have been an important part of the archival research for this project.

Exhibitions of a national importance have been staged at Westminster Cathedral: e.g. the bicentenary of Bishop Richard Challoner (1981).

The cultural use of archives is also the concern of the Catholic Central Library in London. Not only does this library have close links with various other libraries and archives, but it acts as an information centre for researchers, the media etc. Some diocesan and religious archives have good printed collections on Catholic and local history, or have access thereto. In Preston (Lancaster Diocese) there is a specialist Catholic library (the Talbot Library) which also acts as a cultural centre for matters of historical and archival interest in North West England.

In my own diocese I am working with our Liturgical Commission to list and note the treasures (artefacts, archives, printed material) belonging to each parish. This will be a lengthy task, but one of great importance, not only with regard to making inventories of property, but also the cultural implications of being able to share with a wider public the patrimony of the Church. The diocesan archive will therefore be a point of reference for those interested in the various aspects of diocesan historical and artistic patrimony.

There is a need in England and Wales to educate clergy and laity alike in the pastoral and cultural aspects of archives. It is essential that the understanding of archival work is not restricted to that of 'repository' or 'storage facility', but that the whole Catholic community recognises the part it plays in the task of preserving and publicising the unique archival and cultural heritage of the Catholic Church in England and Wales, which emerged in the late-eighteenth and early-nineteenth centuries from more than two hundred years of active (martyrdom) and passive (financial and legal) persecution and restriction, and from the mid-nineteenth century witnessed an unprecedented expansion. Although there is now the experience of retraction and restructuring in many places, there is still a great wealth of cultural and archival activity worthy of the Church's participation.

REPORT FROM CATHOLIC ARCHIVES SOCIETY (UNITED KINGDOM AND IRELAND):

Rev. Stewart Foster

Although the Catholic Archives Society (founded in 1979) exists to promote the care and preservation of the archives of the dioceses, religious foundations, institutions and societies of the Catholic Church in the United Kingdom and Republic of Ireland, in this report I will confine my remarks to the situation pertaining to England and Wales (Scotland and Ireland are separate ecclesiastical jurisdictions and likewise civil law varies between each country).

1. Regulation of Archives: The Catholic Archives Society, although a separate body, works closely with the Patrimony Committee of the Bishops' Conference of England and Wales chaired by Bishop McMahon of Brentwood (my own diocesan bishop). The Society and the Committee are jointly involved with ensuring that steps are taken to see that each diocese and religious order is aware of the need for an archives policy. The CAS is willing to provide expert support and advice to individuals and institutions. The Catholic Record Society (founded in 1904), although primarily an academic and publishing entity, has a keen interest in the preservation of archival material of post-Reformation Catholicism in Britain and Ireland, and in its annual Newsletter (contained in one of the bi-annual editions of the CRS journal Recusant History) publishes information on the accession and migration of archives of Catholic interest. The Association of Diocesan Archivists of England and Wales, drawn from members of the CAS (and often the CRS as well) meets annually to discuss common interests and to recommend specific archival policy to the Bishops' Conference as and when required. Although archives are but part of the cultural and historical heritage of the Church, in England and Wales archival material and related artefacts are assuming an ever increasing importance in the awareness of the episcopate and its advisers. The CAS also works in conjunction with the Canon Law Society of Britain and Ireland in matters of common interest: e.g. in the question of preservation and access of archival material relating to moral or legal cases. At the local (diocesan) level there exist a number of Historical Commissions and Societies (some official, others voluntary) which also assist in the collection and preservation of archives.

2. Management of Archival Heritage: This is very much a local (diocesan and religious) issue, although lately there have been suggestions for a central repository to be established in order to house the archives of small and/or dissolved religious institutes and lay associations. At present a number of diocesan archives (especially Westminster) have custody of the archival collections of defunct lay societies. The problem of (especially single-house) contemplative religious foundations is also a priority: some diocesan archives have taken custody of the archives of disbanded enclosed convents (e.g. Salford: Salford/Manchester Carmel, closed 1993), while other closed houses have amalgamated with larger communities and their archives have been likewise incorporated. The Catholic Archives Society, in its journal Catholic Archives, regularly publishes information regarding the migration and present location of the archives of religious houses which have closed. A number of dioceses (e.g. Middlesborough, Brentwood) have instituted a system of inventories which list the archives/objects of art/architectural features of their various parishes and ecclesiastical buildings. This is in keeping with the decision of the Bishops' Conference Low Week Meeting 2002. The Diocese of Middlesborough issues an 'Archives Profile' summary document to each parish. The training of archivists is also promoted by the Catholic Archives Society via workshops and conferences at which expert speakers are provided.

3. The Co-Ordination of Management Systems, especially via electronic media and the internet are still very much in their initial stages in England and Wales. Some dioceses (e.g. Salford) have had a professional archival website for some years. Others do not as yet have either the facilities or the expertise for such a resource, although it is recognised by individual dioceses, religious congregations and lay societies that use of the w.w.w. is an essential feature in modern archival management. There is, however, a national Catholic History website on which the CAS, CRS etc. have pages. The production, purchase, installation and training for use of an integrated system of archival software designed to accommodate a Catholic archival collection is an urgent priority. Again, it is the cost, expertise and personnel required which are the chief obstacles to the realisation of this task. Moreover, relatively few dioceses or religious congregations or lay associations in England and Wales have a full-time archivist.

4. Relations between the Church and State/Local Government: At national level in England and Wales the Royal Historical Manuscripts Commission is the principal body charged with the oversight, regulation and guidance of archival matters, supported in many instances by Acts of Parliament. The Public Record Office (London) and the Local Record Offices (counties and metropolitan boroughs) provide the main statutory archival services. The HMC also maintains the National Register of Archives. Although the Catholic Church is not officially represented on the HMC, nor on the British Records Association (in contrast with the Church of England), nevertheless, a close relationship exists via those Catholics who work on such statutory bodies and individual Catholic archivists who belong to the BRA and/or attend its meetings on behalf of the CAS. Other national bodies, e.g. the Royal Historical Society, have Catholics (clergy and laity) who hold fellowships or who are members. At local level the County Record Offices provide a close and invaluable form of support to the diocesan and religious/lay archivists. County Record Offices will provide free advice and consultation to ecclesiastical archives in order to assist them in drawing up plans of management. Expert advice on preservation and conservation is also available. Individual dioceses (e.g. Liverpool, Lancaster) have sometimes made major deposits of records in their local record offices. The Catholic Archives Society has several of its members employed as professional archivists in local record offices and such members provide a very important link between ecclesiastical and civil archive administration. Finally, the Religious Archives Group of the Society of Archivists (the professional association for archivists) includes a number of Catholics among its members and the Catholic Archives Society is always represented at the annual meeting of the RAG.

BOOK REVIEWS

Plots and Plotters in the Reign of Elizabeth I (Four Courts Press, Dublin, 2002: pp.296) is the ninth major book published by Father Francis Edwards, the former Archivist of the English Jesuit Province (1959-86) and Director of the Central Archives of the Society of Jesus in Rome. His expertise in the Elizabethan and Jacobean period is once again exemplified in a clearly written and closely argued study of eleven controversial incidents (‘plots’ in common parlance) between 1571 and 1601. His list of archival acknowledgements and sources reads like a ‘Who’s Who’ of secular and ecclesiastical repositories: the Vatican Archives and Library; British Library; Public Record Office; Institute of Historical Research; Lambeth Palace Library; Society of Antiquaries; Rawlinson MSS (Bodleian Library); Venerable English College Archives, Rome ... This volume is an important addition to Anglo-Irish Elizabethan studies.

The present Archivist of the British Jesuit Province, Father Thomas McCoog, has edited A Guide to Jesuit Archives (Subsidia ad Historiam S.I. 12: The Institute of Jesuit Sources, St Louis/Institutum Historicum Societatis Jesu, Rome, 2001, pp.xii+178). This is an invaluable work of reference because it lists the contact details and gives a brief description of the provinces and regions of the Society of Jesus throughout the world. The format is in response to a questionnaire sent to each province in preparation for a conference of Jesuit archivists held in Rome in October 2001. Moreover, the publication of the Circular Letter The Pastoral Function of Church Archives was a key factor in the instigation of this project.

Mark Vickers, a native of Louth in Lincolnshire, a convert and student of the Venerable English College and newly ordained for the Archdiocese of Westminster, has published St Eustace White: Elizabethan Priest and Martyr (St Michael’s Abbey Press, Farnborough, 2002, pp.139: £13.95). Eustace White was also born in Louth, and was a convert who studied at the Venerable. He was martyred at Tyburn in December 1591. The author has pieced together the details of the saint’s life, and in a beautifully produced volume has made use of the Westminster Diocesan Archives, the Lincolnshire and Dorset County Record Offices, and the archives of the Venerable English College. This book will surely act as a model for further biographical studies of the English Martyrs.

Another venerable Roman institution, the Scots College, celebrated its fourth centenary in 2000. The Scots College Rome 1600-2000, edited by Raymond McCluskey (John Donald, Edinburgh, 2000, pp.xiv+177: £12.99) and with a Foreword by the late Cardinal Winning (an alumnus of the college) is a well-researched collection of essays arranged in terms of the chronology of the college. There are also six appendices, the fourth of which is a register of the Scots College Archives (pp.164-167). I quote from the introduction to the appendix: 'The document archive of the Scots College Rome is relatively small in comparison with many other institutions of similar antiquity. What now exists of pre-nineteenth-century material is only a remnant of what must have existed before the troubles of the Napoleonic invasion. The archive takes the form of box files with ribbon ties. Supplementing these is a heterogeneous collection of account-books, diaries, photograph albums, and so on. All of this material is on high shelving in the working office used for College administration. Mgr Philip Flanagan, Rector between 1960 and 1967, completed the burdensome task of re-filing and re-numbering the whole collection. He also produced a comprehensive handwritten list of items, as well as an index of names.' The list runs to 106 boxes as well as 160 registers and account-books.

The archives of Oscott College are now housed in the Birmingham Archdiocesan Archives at St Chad's Cathedral. In Oscott College in the Twentieth Century (Gracewing, Leominster, 2001, pp.xi+194) Monsignor Michael Williams, the acknowledged historian of English seminaries, has made use of both the above-mentioned repositories in an informative account of the life and work of the seminary of the Archdiocese of Birmingham. The book also contains a very useful list of Oscott's clerical students from 1888 (the date of the closure of the lay school) to 2000. The author has also made good use of the photographic archive of the college in selecting appropriate illustrations for his study.

Two books on the architecture of the Catholic Midlands include material on Oscott and other institutions in the Archdiocese of Birmingham. Roderick O'Donnell's The Pugins and the Catholic Midlands (Gracewing, Leominster/Archdiocese of Birmingham Historical Commission, Leamington Spa, 2002, pp.xviii+124) and the more localised Pugin-Land: A.W.N. Pugin, Lord Shrewsbury, and the Gothic Revival in Staffordshire by Michael Fisher (Michael J. Fisher Publishing, Stafford, 2002, pp.202: £14.95) are both excellent examples of the use of archival material, both written and photographic, combined with an enthusiasm for the master of England's Gothic Revival. O'Donnell's comprehensive study is replete with illustrations in both colour and black and white taken from many collections, notably Ushaw College, Handsworth Mercy Convent, Mount St Bernard Abbey and the Myers Family Trust, as well as from individual sources. There is a very useful gazetteer of Pugin's work in the Archdiocese of Birmingham. Fisher's book concentrates on Staffordshire, and in that sense can afford to be more detailed. It also brings out the particular role of Lord Shrewsbury as the architect's chief patron in that county. As with O'Donnell, the author has made good use of the Birmingham Archdiocesan Archives, as well as the Birmingham City Archives, the Staffordshire Record Office, and the Pugin collections in the House of Lords Record Office and the Victoria and Albert Museum. The book is also very generously illustrated.

The Midlands was also the setting of the life and work of Edward Ilsley. In Edward Ilsley: Bishop of Birmingham 1888-1911, Archbishop 1911-1921 (Burns & Oates, London & New York, 2002, pp.xxv+411) his great-great niece Mary McNally has produced an exhaustive study of a man whose life was centred on the extension of Catholicism and the provision of clergy for Central England. The Metropolitan Chapter of Birmingham enabled the publication of this book, and for this gratitude must extend far beyond the Archdiocese. Archivally the author has obviously relied heavily on the Birmingham Archdiocesan papers and those of Oscott College. However, other repositories have been utilised: Westminster, Southwark, Northampton, Sedgley Park and Cotton Colleges, Father Hudson's Homes (the Birmingham Rescue Society), the Mill Hill Missionary Society, the Rosminians, Oulton Abbey and the author's own family archives.

Kester Aspen's first book is an important contribution to our understanding and appreciation of the social and political involvement of the Hierarchy of England and Wales. Fortress Church: The English Roman Catholic Bishops and Politics 1903-1963 (Gracewing, Leominster, 2002, pp.x+353) surveys the period from the beginning of Cardinal Bourne until the death of Cardinal Godfrey. With chapters on topics such as Ireland, the Labour Party, and the bishops' response to the totalitarian regimes, this study, based on the author's Cambridge doctoral thesis, is a fascinating investigation into intra-episcopal relations as well as the issues confronting the Church at home and abroad.

Its archival pedigree is a 'Who's Who' of Catholic Archives Society membership, as well as exhibiting a breadth of research in ecclesiastical and secular repositories in Britain, Ireland and Rome. Moreover, the 'Manuscript Sources' section in the bibliography lists the specific files or boxes where the author's material is to be found. The present reviewer has made note of sources in other collections relevant to his own (diocesan) archives and hitherto unknown to him.

Broadly the same chronological period is approached from a different perspective by June Rockett in Held in Trust: Catholic Parishes in England and Wales 1900-1950 (St Austin Press, London, 2001, pp.x+164). This is a study which has as its focus the life, worship and traditions of Catholic parishes, their people and their clergy in the first half of the twentieth century. Indeed, it complements Kester Aspden's work in a most useful fashion. The author has quarried information not only from diocesan archives and those of religious houses, but also (and most importantly given her subject) from over fifty published parish histories ranging from Aberystwyth to Chelmsford and Bristol to Morpeth. She also includes material from the various immigrant communities, notably the Polish Catholics. This book is precisely the type of publication which proves how essential it is to preserve, catalogue and make available the archives of ordinary parishes.

A Roman Miscellany: The English in Rome 1550-2000 edited by Nicholas Scholfield (Gracewing, Leominster, 2002, pp.xiv+202) is a collection of essays, amply illustrated, which have appeared as articles in The Venerable, the house magazine of the Venerable English College. The contributions include memoirs of cardinals associated with the college (Allen, Philip Howard, the Duke of York, Newman, Edward Howard and Hume), as well as contributions concerning the English Martyrs (by the late Bishop Foley), Papal Zouaves, Pugin, Monte Porzio (the College villa from 1820 to 1920), and the wartime College in exile at Stonyhurst. Many of the contributions have utilised the Venerable's archives, and the editor of the volume was himself until recently the Archivist of the College.

Edwin Jones' The English Nation: The Great Myth (1998) caused something of a stir in historical and historiographical circles. The same erudite approach is once more exhibited in the author's John Lingard and the Pursuit of Historical Truth (Sussex Academic Press, Brighton/Portland, 2001 pp.xv+308). This is a full-scale study of Lingard and his historical method – a topic necessarily confined to but one chapter in the previous work. However, this is Jones' tour de force in favour of a priest and scholar who was remarkable among nineteenth-century historians in that his use of original sources resulted in a proto-revisionism which has remained severely neglected until the efforts of the author (together with Father Peter Phillips) have now happily issued in a 'rediscovery' of a truly great figure in the writing of English history. Archivially there is a wealth of material used from seven principal repositories: Ushaw College (the main collection of Lingard's letters and papers); Cambridge University Library; St John's College, Cambridge; Corpus Christi College, Cambridge; the Bodleian Library; the British Library; and the National Library of Wales, Aberystwyth.

Staying in the North of England, Ampleforth: The Story of St Laurence's Abbey and College (St Laurence Papers V, Ampleforth, 2001, pp.v+223) by Dom Anselm Cramer is a scholarly, yet readable and well-illustrated chronicle of a great Benedictine monastery and its school, containing as appendices some very useful lists of abbots, headmasters, significant dates in the history of the community, etc. The author makes good use of the Ampleforth Abbey Archives, of which he is the present custodian. The book will surely act as a model for other Catholic institutions when seeking to produce a one-volume summary of their past.

A previous Archivist of Ampleforth, Dom Placid Spearritt, is now Abbot of the Benedictine monastery at New Norcia, Western Australia. New Norcia Studies 10 (September 2002) is the fruit of the labours undertaken by the Abbey's Archives, Research and Publications Committee. The journal is a worthy testimony to the principle that archives should be used for the spiritual, historical and cultural benefit of the community (and the wider world). Of particular interest is the article on St Gertrude's College for Girls and a study of Rosendo Salvado (the founding abbot) and the introduction of coffee and coconut into Western Australia in 1869. Ross Harvey's article on printed book collections in the electronic age is also very apposite.

Alfred Gilbey: A Memoir by Some Friends edited by David Watkin (Michael Russell, Wilby, Norwich, 2002, pp.144: £15) is a collection of essays by some of those close to Monsignor Gilbey, who for one hundred terms (1932-1965) was Catholic Chaplain at Cambridge and who thereafter operated a unique apostolate from his base at the Travellers' Club, Pall Mall. Although not a biography of Gilbey, and indeed such needs to be written using the archival collections at Cambridge, Brentwood (of which diocese he was a priest) etc., nevertheless for those who knew this great priest the present work is a welcome addition to the late Monsignor's own publications.

Fools for Christ's Sake by Francis Leonard (available from MEL Publications, 5 Darley Court, Plawsworth, Durham DH2 3LQ at £8.95) is a detailed study (pp.195) of the work of the Catholic Evidence Guild. Although not an academic account with the usual critical apparatus, nevertheless this book makes for very stimulating reading in that it is based on oral history, memoirs and impressions as well as the archives of the Guild. It is a model for the recording of the history of societies and movements which are now in decline or which have changed their original scope. The format adopted is one of a diocese-by-diocese study as well as an account of some of the famous personalities, lay and clerical, associated with the CEG.

Reflecting on Catholic Archives (Catholic Archives Society, 2002, pp.72) is a collection of essays, edited by Robin Gard (the first Editor of this journal), on the character and value of Catholic archives. The contributors are archivists (Ailsa Holland, Donal McCartney, Timothy McCann, Kathryn Byrne, Anthony Dolan) and historians (Michael Williams, John Davies, Carmen Mangion), many of whom are members of the CAS. The topics covered include the identity of the archivist, the archivist-historian relationship, the spirituality of archives, and religious and diocesan archives. The volume is a veritable archivist's 'bedtime reading' and the editor is to be congratulated on his achievement in presenting such a ready-to-hand source of inspiration. The Society has also produced Church Museums, being an edition of the recent letter on ecclesiastical museums by the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church (for further details of CAS publications see inside end cover).

Finally, it is with great pleasure that we notice two recently-published studies from Ireland. Irish Church Records edited by James G. Ryan (Flyleaf Press, Glengeary, Co. Dublin, 2001, pp.208, 28 euros) is a new version of the original (1992) title. It is a compendium of information and contact addresses concerning the archival holdings of the various religious traditions represented in Ireland. In addition to the Catholic Church, the book offers detailed information on the records of Quakers, the Church of Ireland (Anglican), the Presbyterian Church, Methodists, Jews, Huguenots and Baptists. The particular focus is that of the family historian and/or genealogist who is seeking to locate and make use of registers and other records. The publishers specialise in Irish family history resources, and this volume is a most welcome addition to the ever-increasing list of books which aim to assist those engaged in genealogical research. The editor, who is a writer on Irish family history, has contributed the chapter on Catholic records. The Diocese of Elphin: People, Places and Pilgrimage (Columba Press, Blackrock, Dublin, 2000, pp.403) is a truly monumental work, well-illustrated and carefully researched, under the editorship of Father Francis Beirne, who is the Chairman of the County Sligo Heritage and Genealogical Society and the Elphin Diocesan Heritage Society among many other organisations. He has brought together both the history and details of archival interest relating to the diocese from its early Celtic roots to the present day. Although not a definitive history of the diocese (by the editor's own admission), nevertheless it is a splendid production with a full archival-bibliographical appendix which can only assist the author(s) of a future history of the Diocese of Elphin.

THE CATHOLIC ARCHIVES SOCIETY CONFERENCE, 2002

The twenty-third annual conference of the Catholic Archives Society was held at St Gabriel's Conference Centre, Ditchingham, near Bungay, Suffolk, from 27 to 29 May 2002.

The first talk was given by Emma McKenzie from Harwell Drying and Restoration Services. The speaker dealt with methods of coping with archival emergencies and stressed the importance of drawing up a disaster plan in each repository. T.E. Muir gave a paper on the preservation of Catholic musical heritage in England in the period from 1829 to 1962. In addition to providing a concise history of Catholic liturgical and devotional music, the speaker gave some very useful tips on using computers for rescuing, preserving and recording musical collections. Dom Aidan Bellenger spoke on the importance of non-archival printed material and ephemera (his paper is reproduced elsewhere in this volume). He illustrated his topic with examples from the Downside Abbey Archives. Matthew Festing of Sotheby's (North of England), who is also Prior of the Order of Malta in England, gave a very informative presentation of current developments in the world of art and antiques as it affects religious artefacts. He paid particular attention to the custodianship of the Church's patrimony and referred to the Pontifical Commission's documents on ecclesiastical archives and museums.

Visits were made either to the East Anglia Diocesan Archives at St John's Cathedral, Norwich, or the Norfolk County Record Office and Stranger's Hall. This year, for the first time, the Open Forum occupied two slots in the agenda, and as usual provided a very useful opportunity for delegates to exchange news and opinions. A full report on the Conference is to be found in CAS Bulletin 24 (September 2002)

EDITORIAL NOTES

Although no longer President of the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church, our co-Patron Cardinal Francesco Marchisano, is very much the inspiration behind these few introductory notes. The Catholic Archives Society congratulates His Eminence on his elevation to the Sacred College in October 2003. He has been a constant source of encouragement to the Society and its Officers – not least to the Editor and his predecessor – and it was with great pleasure that the participants at the CAS Conference at Osterley last May welcomed him (then still an Archbishop) and our other Patron, Cardinal Murphy-O'Connor, Archbishop of Westminster. I know that I speak for the whole Society in paying tribute to Cardinal Marchisano for his support, and we are delighted that he remains a co-Patron.

The present edition of the journal ushers in the Silver Jubilee of the Society, and Canon Dolan's reflections are a most informative guide to the past twenty-five years. Arthur Burns and the late Father Joseph Fleming provide articles of a more technical archival nature, while it is with equal gratitude that the Editor is able to publish a number of contributions descriptive of particular collections: viz. the Brynmor Jones Library at Hull University, the archives of two Benedictine houses (Colwich and Tyburn), the archives of the Franciscan Missionaries of the Divine Motherhood, and Brother James Hodgkinson's 'Day in the Life' of the British Jesuit Archives.

By way of information, and not criticism, I venture to mention the fact that during the past twelve months I have written to quite a few archivists of dioceses and religious congregations requesting a contribution to Catholic Archives. Those who have responded positively will recognise their offerings in the present edition, and to them and to all our contributors I am most grateful. However, I have received a significant number of replies declining my invitation, and this for a variety of reasons: 'the archives are at present inaccessible'; 'I have only recently been appointed archivist'; 'our archives are quite modest in size and I do not think there is much to write about...' Every member of the Society will recognise the difficulties involved in developing and sustaining a working archive, but it is precisely for this reason that we should remind ourselves that no archival collection is insignificant, and thus I reiterate my invitation for contributions. By far the most common compliment paid to this journal is its consistent publication of descriptions of individual collections, and particularly the encouragement such articles provide to fledgling archivists.

Father Stewart Foster

Canon Anthony Dolan

On a wet, cold Saturday afternoon in March this year, having printed off the parish newsletter and uttered a prayer of gratitude for my bishop, who had been kind enough to issue a pastoral letter to mark the beginning of Lent, thereby relieving his priests – for one weekend at least – of the responsible but time-consuming task of preparing a sermon, I cleared a space of about one square metre on the dining-room table. I wondered why on earth I had allowed myself to be seduced into agreeing to give the opening talk at this year's Catholic Archives Society Conference. Was it, I thought, because I had been bold enough to point out to Council that this year does not mark the Silver Jubilee of CAS since the Society was, according to the information printed in every issue of the journal, 'founded in 1979.' Even a non-mathematician like myself was able to work out that 1979 is only twenty-four and not twenty-five years ago! Had I been chosen, I mused, because it was I who, on the occasion of the Beatification of the Eighty-Five Martyrs in 1987, had drawn the Pope's attention to the existence of the Catholic Archives Society by presenting him (on behalf of the Society) with the first seven issues of Catholic Archives, reading matter which he obviously found so absorbing that, eleven months later, he had still not handed over to the Vatican Archives?

After I had scribbled down all this rubbish, the probable real reason for my being asked to give this talk dawned on me. By custom, the first talk of any conference, especially if participants have a long journey behind them, should be fairly light. Some of you will recall the opening talk of the 1982 Conference given by Father Francis Edwards SJ. It was entitled 'In the Footsteps of Bishop Challoner' and consisted of a series of slides illustrating the pastoral journeys of that great apostle of Penal Times. The speaker had taken all the slides. When one particular slide came onto the screen, Father Edwards commented, 'Challoner never visited this place, couldn't possibly have visited it; but I included this slide because I rather liked it!' I hope that not too many paragraphs of my talk this evening will be as irrelevant as that slide!

The Catholic Archives Society was founded to meet the needs of people like myself who, in the 1970s (possibly even in the 1960s and 1980s, and maybe even in the 1990s) were asked (ordered?) by their provincials, abbots/abbesses or bishops to look after the provincial (community, diocesan) archives. This was usually in addition to several other responsibilities such as provincial bursar, abbot's secretary or parish priest. This was certainly true in Britain and Ireland. On the continent things may have been different; but perhaps the only example I can adduce is not typical. When I visited the Archives of the Diocese of Brugge in February 1986, the Archivist, Canon Boudewijn Janssens de Bisthoven, expressed genuine surprise on learning that I, although a diocesan archivist, (a) did anything apart from archive work and (b) was not a canon. It took a change of diocesan bishop to remedy the second of these defects; and the passage of time should deal with the first one!

In my own case, the manner of my appointment was even more bizarre than for most religious archivists. In the late 1970s, the then Archivist of the Diocese of Nottingham, Canon G. D. Sweeney, felt he needed some help as his health was beginning to decline. The bishop suggested Father X. But Canon Sweeney didn't want Father X, so he suggested me. Having a bit of interest in history but no knowledge whatsoever of archives, I agreed to help. I was duly appointed to assist the Canon. In the few months between then and his untimely death (June 1979), Canon Sweeney took me no more than three times to the diocesan archives. These were housed in several cardboard boxes in a spare bedroom (which doubled up as a linen room) on the first floor of Cathedral House, Nottingham.

And so I was pitched in – like so many of you. But I was blessed in a number of ways, one of which was that the Catholic Archives Society had been set up several months earlier.

The first gathering of Catholic archivists in England and Wales had taken place at Spode House, Staffordshire, from 18-20 July 1978. (Spode House was the first Catholic conference centre to be established in the United Kingdom. It made a tremendous impact on the life of the Church in this country). It was the response of Father Conrad Pepler OP (Warden of Spode, 1953-81) to a cry for help from a nun in Dublin. She, Sister Dorothy McCluskey, had wanted to know whether Spode House 'offered courses to help religious sisters who, without any training for the work, found themselves in charge of their Congregation's archives.' Father Conrad knew of no such course but thought it might not be a bad idea to plan one. This he did.

The response to the 1978 meeting was so encouraging that Dr

David Rogers of the Bodleian Library, one of the speakers at that gathering, addressed a meeting of Religious Superiors in January 1979 on the need for archives. In his address, he set out the aim of the conference planned for March 1979. This was to offer a training course for archivists of religious orders, dioceses and parishes.

At the Conference held at Spode from 21-25 March 1979, the Catholic Archives Society came into being. If one were to write out a birth certificate, it might look something like this:

Name: Catholic Archives Society.

Date of Birth: 25 March 1979.

Place of Birth: Spode House, Rugeley, Staffordshire.

Parents: this is a little more difficult, but Father Conrad (1908-1993) certainly had a great influence. He could be classed as the hospital administrator.

Godparents: this is much easier, viz. the members of the Steering Committee set up in March 1979.

Midwives/husbands: the speakers at the 1978 and 1979 Meetis/s.

With the March 1979 meeting, the baby was born, the chick (or it could have been a turtle) had broken out of its shell, the plane had taxied out onto the runway. The next stage was to teach it to walk (swim) or get into the air. This was done, initially, by a Steering Committee under Dr Leslie Parker, at that time County Archivist for Leicestershire. He was to become the first Chairman of the Catholic Archives Society.

The Draft Statement of Policy prepared by this Steering Committee was submitted, for approval, to the next meeting or conference of Catholic archivists held, again at Spode, in April 1980. It is well to look at this Statement which, along with Dr Parker's Archive Principles and Practice (consisting of the substance of the address he gave at the 1978 meeting), must be regarded as a foundation document of the Catholic Archives Society.

A couple of things strike me as I re-read it. There is already a looking outwards. '... records [we read] ... are the heritage ... also of the wider communities of which Catholics formed an integral part and in which they lived, worked and worshipped.' In other words, Catholic records (including archives) are not just for Catholics. I wonder could this statement be seen as being in the same line of thought as The Pastoral Function of Church Archives from the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church which appeared seventeen years later? It is certainly in the line of thought of Vatican II and the latter's key document Gaudium et Spes. There is another point as well. The 'Purpose and Object' are, I would have thought, fairly standard for any archive. They remind us that archives serve the institution which generated them (their administrative use) and are to be 'accessible for academic research and other cultural purposes.' The Draft Statement of Policy goes on to propose ways in which this purpose and this object might be achieved. At the July 1980 Conference, the Draft Statement of Policy was formally adopted; the first Annual General Meeting of the Society was held; a Council was elected, and a Constitution was approved. As part of its remit, the Executive Committee proposed three types of publication for internal and wider circulation. I shall say more about this later. By the summer of 1980, the Catholic Archives Society had forty paid-up members.

So much for the founding of the Catholic Archives Society. We must now put the question: To what extent has the CAS achieved the objectives it set itself more than twenty years ago? One might phrase the question in a more general way: How different is the Catholic Church in these islands – but especially in England and Wales – as a result, direct or indirect, of the work of the Catholic Archives Society and/or of its members? What influence has the Society had on the life of the Church here?

One might begin to answer this question by checking the 1979 edition of the Catholic Directory for England and Wales and comparing it with the 2003 edition (this would work only for dioceses). How many dioceses had officially appointed archivists then, and how many have them now? Unfortunately, this would be a useless exercise since not all dioceses would have listed their archivists in the Catholic Directory – some still don't! I imagine the same is true for religious orders. Perhaps a more fruitful line of approach would be to see how many dioceses/religious congregations are to be found in the membership list of the Catholic Archives Society or in the Directory of Catholic Archives. One might ask how many diocesan/congregational archivists have attended CAS Conferences or CAS-sponsored training days of which there have been about a dozen.

Although not very many diocesan/congregational archivists do this as a full-time or even principal job, and even fewer have the qualifications which would be required in someone seeking employment at a county record office, very many more dioceses/congregations than was the case in 1979 have at least a 'named' archivist. Most of these have received some form of training not least through attending CAS Conferences and following up what they have learned by putting it into practice as well as by seeking further help from their local record offices, the Society of Archivists, or those professional archivists who have always been key members of this Society. It is perhaps appropriate, at this juncture, to express – on behalf of my fellow amateur archivists – sincere gratitude to Leslie Parker, Robin Gard, Judith Smeaton, Michael Cook and others who were in at the beginning, for the great amount of out-of-hours time and effort they have devoted to helping those among us who have not had much formal training or who do our archive work as one among many jobs. The late Dr David Rogers of the Bodleian Library although not a professional archivist, lent weight and stature to the early stages of our enterprise.

It has always seemed to me that one of the key roles of the Catholic Archives Society, as an institution and in and through its members, has been to raise awareness of the existence and importance of archives as 'a record of God's grace in action in the local community'. (The expression comes from Father David Lannon and, while it specifically refers to parish registers, it could be applied to other archival material also). One also has to dispel a certain degree of ignorance. Nowadays, thanks to many factors including the work of the Catholic Archives Society, very few if any bishops, provincials, abbots, abbesses or even parish priests would give to the question 'What is an archivist?' the kind of answer Dr Kate Thompson, in the talk she gave at the 1996 Conference, quoted as being given by a group of primary school children when confronted with this question. They said (she said): 'An archivist is probably a person who has something to do with making arches, or who guards beehives, or is somebody who is a very special kind of soldier with a bow and arrow.' They were bright children, but they were all very wrong! Some church officials, including a few known to me personally, still regard archives as 'a load of old rubbish'. It follows from this that we archivists are rubbish collectors or cleansing operatives. But then some people regard ecumenism in the same way!

The more positive attitude towards archives and archivists than there was twenty years ago is, of course, due to many factors. I am convinced that the work of the Catholic Archives Society and its members is one of these factors, and a not unimportant one at that. Whether we are laity, religious or diocesan priests, we have had the task and responsibility of convincing other people – parishioners, parish priests, bishops and religious superiors – of the importance of archives. We have button-holed bishops whenever we got the chance – at a funeral, a college reunion, in the colonnade of St Peter's Basilica (I've done all this personally). For several years now, thanks to the unremitting efforts of people like Sister Mary Campion wearing one of her other veils as a way of gaining entrance, we have had a display at the annual meeting of the Conference of Religious at Swanwick. There Major Superiors have had the opportunity to learn about something which they probably do not have time to deal with personally but which they may be able to delegate to someone else once they themselves have realised the importance of it.

In 1987 the Bishops' Conference of England and Wales asked the Catholic Archives Society for advice on what to do about parish registers and other records. The suggestions we made were adopted by the bishops at their meeting in November 1988 and became part of their official policy. The Society has subsequently been consulted by the hierarchy on other issues.

One founder member of the Catholic Archives Society must be mentioned by name because of the unique influence he has had on its development. From his days as a curate in Essex before the Second World War to his death in December 1999, in the closing days of the second millennium, Bishop Brian Charles Foley took an unwavering and profound interest in historical matters. An indefatigable and sensitive researcher, he alerted many people, including his fellow bishops, to the importance of keeping, caring for and making available to others the documents and artefacts through which we learn about our Catholic past, receive inspiration for the present, and are helped to plan for the future. It was entirely fitting that Bishop Foley should be chosen as the first President of the Society. Many of us will have our own memories of this quiet, self-effacing, courteous, gentle pastor and scholar.

I have spoken of how the Catholic Archives Society, as an institution and through its members, has had an influence on the life of the Catholic Church in these islands through personal contacts; and I have listed some of the ways in which these contacts have taken place. An equally, if not more, significant impact has been made by the written word emanating from this body. Publishing, i.e. making information available to others, was one of the principal ways in which the Society envisaged carrying out its declared purpose and object. From the beginning, the Editor was one of the Officers. Three distinct types of publication were envisaged. We will consider them in turn:

1. The Newsletter (since the fifteenth edition called the Bulletin) first appeared in Spring 1980. The September 2002 issue is described as the twenty-fourth. Due to a mistake in numbering, it is at least the twenty-fifth issue; and there have been 'special' non-numbered issues reporting the trips to Rome (1995) and Ireland (1997). The Bulletin has been an important medium for communicating events within the Society. At various stages and under several editors, it has contained reports on conferences and training days, requests for information, book reviews and chairman's reports to the AGM. The style has varied according to the personality of the particular editor, and the length according to what news was available. The latter has been one factor determining the frequency of its appearance. Another has been the time available to the particular editor.
2. Occasional Publications: The first of these was Dr Leslie Parker's Archives Principles and Practice: Notes to assist Custodians of Private Archives with special reference to Church Archives. First published in 1978, it was reprinted nine years later. However, developments in archival theory and practice, new legislation on matters such as data protection, the 1983 Code of Canon Law, documents issued by the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church – the list is not exhaustive – led the CAS Council to request Father Joseph Fleming of the Archdiocese of Santiago de Compostela to produce an updated version of this key work. This was published in 2000 along with Dr Parker's original document. It is interesting to compare the two and to see how archival theory and practice have developed in the last quarter of the twentieth century. In order to be able to communicate with fellow archivists, actual or potential members of the Society, it was felt useful to know who and where they were. For this reason, a 'pilot edition' of the Directory of Catholic Archives was published in 1983. The First Edition followed a year later. Clearly, a publication of this nature has to be frequently updated. So far, there have been five editions, the most recent of which appeared in 2002. One of the most fundamental concerns of any archivist, newly-appointed and confronted with boxes, carrier bags or cupboards of documents, is how to put them in some sort of order. It was partly to address this issue that, after a lot of hard work, Guidelines for the Classification of Diocesan and Religious Archives, a compilation of three documents previously published separately in Catholic Archives, saw the light of day in 1988. Towards the end of the 1990s, Council decided upon the production of what are described as Archive Advice Leaflets on the theme 'Establishing an Archive.' So far, three of these have appeared. The document The Pastoral Function of Church Archives, emanating from the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church, was published by the Catholic Archives Society in April 1997 along with excerpts from the Canon Law Society of Great Britain's Commentary on the 1983 Code of Canon Law. (A second edition of this booklet appeared in 2001.) A further document from the Pontifical Commission, The Pastoral Function of Ecclesiastical Museums, was published by the Society in 2002 as was Reflections on Catholic Archives: Essays on the character and value of Catholic archives from various professional perspectives.

3. Catholic Archives: In its proposals of publications for internal and wider circulation, the Executive Committee of the Society, having mentioned the Newsletter/Bulletin and occasional information leaflets, went on to speak of 'a yearly or half-yearly booklet containing articles describing the character, content, arrangement and use of Catholic archives within the United kingdom and Eire.' The Committee referred to this as 'our most ambitious project.' 'Ambitious' is an understatement. At the time this was announced, the Catholic Archives Society had only sixty-two paid-up members! Who would read such a booklet? We soon found out. The first issue of Catholic Archives (the Journal of the Catholic Archives Society), all forty-eight pages of it, saw the light of day in 1981. This, and the following fourteen issues, were edited by Robin Gard. The Society, and the Catholic Church in general, owes an un-repayable debt to Robin for the relentless hard work he has put into this project. Many of us have been on the receiving end of his gentle but persistent gnawing away at our resistance until we have come up with a version (which had to meet his very exacting standards) of the article he had persuaded us to promise him! He has been one of the best advertisements for the Catholic Archives Society of the United Kingdom and Ireland, and it is entirely fitting that he was appointed, in 1997, a Consultant to the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church. Robin's successor as editor of the journal, Father Stewart Foster, is keeping up his high standards. I firmly believe that Catholic Archives is one of the most important and influential contributions to the dissemination of knowledge about our Christian and specifically (but not exclusively) Catholic heritage which the CAS has made. Copies of the journal are currently sent to individuals or institutions across the globe. I am sure I am not the only person to have been told how highly it is rated in archival circles around the world. Long may this publication, quiet and unassuming like its first and current editors, continue! The list of contents in the first issue of Catholic Archives is instructive. The articles were confined, as the original declaration of intent had stated, to 'Catholic archives within the United Kingdom and Eire.' This was not to last long. Already in the second issue we find articles on Catholic Archives in the USA and the Association of Archivists of the Church of France. No wonder that this number was sixteen pages longer than the first one! Since those early days, the content of the journal has expanded even further to include articles of other traditions: Church House, Westminster (no. 6); the Church Missionary Society (no. 12); and the Methodist Archives and Research Centre in Manchester (no. 14) are a few examples of this expansion.

Our organisation has been called, from the beginning, the Catholic Archives Society. Its remit has always been 'To promote the care and preservation of the archives of the Roman Catholic Church in the United Kingdom and Eire (now re-phrased to 'Ireland').' But, as we have seen, it has never been exclusive. In addition to articles in Catholic Archives from other countries and other Christian traditions, very valuable contributions to the work of the Society have been made by people like Elisabeth Poyser, Brenda Hough, Sister Marguerite Eamon (all Anglicans) and, more recently, Paul Shaw. In 1983, Sister Isabel Joy, of the Wantage community, became the first Anglican religious to join the CAS. But as long ago as 1980, Father Francis Edwards (at that time Vice-Chairman of the Society) suggested that we might bring in (I think he meant to the Catholic Archives Society rather than to the Church) 'non-Catholic archivists, perhaps especially Nonconformists. The Anglicans (he noted) are well-organised.' It is not for me to hazard a guess as to whether Anglicans would agree with that statement!

The CAS and its members have had (or made) contacts with professional bodies, especially the Society of Archivists. Several talks at our annual conferences have been given by members (and in more than one instance, officers) of this body. Some members of the CAS have become members of the Society of Archivists; and of course the reverse is true. Many of our members have regular contact with, and receive valuable support and advice from, their local record offices. In the course of our annual conferences, visits have been made to several county record offices.

The Catholic Archives Society had a significant involvement in the establishment, in 1989, of the Religious Archives Group (a tributary, so to speak, of the Specialist Repositories Group of the Society of Archivists). The name 'Religious' Archives Group was a little confusing since roughly a third of those who came to the first meeting were under the (wrong) impression that it was meant primarily for members of religious congregations! So far, as far as I am aware, no one has thought of a more appropriate name! The fruitful links between the CAS and the RAG have continued; and Sister Margaret Lonergan is our representative at the present time.

Those diocesan archivists who have attended CAS conferences (not as many as I, for one, might have wished) came to feel that their specific needs could usefully be addressed by having a distinct organisation linked to the Catholic Archives Society. Thus it was that, in 1992, the Association of Diocesan Archivists was formally established. Under the chairmanship of Father Francis Isherwood and, more recently, Father David Lannon, it has proved to be very useful. It is the first child of a single parent, the Catholic Archives Society, although the Northern and Midland Diocesan Archivists Group (dating from the early 1980s) might claim grand-parenthood.

We have seen how the Catholic Archives Society and its members have had contact with:

- other professional organisations
- other Christian traditions and
- other Catholic organisations in the UK and Eire.

But it is the Catholic Archives Society; and it has, therefore, an international dimension. As mentioned earlier, the journal included articles about overseas archives in its second issue (1982). There have been contacts with Catholic archivists and archival organisations since at least that time. The most longstanding of these is with the Société des Archivistes de L'Eglise de France. Following a meeting in London with Father Charles Molette, Secretary of that society, Dr Parker was invited to its annual conference in 1981. Other members of the CAS have attended conferences, most recently Sister Mary Coke in 2001. In September 2002 Father Stewart Foster represented the CAS at the Italian Ecclesiastical Archivists' Conference held in Trento (Trent). The Irish connection is especially significant. Although they now have their own organisation, archivists from Ireland have played an important role in the life and work of the CAS.

Over the years contact has been established with archives and archival organisations in various parts of the world. I am sure I am not the only member of the Society to have made a point of visiting archives in foreign parts. I have already mentioned Brugge; but I have also been to the archives of the Diocese of Basle at Solothurn, of Ghent and of Mechelen (Malines), as well Innsbruck, where the archivist just happens to be called Dr Frankenstein. The CAS Bulletin for 2001 contains several pages on 'News from archives around the World.'

It was in the context of broadening our awareness of archival holdings and practices beyond the British mainland, as well as enjoying travel to distant or not so distant parts, that a series of foreign trips has taken place: Rome (1995); Ireland (1997); Spain (2000); Douai (2001). As you know, a further trip – to Belgium – is planned for November this year.

Of particular importance, of course, has been the contact with Rome and the Vatican. There is a very long tradition of conserving and – to a greater degree than many people imagine – of making available to outsiders the cultural and historical records of the central administration of the Church. A note in the Annuario Pontificio for each year gives a brief history of this; and there is a list of references to relevant documents in Footnote n. 1 in The Pastoral Function of Church Archives. But it was Pope John Paul II who, in 1988, established the Pontifical Commission for the Conservation of the Historic and Artistic Heritage of the Church, a body subsequently renamed the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church. This Commission's circular letter to the bishops of the Catholic world (February 1997) has given sound pastoral, doctrinal and scientific guidelines for the conservation and use of church archives. Last year's circular letter has performed the same function for museums. I think it is true to say both that these documents were written after episcopal conferences throughout the world had been consulted and that many of the responses to the questionnaires (including points made by the CAS) were incorporated into them.

The Catholic Archives Society has responded to these documents and to the 1983 Code of Canon Law as well as to the requirements and recommendations of various secular authorities (on matters such as data protection for example) and professional bodies (archive-quality boxes no longer have to have holes in them.) The Catholic Archives Society has tried to respond to recommendations and requirements of church and state, and to the expressed needs of church archivists, by the various working parties it has set up and through the training days it has organised.

For a variety of reasons, one of the key aspects of the life of the Catholic Archives Society has been its annual conferences. The present conference is the twenty-fifth. On the basis of the twenty-three of these conferences which I have attended, I can attest to the wonderful atmosphere which has characterised them. The serious work that is done is carried out in a relaxed atmosphere. There is much fellowship and fun as well as stimulating discussion and mutual encouragement. Participants do not feel threatened or overwhelmed because they soon come to realise that, however long we have been archivists, we are all still learners. In recent years, the liturgy (i.e. the Mass – the only liturgy we normally have during conference) has taken on greater prominence. There have been a couple of occasions when no bar was available. But this social disaster is normally able to be averted. (I suspect that among the questions conference organisers have to ask before they make a firm booking of a particular venue is: Are bar facilities available?). In the gaps between talks, and in the evenings, people usually find their own entertainment. Fortunately, we do not have the tradition (I hope we never will) of putting on a 'show' on the last night. Imagine who would win if we had an eyelash-fluttering competition!

The first seven conferences took place at Spode House. When it was decided, to the regret of many people, to close this centre, the Society had to look for alternative venues. The first of these (in 1986) was Swanwick, Derbyshire. We have been back there on two further occasions. Upholland and Ushaw have also housed us on three occasions; High Leigh and London Colney twice each, and Damascus House, Ditchingham, Douai Abbey, Hinsley Hall, Leeds, and Osterley once each. Over the years a total of eighty-one speakers (or eighty-three, since two half-talks were given) have addressed the conference, eight of these twice and two three times. The talks (I do not include workshops or interest groups as these are difficult to categorise) have been practical, informative, exhortatory, challenging and, in one case, threatening. A key part of the conference has nearly always been a visit to some place of interest in the vicinity of the conference centre. Six archives of religious communities, three diocesan archives, five colleges, three cathedrals and seven record offices have welcomed us, as well as several places, e.g. Bede's World, which do not fit neatly into any particular category.

The remainder of this talk will consist of a series of oddments picked up from here and there, such as Bulletins, Chairmen's Reports, correspondence and recollections. The aim will be to give some kind of flavour of what life in the CAS has been like.

The Summer 1981 Newsletter noted that: 'Dr Parker (Chairman) explained that there could be no representative from Ireland this year. Father James Murphy CM, who had been with us on two other occasions and was booked to come this year, had been murdered on his way to Mass that very morning.' From the same newsletter we learn that Father Denis McEvelly, appointed Archivist of the Archdiocese of Birmingham in 1957 and hence – I think – doyen of diocesan archivists in this country, died in February 1981. On a lighter note, we learn that at the Conference of that year, Miss Judith Close 'gave us a cheerful and instructive practical session, for which she brought visual aids ... (she) communicated much of her own enthusiasm to us.'

The following year (1982) it was noted that 'Miss Kate Topping gave an admirably condensed lecture ...' It was not stated – and may not have been implied – that this contrasted with the previous lecture, which was given by the present speaker. Father Justin McLoughlin told us how one friar of the English Franciscan Province had annotated a baptism register with a 'Cure for ye rheumatism (sic)'. In 1982, the Society had 152 members. Rail strikes, according to the editor of the newsletter, seem to have been a bit of a problem in the early 1980s. In 1982, 'only about four people had to cancel at the last moment on account of adverse travel conditions.' The following year, 'With the General Election over and trains running fairly normally there were no major national events to impede the gathering of the CAS Conference this year.'

By 1983, the Society had 170 members. Five talks were given at the Conference, the only time this has happened. Sister Marguerite Greene, the first Secretary/Treasurer of the Society, was made an honorary life member. In October, a Working Party discussed 'Draft Clauses for the guidance of dioceses or religious congregations in the administration of its archives.'

The Code of Canon Law published in 1983 had some important things to say about archives. These issues were addressed in one of the talks given at the 1984 Conference. In his Chairman's Report to this Conference, Father Francis Edwards SJ stated: 'A Working Party under Ruth Vyse of Oxford University has been appointed to examine the vexed question of listing archives. ... Miss Vyse is prepared to provide more information on the Data Standard for those asking for it. The offer is primarily to members of the Society of Archivists but it is unlikely that anyone seeking a little of her bread would be sent empty away.'

For the 1985 Conference, 'Dom Geoffrey Scott (was) released from teaching at Douai for only one day'; and we were informed that 'the Salford Diocese, where Father Lannon is archivist, has a COMPUTER! Things were beginning to look up especially since, in addition to all this, the Constitution of the Society was approved at the AGM [it was printed in Catholic Archives 1987, pp.62ff].

Because of the closure of Spode House, the Society had to look elsewhere for a venue for its annual conferences. As mentioned earlier, the Hayes Conference Centre at Swanwick in Derbyshire was, in 1986, the first of such venues. Bishop McGuinness of Nottingham, in whose diocese Swanwick lies, paid us a visit. As far as I am aware, he was the first diocesan bishop to do so – as a diocesan bishop. 'In the name of his fellow bishops, he thanked the Society for its work, which goes on unnoticed and often in difficult conditions.' He also 'commented on the presence of younger people.' Even then I was not sure to whom he might have been referring. Miss Mary Finch, formerly of the Lincolnshire Archives, pointed out something that perhaps we religious and mainly amateur archivists may not always realise. County Record Offices, she said, may seem to be established and successful, but frequently legislation and finance are inadequate. Many of us found this observation encouraging! The 1986 Conference was notable also in that our President, Bishop Foley, gave one of the talks.

In 1987, the Working Party on the microfilming of parish records and the making available of these to others completed its work and presented recommendations on such matters to the Bishops' Conference of England and Wales. In November of that year, on the occasion of the beatification of the Eighty-Five Martyrs, Pope John Paul II had his first direct contact with the Society when I, as Vice-Chairman, presented him with a boxed set of our journal.

1988 was important for CAS in that, at their November meeting, our bishops formally endorsed the recommendations about parish records made the previous year.

Now that they were aware – through the good offices of their colleagues, especially Bishops Foley and McGuinness, of the existence of the Catholic Archives Society, the Bishops of England and Wales passed to us – at the 1989 Conference – a questionnaire from the recently-formed Pontifical Commission for Preserving the Patrimony of Art and History. The bishops wanted to know our views on what initiatives they might take in response to the questionnaire from the Holy See. 'Father David Lannon urged that the vision of the hierarchy be stimulated ...', while Dr Judith Champ 'pointed out that the preservation of art and history was not specifically the concern of the bishops only ... the new commission [which they were being asked by Rome to set up] should therefore reflect the shared vision of clergy and laity.' On 12 October there took place the first meeting of the Religious Archives Group. This meeting, to which reference was made earlier, 'was called to help redress the isolation in which religious archivists work.'

Several members of CAS attended, in a very hot week of July 1990, a Summer School on 'Archives and Historical Method' organised by the Institute of Historical Research in London. The Chairman was able to report at the Annual Conference that we now had 254 members.

In the autumn the Society sent out a circular to Major Religious Superiors seeking information about various aspects of archives and archival holdings under their authority.

The Secretary of the Society reported, at the 1991 Conference, the 'dismal results' from this circular: only five congregations of men and eleven of women had returned the forms. But 1991 was not entirely an annus horribilis for the Society. Some twenty contemplative nuns representing about a dozen communities assembled at Prinknash Abbey for a Seminar for Monastic Archivists. This seminar was sponsored by the Society and was very successful as well as being thoroughly enjoyed by those who took part. The Chairman observed that 'growth in membership of the Society together with the variety of groups and individuals present at the annual conference (1991) was a reflection of the influence our modest work is beginning to have.'

Training Days, of which there were quite a few in the earliest days of the Society, seemed to have been put on the back burner for several years. For it was noted that the Training Day held in London in September 1992 was the first for five years. The attempt to get the Conference of Major Religious Superiors (now called the Conference of Religious) more interested in archival matters was not given up, despite the setbacks and disappointments of the previous year. As a result of much effort, principally by Sister Mary Campion, the CAS put on a display of its wares at the CMRS Conference in January. In his Report to the AGM of the Society on 27 May 1992, the Chairman noted that 1991-92 had not been a good year for many members of the Council of the Society. Three priest members of Council had been ill and, hence, out of action for varying periods of time. Two religious (Sisters Mary Campion and Marguerite-Andrée) had moved house 'with all the attendant time-consuming upheaval' this entailed. One lay member (Elisabeth Poyser) had been unavailable for CAS work. The burden of the year's work had been carried out by only three members of Council. He observed that, in spite of this, the work of the Society had gone on steadily. He found this most encouraging and it reminded him of Gamaliel's observation in the Acts of the Apostles (5:38f) that whatever is the work of God will go on. This was true, he concluded, even when some members of the Council of the Catholic Archives Society are unable to function at full strength.

1993 saw the setting-up of the Editorial Board, which later evolved into the Publications Committee (I owe this piece of information to Sister Mary Campion). Independently of this Board, but with the involvement of at least two members of the CAS Council, the Commission for the Economics of the Contemplative Life produced a Handbook for Monastic Archivists. This was in response to requests made at the Seminar for Monastic Archivists held at Prinknash in 1991. In her Chairman's Report to the Annual General Meeting at the 1993 Conference, Sister Mary Campion welcomed the fact that links between the CAS and the Religious Archives Group had been strengthened. But she wished to register disappointment at having heard only on the grapevine about the development of the Bishops' Sub-Committee for Church Art/Architecture and Heritage. Representation had been made (she noted) since in the initial stages of planning we were very much involved and [were] led to believe that we would be further involved once the committee was established.

When Sister Mary Campion presented her Chairman's Report for 1993-94 at the 1994 Annual Conference, she noted that the Society now had 277 members. She pointed out that some ten years earlier the emphasis in the CAS had been on the sorting and collecting of archives. Gradually, however, in the intervening years, the focal point had shifted more towards the preservation and development of the archives 'as they came out from under the bed (so to speak).' The range of topics on which the Society is consulted is quite wide, the Report continued. It has included things such as: 'Where does one find a list of Catholic cemeteries in the United Kingdom?' 'Are there statistics on conversions, Mass attendance and Ordinations in England and Wales?' 'Could we help a television company research an old Catholic building in Northamptonshire?' 'Can we suggest good quality visual material for illustrations in a book entitled Saints: the chosen few? How, if at all, these questions were answered, I have no idea. It was in 1994 that, after a lot of hard effort by – principally – Sister St Mildred, Saint Bede was adopted as the (heavenly) Patron of the Catholic Archives Society.

The 1995 Conference, held at Ushaw, will be remembered by some of us for the diversion during the opening talk (by George MacKenzie of the Scottish Record Office) as Melvyn Draycott and I crawled round the floor trying to set up the video recorder. I hadn't a clue where various plugs were supposed to fit; and Melvyn – who had – couldn't see the plugs anyway! It was like a scene from a Morecambe and Wise show. But 1995 was particularly important because of the Society's Rome Trip and the first meeting (16 October) with Archbishop Marchisano and Dr Carlo -Stella. Four days earlier, Pope John Paul II had given an important talk to members of the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church. The text of this talk is to be found in Catholic Archives 16 (1996), pages 4-7.

1997 saw the publication of The Pastoral Function of Church Archives, a document described by one of our most dedicated members, Dr Brenda Hough, as being 'welcome as the sunbeams from heaven. Its words shine with light.' Several months later, we were pleased and honoured to welcome its author, Archbishop Marchisano, as a speaker at our annual conference.

In 1998, the annual conference took a definite theme: 'Looking Forward.' For the first time, I think, all the speakers were professionally-trained archivists. At the end of October, the Council decided to conduct a 'Survey of Catholic archives in England and Wales'; and an appropriate questionnaire was sent out to members early in 1999. (The fifth edition of the Directory of Catholic Archives, published in 2002, was closely linked to this survey.) In November 1998 a member of the Council of the Society, Dom Geoffrey Scott, was elected and blessed as Abbot of Douai.

1999 was a sad year for the Society in that it mourned the deaths of its Patron, Cardinal Hume, on 17 June, and of its President, Bishop Foley, on 23 December. Could we include them as 'heavenly' patrons in addition to St Bede?

The annual conference in 2000 was held at Hinsley Hall, Leeds. The bulletin editor noted as being of significance that the Leeds Diocesan Archives (which have travelled around a bit) 'are now housed, indeed integrated into, the diocesan Pastoral Centre.' Whatever the reason for this arrangement, one has to agree that this development follows the line of thinking of the present Holy Father and the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church which he founded. At the conference, Michael Gandy (of the Catholic Family History Society) gave a rather rousing talk. At the conclusion of the talk, Sister Mary Campion thanked him for 'his torrent of ideas and his ability to disturb us.'

In 2001 the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church published The Pastoral Function of Ecclesiastical Museums, a sequel to the 1997 document on church archives. To everyone's delight, the Chairman was able to announce at the annual conference that Cardinal Murphy-O'Connor and Archbishop Marchisano had agreed to become Co-Patrons of the Catholic Archives Society, and that Abbot Geoffrey Scott had agreed to become its President. Not to be outdone, in November the Bishop of Nottingham appointed his archivist an honorary canon of the diocese! Sister St Mildred's report of the Open Forum at the annual conference included the following. 'Father David Lannon told us that six people went on the pilgrimage to Santiago de Compostela last October. He also showed a stiff board for use on brown paper parcels.' I have spent a lot of time trying out what, if any, connection there is between these two statements!

I have talked for too long. I will let Blessed Pope John XXIII speak the almost final words. In his inaugural address to the Second Vatican Council on 11 October 1962 he said (in immediate reference to the Church's doctrine, but I believe the same ideas could be applied to the Church's archival heritage): 'Our duty is not only to guard this precious treasure as if we were concerned only with the past, but to dedicate ourselves with an earnest will and without fear to that work which our era demands of us, pursuing thus the path which the Church has followed for twenty centuries.'

That great Catholic layman, Kevin Muir (died 2000), best remembered for his work with the Young Christian Workers, joined the Catholic Archives Society in 1988 and attended his first annual conference five years later. He wrote: 'The discovery of the Catholic Archives Society has been a great boon.' I think every one of us here could and would echo those sentiments.

Arthur Burns

In a provocative article entitled 'Discriminating between readers: the case for a policy of flexibility' published in the Journal of the Society of Archivists (Vol. 23, no. 1, April 2002), Ian Mortimer questioned whether archives (and indeed archivists) were taking sufficient account of the particular needs of their academic users as they strove to respond to pressures to increase wider public access and usage. This article provided a starting-point for discussion among the sixty or so representatives of both the archival and historical professions who gathered for the 2003 Gerald Aylmer Seminar convened under the joint auspices of the Royal Historical Society and what we must learn to call TNA (The National Archives), formerly the PRO (Public Record Office).

A further point of departure was offered by two short papers delivered at the seminar. The historian Victor Morgan welcomed developments such as A2A (Access to Archives) that promote knowledge of archive collections, but he saw few potential benefits to historians from the current drive towards regionalisation, since the significance of many archives and collections transcended local and regional boundaries. He worried that archives and special collections libraries were becoming unnecessarily noisy, as custodians fearful of appearing unwelcoming to the wider constituency of 'recreational' users failed to enforce the conditions without which the concentration and reflection integral to 'studious' research became impossible. The scholarly community, whether or not professional academics, was a minority whose right to such conditions should be respected. It should unashamedly assert that the admirable and politically inescapable objective of widening access need not entail a patronising dilution of the conditions on which access to collections was granted. The archivist Norman Reid then offered a critique of Mortimer's argument for a 'two-tier service' in which the particular needs of professional researchers (including historians) should be recognised in the provision of privileged access to both documents and facilities such as photocopying. Such a policy, Reid suggested, was not only politically impossible when such researchers constituted as little as three per cent of the constituency using the archives, but that in a context in which many archives were suffering severe cuts in funding (and thus in staffing) it was practically impossible as well. The interests of all users, including historians, would be better served if, rather than questioning the consequences of the high profile that access to archives had achieved in public policy, historians were to join other interested parties in a determined effort to ensure that archival issues retained sufficient political importance to have a chance of securing the additional public funding without which little could be achieved.

The papers provoked a wide-ranging and fruitful discussion. Two points rapidly saw a consensus emerge. First, it was agreed that it was difficult to draw workable distinctions between different categories of researchers as a basis for differential access arrangements. Mortimer himself now argued that any such policy needed to attend to the nature of the research rather than of the researcher. However, both historians and archivists were nervous of any suggestion that archivists were in a position to make effective judgements even of this nature, particularly as much genealogical and locally-oriented research conducted by 'recreational' users had real scholarly value. It was generally agreed that the key to facilitating academic historical research in the archive was flexibility, when it came to search-room rules. It might be inappropriate to institutionalize this along the lines that Mortimer had suggested in his original article. But there was some feeling among historians that a nationally agreed statement on what kind and level of flexibility might reasonably be expected from institutions of a particular kind or scale would nevertheless provide a useful starting-point for case-by-case negotiation.

Secondly, the importance of creating an atmosphere conducive to 'studious' research was universally acknowledged, and seen as a demand which would receive support far beyond the academic community among archive users. Representatives of the major national repositories outlined the steps actively being taken to create 'quiet zones' within their reading rooms, while also stressing the need to provide settings in which archives could be discussed by users engaged in collaborative research. However, it was accepted that a busy (and therefore financially secure?) archive would inevitably rarely be entirely peaceful, especially in institutions with less space to play with and fewer staff to deploy than TNA. Some historians were nevertheless concerned that the layout of reading rooms in some recently opened county archive offices implied that the issue had not received sufficient attention in the design process.

Michael Winstanley suggested that historians were perhaps too slow to acknowledge the great benefits that had accrued to academic researchers from the time and effort archivists had devoted to making catalogues and search aids available online. Moreover, with schools making regular use of record office resources, perhaps the most under-represented constituency of potential users in the archives were history undergraduates. For this, those teaching in Higher Education institutions should take some responsibility. Both historians and archivists agreed that, if time and resources permitted, an effort should be made to give students more targeted and informative teaching about the nature and usefulness of archives and the aims and methods of record offices.

For many historians present the most instructive aspect of the seminar was a discussion of changing career structures and developments in professional training for archivists. Of greatest concern was the impact of such changes on the tradition of the 'scholar-archivist', that often indispensable ally in forays into archives. The picture that emerged was not a cheering one. Job mobility, short-term contracts and increasing administrative burdens exacerbated by staffing cuts would make it unlikely that future archivists would develop the intimate personal knowledge of their holdings from which historians had in the past so often profited. Moreover, representatives of institutions responsible for the professional training of archivists reported that the curriculum they delivered was becoming overcrowded, with former compulsory elements such as palaeography now becoming optional. With the future careers of many archivists now lying in the more financially rewarding work of institutional record management rather than in historical archives, such skills could appear less relevant to the students themselves. Increasing numbers of students arrived without significant knowledge of languages and in particular Latin. It was hard to avoid the conclusion that the skills most relevant to the curating of records of interest in particular to pre-modern historians were likely to become rarer among those embarking on their careers, although Continuing Professional Development courses might offer a way ahead here in future. Cutbacks in funding support for archival students were in addition contributing to a severe shortage of qualified archivists.

At the end of two hours, many important issues remained untouched, including the digitisation of primary sources and access to original documents. Chris Kitching rounded off proceedings by inviting all present or interested in the subject to suggest further themes that might provide a focus for future seminars in the series.

CHRIS KITCHING ADDS:

Participants have e-mailed me since the meeting with many additional comments. The digitisation of archival materials is strongly favoured as the topic for next year's seminar. Archivists have pointed out that they will do their best to meet any special needs of historians provided plenty of advance warning is given. Historians can help archivists by actively supporting archives and archive services, adding their support (where relevant) to efforts to raise grants for acquisitions and preservation, putting owners of private collections who may be seeking advice in touch with TNA or an appropriate local archive service, and publicising any new archival sources that come to their attention in the course of their research. Archivists can help historians by ensuring that any microfilms they provide for public study are legible; that where microfilms exist copies are made available at other convenient service points wherever possible; and by ensuring that as much of their holdings as possible is catalogued to a sufficient standard to facilitate research.

ARCHIVAL THEORY AND STANDARDS IN ECCLESIASTICAL ARCHIVES: PART III

Rev. Joseph Fleming

CONCLUSIONS

In the third and final part of this article I will begin by summarising the main lines of argument from the previous parts (see Catholic Archives 21, pp.4-17 and 23, pp.38-46). Firstly, sound archival theory must be founded on practice which reflects the best and most efficient aspects of archival practice. It is not enough to formulate academic theories which have no practical applicability to the profession. Archival theory must be rooted in sound practice and the standards that are formulated from it must reflect this and must aim to foster the highest professional competence.

Secondly, we have seen that standards are employed in the intellectual control of archives, where the principles of provenance and original order lead to a hierarchical view of archive description. We have seen this principle manifested in ISAAD(G), but we have also seen that other listing standards are being employed. With the increase in the possibilities for communication and especially the advances in Information and Communications Technology, we find that the uniformity that was once necessary at the level of the individual archive is highly desirable at all levels. This will facilitate, in the first instance, the exchange of information between archives and so assist researchers by standardising finding aids.

Thirdly, it has been noticed that records required storage in certain conditions in order to be adequately preserved. These conditions may vary according to the media supporting the records and geographical location of the archive. Moreover, contingent on this is the state of the archive building itself. We have seen that ISO/DIS 11799 aims to provide a universal standard for archive storage to which all countries can subscribe and which leaves open the possibility for each country to add its own specific standards. We have also seen that each of the three archives surveyed (viz. Santiago de Compostela Cathedral Archives, Liverpool Archdiocesan Archives, and the Archive of the World Council of Churches) is concerned with implementing and maintaining storage and preservation standards in its own archive.

There was then a brief consideration of some of the legal issues facing archives: the whole question of freedom of information is a major point of law which requires careful consideration by archivists. Throughout the European Union there is a tendency to harmonise national legislation on this matter. Moreover, the relevant canons on archives from the Code of Canon Law were considered, as well as the latest directives from Rome. An overview of the three archives under examination was then given, paying special attention to their strengths and how the archivists envisaged and applied archival standards.

Finally, it may be said that archival standards are necessary to the profession of the archivist. But good standards flow from sound practice and are not a mere abstraction. A good archival standard aims to promote not only professional uniformity but also professional efficiency. Both these aspects are essential in coming to terms with the improvements in communication that arise from advances in computer and information technology.

Ecclesiastical archives, although they have their own specific nature, need to strive to achieve and maintain the highest professional levels and offer the best service possible to their creating bodies and to researchers. To that end they need to be aware of standards at all levels and in all fields of archival practice, and to implement them. It is in this way that the archive will best function and offer the highest standard of service. The three archives which were kind enough to participate in this survey seem well on the way to reaching that goal.

QUESTIONNAIRE

1. Name of Archive
2. Address, Telephone, Fax, E-mail
3. Do you have a Mission Statement?
4. Do you have a Collecting Policy?
5. What archival building construction norms have been used in constructing the archive?
6. Are there any environmental dangers which threaten the archive?
7. Where are the emergency services situated and what contacts do you have with them?
8. What construction has been used for the fabric of the archive ?

9. What are the specifications of the electrical installation ?
10. What are the specifications of the lighting system?
11. What are the specifications of the archival store?
12. What are the specifications of the shelving?
13. What are the specifications of the temperature control and is it monitored?
14. What are the specifications of the control of Relative Humidity and is it monitored?
15. What are the specifications of the fire alarms and extinguishing systems?
16. What are the specifications of the flood alarms?
17. What are the specifications of the burglar alarms?
18. What is the number of staff?
19. What staff facilities are provided?
20. What is the policy on public access and use?
21. What security measures are in force?
22. What listing norms are applied to collections?
23. What catalogues have been produced and may the public consult them?
24. Are computers used in the archive? (if they are, to what extent?)

THE REPLY FROM THE CATHEDRAL ARCHIVE OF SANTIAGO DE COMPOSTELA.

1. Archive and Library of the Cathedral of Santiago de Compostela.
2. Plaza de Platerias S/N.
3. Yes. Canon Archivist-Librarian (which is a benefice obtained by public examination) of the Cathedral Chapter. The working of the archive is governed by the regulations of the same Chapter.
4. We follow the guidelines of the Ministry of Education (General Directory of Archives, Books and Libraries, Documental Patrimony) with the typological norms taken from AENOR and also those of the Galician autonomous Community.

5. They contain different sections according to the nature of their original typology, which can be either by administrative reason for creation or by nature of content.
6. No.
7. The cathedral security service is located in the sacristy and there is a night service from 9.00 p.m. We have the service of the local, national and autonomous police forces which are situated in the Town Hall opposite the Cathedral
8. [No answer]
9. It has been inspected and brought up to date with non-flammable and high tolerance material.
10. The electrical system is divided into separate zones: ground floor, cellars, first and second floors. The lighting system uses daylight halogen lamps.
11. It is divided into functional shelves and shelving (both wall and self-supporting) which is used for both books and archival material.
12. The body of the shelving is wooden, although those in the cellar are metallic.
13. Given the natural qualities of the building, it possesses ideal thermal conditions.
14. In order to be between 50 and 60 % relative humidity, we use a series of dehumidifiers in the ground floor and cellar.
15. There are automatic smoke and gas detectors helped by contingency measures (sprinklers). The system is connected to the fire services.
16. [No answer.]
17. The alarms are of a standard type and are connected to the switch-board of the security service and the national police.
18. There are three members of staff whose functions are to document, computerise and deal with the public They are co-ordinated by the director.
19. They have a cataloguing, revising and expurgating room on the second floor and a cataloguing room on the ground floor.
20. The public must show their identity card and a letter of recommendation from their research director.
21. Invigilation in the research room. The records are kept securely and there is a strong room.
22. The majority of series have already been ordered, usually by administrative function. There is the principle of provenance and we must add an insertion of the documental (alphabetical order of authors and titles) series in them, we can add to this the rules given by the Ministry of Education and Culture and also the rules of Functional Headings given by the public archives of the Autonomous Community of Galicia.

23. We are implementing the systematic reference catalogues of the Vow of St James, the general collection of bundles, the Confraternity of the Immaculate Conception and notarial cases.
24. Computers are used for cataloguing according to the cataloguing rules of the Ministry of Education and Culture. This applies both to monographs, published series and special material. We also follow the list of material headings which contain the aims and procedures of GALA (Glosario ALA de bibliografía y ciencias de la información), IFLA/FIAB (International Federations of Library Associations and Institutions/Federacion Internacional de Asociaciones de Bibliotecarios), ISBD (International Standard Bibliographic Description), ISBD (A): for ancient publications, ISBD(CM): for cartographic material, ISBD (G): General, ISBD (M): Monographs, ISBD (NBM): for non-bibliographical material, ISBD (PM): for printed music, ISBD (S): for published series, ISDS and CDU. We also apply the ordering of data bases and adapting of series to the autonomous community's own network; we use programme MEIGA 3 for library and document series, which is the first step towards an integral document management system which is on line at the autonomous and national level.
25. We are expecting to adapt the bibliographic-documental series (with direct access) so as to be able to join the Galician information network via the super-computation centre of Galicia which will give us access to the net at autonomous and world-wide level.
26. We mention that the effort in computerising the collections, creating their own catalogues, indexes and formularies for reference and consultation are the way for the later adapting and achieving the establishment of the Centre for Jacobean Documentation, a project which concerns only the library/archive sphere; but which would also house a daily library, sound library, multimedia centre and a consultable reference section.

THE REPLY FROM THE LIVERPOOL RC ARCHDIOCESAN ARCHIVES

NB The Archive has since been relocated to the crypt of Liverpool Metropolitan Cathedral.

1. Liverpool RC Archdiocesan Archives.
2. St Joseph's College, Upholland, Skelmersdale, Lancs, WN8 0PZ. Tel: 01695 625255. Fax: 01695 627269. Dr Meg Whittle, Archdiocesan Archivist.
3. Duties and Responsibilities.
 - i To sort and box the holdings at the College with priority given to the Worlock Papers.
 - ii To devise and implement a workable catalogue system and enter onto computer.
 - iii To sort and box any Archdiocesan material lodged at the College.
 - iv To establish an acquisition register of documents lodged.
 - v To collate a central record of Archdiocesan archive material held elsewhere.
 - vi To inform Parish Clergy that all future Parish Archives should be deposited at the College.
 - vii To establish a policy for access and retrieval in collaboration with the Director.
 - viii To answer all correspondence queries etc.
 - ix To undertake researches for enquirers.
 - x To train and manage assistants and volunteers after a probationary period.
 - xi Purchases to be made through the College Administration Office. Any large expenditure to be cleared with the Director.
 - xii To prepare a system of outreach for educational purposes.
 - xiii To prepare a disaster plan,
4. See points i, iii and vi above. The archive also holds the O'Byrne art collection, the audio visual archive of the Catholic Pictorial, the Murphy Lourdes photographic collection and a gramophone collection.
5. The building was constructed in the nineteenth century, no present norms apply.

6. The archive is situated on the third floor, in the west wing. There are no natural dangers.
7. The College Administrator liaises with the emergency services. The College complies with all health and safety regulations. The conservator of the Lancashire Record Office advises on health and safety in the archive.
8. Grey stone.
9. A new circuit was installed in 1997 which complies with relevant standards. Sockets are provided throughout the archive.
10. The light is day fluorescent and the windows of the repository are covered with LTV filters. They face east and west.
11. The repository is a single room, situated on the third floor. It is equipped with a fire alarm and has two manual extinguishers. It has a central corridor with shelving on either side. It has daylight fluorescent lighting and natural lighting from east and west. The windows are covered with a UV filter. It is heated by the College central heating system.
12. The shelving is made of metal and is static. The floor is strong enough to take the weight.
13. The temperature of the repository is monitored. The levels are within the guidelines but there is no way of controlling them.
14. The relative humidity of the repository is monitored. The levels are within the guidelines but there is no way of controlling them.
15. There are fire alarms around the College, these are not linked to the fire services. There are manual extinguishers situated around the building. All extinguishers are checked regularly and fire drill is practised.
16. There are no flood alarms.
17. The college is patrolled by the security service and is secured at night.
18. The staff comprises of the Archivist and volunteers.
19. There is a staff lavatory and tea making facilities.
20. The archive applies a thirty-year rule. Otherwise archives are open to the public. A prior appointment is needed and there is a research room.

21. Readers' bags are searched on entry and exit.
22. The records are listed hierarchically according to the Scheme of Classification for Diocesan Archives drawn up by the Catholic Archives Society.
23. Catalogues of records have been printed out and may be consulted by readers.
24. Computers are used to produce catalogues which are then printed out. There is no facility for on-line consultation.
25. The College Administration has access to the internet and electronic mail. The archive does answer messages sent by electronic mail.
26. There is a confidentiality protocol which volunteers must sign. The readers have no access to confidential material and confidential searches are kept under lock and key. The archive is cleaned monthly by the College cleaners and more regularly by the Archivist. There is a conservation room.

RESOURCES FOR THE STUDY OF CATHOLIC HISTORY AT HULL UNIVERSITY BRYNMOR JONES LIBRARY

Helen Roberts

The University of Hull has been collecting archives since 1929. Its holdings span a range of different areas, from modern political papers, pressure group archives and modern English literary manuscripts, to landed family and estate papers, business archives and South East Asian manuscripts. There are well over 200 individual archive collections held in total, housed in the Brynmor Jones Library.

The Brynmor Jones Library is not a diocesan record office either for the Church of England or the Roman Catholic Church. In terms of religious bodies, its principal holdings are the archives of the Religious Society of Friends (or Quakers) in the East and North Ridings of Yorkshire, and archives of Marrick Priory and Selby Abbey.

Sources for the study of Catholic history are to be found mainly amongst the papers of some of the major landed families in the East Riding, including the Stapleton family of Carlton, the Constable Maxwell family of Everingham, and Caerlaverock and Terregles in Scotland, and the Langdale family of Houghton. These families remained Catholic after the Reformation. There are also personal and political papers of individual Catholics, including for the nineteenth century Sir Charles (1795-1847) and Lady Mary Barbara Chichester (1801-1876), and for the twentieth century Kevin McNamara MP (1934-), Sir Mark Sykes (1879-1919), and Sir Patrick Wall MP (1916-1998). A pamphlet on religious archives at the Brynmor Jones Library is available on the archives website at www.acsweb.hull.ac.uk/arc/collection/subjectguides.html; this includes a section on Catholicism. This overview covers three of the more significant of these collections and attempts to give a flavour of the sources available.

ARCHIVE OF THE STAPLETON FAMILY, LORDS BEAUMONT, OF CARLTON TOWERS [DDCA]

A branch of the Stapleton family settled in Carlton in the West Riding around the tenth century. In the late fifteenth century the Stapletons became, through marriage, heirs to the barony of Beaumont (although the title was not claimed for over three hundred years). The family upheld the Catholic faith after the Reformation and worshipped in the chantry chapel at Carlton church until this was discovered in 1611. A private chapel was then used at the family home, Carlton Towers. During the seventeenth century the family suffered heavily from recusancy fines, and Miles Stapleton (b. 1626) was tried for complicity in the Popish Plot, but was acquitted by a jury composed of Yorkshire gentry.

The archive comprises not only estate and family papers, but also archives of Marrick Priory, whose lands passed to the Crown after dissolution in 1539, and later fell into private hands [DDCA(2)129]. The Marrick Priory archives include an early set of charters and other title deeds dating from the mid-twelfth century onwards, as well as rentals and a rare account roll compiled by the bursar, sacristan and granger for 1415-1416. Accounts of recusancy fines levied on the estates of Gilbert Stapleton (d. 1636) and his second wife Helen Gascoigne have survived for the years 1616-1649 and 1654 [DDCA/29/1 & 4]. The correspondence of the eighth Lord Beaumont, Miles Thomas Stapleton (1778-1854), and of the ninth Lord Beaumont, Henry Stapleton (1848-1892) and his wife Lady Violet Isaacson includes various letters on Catholic affairs; there is also a letter from Cardinal Wiseman concerning the education of the children of the eighth Lord Beaumont into the Catholic faith [DDCA(2)/52/7-9, 23].

ARCHIVE OF THE CONSTABLE MAXWELL FAMILY OF EVERINGHAM AND CAERLAVEROCK [DDEV]

This archive involves two large landed families – the Constables of Everingham in Yorkshire and collateral lines of the Maxwell family in Scotland – and one small landed family, the Sherburnes of Stonyhurst, Lancashire (who married into the Constable family in the mid-seventeenth century). This is one of the largest landed estate archives held by the University. It comprises around 25,000 items, documenting the history of the estates and the family's own history. The Constables were settled in the East Riding in the early sixteenth century, but due to the persecution experienced on account of their faith, it was not until the mid-eighteenth century, under William Haggerston Constable (1734-1801), that the family estates were consolidated. It was at this point that the family was joined in marriage with the Maxwells through William's wife, Lady Winifred Maxwell. The Maxwells were settled in Caerlaverlock by the early thirteenth century.

Beginning with the seventeenth century, there is a set of recusancy records for Sir Philip Constable (d. 1664) and his son Marmaduke (1619-1680), including inquisitions and valuations of sequestered estates, lists of debts, certificates of delinquency, petitions and correspondence [DDEV/52/12-14; 60/1-10; 68/248]. These date back to Philip Constable's conviction for recusancy in 1632 and the family's subsequent experiences during the Civil War and the Commonwealth, and following the Restoration. DDEV/68/248 is an especially significant volume compiled c.1855 and containing over one hundred original documents. Examples include the royal licence issued by Charles I to Philip Constable in 1632/33, allowing him to travel more than five miles from his home, and the letter of protection granted by Sir Thomas Fairfax to Philip Constable, dating from April 1649 and protecting his family and goods at Everingham.

A series of family correspondence for both the Constable and Maxwell branches spans the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries and is a good source of information on Catholic affairs in England and Scotland [DDEV/60]. In particular, the correspondence and diaries of William Constable Maxwell (1804-1876), tenth Lord Herries, and his brother Marmaduke Constable Maxwell, cover topics such as the building of the Italianate Catholic chapel at Everingham in the late 1830s in celebration of Catholic Emancipation, the building of the Catholic school at Dumfries c.1866, the dispute over the Lenten Pastoral of Bishop Baines which arose in 1840, and various journeys to Rome [DDEV/60/29-31; 61/17, 22-23, 41]. In the next generation, the correspondence of Marmaduke Francis Constable Maxwell (1837-1908), eleventh Lord Herries, covers such topics as the Royal Declaration Bill and the accession oath [DDEV/60/36].

There is also a separate series of Roman Catholic manuscripts collected by the family over the centuries, the most notable being Rev. J. Knaresborough's 'The sufferings of the Catholicicks' [DDEV/67/1-4]. This work comprises some five manuscript volumes compiled c.1720, containing lists of martyrs, Catholic prisoners, banished priests and delinquents whose estates were forfeited, for the period 1558 to 1654. There are also two bound collections of documents and working papers of Rev. Knaresborough, including lists of recusants in twelve English counties. Other material includes a register of baptisms, marriages and burials, possibly performed by a Catholic priest at Everingham, for the years 1771 to 1801, and 'A collection of letters and scatter'd papers found in Bishop (Bonaventure) Gifford's closet dating from the period 1694 to 1715 [DDEV/67/130; 60/83].

Patrick Wall (1916-1998) served as Conservative MP for Haltemprice (later Beverley and Haltemprice) from 1954 to 1987. He was brought up as a Catholic and educated at Downside before being commissioned in the Royal Marines in 1935. As a politician he specialised in defence issues and foreign affairs, particularly in Africa, the Mediterranean and the Middle East. He travelled widely and frequently in those areas throughout his political career. He was influential within the Conservative Party as the founder of the 92 Committee, known as Margaret Thatcher's 'Praetorian Guard' in the early 1980s, and he was knighted in 1981 for his political services. He was a leading figure in Catholic politics and his papers include a series of almost two hundred files on Catholic affairs [DPW/26].

In particular, the files document his role as the founder of the Catholic lay movement Pro Fide ['for the faith'] in 1970. There is correspondence documenting how support was gathered prior to forming the movement, and drafts of the original manifesto, 'A voice for the silent majority' [DPW/2611-7; 8]. As Chairman, Patrick Wall sat on the National Advisory Committee (later the National Council), for which there are minutes up to 1991, and he compiled both annual and progress reports [13PW/26/1214, 57; 15]. He also gave numerous speeches and wrote to the press on Catholic issues and had contacts with a wide variety of other Catholic organisations both in Britain and overseas, including the Catholic Union of Great Britain [DPW/26/18-19; 58-66; 116-121]. Extensive correspondence, including with Cardinal Basil Hume and Father J.W. Flanagan of the Catholic Priests Association, has survived, as well as a number of Pro Fide publications, focussing on its concerns with catechetics and the crisis in the Church [DPW/26/33, 37-39; 76-77]. Patrick Wall continued to be actively involved in Pro Fide until 1987, when he stood down from Parliament and gave up many of his other political responsibilities.

Catalogues for each of these collections, and indeed for other Catholic-related archives, are available online as part of our HUMAD2 [Hull University Manuscripts and Archives Database] database at www.acsweb.hull.ac.uk/arc/collecton/humad2.html. The database contains both collection descriptions (summarising the historical background and contents of each archive), and itemised catalogues for each archive. A search on the term 'Catholic' will enable the researcher to identify major collections of relevance. Searches can also be made for named collections, or for individuals, organisations or places. The results list will commonly comprise a number of collection descriptions and the reference codes of individual document descriptions. Access to the archives is open to all bona fide researchers by appointment only. Before your first visit, you should write to the University Archivist explaining the nature of your research. Subsequent visits can be arranged by telephone or e-mail. The Archives Reading Room is open on Mondays to Thursdays only, from 9am to 1 pm and 2pm to 5pm. An introductory leaflet including a location map is available on request.

THE ARCHIVES OF THE ADORERS OF THE SACRED HEART OF JESUS OF MONTMARTRE, OSB (THE TYBURN NUNS)

Mother M. Claudia OSB

At Tyburn Convent there are two sets of archives housed – that of the Congregation of the Adorers of the Sacred Heart of Jesus of Montmartre OSB, and that of Tyburn Convent. This article is concerned only with the Congregation archives. (Note: in our Congregation the Secretary General is usually designated archivist).

BACKGROUND: THE ARCHIVES AS AN INSPIRATION FOR THE CHURCH

Some people tend to repress a shudder when they hear the term 'archives' and are glad to leave it to someone else to deal with, so here we present some background inspiration to show that work with archives is worthwhile, extremely valuable for the Church, for every religious congregation and for society at large.

Firstly, let us examine briefly what recent popes have said about the Vatican Archives, because the archives of the Church are only a worldwide version of our Congregation (and house) archives. The archives of the Church were not open to scholars until the time of Pope Leo XIII. They are still called the Vatican Secret Archives (VSA), but with the idea of making 'the concepts of historical research and the search for truth coincide'.¹ Pope Leo opened them to researchers, saying: 'The first law of history is not to dare to say anything false; and furthermore not to pass over in silence anything true.'² Pope Paul VI said of the VSA: '... Our pieces of paper are echoes and vestiges of [the] passing of the Lord Jesus in the world. And so to have the cult of these papers, documents, archives, means indirectly to have the cult of Christ, to have the sense of the Church, to give ourselves, and those who will come, the history of the passing of this phase of the transitus Domini in the world.'³ Pope John Paul II has a great appreciation and regard for archives and at the inauguration of the new premises for the VSA in 1980 he said many important things concerning the VSA which can also be considered as important for us as we consider our own archives. We should '... understand the importance of the archives as an instrument and source of government, law and history; in other words, of knowledge, humanity and culture: it is not just a collection and preservation of writings, it also assumes a dynamic aspect, in its different phases of functional, administrative and cultural good ...¹⁴ Pope John Paul II spoke again at an exhibition of documents from VSA the following year: 'The documents of the Church bear witness, in particular, to the spread of the kingdom of Christ in the world, the continual and anxious concern of the pope and of the pastors of the Church for the flock entrusted to them, as well as their desire and their efforts for the triumph of justice and peace in the world. It is a question therefore of testimonies that deserve all our respect. ... Furthermore, the high value of each document, which is at once sacred and precious, is to be considered, and the impulse they give to historical research, carried out with the highest scientific standards ... There is no doubt, therefore, that the Archives can be called sapientiae templa (temples of wisdom), due precisely to that wealth of information and knowledge which they contain, and the preservation, the worthy and adequate presentation of these documents, from the most humble to the most precious, becomes a service rendered to Truth. It is an act of love for Truth.'¹⁵

THE ARCHIVES AS AN INSPIRATION FOR OUR CONGREGATION.

A second source of inspiration in appreciating the value of archives is the discoveries that we have made about our own way of life and our Mother Foundress by consulting original sources from our archives. In the 'Statement on our Charism' alone there are eighteen references in the margin to documents of our Mother Foundress, and we have the joy of knowing that consultation and use of original sources commands respect from those who hear or read our papers. In using our own archives in an enlightened, careful and scholarly way, we perform a service for the whole Church, building up her vast and deep contemplative and mystical heritage.

Now let us turn to look at the Archives of our Congregation in more detail. We begin with a brief history both of the Congregation and of the archives:

BRIEF HISTORY OF THE CONGREGATION

Our Congregation was founded by Marie Adele Garnier (Mother Mary of St. Peter 1838-1924) at Montmartre, Paris, in 1898 with the approval of Cardinal Richard, Archbishop of Paris. Our foundress felt called to establish a religious family totally consecrated to the worship

Park Place, on the site of the ancient Tyburn Field, where, during the Reformation and post-Reformation eras (1535-1681), 105 officially-recognised Catholic Martyrs were executed for their Faith. A Shrine in honour of these martyrs was immediately established at the new convent, and a little later perpetual adoration of the Blessed Sacrament exposed was also begun. Gradually the community at Tyburn Convent came to be known as the 'Tyburn Nuns'. There are seven other monasteries world-wide: Ireland, Australia, Peru, Scotland, New Zealand, Ecuador and Colombia. Tyburn Convent is the Mother House of the Congregation.

BRIEF HISTORY OF THE ARCHIVES

In our very first constitutions, approved by Cardinal Richard in 1898, in Chapter 15 (On Poverty), provision is made for a separate locked compartment in the 'depository,' where the archives will be kept. These are envisaged as title deeds, terms of leases, documents from the archdiocesan chancery, etc. In the first customary, approved in 1899, we find, in Chapter 21 (Of the Employments), subsection 2 (Of the Archivist), No.376: 'The archivist has care of the papers of the society: she will and praise of the Holy Trinity principally through the Holy Mass, Divine Office and the Perpetual Adoration of the Blessed Sacrament exposed. To achieve this she chose the enclosed, contemplative, Benedictine way of life for she could find 'no better rule of life to bequeath to her spiritual daughters' (Charism 3). In 1901 the anti-religious Laws of Association caused Marie Adele Garnier and her fledgling community to leave France for England. She said, however, 'Not in exile, but on mission'. A temporary home was found at Notting Hill, London, and in 1903 a property was purchased near Marble Arch, No. 6 Hyde carefully arrange them and will put the titles and necessary indication on the wrappers, boxes, envelopes: Acts of the foundation, Letters from the archbishop, Manuscripts, Business papers, etc. No. 377: All the secretary's books will be kept in the archives except the necrology (when there is one), the address books and the current annals. Patron: St Jerome.' It is clear from these early documents that from the very beginning of our Congregation the archives were considered to be of great importance.

The 1909 and 1914 Constitutions have a brief mention of the subject. In Chapter 19 (On divers offices), No. 741 says: 'One sister will be charged with the archives'. In Chapter 6 (Of the Secretary General), we find in No. 559, 'The charge of the Secretary General is to attend to the preservation of the important acts and documents concerning the history and general administration of the Institute ...' The word 'archives' is not used but the intention is there. The 1928 Customary and Directory has half a chapter on 'the Archivist of the Convent'. By this stage of our development there were clear rules for the classification of the archives and what should be kept in them. By and large they were much the same as what is laid down for the archivist of the convent in No. 62 of our Manual today. However a certain naive trustfulness is apparent in two items: 'It is fitting that a catalogue of the archives be kept ...' and 'When any books, packets, or important documents are given out from the archives, the archivist is recommended, for the sake of good order, to make a note of it.' Our present Manual shows the result of experience: 'The Archivist will keep a catalogue of the documents in the archives and a note of any borrowed from them' (No.62).

PHYSICAL STORAGE CONDITIONS OF THE ARCHIVES

Our archives are stored in box-files using plastic envelopes (with air-holes) to protect the documents. The box-files are labelled and stored on open shelves in the general secretariat where there is good cross-ventilation. Items are classified, accessioned and catalogued according to a simple card system. Two cards are made. One is the main entry, including added entry cards as required. These cards are arranged in alphabetical order according to the heading, and form the card index or catalogue. The other, duplicate card, is marked SL, (shelf list) and these cards are arranged in the order that the items have in their boxes and that the boxes have on the shelves, and they form a shelf list. This shelf list is essential for verifying the archives.

CONTENT OF THE ARCHIVES

The Secretary General keeps an inventory of all papers and documents in the Congregation archives. To preserve confidentiality no document may be read or removed without the permission of the Superior General. A memorandum of all documents temporarily removed from the archives is kept by the Secretary General.

The archives are classified as follows:

i	Documents from the Holy See (for Cardinal Protector)	C CP
ii	Documents from the Ordinaries	CB
iii	Acts of the General Chapters	GC
iv	Acts of the Superiors General	SG
v	Acts of the Sisters - certificates civil papers, etc.	S
vi	History	H
vii	Photographs	P
viii	Business	B
xi	Architecture	A
x	Divers	D

There are also nine Congregation registers kept by the Secretary General.

USE MADE OF OUR ARCHIVES

From about 1945 and continuing with long intervals until recently, members of a French secular institute for diocesan priests, The Society of the Heart of Jesus, have used our archives for material on the Abbé Daniel Fontaine, whom they honour as their 'restorer.' Dom Columba Marmion's letters to our Foundress were borrowed by Dom Raymond Thibaut of Maredsous for his life of Abbot Marmion. An article on our Foundress by Father S. Bezine, OP, in La Vie Spirituelle, September 1931, says in a note: 'This study is based on original unpublished documents', and these documents are obviously those in our archives. More recently Father Mark Tierney OSB requested access to the letters of Dom Columba Marmion in our archives. Father Tierney was researching for a book on Abbot Marmion to promote the cause for his Canonisation. We provided photocopies of all the letters we have, and Father Tierney kindly gave the community a talk on his work as Postulator of Blessed Columba Marmion's Cause for Canonisation. The Cause for Canonisation of our own Foundress Marie Adele Garnier was opened by the late Cardinal Basil Hume in September 1995 and work is progressing on her Positio to present to Diocesan Officials for approval.

ACCESSIBILITY

Anyone wishing to consult our archives should communicate with the archivist in writing.

EMERGENCY PLAN

The Congregation has an emergency plan of action for the archives in case of fire or other disaster.

THE ARCHIVES OF SAINT MARY'S ABBEY, COLWICH

Sister Benedict Rowell OSB

FOUNDATION AND HISTORY OF THE COMMUNITY

Saint Mary's Abbey, Colwich is a community of enclosed contemplative Benedictine nuns, and belongs to the English Benedictine Congregation (E.B.C.) It was founded by Our Lady of Consolation, Cambrai (now at Stanbrook Abbey, Worcester) in 1651 at Paris. As a result of the French Revolution, the English Benedictines of Paris came to England in 1795.

The community's title was (and still is) the Monastery of Our Lady of Good Hope. It is worth listing the community's permanent homes, because researchers may find reference to these, without realising that they all refer to one community that is still alive.

1664-1794 Paris: Champ de L'Allouette, rue des Anglaises

1795-1807 Marnhull, Dorset: Nash House

1807-1836 Cannington, Somerset: Court House

1836 - present Colwich, Stafford: The Mount, or Mount Pleasant, Saint Benedict's Priory, later Saint Mary's Abbey.

Although the community began in the E.B.C., it soon transferred to the jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Paris, and in England remained under the Vicars Apostolic/Bishops until 1928, when it returned to the E.B.C. and was raised to the rank of an Abbey. There are papers about this community in the archives of the Western and Midland Districts and the Archdiocese of Birmingham, as well as the Archives Nationales in Paris [Paris, Archives Nationales S4619].

From the beginning, the community lived a strictly enclosed Benedictine life centred on Mass and the Divine Office in choir, with mental prayer in the tradition of Father Augustine Baker, the English Benedictine mystic and spiritual guide (died 1641). In 1823 the community became England's first house of Perpetual Adoration of the Blessed Sacrament, which continued until the 1950s. There used to be choir nuns and lay sisters. The community made a foundation in 1859, St. Scholastica's Priory, Atherstone, Warwickshire, which amalgamated again with Colwich in 1967. The Atherstone archives are at Colwich. The community's involvement with schools was very small. A few pupils were taken inside the enclosure for a short time at Cannington. Then there was a Poor School, under an Ursuline nun who lived with the community. The Poor School was continued for a few years at Colwich.

LOCATION AND STORAGE OF THE ARCHIVES

The archives are located inside the monastic enclosure, and only the archivist has access to them. The Abbess may give permission for the archivist to provide information by post or e-mail, or to show archival material to a researcher in the Guest Room.

There is an archives room, which is dry and well aired, at a reasonably constant temperature, and shaded from sunlight. There is no purpose-built storage, but the archives are in good condition, and the risk of fire is quite low. Recent acquisitions are stored temporarily in a fairly suitable room in the twentieth-century part of the building. Some items, such as deeds, are in a safe, which provides protection from fire and flood. Some historical financial records are also in a metal filing cabinet in the bursar's department.

CONTENT OF THE ARCHIVES MONASTERY OF OUR LADY OF GOOD HOPE

The archives of the principal community, the Monastery of Our Lady of Good Hope, are classified according to the main places where the community lived. These are listed on one card index in the order of the records, and in another card index by names and subjects. Some of these items consist of only one or two papers.

Paris: 38 envelopes, including: Constitutions in the hand of Dame Clementia Cary (1656); account of the community's experiences in the French Revolution; portrait of Mother Bridget More, first Prioress; some letters of the period; copies of material in other archives etc. referring to this period.

Marnhull: 14 envelopes, including: some death notices; letters of the period, including Bishop Sharrock, Abbe Edgworth, financial letters 1805-1828 from Dom Michael Anselm Lorymer.

Cannington: 27 envelopes, including: letters of the period, including Cardinal Weld, Bishop Baines, Abbe Premord; manuscript notes of community history from Paris to Cannington (1825); information about Court House, Cannington.

Colwich: 152 envelopes, from 1836 to the present, including: plan of Mount Pavilion; Customary of Perpetual Adoration (1890); newspaper cuttings and papers re-Colwich nunnery case (1857-1870); many letters (names in card index); elections of Abbesses; meetings of Abbesses etc.

The material stored on shelves consists partly of boxes and partly of volumes such as constitutions, profession books etc. There is a ring folder that lists the content of each shelf, and the contents of the boxes are gradually being listed. The materials in the safe and temporary store are also listed in the folder. One shelf contains the archives from the closed daughter house, St Scholastica's Priory, Atherstone. These are listed. There would also be material about the foundation in the Birmingham Archdiocesan Archives. There is a card index by surname of professed religious of the community, choir nuns and lay sisters, including St. Scholastica's Priory, Atherstone. This is a useful starting-point for enquiries about individuals.

Although not part of the archives, there are a number of rare books and manuscripts in the care of the archivist. They are located in a small room specially constructed in the 1960s, including some fire and security precautions, but no modern technology such as climate control. There are about two thousand books and manuscripts, some of which came from the house in Paris. Dr. Rogers of the Bodleian Library was involved with their preservation. Other books came from Abbe Premord and Father Robert Eaton. There is a catalogue, in the order of shelving. The manuscripts stored in the book-room are known as the Baker Manuscripts, many of which came from Paris. There are important examples of the works of Father Augustine Baker, which have been used by Dr. John Clark in his Baker editions. There is a catalogue, in the order in which the books are stored. The Abbess may allow these books and manuscripts to be studied by researchers.

The community's website includes a section about the history of the community. Some biographies of individual nuns are given. The website should be expanded to include more information from the archives.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The manuscript House History is dated 1695. The nineteenth-century expanded version was published in the Ampleforth Journal 1906-1908, nos. 11-13. This was also the basis for the first part The Benedictines of Colwich by Father Robert Eaton (1929). Biographies of the early nuns include Some Particular Remarks of our Venerable Mother Beginners, which is about the same date as the House History. The nineteenth-century expanded version of this was published by the Catholic Record Society Vol. 9, No. 11. The Works of Father Augustine Baker, edited by Dr. John Clark, are published in Analecta Cartusiana 119:9, Salzburg 1999 etc.

ARCHIVES OF THE FRANCISCAN MISSIONARIES OF THE DIVINE
MOTHERHOOD

Sister Victoria Batchelor FMDM

We are a smallish congregation – just over 300 of us – and our Mother House is at Ladywell, Godalming, in Surrey. It is here that we have our General Archives. There are Regional archives in Singapore, Ireland and Zambia and one is currently being set up in Australia.

In Zambia Sister Monica Orange, the Regional Archivist, is researching in the Lusaka Public Records Office and has discovered much about the early days of religious communities in that country. Most material from our Zimbabwe Region comes here at the moment as, at the time of writing, Zimbabwe is not too safe a place for it to be kept.

Our archives in Godalming give a good idea of the history of our congregation. Our first few sisters had been in temporary profession with the congregation of Mother Francis (Alice) Ingham, now the Franciscan Missionaries of St Joseph, and we have in our archives copies of relevant material from their archives. In 1884 some sisters were sent by Mother Francis Ingham to work in St Vincent's Orphanage in Holly Place, Hampstead. This was in the parish of St Mary, Holly Place, and the parish priest at the time was a Canon Arthur Dillon Purcell. Canon Purcell and Mother Francis Ingham did not see eye to eye on the question of these sisters. Mother Francis made changes in the personnel while the Canon was away on the Continent. He thought two sisters could manage the work, while she felt there needed to be three – and so on. We have copies of this correspondence, the originals being in the FMSJ archives. The result was that one sister was dismissed by Mother Francis and two did not renew their vows in her congregation. On the feast of St Francis, these three sisters set up on their own. The following year a sister who had left Mother Francis earlier, with her blood sister, joined the first three. On the first page of their Council Minutes, in the hand of Sister Mary Martha Manning, is the following entry:

Sister – Mary Martha (Margaret Jane Manning)

Sister – Mary Margaret (Mary Docherty)

Sister – Mary Patrick (Winifred Brennan)

United under the directions of the Very Rev. Cannon Purcell to commence this branch of the Third Order of St Francis Oct 4th 1887.

Sister Mary Francis (Jane Kennie Harvey) joined the above sisters April 5th 1888.

Sister Mary Anthony (Barbara Kennie Harvey) joined the above sisters
Nov 19th 1888.

We have minutes of Council meetings from 1887 until the present day.

More sisters joined these five and new communities were founded, including one at Littlehampton, then in the Diocese of Southwark, and one at Aldershot, in the Diocese of Portsmouth. The Littlehampton community, led by Sister Patrick, one of the first five, subsequently developed into the Franciscan Missionary Sisters of Littlehampton and we have copies of documents from their archives concerning the Holly Place days.

The next major drama culminated on 1 January 1912 when the sisters and communities in the Westminster Diocese joined the Franciscan Missionaries of Mary. Troubles in the Holly Place community had led to this, and copies of correspondence (the originals this time being in the FMM archives) between the FMM General of the time and the authorities in Westminster concerning this amalgamation are in our archives.

This left two communities outside Westminster. Mother Patrick and the sisters in Littlehampton became, as we have said, the Franciscan Missionary Sisters of Littlehampton and our foremothers in Aldershot battled on alone. Bishop William Cotter was Bishop of Portsmouth at this time and he took these sisters under his wing. Aldershot's local Superior, Mother Francis Kennie Harvey (another of Holly Place's first five) died and Bishop Cotter chose Mother Collette Tierney, a doughty Scotswoman, in her place. We have correspondence between Bishop Cotter and each of these sisters. The tone gives the impression he got along much better with Mother Collette than with Mother Francis. The future Mother Francis Spring joined these Aldershot sisters in December 1917. Five years later a two-year-old girl in St Anthony's Orphanage, where the sisters lived and worked, died of diphtheria, whereupon the local Medical Officer of Health advised Mother Collette to send one of her sisters to train as a nurse. Two sisters were sent to train in St John and St Elizabeth Hospital in London. One of these was Sister Francis

Spring, and when she returned from training, she went to work in Aldershot Hospital three afternoons a week. Here she met a Consultant Surgeon who suggested the sisters start a nursing home and thus began Mount Alvernia Hospital, Guildford, which was opened in 1935.

The Guildford doctors asked that the nursing home should take maternity patients and Mother Collette asked Archbishop Amigo of Southwark, in whose diocese Guildford then was, if sisters could train as midwives. He was quite agreeable, but back in Portsmouth, where our novitiate was still situated, Bishop Cotter was far from happy. We have correspondence documenting all this.

ILLUSTRATION 4: FMDM PIONEERS IN AFRICA (WEARING THE CUSTOMARY TOPIS OF THE TIME) MOTHER FRANCIS SPRING (CENTRE) AND HER COMPANIONS FORMED THE FIRST COMMUNITY IN KASABA, NORTHERN RHODESIA (NOW ZAMBIA) IN 1946.

In 1937 Mother Francis Spring was elected Mother General and from then on new communities were founded at a great rate – in England, then Ireland and Zambia (at that time Northern Rhodesia). Once we had our first community in Zambia and planned to go to China, Mother Francis Spring felt we should become a Papal Congregation and, after the usual to-ing and fro-ing, we did. Up until then our title had been 'The Franciscan Sisters for the Home Missions', so a change of name to 'The Franciscan Missionaries of the Divine Motherhood' took place at the same time. Together with the study of midwifery had come a deeper appreciation of Mary's Motherhood and Fr Ethelbert Cardiff OFM contributed his knowledge of Mary as Mother in the writings of St Francis – hence Divine Motherhood in our title. Material in the archives bears witness to this.

When Mother Francis Spring came out of office in 1971, our congregation had 39 communities in 25 dioceses and we have records of the setting up of these communities including correspondence with many bishops. More recently we have records of short-term projects undertaken by sisters who worked in Ethiopia during the famine and others who went into Rwanda straight after the massacres there, and still others who went to Iraq several times from our community in Jordan to help those suffering as a result of sanctions.

What is coming into our archives today? Well, mostly minutes of meetings. Records from health care institutions are taking up more and more space. Two hospitals we have handed over to other organizations but five are still owned or administered by us and generate much paper. Photographs seem to be much in demand for various occasions and we have many which are space-consuming, especially if people put them in big fat padded albums.

We are most fortunate in having a purpose-built room for archives, which in 1971 was constructed as part of a new block built for our General Council. They have since moved elsewhere, but the archives remain. Most of our material is in boxes 105 x 270 x 375 cms. My predecessor started using boxes this size, but we were unable to discover where she got them, so we had them made last time. The larger boxes advertised by the suppliers would be too heavy for this septuagenarian. Someone is, at the time of writing, very kindly transferring our somewhat diffuse descriptive list to Excell.

DOWN AMONG THE DEAD MEN: OR A DAY IN THE LIFE OF THE ARCHIVES

Brother James Hodkinson SJ

Archives: musty, dull, full of old books and documents. You would be right in the last two, but not very musty and definitely not dull. Enquiries come to the Archives of the British Province of the Society of Jesus from all over the world, wanting to know who was where in 1890 or do we have any information on Brother so-and-so who was someone's great-uncle because a family history is being compiled. Another enquiry, just in, from a firm of architects who are renovating a college building once owned by the Jesuits requires a set of plans, as they intend to put in the original style of windows. Fortunately, we have a photograph from the 1930s and are able to send them a copy. We never send the originals, otherwise we would end up with no archive. When a house closes or a parish is handed over to a diocese, any relevant Jesuit material comes to the Province Archives, as do the papers, writings and notes of Jesuits when they die.

Quite a few people come to the Archives when they are researching for academic theses: 'Why and how did the French Jesuits come over to England when they were expelled from France, where did they carry on their studies, and are the buildings still there?' Quite a few requests for information are received concerning the English martyrs since we have a lot of material from the time of the preparation of the cause for their canonisation. Gerard Manley Hopkins is also a popular subject for a thesis. One lady came over from Australia last year to consult material on him. We even have a few letters of St Edmund Campion, although these are never on view.

Always a great help in answering queries is Letters and Notices, the house journal of the British Province. It was first published in 1863 and contains obituaries of all Jesuits of the Province as well as matters of interest from each of our houses. To date ninety-six volumes have been published.

More requests have come in today, including one from a priest who wants to see our collection of the letters of Dr John Lingard, the early nineteenth-century historian. Then there is the everyday work of the Archives. We rely on a card index which has to be updated as articles are sent in. One day we will have the money to have it computerised. Requests also arrive from other archives, Jesuit and non-Jesuit, at home and abroad. They ask about British Jesuits or houses, or any of the myriad requests they have to deal with concerning the Society of Jesus. In October 2001 there was a meeting of Jesuit archivists in Rome, the first in the history of the Society. It was attended by more than fifty archivists. The participants made some very interesting visits to the Vatican Archives and the Jesuit General Archives, and listened to a very good talk from Father Paul Molinari, who was closely involved with the canonisation of the English Martyrs. As you can see, there is never a dull moment in the Archives. It can be very busy, but always interesting.

EDITORIAL NOTE

This is a slight adaptation of an article which first appeared in Jesuits and Friends 54 (Easter 2003) and is reproduced by kind permission of the Editor of that publication.

The Construction of Martyrdom in the English Catholic Community, 1535-1603 by Anne Dillon (Ashgate, Aldershot & Burlington, 2002, pp.xxxviii+474) is a title in the St Andrews Studies in Reformation History series. It is an examination of the deaths of those Catholics who gave their lives for their faith under Henry VIII and Elizabeth. In particular the cult of martyrdom and its iconography is investigated in terms of marshalling continental support for English Catholics and strengthening resistance and resolve at home. The range of archival sources used by the author in pursuit of her argument is impressive: Peter Mowle Collection, Oscott College Archives; Cambridge University Library (Roper's Life of More); Guildhall Library, London (Charterhouse); Bar Convent Archives, York (Wigmore's Life of Mary Ward); Stonyhurst Archives (Grene's Collectanea); and Westminster Diocesan Archives (St Edmund's College: Verstegan's Descriptiones), as well as the archives of the Venerable English College, Rome. More impressive still is her familiarity with and use of contemporary printed material.

New books on Newman are always of archival interest in that the vast quarry which represents the cardinal's own papers at the Birmingham Oratory, for many years cared for with great devotion by the late Gerard Tracey, is still being tackled by scholars. However, Pilgrim Journey: John Henry Newman 1801-1845 by Vincent Ferrer Blehl SJ (Burns & Oates, London & New York, 2001, pp.xii+452, £20), a spiritual biography of Newman's life up until and including his conversion to Catholicism, comes from the pen of a scholar who was successively an editor of the Letters and Diaries, Chairman of the Historical Commission and Postulator of the Cause, and for that reason alone one may approach this book with a certain reverence. Because the story of Newman's reception as a Catholic is so well known, it is especially important to realise, as the author guides us through his subject's later (post-1841) Anglican years, that to Newman himself his life at Littlemore had anything but a certain conclusion. Colin Barr, who lectures in modern European history at Maynooth, uses a variety of archival sources in Paul Cullen, John Henry Newman, and the Catholic University of Ireland, 1845-1865 (Gracewing, Leominster, 2003, pp.xviii+288, £17.99). His aim is to present an account of the foundation and progress of this institution in a way that is not overly centred on Newman and which takes into consideration some of the other personalities and influences involved, notably Archbishop Cullen of Armagh and then Dublin. The author has based his study almost completely upon archival material and utilises several primary sources in Ireland: Cullen, Murray and Woodlock papers in the Dublin Diocesan Archives; Catholic University papers in University College Dublin, Archives; Lucas and Monsell papers in the National Library of Ireland; Slattery and Leahy papers in Cashel Diocesan Archives (consulted on microfilm at the National Library of Ireland); Denvir Papers in Down and Connor Diocesan Archives; Dixon Papers in O Fiaich Memorial Library, Armagh; and pamphlet collections at Trinity College Library, Dublin. Outside Ireland he consulted the University of Notre Dame Archives, the Cullen and Kirby Papers at the Irish College, Rome, the Newman Papers at the Birmingham Oratory, and the Peter le Page Renouf Papers at Pembroke College, Oxford. He provides a useful commentary on his use of sources.

The period coinciding with Newman's life (and beyond) is the chronological span of Barbara Walsh's Roman Catholic Nuns in England and Wales 1800-1937: A Social History (Irish Academic Press, Dublin and Portland, 2002, pp.viii+248, £35.00). The book analyses the growth and development of women's religious life in all its aspects and the author bases her study on research conducted in four archives in particular: Sisters of Charity of St Paul the Apostle (Selly Park); Sisters of Notre Dame de Namur (Liverpool); Sisters of the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary (Chigwell); and the Daughters of Charity of St Vincent de Paul (Blackrock, Co. Dublin). In acknowledging the assistance of the respective archivists, and in addition mentioning the assistance received from several other members of the Catholic Archives Society, the author reveals her appreciation of the trust placed in her when dealing with often sensitive material. From an archivist's viewpoint this type of recognition is always most welcome. Moreover, the bibliographical appendix lists the specific files consulted in each of the archival collections, and there are a series of very useful tables listing inter alia the orders and congregations which were represented in England and Wales during the period under examination.

Thomas Earp: Eminent Victorian Sculptor by Anthony and Olive Mitchell (Baron Books, Buckingham, 2002, pp. 128, £13.95) is a well-illustrated and meticulously researched book on the life and work of the Nottingham-born craftsman whose work may be seen in a number of Catholic churches, including Farm Street and Maiden Lane in London. Earp (1828-93) learnt his craft under Pugin and Myers and also worked for the young J.F. Bentley, the future architect of Westminster Cathedral. The archival pedigree for this book is naturally architectural: Royal Institute of British Architects; Council for the Care of Churches; Architectural Section of the Historical Manuscripts Commission; as well as Lambeth Palace Library, the Public Record Office (now National Archives), Guildhall Library and Record Office, Nottinghamshire and Derbyshire County Record Offices.

Architecture forms an important part of several recently published parish histories. Our Lady of Ransom, in Gratitude and Hope (Eastbourne, 2001, pp.xii+197) by Joan Kennedy is a model of what a parish history should be: well researched and interestingly written, with a good use of primary source material and ample illustration. The mother parish of Eastbourne traces its roots to 1867, with the present church dating from 1901, but the author's introductory chapter sets the scene well by summarising the earlier history of Catholicism, both pre- and post-Reformation. The chief primary sources used were the Archives of the Diocese of Arundel and Brighton, convent archives, oral history, and the parish's own archives, and it is heartening to note that in the latter the author placed additional information not used in the book so that it is ready for future historians. The author and journalist Joanna Bogie has written the story of St Bede's, Clapham Park, in One Corner of London (Gracewing, Leominster, 2003, pp.67, £6.99). Although succinct in its method, the book nevertheless charts the origins and development of a thriving south London Catholic community and has made good use of parish records and archives in a way that is not cumbersome to the general reader. La Chiesa Italiana di San Pietro a Londra by Luca Matteo Stanca (Rome, 2001, pp.94), with an English translation by Michael Coffey, is the story of London's Italian Church, from the beginnings of the mission in 1844 and the completion of the church in 1863 to the present day. The section on the church building itself, as indeed the whole study, makes use of much photographic and other archival material, not only from the Italian Church but also from the Generalate Archives of the Pallottines, the religious society entrusted with the foundation of the mission and still responsible for it today. Catholics in Cambridge edited by Nicholas Rogers (Gracewing, Leominster, 2003, pp.xxiv+398), the final parish history under review, is in fact an account of Catholicism in one town since medieval times, although it has as its focus the period from the foundation of the first modern mission in 1841. Moreover, as the Archbishop Emeritus of Birmingham says in his Foreword, this volume has been 'produced mostly by contributors from Cambridge parishes, with a sprinkling of academics. From the three dozen essays contained in this book an account written from a "town" viewpoint emerges'. Every possible archival source has been quarried: schools (both in Cambridge and also St Edmund's, Ware); Cambridge colleges (especially St Edmund's); dioceses (East Anglia, Northampton, Birmingham, Westminster); religious houses; Cambridgeshire Record Office; and parishes (notably Our Lady and the English Martyrs). As with Eastbourne, oral history (taped interviews) form a significant part of the primary source material.

New Norcia Studies 11 (September 2003) contains several articles of archival interest connected with the Spanish-founded Western Australian Benedictine monastery. Perhaps the most fascinating, however, is Father David Barry's account of his search for documents relating to the history of his abbey. The search took him to five European countries: Spain, Italy, France, England (Ramsgate Abbey, Public Record Office, Downside Abbey, Ampleforth Abbey) and Ireland (All Hallows College, Dublin). The project lasted from January to December 2002 and resulted in 7000 images scanned, four reels of microfilm, and several hundred pages of photocopies. Clearly the monks of New Norcia are committed to discovery of their archival roots.

Burn Holy Fire: Religion in Lewes since the Reformation by Jeremy Goring (Lutterworth Press, Cambridge, 2003, pp. 192) charts the fortunes of various religious groups in the county town of East Sussex – a town known as the setting for the burning of ten Protestant martyrs under Mary Tudor in 1557 and also for its 'No Popery' Bonfire Night celebrations. The author argues that the anti-Catholic strain in the latter dates more precisely from the so-called 'Papal Aggression' of 1850 (Restoration of the Hierarchy). The book utilises archival material from the Public Record Office and draws heavily upon both the East and West Sussex Record Offices. Although much of the book is concerned with Anglicanism and Protestant Dissenters, the author is both perceptive and generous in his analysis of the Catholic contribution to the town's more recent religious history, especially with regard to ecumenism in an environment which has not always proved conducive to that task.

In 2003 the English Benedictine community of St Edmund, founded at Paris in 1615 and transferred to Douai in 1818, celebrated the centenary of its arrival in Woolhampton, Berkshire. Douai 1903-Woolhampton 2003: A Centenary History (Stanbrook Abbey Press, Worcester, 2003) is edited by Abbot Geoffrey Scott, President of the Catholic Archives Society, and has been produced by the oldest private printing press in England. In fact the book, which comes with a CD containing lists, photographs and other data, traces the history of the monastery (and school, closed in 1999) from its foundation in Paris to the present day through a series of essays. The result is an informative survey of a venerable religious community which has on several occasions successfully adapted itself to changing needs and circumstances. Recourse to the monastic archive is evident in each of the contributions.

A bi-centenary celebrated in 2003 was that of the Restoration of the English (now British) Province of the Society of Jesus. Promising Hope: Essays on the Suppression and Restoration of the English Province of the Society of the Jesus, edited by Thomas M. McCoog SJ (Jesuit Historical Institute, Rome/British Province of the Society of Jesus, London, 2003, pp.xii+479) is a meticulously-researched and attractively-illustrated volume which has as its mainstay eight essays by Father Geoffrey Holt SJ, the doyen of scholars specialising in eighteenth-century English Jesuit history. He is ably supported by the editor's historical overview and afterword, and essays by Professor Maurice Whitehead, Father Thomas Morrissey SJ, the late Father Hubert Chadwick SJ, and Jan Graffius. As one would expect, the use of primary sources is abundant, chiefly from Jesuit archives in Rome, England (Provincial Archives, London, and the Stonyhurst Archives) and Ireland (Provincial Archives, Dublin). A series of appendices supply a wealth of documentary sources, including the texts and translations of papal documents, catalogues of the English Province during the time of Suppression, and correspondence relating to the re-establishment of the Jesuits in England. Once again the Jesuits have proved their commitment to historical research and the use of archival sources.

The year 2002 witnessed the commemoration of the bicentenary of the birth in Seville of Cardinal Wiseman. La Sevilla de Nicolas Wiseman (Fundacion Jose Manuel Lara, Seville, 2003, pp.166) has been edited by Antonio Garnica and contains the papers given as part of a special symposium convened to mark the occasion. Martin Murphy (on the Irish in Seville) and Father Paul Keane of the Diocese of Brentwood and until recently student archivist at the Venerabile (on Wiseman and the English College, Rome) were the two English-speaking participants. The other contributions examine the Irish in eighteenth-century Europe, the three cities associated with Wiseman (Seville, Rome and London), Seville in Wiseman's time, the Wiseman family as seen from evidence in the parochial archives of Santa Cruz in Seville, a history of Wiseman's birthplace, and the Church in Seville at the time of the cardinal's birth. A translation into English would be most welcome.

THE CATHOLIC ARCHIVES SOCIETY CONFERENCE, 2003

The twenty-fourth annual conference of the Catholic Archives Society was held at Campion House, Osterley, Middlesex, from 26 to 28 May 2003. On the opening evening Mass was celebrated by the Patrons of the Society, Cardinal Murphy-O'Connor and Archbishop (now Cardinal) Marchisano, and the after-dinner speaker was Abbot Geoffrey Scott, President of the CAS. The Archbishop, together with Dr Christina Carlo-Stella of the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church, attended the conference.

The introductory talk of the conference was Canon Anthony Dolan's 'Overview of Twenty-Five Years of the Catholic Archive Society', which proved to be a humorous as well as informative reflection of the Society's foundation, development and contribution to the life of the Church since its inception in 1979. The text of this talk is printed elsewhere in this edition of Catholic Archives.

On Tuesday morning Mr Paul Atterbury spoke on 'Setting up an Exhibition', recalling his own involvement in the highly successful Pugin exhibition at the Victoria and Albert Museum in 1994. In the afternoon the majority of participants travelled by coach to Kew, where they were given a guided tour of the National Archives (formerly the Public Record Office) – a visit made all the more memorable by the fact that Archbishop Marchisano and others were trapped in a lift for some minutes en route to the search rooms. A smaller number of people went to Brentford to visit the Archives of the Poor Servants of the Mother of God, where they were given a conducted tour by Paul Shaw, the archivist. The evening workshops were devoted to 'Archives in Schools', 'Writing a Parish History', and 'Writing a History of Religious Orders'.

The first part of the final morning of the conference was devoted to Archbishop Marchisano's address, in which he concentrated on the contribution made by the CAS, the importance of forging links with other archivists (especially in countries where the Church is still young), the task of making inventories, and the need for in-service training. The Open Forum and A.G.M. provided their customary useful exchange of information and ideas. A full report on the conference is to be found in CAS Bulletin 25 (Autumn 2003).

EDITORIAL NOTES

It is with a sense of thanksgiving that I write this short introduction to what is the Silver Jubilee edition of Catholic Archives. The journal first appeared in 1981, and to the founding Editor, Robin Gard, a great debt of gratitude is owed. He established Catholic Archives as a review of national and international importance, a respected organ in archival circles both within and beyond the English-speaking countries of the Catholic Church. Supported by a host of willing contributors, and perhaps a few who have endured the proverbial 'arm-twisting' to secure an article, both Robin and the present Editor may be quietly satisfied with the consistently high standard of contributions and the equally consistent level of interest shown by subscribers and readers in the fortunes of the journal.

I am particularly pleased to include three articles from Ireland in this issue. Firstly, I would like to thank the Most Rev. Edward Daly, Bishop Emeritus of Derry, not only for his contribution to the journal, but also for the very encouraging example of energy and commitment that he has brought to his task as Diocesan Archivist. Likewise my thanks go to Father Seamus de Val and Brother Linus Walker for their contributions on the Diocese of Ferns and the Brothers of St Patrick respectively. These three articles serve as a timely reminder of the importance of the Catholic Archives Society's role and influence in Ireland.

In England & Wales the Diocese of East Anglia is one of the more recent creations. Dora Cowton has submitted a summary of the classification scheme and contents of the archive, and thus augments the list of English dioceses which have featured in the pages of the journal. From the Phillippines the intrepid Sister Mary Campion McCarren reports on her visit to the Archives of the Archdiocese of Manila. After reading her description I think that there is much that we in Europe may learn from the professionalism and enthusiasm of our Filipino colleagues.

Religious congregations are also well represented: the Poor Clares of Darlington (Sister Mary Michael); the Passionists (Sister Dominic Savio Hamer); and the Daughters of Charity. The latter contribution, by Sister Judith Greville, is a revision of her congregation's holdings of children's records, complemented by a list of other repositories holding such records. This will be manna to those archivists who are called upon to respond to genealogical enquiries. Finally, Sister Anne Leonard introduces us to the work of the Association of English-Speaking Archivists in Rome.

Sadly, and after twenty-four editions, the Carmelites of Darlington have been obliged to relinquish the printing of Catholic Archives owing to the need to re-arrange their publishing commitments in the light of the number of active sisters available for such work. On behalf of my predecessor as Editor, and of the whole Society, I wish to thank the Carmelites for their unfailing courtesy, patience and hard work since 1981. However, with the inability of the Carmelites to continue as our printers, the Editor has made a foray into desk-top publishing, and has been able further to regulate production costs which it is hoped will benefit the Society in terms of its financial resources.

THE DERRY DIOCESAN ARCHIVE

Most.Rev.Edward Daly

The Derry Diocese is located in the north-western part of Ireland. It consists of most of County Derry, about half of County Tyrone and eleven parishes in County Donegal. The ecclesiastical centre of the diocese is Derry City, founded originally by St Columba in 546 as a staging post between Ireland and what would be his most important foundation at Iona in Scotland. The current diocesan boundaries were set up in the twelfth century.

I was appointed as Diocesan Archivist in 1994 by my successor, Bishop Seamus Hegarty. Prior to then, nobody had been specifically designated as Diocesan Archivist. Documents, various registers and books had been preserved; some had been filed under various headings; but there was no catalogue of the archive and nobody had any accurate idea of the extent of the archive or what the archive contained. The archives were located in the strong room in Bishop's House and stored in filing cabinets, tea chests, cardboard boxes and containers in other parts of that building. In 1990 a proper location or environment for the diocesan archive was identified. The preparation of this facility was completed in 1994 and all the documents and books with the exception of those detailed in Canon 489 were moved from Bishop's House to the newly-prepared location in Collon House. This is the residence of the priests who teach in St Columb's College, Derry. It is a secure and environmentally suitable storage facility used exclusively for the archives in accordance with Irish national standards. These standards are set down in Standards for the Development of Archive Services in Ireland, published by the Society of Archivists Irish Region in 1997.

My first task as Diocesan Archivist was to sort out the huge and dusty mass of paper, which confronted me. Initially, I was disappointed with the lack of material that originated before the episcopacy of my predecessor, Bishop Neil Farren (1939-73). However, when I had waded through the paper and decided on the categories under which I wished to list the archive, I then gave consideration to the manner or technique of cataloguing the material. I consulted with a number of individuals and agencies, including David Sheehy, Archivist of the Archdiocese of Dublin, Bishop McKiernan of Kilmore and the Northern Ireland Public Record Office in Belfast.

I eventually decided to catalogue all the documents on a computer database. I had already been using computers in the Bishop's Office since the early 1980s. The original database software programme I had used in that work was DELTA. It was manufactured by an English company, Compssoft plc. I decided to use Compssoft's Equinox software programme in cataloguing our archive. It proved most satisfactory and is a most effective and efficient search engine with a virtually unlimited capacity. I have now set up another database on Microsoft Access. All archive documents are listed on both databases.

Each document or register in the archive is individually listed in the database under the following headings:

DATE: Date of Issue

DESCRIPTION: Letter/Record/Report etc. The nature of the document.

FROM: Name and address of the person/persons or agency from which the document originated.

TO: Name and address of the person/persons/agency to whom the document was sent.

SUBJECT MATTER: A short summary of the content of the document.

FILE: Number of the File Folder in which the document is filed.

BOX: Number of the Box in which the File Folder is contained.

I have now catalogued more than 58,000 documents on both databases. Under these various headings and with a modern powerful PC, any document or set of documents can be located in seconds. We can search for documents under one or more of the criteria listed above.

After the sorting and cataloguing process was completed, the documents were stored in acid-free folders and acid-free boxes for long-term storage and preservation. The files in which the documents are kept are listed under specific headings e.g. Diocesan Council of Priests, Parish of X, Annual Statistics etc.

The lack of older archive material is disappointing. Although there is some material of nineteenth-century origin, most of the items in the archive are post-1939. There are only about 2,000 documents emanating from before 1939. However, there is a very comprehensive archive of the period since 1939, covering the Second World War, the development of Catholic education in Northern Ireland after the Education Act (NI) 1947, and the entire period of the Northern Ireland Conflict (1968-94). The archive consists of letters, diocesan and parish records, inventories, financial statements, photographs, newspapers and newspaper clippings, minutes of meetings, registers, publications etc.

In association with the work of cataloguing the diocesan archive, a book was published in December 1997 by Four Courts Press, Dublin. It was entitled The Clergy of the Diocese of Derry: An Index. The joint authors were Father Kieran Devlin and myself. In this book are listed the saints associated with the diocese; bishops (including monastic bishops) and abbots; priests from the earliest period to the sixteenth century; and a virtually complete list of the clergy and parish staffing for the period 1800-1996. As far as possible, a brief curriculum vitae of each individual is included. In this manner, all the priests who have served the diocese are recorded for posterity. To mark the Millennium, a number of writers were commissioned by Bishop Hegarty to contribute to an outline history of the diocese from the introduction of Christianity in the sixth century until the present day. Each contributor submitted an article of around 6,000 words about a specific period of diocesan history in which the writer has particular expertise. This project was sponsored by the diocese. Four Courts Press published the work in late 1999.

The Circular Letter, The Pastoral Function of Church Archives, issued by the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church in February 1997 was a great source of encouragement and affirmation for church archivists. The Letter emphasised the importance of archives as part of the Church's cultural heritage and pointed out the responsibilities which bishops have under the 1983 Code of Canon Law in relation to archives. It was also the first time, to my knowledge, that a document from the Holy See urged the use of modern electronic technology in the management and cataloguing of church archives.

There is a particular difficulty experienced by some archivists with some computer programmes, i.e. those that do not recognise any date prior to 1 January 1900! This can be a problem in cataloguing documents going back for a few hundred years. Most modern databases are programmed to recognise all dates from 1 January 1900 until 31 December 2099! However, with a little adjustment, this problem can be overcome.

The work continues. It is important nowadays that a diocese should have good and reliable archives and records that can be easily accessed. Anyone who wishes to access our archive should contact me at: 9 Steelstown Road, Derry BT48 8EU. My telephone number is 028 71350809; e-mail: edward.daly@btinternet.com

THE ARCHIVES OF THE DIOCESE OF FERNS

Rev. Seamas S. de Val

Getting Started

For a diocese which has celebrated its fourteenth centenary, it may surprise readers of Catholic Archives to learn that its archives are only in their infancy! That however, is a fact. The Diocese of Ferns, having a population of about 95,000 Catholics in forty-nine parishes, covers most of County Wexford in the south-east corner of Ireland. Parts of it extends into the neighbouring counties of Carlow and Wicklow, while a small portion of County Wexford belongs to the Archdiocese of Dublin. It is bounded on the east by the Irish Sea, on the south by the Atlantic Ocean, on the north and west by the Archdiocese of Dublin and the Dioceses of Kildare and Leighlin, Ossory, and Waterford.

The diocese is reckoned to have been founded in 598 A.D. by its first bishop, St Maodhog, otherwise known as Aidan. A few years before the celebration of its fourteenth centenary, a small committee, which came to be known as the Ferns Diocesan History and Archives Group, came together to consider what could be done to mark the occasion, and it was decided, first, to publish a comprehensive biographical dictionary of the clergy of the diocese; secondly, to publish a book containing articles on various aspects of diocesan history and activity for a general readership; and, thirdly, to establish a diocesan archive, something which was considered essential. While every parish has its own parochial archive, and an archive, obviously, exists in the Bishop's House, there had been no specific 'diocesan archive' to which researchers might have access.

The efforts of the History and Archives Group resulted in the publication, in November 1999, of Memory and Mission: Christianity in Wexford 600 to 2000 A.D., followed early in 2000 by Canon John V. Gahan's The Secular Priests of the Diocese of Ferns, a volume of over 400 pages containing detailed biographical notes on the priests of the diocese from the seventeenth century, and which will be an extremely valuable source of information for research workers for many years to come.

The establishment of a diocesan archive received episcopal approval. While an archive existed in the Bishop's House, there was no diocesan archive as such. The first problem was to find a location for the proposed archive. The ideal, of course, would be a free-standing, purpose-built structure erected on a green-field site, but financial constraints excluded this from the start. Various existing buildings were considered but these, too, were ruled out as being unsuitable for one reason or another.

Finally, the only premises available proved to be the downstairs area of the large late eighteenth-century Georgian house which formed the nucleus of St Peter's College when it opened in Wexford Town in 1819. While basements are the least acceptable locations for archives, the choice was between that and abandoning the idea altogether! A large apartment in the basement was chosen to be the main storage area with two smaller rooms to serve as an office and a search room. An air conditioner was fitted, metal shelving installed, and acid-free boxes and folders purchased. This accounted for all the finance available. It was now up to the unpaid archivist to fill the boxes!

Initially, an appeal was made to the parishes for various types of material that might be of archival interest: (a) documents of any kind giving information about parochial appointments, ordinations, church building, the activities of clergy, especially of earlier periods, e.g., newspaper cuttings, memorial cards, photographs; (b) letters, old manuscripts of sermons, church notice-books, booklets or brochures relating to church dedications, school openings, lists of subscribers to fund-raising activities; (c) catechisms, devotional booklets, plays, novels, etc., especially those written by diocesan priests; (d) documentation relating to the building, alteration or renovation of churches, information on ancient cemeteries, churches or monastic sites etc.

A small amount of such material has been forthcoming from some of the parishes, but this has not yet been described and arranged. Three large collections have found their way to our infant archive: (i) The Hore Manuscript Collection; (ii) The House of Missions Collection; and (iii) The Patrick O'Donovan Collection.

Large Collections

(i) The Hore Collection

The Hore Collection consists of the manuscript material compiled by two Wexford historians of the nineteenth century, father and son, named Herbert Francis Hore (1817-1865) and Philip Herbert Hore (1841-1931). When Herbert Hore died in tragic circumstances in 1865, he left behind him a mass of historical notes and letters concerning the history of County Wexford, having already published important articles on the subject in various archaeological and historical journals. His son, Philip Hore, was faced with the problem of what to do with all this material. He wondered whether to destroy it, or to preserve it and endeavour to continue and complete his father's work. Happily for local historians, he decided on the latter course. He embarked on a programme of research which was to occupy him for the rest of his active life, working whenever he could in the Public Record Offices in Dublin and London, in the university libraries at Oxford and Cambridge, and in libraries in Paris, Brussels and Rome, spending a large amount of money in the process. The result of his efforts was what he called, with justifiable pride, 'one of the finest collections' of historical manuscripts. Between 1901 and 1911 he published six large volumes on the history of County Wexford, as well as numerous articles in journals and newspapers, but the printed works represent only part of the contents of the manuscript collection in which students of Wexford history have an invaluable storehouse of original material - extracts from State Papers and other documents dating from the twelfth century. Many of these which he had copied in the State Paper Office and the Public Record Office in Dublin were destroyed during the War of Independence and its aftermath in the early 1920s, and so Hore's copies are of the utmost importance. Philip Hore died in 1931 at the age of ninety.

The whole of the Hore Collection was left by will to St Peter's College, Wexford, and has now been transferred to the Ferns Diocesan Archives. The services of an archivist were made available by the Wexford County Library, so that the collection has now been catalogued, and a 'box list' prepared, and plans are afoot to have a detailed descriptive list made of the manuscripts, as well as, it is hoped, making the material available in the County Library in Wexford Town.

(ii) The House of Missions Collection

The second large collection I have mentioned is the House of Missions Collection. The House of Missions was an institute of diocesan priests, established in 1866 for the purpose of conducting parish missions and retreats in Ireland, Britain, and occasionally in the United States. In the present climate of falling numbers of clergy, it was not possible to continue this mission work and the House closed in 1991. Several boxes of miscellaneous material have been deposited in the Diocesan Archives, and descriptive lists have been made of the contents.

(iii) The Patrick O'Donovan Collection

The third collection is a large number of notebooks and photographs amassed by a local historian. However, no work of cataloguing or arranging has as yet been done on these.

Small Collections

In addition to the above, there are some smaller collections of letters and papers of individual priests and laymen gathered by them in their lifetime and deposited in the Diocesan Archives by relatives or friends. Most of this material has been processed. Also, a great amount of material has been transferred from Bishop's House and deposited in the Diocesan Archives. Work is progressing slowly on this. Included are letters and other documents relating to bishops of the diocese from the eighteenth century, such as Ambrose O'Callaghan (1729-44), Nicholas Sweetman (1745-86), and James Caulfield (1782-1814), as well as material concerning convents and religious houses, and documents from Rome appointing bishops, replies to queries, promulgation of regulations etc.

The Future

The Diocesan Archives are located in the basement of the large Georgian house at St Peter's College, Summerhill, Wexford. However, members of the History and Archives Group realise that this location is entirely unsuitable, as it is impossible to have proper environmental control, even with the installation of air-conditioning equipment. Efforts are being made to find a solution to this problem, but thus far without much success. Financial restraints are a major problem. No facilities exist for researchers - and very few for the archivist, who to the best of his ability endeavours to reply to queries and to offer whatever assistance he can in the circumstances. Enquiries may be addressed to: The Archivist, Ferns Diocesan Archives, St Peter's College, Wexford, Republic of Ireland.

AT THE ELEVENTH HOUR: THE GENERALATE ARCHIVE OF THE BROTHERS OF ST. PATRICK

Brother Linus H.Walker

In 1986, while resident at our Generalate, I was told that I was General Archivist. Two considerations may have helped the authorities in their decision: I had done some historical research and had frequently supplied items for the archive. Perhaps the appointment was casually made. Casually accepted it certainly was. At the time I held a full-time teaching post and was involved in parish activities and other work in the wider community. Innocent of all archival training, unaware of any need for a job description, and possessed of a dangerous goodwill, I thought of the task as simply a matter of keeping the Congregation's Annals up to date. In this I had the able assistance of the Indian-born Secretary to the General Council who plied me with documents from many sources, including excerpts from his personal diary. Over the next six years I did little more than record what seemed important or interesting. At first this was done in longhand, but later with the aid of a word-processor. I did develop the habit of filing away the more important documents supplied to me.

On retirement from school work in 1992 I was offered a part-time post as archivist to the Diocese of Kildare and Leighlin. This was to prove a blessing and in many respects a turning-point, not just for me but for my Congregation's holdings. The Chancellor, a personal friend, early on handed me several issues of Catholic Archives, all edited by Robin Gard. In one I found a pilot scheme for a diocesan archive, and this, with later emendations, served me very well indeed. The Association of Church Archivists of Ireland was just then breaking new ground with day seminars and short training courses, invaluable aids to such raw beginners as myself. In time I began to apply to our own collection what I had learned, sorting and arranging as best I knew.

Our Generalate was a purpose-built structure, less than twenty years old. In traditional fashion the provision for archives was no more than a tiny room equipped with shelving and a fireproof door, (the other walls were lath and plaster). Inside was a jumble of boxes, folders, envelopes and artefacts. There was no working-space or accommodation for reading. I soon discovered that my "collections" were always in someone's way, and in danger of being shifted about by cleaners and others. Again, such designations as I had devised seemed to need constant revision, and even to become mysterious to myself.

Possible categories were endless, and were I to proceed as I had begun I should need an aeroplane hanger for the work. I found myself forced to reformulate my ideas, deciding that the need was to determine what had been preserved, provide for its safety and for the easy retrieval of any item. In something like a spirit of desperation I took up the first document to hand, a housekeeping bill from 1949. To this I assigned a temporary classification and a number within that classification before placing it in an archival folder appropriately marked. The folder I stored in a large press in our little-used billiard-room. The next step was to open a temporary catalogue and record there the number, classification and a short description of that precious document. No matter that the very next entry referred to an entirely different document and classification. A beginning has been made and two items temporarily disposed of. The new process I soon found tedious and unending. Progress seemed infinitesimal and over the years I came to liken my case to that of Job forced to lament his existence in a place "where no order but everlasting horror had its settled abode."

Bishop Daniel Delany of Kildare and Leighlin established the Sisters of St. Brigid in 1807 and the Brothers of St. Patrick a year later for the purpose of providing education in his mensal parish of Tullow. It is interesting that some six or seven other congregations came into existence about that time and in the same general area of south-east Ireland. Though spreading to other dioceses, to India and Australia, the Brothers remained a diocesan institution until 1888 and were always relatively few in number. The twentieth century brought expansion at home and overseas including foundations in California, Kenya and Papua New Guinea. Successive general administrations worked from Tullow, the place of foundation, and the archives came to be localised there. Eighty years "under the bishops" had not provided for the keeping of a regular and central record. Little survived from the early years of any community. A few Brothers here and there did something by way of chronicling salient events, but these were seldom complete and few found their way to the central archive. Successive Superiors General were their own secretaries, each with his own approach to record-keeping and document preservation. On taking office each tended to put away, with or without label, such of his predecessor's papers as he did not need for immediate purposes. Such collections found their way in time to a single press in an old and damp monastery and, ultimately, to that storage space in the new Generalate opened in 1975.

Of the collections which came to hand during my search few contained all the documents relating to their labels, while heterogeneous bundles abounded. It was not unusual to find a labelled container from which the contents had been removed. In general, title deeds and legal documents had been preserved in an iron safe, profession records placed together, financial returns either grouped together by periods or arranged under places of origin, but there order ended. Photographs, particularly the earlier ones, had been almost totally neglected, and were rarely identified or dated. When information on the past was needed the main reliance had been on an immense and unwieldy tome labelled "Annals Volume One." Even this owed most of its information to the labour and dedication of Brother Boniface Carroll, who had worked on it for thirty-odd years from 1919, using an old N-pen to chronicle current happenings and events long antecedent to the time of writing.

By dealing with each document as I came upon it I had rendered any accurate estimation of progress almost impossible, though the tedium was occasionally relieved by rewarding discoveries or moments of light relief. Among the papers surviving from the early years was a manuscript copy of the first set of Constitutions. Dated 1822, it was much more an extended horarium than a set of rules, but it contained many of the Founder's maxims and extracts from conferences given to the first Brothers. Among others things it provided for a quarterly Chapter of "all members of the community, at which the state of the house shall be laid open, and each one free to express his own opinion, which shall be listened to." The printed version bearing the imprimatur of Bishop James Doyle, himself an Augustinian friar, was dated 1826 and differed in just one particular from the original. The provision on Community Chapters was altered to read: "Everyone shall be free to express his own opinion, which shall be listened to, but by no means acted upon."

The early account books proved to contain interesting historical notes, sometimes by way of comment on events in community, church or state. The human touch was occasionally evident as when a troubled accountant entered "the school money, as Bro. John said it was." Brother John Lawler was superior of the monastery at the time. The connection with the Metropolitan Orphan Protection and Rescue Society is borne witness to solely in the accounts of the Tullow house, as is also their connection with, and indebtedness to, the local Temperance and Mortality Society. The laconic entry "Michael Hickey left here this day" marks the departure from the Institute of Brother Joseph Hickey, who had designed and built two of its earliest monasteries. A loose page bore the names of those who were the first to pronounce vows in the Congregation, giving the place and date and bearing the intriguing signature 'Frater Primus', intriguing in that from our present state of knowledge it could signify any one of three among those named.

Two notebooks of unequal size represent the memoirs of Brother Serenus Kelly, a close associate of the founder. Leaving Leitrim in the far north-west, Patrick Kelly worked his way as a journeyman labourer to Tullow, where he acquired a smallholding before joining the little group of "monks" in April 1808. His already poor health was so aggravated by the primitive conditions of a tumbledown monastery that he was advised to leave. Writing always in the third person he describes how the community "met to vote him out" and how he appealed to the founder, asserting that "if he couldn't live in the monastery, he hoped, with the grace of God and the bishop's permission, to die there." From that time he became Bishop Delany's close helper, acting as his driver on many journeys and performing several missions for him and the clergy. He was to outlive all his contemporaries, filling the office of superior on eight different occasions, making fund-raising tours in Ireland, England and France, during which he claimed to have "had audience of eight kings in their palaces." Bishop Doyle employed him to collect money for the building of Carlow Cathedral. He was involved with Father Mathew's Temperance Movement, and was an ardent supporter of Daniel O'Connell in the latter's campaigns for Emancipation and Repeal of the Union. Never reluctant to engage in controversy, he differed sharply with Bishop Doyle's immediate successor, even journeying to Rome to assert his claim. On a related point he again opposed the next prelate, and though appearing to lose the argument, may be said to have carried it posthumously in that it was discovered that the arrangement insisted on by the bishop had been vitiated by an act carried out by Brother Serenus twenty years earlier. On one of his earliest journeys by steamer he described how the ship carried a band "to bother grief " by drowning out the noise of the engines.

The late months of the year 1999 passed in a veritable nightmare of packing and recording. The Generalate was to be disposed of and the archives moved to Galway. Even this was likely to be but a temporary relocation, in that declining numbers and the closing of monasteries and schools imperatively demanded some forward thinking. The Superior General took the matter to the Conference of Religious in Ireland. An approach to Government brought a grant for a survey to determine what was held by the various religious institutes and the provision actually existing for these holdings. A useful report to the Conference followed in something over a year, and there the matter seems to have ended. The dream of a central repository for the archives of religious institutes, for dioceses and for Christian churches in general seems to have receded. The 1998 Vatican document, The Pastoral Function of Church Archives, failed to generate enthusiasm in Ireland, even after the version published by the Vatican Polyglot Press had been supplemented by the much more readable edition produced by the Catholic Archives Society. Two years ago I failed to interest a publisher in a simplified version of the original along the lines once popularised by the Grail.

Commuting from Galway I continued my involvement with Kildare & Leighlin until 2002, after which I concentrated on my own Congregation's archives. By mid-2003 the temporary listing had been sufficiently advanced for work to begin on what I hope will be a final and permanent catalogue. The central administration, General Chapters, successive Superiors General, papers relating to the provinces and to the communities in Ireland have been arranged, filed, boxed and catalogued. Work remains to be done on individual Brothers, newsletters and various bound volumes. Present thinking is that when cataloguing has been completed, the General Archive of the Patrician Brothers may find a permanent home, in a repository planned by the diocese in which our Congregation took its origins two hundred years ago. May God bring this plan to fruition.

BISHOP DANIEL DELANY

POOR CLARE MONASTERY, DARLINGTON: ITS HISTORY AND ARCHIVES

Sister Mary Michael P.C.

History

Under the guidance of St. Francis, St. Clare of Assisi founded in 1212 an order of contemplative sisters, whose lives, lived within the enclosure, would draw down from God many graces and blessings for the whole world. The first Poor Clare monastery in England, was founded in 1266, at Newcastle-upon-Tyne. At the time of the Reformation, with the Dissolution of the Monasteries, and the prohibition of religious life, those who wished to enter the cloister had to do so abroad, in a Catholic country or environment.

In 1455 a Poor Clare convent had been founded in Antwerp. From there, in 1472, a small colony of nuns founded a new community in the little town of Veere in Holland. The community prospered until 1572, when it was driven out by the Calvinists. The nuns returned to the motherhouse at Antwerp, until in 1581 all the Poor Clares were forced to leave the city as the Geux had seized it. The community then proceeded to St. Omer, where it settled and flourished.

In this community lived for a short time, as an Extern sister, a young English gentlewoman from North Yorkshire named Mary Ward. She saw the need for and established a community for English women in Gravelines, then in the Spanish Netherlands but now in northern France. Through a benefactor she procured some land, and the monastery was built. Though she came to realize that her vocation lay elsewhere, she was the effective foundress of Gravelines. Mary Ward eventually established the Institute of the Blessed Virgin Mary (I.B.V.M.)

In 1609, some of the English Poor Clares left St. Omer for Gravelines, and the community both increased and prospered. So much so, that within a short time several foundations were made. The first was at Aire in Artois in 1629, then Rouen in Normandy in 1644, and also at Dunkirk in 1652. The Darlington community is the direct continuation of that at Rouen and also, since 1807, representative of all the foundations from Gravelines.

For almost 150 years, the Rouen nuns faithfully lived out their Poor Clare vocation, until in 1789 the first rumblings of the French Revolution were heard. The Revolutionary government began to impose greater hardships, and in 1793 the monastery was confiscated and the nuns imprisoned for sixteen months, together with several other communities, including the Benedictine nuns of Dunkirk. Their courage and ingenuity at coping with this situation was inspiring. They did not have enough food or fuel, and lived in daily fear of execution. With the fall of Robespierre, the chief architect of the Terror, in 1794, things improved a little, but they were still in danger. In January 1795 they were given their liberty, but soon realized that it would be impossible to continue their religious life at that time in France. Friends and benefactors alike urged them to return to England. This they did in July and August of that year. They travelled in small numbers, at different times, to avoid suspicion. In all forty-one nuns came to England. In one group was an intrepid lay sister. She sat on the deck of the ship with a large bundle on her knee, and outside was tied an old cooking pot. When the customs man approached, and asked "What have you got there?", she replied bravely "Can't you see, kitchen utensils", and promptly pretended to be seasick. The official moved away quickly. In reality, the bundle contained the sacred altar vessels from Rouen. The community lived for about four months in a rented house in Manchester Square, London, while looking for something more permanent. The nuns wore secular dress and tried to support themselves by the making of their own recipe for apple jelly. At length they heard of something more permanent. Sir Carnaby Haggerston of Northumberland offered them a wing of his castle. They gratefully accepted and travelled north, six every day, by public coach. Passing through York, they were given hospitality at the Bar convent (I.B.V.M.), the sisters being very kind to them. The Poor Clare community, after many trials, was reunited in its new home on Christmas Eve 1795.

As soon as they could, the nuns opened a school for young girls at Haggerston Castle. Since the early days in Rouen, though strictly enclosed, and following the First Rule of St. Clare, the community always had a school for young ladies. This helped it to be self-supporting. At this time the nuns were not allowed to wear their religious habit, but all dressed alike in plain black frocks, and muslin caps. During the years at Haggerston Castle twelve of the nuns died, and were buried in the graveyard of the parish church at Ancroft, where there is a memorial stone with an inscription and a record of their names

By 1805, the castle was in need of repair, and again the nuns found themselves on the move. On the advice of Sir John Lawson of Brough Hall near Catterick, Yorkshire, they at length decided to purchase Scorton Hall at Scorton, Yorkshire. The nuns, now numbering twenty-nine, arrived at Scorton in 1807, and after suitable alterations had been made, opened a school in 1809. The community prospered during these years: many new sisters were professed, some of whom had been pupils in the school. They were truly treasures, as the Chronicles state, for not only did they teach in the school, fulfil their religious duties, and help in the house; they also helped to care for the sick and infirm members of the community.

One of the benefactors who helped the nuns at this time, was Lady Mary Stanley, the daughter of Sir Carnaby Haggerston. It is interesting to note, as one looks through the records, the consistent kindness of these Catholic families of means to refugee religious communities. The Rouen nuns were helped by Sir Carnaby, whose mother was Mary Silvertop, daughter of George Silvertop of Minsteracres. The Aire community was given assistance by the Witham and Weld families - Sister, M. Euphrasia being the sister of Mr. Thomas Weld of Britwell House, Oxfordshire - and there it was offered shelter. The Dunkirk community, though further away in Worcester, also met with great kindness, and was given a small house on the Berkeley estate at Spetchley Park, near Worcester.

In 1850, the Scorton nuns were looking for a site for a new monastery. Three locations were suggested, but were deemed unsuitable. In 1851, on the occasion of the annual visitation by Bishop Briggs of Leeds, Rev. J. Brown, chaplain to the nuns at Carmel House, Darlington, and Bishop Hogarth of Hexham and Newcastle, made known to Mother Abbess that the Carmelites, who had been established at Darlington since 1830, were prepared to offer the Poor Clares some of their land as a site for the new monastery. The community at Scorton was very grateful for this proposal, but Bishop Briggs thought otherwise. He was reluctant to allow the nuns to leave his diocese. However, after the lapse of one year he consented. Plans were drawn up, the site prepared, and in September 1855 the foundation stone of the new abbey church was laid. By the end of 1857 the community and its pupils took possession of their new home.

Simplicity of style is probably the most notable feature of the abbey. In the church alone, the centre of the life of a nun, do we find a departure from this simplicity. The building is often taken to be by Pugin, but it was designed by J. Hansom. The pillars and the altarpiece are quarried and sculptured from local stone. The east window is a very beautiful creation in stained glass.

The community settled down quickly and happily in its new home. The school was given up in 1887 because the nuns wished to be free to concentrate on their contemplative vocation. Observing the First Rule of St Clare, they continue this life today, earning their living by the making and selling of altar breads. They have no extern sisters, but a resident housekeeper.

Archives

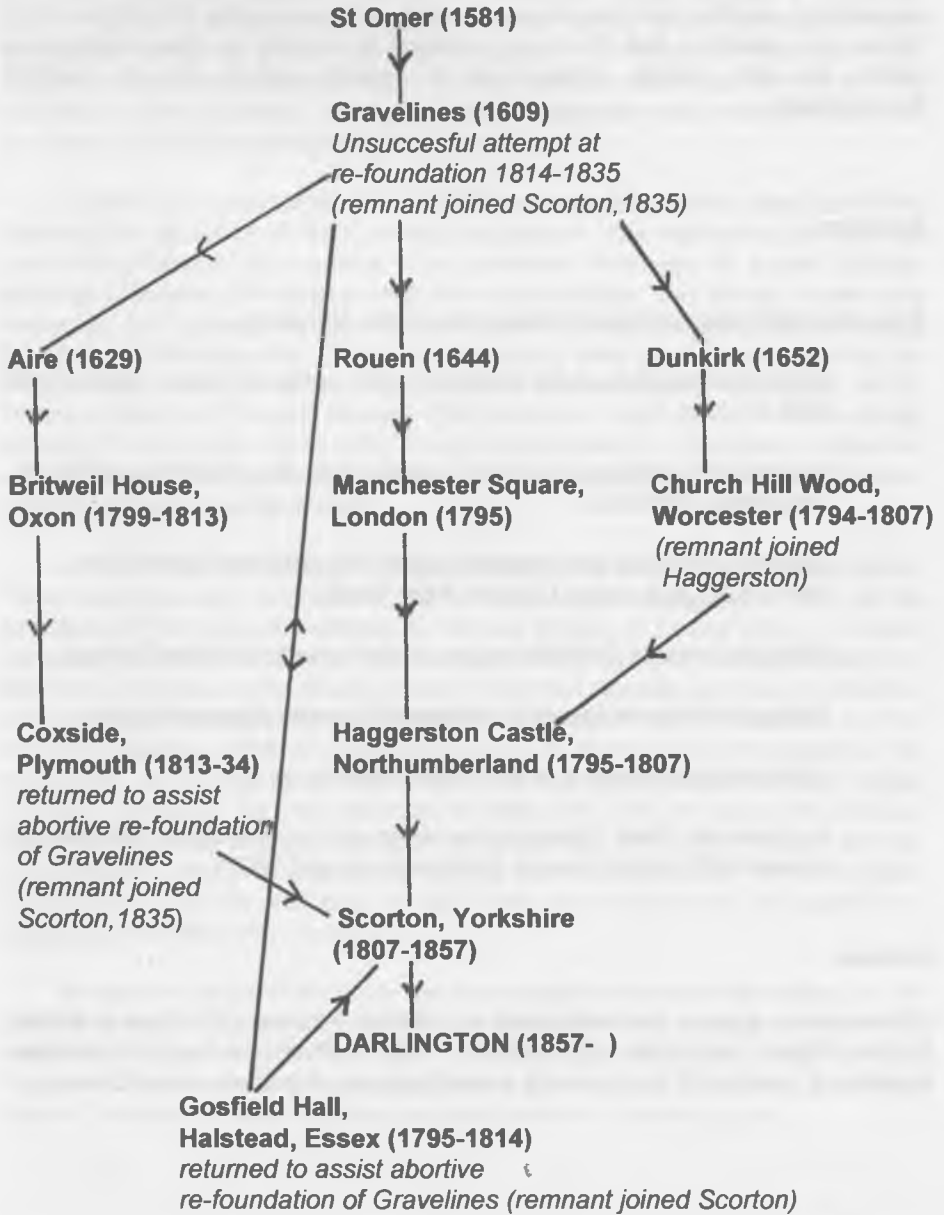

The principal holdings of the archives include the following:

- Original chronicles of the English Poor Clares of Rouen (1644-1780, 1795 to date).
- Seventeenth-century copy of the annals of the English Poor Clares of Gravelines (1609-36).
- Original profession and death registers: Rouen (from 1644); Aire (from 1629, plus copy); Dunkirk (from 1652).
- Filiations: original Dunkirk register, now housed at Ushaw College.
- Collection of seventeenth & eighteenth-century devotional books.
- Various papers relating to the Rouen community.
- Archives of Poor Clare monasteries at Levershulme, Manchester (closed 1978) and Liberton, Edinburgh (closed 1992).

PASSIONIST NINETEENTH-CENTURY PARISH MISSIONS: THE ARCHIVAL SOURCES

Sister Dominic Savio Hamer C.P.

Parish Missions: two examples

According to the entry in his official Passionist Mission and Retreat Book, on Thursday 15 March 1855 the Italian Passionist, Father Gaudentius Rossi, travelled from Levenshulme, near Manchester, to Ugthorpe, near Whitby, to give a parish mission or retreat. 'Ugthorpe', he afterwards wrote:

...is a small village in a deserted portion of East Yorkshire, eight miles from Whitby ...At the time of the Protestant Reformation the faithful Catholics of England, like the primitive Christians, were obliged to hide themselves in deserted moors and wild portions of the country to save their lives from the persecution of their fellow countrymen and nominal Christians. Ugthorpe has the honour to have given the last devoted priest to martyrdom for his Faith, publicly executed at York. The spirit of Catholicity is preserved in this neighbourhood. About a hundred Catholic families live within a circle of ten miles. They have to walk to the chapel through bad roads, upon barren moors and bleak hills. Some of them have to come the distance from ten miles downwards. The village is very small and comparatively few Catholics live in it. The Reverend Missioner arrived at Ugthorpe on a cold day. Snow covered the hills, in some places several feet high. Besides being already fatigued, he took a bad cold. Yet he began the retreat on the fourth Sunday in Lent, 18 March. He preached as usual twice a day during a fortnight. The people attended every night with wonderful zeal and perseverance. Several families came from eight, six, four miles' distance and had to go back again in a cold season and the roads covered with snow. These efforts on the part of these good people were abundantly rewarded by a special grace from God. Some had not been, as they publicly stated, during ten, twenty, thirty and even fifty years to Confession. They neglected even a retreat by Dr Gentili nine years ago. The zealous and prudent Pastor told all this Congregation to go to the Missioner for Confession; which they did with excellent dispositions. Eight grown up persons were conditionally baptised. The two extra services had a good effect on the people. On general occasions the chapel was too small for the crowds. The retreat closed on Palm Sunday.¹

Father Gaudentius (Stephen) Rossi was born in northern Italy in 1817. He received the Passionist habit on Monte Argentario on 24 May 1836, took the four Passionist vows in 1837 and was ordained priest in the Lateran Basilica in 1840. He arrived in Aston Hall, Staffordshire, aged twenty-five, in 1842, the first Italian priest to be sent to join Blessed Dominic Barberi on the English Mission. He began to give parish missions in 1844. Between then and his departure for North America in November 1855 he gave one hundred and forty-four missions or retreats, some in the quiet of religious houses, some in hamlets and country estates, but most in the parishes of large manufacturing towns teeming with Irish poor. He had given one such urban mission in Stockport just before he went to Ugthorpe in 1855.

According to his record of it, in the same documentary source, his Mission and Retreat Book:

...the Reverend Mr Coulston, Pastor at St Michael's Catholic Chapel at Stockport, several months before requested the Reverend Father Gaudentius to give a spiritual retreat to his poor Congregation in that town. The Reverend Missioner was sent by the Vice-Provincial, Very Reverend Father Vincent [Grotti], with Very Reverend Father Consultor Ignatius [Spencer]. The two Fathers began the retreat at the last Mass on the First Sunday in Lent [25 February 1855]. Every day the two missioners said Mass, after which the Very Reverend Father Ignatius gave a meditation on the Sacred Passion of Our Lord, which was well attended considering the severity of the season and the poverty of the people. In the night at seven o'clock after a short singing the same Father delivered an instruction for about an hour's duration, which was followed by some singing again and the sermon was then delivered by the Reverend Father Gaudentius, which generally lasted about an hour's time. This plan was followed every day except Saturday night and the two nights when the services in honour of the Blessed Sacrament and our Blessed Lady took place. The chapel was crowded to inconvenience every night. The two missioners were totally occupied in the Confessional. Many poor unhappy sinners made their reconciliation with God. This was the first public retreat in this chapel, which is situated in a poor and low locality. At the unhappy times of the Stockport riot this chapel was broken into by the mob; the Tabernacle opened; and the Blessed Sacrament thrown upon the floor and trampled on by the infidel crowd. Several of these people attended the retreat. The Reverend Father Gaudentius received a Protestant woman, who showed the best dispositions. The Protestants at Stockport since the late unhappy riot seem humbled by their own excess and ever since have shown greater civility to the Catholic population. As a sign of this, though every day during the retreat the two Missioners had to walk from the priest's house to the Chapel and back again morning and night in their religious dress, yet they never experienced any inconvenience from the people, though they had to pass in a public populous street and market place.

It is necessary to state that the Catholic portion of the Congregation were highly pleased and most benefited by the retreat, though nothing extraordinary could be remarked. The Very Reverend Father Ignatius remained in the sacristy on the last Saturday till 3 o'clock in the morning, when he left to go to join Very Reverend Father Vincent at Hull in Yorkshire on the Third Sunday in Lent. The Reverend Father Gaudentius remained there to finish the retreat, which he closed in the evening with the Papal Blessing. With the Provincial's permission, he remained with the Sisters of the Holy Family at Levenshulme and Ashton-under-Lyne, where they have gone since his last retreat in that town; and on the following Thursday he started for Ugthorpe near Whitby, Yorkshire.²

There is also another source for this mission in Stockport, viz. the Diary, or Journal, of the Servant of God, Father Ignatius Spencer. According to this source, on Saturday 24 February 1855 Father Ignatius took the train from London to Stockport and was joined there at 9.30p.m. by Father Gaudentius Rossi. On Tuesday 27 February the two Passionists took time away from the mission to visit Levenshulme, where Father Ignatius dined with Mr and Mrs Charles Marshall and saw Father Marshall and Mr and Mrs Grimshaw. On 1 March Father Gaudentius went to Ashton-under-Lyne and on 4 March he again went to Levenshulme. On 6 March Father Ignatius made a very interesting entry:

Father Gaudentius took the Meditation and preached alone at 7 p.m. with a solemn service and Benediction in honour of the Blessed Sacrament. 30 girls

The Archival Sources

The Passionist Retreat of the Immaculate Heart of Mary at Minsteracres, near Consett in Co. Durham, is where the Archives of the Province of St Joseph have been situated for the last two to three years. Before that they were in St Anne's Retreat, Sutton, St Helens, where I had the privilege of looking after them from 1999. In fact, it fell to me to catalogue and pack them, ready for their transportation to Minsteracres, and then to unpack them, to rearrange them on the shelves in Minsteracres and to adjust the catalogue accordingly. I always found it a very humbling experience to work on these rich archival sources, not simply because of their historical value but because I was handling the very letters and other documents written by Blessed Dominic Barberi, the first Passionist to come to England, by Father Ignatius Spencer, and by many other saintly Passionists. There are relics there, too: several of Blessed Dominic's bones; his Passionist Sign and an Altar Stone he is said to have used; Father Ignatius Spencer's Rosary beads, a shoe and a number of his writings and sermons, such as Our Hope that the Light of Truth will yet shine forth in England, encouraged by a Recollection of the Virtues and Sufferings of her Catholic Martyrs, given in the Catholic Chapel, Leamington, on 25 February 1838 (Birmingham, 1838). Then there are the great collections of books and magazines and the Platea or House Records, the Mass Books, Suffrage Books, Financial Accounts, Books of Arrivals and Departures and, most relevant to this present article, the Books of Missions and Retreats belonging to each Passionist foundation in the country. The Book of Missions and Retreats in which Father Gaudentius Rossi wrote his accounts of the Stockport and Ugthorpe Missions was almost entirely his own. He seems to have carried it with him as he gave his endless missions in different parts of the country. Before he left for North America he was staying in Sutton and so he left it there. I had the rare joy of being able to identify it when, almost 130 years later, I was doing research on our Foundress, the Servant of God, Elizabeth Prout, Mother Mary Joseph of Jesus. The Rector handed it to me, saying, 'I don't know what this is. Do you think it would be of any use?' Unwittingly he was handing me pure gold! Because it had no title but was amongst the Sutton documents, I called it the 'Sutton Mission and Retreat

Book, 1851 - 1855' but, as indicated by the two extracts I have given and like all the Mission and Retreat Books, it describes missions and retreats given elsewhere, rather than in its titular house.

Some other documents that are relevant to Passionist Missions given in England are in the Archives of the Province of St Patrick, located in St Paul's Retreat, Mount Argus, Dublin. In particular there are the numerous volumes written by Father Salvian Nardocci, who for many years was the Master of Novices, living in St Saviour's Retreat, Broadway, but who died in Dublin. He produced nine volumes of the Annals of the Anglo-Hibernian Province, 1842 -1890, as well as nineteen volumes of his own Diary from 1855 to 1896. He also wrote biographical accounts of the early novices from 1842 to 1859, as well as keeping a folio of newspaper cuttings from 1856 to 1895.

The two mission accounts that I have quoted, however, demonstrate the need to look beyond the purely Passionist Archives in order to find other archival sources for understanding the background to Passionist missions. Who, for example, was the martyr Father Gaudentius mentioned as associated with Ugthorpe - the last to be publicly executed in York? Clearly it was Blessed Nicholas Postgate. Born at Kirkdale House, Egton, Yorkshire in 1596/7, he was ordained a priest in Douai in 1628. He returned to the English Mission, labouring around Ugthorpe for fifty years until, at the age of eighty-two, he was apprehended in 1679 at Sleights near Whitby by an exciseman called Reeves. He was taken to York and hanged, drawn and quartered on the sole charge of being a Catholic priest. For a full appreciation of this Passionist Mission in Ugthorpe, therefore, one would have to visit the National Archives in London for material on the Titus Oates Plot of 1678, which fomented renewed zeal in hunting down Catholic priests, and also for the Acts of Parliament of Elizabeth I, under which Blessed Nicholas was martyred, as well as the Record Offices, Local Archives and Libraries in Yorkshire for a local flavour of the period and place, both in the seventeenth and in the nineteenth centuries.

To understand the Passionist Mission that Fathers Ignatius and Gaudentius gave in Stockport in early 1855, the net would have to be cast even wider. Father Gaudentius referred to the Stockport Riots. These were the result partly of Derby's Proclamation of 15 June 1852, forbidding the wearing of Catholic religious dress in public and processions with religious banners; partly of pre-election rivalry between Liberals and Tories; and partly of economic and sectarian tension. Like all Sunday school children, the Catholics in Stockport held a procession once a year with banners and flags flying. Following Derby's Proclamation, Father Frith of the Stockport parish of Saints

Philip and James forbade the children to carry banners and flags, and he and Father Forster walked in ordinary clerical black. The procession passed off successfully on Sunday 27 June 1852, but that evening some Orangemen arrived from Stalybridge intent on making trouble. On the following day some members of the Stockport Protestant Association, founded in 1850, held a mock procession in derision of the Catholic Faith and burned an effigy of Father Forster. There was already racial trouble in Stockport, because, with a plentiful supply of Irish unemployed in a period of slack trade, the cotton mill owners had reduced wages. The real cause was economic but the English workers blamed the Irish for being ready to take lower wages. Public-house brawls were already taking place, chiefly incited, however, by Tory-supported Orangemen and the infamous Protestant Association. Moreover, one of the Stockport Liberal candidates in the forthcoming parliamentary elections was already in Parliament and had voted against the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill of 1851, forbidding the Catholic Hierarchy in England from using any of the titles of the medieval bishoprics. His Tory rivals in Stockport therefore dubbed him a papist and warned voters not to elect a papist parliament. This whole scenario finally culminated on 29 June in riots between the English and Irish, when St Michael's church in Princess Street was attacked, as described by Father Gaudentius. Two days later a mob assembled round the Catholic church at New Mills, where the priest was a Father Collins. Shouting '£20 for auld Collins' head', being the sum an informer received for the capture of a priest in Penal Times, they added that the 'Popish Irish' would have the same fate if they would not quit the town. The archival sources for these events and their background are the British Parliamentary Papers, especially the Report on the State of the Irish Poor in Great Britain (1836), the Reports of the Inspectors of Factories and the Accounts and Papers on Ecclesiastical Titles: C. Newdegate's Presentation of Anti-Catholic Addresses, as well as the nineteenth-century newspapers and magazines, such as the Manchester Guardian, the Illustrated London News, The Tablet and The Lamp, which can be found in major libraries and archives.

There are, however, some other references that require explanation in the excerpts both from Father Gaudentius Rossi's entry and from Father Ignatius Spencer's Diary. Father Gaudentius was at pains to record that it was with the Provincial's permission that he 'remained with the Sisters of the Holy Family at Levenshulme and Ashton-under-Lyne', where they had gone since his last retreat there; whilst Father Ignatius considered it worthy of an entry in his Diary that on 27 February he dined in Levenshulme with Mr and Mrs Marshall and that he saw Father Marshall and Mr and Mrs Grimshaw. Moreover, whilst Father Gaudentius prepared to take charge of the mission on Tuesday night, 6 March, when he was going to have a procession of thirty girls dressed in white and carrying candies, Father Ignatius betook himself to Levenshulme for the day and there he had conferences with Sister Clare etc. Who was Sister Clare and what was so special about Levenshulme to both Fathers Gaudentius and Father Ignatius? The answers to these questions are to be found in the Archives of the Sisters of the Cross and Passion, who were initially the Sisters of the Holy Family; in the Pastoral Letters of Bishop William Turner, preserved in the Archives of the Diocese of Salford; in the Census Returns; and in the Levenshulme Highway Rate Books and Rate Books for the Relief of the Poor preserved in the Archives of the Corporation of the City of Manchester. In brief, Sister Clare was one of the Sisters, the novice-mistress in fact and the local superior in Levenshulme since the Foundress had made a new foundation in Ashton-under-Lyne in January 1855. Samuel Grimshaw of Errwood Hall in Cheshire was a convert, who in 1853 had given land in Levenshulme to Bishop William Turner, the first Bishop of Salford, for a new Catholic mission and had converted some farm buildings into a church, presbytery, day school and convent. In 1854 Bishop Turner had given the convent to Elizabeth Prout to rescue her and her Sisters from the slums of central Manchester, where in 1853, with the exception of the Foundress, they had all contracted fever and several had almost died. In Levenshulme they opened St Mary's Parochial School and also a private boarding school within the convent; and it was in St Mary's, Levenshulme, that in November 1854 the first six Sisters had made their religious vows before Bishop Turner.

Although Elizabeth Prout was the Foundress, the inspiration to start the Congregation belonged to Father Gaudentius Rossi. It was because he was their Founder that he was anxious to see them, both in Levenshulme and in their new house in Ashton-under-Lyne. As Provincial in 1849, however, when Father Gaudentius and Elizabeth Prout first began to work together on the foundation, Father Ignatius Spencer had permitted him to do so. Moreover, Father Ignatius was already acquainted with Elizabeth Prout, because she had previously lived in Stone, near Aston Hall. He had visited her during the fever crisis and he had given the Sisters a retreat in January 1854. From then he was a frequent and welcome spiritual director. Finally, when Father Gaudentius went to North America, he entrusted Father Ignatius with the care of the Sisters. Mr and Mrs Charles Marshall were friends of Father Ignatius Spencer. They lived at one of the first houses to be built in what was to become Alma Park, Levenshulme; and Father Marshall was the parish priest of St Mary's, Levenshulme.

All these points, however, although relevant to the archival sources for Passionist missions, really touch only the periphery of their essence. Father Ignatius Spencer's early departure for Levenshulme, when Father Gaudentius was preparing thirty little girls dressed in white to walk round the church carrying candies before the Blessed Sacrament, raises another issue, leading us to the General Archives of the Passionist Congregation at the Retreat of SS John and Paul in Rome. As Blessed Dominic Barberi described in a letter to the Passionist Father General in 1844, preserved in those Archives but also now published in English, when he gave missions in England he began each day with Mass and a 5.00a.m. meditation on the Passion, which workers could attend and still be in the factory, or the field, by 6.00 a.m. At 3.00 p.m. he gave a practical instruction on Catholic Doctrine, especially on the Sacrament of Reconciliation; and at 7.00 p.m., when the people were home from work, he gave a sermon on the Eternal Truths. This was the pattern that was followed in both Stockport and Ugthorpe and that was always followed by Father Ignatius Spencer. For him, as for Blessed Dominic and St Paul of the Cross, the love and mercy of Christ, as shown in His Passion, were at the centre of every phase of the mission, compelling the sinner's conversion to holiness of life. It was the pattern that Father Gaudentius Rossi had also followed in 1844 and 1845. In 1846, however, he had begun to introduce the Quarant 'Ore and Blessed Sacrament processions, with girls in white dresses and boys in cassocks and surplices carrying long wax candles, as well as services in honour of Our Lady. Although doctrinally sound and part of the Tridentine reforms encouraged by Cardinal Wiseman and practised by the Rosminians in their missions, these practices were not the substance of a Passionist mission. Hence, when, on 6 March 1855, Father Gaudentius in Stockport was preparing for such a procession, Father Ignatius Spencer took the 10.30 a.m. train to Levenshulme!

What, then, was the essence of a Passionist mission and what was its place in the Passionist life according to St Paul of the Cross? In a document that he wrote in 1747 to explain the nature and purpose of his Congregation, Paul explained why the Passionists gave missions and why they lived as they did. He explained that God had raised up the new Congregation at that 'pitiable and distressing time' when they saw 'openly at work every kind of iniquity, with harm to the Holy Faith which was keenly affected in many parts of Christendom'. He described the world as 'sliding into a profound forgetfulness of the most bitter sufferings endured by Jesus Christ, our true Good, out of love, while the memory of His Most Holy Passion was practically extinct in the faithful.' He explained that he and his followers wanted to bring the Crucified Christ back into the world. They wanted to evangelise it by replacing its forgetfulness with the memory of Our Lord's Sufferings. In their missions they wanted 'to remove vice, to foster virtue and to set souls again on the way to heaven' by preaching the love and mercy of Christ Crucified, thus inspiring souls with such a tender devotion to the Passion that they would live out the memory of that Passion in their own lives.

The Passionists themselves, however, could not personify the love and mercy of Christ Crucified unless they themselves had first experienced something of what He felt and thought in His Sufferings. In order to have that personal experience they withdrew to the solitude of their monasteries, which they deliberately called 'retreats' and which were two or three miles outside towns or villages, 'to be formed to be totally God-centred, men of prayer, detached from the world, from things and from themselves.' They took vows of poverty, chastity and obedience and a fourth vow to promote the memory of the Passion in the hearts of the faithful. They relied on alms for their food; their black habit was simple and poor, both symbolising and reminding them of the meaning of their lives; and in their small rooms they had no more than a Crucifix, a paper picture of Our Lady, a small table, a straw chair and a narrow bed only a few inches above the floor. Thus, as Paul wrote, 'free of every affection for earthly things' they could 'put all their thoughts on God.' They did this by keeping silence throughout the day, apart from ninety minutes' recreation; by making three hours of mental prayer each day; and by psalmody in choir, with Matins recited at midnight. St Paul of the Cross further explained that, to be able to personify Christ Crucified when they went to give missions, they remembered His Passion by living it out in a penitential lifestyle. Thus they willingly took the discipline three times a week; observed a perpetual Lenten fast, apart from Sundays and some feast days; and practised acts of mortification in the refectory, such as carrying a cross on the shoulder, wearing a crown of thorns, kissing the feet of the brethren and being walked over at the door. Their purpose was to experience not just the humiliations and indignities that Our Lord had suffered in His Passion but also His thoughts of love and mercy as He suffered. Thus the Passionists themselves became gentle, loving and compassionate men. Moved 'by such beautiful examples' they all vied with each other to grow in perfection, to humble themselves and to practise fraternal charity. By these means they 'accustomed themselves for battle'. 'This is the primary end of this growing Congregation', Paul wrote, 'to qualify oneself by prayer, penance, fasting, tears and mourning so as to help one's neighbour, to sanctify souls and to convert sinners.' Thus armed, Paul and his followers went 'into the field' in 'missions, retreats, spiritual exercises, catechetical instructions, meditations, sermons, confessions and every level of apostolic ministry for laity, ecclesiastical persons and nuns, always promoting a devotion to the most bitter Sufferings of Jesus. ...When their campaigns were finished, they withdrew into their solitary retreats to regain their energy, acquire a greater spirit and rest at the feet of Jesus Crucified.⁴

All that St Paul of the Cross wrote in this account of 1747 had a special meaning for Passionist missions in England, for when, twenty-seven years earlier, in 1720, he had made a forty days' retreat immediately after his own clothing in the Passionist habit, he had been inspired to pray very specially for the conversion of England and even to go there to die a martyr's death. As they listened in Stockport to first-hand accounts of the 1852 riots, Fathers Ignatius and Gaudentius would have realised how, even more than 130 years later, being a Catholic in England might still involve martyrdom, whilst in Ugthorpe Father Gaudentius saw how the Catholic Faith had survived in spite of persecution unto death. 'For fifty years I have never been able to pray without praying for England', St Paul of the Cross had once said. The Passionist missions in Stockport and Ugthorpe were the fruit of Paul's total oblation of his life for the conversion of England, as they were also the fulfilment of his mystical vision, shortly before he died, of his 'children in England'.

It is clear from the letters of St Paul of the Cross, preserved in the General Archives in Rome but now printed in English, that he invited the laity of all walks of life to live out the memory of the Passion, as understood in the Scriptural sense of reliving, re-experiencing, actually participating in, in one's heart, as also understood in the Scriptural sense of denoting in the depths of one's being.⁵ Hence in January 1760, after giving a mission in Tessannano and Arlena, he wrote the first of nine letters to Lucrezia Bastiani Paladini, a married lady who had been to Confession to him during the mission:

*The Passion of Jesus Christ
May the holy sufferings of Jesus be always in your heart*

I received to my edification your letter, lacking a date, and I thank God for the holy intentions that His Divine Majesty grants you. Since you are asking some spiritual direction from me so as to please God better, so I tell you to put into practice what I laid out in the mission at Tessannano and Arlena, for acting in that way you will render yourself a true servant of God.

In any case, I am not failing to recall the following points for your consolation:

- 1. With devout preparation beforehand and thanksgiving afterwards, frequent the holy Sacraments at least every week.*
 - 2. Every morning in your room make at least a half-hour of mental prayer on the Passion of Jesus Christ.*
 - 3. Every morning assist at Holy Mass with great devotion, reverence and fear.*
 - 4. Every evening, after you have taken care of your household tasks and before supper, as often as you can, make another half-hour of mental prayer.*
 - 5. Never stand idle. Above all, take care of the holy upbringing of your children and, here, put in all care, diligence and vigilance. In all that is right be very obedient to your husband, be at peace with him, always with a pleasing face and a loving manner, trying to make him the companion of your devotions.*
 - 6. Never be idle, but work according to your state of life. While working, keep your heart recollected in God and often rouse your soul with sweet affections and ejaculations of holy love for God. Build an oratory within yourself, and there have Jesus on the altar of your heart. Speak to Him often while you are doing your work. Speak to Him of His holy Love, of His holy Sufferings, of the sorrows of Mary Most Holy.*
 - 7. Often make spiritual communions, which you can make as often as you like, day and night, inviting the gentle Sacramental Jesus to come into your heart and set you on fire with holy love. Oh, what great treasures you will acquire! I am in a hurry and will say no more, except that, if you do what I have prescribed, you will be a true servant of the Most High in your state of life. ... In everything do the Holy Will of God.*
- I enclose you in the holy Side of Jesus and ask for you every fullness of blessings,*

Your unworthy servant in Christ,

Paul of the Cross.⁶

Applying this spirituality to the enormous numbers of English and Irish workers in the industrial towns of nineteenth-century England and Scotland and to the people in Ireland itself, Father Ignatius Spencer offered them a complete Christian rule of life, an ideal of Christian lay perfection. He recommended a period of daily meditation on the Passion, frequent reception of the Sacraments and the recitation of the Rosary. He wanted them to replace anger and its consequence, cursing, with a joyful Deo gratias for whatever happened. He asked them to avoid bad company and, since many of the Irish were addicted to alcohol, he asked them to abandon drunkenness by taking the 'Pledge'.⁷ I don't think anyone has counted the number of missions, retreats and little missions Father Ignatius Spencer gave as a Passionist from 1848, but there was scarcely an inch of Ireland he did not visit. He travelled the length and breadth of England; he preached across the industrial belt of Central Scotland; and he was a familiar figure in France, Belgium and Rome. Always he had the same double theme: the Passion of Our Lord and the Conversion of England. Like Blessed Dominic Barberi, he finally paid the price, dying, on 1 October 1864, of a massive heart attack as he was travelling from a mission in Coatbridge, near Glasgow, to another in Leith, near Edinburgh.

And so we end where we started, viz. in the Archives of the Province of St Joseph at Minsteracres, where the precious and vast amount of material on the missionary activities of Father Ignatius Spencer is preserved. Perhaps it is not inappropriate to conclude with his constant prayer: 'O God, have mercy on England. Turn, O Jesus, Thy Meek eyes upon that people. Let pity drop from Thy Glorious Wounds and mercy from Thy Heart. In what she is blind, in what she sins, forgive her, for she knows not what she does. Have mercy on England.'
