Father Stewart Foster kindly asked me to write an article for Catholic Archives about the Association of English-Speaking Archivists (A.E.S.A.) in Rome, and I am very happy to tell you about the group. A few years ago we prepared an information sheet for the members of the International Union of Superiors General (I.U.S.G.) and the Union of Superiors General (U.S.G.), and perhaps that brief outline will help by way of an introduction. Then I shall present the story of how we got started in 1987-1988 using the Minutes of that first meeting. One of the founding members is still part of the group. A little overview of the organization as such and of who the members are with reference to job descriptions may also be of interest.

The Association's fifteen years in existence speaks for itself. What was recognised in the beginning holds good for today: archivists of their General Archives in Rome need help and support in various ways. Certain topics have been repeated, for example: archival policy in the light of new experiences; or the care and classification of photographs. Certain archives have been revisited because members change. It was also important to see those archives where modifications have been introduced. You will recognise that our topics and activities are similar to those of the Catholic Archives Society. The difference, perhaps, is that our archivists are working at the generalate level for their congregations and in Rome.

The Association has taken advantage of archives and personnel in Rome. Our Minutes have been kept since the beginning and they represent not only the good deal of dedicated work involved in keeping our little group going, but also a sense of expansion and enthusiasm. I hope you will find those elements in this account!

An Information Sheet prepared for the International Union of Superiors General (I.U.S.G.) and the Union of Superiors General (U.S.G), Concerning the Association of English-speaking Archivists.

The Association of English-speaking Archivists (A.E.S.A.) is a small independent group which began in 1988 for the purpose of helping one another and furthering our personal formation as archivists while in Rome.

- The group meets 5 or 6 times between October and May, usually the first Tuesday of the month from 15.00-17.00.*
- A core group helps plan the meetings although all are invited to participate in the responsibility of organising events.*
- The meetings are informal and held in different houses.*

At the end-of-year meeting in May the group puts forth suggestions for the next term, aware of changes that may take place, members leaving and the arrival of new members.

Of special interest to A.E.S. A. are:

- guest speakers invited as resource people;*
- a visit to another archive or centre of historic importance;*
- a presentation by a member on a topic of particular interest;*
- a sharing on a specific concern or topic.*

What characterized the intent of the Association of English-speaking Archivists was the need to provide a forum for support and learning. Most archivists appointed by their congregation hold other responsibilities upon their arrival in Rome. Most have little or no training in archival science and besides their archive work they have many things to learn. Usually they are functioning with several languages within their generalates, and in their archives the documents are in more than one language. The English-speaking archivists belong to international congregations, several of which are missionary institutes. There is both a richness and an asceticism in their ministry. Some have been asked to work on the history of their congregation or to translate. They have realized that it is next to impossible to give adequate time to their archives and to do personal research and writing.

Over the 15 years of the existence of A.E.S.A., its initial thrust has held firm: to provide a 'kind of on-going formation for archivists.' Many, because of time constraints and inability to handle the Italian language, are not able to follow the Vatican course for archivists nor to go abroad for a few weeks for special sessions. The first three members had taken the archives course at the Vatican and recognized this need. At first the members were women religious but now men and women religious and lay archivists responsible for a religious congregation's general archives are members.

The first Minutes mention interest in the storing and classifying of photographs, the use of film-strips and a visit to the archives of the Discalced Carmelites. The introduction of the computer was also discussed and it was observed that no ready-made programme seemed to satisfy archival needs. Soon some were preparing their own data base. Various programmes have been subsequently discussed. And many are finding their own way for their own archives or adapting an earlier programme through the use of Access and Excel. There is something unique in the way that each congregation has organized its archives over the years, which has become a source of learning for all, and especially for smaller groups getting started.

Finding materials in Rome has been another preoccupation. Many continue to get acid-free paper from abroad, for example. Even boxes for storage is an oft-repeated question. The most difficult concern in Rome is the climatization of archives because of the humidity: most archives because of size and weight are in the basement and even the most up-to-date dehumidifying system has its limitations. Michaelangelo seems to have been the only one who knew how to solve this problem. When we had the good fortune to visit the archives of the Basilica of St. Peter we discovered that St. Peter's had two domes, a smaller one inside the large one seen from outside. The archives are housed in the circular space in between which is quite extensive, but has always the same temperature of about 20° C and a humidity index of 55. Nothing is needed to regulate these temperatures. (There is, however, some modern sophisticated machinery for controlling the insects in books.) Worth a visit, the next time you go to Rome!

From this little aside, it is clear that the Association has informative meetings and also arranges visits to archives in Rome. Since the group meets in various houses of the members, there is an occasion to visit one another's archives, learn something of their history, and of the congregation. Such occasions strengthen bonds and historical connections are often discovered among the various congregations. From time to time a speaker is invited. Shortly after Cardinal Marchisano had published the Circular Letter The Pastoral Function of Church Archives, we invited him to come to speak to a joint meeting of the French-speaking and English-speaking archive groups in Rome. He seemed duly impressed by our numbers and our commitment. It was through him that we were able to visit the archives of the Basilica of St. Peter, and learned as well the importance of having small museums as part of our archives. Memorabilia, paintings, furniture, are part of the congregations' heritage and need to be cared for and displayed attractively. In Rome we take advantage of visiting exhibitions when some congregation has had a member beatified, canonized or is celebrating an anniversary.

A session at the Jesuit Curia with Father Thomas McCoog S.J. in 2002 was both timely and stimulating. He reported on a meeting in Rome organized for all archivists of the Society of Jesus, a first such assembly. The A.E.S.A. followed up this talk with a discussion concerning the General Archivist and relations with their provincial archivists and other archivists in their congregation. Father Rolando Delagoza C.M. prepared some questions for our consideration and shared some of the ways he remains connected with his provincial archivists by e-mail. Another topic of interest that has developed is what to do with archives of houses being closed, provinces merging or a province closing. These are real situations for our congregations even now and it seems incumbent on the General Archivist to be alert to the future of local and provincial archives, and to be included in the discussions.

On the practical level many aspects of being archivists in Rome working at the general level are similar whether you are the archivist for a province, an academic institute or large house. However, the scope and responsibility are different. Some archivists in Rome, for example, have the dual concern: the archives of the generalate and the archives of their motherhouse - the latter being in another country. Their work for the generalate focuses primarily on the storing, classifying and making an inventory of what is transferred from the General Council through the General Secretary and Treasurer. While this transfer has its regular time schedule throughout the year, the bulk of the central administration's material comes at the end of General Council's term of office, a formidable moment for the archivist!

Many archives have considerable historical material, and there are requests from their own members and others to come to do some specialized research. Research has thus become a topic that the members often share, because it includes the valid concern of the use of private archives, confidentiality, and discretion. Examples are always helpful, and among ourselves we respect this confidentiality whenever stories/situations are given by a member. It was, in fact, from concrete situations and discussions that we began working on a Policy Manual that could then be adapted by a specific congregation. Other areas of concern for us at the general level are relations with the General Council and the General Secretary. All recognize the importance of maintaining open relationships, even to the point of assisting those in the generalates with sorting and transferring their papers to the archives. It is recommended that a yearly evaluation be done for the General Council and a meeting be arranged with them. Most general archives are in the same building as the generalate; and all maintain a necessary interconnection with the General Secretary. Sometimes in Rome there are sessions beneficial for both the General Secretaries and the Archivists.

The drawing up of a job description for the General Archivist was something that some of us found helpful. Very few had anything in their constitutions about the responsibility of the archives or archivist. One member noted that their first constitutions (early nineteenth-century) had a section which called for a 'Sub-Secretary for the Archives': a person of intelligence, activity and discretion. Perhaps that description still holds good for today!

For contacts in Rome, I would suggest the following:

THE DAUGHTERS OF CHARITY AND CHILDREN'S RECORDS

Sister Judith Greville D.C.

In Catholic Archives 15 (1995) I provided a list of Children's Homes and Orphanages conducted by the Daughters of Charity of St Vincent de Paul. Prior to my retirement as Archivist in September 2004 I did a little tidying up, and thought that a revision of the earlier list would be useful.

VISIT TO THE ARCHIVES OF THE ARCHDIOCESE OF MANILA

Sister Mary Campion McCarren F.C.J

I visited the Archives of the Archdiocese of Manila at 121 Arzobispo Street, Intramuros, Manila, on Monday 29 March 2004. The present Director, Father Gabriel Casal, was formerly Director of the National Museum of the Philippines. The Assistant Director is Ms Maita Maronilla-Reyes, a chemist-conservationist, who studied in Italy, Spain, Germany and Austria. She is the founding President of the Philippine Association for Scientific Conservation Inc.

Brief History

1521 - Magellan, having well-nigh circumnavigated the globe, arrived at Cebu, on the eve of Quadragesima Sunday; on Easter Sunday the first Mass was celebrated by his chaplain in Butuan; on 27 April 1521 Magellan was murdered. His (anonymous) chaplain is the First Apostle of the Philippines.

1571 - founding of Manila, by Legaspi and his navigator, the Augustinian friar Andres de Urdaneta.

1574 - conscientious record-keeping started with the Anales Eclesiasticos de Philipinas. The volume covers 1574 - 1682. An illustrated two-volume translation is available in English.

1579 - Manila established as a Suffragan Diocese of Mexico.

1595 - Pope Clement VIII, at the request of Philip II of Spain, issued a Papal Bull raising Manila to a Metropolitan See with three suffragan Sees.

1995 - Pope John Paul II came to Manila for the fourth centenary.

Location

The Archdiocesan Chancery, which is situated in Intramuros, the old walled section of Manila, was bombed in World War II. Fortunately, the archives had been stored in the University of Santo Tomas and at the Archiepiscopal Villa, St Miguel, and were therefore preserved intact. The Archdiocesan Archive is now located at the address given at the beginning of this report.

Cataloguing

It would seem that the main work of preserving and classifying the holdings was begun in earnest in the mid-1970s. A thorough analysis was made and an arrangement undertaken based on the new inventory with reference to provenance and the functions of the Archdiocesan Office. There are four main record groups:

- General Administration
- Sacraments
- Personnel
- Asuntos Generales (Various Topics)

To each Group is then attached series, sub-series, folder, file units and documents. All are placed in archival boxes. At the present time there are 626 boxes each with 22 folders. The boxes are housed on 48 sections of metal shelving, each section with 5 rows, each row with 3 bins or boxes.

Records of demographical value were microfilmed through the auspices of the Mormons. There is available a very fine catalogue, informative and comprehensive, drawn up by Father Ruperto Santos, a previous Director. According to the official catalogue 'there are approximately 3 million church records to conserve... (including) cedularios, synodal constitutions, royal decrees, works on superstitions, restrictions on baptisms etc.'

At the present time there are five staff helped by an army of volunteers - intelligent, retired people who are happy to serve the Church in this way. To date, thanks to them, a quarter of the folders have a contents summary. The programme used for cataloguing the material is FILEMAKER. In this way the Archdiocesan Archives are harmonized with both the Spanish and Filipino National Archives.

On line at www.aam-rcam.org/archives.htm the following items are to be found:

- Details of the Collection
- A Guide for Researchers
- Finding Aids
- A Code of Ethics for Archivists

Results of neglect

Despite the meticulous record-keeping which the Spanish started, there are gaps in the existing ecclesiastical politico-historical documents. Some of these have been caused by losses in the last century when for various reasons the archives were moved from place to place several times. Other losses are due to the destruction of documents resulting from poor storage conditions. The chemical-conservator has arranged a very telling exhibition of causes of deterioration: iron gall, termites, cockroaches, beetles, micro-organisms, humidity, paper acidity, acidic adhesive tape and floods.

The emphasis of the Conservation Department is two fold: preventative, to arrest or slow down deterioration; and curative, or full conservation, which tries to bring back deteriorated paper to its original form, durability and chemically stable condition. Among their equipment one finds an oven, a stereozoom microscope with radial arm, a tacking iron, a fumigation cupboard, a laminating machine, refrigerator, darkroom area and facilities for leaf casting and lining. (The leaf casting machine comes from Britain but the lining paper comes from Japan). On the website are Rules for Paper Conservation.

Outreach

In addition to the work in the Archdiocesan Archives, the staff organize training days and seminars. Some of these are specifically for parishes on topics such as preserving parish history. Others of a more technical nature are appreciated by professional archivists seeking in-service training. These treat of paper conservation, for example, and book binding.

Envoi

Each time Cardinal Francesco Marchisano, now President of the Catholic Archives Society, meets with members of the Society, the conversation inevitably turns, sooner or later, to the Archives of the Archdiocese of Manila. Having seen them for myself, and having gained some insight into the difficulties faced and the energy, enthusiasm, dedication and perseverance with which the staff and helpers go about their business, I can understand the Cardinal's admiration and appreciation. My hope would be that links between the two groups of church archivists would prosper.

BOOK REVIEWS

D.Price & C.C.Ryrie, Let It Go Among Our People: An Illustrated History of the English Bible from John Wyclif to the King James Version (Lutterworth Press, Cambridge, 2004, pp.160) is a scholarly yet readable account of the translation into English of Sacred Scripture up until and including the publication of the Authorised Version in 1611. The political and ecclesiastical circumstances surrounding the vernacular editions are conveyed with clarity, and although the focus of the book veers towards the King James Bible, there is a balanced account of the work of Gregory Martin and other Catholic exiles on the Continent which led to the appearance of the Douay-Rheims version of the New Testament in 1582 (the Old Testament was published in 1609-10). Two appendices give a useful summary of the revision of the King James Bible and a chronology of subsequent versions in English. Although perhaps not directly relevant to the immediate task of the archivist, this book offers a concise introduction to the earlier history of versions of Scripture in English, and in this sense will prove a particularly useful tool in the reference collections indispensable to Catholic (and indeed all Christian) repositories.

Dom Anselm Cramer OSB, Archivist of Ampleforth Abbey, is responsible for editing Lamspringe: An English Abbey in Germany, 1643-1803 (Ampleforth Abbey, St Laurence Papers VII, 2004, pp.xxiv + 258), being papers delivered at the twenty-ninth annual symposium of the Historical Commission of the English Benedictine Congregation held at Ampleforth in April 2003. Chapters 5 (by CAS President Abbot Geoffrey Scott) and 6 (by the Editor of the volume) on the library, publications and manuscripts of Lamspringe, the English Benedictine monastery in Saxony (which underwent an attempted re-foundation in Worcestershire in the early nineteenth century) probably hold the most interest from an archival point of view. Archival source material pertaining to Lamspringe may now be found at Ampleforth, Colwich Abbey, Downside (the Birt Collection), Douai Abbey, Clifton Diocesan Archives, the Jesuit Provincial Archives at Farm Street, and at Stanbrook Abbey, as well as in repositories in Hildesheim, Hannover, Wolfenbüttel, Nancy, Paris, Douai and Lille. The book contains a number of very useful appendices as well as high-quality illustrations.

A former Archivist of Ampleforth, Dom Placid Spearritt, is now Abbot of a more recent Benedictine foundation at New Norcia in Western Australia. Among the many articles of archival interest in New Norcia Studies (No.12, September 2004), produced by the community's Archives, Research and Publications Committee chaired by Abbot Spearritt, two in particular may be mentioned: Perrie Gordon's account of the New Norcia museum, especially as regards the care and conservation of artefacts; and Teresa de Castro's analysis of the 1,114 items of correspondence in the Abbey Archives between the years 1880 and 1883, including a very useful tabular synopsis of writers and recipients. Both contributions, and indeed each of the seventeen or so articles in this edition of the journal, continue to testify to the vitality of the cultural and intellectual life of this monastic community.

Father Peter Phillips, recently appointed Archivist of the Diocese of Shrewsbury and a specialist in the life and work of the celebrated priest-historian, has edited Lingard Remembered: Essays to mark the Sesquicentenary of John Lingard's Death (Monograph 6, Catholic Record Society, London, 2004, pp.xii + 224). Of the ten articles in this volume, one in particular, that by another distinguished Lingard scholar, Edwin Jones, focuses on the use made by the historian (via contacts at the English College, Valladolid) of the Spanish State Archives at Simancas. Moreover, Appendix 2 gives a very useful summary of the condition and location of Lingard's papers. In Britain there are no less than twenty-six separate repositories holding Lingard material. Of the specifically Catholic ones, in addition to Ushaw College, they comprise: Shrewsbury Diocesan Archives; Birmingham Archdiocesan Archives; Downside Abbey; Scottish Catholic Archives; Leeds Diocesan Archives; Liverpool Diocesan Archives; Jesuit Provincial Archives; Southwark Diocesan Archives; Westminster Diocesan Archives; Northampton Diocesan Archives; and Stonyhurst College. Further papers are also to be found in the Lisbon College Archives (now at Ushaw), the Archives of the English College, Valladolid, and in Rome at Propaganda Fide and the Archives of the Venerable English College and the Scots College.

Saho Matsumoto-Best, Britain and the Papacy in the Age of Revolution, 1846-1851 (The Royal Historical Society/Boydell Press, Woodbridge, 2003, pp.xi + 196) takes a fresh look at the near-rapprochement between Britain and the Vatican at the time of the mid-nineteenth-century revolutionary period. As would be expected of such a scholarly publication based upon the author's PhD research, extensive use has been made of unpublished primary sources in Britain, Ireland and Italy. To select a few, one may mention the following: Ushaw College Archives (Wiseman papers); National Archives, Kew (papers of the departments of state, especially the Foreign Office); Westminster Diocesan Archives (Wiseman papers); Royal Archive, Windsor (Queen Victoria papers); Dublin Diocesan Archives (Cullen, Hamilton, Murray & Nicholson papers); Venerable English College, Rome (Wiseman papers); Propaganda Fide Archives; Vatican Secret Archives (Secretariat of State, Nunciatures in Paris & Vienna, archives of Pius IX). The Irish question is dealt with particularly well, and likewise the Restoration of the Hierarchy in 1850.

Brian Doolan, as Dean of St Chad's Cathedral, Birmingham, is particularly well placed to have written Pugin and the Hardmans (Publication 18, Archdiocese of Birmingham Historical Commission, 2004, pp.34). He has made use of four archival collections in particular: Birmingham Archdiocesan Archives; the Archives of St Mary's Convent of Mercy, Handsworth; Birmingham City Archives (Hardman Collection); and the Archives of the John Hardman Studios. Well illustrated and combining family and biographical information, it offers a very readable account of the various aspects of the Hardman family's business: stained glass, memorial brasses, metalwork, vestments... The Hardmans, chiefly on account of their association with Pugin, made a very important contribution to the life of the Catholic Church in Victorian England, and especially in Birmingham and the Midlands. However, as the author points out, examples of the Hardmans' work may be found in many parts of Britain and Ireland, and even as far afield as Australia, New Zealand and the West Indies.

Robert Finnigan of the Leeds Diocesan Archives has already written a history of the mother church of that diocese. His latest publication is St Anne's Centenary: Leeds Cathedral, 1904-2004 (pp.48), produced for a specific celebration and incorporating some fine illustrations, including a number of reproductions of prints from the Leeds Diocesan Archives. The cathedral was designed by John Henry Eastwood and the Diocesan Archives hold more than six hundred original plans and drawings made by the architect and his assistant, S.K.Greenslade. Indeed the high quality of the illustrations in this booklet, which was produced with assistance from a leading bank, together with an informative but succinct text, complement the author's earlier work published in 1988

An example of a good parish history is to be found in Margaret Martin, The Church of the Sacred Heart, Hove (2002, pp.136, £9.99, available from the author at: 6 Stanley Avenue South, Portslade, East Sussex BN41 2WG), together with her accompanying booklet The Tour of the Sacred Heart Church (pp.20, £1). The story of the Sacred Heart Church is prefaced by a brief account of post-Reformation Catholicism in Sussex and in Brighton and Hove in particular, and the appendices include a list, arranged chronologically, of Catholic church buildings in the county. The Hove church was opened in 1881 and built to the designs of John Crawley and J.S.Hansom. No aspect of the history of the church and parish is left untouched. The guide to the church is also most informative. The main book is well illustrated and has made profitable use of local archival material. It is to be recommended as an example for others to follow in the important field of parish (and indeed school) histories.

The School by the Lane: A Social History of St Winefride's Catholic Primary School, Manor Park, London E12 by Steven Hariis (Lewarne Publishing, London, 2004, pp.72, £7.99 incl. p&p, available from the school at: Church Road, London E12 6HB) is a well-researched and illustrated account of the foundation in 1909 and subsequent development of a school established by the famous Canon Palmer of Ilford. One of Palmer's parishioners, a certain John Carmel Heenan, was later (1937-47) parish priest of Manor Park and Manager of the school. The future cardinal thus features prominently in the story. The author, who is a teacher at St Winefride's, has made good use of the National Archives, Newham Borough Archives, Brentwood Diocesan Archives, the school's own records, and especially the memories of past pupils. This book is an example of the pastoral function of archives at their best.

J.Robbins, John Priestly Warmoll: Apostle of Bedford. His Life, Times and Family (2004, pp.238, available from the author at: 21 Ryston End, Downham Market, Norfolk PE38 9AX) is a work of painstaking research and great devotion to the priest who re-established Catholicism in Bedford, a town known for its association with Bunyan and the Puritan tradition. Born in 1830, the son of an East Anglian clergyman, an assistant master at Hurstpierpoint under Nathaniel Woodard, and educated at Lincoln College, Oxford, for the Anglican ministry, Warmoll was baptised as a Catholic by the future Cardinal Manning in 1859 and ordained to the priesthood in 1863. On Christmas Eve of that year he arrived in Bedford and laboured there until his death in 1885. This study has made good use of both primary and secondary sources. Among the former are: the National Archives; West Yorkshire Archives; Norfolk Record Office; Suffolk Record Office; Hurspierpoint and Lancing College Archives; Archives of the Parish of the Holy Child & St Joseph, Bedford; and Northampton Diocesan Archives. In the absence of any family papers, the author has searched for every available clue from a wide variety of sources.

We come virtually to the present day with Jean Rockett's A Gentle Jesuit: Philip Caraman, SJ (Gracewing, Leominster, 2004, pp.xii + 356, £20). A disciple of Father Martin D'Arcy, the much admired historian made his name as Editor of The Month, the now defunct Jesuit review. His editions of the journals of two Elizabethan Jesuits (John Gerard and William Weston) and his biography of Henry Morse, 'the priest of the plague', published between 1951 and 1957, established Caraman as a scholar of recusancy. His subsequent literary career spanned not only further publications on the history of English Catholicism but also on that of Jesuit missions and foundations throughout the world. Father Caraman was also appointed Vice-Postulator of the Cause of the English Martyrs in 1960. The book chronicles its subject's association with many of the leading literary figures of the post-war era, as well as the internal politics of the Society of Jesus. The principal archival source used by the author consisted of Father Caraman's own deposit of papers in the John J. Burns Library at Boston College, together with the Archives of the British Province of the Society of Jesus at Farm Street. However, extensive use has also been made of letters and other material in the possession of private individuals. There is one hair-raising episode (from an archivist's point of view) recounted (p.225): while researching his book on the Jesuit Reductions in Paraguay, Father Caraman visited an eighteenth-century church built by an Austrian Jesuit in the heart of the Chiquitos jungle in Bolivia. On entering the choir loft of the church a box near the organ revealed manuscripts of music copied out by the indios in the eighteenth century. Unfortunately, a religious sister accompanying the Jesuit historian to the choir loft 'grabbed a bunch of scores roughly in her hand, and [Father Caraman] screamed – the paper was near perishing. What might be there God knows!' Father Carman was offered the box of manuscripts but declined owing to the danger of losing it in the jungle.

Father Caraman is, as one might expect, one of the authors cited in his bibliography by Michael Yellowlees, author of 'So strange a monster as a Jesuite': The Society of Jesus in Sixteenth-Century Scotland (House of Lochar, Colonsay, 2003, pp.xi + 228, £18.99). The Jesuits' first mission to Ireland and Scotland took place in 1541, forty years before Campion and Persons reached England. The Society played an important part in preserving the Catholic Faith in parts of Scotland between 1541 and 1603, although the first formal mission to Scotland was only launched in the 1580s. This book examines the recruitment, training and apostolate of the Scottish Jesuits in the sixteenth-century. In addition to a wide range of printed sources, primary and secondary, manuscript material from five archival repositories is cited in the bibliography: the British Museum; the Archives of the British Province of the Society of Jesus; the Jesuit Archives in Rome; the National Library of Scotland; and the Scottish Record Office.

EDITORIAL NOTES

For the Catholic Archives Society 2005, in addition to the momentous events of the death of Pope John Paul II and the election of his successor, Pope Benedict XVI, will be remembered as the year in which it lost Robin Gard, a key figure in its foundation in 1979 and the first Editor of Catholic Archives (1981-1995). His death, although it saddened us deeply, has brought forth many recollections of Robin's life and work, and his legacy is marked in this edition of the journal by a number of tributes to a great and a good man. Catholic Archives 26 is dedicated to Robin. Requiescat in Pace.

Father Frank Morrissey and Monsignor Gordon Read have provided material on matters archival from a canonical perspective, and we are grateful to them for sharing their expertise. There are still many issues that require careful consideration, especially on the questions of access, confidentiality and rules of closure.

There is a Welsh flavour to the journal this year, and happily so. Dan Chidgey and Katherine Byrne, on the Archives of the Archdiocese of Cardiff and the Diocese of Wrexham respectively, offer a much needed picture of the current situation in (two-thirds of) the Principality. In the North East of England, David Smallwood has provided a timely description of the Middlesborough Diocesan Archives and his admirably professional approach to his task.

One of Robin Gard's priorities as Editor of Catholic Archives was to forge links with archivists working beyond Britain and Ireland. This concern is continued in the form of a most interesting article by Maria Mazzenga on the activities of the Religious Archives Institute at the Catholic University of America. Finally, Sister Dominic Savio Hamer's account of her adventures in Spain is a lesson in archival perseverance and determination.

To all those who have contributed to Catholic Archives 2006 both the Editor and the Society are deeply grateful. It only remains for me to encourage those archivists – diocesan, religious or lay – who have not yet provided a description of their work and collections to take heart from the efforts of this year's contributors and to begin writing!

Father Stewart Foster

TRIBUTES TO ROBIN GARD

1. Robin Gard and the Catholic Archives Society

Robin was a founder member of the Catholic Archives Society. The first meeting of Catholic archivists in England took place at Spode House in July 1978, as a result of a plea to Father Conrad Pepler O.P., Warden of Spode House, Staffordshire, for help for religious sisters who had been given charge of their congregations' archives but who had received no formal training. The meeting which Father Conrad organised attracted a wide response. Several professional archivists (including Robin, who was then the County Archivist of Northumberland), who attended in the hope of learning more about Catholic archives, as little information was generally available at that time, found themselves pressed into the role of teachers, explaining everything from the integrity of the archive group to the value of the brass paperclip, but at the same time discovering the wealth of archive material held in religious houses, diocesan archives and other institutions. The need to preserve this material and to make it available, and to support the people who were given charge of it, was clear and urgent and in the following March the Catholic Archives Society was established.

Robin was involved from the very beginning of the society and took on the role of Editor of the journal, Catholic Archives, which first appeared in 1981. He edited the first fifteen volumes of the journal, which included articles on all aspects of Catholic archives, not only in the British Isles but also in all parts of the world. In 1995 he handed the editorship to Father Stewart Foster and then took on the role of Chairman of the Society for three years, during which time he continued to promote its aims at every opportunity. He was active himself not only as Archivist for the Diocese of Hexham and Newcastle but also in searching out, listing and finding safe homes for any threatened archives, especially those of lay Catholic societies, in which he had a particular interest. He was also the Society's first representative at meetings of the Religious Archives Group, a special interest group of the Society of Archivists. His great contribution to work in the field of Catholic archives was recognised in 1997 when he was appointed a Consultor to the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church.

He was always keen to promote contacts with archives in other countries. It was during his period as Chairman that the CAS began its series of overseas visits with a trip to Rome. While there the welcome contact with the Pontifical Commission began when members met Archbishop, later Cardinal, Marchisano, now one of the Society's patrons. Robin presented him with the complete series of Catholic Archives in a box he himself had made and spoke lucidly of the work of the Society. With one exception, Robin took part in all the later overseas visits and frequently reminded the council of the importance of such links.

When he completed his three-year term as Chairman, Robin continued to serve as a member of the Society's council and to produce publications, notably Archive Advice Leaflets which provide advice and information in a clear and simple format. He contributed articles about his work with the archives of lay societies to Catholic Archives and also edited Reflections on Catholic Archives, a collection of essays by archivists, historians and users of archives, which was published in 2002. He always stressed the need for the Society to maintain an active publishing programme and rightly pointed out that publications are the only means of reaching the 75% or so of the membership that do not attend the annual conference.

He was the longest serving member of the CAS council, having been a member continuously from its formation until his death, and he retained an active interest during the last few months when he could no longer attend meetings.

2. Sermon by Father J. Travers at the Requiem Mass of Robin Martin Gard, Sacred Heart Church, North Gosforth, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, 9 May 2005.

Last night when Robin was taken to church Bishop Kevin came because he wanted to show his appreciation of Robin and of all the work he had done over the years for the Church. Today we have our retired bishop, Bishop Ambrose, and seven priests concelebrating Robin's Requiem Mass.

If it were left to Robin to decide, none of you would be here; there would be just me. I'm sure that must sound very arrogant. But I'm speaking of Robin, not me. It could have been Father John, or Father Tom, or any other priest who happened to be at Sacred Heart at the time of Robin's death. If Robin could speak from the coffin, he would ask: 'What are you all doing here? What's all the fuss about?' Robin, although he was a very intelligent man, was also very simple in his approach to life, and he hated a lot of fuss.

To speak to Robin you would know that he was not a native of these parts. In fact, he was born near Dundee in Scotland, in 1926. Although he was born in Scotland, Robin never considered himself Scottish. All his folk came from Cornwall, and Robin was proud of his Cornish roots. His dad was in the Royal Air Force, and so the family moved around a lot. That is how Robin came to be born in Scotland. He was the youngest of a family of four boys. His brother Peter was also a pilot in the RAF, and was killed in action. Robin is survived by two of his brothers, one of whom lives in Canada and the other in Tasmania. By the end of the War, Robin was eighteen, and he did his National Service, mainly at sea.

After that, he went to university, where he studied history. After graduation, he had a job in Leicester as an archivist. While at university he met Inez, who was to become his wife and mother to their two children, Martin and Debbie. Inez never enjoyed good health. She suffered from severe arthritis, and Robin looked after her with great love until her death in 1979.

It was in 1965 that Robin came to work for Northumberland County Council as County Archivist, and he retired in 1987. His moving to Newcastle brought him into contact with many people through his work, and through his hobby of bookbinding, at which he was very good. And to know Robin was to love him. I have never heard Robin say an unkind word about anyone. He had the lovely gift of putting you on the right track when you were wrong. But he did it without making you feel stupid or a fool. He always put other people before himself; and he respected everybody. That is why he himself was so loved and respected. His gentleness and kindness were remarkable.

He also had a lovely sense of humour. He would be pulling your leg and you wouldn't know it until you looked at his eyes. The smile was in his eyes.

The other really outstanding characteristic of Robin was his Faith. His love of the Eucharist was very evident. He remembered the words of Jesus, 'As I, who am sent by the living Father, myself draw life from the Father, so whoever eats me will draw life from me' (John 6,57). Robin attended Mass every day and drew his strength from the Eucharist. He accepted his illness with dignity and serenity, for he was aware that we have here no lasting city.

We think of those long walks Robin made and how, on them, he felt very much in touch with creation - and very much in touch with the Creator.

Saint Paul wrote to the Romans: 'The life and death of each of us has its influence on others' (14,7). Robin in his journey through life influenced very many people, probably without ever knowing it.

We thank you, Robin, for your contribution to humanity, to the Church, and to our world. We thank God for giving us Robin, and for allowing us to share in his life. And we recall the words from our First Reading (Apoc. 14,13): 'Happy are those who die in the Lord! ..now they can rest for ever after their work, since their good deeds go with them.' And Robin has gone to the Lord with a whole armful of good deeds.

3. Quiet, Courteous Robin, Custodian of Memories

The 'Custodian of our Memories' in the Diocese of Hexham & Newcastle, Robin Gard died on 1 May after a long illness. He was 79.

Robin offered his services to Bishop Lindsay when he was due to retire from his career as Archivist to Northumberland County Council in 1985. He wrote: 'I would be available for voluntary work, where I could be useful with the diocesan and parish records.' And, said Bishop Kevin Dunn, who received Robin's body into Sacred Heart Church, North Gosforth, the night before his funeral on 9 May, 'he was useful!'

The bishop explained: 'As a diocese we owe him a great debt of gratitude for his work as Diocesan Archivist. Indeed, we thank God for his skills and his example of remembering the stories of our past, which enables us to live in the present and look to the future with hope. He was the Custodian of our Memories.'

Robin's Requiem Mass was concelebrated by Bishop Ambrose Griffiths, Parish Priest Father Joe Travers, Father David Milburn of the Northern Catholic History Society, Father Richard Harriott, Chaplain to the Catholic Writers' Guild, Father Peter Stott, Canon Chris Smith from Plymouth, and Canon Anthony Dolan from Nottingham, both of the Catholic Archives Society. Father Tom Cass, former Parish Priest of Sacred Heart, was in the congregation. Father Travers said that Robin was a very humble man, and would have wondered why so many clergy and people were at his funeral.

Born near Dundee, where his father was serving in the Royal Air Force, Robin was of Cornish stock. He was the youngest of four boys, one of whom, Peter, was killed in action during the Second World War. His other brothers live in Canada and Tasmania. Robin studied history at university, where he met his future wife Inez and became Archivist to Leicester City Council. Sadly Inez never enjoyed good health and died in 1979, after many years of being cared for lovingly by Robin. The couple had two children, Martin and Debbie, and three grandchildren, Christian, Pippa and Henry, all of whom took an active part in readings at the Requiem Mass.

'To know Robin was to love him,' said Father Travers. 'He never said an unkind word about anyone, and was respected and loved by all. He was a man of very great faith. When he got news of his illness, he accepted it with dignity and serenity, although he must have had dark moments. He loved the Eucharist and was at Mass almost daily.'

Bishop Ambrose said he always enjoyed having Robin working in Bishop's House. He was courteous and helpful, and very efficient at his tasks. Father Milburn paid tribute to Robin as an historian. He told how he had spent the last few weeks of his illness preparing the forthcoming issue of Northern Catholic History and had the joy of seeing it at the proof stage. Canon Smith often entertained Robin on his visits to Cornwall and he praised his skills as a bookbinder, recalling how he had restored several old books for him: 'He had such knowledge and expertise, always used quietly and privately.'

Robin helped to found the Catholic Archives Society, was a member of the Catholic Writers' Guild, enjoyed walking in France and Spain, disliked injustice and cared for others through the St Vincent de Paul Society. During the reception in the church hall, friends and colleagues shared memories of this remarkable man, writing messages on cards, and his grandchildren Pippa (12) and Henry (6) drew pictures and wrote about their beloved 'Grampy.' May he rest in peace.

EDITORIAL POSTSCRIPT

I am indebted to the authors of the above tributes for their permission to reproduce them here. In addition to his pivotal role in the establishment of both the Catholic Archives Society and the North East Catholic History Society, and indeed as founding Editor of their respective journals, Robin was an active member of the Catholic Record Society. A fitting reminder of the latter is the posthumous publication of a chapter in Victorian Churches and Churchmen, itself a festschrift for his friend Professor Alan McClelland, Chairman of the CRS and Editor of Recusant History. Robin's contribution is entitled 'The Cardinal and the Penitent' and is cited in the Book Reviews section below. In addition to his devotion to the Compostela Way in Northern Spain, for twenty-three years Robin was one of the Walsingham Walkers of the Guild of Our Lady of Ransom. Monsignor Stark, the Master of the Guild, in The Ransomer (New Year 2006) describes him as a devoted and 'true gentlemanly walker', 'a man of high intelligence, a great raconteur and always delightful company.' On a personal note I can testify to Robin's unfailing support and wise counsel as I succeeded him as Editor of Catholic Archives, a task in which I 'shadowed' him for one year. As those who knew Robin will appreciate, this was not always an easy task in that one was ever conscious of following in the footsteps of such an exacting scholar. I treasure the many, and they are many, letters, written in his distinctive and somewhat miniscule hand, and (in true Victorian fashion) wasting not a scrap of the notepaper, in which Robin offered encouragement, and occasionally criticism, in the editorial task. It was invariably by letter that we communicated – I don't think we telephoned one another more than half-a-dozen times in as many years. I was very fortunate indeed to be able to rely on his knowledge and expertise, and likewise to draw upon his excellent and close relationship with the journal's then printers, the Carmelite Nuns of Darlington. When I assumed editorial responsibility Robin deposited with me a box file of 'notes', chiefly correspondence and contacts from the first fifteen years of Catholic Archives. He told me he was lending them to me! I am still looking after them for him. In his first Editorial (Catholic Archives 1, 1981, p.5) Robin wrote: 'The [Catholic Archives] Society hopes that Catholic Archives will commend itself to archivists, record repositories, libraries and institutions, and to all who are concerned for the care and use of the archives of the Catholic Church.' If the journal has in some way succeeded in this task, it is because of Robin Gard's vision, diligence and good humour. Lastly, and on a more personal note, I had the privilege of instructing Robin's son, Martin, and his daughter-in-law, Jenny, for marriage, and in due course of baptising Robin's grandson, Henry. To see Robin as the proud father and grandfather was yet another, and most heartening, aspect of this remarkable man. S.F.

CONFIDENTIALITY, ARCHIVES AND RECORDS MANAGEMENT

Rev. Francis G. Morrissey O.M.I.

INTRODUCTION

The topic of 'archives' has taken on new significance lately, particularly in view of the various court cases arising here and there. I will try to look at the legislation concerning archives, placing it within the context of privacy and confidentiality, which is of such significance today. However, I am not a civil lawyer and therefore I make no pretence of knowing what the applicable civil law is in a given territory, particularly in regard to access to information. Therefore, if delicate situations arise, it will be important to consult the legal advisers of the institute or diocese.

I: SECRECY AND CONFIDENTIALITY IN CANONICAL LEGISLATION

There are many canons in the Code which speak of secrecy, confidentiality, and related issues. While it would be difficult to arrange them in order of importance (since the Code itself does not foresee such a listing), nevertheless, we can realize that there is a certain gradation in the obligation of preserving secrecy.

The general norms of moral theology regarding the obligation of observing secrecy in each situation would have to be observed in the following and similar instances.

A. The Seal of Confession

According to canon 983, the confessional seal is inviolable. Failure to observe this provision can lead to the most serious canonical penalties. Indeed, canon 1388 provides that a person who directly violates the sacramental seal incurs an automatic excommunication reserved to the Apostolic See (Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith).

B. Pontifical Secrecy

The Instruction of 2 February 1974 on Pontifical Secrecy provides that failure to observe such secrecy can also entail the imposition of serious penalties (suspension from office, removal from office, dismissal from office). This provision became even more significant in the life of the Church when the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith issued the circular letter of 18 May 2001, Ad exsequendam outlining particular delicts which were henceforth reserved to the Congregation (see AAS 93 [2001], pp. 785-788). Among these, we find the abuse of minors under the age of 16. A complementary document, 'Procedural Norms', was not released publicly. It was promulgated by Pope John Paul II on 30 April 2001, and contains 26 norms - five of which are considered to be substantive, the other 21 being procedural. These provide that cases involving minors are subject to Pontifical Secrecy. Pontifical Secrecy also applies in cases relating to the appointment of bishops, the examination of writings of theologians, creation of cardinals, etc. (See also canon 1362).

C. Secret of the Holy Office

The Secret of the Holy Office is not mentioned in the current Code, and is perhaps identified with Pontifical Secrecy, but it was mentioned in a number of former documents. Again, penalties were laid down for those who violated it. There has been considerable publicity given lately to the 16 March 1962 Instruction of the then Holy Office referring to cases of solicitation in the confessional. Sections 71-74 of this text refer to sins of clerics against those who had not reached the canonical age of puberty (14 for a boy, 12 for a girl), or with persons of the same sex. All information relating to such cases was subject to the Secret of the Holy Office (Sections 11 and 70), and was considered to be sub gravi. Failure to observe secrecy led to automatic excommunication, reserved exclusively to the person of the Pope. Some lawyers have been stating recently that this law of the Church was intended to prevent bishops from notifying the civil authorities about a paedophile in the ranks of the clergy. However, the intent of the document was to protect the reputation of all persons involved and avoid scandal (since such cases were considered to be so rare); there was no mention of the civil authorities in the text, either for or against.

D. Secrecy in penal and contentious trials

Canon 1455 provides that, in penal trials, the judges and tribunal assistants are bound to observe always the secret of the office; in a contentious trial, they are bound to observe it if the revelation of any part of the acts of the process could be prejudicial to the parties. There is also an obligation of permanent secrecy concerning the discussion held by the judges. Canon 1457 provides for appropriate penalties if court personnel breach the law of secrecy.

E. Secrecy of Office

Canon 127 provides that if the seriousness of the matter requires it, they [councillors] are obliged carefully to maintain secrecy, and the superior can insist on this obligation. Likewise, canon 471: 'All those who are admitted to an office in the curia must [...] observe secrecy within the limits and according to the manner determined by law or by the Bishop.'

F. A Committed Secret

According to canon 645, superiors can seek information from others before admitting candidates, and can promise secrecy (which must then be observed). Canons 983, §2, and 1388, §2, would apply here: those to whom confessional knowledge comes in any way, even though they are not the confessor, are bound to observe the secret.

G. Professional Secrecy

Canon 1548, §2 provides that, in ecclesiastical court cases, clerics are exempted from the obligation of replying to questions in those matters revealed to them by reason of their sacred ministry. The same applies to 'civil officials, doctors, midwives, advocates, notaries and others who are bound by the secret of their office, even on the ground of having offered advice, in respect of matters subject to this secret.'

H. The General Provision of canon 220

'No one may unlawfully harm the good reputation which a person enjoys, or violate the right of every person to protect his or her privacy.' More on this later.

II: THE CANONS ON THE RIGHT TO PRIVACY AND REPUTATION

A. Canon 220 – General Principles

The fundamental canon in the 1983 Code, and which is the basis for on-going jurisprudence today, is canon 220, noted above. This canon contains two rights: the right to privacy, and the right to reputation. It is complemented by canon 128: 'Whoever unlawfully causes harm to another by a juridical act, or indeed by any other act which is malicious or culpable, is obliged to repair the damage done.' Likewise, canon 1390, §2: 'One who ...injures the good reputation of another person can be punished with a just penalty, even including a censure' such as excommunication.

1. The Right to One's Reputation

There are two dimensions to the right of one's reputation: the loss of it, and the harming of it.

(i) There are times when a person's reputation can be damaged lawfully, as in the case when a penal trial is held, a person is pronounced guilty, and the sentence is declared or the situation is notorious. But, as canon 1717, §2 provides, before the trial is held, 'care must be taken lest anyone's good name be endangered by the [preliminary] investigation.' Even after the trial, if the person cannot observe the penalty without danger of serious infamy, then the penalty is suspended for the time being (c. 1352, §2). Therefore, dioceses should not be making public the names of priests accused of actions - even with minors - until the trial has been held, either in the secular forum or before the Church, and a decision given.

(ii) A person's reputation can be harmed first of all by revealing secrets. But it can also be harmed through calumny and slander. The law takes the obligation of not harming a person's reputation so seriously that a willful violation of such a personal reputation could be subject to very severe penalties within the Church. Furthermore, if such a violation were to occur, there always remains the obligation of making suitable reparation. For instance, priests and religious can be falsely accused of actions they did not commit, or insinuations are made about their behaviour without sufficient evidence of proof. Reparation should be made in such instances. The topic of 'letters of recommendation' is a very delicate one. For instance, canon 241, §3 provides that 'when persons seek admission after they have been dismissed from another seminary or from a religious institute, further testimony is required from their respective superior, especially regarding the cause of their dismissal or their leaving.' If the reasons for departure were public or of a public nature, such letters would have to be forthright, or at least should invite the recipient to have personal contact with the writer for additional information. At times, the refusal to write a letter of recommendation is sufficient indication in itself of a serious problem on the part of the candidate. But, if the information is strictly confidential or on the level of the internal forum, then it cannot be communicated, no matter how advantageous it would be to have access to it.

2. The Right to Privacy

Although the 1917 Code focussed more on the right to privacy in correspondence (canon 611) than on other matters, the current law appears to extend the right to privacy to cover many personal issues. For instance, although the 1983 Code does not mention specific areas, we can deduce from experience and by analogy a number of instances where the right to privacy would be violated.

(i) For instance, forcing a candidate to priesthood or to religious life to reveal his or her sexual orientation.

(ii) Another area is undue inquiry into a person's past medical history, unless this has bearing on a candidate's aptitudes for religious life or priesthood today: for instance, an active case of AIDS.

(iii) A third area concerns the retention and distribution of psychological evaluations and reports. We must recognize that there is a major difference between having candidates undergo a psychological assessment, and having the results of such evaluation shared by many people.

(iv) There are also privacy issues regarding what is kept in a person's personal file. For instance, if a person giving a letter of recommendation is promised secrecy, this letter should not be placed in the candidate's file. The same applies to anonymous letters denouncing a person. If ever there was a trial against a person, the accused would have the right to know who the accusers are and what they are stating (c. 1720, 1°). Likewise, reports from counselling centres that are supposed to be destroyed after six months should not be kept in a person's file; indeed, they should be destroyed as demanded.

(v) A very common occurrence today is the respect (or disregard) of privacy when a priest or religious is transferred to another posting. A bishop or superior is not at freedom to give the reasons for the transfer. The same applies to instances where a member wishes to leave a religious institute, or a priest applies for priest applies for laicization.

3. Some Immediate Practical Applications

(i) The right to privacy is invoked as the basis for Roman statements that a bishop may not oblige a cleric to undergo therapy without the latter's consent. (See G. Ingels, 'Protecting the Right to Privacy when Examining Issues Affecting the Life and Ministry of Clerics and Religious' in Studia Canonica 34 [2000], pp. 439-466). An Instruction of the Secretariat of State (6 August 1976) spells out the elements to be kept in mind when dealing with therapy: it is not licit for anyone, either a religious or diocesan superior, to enter into the psychological or moral privacy of a person without having received from that person a prior, explicit, informed and absolutely free consent...'

(ii) It is also held that a cleric cannot even be sent for psychological evaluation without his consent, cf. Congregation for the Clergy, 8 October 1998: '...Therefore, this Congregation concludes that Your Excellency cannot, in this case, under pain of obedience, oblige your priest to undergo psychological evaluation.' And, if he accepts to go, the report should be protected. Father G. Ingels lists three principles that could be followed in instances where it is essential for a superior to have psychological information:

(a) When circumstances suggest the need for a priest or religious to undergo a psychological evaluation or when an assessment recommends ongoing therapy, the individual should be invited to take part in the evaluation or therapy.

(b) A priest or religious who freely consents to an evaluation or ongoing therapy should be invited to release the results of the evaluation or the therapy to his or her superior or ordinary. He or she cannot be compelled to release such results following the assessment or to sign a release prior to an assessment agreeing to the later release of the results: if he does release them, then the conditions of the release should be respected.

(c) Under no circumstances can a priest or religious be required to undergo invasive testing which elicits information over which the individual has no freedom or personal control, for example, through testing or procedures which involve the use of a polygraph, the penile plethymograph, drug induced responses, or other techniques of this nature. Due to the questionable morality associated with the use of these techniques, even if an individual should freely submit to such testing, any information gathered from such procedures cannot be used in the external forum.

A person who signs a release should be able to ask that, even though they are used in the actual therapy, certain pieces of information be deleted from the report being sent to ecclesiastical authorities.

(iii) If the priest refuses to undergo evaluation, the bishop is free to ask a specialist for an evaluation of the documentation already gathered, and to make a report based exclusively on the information available. Of course, this does not give a full picture, but if nothing more is available, and the bishop must act, then he can proceed in this way in applying canons 1041, 1° or 1044, §2, 20 (which determine that a person is unfit for ordination, or for the exercise of orders already received). The priest or religious may then determine whether an evaluation would help in his right of defence, but he cannot be forced to authorize such an intervention.

(iv) The Congregation for the Clergy has also decreed that medical records cannot be used as evidence in a penal case without the direct consent of the person accused (9 June 1998). Medical records are there to assist the patient, not to militate against him.

B. Canon 642 - Formation Issues

Canon 642 is probably the principal canon in the law for religious dealing with protection of the right to privacy, although canon 618 also speaks of the 'reverence' which superiors are to show for the human person. Canon 642 is concerned with admissions to the institute. Three points are specifically mentioned in the canon as calling for verification:

- (1) the health of the candidate
- (2) that person's character
- (3) personal maturity

These three areas can be verified if necessary by using experts, with due regard for the prescription of canon 220. The experts would be physicians, psychologists, counsellors, and the like. One area in relation to a person's character - if handled with care - which could be the object of an inquiry, is the family background of the person being evaluated. For instance, where there was alcoholism, sexual abuse, violence, serious dysfunction, and so forth. Persons who were brought up in such a milieu are not always able to function in an appropriate manner in an institute or seminary.

When canon 642 speaks of 'maturity', it would seem that 'affective maturity' would be an important element to consider. This would apply to sexual maturity and integration, to the capacity to reach out to others, to love and be loved - according to the norms of religious life.

III. THE NATURE AND PURPOSE OF ARCHIVES

The information received is eventually sent to archives. For this reason, it will be important to review the norms of the Code relating to archives - keeping in mind the perspective of confidentiality.

A. The Nature of Ecclesiastical Archives

Although the Code does not provide a definition of ecclesiastical archives, the following elements of an eventual definition can be gleaned from the canons:

- they are to be established in a safe place (c. 486, §2)
- documents and writings are kept (c. 486, §2)
- these documents concern both spiritual and sacramental matters (c. 486, §2)
- they are to be properly filed (c. 486, §2)
- they are to be carefully kept under lock and key (c. 486, §2)
- an inventory (catalogue), with a short synopsis of each document, is to be prepared (c. 486, §3)
- only certain persons are authorized to have access to the archives (c. 487, §1)

- the persons concerned have the right to receive, personally or by proxy, an authentic written or photostat copy of documents which are of their nature public and which concern their own personal status (c. 487, §2)
- it is not permitted to remove documents from the archives, except for a short time and with appropriate permission (c. 488)
- there are three types of archives: the general archives, the historical archives, and the secret archives (see c. 489, §1)
- the secret archives are to be securely closed and bolted in a cabinet that cannot be removed (c. 488, §1)
- a retention policy for documents kept in the secret archives is established by law (c. 489, §).

B. The Contents of Archives

The Code of Canon Law lists a number of documents that are to be retained in ecclesiastical archives. Among these, we could mention the following:

- canon 482, §1: acts of the curia; these would be acts which have juridical effect, that is, those which are signed by the Ordinary and countersigned by the Chancellor (see canon 474). Acts of the Ordinary, which do not have juridical effect, need not be kept in the archives (such as personal correspondence)
- canon 486, §2: documents concerning both the spiritual and the temporal affairs of the diocese or institute
- canon 489, §2: documents relating to ecclesiastical criminal cases concerning moral matters (with particular norms for their retention)

-canon 491, §2: historical documents

-canon 535, §4: local archives (parishes, etc): documents relating to spiritual and temporal matters, necessary or useful documents

-canon 1082: marriage dispensations granted for occult cases

-canon 1133: records of marriages celebrated in secret

-canon 1283, 30: copies of inventories of temporal goods

-canon 1284, §2, 9°: copies of documents and records establishing the rights of the Church or Institute to its temporal goods

-canon 1306, §2: copies of documents relating to the establishment and governance of canonical foundations

-canon 1339, §3: copies of warnings and corrections in criminal cases

-canon 1475, §2: judicial acts and documents obtained in processes.

It can be noted that these canons do not speak of personnel files as such. While the current files of clergy (and religious) are kept in the chancery office or secretariat, the files of those who have died or have left are usually placed in the archives after a certain period of time. The question that arises constantly is: what is to be retained in such files? We will return to this in a few moments.

For cases relating to processes, a response of the Apostolic Signatura states that the originals may be destroyed after ten years, except for the original text of the sentence and decrees of confirmation which must always be preserved. The other judicial acts are to be preserved on microfilm (or some similar method), which is prepared with all due technical care so that the integral acts can be reproduced whenever this is necessary (July 29, 1989, in CLSA, Roman Replies and CLSA Advisory Opinions, 1990, p. 22).

The archivist determines the value of records based on their administrative, legal, fiscal, historical, or sacramental uses (see CLSA, New Commentary on the Code of Canon Law, p. 640). We will now examine what this means in practice.

IV. ACCESS TO DOCUMENTATION

NB. The following points and those in the next section are taken, at times literally, from the 'Guidelines' prepared by the Archdiocese of Edmonton (15 December 1998) on acquisition/collection, preservation, reproduction and access to general and historical records.

The archives of a diocese or religious institute exist to collect, preserve and make available the records of enduring value which pertain to the history of the Church. As such, they play an integral part in the information system of a diocese or religious institute.

The archives seek to ensure a documentary heritage to us and to future generations. Eventually, they will form a basis for scholarly research in keeping with the moral and historical precepts of canon law and the democratic values and civil law of the country. For years, superiors and other persons in charge have been collecting these silent but eloquent witnesses of our history; as custodians of these historical documents they have the responsibility both to preserve and to share them.

The Catholic Church (as well as its various component parts) is a private institution. As with any religious body, many of the various internal involvements and undertakings of the Church are not strictly speaking open to the general public. The private nature of the Church influences the preservation and use of its records. In a word, they too are private.

Guidelines for access to archival material should be developed with a sensitivity for both the right of an individual to privacy and the right of a researcher to information, thus complying with canon law and with the civil legislation in effect, which recognize the right to privacy and to reputation. Such guidelines would be meant to ensure that anyone using the archival resources will do so in the most responsible manner.

General elements of a Policy:

A. General Norms

- 1 . The archivist (chancellor) is the custodian of the ordinary archives (see c. 482,§11). The archivist looks after the day to day care and supervision of the archives and serves as the bishop's/superior's representative and liaison in the establishment of archival policies.
2. Public ecclesiastical documents and public civil documents are those which an official person draws up in the exercise of his or her function in the Church or in society, according to the formalities required by ecclesiastical and civil law (depending on the case). All other documents are private (see c. 1540).
3. In the broadest sense, documents could be considered to be any type of object that is not oral and which may serve to establish proof of a situation. Thus, in general, the word 'document' could refer to instruments on which is recorded matter which may be used evidentially. Such could be letters, lithographs, photographs, maps, plans. The inscription need not be on paper. Inanimate objects could also be considered as documents (e.g., a box of pills).
4. The custom is that historical documents become public domain after a period of seventy (70) years. However, documents considered confidential in nature may remain confidential indefinitely.
5. The Code of Canon Law stipulates one of the most basic principles to keep in mind whenever dealing with general, sacramental or historical records; viz. professional secrecy: 'No one may unlawfully harm the good reputation which a person enjoys, or violate the right of every person to protect his or her privacy' (c. 220).
6. Persons have the right to receive, personally or by proxy, an authentic written or photostat copy of documents which are public of their nature and which concern their own personal status (see c. 487, §2). These would include copies of acts of religious profession, dispensation from vows, dismissal from the institute, ordination, laicization, etc.

B. Acquisition/Collection

1 . Historical memory constitutes an integral part of the life of a diocese or religious institute, of its various communities and services. Therefore, original documents, acts and writings concerning the spiritual and temporal affairs of the various parts are to be clear, complete with names, dates and annotations, legibly signed and witnessed. They are to be properly filed and carefully kept.

2. Ordinations and religious professions, as well as funerals/burials, are to be entered carefully and without delay in the appropriate registers. Such entries are to be complete with names, dates and annotations, as required by law, signed and legibly witnessed (see c. 535).

3. For safety purposes, documents kept in parishes or religious houses should be regularly transferred to the central archives to be systematically filed, catalogued and kept under lock and key. If the originals are necessary in the place where they originate, duplicate copies should be forwarded to the central archives, duly signed, testifying to their authenticity.

4. All persons involved, such as parish priests, those in charge of diocesan offices, schools etc., are to collaborate with the diocesan or congregational archivist to ensure that records are as complete as possible. Omissions must be identified and every effort made to locate missing records.

5. When a particular work is closed, all original records are to be transferred to the central archives.

6. Documents are not to be removed from local or central archives, except for a short time and then with the appropriate permissions (see c. 488).

C. Personal Files

1 . Each diocese or institute should have a policy relating to what is to be kept in the archives, or in the personal file of each member. There is a distinction between active files and those which have been placed in the archives.

2. It would be good for dioceses and institutes to work closely with civil archivists to make certain that the applicable civil law is also observed.

3. There are no hard and fast canonical rules regarding how long certain materials should be kept. There are advantages and disadvantages in keeping material. If retention schedules have been determined, they should be scrupulously adhered to so that no inference can be made of the fact that only certain documents were destroyed and others retained.

4. For instance, and merely as an example, the following could be determined:

- the personal notes of a superior (e.g., seminary rector, parish priest, etc.) are destroyed at the time of change of office. A verbal communication can be made to the successor in office, who can take notes from the conversation.

- there is another dimension to the communication of information, this time within the institute itself. For instance, when a major superior finishes his or her term of office, it is asked what information can be shared with that person's successor. The Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life holds that a major superior can transmit information under certain circumstances. For instance, if a member who is HIV positive was having sexual relations with persons outside the institute, and the major superior, being aware of this, imposed the appropriate precepts on the religious, it is also important for the successor in office to be made aware of the fact so that the precepts are not lifted when there is a change of superiors.

To illustrate this point, CICALSAL replied on April 18, 2001: 'Regarding the issue of confidentiality, both Father X and the Congregation have important rights and responsibilities. Hence, the information concerning the medical condition of the religious should be placed in the secret archives of the Congregation and not released to anyone; however, you are permitted - in strictly confidential fashion - to share this information with your successor when that time arrives.'

- it should be determined what a person has access to in regard to his or her personal file, and who is to be present when the file is examined.

- retention schedules are drawn up (for instance, five or ten years for certain types of documents). This applies particularly to medical records, psychological assessments, therapy reports, etc.

- records for seminarians, associates, postulants, novices, etc., are usually kept separate from records of the clergy or members of a religious institute.

- anonymous letters are not kept, nor progress reports from therapy centres.

- addresses and telephone numbers of former seminarians, priests, or members of institutes are not given out without their permission.

- when a person leaves the diocese or institute (as distinct from dying while a member), very little of a personal nature is to be retained.

- pictures of persons (whether present or former seminarians, priests, members, etc.) should never be used in publicity or advertising without their permission.

It must also be remembered that to date the civil courts do not recognize that Church documents are privileged; therefore, any file can be confiscated, even those in the secret archives. As a principle, it is often stated that we should keep nothing that we would not want to see made public. Of course, there are nuances to make to this statement. Historians, obviously, do not agree with this approach, but until things quieten down a bit, we are better to preserve the good name of persons and institutions. Of course, once a court case has begun, no documents can be destroyed. Likewise, it is important to have a policy on hand, determining what to do when the police arrive with a subpoena.

Although there are differing opinions on the matter, it seems that, in summary, the following documents are generally not retained (subject to exceptions):

-anonymous letters

-personal notes of superiors

-letters that do not have historical value (unless there was a potential cause for beatification concerning the person)

-documents concerning matters that have been resolved (unless there are exceptions)

-copies of documents readily found elsewhere, unless access to the originals is difficult

-for deceased persons: seminary evaluations, psychological reports during formation years, last will and testament, disciplinary actions, etc.

-psychological evaluations and progress reports

-documents that we would not want to become public.

D. Preservation

1. All documents concerning the diocese or institute or its parts and its works are to be kept with the greatest care in a safe place and out of reach of unauthorized persons (see c. 486). Those in charge at all levels are to ensure that entries are accurately made and that registers are carefully preserved (see c. 535, §11).

2. No one is permitted to delete any information contained in church archives (see c. 428, §2) and this includes no use of white ink, cover-up tape, scotch tape. Tampering with original records is absolutely forbidden (see c. 1391). However, annotations (additions and corrections) may be made only upon presentation of true copies of legal supporting documents, and are to be kept in the original register (for instance, dispensations from vows or from the obligations of sacred orders). Generally speaking, to accommodate the possibility of future additions or corrections, a number of blank pages are to be left at the end of registers for the purpose of creating a 'B' entry, or for annotations, confidential or otherwise.

3. Records may not be removed from church archives except for such reasons as copying for conservation measures (see c. 488) and for similar purposes.

4. If documents are copied, one copy is to be stored in a vault off the premises. This is a precaution in the event of fire, flood or other damage.

5. If the general archivist, in view of providing specialized measures for the preservation of original documents of 80 years old or more (see c. 535, §5), requests old registers, a copy will be kept in the local archives.

6. The archivist is to see that all records are stored in a secured area where environmental conditions are controlled, where records are protected from damage caused by improper lighting, ultra-violet radiation, dust and infestation. Temperature and humidity controls are to be maintained within the accepted norms.

E. Reproduction

1. Reproduction of confidential documents cannot be authorized. However, certain records may be copied (microfilmed etc.) from time to time at the discretion of the archivist.

2. Should a copy of a historical document be required, the archivist will have the pertinent document photocopied and will sign the document attesting to its authenticity.
3. Whoever publishes a document from the diocesan or congregational archives should acknowledge its source.
4. Whoever wishes to publish an article or a book including material obtained from any church archive should seek approval from the archivist.
5. Reproduction of entire non-sacramental record groups, i.e., bodies of organizationally-related records established on the basis of provenance, may be authorized by the archivist (or the superior) in order to facilitate the work of research.
6. Some conditions may apply, depending on the request (whether for scientific research or for monetary profits), and the use to be made of the documents.
7. When reproduction is permissible, the archivist will determine (a) the reproduction cost; (b) the damage cost, if applicable; (c) a suitable compensation if the enterprise is a profitable endeavour.

F. General Access

The archival term 'access' refers to authority to obtain information from or to perform research in archival materials.

1. The person in charge of local archives may authorize others, such as secretaries, to access records for the purpose of preparing certificates.
2. The bishop/superior, or his/her duly-designated representative, can have access to the archives, or designate other persons to have access in order to prepare certificates.
3. Any person who is granted access to the archives is bound in prudence from releasing any archival document and to secrecy regarding the confidential information obtained from such records. The binding of secrecy holds even after their employment with the diocese or congregation has ceased.

4. In the case where a person would request that his or her name be taken from a register, the request is to be addressed in the most pastorally possible manner and kept with the original record.

5. Assistance may be given to individuals requesting genealogical research on their own family. Records of living persons are to be dealt with judiciously so as to respect their right to privacy.

6. Assistance may also be given to genealogical researchers. While their interest in any pertinent information contained in records with respect to family histories and lineage is legitimate, there is a certain aura of confidentiality to be respected in dealing with some of these records (for instance, dispensation from certain occult impediments, laicization and dismissal cases), which were created under the assumption of privacy. Consequently, direct access to certain records is not always permissible.

7. Access to any historical document pertaining to the diocese or institute may be obtained from the archivist. Access is open to all qualified researchers regardless of race or creed. However, if the request is made for the purpose of instituting a court case against the diocese or institute or one of its parts, the archivist (or ecclesiastical superior) may deny access.

8. Whoever uses substantial archival material is to sign a document to the effect that he or she shall observe an ethical code to the effect that all information received will be used in the most responsible manner.

9. An example: the Archdiocese of Chicago has opened up sacramental records up to and including 1915. After 1915, if a person is seeking his or her own record or has a legitimate reason to request family records (e.g., parent of a minor or guardian seeking the record of an incapacitated adult), the parish priest or authorized parish personnel shall examine the register and issue the required information either in person or by mail. If the person requesting is not known to parish personnel, a signed request with proof of identity (picture ID) is required. Requests made by someone other than the person whose record is sought, including government or corporate agencies, should be accompanied by a release signed by the person whose record is requested (or a legally qualified guardian) authorizing the release of information. However, certificates can be issued directly to a parish or other church authority for canonical purposes (such as a pre-marital inquiry), without a signed release (August 16, 1999, [Most] Rev. T.J. Paprocki, Chancellor). An adaptation of this policy could be made for the archives of religious institutes when persons seek information.

V: PROCEDURES RECOMMENDED IN CASES WHERE A SUBPOENA IS SERVED FOR DOCUMENTS KEPT IN THE ARCHIVES

1. If police officers arrive to carry out a search of the archives, it must first be ascertained whether they are in possession of the requisite judicial search warrant. If so, there cannot be interference with their right to carry out the warrant.
2. However, it is of paramount importance to contact and brief counsel respecting the circumstances of the case, if possible before any documents are handed over.
3. The police officers should be invited to contact their own legal advisors. Direct communication between counsel for both parties would be advisable.
4. Counsel for the diocese or institute, or the person in charge of the premises described in the search warrant, should appraise the police of the likely existence of a privilege with regard to the documents they wish to take, as well as of the fact that it is intended to claim this privilege before the courts.
5. Counsel for the diocese or institute, or the person in charge of the premises, should insist that seized documents be placed in a sealed envelope before the police officers have an opportunity to read or photocopy them. Furthermore, every effort should be made to have the officers agree that the envelope shall remain thus sealed until such time as a judge examines whether or not a privilege exists respecting the documents.
6. In these conditions, the privilege may be protected until a judicial decision is handed down. This judicial decision may be made at the trial, in the course of a voir dire or similar procedure conducted to determine the admissibility of such documents (viz. the preliminary examination which the court and lawyers make to determine the suitability of such documents etc.), or it may be sought in the days following the search and seizure.

VI: CARE OF DOCUMENTS

1. Norms for historical archives were set out in a letter from the Congregation for the Clergy (1 February 1971); cf. La Documentation Catholique 86 (1971), pp. 521-522. Detailed regulations were given in the subsequent Circular Letter from the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church (2 February 1997); cf. La Documentation Catholique 94 (1997), pp. 610-620.

The 1997 Circular Letter covers the following points:

(i) The ecclesial importance of transmitting our documentary patrimony transmission as a moment of Tradition transmission as the memory of evangelization transmission as a pastoral instrument

(ii) The outline of an organic project the strengthening of diocesan historical archives adapting current archives (information and coordination) mutual cooperation with civic institutions common orientations adopted by the Conference of Bishops hiring of qualified personnel

(iii) The preservation of documents that contain "memory" gathering together in one place documentation that is unique appropriate location inventories and use of information technology

(iv) Sharing documentary patrimony for historical culture and for the Church's mission the universal dimension of archival documentation establishing a policy for access to archives placing documentary material within a historical context cultural formation based on the documentation preserved promotion of historical research.

2. There should be reasonable criteria for the acceptance of possible archival material (not everything is to be kept!):

- (i) Administrative value: is it considered vital to the person who created the document for administrative, financial, legal, or other reasons?

- (ii) Age parameters: does it fit into the chronological boundaries of the archives? Does it have value even if it is contemporary?
- (iii) Quantity: is there too much to keep? Is it all worth keeping? What is kept and what is not, and why?
- (iv) Type of material; does it contain important information?
-Uniqueness: is it one of a kind?
- (v) Physical quality: is it worth the cost of care?
- (vi) Time span: does the material indicate a pattern over a time period?
Does it reveal a history?
- (vii) Accessibility: are there restrictions by the donor on its use? Would restrictions need to be established by the diocese or congregation?
- (viii) Use: how often will the material be used?

3. One area to be kept in mind is that technology is changing rapidly. Thus, the equipment used to create and read electronic records today may be obsolete and disposed of by the time it would be necessary to read the electronic record in the archives. Therefore, it will be important to keep the reading equipment, or transfer the material to newer 'diskettes', etc.

CONCLUSION

Given new circumstances, archival material is not always used for historical purposes. Today, dioceses and religious institutes need such material to provide justification of their activities when court cases are brought against them. Regretfully, there is a serious tension between preserving documents for the sake of history, and protecting dioceses and institutes from civil litigation. Hopefully, before too long, this wave of litigation will cease and archivists will be able to carry out the requirements of their profession in security and joy.

Church Archives: Guidelines

Rt.Rev. Gordon Read

In the autumn of 2005 the members of the Association of Diocesan Archivists of England & Wales, a group convened under the auspices of the Catholic Archives Society, were circulated with a Questionnaire regarding their diocesan policies on access, rules of closure, preservation and deposit of sacramental records, and matters of data protection. Monsignor Read, Chancellor of the Diocese of Brentwood and an expert in Canon Law, prepared the following guidelines and suggestions for discussion to assist archivists and others responsible for diocesan policy regarding archives and records management.

A. Principles

1. The guiding principles and norms specific to archives in the Catholic Church, at both diocesan and lower levels, are set out in canons 482-491 of the Code of Canon Law.
2. The Chancellor, and other notaries, have the responsibility of ensuring that curial acts are properly drafted and kept safe in the curial archive (canon 482 § 1).
3. It is the responsibility of notaries, under the vigilance of the Chancellor, to show acts and documents from the archives to those who lawfully request them, and verify that copies conform to the original (canon 484 3°).
4. All documents concerning the diocese or parishes are to be kept with the greatest care (canon 486 §1).
5. In each curia there is to be a diocesan archive carefully kept under lock and key. In it are to be kept documents and writings concerning both the spiritual and the temporal affairs of the diocese (canon 486 §2).
6. There is to be an inventory with a short synopsis of each document (canon 486 §3).

7. Only the Bishop and Chancellor are to have the key; access requires permission from the Bishop or from the Moderator of the Curia and the Chancellor (canon 487§1)

8. 'Persons concerned have the right to receive, personally or by proxy, an authentic written or photostat copy of documents which are of their nature public and which concern their own personal status' (canon 487 §2).

9. It is not generally permitted to remove documents from the archive, except for a short time and with explicit permission (canon 488).

10. Specific regulations cover the Secret Archive, to which only the Bishop has access (canons 489-490).

11. There is to be a separate historical archive at diocesan level (canon 491 §2).

12. Other bodies are under the supervision of the Bishop, and are to give copies of their own inventories. The Bishop is to lay down specific norms on access to these other archives (canon 491 §1 & §3).

13. Documents may be categorised as:

¶ Public ecclesiastical documents

¶ Public civil documents

¶ Private documents

B. Regulation of Archives

In addition to the general provisions of the Code it is expected that each diocesan bishop will issue norms covering his own curial archives, and those belonging to juridical persons subject to him, e.g. parishes. The Episcopal Conference is not empowered to legislate in this area without seeking permission from the Holy See, but all bishops could agree to enact identical norms each within their own diocese. I suspect that most would be happy to accept the recommendations of the Chancellor or Diocesan Archivist on this.

C. Access

The Code distinguishes between different kinds of document. Public ecclesiastical documents are those drawn up by an official with due formality (canon 1540), not necessarily those that refer to publicly known events, e.g. contracts and similar agreements, as well as sacramental registers. Equally, private documents may well refer to publicly known facts, e.g. the contents of the diocesan year book.

The Code supposes that only the Bishop, Chancellor and authorised notaries have direct access to the curial archives, and that with due permission documents may be brought out to a secure place for others to have access. Note that interested persons have a right to a copy of documents that are of their nature public and concern their own personal status. This does not imply a right of access to the original documents. The draft Code was changed, and this right eliminated. In other circumstances there is no right of access, but this does not mean that it cannot be lawfully sought or given.

Access to sensitive materials could be governed by restricted dates marked on the documents, or, in the case of registers, ensuring that particular entries are blanked out from photocopies.

D. Historical Archives

The wording of the Code suggests that this refers to documents of a historical value. Primarily this would seem to be correspondence, charters, legal documents etc. rather than sacramental registers. Although these would certainly be of historical interest, they are primarily documents relating to the personal status of individuals. What they contain, however, is normally of its nature public, unlike, for example, marriage preparation papers on file in each parish. Since they may always be needed in the lifetime of those named in the entries, they should not be deposited with public authorities until they can no longer conceivably be needed for this purpose. This would suggest a minimum of 75 years, and more probably 100 years. Personally, I take the view that such records should not pass outside direct Church control. The Code envisages a diocesan historical archive, not that such materials be passed over to the state. If they are not secure, then it is for the bishop to make appropriate regulations so that they are kept securely within the diocese or parish. There is no reason why a copy of the inventories cannot be made available to civil authorities so that researchers know where to look.

E. Suggestions for Discussion

Church documents should be properly safeguarded within Church archives whether at parish or diocesan level. They should not normally be handed over to other bodies, except for short periods on loan, e.g. for exhibitions.

Copies of the inventories of diocesan archives (and parish archives in the unlikely event of these actually existing!) could be deposited with County Record Offices or similar bodies so that they know what documents are available, and also the terms of access where relevant.

Since sacramental records are records of public events, albeit occasionally containing material of a sensitive nature, there is no reason why their contents should not be made available, at least in the form of a copy, to those with a legitimate interest, and copies must be given to those on whose status they have a bearing. This cannot be done if the registers have been given to another body. Records less than 100 years old must be retained in the parish or diocesan archive (e.g. where a parish has been closed), and should be recovered where they have been transferred. Ideally they should be retained beyond 100 years, in perpetuity, but beyond that date they could legitimately be regarded as of historical rather than current interest.

More generally each diocese needs to have a clear policy in place with regard to the conservation and cataloguing of archives at parish as well as diocesan level, and about who may be given access to what, and under what conditions. This policy needs to be issued over the signature of the Bishop.

I would suggest that in general, and in line with public authorities, unrestricted documents that are not of a sensitive personal nature should be available for access after 30 years. Others should be marked 'closed for 50 years', or whatever as appropriate. Items that are of their nature public, e.g. sacramental records, publications, etc. should be available without restriction.

Access should be indirect where possible, e.g. copies of requested documents rather than originals, or else available for study in a supervised and secure area.

Requests for access should indicate the reasons, as well as the documents desired. In some cases there will be a right of access. In others permission will need to be given or withheld by the responsible person, e.g. Diocesan Archivist or Parish Priest. It may be appropriate to seek references. Do the search criteria correspond to the purposes for which the material is retained in virtue of the Data Protection Act? It may be worth reflecting that the full electoral register is available only for the purpose of establishing a particular person's right to vote, but a sanitised version is available for purchase or consultation by commercial companies, or the general public.

It might be appropriate for the norms to establish a suitable administrative fee tariff.

THE ARCHIVES OF THE ARCHDIOCESE OF CARDIFF

Dan Chidgey

From 1688 until 1840 the whole of Wales and Herefordshire formed part of the Western District under Vicars Apostolic who were Benedictine monks or Franciscan friars. Apart from some areas, where aristocratic or gentry recusant families predominated (e.g. the Vaughans), there were few places that retained a loyal Catholic population throughout Penal Times and especially in the aftermath of the Titus Oates Plot in the late 1670s. Catholicism all but disappeared in most of Wales. This can be largely attributed to deprivation of native missionary priests. In 1773 Bishop Walmsley, Vicar Apostolic of the Western District, reported to Rome that Wales had 750 Catholics and 9 Missionaries !

Industrialisation in the early nineteenth century attracted large numbers of mainly Irish immigrant workers. Rome's response to this was to increase the Vicars Apostolic from four to eight, one of whom was to be responsible for Wales and Herefordshire. The man chosen for this enormous task was Dr. Thomas Joseph Brown O.S.B., the Prior of Downside. A brilliant theologian and a formidable controversialist, he had been Prior for eight years. His early struggles against abject poverty and shortages of priests and accommodation was multiplied greatly by an enormous influx of starving and dying famine victims from Ireland.

At the Restoration of the Hierarchy in 1850 the northern counties were attached to the Diocese of Shrewsbury and the rest of Wales, plus Herefordshire, became the Diocese of Newport and Menevia. Bishop Brown succeeded in obtaining a unique arrangement for the new diocese. The Chapter was to have up to ten Canons, all of whom were to be Benedictine monks, and the pro-Cathedral was to be the newly built Belmont Priory near Hereford. This was to cause great concern at a later date.

The indefatigable Bishop Brown ruled for forty years. He was succeeded by his auxiliary, Bishop Cuthbert Hedley, a fellow Benedictine, in 1881. A learned cleric and a man of foresight, he saw that the future of the Catholic community needed to be centred on Cardiff, and his first act was to move his residence there,(one of many such moves!). A notable educationalist and a great spiritual writer, he was for many years editor of The Dublin Review. He died in 1916.

What of the archives of these early years? Fortunately, despite later disasters, much of the bishops' correspondence and many documents were preserved, though they had deteriorated. In 1996 it was decided to deposit these papers at The National Library of Wales at Aberystwyth. 126 Box Files were moved there under a well drawn-up deposit agreement whereby the contents, and access to them, remain in the ownership of Archdiocese of Cardiff but the National Library will catalogue and preserve them. We were also fortunate in having had some outstanding local historians who made use of early documents to produce historical papers. Noteworthy is the work of Father John Cronin I.C., John Hobson Matthews, the Cardiff Archivist who contributed numerous articles to the Catholic Record Society, and Joseph Herbert Canning, whose outstanding works on Catholic Monmouthshire are available through the National Library and local sources.

In 1916, following the spadework done by Bishop Hedley, it was decided to make Cardiff an Archdiocese. The new Metropolitan was named as John Romanus Bilsborrow O.S.B., Bishop of Port Louis in Mauritius. We have very little in the way of correspondence apart from cables from the Vatican asking, 'Where are you? Why have you not taken possession of your Archdiocese?' It must be remembered that it was the middle of the First World War and Mauritius was a great distance by sea. Archbishop Bilsborrow did not enjoy good health. He was not convinced that succession should always be in the hands of the Benedictines. He also faced a strange dilemma. Rome, adhering to traditional practice, decided there should be a Benedictine Chapter and Cathedral at Belmont and also a Chapter composed of secular priests and a Cathedral in Cardiff. So we had a reluctant Archbishop with two Chapters and two Cathedrals! He took the matter up with Rome. For four years neither Chapter met. Eventually Rome agreed that this was a Benedictine anomaly and decreed that the Cathedral and Chapter would be based on Cardiff and its secular priests. By way of compensation the long-serving Benedictine, Canon Duggan, was allowed to stay on the Chapter and Belmont was raised to the status of an Abbey. Archbishop Bilsborrow retired to live once more in Mauritius.

The year 1921 saw the enthronement of the greatly loved Archbishop Francis Mostyn, a Welsh-speaking member of an old Catholic family from North Wales. A great success as Bishop of Menevia, as Archbishop of Cardiff he faced the years of depression following the Great War. Many new parishes and Mass centres were opened, but with little income many priests had to share the poverty of their parishioners. Archbishop Mostyn died in October 1939, a few weeks after the outbreak of the Second World War. He was followed by Archbishop Michael McGrath, a great scholar and polyglot. He led the Archdiocese during the war years and the difficult times endured after the end of hostilities. He died in 1961.

It was on 3 March 1941 that a great tragedy struck St. David's Cathedral, where many of the archives had been housed. Fire bombs reduced the fine old church to ruins and water damage led to the destruction of many important letters and documents of the era of Francis Mostyn. Between the death of Archbishop McGrath in 1961 and the enthronement of Archbishop Murphy it was decided to move the residence from the city centre to the outskirts of Cardiff. This was to be the fourth such move and inevitably documents were lost in the process. There are even stories of bonfires in the garden before the removal vans arrived !

Archbishop Murphy (1961 - 1983) was a popular and prolific writer. He and Archbishop Ward OFM Cap. (1983 - 2001) were meticulous in preserving letters and documents and numerous archive boxes, filling a whole room, can testify to the care taken to collect archival documents in recent years. Much work remains to be done on cataloguing and storing these records.

The solution to an archival emergency, however, indicated a possible way forward for under-resourced and under-manned curial offices such as ours. In Bishop Brown's struggle to build up the Church in industrial South Wales, two factors were of enormous importance. The 3rd Marquess of Bute, the richest man in Britain in his day, became a Catholic in 1868. His generosity helped to build up the Catholic infrastructure of churches, schools and institutions. Even more importantly, at an earlier date, Bishop Brown's persistent appeals to Antonio Rosmini to send some priests and brothers from his newly-founded Institute of Charity met with success. The Rosminians took over Newport in 1847 and Cardiff in 1854. The written records of their difficulties and tremendous achievements in the area are inextricably bound up with the diocesan archives providing a compelling picture of those early days of the revival of Catholicism.

When the Institute of Charity decided to transfer its archives to purpose-built, environmentally friendly accommodation in Stresa, in Northern Italy, it was realised that their inaccessibility would be a problem for bona fide researchers from Britain. The Rosminian Archivist and Provincial were approached and it was agreed that boxes of documents concerning South Wales could be made available within a limited time-scale for copying. How could this be achieved without creating a second set of boxes with even more sheets of paper? Did the answer lie in CDs? Would it be possible to compress onto discs numerous boxes of letters, forms and documents so that the contents of a room could be reduced to a couple of shelves?

Volunteers from the local Catholic History Society included a man with computer experience. Experiments took place, a modus operandi was agreed and the equipment purchased with a grant from a local Catholic charitable body. Then the task began in earnest. Over a period of more than two years, for two or three mornings a week, the copying progressed. Where originals were sub-standard they were photocopied on to white paper or photographed with a digital camera. The results were highly satisfactory. Nineteenth-century handwriting can be difficult to read by those who have become accustomed to typescript. The computer's facility to enlarge handwritten words is a great aid here.

Despite being given an unexpected ultimatum, the task was completed. Some forty boxes of papers, which contained almost 11,000 pages were copied onto just twenty-one CDs. Each had a description of contents and a picture logo incorporated into the disc (not an added label!) and when put on a shelf, they occupied all of six inches! A word of warning: discs do tend to corrupt in time. This will probably be overcome as technology advances. We have three sets of these discs. They should be inspected at frequent intervals and copied onto new discs from time to time. Using DVDs, it will be possible to compress the contents into just 3 of these discs ! We shall certainly continue using this process as we tackle documents waiting to be copied. Our experience with the use of computers and CDs to copy papers may commend itself to smaller dioceses, religious orders and convents which are 'down-sizing' and needing to reduce the volume of paper that has been acquired over a very long period.

In addition to their normal tasks, more and more enquiries concerning baptisms, marriages and deaths are finding their way to archivists. This is part of the modern craze for people wanting to build a family tree. Having discussed the matter with the Council of Priests, a proposal that all early registers should be deposited with local County Record Offices was approved. These CROs are usually based on the old County Council areas. For pastoral reasons a date after which registers should not be open to the public was agreed. The Cardiff Archdiocese was established in 1916, and so this is a convenient operative date after which registers must remain closed. Far from being reluctant to take on these additional tasks the CROs were most amenable. Ancient registers would be kept in suitable fireproof locations and restored where they have been damaged. Discussions with County Archivists were most friendly and agreeable conditions for deposit were soon completed. Our oldest registers have now been stored and the process continues. Thanks to the dedication and expertise of one lady, early sacramental records have been indexed recently and preserved on a CD.

Given the problems of missing documents, scattered sources and limited accommodation, for some years requests for access to the archives have had to be refused. Gradually the policy of 'repel boarders at all costs' is changing to one of offering help and advice where possible. A recent decision not to move the curial offices again has made it possible to plan for the future. Instead of sporadic visits to deal with queries single-handed, it should eventually be possible with the help of a select group, recruited from the local Catholic History Society, to begin the massive task of sorting, selecting and transferring records to computer discs. A routine for manning the office and welcoming callers could then change from a hope into a reality.

Finally, I am most grateful to the Editor of Catholic Archives, Father Stewart Foster, who, whilst discussing this article with me, very kindly copied letters of Archbishops Mostyn and McGrath to the Bishops of Brentwood so that our records from 1920 to 1961 are now fuller and of greater interest.

THE ARCHIVES OF THE DIOCESE OF WREXHAM

Kathryn Byrne

The Diocese of Wrexham is spread over the counties of Anglesey, Conwy, Denbighshire, Flintshire, Gwynedd, Wrexham and the District of Montgomery in the County of Powys. The area was part of what was known as the Western District until 1840, when it became part of the Welsh District. At the Restoration of the Hierarchy in 1850 it became part of the Diocese of Shrewsbury. In 1895 there were further boundary changes and the area became part of the Welsh Vicariate under the charge of Bishop Francis Mostyn as Vicar Apostolic. Three years later this became the Diocese of Menevia with Francis Mostyn as its bishop. It comprised most of Wales except for the heavily populated Cardiff and Swansea areas, which in due course became the Archdiocese of Cardiff and the Metropolitan See of the Welsh Province. When the Province was restructured in 1987, James Hannigan, until then Bishop of Menevia, was translated to the new Diocese of Wrexham and Daniel Mullins became bishop of the restructured Diocese of Menevia. There are about 40 parishes in the Wrexham diocese, most of them small and scattered. Less than half of the parishes have a Mass attendance of more than 200. The congregations, in the main, consist of immigrants from England, many from the North-West. As a consequence, only a minority of Catholics speak Welsh, although efforts are made to incorporate Welsh into the liturgy.

The Diocesan Archives are housed at Bishop's House, Sontley Road, Wrexham. Originally known as Plas Tirion, it was built in 1865 and is a listed building. It was acquired by the diocese in 1926 for its then new bishop, Francis Vaughan, who was consecrated on 8 September of that same year. Adjacent to the house are the Curial Offices, housed in a former stable block.

When I was appointed Diocesan Archivist, I found the archives housed in two rooms on the ground floor of the Curial Offices, with other material being in the cellar of Bishop's House itself. None of the rooms really lends itself to archival storage and it is planned shortly to transfer part of the archive to the National Library of Wales. I have been spending one day each week, with some help, assessing the extent of the archive, listing it and storing it and preparing part of the collection for transfer to the National Library. In conjunction with the listing of the papers, they have been removed from rusty strong-boxes, worm-eaten skips and boxes of various kinds and placed in acid-free archive boxes. Metal clips have been removed. Boxes which have been sorted, follow the Catholic Archives Society's 'Guidelines for the Classification of Diocesan and Religious Archives'. There is clearly very much to be done, so until the work is completed, the following is an interim list of the Wrexham Diocesan Archives.

THE MIDDLESBROUGH DIOCESAN ARCHIVES

David Smallwood

ORIGINS OF MIDDLESBROUGH DIOCESE

When the Catholic Hierarchy was restored in 1850 the whole of the vast county of Yorkshire became the Diocese of Beverley under Bishop John Briggs, the former Vicar Apostolic of the Northern District. The diocesan administration was centred in York with St George, Peel Street, being used as the pro-Cathedral. Ten years later Bishop Briggs, because of ill health, offered his resignation and the Letters Apostolic which appointed his successor, Robert Cornthwaite, already contained provision for a future division of the diocese.¹ As early as 1862 Cornthwaite moved his administration to Leeds which left the North Riding, including the rapidly growing town of Middlesbrough in the far north of the diocese, somewhat isolated. In a letter to the Congregation of Propaganda on 1 November 1874, Cornthwaite argued the case for dividing this diocese with its huge area and ever-growing population.²

The Vatican's response came four years later in a decree of Pope Leo XIII, issued on 20th December 1878, that the Diocese of Beverley was to be split. The West Riding and those parts of the City of York south of the River Ouse became the Diocese of Leeds; the North and East Ridings, together with the City of York north of the Ouse, became the Diocese of Middlesbrough. The recently erected church of St Mary in Middlesbrough was named as the cathedral of the new diocese and in November 1879 its Rector, Richard Lacy, was appointed the first Bishop of Middlesbrough. In more recent times there have been some minor boundary changes: the York parishes south of the Ouse were ceded to Middlesbrough in the 1980s so that all the churches in the city are now in the same diocese; in 2004 the parish of Howden, in the far south west of the East Riding, went to Leeds.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF MIDDLESBROUGH DIOCESAN ARCHIVES³

The earliest attempts to preserve archival material in the diocese were made by Monsignor Patrick Lannen who, as Bishop's Secretary from 1939 to 1957 and Chancellor from 1952 to 1963, was in a good position to have an overview of the diocese. The archive was at first held in a room in Bishop's House. No listings were made in those early days, so we can only speculate as to what was there; probably mainly a collection of correspondence with missions/parishes from the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. As far as I can ascertain, only some clergy were aware of the existence of this collection - it was certainly not open to the general public.

In the mid 1970s, as the centenary of the formation of the diocese approached, Canon Robert Carson, the Administrator of the Cathedral, began to assemble material to write his history of the diocese.⁴ As well as the archive in Bishop's House, he found much material in presbyteries, especially in those of the larger parishes such as Middlesbrough Cathedral, St Wilfrid, York, and St Charles, Hull. Canon Carson would seem to have been the first person in the diocese to see the need for a formal historical archive; when he had finished writing his book he placed all the material he had collected, including the first complete set of diocesan directories, in an archive room in the Curial Offices in North Ormesby.

The last main stage in the development of the archive came under Monsignor Raymond Charlton, who took over as Diocesan Archivist after the death of Canon Carson in 1988, and saw the need to organise what had become by then quite a large collection. He did this under the direction of a professional archivist, Judith Smeaton, with help from Bidy Breen and Mary Hicks. Father Dominique Minskip, who took over as Archivist in 1993, continued to gather material from parishes and added many of his own books to an ever-growing library of Catholic history. I was appointed Diocesan Archivist in September 2000 and Father Minskip has since continued to play a very active role.

³ I am indebted to Monsignor Raymond Charlton for most of the information in this section.

PREMISES

The need for larger premises for the Curial Offices necessitated them moving firstly to Grange Road in Middlesbrough and secondly to their present location in The Avenue, Middlesbrough. The Diocesan Archives have moved along with the Curial Offices, and now occupy one ground floor room approximately 16 feet by 12 feet. The majority of our holdings are stored there in archival quality boxes inside steel stationery cabinets.

Visitors are welcome, by prior appointment, but because of severely limited space in the archive room, they have to be accommodated in a conference room on the opposite side of the corridor, or if that is in use in the corridor itself. Photocopying facilities are available, for which a small charge is made.

CONTENTS OF THE ARCHIVE AND CATALOGUE

Items have been classified using the following ten headings:

1. Diocese (including bishops)
2. Hierarchy of England & Wales
3. Individuals and Families
4. Miscellaneous
5. Organisations (non-diocesan)
6. Parishes
7. Religious Orders
8. Schools
9. Seminaries
10. Vatican & Papal Nuncio

Using Microsoft Access, a relational database has been constructed to catalogue the content of the Archives. The structure of this database is hierarchical:

FONDS ? SUB-FONDS ? ITEMS

For example: 'Parishes' is a fond, within which 'Ugthorpe, St Anne's' is a sub-fond, within which 'Burial Register, 1880-1896' is an item. The database can be searched on a number of fields (e.g. sub-fond, box number, date, key word of description) and is also used to produce printed reports, notably a complete catalogue of the Archives which constitutes our main finding aid.

PARISH SURVEY

A large majority of our holdings are from parishes and in 2003 we began a survey of material still in the parishes themselves. Bishop John Crowley gave advance notice of this in an Ad Clerum and a booklet was prepared to facilitate information-gathering, with spaces to enter items under the following headings:

Sacramental Registers

Indexes to Registers

Lists of Easter/First Communicants

Visitation Books/Forms

Certificates (e.g. of consecration of church)

Mass Intention Registers

Notice Books/Newsletters

Parish Magazines

Sick Call Books

Parish Census Books

Diaries/Notebooks

Documents relating to Buildings (e.g. plans, condition surveys, deeds)

Documents relating to Land (including cemeteries)

Map of Parish Boundaries

Financial Records

Records of Societies/Sodalities

Parish History (published/MS notes, press clippings, photographs)

Artefacts

For cases where there was, or had been, a parish school provision was also made to enter details of any:

Log Books

Admission Registers

Sacramental Registers (e.g. First Confession/Communion)

Managers' Letter Books

Minutes of Managers/Governors

Photographs

At the time of writing about three-quarters of our parishes have been surveyed in this way. All the information obtained has been entered into our catalogue database (each item from the survey has been given a box number of 'Par' to indicate it is in the relevant Parish Archive rather than in the Diocesan Archives).

Whilst this exercise has been a major undertaking, it has been very worthwhile: not only have we acquired a vast amount of information about archival material spread around the diocese but also a significant quantity of material has been deposited centrally, some of which may well otherwise have been lost. The other advantage has been the raising of awareness in the minds of parish priests both of the need to preserve archival material and of the existence of the Diocesan Archives to help them do this.

PUBLICATIONS

In 2003 we began a series of *Occasional Publications*⁵ each drawing mainly on materials in the Diocesan Archives. Martin Craven, a frequent visitor to the Archives, has published an extensive history of Catholics in the Holderness area of East Yorkshire. The same author has in the process of publication a history of the Mission at Market Weighton which includes much material on the Landdale family.

⁵ No. 1 J. D. Smallwood, The 1858 Diary of Fr James Hostage at Egton Bridge, 2003; No. 2 D. Minskip, A New History of St Williarn's Mission, York, 2003; No.3 D. Minskip, The Bedale RC Mission, 2004.

A DAY IN THE LIFE...

At the moment I am going into the Archives on one day a week which, because of family reasons, cannot always be the same day - hence the need for prior appointments. Typically about half this day is spent in answering queries whether by letter, by telephone recorded messages, or by e-mail. These queries cover a wide range of topics: the diocesan newspaper may want a photograph for a forthcoming edition; someone compiling a potted parish history for an anniversary may want relevant information; baptismal certificates for the purpose of marriage may be required; professional historians may ask what material we have on a specific topic; and of course (dare I mention them!) family historians seek information on their forebears.

Regarding the latter, some dioceses have elected to deposit their older sacramental registers in local record offices and thereby washed their hands of them. Our policy is to retain all registers. At the discretion of the parish priest some of these are still kept in parishes but many have been deposited in the Diocesan Archives. For obvious reasons I would prefer family historians to visit the Archives and carry out their own searches, but where this is not possible I am prepared to do some limited searching of registers myself. A fee of £10 per hour (or part thereof) is charged for this and in my experience most such searches can be completed within the hour. I confine searches to looking for named individuals in named parishes over defined date ranges, and would decline doing general trawls for a surname over many registers over many years. I also confine my replies to giving transcripts (in English) of any relevant entries found and leave the enquirer to construct family trees for themselves.

Once correspondence is dealt with I spend the rest of the day on routine activities such as entering new material into both the accessions register and the catalogue database and also cataloguing existing materials (some of our school boxes are at present only catalogued to the bundle level). If any time is left there is always work to be done on one of several current projects: e.g. indexing baptismal registers and writing the next Occasional Publication.

RAISON D'ETRE

Writing this article has prompted me to ponder the reasons for having a diocesan archive in the first place. Clearly, as with any archive, it has an information service to provide whether this be for professional academic, amateur local, or family historians. If this was our only function we could, and probably should, hand over all our holdings to the local record office. What makes us distinctive, however, is that our archives record religious history and thereby have a pastoral role. As Pope Paul VI put it:

It is Christ who operates in time and who writes, He Himself, His story through our papers which are echoes and traces of this passage of the Church, of the passage of the Lord Jesus, in the world.⁶

The Religious Archives Institute at the Catholic University of America

Maria Mazzenga

Every other year an assortment of individuals from across the United States converge upon the Catholic University of America for the Religious Archives Institute, a rigorous two-week course designed to prepare participants for work with Catholic records, manuscripts, and objects. Whether from Bronx, New York, or Butte, Montana (both represented in our last Institute), participants arrive eager to learn how to work with religious archives. Some are priests and nuns, others are non-religious, most, however, come from diocesan and religious order archives. Many Institute participants already possess archival training and come to learn more about working with Catholic records. Others have been placed in charge of their order's archives because of a love of history or excellent organizational skills, yet have very little experience or formal training in archival work. All leave with the latest in archival theory and practice from national experts in the field, often with the added bonus of having traded ideas and stories unique to individuals labouring in a Catholic archival environment.

The first Religious Archives Institute took place in the Summer of 1997 under its current director, Dr. Timothy Meagher, Archivist and Museum Curator at the American Catholic History Research Center and University Archives at the Catholic University of America. Due to the success of the core programme, the content and faculty have remained remarkably consistent since its inception. Beginning with fundamentals of archival practice, the course's subject matter becomes more specifically focused as the two weeks progress. As one of this year's participants noted, the content organization 'helped build knowledge progressively.' Accordingly, week one saw Dr. Philip B. Eppard, Professor of Information Science and Policy at the State University of New York at Albany, begin with a discussion of archival history, move into a focus on types of archives, their arrangement and description, archive reference services, and conclude with a look at archival ethical and management issues.

Students usually take advantage of the free time on Saturday and Sunday between the Institute's two weeks to see the Washington D.C. sites and to rest. Week two began with a lively presentation by Jac Treanor, Vice Chancellor and Archivist with the Archdiocese of Chicago in Illinois. Mr. Treanor draws from his extensive knowledge of diocesan and religious order archives in a two-day, state-of-the-art presentation on records management. Participants find his wide-ranging knowledge of both diocesan and religious order archives particularly relevant and useful.

The focus of the final classroom presentations always please Institute participants because of both their practicality and their participatory nature. Archivists of religious orders often feel overwhelmed by the prospect of processing photographs and objects. Sarah Dashiell Rouse, a specialist in photograph management and preservation at the Library of Congress, draws from a fascinating collection of photographs from the nineteenth century to the present, to discuss image formats, storage and preservation, and cataloguing. As one participant put it, Ms. Rouse's presentation 'made the whole processing of photos seem a little more manageable.' Similarly, many of our participants are uncertain as to the historical value of certain objects in their collections. Melissa McCloud and Joan Hoge, both experts in preservation and management of historical objects at local museums, draw from the Catholic University Archives museum collection in a guided session in cataloguing. Participants usually leave this presentation with a more sophisticated sense of the value of their own collections: as one student noted, 'they sold me on the value of keeping and using objects... I enjoyed their enthusiasm and practical suggestions and the 'hands-on' work in groups followed by critique.'

Finally, the Washington area is replete with history, and field trips were organized by the staff for Institute participants to make the most of our historically exciting setting. One afternoon-long, archive-oriented field trip is planned for each week. This year, participants were bussed to the Library of Congress (a short half-hour drive from the university) for tours of the library's Prints & Photographs and Manuscripts collections. Particularly delightful for this year's participants was the viewing of the original United States Thirteenth Amendment abolishing slavery and a sixteenth-century Albrecht Durer print. During week two, students travelled to Baltimore, Maryland, for a presentation by Tricia Pyne, Archivist of St. Mary's Seminary and University Archives at that institution. The St. Mary's visit was followed by a tour and dinner at the Shrine of Divine Mercy, a historic Polish ethnic church, in the city of Baltimore. The trips enabled participants a glimpse of archival practice in action while expanding appreciation for local and national history.

The Institute is held every other year, and is scheduled to take place again in 2007. This year's Institute tuition was $1300 for the non-credit course and $1875 for academic credit. Participants usually stay on campus, where a selection of housing and meal plans are available. For more information on the Institute and other archival programmes at the American Catholic History Research Center and University Archives at Catholic University, visit the Archives website at: <http://libraries.cua.edu/achrcua/events.html> or e-mail either Maria Mazzenga at mazzenga@cua.edu or, alternatively, Jane Stoeffler at Stoeffler@cua.edu.

RELIGIOUS ARCHIVES INSTITUTE SYLLABUS

11-22 July 2005 at the American Catholic History Research Center and University Archives Catholic University Washington, D.C.

The Religious Archives Institute is a two-week intensive course designed to prepare students for work with religious records, manuscripts, and objects. The course material is presented by historians, archivists, librarians, and museum curators, and participants will visit local archives and tour the Library of Congress toward gaining knowledge of varieties of archival management and operations.

ARCHIVES IN THE FIELD: A SPANISH ADVENTURE

Sister Dominic Savio Hamer C.P.

From 24 October 2005, as already reported in detail in the CAS Bulletin, a group of the Catholic Archives Society had a wonderful week in Valladolid, investigating ecclesiastical and civil archives in that area of Spain. It was a bright, clear day on 31 October as most of the group prepared to leave the English College either for England or other destinations in Spain. I, however, had other plans: I was setting out on a Spanish Adventure to investigate archives literally in the fields. My fieldwork was based on a desire to solve a mystery on behalf of our Province and Congregation: the mystery of where exactly we, as Sisters of the Cross and Passion, had had a foundation in Spain from 1925 to 1927.

Before I had left home, I had put together the pieces of the jigsaw puzzle which I had found in various community annals and other documents and so I had the following pointers. Our convent had been in a village called Noja, which was somewhere near Santander. Three Sisters had sailed on 17 September 1925 from Liverpool to Santander on the Orita which seems to have been on its way to Chile and was therefore probably a large ship. The Sisters had arrived in Santander on 20 September and had been taken to the nearby Passionist monastery for a meal. They had stayed in Santander that night, had had Mass the next morning in the Passionist church and breakfast in the monastery parlour, where, like some of us in Valladolid who were in Spain for the first time, they had had the novelty, to quote the annalist, of 'coffee in bowls and large hunks of bread'. During that morning they had been taken sightseeing along the sea front to El Sardinero, 'passing through gardens with many stately palms and beds of flowers, a riot of gorgeous colours, where seats were placed in the most convenient corners and spots, overlooking a sea of emerald flecked with tiny white waves.' They had also visited the British Consul, then the Cathedral and the house of the Bishop of Santander.

In the afternoon they had travelled one-and-a-half hours by train as far as Gama and then by private car to Noja. The station in Santander was made up of huts, and as for the train: 'How strange to British eyes', recorded the annalist, 'was that train with its leisurely puff-puff as it made its way through the streets of Santander to the outskirts. People walked along the line and even crossed in front of the engine. Truly, it was a hundred years ago!' The countryside reminded the Sisters of parts of Ireland, Wales and Scotland. As they arrived in the village, knots of people waited and as the Sisters passed they cheered and waved their handkerchiefs and then ran behind the cars. The Civil Guard had erected two triumphal arches in flowers: 'Welcome to Noja' on the first and on the second the Passionist sign. The road was lined with men, women and children and the church bell was ringing. The Sisters were then led to their large house, in which they were going to provide a school, completely free of charge, for forty children of poor families.

On 20 October two other, Spanish-speaking, Sisters had arrived from Chile. Other places mentioned in the records were Isla, Beranga, Escalante and Santona. During their two years in Noja, until 1927, the Sisters had generally had a convent chaplain, appointed by the bishop, but during a period of illness suffered by the priest they had attended daily Mass in the village church, which the Passionist Chronicle for September 1925 described as 'majestic'. According to the same Chronicle, Noja was on the coast of Cantabria with a view of the mountains, had a thousand inhabitants, was noted for its beautiful gardens and had a beach that was very popular amongst the people of the Province. According to the annalist, the shore was only a short distance from the convent, so near, in fact, that when some visitors went down to the beach, the maid carried down their tea on a tray. Finally, in September 1926 two of the Sisters had gone to a place called 'Las Caldas' for a week.

With that information, two maps, a phrase-book, a railway timetable, some trepidation I must admit, and the assistance of Father Stewart Foster, I took a taxi from the English College to the railway station and at 9.30 a.m. I set out by train from Valladolid to Santander. It was only later that I discovered that that was a distance of 151.4 miles! Since I had to return to Valladolid that same day, I was planning to find a taxi immediately on arrival in Santander, go to Noja, return by the same taxi and explore Santander. The train was running on time until it began to make unscheduled stops. As a result, instead of arriving in Santander at 1.30, a four-hour journey, it arrived after 2 p.m. My return train, however, was at 4.45 p.m., so that instead of having three hours to get to Noja and back, I found I had less than two-and-a-half. Then I had to wait about another twenty minutes for a taxi, praying to our Sisters who had lived in Noja to send me the right driver who would be willing to take me and bring me back and would be safe; and then we had to crawl through very busy traffic, especially along the street where, I knew, the Passionist monastery was situated.

When we escaped from the city, however, we went onto a motorway and the driver speedily made up for lost time! It was about 25 miles from Santander to Noja. As we drove along I began to recognise the place-names I was looking for: Escalante, Beranga, Isla and finally Noja. The hilly scenery was wonderful under the blue sky. As we approached Noja, I managed to tell the driver in Spanish that I needed photographs of the church, the beach and a house with a school beside it, because I was fairly sure they would have kept our school there. We saw the church bell-tower first. As we followed the road to it, there, directly opposite, was a large house in its own grounds; and there, twenty yards in front of us, was a beautiful green sea and beach! That house just had to be our convent. There was no school beside it, because, as I remembered later, the school we had had was inside the house. The larger one we had planned to build had never materialised. The church in Noja was closed as it was siesta time, and in any case I had to take my photos from inside the car as the driver could not stop in that particular area and I did not dare to get out in case he left me behind! But it made all the difference in the world to have seen these places and in such glorious sunshine.

We returned to Santander at the same speed. There was the ferry landing-stage, with a ship in, and on the street opposite was a café with a picture on the door of the old railway station, which was burnt down in 1941. I walked along the sea front towards El Sardinero, 'passing through gardens', not perhaps at the end of October 'with many stately palms and beds of flowers, a riot of gorgeous colours', but seats 'were placed in the most convenient corners and spots, overlooking a sea of emerald flecked with tiny white waves.' Then I visited the Cathedral and saw the house of the Bishop of Santander. It was then 4.30 p.m. I dashed back to the station, bought a bottle of water and a roll and jumped onto the train, with five minutes to spare!

My fieldwork was still not finished, however. On the way north, I had caught a fleeting glimpse of a station called 'Las Caldas'. That was one of the places I was looking for. When I did not find the name again near Noja, I knew that it must have been the Las Caldas I had seen in the mountains south of Santander. I wondered if the two Sisters had been there on holiday. On the return journey, when I was looking out for it very carefully, I discovered it was a spa with hot springs that cured rheumatism etc. Evidently, at least one of them suffered from rheumatism and had gone there for a cure! I was very happy as I finally arrived back safely in the warmth and kind hospitality of the English College in Valladolid. Perhaps, if Ryanair continue to provide cheap flights, I shall return to Santander and Noja at a more leisurely pace!

BOOK REVIEWS

S.Gilley (edit.), Victorian Churches and Churchmen: Essays Presented to Vincent Alan McClelland (Woodbridge: Boydell Press, for The Catholic Record Society, 2005, pp. xvii + 387). The editor of this volume, Sheridan Gilley, introduces each of the sixteen contributors to Professor McClelland's festschrift. This is what he writes about the late Robin Gard's chapter, entitled 'The Cardinal and the Penitent: Cardinal Manning and Virginia Crawford': 'In a model piece of editing by Robin Gard, Manning's tenderness and humour with his female penitents also appear in the diary of his penitent Mrs Crawford, the survivor of the spectacular divorce trial involving Sir Charles Dilke, and a Catholic convert, a writer and life-long social worker among the poor.' The essay, which deals with a person for whose memory its author had a great affection and respect, serves as a fitting memorial to Robin as well as honouring the recipient of the volume, Alan McClelland, who is also a member of the Catholic Archives Society.

F.Dobson, The Life and Times of George Silvertop of Minsteracres (Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Browne Burton, 2004, pp.311). Written to celebrate the 150th anniversary of St Elizabeth's church, Minsteracres, Frank Dobson's account of the late eighteenth- / early nineteenth-century squire blends the rich history of Catholicism in North East England with the wider issues of Emancipation and the position of Catholics in English society. It is gratifying to see in the footnotes references to the Minsteracres Papers kept at the Northumberland County Record Office – itself another lasting reminder of the work of Robin Gard.

M.Trott, The Life of Richard Waldo Sibthorp: Evangelical, Catholic and Ritual Revivalism in the Nineteenth-Century Church (Brighton/Portland: Sussex Academic Press, 2005, pp. xii + 250). The controversial, not to say enigmatic, career of Richard Sibthorp is the subject of a carefully-researched book written by one of Professor McClelland's doctoral students. Michael Trott pays particular tribute not only to his academic mentor, but to the descendants of Sibthorp, who permitted him access to a large collection of papers in the custody of the family. Other MS sources consulted include: the Lincoln Archives; Magdalen College, Keble College, the Bodleian Library and Pusey House, Oxford; the British Library [Gladstone Papers]; Cornwall Record Office; Birmingham University [Church Missionary Society]; Cambridge University [British and Foreign Bible Society]; and the School of Oriental and African Studies, London University [Religious Tract Society].

N.M. de Flon, Edward Caswall: Newman's Brother and Friend (Leominster: Gracewing, 2005, pp. xii + 226). This biography of the satirist, humourist, hymnologist and fellow Tractarian convert and Oratorian of Cardinal Newman, offers a fascinating insight into the life of an important figure in the history of Victorian Catholicism. The late Gerard Tracey, Archivist at the Birmingham Oratory, whose knowledge of Newman and all things connected with him was legendary, is recognised for the pivotal part he played in encouraging Nancy de Flon in compiling this study. Other archival collections consulted by the author include Brasenose College and the Wiltshire Record Office.

P.Shrimpton, A Catholic Eton?: Newman's Oratory School (Leominster: Gracewing, 2005, pp.xvii + 308). One of the more controversial aspects of the apostolate of the Birmingham Oratory was the foundation and conduct of what became effectively a Catholic public school. As one would expect, the author, Paul Shrimpton, in tracing the development of Newman's educational project, has made extensive use of archival material. In addition to the two obvious sources, viz. the Birmingham Oratory Archives and the archives of the Oratory School itself, collections have been consulted at the following places: Ampleforth Abbey [Grissell Papers]; Duke of Norfolk's Archives, Arundel Castle; Cambridge University [Acton Papers]; National Library of Scotland [Hope-Scott Papers].

J.Furnival, Children of the Second Spring: Father James Nugent and the Work of Child Care in Liverpool (Leominster: Gracewing, 2005, pp. 346). Monsignor John Furnival has written this study of the founder of Catholic childcare in Liverpool as a labour of love. Archivaly, he has cast his net wide: The Nugent Care Society's own records; The Poor Servants of the Mother of God, Brentford; Ushaw College; Venerable English College, Rome; Liverpool Archdiocese; City of Liverpool; Mount St Bernard Abbey, Coalville. The author has pieced together the remarkable story of a true pioneer in his field.

P.Doyle, Mitres & Missions in Lancashire: The Roman Catholic Diocese of Liverpool 1850-2000 (Liverpool: Bluecoat Press, 2005, pp. 407). This long-awaited and scholarly presentation of 150 years of Catholicism in Liverpool and its hinterland draws upon a wealth of archival sources: Liverpool Archdiocese (including material deposited in the Lancashire Record Office); Westminster Archdiocese; Birmingham Oratory; Propaganda Fide; London Province of the Redemptorists. Beautifully produced and very well illustrated, Dr Peter Doyle's book, in twenty thematically and chronologically constructed chapters, tells the story of the proud tradition of Catholic life, not only in the great port itself but also in the surrounding towns and countryside of Lancashire. Dr Meg Whittle, Archivist of the Liverpool Archdiocese, is given a special mention for her assistance to the author, and likewise a number of other members of the Catholic Archives Society: Sister St Mildred (Daughters of Wisdom); Sister Maire Powell (Sisters of the Sacred Heart of Mary); Sister Mary Campion McCarren (Faithful Companions of Jesus); Paul Shaw (Poor Servants of the Mother Of God); and Father Ian Dickie (Westminster).

A.Howard, Basil Hume: The Monk Cardinal (London: Headline, 2005, pp.342). This book received a great deal of attention in the media when first published. Anthony Howard has drawn upon a great many sources, both verbal and written, to offer a biographical study of Britain's most prominent Catholic leader of the second half of the twentieth century. Of the diocesan material used by the author in research for the book, he consulted the late cardinal's papers still retained at Archbishop's House, as well as the vast collection of Humeana in the Westminster Diocesan Archives. Howard acknowledges the special part played by Father Ian Dickie, Diocesan Archivist of Westminster until Easter 2005, describing him as '...a tower of strength throughout. The ready access that he granted me to the 600 boxes covering Basil Hume's archiepiscopal career... greatly speeded up the progress that I was able to make.'

R.Finnigan & J.Hagerty (eds.), The Bishops of Leeds 1878-1985: Essays in Honour of Bishop David Konstant (Keighley: PBK Publishing, 2005, pp.182). The authors, both of the Leeds Diocesan Archives, are to be congratulated on this timely and most professionally produced tribute to the Bishop Emeritus of Leeds. From an archival point of view the most obvious attraction of the book is the extensive use it makes of the Leeds Diocesan Archives, not least the photographic collection. After an appreciation and short biography of Bishop Konstant, seven further chapters chronicle the history of the Diocese of Beverley and (from 1878) the Diocese of Leeds under the various episcopates.

B.Taylor & Contributors, The Catholics of Sutton Park (Guildford: St Thomas' Trust, 2005, pp.viii + 191). Father Brian Taylor and a team of contributors have produced an attractive, well-illustrated and meticulously researched account of the only Catholic community in Surrey that claims continuity from the medieval and post-Reformation eras. The present church, dedicated to St Edward, was opened in 1876. One of its incumbents was Father (later Cardinal) Arthur Hinsley, who served at Sutton Park from 1905 to 1911 while teaching at St John's Seminary, Womersley. The book covers every aspect of the history of the mission, its clergy, buildings, architect (Charles Alban Buckler), and school. Good use has been made of the Southwark Archdiocesan and Arundel & Brighton Diocesan Archives, as well as material preserved at Sutton Park itself.

J.Bogle, The Church in Nightingale Square: A History of Holy Ghost R[oman] C[atholic] Church, Balham (Leominster: Gracewing, 2005, pp.63). Designed by the Catholic architect Leonard Stokes and opened in 1897, Holy Ghost church, Balham, is today the centre of one of the most thriving parishes in the South London area of the Archdiocese of Southwark. Joanna Bogle's succinct history of the church and parish, complete with twenty illustrations, follows her previous account of a neighbouring community, St Bede's, Clapham Park. Once again she has made profitable use of both parish and diocesan archival material.

A.V.Kiran, Information Management of Church Archives in India (Chennai [Madras]: Department of Library and Information Science, University of Madras, 2003, pp. x + 260). Father Vijay Kiran has been in charge of the Chennai (formerly Madras) Archdiocesan Archives for more than a decade. This book, presented to the reviewer by the author when visiting England, is a very useful compendium of how to integrate ecclesiastical archives into a modern system of information technology, keeping the integrity of the former while utilizing the very best in IT know-how and computer software. Included in the book is a very helpful list of archival websites throughout the world, including www.catholic-history.org.uk, the CAS' own shared site.

The Catholic Archives Society Conference, 2005

The Catholic Archives Society held its Annual Conference from 23 to 25 May 2005 at All Hallows Conference Centre, St Gabriel's [Anglican] Convent, Ditchingham, near Bungay, Suffolk – although the Centre itself is just in Norfolk. It was the second time that the Society had visited Ditchingham, which, although by no means the easiest spot to reach via public transport, made up with hospitality what it may lack in accessibility!

The first speaker, on the Monday afternoon, was Dr John Alban of the Norfolk Record Office, who gave a most stimulating illustrated account of the destruction by fire (and water damage) of the former County Record Office in Norwich and the remarkable and very successful efforts to rescue its archival treasures. He also gave us a preview of the current Norfolk Record Office, a recently-constructed state-of-the-art building attached to County Hall on the outskirts of the city which we were to visit the following afternoon. The Bishop of East Anglia, Rt. Rev. Michael Evans, joined us for supper and stayed for the evening session. This was led by our Chairman, Dr Graham Foster, who embarked upon a fascinating archival trail searching for clues into the life and work of Bishop Bagshawe of Nottingham, the subject of his doctoral research.

On Tuesday morning Sister M. Cabrini Delahunty RSM, Archivist of the Diocese of Cloyne, gave an illustrated talk on her work. Although she was reluctant to acknowledge it, her largely single-handed achievement, especially in the field of cataloguing, has been outstanding. In the second paper we heard Deidre Sharp of the Norfolk Record Office speaking on Freedom of Information, a most topical subject, but together with the allied theme of Data Protection, one that taxes many an archivist, ecclesiastical or otherwise. In the afternoon a most rewarding visit was made to the new Record Office in Norwich.

Two open forum sessions were held, one on Tuesday evening and the second on Wednesday morning. As usual, these events proved to be very valuable opportunities for the exchange of information and the discussion of topics of common interest and concern. Special tribute was paid to the late Robin Gard at these sessions and also at the Annual General Meeting, which concluded proceedings on Wednesday morning prior to Mass, lunch and departures. The 2006 Conference will be held at Ushaw College, Co. Durham, from 22-24 May.

EDITORIAL NOTES

The 2007 issue of the journal looks to the future by publishing the latest Circular Letter of the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church, the first part of Sarah Jane Stanton's recent thesis on access to Catholic Archives in England and Wales, and Andrew Nicoll's analysis of the challenges faced by the Scottish Catholic Archives as the twenty-first century gathers pace. Edward Walsh then offers a fascinating account of one of the more remote archival collections in the Catholic orbit, that of the Falkland Islands, Victoria Perry presents a most professional report on the Archives of the Sisters of Our Lady of Charity of Refuge in Ireland, and Sister Mary Cecily Boulding's note on the Archives of the Dominican Sisters (Stone Congregation) whets the appetite for a much fuller account of their holdings. Finally, from the North of England come contributions by John Davies on the Derby Collection in the Liverpool Record Office, and Father Nicholas Paxton, who sheds light on the papers of Bishop Bilsborrow, the third Bishop of Salford.

One of the strengths of this journal is that it receives material for publication not only from those who are already members of the Catholic Archives Society, but also from archivists and historians who have come into contact with the collections of Catholic institutions in other ways. Both categories of contributors are much appreciated, and the Editor is again grateful to all who have supplied articles for Catholic Archives. Nevertheless, the principal responsibility for the future of the journal must still rest with the willingness of the Society's existing members to share their expertise in the public forum. Experience shows that the appearance of an article in Catholic Archives, as well as acting as a stimulus to those who are beginning the archival adventure, also encourages new members to join the Society.

Last year we paid tribute to Robin Gard. In September 2006 I concelebrated at the Requiem Mass of Father Francis Edwards S.J. at Farm Street. A distinguished and widely published historian, especially of the Elizabethan and Jacobean periods, he had served as Provincial and General Archivist for the Society of Jesus and was a past Chairman of the Catholic Archives Society (1983-1986). In February 2007, as I write these notes, I have just returned from Plymouth Cathedral where several members of the Society attended the Requiem Mass of Canon Christopher Smith, another former Chairman (1998-2001) and until his death Editor of the CAS Directory. Both Francis and Chris were great servants of the Society, and will be missed. Requiescant in pace.

CIRCULAR LETTER OF THE PONTIFICAL COMMISSION FOR THE CULTURAL HERITAGE OF THE CHURCH N. 14/06/4

INVENTORY OF THE INSTITUTES OF CONSECRATED LIFE AND THE SOCIETIES OF APOSTOLIC LIFE: CULTURAL PATRIMONY – SOME PRACTICAL ORIENTATIONS

Reverend Father/Brother/Mother General,

It is a well established fact that the goods of cultural value in the care of Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life constitute a significant share of the remarkable historical and artistic patrimony of the Church. They encompass 'first of all, the artistic wealth of painting, sculpture, architecture, mosaic and music, placed at the service of the Church's mission. To these we should then add the wealth of books contained in ecclesiastical libraries and the historical documents preserved in the archives of ecclesiastical communities. Finally, this concept covers the literary, theatrical and cinematographic works produced by the mass media' (Pope John Paul II, Address to members of the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Patrimony of the Church, 12 October 1995, no. 3: L' Osservatore Romano, Weekly Edition in English, 25 October 1995, p. 5).

From the beginning of its foundation, this Pontifical Commission has made every effort to instill among the Institutes and Societies a sense of responsibility and vigilant attention to their own historical and artistic patrimony; in particular by way of the Circular Letter The Cultural Heritage of the Church and Religious Families (10 April 1994). In that letter and in other documents the inventory of goods of cultural value has been singled out as being primary and essential in assisting the work of judicial guardianship, of protection against the crimes of theft, alienation, or expropriation, of maintenance of cultural items and also for ecclesial improvement. Such an inventory was also the object of a previous document of the Pontifical Commission, The Inventory and Catalogue of the Cultural Heritage of the Church: A Necessary and Urgent Task (8 December 1999), which while being addressed to diocesan ordinaries, is also valid for religious.

However, notwithstanding the positive response and collaboration on the part of various Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life -some of whom have developed thorough internal provisions - many others have not yet been able to take the task in hand because of the lack of suitable personnel and funds intended for this purpose.

The risk that arises from such a situation is easy to imagine. If one considers, among other things, the more frequent closure of religious houses, a dilemma occurs regarding the destination not only of works of art and liturgical furnishings, but of whole libraries and archives. In more than a few cases, this situation is resolved via an irretrievable diffusion of these goods of cultural value on the antiques market, which causes great harm to the patrimony of the Church and is in direct violation of both canonical and civil regulations.

It is hoped, therefore, that with a sense of responsibility, Major Superiors will in a timely manner take the necessary steps to arrange for an inventory of archival items, libraries and works of art in their possession, located either at the mother house or in regional houses. Particular attention should be given to goods of cultural value from suppressed religious houses. The importance of such an inventory is highlighted in canon 1283,2° of the Code of Canon Law and canon 1025 of the Code of Canon Law of the Eastern Churches.

For religious communities with their Generalate in Rome or elsewhere in Italy, it is necessary to follow the directions given by the Italian Episcopal Conference (CEI). So as to facilitate communication between these two groups, before writing this letter this Pontifical Commission consulted the CEI, which in collaboration with the Istituto Centrale per il Catalogo e la Documentazione (ICCD) initiated, some years ago, a programme of inventory for ecclesiastical furnishings of artistic and historical value.

With reference to the protection of sacred art, the participation of religious superiors is expected according to the 1974 norms Tutela e Conservazione del Patrimonio Storico-Artistico della Chiesa in Italia (cf. no. 6) (Enchiridion della Conferenza Episcopale Italiana, II, Bologna 1985, pp. 448-460). This is outlined further in the agreement between the Minister for Goods and Activities of Cultural Value and the President of the CEI (18 April 2000) which pertains to the conservation and consultation of the archives of historical interest and libraries of ecclesiastical agencies and institutions. Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life are included in this agreement (Intesa fra il Ministero per i Beni e le Attività Culturali e il Presidente della CEI, 18 aprile 2000: Enchiridion della Conferenza Episcopale Italiana, VI, Bologna 2002, pp. 1419-1441).

Therefore, on the basis of these directions, the CEI guarantees that the computer software prepared by the offices and services of its General Secretary for the purposes of the inventory of ecclesiastical goods of cultural value is freely at the disposal of those Institutes and Societies who request it.

Together with the inventory software for historical and artistic goods and archives, the Ufficio Nazionale Beni Culturali Ecclesiastici (National Office for Ecclesiastical Goods of Cultural Value), where possible, would like to offer the above-mentioned Institutes and Societies formation of personnel, technical assistance and the possibility of a continuing renewal by way of the Forum sui Beni Culturali Ecclesiastici. Moreover, a programme relating to ecclesiastical libraries is already available on the Ufficio Nazionale Beni Culturali Ecclesiastici website.

Economic provisions are made under the terms of Article 1, § 3 (c) of the Disposizioni Concernenti la Concessione di Contributi Finanziari della CEI per i Beni Culturali Ecclesiastici and Article 1, § 2 of the executive Regolamento (Notiziario della CEI 9/2003, pp. 279-295). Civilly-recognized Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life are able to allocate donations for the conservation and consultation of General and Provincial archives as well as libraries of particular importance that are open to the public. Regarding requests for grants, applications must be made by the Major Superior to the ordinary of the diocese in whose territory the religious house is located.

The General Secretaries of the CEI and the Ufficio Nazionale per i Beni Culturali Ecclesiastici are available to the above-mentioned Institutes and Societies which may require assistance. For more detailed information contact the Centro Servizi Progetti Informatici dell'Ufficio Nazionale per i Beni Culturali Ecclesiastici of the CEI on (green number) 848.580.167 (Dr Francesca M. D'Agnelli). The principal contact person is Rev. Don Stefano Russo, Via Aurelia 468, 00165 Roma, Italy (e-mail: unbc@chiesacattolica.it).

In the event that the Generalate is not located in Italy, but is connected to Italy by way of Provinces or recognized houses, the CEI also offers Institutes and Societies access to computer software. As a rule, it is appropriate to adopt the system of inventory in use in the country in which the Generalate is located or in which the Institute has a major presence. Taking into consideration, however, that not all countries have an available system of inventory, particularly with reference to computer technology, it would be preferable to use those which have reliable and trusted systems.

Finally, in the case of insufficient domestic funds or the impossibility of civil grants, it is recommended to apply to international corporations or foundations for economic assistance.

Thank you for all your work in protecting the historical and artistic patrimony of your Institute and for taking into consideration the recommendations made in this letter.

Reassuring you of the availability of this Pontifical Commission in the event that assistance or clarification is needed, I remain

Sincerely yours in Christ,

+ Mauro Piacenza, President

Sarah Jane Stanton

Introduction

Access is a hot topic in the world of archives. It has become so for two key reasons: the number of people wanting or gaining access to archives and the changing nature of the material which they desire to consult. The number of people using archives has increased significantly in the last twenty years and Helen Forde cites the popular interest in archives, including family history, and technological advances as two of the facilitators of change.¹ It is no longer just scholars who want access to information and it is becoming increasingly easy for the general public to gain this access. The popularity of social history and the interest in more recent history means that people now want to study records concerning ordinary citizens, who may still be alive. In juxtaposition to this, however, there is a growing awareness that the right to privacy needs to be reasserted in this information and communications technological age. This article will address the particular relevance of the changing expectations of access for the Catholic archival community.

The International Council on Archives' Dictionary of Archival Terminology defines access as 'the availability of records/archives for consultation as a result of both legal authorisation and the existence of finding aids'.² The question of accessibility is both intellectual and practical. The intellectual aspect of access addresses who is allowed access to what material - or, discrimination between users and the availability of records - and is grounded in attitudes and opinions. This will be addressed in Section 1:2 below, which discusses whether access is a right or a privilege, as well as the rôle of policies on access. The practical aspect of access relates to issues such as the location of the archive and its opening times: this is frequently influenced by the amount of resources which has been allocated to the archive. Section Two (to be published in Catholic Archives 28) will discuss some practical actions which could enable Catholic archives to accommodate more users. The most common groups of people who want to use Catholic archives are: academic scholars who desire to publish what they find; school children and students engaged in directed learning events; genealogists researching their family trees; and people with an interest in local history. In addition, those archives which have records of orphanages, hospitals and schools will receive enquiries from people wanting to learn about their own, or their family's, connection with the institution. It is evident that a wide range of people are affected by this important issue.

Currently, there is a small amount of legislation regarding the management of private archives in England and Wales. Archives are implicitly included as national heritage and there are provisions regarding grants and loans for purchase, export control and tax concessions.³ It is only since the end of the twentieth century that legislation has referred to access. Recently, two significant measures have been passed: the Data Protection Act (DP) of 1998 and the Freedom of Information Act (FOI) of 2000.⁴ With regard to this topic, Data Protection means that an individual is entitled to know what information is held about him or her and has the right to have it corrected, if wrong. In addition, this data must not be made available to those who do not have the right of access to it. Freedom of Information means that requests for information can be made to publicly-funded bodies. Previously, these records were only opened after a thirty-year closure period. The Act does not mean that sensitive or personal information will be generally available and a 'public interest test' will be applied before any information is released. This Act will have an impact on Catholic archives in two ways. Some Catholic institutions such as schools, hospitals and care homes receive, or have received, public money and therefore their records are legitimate subjects of requests for information. The Act is also likely to raise expectations of what materials should be available for consultation and so de facto reverberations will be felt in the private domain.

⁴ The Information Commissioner's website contains information about both acts at: <http://www.ico.gov.uk/> (accessed 25 July 2006).

Records have always been important to the Catholic Church. It is a belief system in which memory and tradition are very significant: 'Tradition was important to the structure of doctrine which fed men's faith. Tradition was continuity, and continuity was history.'⁵ Records of the work of evangelisation and other activities of the Church have been preserved since apostolic times.⁶ Pope Innocent III (1198-1216) was the first to organise the collection and preservation of Church records. Pope Paul V (1552-1621) officially divided the archives and library and from then on an independent central archive has existed in the Vatican.⁷ The rules governing Church archives are laid down in Canon Law. The 1983 Code describes how four different types of archive - diocesan, secret, parish and historical - are required. The specifications for the historical archive are basic, as they must be applicable to the whole Church:

Canon 491 §2 The diocesan bishop is to ensure that there is an historical archive in the diocese, and that the documents which have an historical value are carefully kept in it and systematically filed.

§3 In order that the acts and documents mentioned in §§1 and 2 may be inspected or removed, the norms laid down by the diocesan bishop are to be observed.⁸

It is, therefore, the responsibility of each bishop to set access regulations for the records of his diocese. There are no specific canons for the archives of religious communities, but good record-keeping practices are implicit in the requirement that the 'intention and wishes of founders about the nature, purpose, spirit and character of an institute, together with its healthy tradition... are to be faithfully observed by all.'⁹ The preservation and use of records within the Church has, therefore, a long-standing and well-regulated tradition.

⁹ P.Ingman, 'The New Code of Canon Law and Archives', Catholic Archives 5 (1985), p.55; cf. canon 578 in Sheehy et al. (eds.), op.cit., p.318.

This emphasis on the administrative use of records started to change from the mid-twentieth century onwards, as a new theology developed in the 1960s under the pontificate of Pope John XXIII, culminating in the Second Vatican Council. This called for the Church to be less distant and more practically active in daily life. More recently, in 1988, Pope John Paul II established the Pontifical Commission for the Conservation of the Historic and Artistic Heritage which was restructured in 1993 to become the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church. In 1997 this Commission issued an extremely significant Circular Letter, entitled The Pastoral Function of Church Archives, which aimed to increase awareness of the cultural and evangelical significance of archives.¹⁰ This document is particularly relevant to the current archival climate and although it is advisory, Robin Gard states that 'its inspiration is clearly pontifical and it will thus be received by its recipients and acted upon with due regard for its authority.'¹¹ Therefore, a much more recent trend has evolved, stressing the social rôle that Catholic archives have to play alongside their administrative one.

While tradition and therefore records are an integral part of Catholicism, the modern-day requirements of this fact are not always recognised within the Church: that records need to be preserved and made available and that these actions cost money. There has been external pressure on the Church in recent years, however, resulting in a growing awareness of these issues. Child abuse allegations mean that individuals, the police and courts of law are demanding access to Catholic archives. The Church has woken up to the important rôle of records management and, at times, a desire either to destroy records if they contain incriminating evidence, or to press for their preservation to facilitate the vindication of the Church from any wrongdoing. It is sad that it has required an issue such as this to force some in the Church to recognise the value and the power of records. Access to records as part of legal proceedings and abuse allegations is not an issue which this article can, or will, address directly. This is not to say, however, that archivists should not be involved in these issues. Bishops and religious superiors need to handle requests for access to these records with the utmost care.

Currently, there are many small Catholic archives throughout England and Wales. Each diocese has its own archive and many religious congregations and individual communities do too. In 1997 the Directory of Catholic Archives listed 134 in England and Wales.¹² It is very natural for institutions to desire to maintain their own records even when they no longer require them on a day-to-day basis. James Lambert sees religious bodies as 'long established and often tenacious practitioners' of what he has termed 'institutionality'.¹³ This analysis will discuss whether this arrangement maximises accessibility to Catholic archives. While important to the Church itself, the care of Catholic archives is also equally important to the archive community generally. When assessing policies and practices for any specific type of archive, it is important to consider how they affect the rest of the domain. Even if archives are privately and separately maintained, links should exist between different institutions promoting advice, encouragement and other networking projects. Margaret Harcourt Williams comments that 'the question of access to any private archives, not just those of the Catholic or other non-established Church, is one that the archive community as a whole needs to consider seriously'.¹⁴ Many of the issues that are current in the world of Catholic archives - the challenges of applying for funding for small archives and appropriate protection for sensitive records - are clearly not specific to this community alone.

The research for this article has relied upon professional literature which describes the policies and practices of archives in England and Wales. In the administration of the Catholic Church, the twenty-two dioceses of England and Wales are distinct, so this area forms a natural unit for discussion. Several Catholic archives were visited and other people who have an interest in these issues contacted, in order to collect information on the current situation in England and Wales.¹⁵ The article also makes reference to the Scottish Catholic Archives, as the arrangement in this country provides an interesting case-study. The evidence obtained is qualitative rather than quantitative, so it has not been possible to generate statistical conclusions. Catholic archives are extremely varied, even within England and Wales, and the diversity of experience of archives is evident throughout. Some archives are actively engaged with the local community, whereas other are struggling to arrange and describe their collections. Each archive is unique and therefore it would be inappropriate to draw direct comparisons between them. It is hoped that the comments made will be relevant to the majority of the Catholic archives in England and Wales.

The fact that this article has been adapted from a dissertation produced as part of a Master's Degree in Archives and Records Management means that theory and best practice are prominent at times. Nevertheless, it is hoped that the suggestions made are practicable rather than idealistic. One essential aim is to demonstrate how central access is, or should be, to all aspects of archive management. Access, it will be argued, should be an integral responsibility of custody.¹⁶ If an archive is facing challenges in any aspect of its administration, this will be reflected in its ability to welcome users. Several archives have been highlighted for praise. There are probably many more that are doing much good work, but there was insufficient time to investigate as many as desired. This analysis also contains some personal recommendations for improvement that are intended to stimulate discussion. Any criticisms made are not aimed at any particular archive, but are presented as points for consideration by the Catholic archival community in general. A specific aim has been to challenge and provoke a response. Access to archives is a very broad topic and it has not been possible to cover any specific area in great detail. In some respects, this analysis will raise more questions than it answers, but it is hoped that it will form a helpful contribution to an ongoing discussion, within both the Catholic Church and the archival community.

1 Policies on Access

1:1 The 'Secret' Archives

This section will address whether there is a right of access to Catholic archives and to whom, if anyone, this right extends. It will also ask whether the current policies for regulating use of Catholic archives are appropriate. Access is currently very prominent on the archive agenda and James O'Toole believes that 'the question of access to and use of diocesan records is asked more frequently than almost any other.'¹⁷ There is a defensive attitude from some quarters within the Catholic Church regarding access issues. Many Catholic archivists feel that it is important to stress that the records they look after are private and therefore that admission for external users is a privilege rather than a right. This indicates a concern in the world of Catholic archives, that the special requirements of their records are not always understood or appreciated. Attitudes about archives are changing and legislation, such as Data Protection and Freedom of Information, and growing expectations of users' rights have made this sensitive and difficult issue a hot topic. Paul Shaw states that 'there is much concern about requests for access to our archives' and David Sheehy believes that Church archivists find this a challenging area.¹⁸ This section will examine attitudes towards Catholic archives both from inside the Church and externally. While there is a lack of understanding about how the Church manages its records, there is limited appreciation among some Catholic archivists of what access needs to mean. The status of Catholic records needs to be analysed and appropriate policies devised to help administer the current situation.

A general right of access to certain types of records is now well acknowledged. A citizen's right to view the records of his or her government is seen as an essential tenet of a civilised democracy. David Sheehy describes how the 'right of access to information or to records is founded in the concept of natural law' and 'since the end of the eighteenth century the notion of a universal civic right of access to archives has been widely promulgated in Europe.'¹⁹ In our society, therefore, there is an accepted principle that people have a right of access to certain types of records and information. To counterbalance this freedom, however, we also recognise a fundamental right to privacy, acknowledged by the Human Rights Act of 1998.²⁰ In the terms of this simple dichotomy, the Catholic Church is not a public body, but a private one, and the records it creates are its own private property.

Catholic archives have a reputation of being inaccessible and closed. While this is not entirely justified, at times the Church has badly managed the issue of access to its archives. While the Vatican Archives have been in the main open since 1881, they have retained the official title of 'the Vatican Secret Archives.'²¹ In 2004 the Vatican Archives released volumes of edited documents concerning the Holocaust and the Second World War but would not allow access to the original records.²² In England and Wales not all archives of religious orders are open to external researchers and while Dr Mangion says that it is difficult to give figures, she believes that there are many archives where no external access is allowed.²³ While in theory an unawareness of external needs or an inability to fulfil them is harder to criticise than a refusal of admittance, in practice it produces much the same result for the would-be user: inaccessibility. From the outside, poor management can be difficult to distinguish from concealment. The tag-line for the recent book-turned-film The Da Vinci Code, 'the greatest cover-up in history', sums up this attitude. People perceive the Church as having something to hide.

The Catholic Church frequently asserts that its archives are private on the basis of their function and nature. Within the record-creating tradition of the Church, there is a strong emphasis on their administrative purpose. In 1612 Pope Paul V created a central archive 'to make the administration more efficient,' since he believed that 'old documents are non-military weapons for holding on to property we have acquired.'²⁴ This emphasis has remained prominent, and was the only one stipulated up to and including the 1917 Code of Canon Law.²⁵ A significant number of archives visited stated that their primary purpose was to serve their parent organisation.²⁶ Within secular archives there is also a recognition of the importance of the administrative role of archives, one which Patrick Cadell believes has not been sufficiently stressed in recent years. While he does not deny that archives have other uses, he sees historical research as 'a by-product of the preservation of archives' and criticises the tendency within the United Kingdom for archive services increasingly to be seen as a 'cultural service.'²⁷ Another reason for the private status of Catholic archives is financial: Sister Mary Coke stresses that, because Catholic archives are privately funded, they have the right to refuse entry.²⁸ The reluctance of Catholic archives to accept Government funding because of access requirements will be addressed in more detail in the second part of this article.

Catholic archives are private, not only due to their function and funding, but also because they contain genuinely sensitive material. They include records from schools, hospitals, homes for unmarried mothers, care homes and orphanages that were, or are, run by the Catholic Church. Shelley Sweeney states that facts which people tend to want to hide, 'illegitimacy, adoption, incest, infidelity', can be found in church records.²⁹ The Catholic Church would be heavily criticised if it did not go to great lengths to protect this information. The nature of religious institutions means that they create sensitive records and some can remain current for many years as the Church is a stable rather than fast-changing organisation.³⁰ In addition, there tends to be a blurring of business and personal in the records of those who have committed their lives to God's service. This can be seen in the archives of religious orders, which are family papers rather than institutional archives.³¹ When individuals join a religious community, there is an expectation that they will live within that community for the rest of their lives and all significant events in their lives will be shared with that community. Like the seal of the confessional, the confidentiality of records is fundamental to the work of the Catholic Church:

Without this ability to maintain confidential information on the spiritual state of its communicants, individuals would rarely, if ever, approach the church on sensitive spiritual matters and the church could not function.³²

While the sensitive nature of school and hospital records is more generally acknowledged, the special nature of religious community archives and subsequent restrictions seem only partially understood by those outside. It is clear that the Church's attitude that its archives are private is not unfounded. Created and paid for by the Catholic Church, they have an important administrative purpose and contain genuinely sensitive material.

1:2 Is Access a Right or a Privilege?

Following the description of Catholic archives as private, it follows logically that access to them must be a privilege offered by the Church. The issue, however, is not this simple and it is one that has been prominent in the secular domain.³³ The basis of the argument is that 'records have a value to society beyond the immediate concerns of the creators.'³⁴ It could be argued that archivists have a professional responsibility to promote access, an idea supported by James O'Toole who believes that they should encourage awareness of their collections and work.³⁵ Shelley Sweeney states that an open access policy can be difficult for religious archives because:

Churches have a very narrowly defined constituency... There does not exist that broad public mandate that guides the government in its access decisions.³⁶

Despite not seeing the Church as a public body, many Catholics would disagree with the statement that the Church does not have a 'broad public mandate.' David Sheehy clarifies the issue: the Catholic Church is a private institution in 'purely secular legal terms' and therefore in the eyes of the law its archives are private rather than public records.³⁷ In Andrew Nicoll's words, 'the Church is a private institution with a public persona.'³⁸ Consequently, while Catholic archives have no legal obligation to provide access to their records, it is possible to recognise religious and social expectations of access, and a very broad mission.

There are two aspects to this responsibility. Firstly, that all people who have lived in a society where the Catholic Church has been active could argue that they have a claim on its records, and secondly, that access to archives can bring social and educational benefits which the Church should want to provide. Data Protection legislation states that people have a right to know what information is held about them and to have it corrected if wrong.³⁹ A similar right is acknowledged by the Church based on the principle that 'everyone has a right to know his or her status in the Church.'⁴⁰ The stipulation in Canon Law only provides that 'persons concerned have the right to receive [copies of] documents which, by their very nature, are public and which concern their own personal status' and therefore does not extend the privilege as far as civil law.⁴¹ Many people have been touched, directly or indirectly by the Catholic Church. The Public Service Quality Group (PSQG)'s Standard for Access to Archives states how the community which an archive serves 'will extend beyond the formal boundaries of the responsible body.'⁴² Historians are frequently aware of the relationship between the Catholic people and organisations they study and the wider non-Catholic community. Carmen Mangion states that the archives of religious communities contain information that is 'not only the history of religious life, or of the Catholic Church, but it is part of the history of society.'⁴³ As well as documenting the lives of holy people and the development of religious beliefs, Catholic archives contain information about education and healthcare due to the schools and hospitals run by the Church. Immigrant ethnic groups, such as the Irish and Italians, can feature prominently. Catholic archives are also an excellent source for nineteenth-century women's history as the work of women at this time is frequently not recorded elsewhere. This was recognised by The Pastoral Function of Church Archives which acknowledged that 'historical archives of ecclesiastical entities, are also part of the national heritage, even if they remain autonomous.'⁴⁴ Access to archives brings many cultural and educational benefits for people, such as social inclusion, regeneration and life-long learning, as recognised by the current United Kingdom Government.⁴⁵ The Catholic Church has a responsibility to offer these benefits to people by providing as many access opportunities as possible.

Archives have more uses than their original administrative purpose, and not only is there a responsibility to make them available, but benefits can be derived from this activity. Paul Shaw believes that there are great benefits in granting external researchers access to archives.⁴⁶ According to the PSQG, 'access services function through a process in which the user is an active participant and in which the user has responsibilities as well as rights.'⁴⁷ Since they too place a high value on archives, though for different reasons, academics are often excellent advocates for the value of an archival programme. Historians can also help people understand and appreciate the work of the Catholic Church and they 'often use records intensively, creatively and surprisingly [and] open up new avenues for other researchers.'⁴⁸ There is evidence that Catholic history is inadequately understood because there has been insufficient access to archives. This claim was made by the American bishops in 1974.⁴⁹ Carmen Mangion believes that the important role of women religious in nineteenth-century social history is still not recognised.⁵⁰ Some historians do not discuss the role of nuns because they are unaware of, or find it difficult to gain access to, the records which provide this information. Genealogists are other common users of archives, although not always appreciated. They can 'provide much support, either financial or in other undefined, but no less important ways' by boosting users numbers, paying for services and sharing their detailed knowledge of the history of Catholic families.⁵¹ Requesting a copy of materials published by researchers can be a quick and economical way to establish a reference library of considerable relevance. Making archives accessible does not have to be a 'give-give' situation for repositories: perhaps the benefits of having external researchers should be better exploited.

Some within the Church do wish to make its records more accessible and recognise what opening up its archives can achieve, namely, that an open access policy will bring benefits to the Church and that archives have a rôle to play in evangelisation. As stated by the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church, 'the care and appreciation of archives [...] can have profound pastoral significance as well as become an effective instrument of dialogue with contemporary society.'⁵² For some people who write to an archive asking for information about their ancestors, it may be their first contact with the Church.⁵³ The writing of history has a long-standing tradition. In 1883, Pope Leo XIII published a letter which called for 'true history, better history, impartial history' to be written.⁵⁴ These aims are being put into practice.

There are three societies which encourage use of Catholic archives in England and Wales. The Catholic Record Society publishes the journal Recusant History and its 'Record Series', calendaring the history of the Roman Catholic Church in the British Isles from the Reformation to the present day. One of the objectives of the Catholic Archives Society is that records of Catholic dioceses, religious foundations, institutions and societies 'may become accessible for academic research and cultural purposes' and it publishes an annual journal (Catholic Archives) to assist in this aim. The Catholic Family History Society exists to help genealogists.⁵⁵ There are also several local Catholic history societies. Some religious orders, such as the Sisters of Mercy, place a heavy emphasis on the importance of research being undertaken on their records and wish to 'alert scholars to these rich resources' recognising that publication results in wider availability.⁵⁶ The Church will benefit from scholarly research: as The Pastoral Function of Church Archives argues, 'a well-documented and unprejudiced study of its own past makes the Church more "expert in humanity."⁵⁷ This is a trend which should be encouraged.

Having established the many benefits that external researchers can bring, the lengths to which this policy can be taken should be considered. A recent discussion paper from the History of Women Religious Conference listed academic requirements as: access to original archival material for each convent, at reasonable notice; the freedom to use digital cameras; permission to take 150-word quotations; and to not be required to submit work prior to publication.⁵⁸ It is easy to see how, having used large public archives, researchers 'are used to a certain mode of availability and access' that frequently cannot be offered by Catholic archives.⁵⁹ While historians and researchers bring benefits to the world of archives, as a group they are far from perfect. Historians are not always sympathetic to the special requirements of Catholic archives described above and can be critical of closed periods and other restrictions placed on access. Among archivists, there is concern that trust could be abused and information 'deliberately misused.'⁶⁰ If wider access is being considered, Catholic archivists need to be prepared for ethical dilemmas. Owen Chadwick asks:

Because we are committed to historical enquiry, is it our duty to allow free access to private archives, even if we are afraid that those who use the archives might change the understanding of the past, or injure the Church of the present?⁶¹

It is important to ask how far the Church should be expected to bow to the demands of external users. The difficult position of the Church archivist is evident. Catholic archives should be open, but with limitations. They contain both wonderful sources and sensitive material which needs to be kept private. A policy on access is proposed to best cope with this predicament.

1:3 A Policy for Access

While access to its records for external users is a privilege, rather than a right, the Church has a moral and religious duty to make its records as accessible as possible. The simplest and most effective way to do this is to devise an access policy. In 2005, only one out of eighteen Catholic diocesan archives had a written or published policy on closure rules.⁶² This is a contemporary issue, however, with many archives revising this aspect of their administration. As shown above, access issues can be a minefield of problems. Robert Geisinger describes how archivists must: 'reveal what ought to be revealed, yet must protect what ought not be revealed, all in an effort to do what is right and just when sometimes what's right and just is not at all clear.'⁶³ Many archivists find this a complicated and challenging issue and it is easy to see why: these are not easy decisions to make.

Long-term closure periods form the basis of the current solution for many Catholic archives. David Sheehy says that it is 'now standard' for United Kingdom Catholic Church archival repositories to utilise a general closure date to regulate access to their archives.⁶⁴ Out of nineteen dioceses surveyed in England and Wales, one half set a closure date for their general records. The majority of the dioceses laid down a closure period of thirty years, some with extendable flexibility for sensitive material. The situation for personal files was more unregulated. Eight out of thirteen dioceses decided on individual cases, three were totally closed and two had set dates, one of fifty years and one of a hundred.⁶⁵ John Smart describes closure periods as 'short-term access pain to ensure long-term historical gain,' and it is true that a policy of long closure periods brings benefits.⁶⁶ The inconvenience is mitigated by the fact that archives are being kept indefinitely and so closing records provides an acceptable solution for both record-creating institutions and users. The Catholic Church achieves confidentiality and historians of the future will have access to the sources. Subsequent users of archives benefit because 'public scrutiny via the writings of historians and the media is not lost on our records creators.'⁶⁷ People are inclined to be more open if they know that the records will be kept closed for an appropriate length of time. In 1978 the Catholic Archives Society recommended that archives employ a thirty-year closure rule for most material and a hundred-year rule for personal material. This advice was modified in 2000, leaving each repository to choose a length of time that was suitable for its own requirements.⁶⁸

As the Catholic Archives Society's modification of its policy indicates, a set date on which to open records can sometimes be too crude a mechanism. James O'Toole believes that there 'should not be a flat cut-off date,' and David Sheehy argues that it 'makes better sense to open up a complete collection at a stroke rather than be tied to opening a collection in a piecemeal and incremental fashion.'⁶⁹ Small and understaffed archives may also find dates are arriving too soon, if they are behind with cataloguing.⁷⁰ While, therefore, a closure date may be simple to apply, it is not sufficiently flexible and responsive for today's access requirements. Some collections can be opened relatively quickly while others need longer protection. The restrictions should be specific to the requirements of each particular series of records.⁷¹ Simply having a closure date is inadequate; a more sophisticated system is required to regulate access. David Sheehy highlights the fact that 'professional archivists are not unanimous in accepting the need for [...] a policy.'⁷² There is some feeling that less is more in terms of access regulations and that the archivist should be able to decide on a case-by-case basis. This, however, places great pressure on the archivist to make the 'right' decision and leaves him or her open to criticism from those who feel they have been unfairly treated.⁷³ In addition, it must be difficult for even the most conscientious archivist to prevent personal opinion affecting his or her judgement. If a policy is well constructed and implemented, it should bring many benefits. A majority of dioceses (twelve out of nineteen) would favour a uniform, national, co-ordinated policy on closure rules and a further four want less formal recommendations.⁷⁴

Granting or refusing external requests for access is an important part of archives management which can have potentially serious consequences. These are not decisions which should be made lightly or in a haphazard fashion.⁷⁵ There are both practical and ethical reasons for having a policy. As wider access is becoming the norm and user numbers increase, it seems impractical to have to deliberate over each individual request for access, especially if some are of a similar nature. In addition, the advent of digital records has raised a general archival issue which must be addressed immediately. Records stored on computers and disks have to be appraised shortly after their creation, because in several years time they may be unreadable. Sensitive records stored on digital media cannot be left in a strong room for thirty years. It is necessary to be conscious of their long-term viability, even if they are closed.

This is a challenging time to be regulating access to archives and some moral guidance is a vital tool. A policy can assist archivists regarding what material should be made available to whom. All archivists can have personal, archival and institutional loyalties which do not necessarily coincide. Many religious archivists would regard their work as a service to God and, as priests and nuns take vows of obedience, ethics have an extra complication in the world of religious archives.⁷⁶ Religious community archives especially are family archives rather than corporate ones, and in such situations it could be difficult for archivists to be objective.⁷⁷ Such dilemmas could include what material should be made available for use, or even preserved. It is concerning to hear that there is 'a serious tension between preserving documents for the sake of history, and protecting dioceses and institutes from civil litigation' and 'although there are different opinions on the matter, it seems that, in summary, the following documents are generally not retained [...] documents that we would not want to become public.'⁷⁸ Tim Macquiban sympathetically describes the dilemma which can be 'a temptation to select the best evidence we can muster to support our view of a particular religious organisation.'⁷⁹ Canon Law, however, is quite clear on the matter, stating that no one can delete material from Church archives or tamper with original records.⁸⁰ The Pastoral Function of Church Archives requires that 'archives must systematically gather all the data making up the articulated history of the Church community so that what has been done, the results obtained, including omissions and errors, may be properly evaluated.'⁸¹ Articles in Catholic Archives stress how it is important to keep all records, uncensored, so that the truth will be fully recorded.⁸² It is vital for archivists to understand what sort of access historians require. The religious archivist may not appreciate that from the researcher's perspective, a refusal of access is better than uninformed censorship. Archivists should be frank about what material is available and if items have been removed from a file because of their sensitive nature, a record of this action should be left in their place giving the date when their access status will be reviewed.

Many Catholic archives state that they only allow access to bona fide researchers. The ethics behind this need to be analysed and the solutions incorporated into an access policy. How does the Catholic Church establish who these people are and is it right that they deny access to the rest? C. P. Stacey believes that:

Access cannot be divided into open categories for 'scholars' and closed categories for 'sensational writers', or available to those with a 'genuine' interest and unavailable to those who lack appropriate appreciation.⁸³

It not only creates a value judgement on those who wish to use the records, but the party that is making the decision has a vested interest in the situation. The 1917 Code of Canon Law defined 'access to the records very broadly, saying that diocesan archives may be examined and used "by anyone interested in them."⁸⁴ This was modified in 1983 and each bishop now sets the access rules for his diocese. The converse, granting extraordinary access for privileged cases is not 'a risk-free undertaking' but 'undermines the justification for the original policy.'⁸⁵ Out of nine archives questioned, there was

However, the chancellors of Curiae, parish priests, and other guardians of the archives should, in making available, copying and delivering documents, obey the rules given by legitimate ecclesiastical authority and, in cases of doubt, consult the local ordinary.

one significant incident reported and three more minor access problems.⁸⁶ Most archivists seemed to be cautious because they had heard of similar establishments which had been badly treated in the past: where access had been granted and then abused. The relatively small number of incidents probably results from the precautions taken by Catholic archivists, although it also indicates that it is only a minority of researchers who act unethically. It appears that journalists pose more of a threat than academics. One former archivist, whose archive is not included in Appendix Two, reported two incidents when journalists has asked 'irrelevant' questions. The balanced approach of the Scottish Catholic Archives is that 'if you have a basic respect for the organisation and the archives, you will be granted access to conduct your research.'⁸⁷ Andrew Nicoll explains how this is not meant to be exclusive, but 'it just asks some general basic support from enquirers.'⁸⁸ It has already been discussed that some records are genuinely confidential. It seems reasonable to ask that researchers are serious and reliable and that, while all will to some extent have an agenda, that their aim is to present the truth in its appropriate context.

While each establishment should devise its own access policy to suit its particular requirements, there are several elements which are necessary in such a document. James O'Toole lists the following components as essential to an access policy:

1. A general description of those records that will be considered open and available for research, those that will be subject to specific restrictions, and those that will be closed.
2. Time periods for restrictions on particular records.
3. A statement of the procedures by which researchers from outside diocesan administration may use the archives, including procedures for application, identification, and terms of use.
4. A procedure by which researchers may apply for access to restricted collections or for a review of restrictions.

⁸⁶ See Appendix 2.5.

5. A procedure governing permission to reproduce and publish material from archival records. [...].⁸⁹

It is important to include a statement regarding lines of administrative authority and to remind the researcher about the responsibilities that come with access. It should be drawn up by a committee which, at the minimum, includes the archivist and a senior individual such as the chancellor, bishop or superior. This official sanction is vital to give the policy authority. The archivist has an extremely important rôle to play in these proceedings, providing his or her expertise in an attempt to find a balanced solution. There are different methods of enforcement, such as requiring users to sign a contract before using material or screening research notes and draft publications. The access policy should be openly publicised and it is prudent to keep a record of decisions. The Central Congregational Archive of the Poor Servants of the Mother of God has developed a very good access policy which has been reproduced, by kind permission of the Order, in Appendix Three. The Poor Servants of the Mother of God believe that the advantages of having an access policy are that:

It allows for a level of consistency, continuity and transparency in archives administration which is likely to be of benefit both to those who use and who administer the archives, while allowing sufficient flexibility for the service to be able to respond to individual cases.⁹⁰

Because its records are private and the Catholic Church is essentially a self-regulating body in terms of archival matters, a well-publicised policy on access shows the endeavour to be open and transparent. As a result, researchers are more likely to be understanding of decisions and sympathetic to the Church's requirements. An archive is not under any obligation to create an access policy, but it will find advantages in doing so. Most researchers will understand that records need to be closed for a certain length of time. However, they do want to know that they have been treated fairly and it is vital that files are not censored without their knowledge.

1:4 An Access Theory for the Future

I have not intended to argue, indeed it would be impossible so to do, that Catholic archives should become public records or that there should be a general right of access to them. While Catholic archivists have no legal duty to allow access to their records, there is a moral expectation within society and a religious duty placed on them to be as open as possible. The Pontifical Commission states that although archives 'should be offered primarily at the service of the community which has produced them [...] they assume a universal destination because they become the heritage of all humanity.'⁹¹ Church archivists are custodians of the official memory of ecclesiastical institutions and therefore, 'servants of the servants of God.'⁹² There are many ways that Church archives can be used to do God's work; their administrative purpose is just one of these.

In the light of the way legislation seems to be moving, the Catholic Church may no longer be able to assert its rights over its archives as strongly. While the majority of Catholic archives are currently not affected by FOI legislation, this legislation cannot fail to have a 'horizontal' effect and an impact on expectations. Ailsa Holland believes that:

Society expects organisation, whether public or private sector, to be accountable for their actions, transparent in decision-making and compliant with freedom of information laws where they apply, or with the spirit of freedom of information where they do not.⁹³

David Sheehy also identifies a trend whereby civil legislation may encompass the records of private institutions.⁹⁴ The Draft Model Law published by UNESCO in 1972 states that because 'documentary sources owned [...] by private bodies or individuals also constitute a cultural asset, and therefore require constant surveillance; measures permitting the exercise of such surveillance therefore become necessary.⁹⁵ This is far more radical than any archival legislation currently in place. The reasoning proposed is familiar: the cultural interests of the community are improved by access to records. While in principle the Catholic Church may agree with the logic behind the argument, it is unlikely to agree with the proposed rigid enforcement. According to the Model Law, the decision to refuse access is at times, 'influenced by purely subjective considerations [...] indeed, they may be only of psychological importance.'⁹⁶ At the Scottish Catholic Archives, Andrew Nicoll is 'working towards complying with the spirit of the Freedom of Information legislation' and believes that the Church might become subject to FOI unless it decides to comply first.⁹⁷ From a pragmatic perspective, if civil law is moving in this direction, it would be preferable for the Catholic Church to establish an acceptable access programme on its own terms rather than be pushed towards one that is less suited to its needs.

Is it possible to have a synthesis where everyone's needs are met without conflict? In John Dirk's opinion, there has been 'a false dichotomy' between the records used for the protection of the parent organisation and their place in heritage, memory and history.⁹⁸ Peter Hughes believes that open archives need not be inconsistent with any appropriate need for confidentiality.⁹⁹ Such an attitude will pay dividends. If an archive has an access policy that is fair and clear, researchers are more likely to show respect and sensitivity. In theory, the multiple uses of archives complement each other. Although researchers frequently use records in different ways to their original purpose, they benefit from records that were given a high administrative value. Likewise, an archive is strengthened by external interest in its records as it consolidates their inherent value and relevance to society. While perhaps in theory there is no conflict, in practice we live in a world of limited resources. Part Two of this article will examine the best ways of practicing this access agenda within what can be the somewhat limiting constraints of time and money.

Catholic Archives in the Twenty-First Century: The Scottish Experience

Andrew R. Nicoll

Introduction

I am very pleased to have been given this opportunity to tell you about the way in which Catholic Archives in Scotland have grown into the twenty-first century. We have now almost fifty years of solid building of an institution which is providing a core administrative service to the Church in Scotland and is nurturing education, research and learning through its growing place in the academic community of Edinburgh and Scotland. I need only mention names like Anderson, McRoberts, Dilworth and Johnson, to remind us of such figures who have contributed so much to the future of Scotland's Catholic Heritage. I should not have to point out that these are simply the figures who were mainly associated with the Scottish Catholic Archives at its home in Columba House in Edinburgh, and that so many others have contributed to our knowledge and understanding of our heritage. I would like to take a look at the work which we are currently undertaking in Edinburgh which allows us further to develop the facilities which we have at the Scottish Catholic Archives, giving you a little taste of the Scottish experience! I hope I will be forgiven for this being perhaps more of a 'what we are doing in the Scottish Catholic Archives' type story, rather than something heavy about archives in general.

1. How are we organised?

Unlike any other country in the world outside the Vatican, I believe, we organise our archive service on a national basis. What that means is that in one place in Edinburgh, the Bishops' Conference of Scotland has gathered together the historic collections of the Church dating from the twelfth century to 1878; the national collections of the Bishops' Conference (i.e. the General Secretariat and its Commissions and Agencies) dating from the twentieth century; seven Bishops in Scotland have co-located their diocesan archives; and all parishes which date from before 1855 are being encouraged to deposit their early registers and records with the Scottish Catholic Archives. In addition to this, we accept deposits from societies and organisations connected with the Church, and from individuals also - clergy and laity alike. All in all, we maintain approximately 1 km of manuscripts in our building in Edinburgh.

Practically, we have one building in the heart of Edinburgh (Columba House), with two outstores in diocesan property. This allows us to undertake records management for the Archdiocese of St Andrews and Edinburgh and also provide safe accommodation for the Provincial Archive of the Helpers of the Holy Souls. We also manage small records stores at diocesan level which allows local offices to administer their own records through the short- to medium-term. It is our intention to formulate full retention guidelines so that diocesan staff will be able to assist with the administration of non-current files, managing free space in the long-term for the Edinburgh stores.

I hope that what I have just described does justice to the close relationship which the Scottish Catholic Archives has to each of the dioceses which it serves. We very much look upon ourselves as a part of each diocese. We may be located in Edinburgh, and work with colleagues in Aberdeen, Dundee, Ayr, Oban, Motherwell and Paisley, but we feel that it is important that each diocese feels that the Scottish Catholic Archives is their archive, and we are a part of their diocese, despite the distance there is between us.

This work continues with strong relationships with the Helpers of the Holy Souls and also with the Dominicans. Both orders have located their Provincial Archives in Edinburgh. In the case of the Dominicans, we are providing a support service to the Provincialate, in modernising the Archives, upgrading the accommodation, and investigating ways of increasing access to the valuable collections. In the case of the Helpers of the Holy Souls, the Provincial Archivist contacted us with a plea for help, and we were able to make available space in one of our outstores and begin to support her in the work of looking after the collection. Also, I have been providing support to the Bishopric of the Forces, and we have begun successfully to consolidate the valuable work undertaken by previous members of the administration there. In addition, we work closely with seminary staff in Rome and Salamanca, to provide assistance in managing both historic archives and modern records in our college environments, to ensure that the long-safeguarded heritage continues to survive and be made available.

2. Does it work?

The question from all of this perhaps is: does it work? I think it does! We have gone from a very unknown service in the Church three or so years ago, with a few hundred enquiries and no more than eighty reader visits per year, to a service which has now approaching one thousand enquiries and more than four hundred reader visits per year. We have a website and use e-mail. Our website is very basic at the moment, but we are going to change this over the summer months [of 2006] with more of our catalogues being made available online and more of this information which we have at our fingertips in Columba House being made available to a wider audience.

Now, when I mention 'we', I suppose I should give you an idea of how many of us there are! There is myself, the Keeper, and Caroline Cradock, the Assistant Archivist, which means that the Scottish Catholic Archives is staffed by two qualified professionals. In addition, we currently have two volunteers who are engaged on a number of projects, and there are two diocesan archivists responsible for other areas. We also have the support of the two Provincial Archivists, and members of the Scottish Catholic Heritage Commission.

It may seem that though we have a large portfolio, which is true, we nevertheless appear to be able to divide our time and workloads effectively to cope with it all. True, we could do with more help, but with the limited financial resources available to us, we just have to make do with what we have, and move forward bit by bit.

3. Access

I have touched upon the numbers of people who come to Columba House and make contact with us, but perhaps I should explain how we do this. Columba House is a nineteenth-century New Town townhouse, which presents many practical challenges to a modern archive service! We occupy three storeys of the building, with seven storerooms and almost one thousand metres of manuscripts and three hundred metres of printed books. We operate a reading room which allows space for up to ten individuals at a time, with microfilm and microfiche facilities. At the moment, we do not have a public access computer, but this will be made available by the end of this year.

In addition to members of the public being welcomed to Columba House, we encourage group visits from universities and other interested parties. It is important for us to maintain a good public profile, and reach out to groups who might not normally come into contact with us. I feel it is very important that the archives of the Church are as welcoming as possible, with little restriction on who may use the collections. We have such a rich tool for education and learning that we must make it available to as many people as possible.

Perhaps unusually, we have opened up the archives of the Church to 1965. What do I mean by this? Well, we firmly believe that the Scottish Catholic Archives is a private organisation with a public persona. By that we maintain that we have a responsibility to allow access to our collections and permit the public to become involved in exploring our history. This does not mean that all of the files are open - we still adhere stringently to the terms of the Data Protection Act and there are restrictions on personnel files of course, but with these things in mind, we do our best to allow access to materials for genuine research purposes up to 1965. Why 1965? When we first examined our closure periods it was 2005. At the time, forty years seemed like a good closure period for normal files, but this will likely be reviewed regularly in the future. It is very clear to us that we must engage with the spirit of legislation which exists but does not directly affect us. By this I mean that while not subject to Freedom of Information legislation, we are mindful of the need for the Church to acknowledge its spirit.

4. Education

In addition to welcoming postgraduate and undergraduate students to Columba House as part of a group or to support their own individual research, we are lucky to have student internships from a number of universities. So far we have welcomed two students from the School of Scottish Studies at the University of Edinburgh who have completed a number of archival projects as well as writing assignments and reports which have been of use to us in our work. Two students have come from the University of Glasgow Archive Training Programme, and we have supported applications by three volunteers who are now in the process of training to be archivists. Further afield, we have an Australian student who is undertaking a distance learning programme from her home university, and in July 2006 an intern from Paris catalogued the archives of the Scots College in Paris and Douai. I feel that this is an important part of the work that we do, broadening the number of individuals who have contact with the Church, and more importantly, it gives us free labour for a number of weeks each year which is always welcome.

We recently received a grant from the Big Lottery Fund to carry out an oral history project which recorded the experiences of individuals during the Second World War, and in particular their experience of religion and worship on the Home Front. The next part of this has been to employ two teachers to compile teaching packs for primary and secondary schools. This is the first time that we have moved into the fields of primary and secondary education, but one with which we must continue. It is important to interest young people early on, and plant a seed which will, one hopes, give them a lifelong interest in the history of the Church.

5. Technology

I am always proud to say that I took the first computer into Columba House in 2003! Exactly how we managed without a computer before then is difficult to understand. However, I sometimes think that we are lucky that we have no legacy of old electronic files which would take longer than anything else to do something with to make them useful. We are currently converting a large part of our manuscript indexes to electronic format, using a database built in-house to an ISAD(G) template. With a limited budget I decided not to go with proprietary software, and we have used MS Access to pull together a database which manages our catalogue, consultations, enquiries and many other things. It is hoped that with a grant later in the year [2006], we will have our catalogues placed online using the ArchivesHub - a United Kingdom higher education service.

There have been many archival developments in Scotland in recent years, and it is encouraging that we are a part of them. The Scottish Archive Network brought together a union, top-level catalogue for the majority of the archives in Scotland. We were not a part of this initial stage of work, but we are now a part of the project and it means that we will contribute in the future, mainly to a full online union catalogue of archives.

The other major output of the SCAN was the digitisation of the Scottish wills and testaments up to 1900. This has now been joined with the Scottish Family History Service, and Presbyterian Church records from before 1855 have been added, along with civil registration and census. It is anticipated that we will be working with the ScotlandsPeople consortium to add Catholic baptism, marriage and other information to the pay-per-view website which has been developed.

6. Projects and Partnerships

We have worked on a number of projects in the past few years. Our manuscript music sources have been added to the RISM database; we are working on DAMP; we have received funding from the NMCT to microfilm and re-house the entire Blairs Letters collection, as well as continuing our own preservation programme. We recently contributed many medieval manuscripts to an exhibition in the Schottenkloester in Regensburg, and made excellent contact with colleagues in Germany. We are well underway for applying for a further £200,000 over the next couple of years to continue our work, using the limited internal resources we have and adding to that the external funding we are able to harness. A major partnership we will be involved with is the Scottish Family History Service which will allow us to open up our collections to family history researchers, which we feel will become an increasing part of our work in a time when more and more individuals are looking for more of their family.

7. Why we do this?

I should probably give you some reason as to why we do this! I hope that from everything I have detailed it is clear that there is an enthusiasm and commitment to good administration, to the archives, to history and to learning. But most of all, there is a commitment to the Church, and using the collections we have to allow as many people as possible to have contact with the Church. I have often had readers at Columba House explain to me that they hoped it was alright that they were there using the facilities, because after all, they were not Catholics. I have always replied in the most positive way I can by saying that it does not matter. As long as you have an understanding of the Church, however small, and find value in the contact that you have with it, then we are doing our work, grasping the values outlined in The Pastoral Function of Church Archives, the Circular Letter issued by the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church in 1997. The Scottish Catholic Archives forms part of the cultural good of the Church, and is an integral part of the memory of the Christian community in Scotland and indeed Europe. We are making this available to the Church and to the wider community in the best way we can.

The Archive of St Mary's, Stanley, Falkland Islands

Edward Walsh

The Falkland Islands (FI) lie some three hundred miles off the coast of South America and over five hundred miles north of Antarctica. There are two main islands - East and West Falkland - as well some seven hundred smaller islands. The population is estimated to be just over three thousand. The capital, Stanley, is on East Falkland. St Mary's parish church is situated on Ross Road in Stanley in front of the Town Hall and next to the police station.

The foundation stone of the present church was laid on 12 February 1899.¹ The structure itself was a prefabricated wooden building supplied by the Norwich firm of Boulton & Paul, and in the manufacturer's catalogue was referred to as 'Church No.19 as supplied to the Falkland Islands. Code - Falkland.'² Typical of many buildings in the Falklands, the church has weatherboarded walls and a corrugated iron roof.³ It was built by Messrs James Smith & Bennett assisted by Vincent Biggs and E. Bound, carpenters in the employ of the Falkland Islands Company (FIC). A great part of the cost was met by Louis Baillon a West Falkland farmer.⁴ But this was not the first Catholic church in Stanley. Before the arrival of Father James Foran⁵ in 1875, three Irish priests - Lawrence Kirwan,⁶ Patrick Dillon,⁷ and William Mason

Walsh⁸ - made visits to the islands from Buenos Aires in 1857, 1865 and 1872 respectively. James Foran was the first resident Catholic priest and on his arrival received a most cordial reception from Governor D'Arcy. The small church which Foran found was built at Pump Green,⁹ financed by a combination of funds raised by the Catholics themselves and government labour. In 1886 (and a very short time before Foran would finally leave the islands) this building was moved and re-erected by Charles M. Dean in its present location at a site 'on the front road' now known as Ross Road. The land at Pump Green was exchanged with Dean in part-payment of building costs. The present St Mary's was juxta-positioned in close proximity to the earlier building and once blessed, the old church was re-named St Mary's Hall and would be used as a school as well as for parish functions.

There are several distinct eras in the ecclesiastical history of the FI: viz. the French and Spanish period, 1764-1811; the British period (early years in Stanley), 1857-1886; the Salesian mission, 1888-1952; and the Mill Hill Missionaries 1952-2002.¹⁰ In 1907 a community of Salesian Sisters arrived in Stanley from Argentina to take over the running of a school which had been conducted by St Mary's since 1880. Due to wartime conditions the sisters were obliged to leave the colony in 1942.¹¹

In 1952 the Church in the FI was erected as an Apostolic Prefecture and it was agreed that the Salesians would transfer its charge to the Mill Hill Missionaries.¹² In August 1986 the islands of Ascension, St Helena and Tristan da Cunha were detached from the Archdiocese of Cape Town and erected into a Missio sui juris in the pastoral care of the Prefect Apostolic based in Stanley. The Bishops' Conference of England and Wales agreed in early 2001 to accept full pastoral care for the Church in the South Atlantic in succession to the Mill Hill Missionaries.

To date there have been four Prefects, of whom Monsignor Daniel Spraggon MHM¹³ will always be remembered in connection with the Argentine invasion. One night his house was peppered with bullets by Argentine soldiers shooting from the Drill Hall. He subsequently joked that the bullets had gone through his theology books more quickly than he had ever done. Writing to the Claims Officer at the Government Secretariat in Stanley on 4 June 1982 Monsignor Spraggon noted that 'further to my claim made on 26 May for damage by gun fire to my house and property on the night of the 23 May, I now find that my typewriter was also damaged by a bullet. I would appreciate it if some one could examine the typewriter in order to assess the damage.'¹⁴ In another undated, unaddressed typed letter (directed to an unidentified Mr Kelly) but undoubtedly written at about the same time as the letter above, Monsignor Spraggon wrote:

I did not think that I would [be] re-ordering things for my new house. But the Argentines took and destroyed so much stuff. Would you please be so kind as to order the enclosed. Willie Bowles has worked it out with me. Please send the account as before to F[at]he[r] Duggan at Mill Hill. Well, the war is over but we still have many problems. The Argentines certainly left a mess. Some of the things I lost I am able to buy locally through the Government store. We had 10½ weeks of occupation: it was a bit rough but we all felt that in the end we would be O.K. One night the Argentines fired 27 rounds into my house and 3 into the church hall. I was very lucky since I had left one of the rooms that was shot up only a short time before. The good Lord took care of me. I know that you will get these things on the earliest possible ship. I am most grateful for all the help you have given me in the past. David Briton said that he was sure I could depend on you. I did not need his word for that. Again many many thanks for all your help. I am sure that if you tell these firms that this is to fill up what the Argentines destroyed they will help you out. My sincere thanks to you for all your help. Yours sincerely... PS. I am sorry for the bad typing but it is very late, I have been listening to some of the poor soldiers' problems. God bless.¹⁵

¹³ Monsignor Daniel Martin Spraggon MHM, OBE (1912-1985), arrived in the FI in October 1971 and became the second Prefect Apostolic in May 1973. Awarded the OBE after the 1982 conflict, he will always be remembered for securing the release of many residents detained by the Argentines and also for being rescued from the hospital fire in 1984. He is buried in Stanley cemetery. See Daily Telegraph 30 September 1985.

The archive and parish records are contained in six four-drawer filing cabinets located in a small room immediately adjacent to the parish priest's office in the parish house. The filing cabinets are numbered A, B, C, D, E and F. The actual file titles have been used to describe the archive contents. Some items carry a document identification number, and in those instances the document number has been stated. It is curious that apart from the house account books noted in F/C "F" D3 covering the years 1905-1947, there are only two Salesian letters in the archive: one dated 22 May 1911 written by Father Migone to Mr Biggs on notepaper of the Milan Hotel Bahnhof, Lugano, and another of 4 December 1913 from Sister Mary Ussher to Madge Biggs.

I am indebted to the Shackleton Scholarship Fund for facilitating my travel to the Falkland Islands and to Father Peter Norris, Parish Priest of St Mary's, for his hospitality and for allowing me access to the church and parish archive. I must also thank Jane Cameron, Falkland Islands Archivist, David Guevara (Rio Grande, Tierra del Fuego) and Juan José Santos (Buenos Aires) for their assistance on matters of detail.

'The Bahía Buen Suceso used to visit the FI at thrice monthly intervals from approximately 1972, when I sailed on her from Buenos Aires. During the Falklands War she came to [the] islands as a supply ship carrying ammunition and food. The ship was captured at Fox Bay by the British; ammunition was removed, weeks later she was inspected with a view to using her as a coaster, but it was found that she was almost alive [with] the "RATS" which had thrived on the food supplies. The locals had stripped her of all possible brass that was moveable. The only thing possible was to sink her at sea. The British did this. The Chief Engineer of the *Sir Belvedere*²⁶ Royal Naval auxiliary ship gave this log to me. D.M.Spraggon July 1982.'²⁷

Madge Biggs Papers²⁸

Madge Biggs (1902-1995): King George VI decorated her with the MBE; Pope John XXIII awarded her the Bene Merenti medal; and Pope John Paul II the Pro Ecclesia et Pontifice decoration. She left her property and personal papers to the Catholic Church, and those papers are kept at SMCA in a 12½" x 18½" x 5" wooden box. The index to these papers will be published in a future number of Catholic Archives. Regarding the Madge Biggs papers, there is a single A4 sheet dated 4 March 2004 entitled 'Papers from the Estate of Madge & Irene Biggs on loan to the Falkland Island Government Archives from St Mary's Church, Stanley' signed by Monsignor Michael McPartland [the present Prefect Apostolic] on behalf of St Mary's and Jane Cameron on behalf of the Falkland Islands Archive.

REPORT ON THE ARCHIVES OF THE SISTERS OUR LADY OF CHARITY OF REFUGE

Victoria Perry

1. Introduction

1.1 The Archive of the Sisters of Our Lady of Charity of Refuge (Ireland)

The archive consists of material relating to the order and institutions with which it has been involved over the past 150 years, including Magdalene asylums, reformatory and industrial schools and other childcare units. Most of the collections have been centralised in a storage area of the library at Beech Lawn, Drumcondra, Dublin. The collection was generally in very good condition: dry and flat, with very little damage. The main damage that has been done is through general wear and tear; mainly over-use of volumes. The conditions in the storage area are good, considering that it was not purpose-built for archives. Although temperature and humidity fluctuate slightly more than would be desirable, this fluctuation is not enough to cause concern and tends to stay within recommended conditions for the storage of archival material.

1.2 Archival Collections in Beech Lawn Library

HIGH PARK

Includes material relating to the convent, asylum and St Michael's Guest House. The convent material contains items relating to the establishment and management of the convent, as well as its rules and members. Also childcare material from Blaithin children's home, Cuan Mhuire children's home and Grianan teenage unit. This is the largest collection in the archive (c.60 boxes).

ST ANNE'S

Includes material relating to the convent, children's home and school (c.15 boxes). If there is any more convent material, it should be placed with the rest of the collection.

ST JOSEPH'S REFORMATORY / INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL

Includes material relating to children in the school (admissions, departures, medical and court records), internal administration of the school (staff, financial papers), external administration of the school (government departments, local authorities) and material relating to the Resident Managers' Association (c.10 boxes).

THE GRANGE

Includes material relating to the convent (a very small amount), and various childcare units including Bartres children's home, Cualann children's home and Aislinn aftercare unit (c.4 boxes): Very incomplete- is there more?

SEAN MACDERMOTT STREET

The second largest collection. Includes material relating to the convent and asylum, as well as St Anne's, Ri Villa and the Casual Unit. There are a number of photographic albums in the collection (c.20 boxes).

CENTRAL ADMINISTRATION OF CHILDCARE

Includes material dating from when the various institutions within the separate houses began to be administered centrally (c.2 boxes).

CENTRAL ADMINISTRATION OF THE ORDER IN IRELAND

Material relating to the administration of the Sisters of Our Lady of Charity of Refuge in Ireland, from the amalgamation in 1948. Includes chapters and material relating to the council (c.20 boxes).

2. Work completed on the collection, October 2003- March 2004

Completed tasks:

- (a) Identification of 155 women buried in St Mary's Cemetery, with 154 real names.
- (b) Database of all women who were entered into St Mary's Asylum registers, cross-referenced with other sources.
- (c) Database of all women who were entered into Gloucester Street Asylum registers.

- (d) Database of children entered into St Joseph's Industrial School, 1927-1973, taken from register.
- (e) Entire collection sorted into more manageable units and contained in archival quality acid free folders and low acid boxes.
- (f) Part of the High Park Convent and Asylum papers described on index cards.
- (g) Collection list for St Joseph's Reformatory/Industrial School.

3. Use of Finding Aids Produced

3:1 Women's databases

Databases exist for St Mary's Asylum and Gloucester Street Asylum, containing entries for women entered in the institutions' registers. The databases can be searched, arranged or filtered as described in the section of this report relating to the database for St Joseph's Industrial School.

(a) St Mary's Database

To see the list of 155 women that were buried in St Mary's Cemetery, go to Queries, then select St Mary's burial query. Many of the women are entered twice or more. The first entry is the one for which details are given in the database. Subsequent entries are in the column entitled 'other entries'. There may be more than one entry for some women if their subsequent entries were not described as such in the register.

(b) Gloucester Street Database

This database is identical to that for St Mary's, with the exception that subsequent entries are listed separately, rather than grouped together in one column. There are sometimes photographs attached in the register. Where possible, this has been noted with a tick in the final column.

3.2 St Joseph's Industrial School database

(a) Entries

These are arranged in chronological order of entrance into the school. The Register number (column 1) is the same as that given in the register SJ/15.

(b) Searching the database

The first column is surname, which is the field most likely to be searched under. To open the database, go into Children's Database, select Table, then St Joseph's Industrial School. The table will appear. Right-click on the title of the field to be searched (e.g. surname), then left-click on find, and type in the name to be searched for. Part of a name can be searched for under match, for example if the spelling of a name is not certain. Thus to search for the name 'Finnegan', if you are not sure of the spelling, select match and then any part of field and search for 'Fin'. This will bring up any name that has the combination of the letters F,I and N in it. Selecting start of field under match will find any names that begin with the letters 'fin'. Keep clicking on find next to see all of the entries that fit the selected criteria. The entries can also be arranged in order according to field. To do this, right-click on the field name to be arranged and select sort ascending or sort descending as required. For example, to arrange the entries in alphabetical order of surname, select sort ascending in the surname field. To put the table back in the original order, select sort ascending in the register number column. The entries can also be filtered, so, for example, only entries with a particular first name are shown. To do this, left-click on an entry in the column required to be filtered, then right-click. Left-click on filter for and type in the name to be filtered. For example, to do this in the first name column, type in 'Mary' to find all children in the database whose first name was Mary. This will not bring up any Mary Annes etc.

(c) Printing a form

Using forms to answer queries from members of the public will help to ensure that damage caused by photocopying is kept to a minimum. To print off a form, first of all find the record number of the entry required, this is the same as the register number. Then go back to the database page and select form instead of table. Select St Joseph's Industrial School and maximize the page. In the record number box at the very bottom of the page, type in the record number required. Select print and then selected records.

(d) Sources

The second to last column in the table indicates sources available in the collection relating to that particular child. The first entry in this column refers to the page number in the admissions register. Other entries refer to various other series of records including school reports, medical records and a very few burial records.

(e) Legislation

The column entitled 'Act under which charged', gives details of the Act under which the child has been sent to the school. These Acts have been abbreviated in the table:

* 8 Edw 7 ch 67 sec 58 refers to the Children Act of 1908

* Section 10, 1941 refers to the same Act, as amended in 1941.

(f) Previous address

3.3 St Joseph's Collection List

Each document or file of documents within the collection has been described. These descriptions were then grouped and arranged into a hierarchical order. The descriptions were then numbered and the physical documents themselves were arranged into the same order and numbered in the same way. Therefore, the order of the descriptions of the documents is the same as the physical order of the documents within the boxes. The resulting finding aid is called a collection or descriptive list. To locate a document, the content and structure section can be consulted and the relevant page number found, so that appropriate sources may be located. To find the physical document itself, take a note of the document number and then locate the correct box. Documents in the collection are labelled in numerical order, with the first document labelled 1.

Sub-numbering: where a description relates to more than one item (for example in a file of documents), the documents in that file are sub-numbered; this is to ensure that the documents are placed back in the correct place in the file. Information to be found in the descriptive list includes type of document, author or creative cause (this could be an organisation, e.g. the Department of Education), content, size and date. Within the lowest levels of description, items are arranged in chronological order. It is advisable to have a slip of paper to insert into a file or box when a document is consulted, to ensure that it is replaced in the correct place.

4. The Care and Use of Archives

4.1 Handling and Preservation

The archives of the Sisters of Our Lady of Charity of Refuge are generally in good condition. Most of the damage that has been done is the result of wear-and-tear and frequent handling. In order to ensure that the collection remains in good condition it is necessary to implement the following procedures for the handling and use of the documents.

- (a) Documents should always be handled carefully.
- (b) Use the 'Norfolk book sofa' for reading large volumes. Do not lean on the volumes during use.
- (c) Pencils only should be used when taking notes.
- (d) Photocopying should be kept to an absolute minimum as light and ozone emitted from photocopiers can cause damage. Forms from the databases can be used in place of photocopies.
- (e) Care should be taken to ensure that the humidity and temperature in the storeroom is as consistent as possible. Always close the door to the storage area. If it is to be a long-term storage area then the best course would be to have the radiator removed.
- (f) Light can damage documents, speed up chemical reactions and cause ink to fade. Try to limit the amount of time a document spends in lit areas.
- (g) No food or drink to be consumed in the Archive.
- (h) The snake paper weights can be used to hold down a document that is not flat.
- (i) Material should only be consulted in the Library, not taken out of the area.
- (j) Always wash hands before consulting documents.

4.2 Use of collections

The collections can be used by internal staff by the use of databases and list as in section 3 above. The use of forms in the databases will serve to limit the photocopying of fragile registers and prevent further deterioration, particularly of the spines of volumes. Unlisted collections should not be made available for use. A collection list serves to help the researcher to locate a document within a given context, to protect the security of the collection as the folders are numbered and to preserve the collection as documents are not unnecessarily handled. When the High Park papers are being used for research, it should be borne in mind that the collection has not been fully catalogued. The index cards created can serve as a partial finding aid to the collection, as well as the existing descriptions. Many of the boxes are, however, labelled, so this may also help with research. However, as there is no collection list, there are no reference numbers from which to quote sources.

5. Recommendations

(a) Collection Lists

High Park Papers

Approximately 30 boxes have already been described. Some of these descriptions are on index cards, the rest are on paper. The rest of the collection will need to be described, arranged and typed up, and then integrated with the descriptions already done. I have done a provisional content and structure section; however, whoever completes the list may wish to change this slightly. The index cards have been loosely arranged to assist researchers; however, this may not be the final arrangement.

Other Collections

Similar descriptive lists will need to be created for all other collections in Beech Lawn Library, including the Sean MacDermott Street Papers, The Grange Papers, St Anne's Papers, Central Administration of Childcare Papers, Central Administration of the Order Papers and the Papers of the various childcare units.

(b) Databases

St Anne's

A database similar to that created for St Joseph's Industrial School would make enquiries easier. This would be created using the files of children in the school and admissions registers.

St Joseph's Reformatory School

This would need to be on a separate table to that of the Industrial School as register numbers are duplicated. Sources may be incomplete at the start.

(c) Other Tasks

Once listing is complete, an access policy should be created, using the archivist's knowledge of the collections in the library, and taking into account sensitive material found during listing, the wishes of the order and the practicalities of allowing people to use the archive.

Conservation: although most of the collection is in very good condition, some volumes have suffered from over-use. The most important of these will need to be conserved by a qualified conservator, e.g. the third register for St Mary's. Such items will be noted during listing and will not be available for access until in good condition.

6. Conclusions

The Archive of the Sisters of Our Lady of Charity of Refuge in Ireland is rich, interesting and historically very important. Not only does it document the history of the order within Ireland, but it is also a record of Irish life during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. In particular, the asylum and childcare papers will not only serve to help people who were within these institutions trace their history, but will also serve as documentary evidence of an important, yet often ignored area of Irish history. The Archive will become the legacy of the Order in Ireland when it is no longer in existence. If the archives are used and preserved in line with the recommendations contained within this report, then they should not deteriorate further. However, they cannot be used until they have been catalogued. Eventually consideration will need to be given to the long-term future of the Archive when the order is no longer in existence.

Editorial Note: the author, who is Assistant Archivist to the Marquis of Salisbury at Hatfield House, Hertfordshire, prepared her Report in March 2004.

THE ENGLISH DOMINICAN CONGREGATION OF ST.CATHERINE OF SIENA OF STONE: A BRIEF DESCRIPTION

Sister Mary Cecily Boulding O P.

Though I have officially been Archivist for the Stone Congregation for forty years, it is only since my retirement from teaching at Christmas 2005 that I have actually lived in the same house as the archives, or had time to do more than answer occasional queries. The congregation is the result of the amalgamation of five distinct groups of Dominican Third Order Conventual Sisters who were established in England during the nineteenth century:

1. The Congregation of St.Catherine of Siena of Stone, founded in 1847 by Mother Margaret Mary Hallahan (who had established a group of Dominican tertiaries in Bristol in 1842).

2. The Congregation of St.Rose of Lima, founded at Stroud in 1857 by Mother Mary Teresa Matthews.

3. The Congregation of St.Vincent Ferrer, which originated as a foundation made in London by the Congregation of Our Lady of Grace at Chatillon, France, in 1896. This became an independent English congregation at Portobello Road in 1909 under Mother Mary Cecilia Marshall.

4. The Congregation of Our Lady Help of Christians, founded in 1875 at Leicester by Mother Rose Corbett.

5. The Congregation of the Holy Rosary, founded by Mother Catherine Philip Bathurst at Meirelbeke, Ghent, in 1871 and transferred to Harrow in 1877.

With the advice and help of Father Louis Nolan O.P., and the English Provincial, Father Bede Jarrett O.P, these five congregations were united into one in 1929, with its mother-house being designated as Stone, the earliest foundation. All five congregations had previously established various daughter-houses, some being temporary or short-lived missions in response to a particular need or request, others being substantial foundations which endured for more than a century.

Consequently our extensive archives include records of varying extent, from thirty-nine communities, large or small. These deal with:

- (a) origins and foundation
- (b) buildings and property
- (c) communities and personnel
- (d) the daily routine of religious life
- (e) apostolic work and other activities
- (f) relations with the Church and surrounding society

Significant collections of material also concern the relations of the Stone Congregation with Archbishop William Bernard Ullathorne and Cardinal John Henry Newman. The works of the Congregation have included catechetics and teaching at all levels from primary to university, including specialised forms such as work with the deaf, the physically handicapped and the maladjusted; medical work and nursing care of the sick and elderly; pastoral, parish, chaplaincy and ecumenical work. The archives are housed at the mother-house, St.Dominic's Convent, Stone, Staffs, ST15 8EN. Of the typescript 'catalogue' of 320 pages, about half provides full catalogue details, while the rest is, at present, still 'rough-listed'.

Hidden Treasure: Sources for Catholic History in the Derby Collection, Liverpool Record Office

John Davies

Historians of the Catholic community in Britain have been blessed in recent years by the opening of Catholic archives, particularly those of the dioceses and the religious congregations. Historians can now feast on a veritable cornucopia of Catholic archival material. The available material seems to increase exponentially as each issue of Catholic Archives draws further material to our attention. In this happy situation there is, however, perhaps a danger that we overlook the materials for the history of the Catholic community which are to be found in non-Catholic archival collections.

One of the major collections in the Liverpool Record Office is the Derby Collection. The jewel in the crown of this collection for the twentieth-century historian is undoubtedly the papers of Edward George Villiers Stanley (1865-1948), the 17th Earl of Derby (1908-1948). 'The King of Lancashire' as his official biographer, Randolph Churchill, dubbed him,¹ Derby had a long career as a Conservative politician and later elder statesman and political string-puller. In his early career he held a number of government offices and in his later years dominated Conservative politics in Lancashire while maintaining his connections with national Conservative networks. For the historian he is a boon as his vast range of political interests and contacts spawned an even vaster correspondence.

Amongst this sprawling collection there are some perhaps hidden treasures for historians of the Catholic community. In 1921, between a stint as the British Ambassador in Paris during the Versailles peace negotiations at the end of the First World War (1919-1920) and his last government office as Secretary of State for War (1922-1924), Derby acted as an unofficial government agent in the peace process with Sinn Fein which led to the Anglo-Irish Treaty of 1921. Derby, through his excellent connections with leading Liverpool Catholic Conservatives, Sir James Reynolds and Colonel John Shute, recruited Father James Hughes, parish priest of St Hugh, Liverpool, to facilitate contact with the Irish Hierarchy and Sinn Fein. What followed was a James Bond-like saga with

Hughes slipping further and further from Derby's control as he entered with gusto into his undercover role.² The whole story, along with much else, unfolds in 920 DER (17) –34: Lord Derby's Mediation in Irish Affairs 1921, especially in 34/5 (Father Hughes), 34/7 (Cardinal Logue, August-September 1921), 34/7 (Sir James Reynolds), and 34/14 (Lieutenant-Colonel John Shute, April-May 1921).

A decade later Derby was involved in confidential negotiations of vital interest to the Conservative Party and the Catholic community in Liverpool. In December 1932 the sudden death of Sir James Reynolds, a leading Catholic businessman and cotton broker and the Conservative Member of Parliament for Liverpool Exchange, precipitated a by-election in January 1933. The Conservative Party in Liverpool, its leader, Sir Thomas White, and Derby were determined to keep the seat in Conservative hands. However, many and difficult obstacles lay in the path of this ambition. The Exchange Division included within its boundaries the business area of Liverpool. Under the then existing electoral rules businessmen and their wives were able to cast their business vote in this constituency in addition to their residential vote elsewhere. The business vote, as long as it could be mobilised, would be safe for the Conservatives. However, Exchange was a densely populated, largely Catholic working-class area, close to the city centre. When and if they voted, the Catholic working-class population in Liverpool generally did so for the Labour Party. This party had absorbed many of the leaders and supporters of the former Irish Nationalist Party, now reduced to a rump - the Centre Party on the City Council. Derby and his advisors judged that it was absolutely essential to find a candidate, who like Reynolds was a businessman but, more importantly, was a prominent Catholic.

Derby's first preferred candidate was Sir John Shute, a partner in Reynolds' firm, well known to Derby and prominent in Catholic circles as the Treasurer of the recently created Catholic Cathedral Fund. Shute, however, felt that his business responsibilities in the cotton trade, regionally and nationally, at a time of economic depression, precluded him from accepting the candidature. Derby then turned to Reynolds' son, John, who was equally reluctant because of his business duties. F. N. Blundell, formerly the Member for Ormskirk, head of the Blundell family and promoter of the Catholic Relief Act of 1926, was rejected as not being sufficiently close to the Liverpool Catholic working class. Eventually Shute was prevailed upon to reconsider. He duly stood as the Conservative candidate, delivering the Catholic vote and holding the seat again at the 1935 General Election and thus remaining the Member of Parliament for Exchange until 1945.³ The extensive discussion which lay behind these manoeuvrings can be followed in riveting detail in Derby's correspondence, viz. 920 DER (17) 6, Politics in Liverpool: 6/33 (Sir Thomas White to Derby); 6/34 (Derby to White) and 920 DER (17) 6: Unsorted (Derby to Shute, Shute to Derby, Derby to Sir John Reynolds, Sir John Reynolds to Derby, Derby to White, White to Derby).

In addition to the examples above, Derby had extensive dealings with Catholic politicians in Liverpool. Correspondence with Lord Mayors of Liverpool, 920 DER (17) 4 includes 4/13 Austin Harford (November 1943-November 1944) and 4/15 Luke Hogan (November 1945-November 1946). Austin Harford, sometime leader of the Irish Nationalist Party on the City Council, but by this time leading a small number of former Irish Nationalists as the Centre Party, was the first Catholic to become Lord Mayor of Liverpool. Luke Hogan, long-time leader of the Labour Party in Liverpool but who finished his days on the Council as a Catholic Independent, was the first Catholic Labour Lord Mayor of the city.

There is also in the Derby Collection correspondence with T.P.O'Connor, the long-serving Irish Nationalist Member of Parliament for the largely Irish Catholic division of Liverpool Scotland, in 1919 (920 DER (17) 28/3); with Sir James Reynolds in 1929 (920 DER (17) 6/21); and with Sir John Shute, between 1928 and 1945 (920 DER (17) 11/1).

Much of the correspondence in the Shute file (1928-1945) deals with politics and the cotton industry in Lancashire, providing some vivid insights into Shute's fears for the industry at the hands of Hugh Dalton and Sir Stafford Cripps, members of the Labour Government which came to power at the 1945 General Election in which Shute lost his seat to the left-wing firebrand Bessie Braddock. But there are also letters which illustrate Shute's concerns as a Catholic Conservative M.P. in a city with an unenviable record of sectarian divisions. In 1935 he got wind of the possible offer of an Aldermanic vacancy by the Conservative leadership on the council to Rev. H. Longbottom, leader of the small but disproportionately influential Protestant Party. In a letter to White, copied to Derby, Shute complained: co-religionists, and is the prime remaining cause of maintenance of sectarian bitterness, which decent people were hoping is gradually dying out.

Longbottom loses no occasion to vilify and traduce in the lowest terms, the religious beliefs of myself and scores of thousands of my fellow

In 1938 Shute protested at Derby's intention to preside at the Annual Meeting of the Workingmen's Conservative Association. The major issue in Liverpool politics at this time was that of grants to Catholic schools under the terms of the 1936 Education Act. The W.C.A. had been vociferous in its opposition to such grants, producing a petition to that effect. Shute complained:

... tacked onto it [was] a most offensive suggestion with regard to the Catholic body in this town, in which they implied that, generally speaking, they were disloyal, and consequently, were unworthy of consideration. With the knowledge which one has of the great number of those of one's own faith who fought and died so magnificently in the Great War, this was, as I say, peculiarly offensive to me and to others also who think and act like me, and could only have been done to raise, once again, the wretched sectarian spirit which I had thought belonged to the dead past.

Derby's papers provide the historian of the Catholic community some perhaps unexpected insights into the relationships of Catholics with the general community and their increasing importance in the politics of a city such as Liverpool with its substantial Catholic, largely working-class, population. Such insights are not always available in 'official' Catholic sources: in the papers of Archbishop Richard Downey, for example, there is very little correspondence with politicians, even Catholic ones, although, in the case of Salford, Bishop Vincent Marshall had quite extensive correspondence with local politicians, Catholic and non-Catholic. Sources such as the Derby Collection can perhaps be best used along with 'official' Catholic sources in our study of the Catholic community, particularly in cases of its political concerns, both national and local.

THE BISHOP BILSBORROW PAPERS IN BOX 207 OF THE SALFORD DIOCESAN ARCHIVES

Rev. Nicholas Paxton

The specific interest of Box 207 of the Salford Diocesan Archives (SDA-207) is that it contains a broad-based sample of the papers of the see's third bishop, John Bilborrow (1836-1903, Bishop of Salford from 1892 till his death). For discussion purposes, it is best to look at this sample under five headings: Bishop Bilborrow's spirituality; his academic work; his preaching; his public administration; and then his diaries and similar material. Lastly, there will be a summary of other material in the Salford Diocesan Archives which is relevant to his episcopate. But first, a short note on his life will be useful, to help readers to see how the archive items referred to fit into his career and into Victorian Catholicism.

BISHOP JOHN BILSBORROW

Born near Preston in 1836, John Bilborrow trained for the priesthood at Ushaw, was ordained in 1865, and then took charge successively of the missions of Barrow-in-Furness and Newhouse. While at Newhouse he established another mission, at Catforth, after which - aged forty-three - he went to Rome for further studies in order to take up a teaching post in the new seminary at Upholland. When Bilborrow returned from Rome, Upholland was still in process of foundation, and so, after working at two missions near Southport, he instead established the mission at Grange-over-Sands. There he built a church, as he had done at Barrow and Catforth. He became a professor and Vice-Rector at Upholland in 1883, Rector in 1885 and third Bishop of Salford in 1892, being consecrated in August of that year. Throughout his episcopate he suffered from poor health, made worse by increasing age (as he mentioned in his first Pastoral Letter), and he died of heart disease and bronchitis in March 1903.

The interest of SDA-207 as, so to speak, a 'cross-section' of Bilborrow's papers is particularly important since he is now less well known than other past Bishops of Salford, mainly for three reasons. Firstly, he and his episcopate have not yet attracted the attention of either a full-length biographer or a postgraduate writing a thesis, unlike the other Salford bishops up to the Second World War, viz. William Turner, Herbert Vaughan, Louis Charles Casartelli and Thomas Henshaw. Secondly, Bilborrow's relative obscurity seems to derive from the shortness of his episcopate - under eleven years, compared with twenty-one for Turner, nearly twenty for Vaughan, twenty-one for Casartelli and nearly thirteen for Henshaw. Thirdly, the Salford Diocesan Archives contain comparatively few of Bilsborrow's papers, some of which could have been lost when the rented house in Whalley Range, Manchester, which had served Bilsborrow as Bishop's House, was vacated by the diocese soon after his death (on this, see SDA-177-143 to 149). But Bilsborrow's current obscurity does not mean that his tenure of the see of Salford was insignificant in its day, either locally or nationally. On the contrary, his capable and competent episcopate was distinguished locally by his dedication to duty and his sympathetic, encouraging behaviour towards clergy and laity alike - so much so that on his death the Manchester Shechita Board, on behalf of the Jewish community, recorded its sympathies to the City of Manchester as well as to the local Catholics. Nationally, Bilsborrow's major claim to fame lies in his work for Catholic schools: his detailed knowledge here led to his being (as his obituarist in the Manchester Guardian stated) a leading influence, after Cardinal Vaughan, on the Hierarchy's schools strategy. Some exposition of the contents of SDA-207 will therefore be especially helpful.

ITEMS ON SPIRITUALITY

To begin with, SDA-207 offers important insights into Bilsborrow's spiritual life, which are particularly significant for students of the history and practice of spirituality. Thus there are notes on different aspects of spiritual theory and practice, as well as on the ecclesiastical year, in a notebook which Bilsborrow acquired in 1854, according to the signature and date (SDA-207-005). Bilsborrow's spiritual address, or meditation, on Sin, based on Jeremiah 2: 12ff, is datable to after May 1873 since it appears on the reverse sides of copies of a printed letter to Bilsborrow of that month from Bishop O'Reilly of Liverpool, commending Bilsborrow's work of building the new church and presbytery at Catforth (SDA-207-042).

This is an instance of Bilsborrow's frequent practice of re-using paper, which helps an archivist by providing terminus a quo dates for otherwise undated items. In fact, two other addresses, one on the glory of Our Lady and the other on the Saints and Our Lady's Dormition, from after August 1878 and July 1883 respectively, are datable thus by the reverses of the papers on which they are written (SDA-207-021/2). The discourses in SDA-207-018, which were probably lectures on spirituality to be given to the students at Upholland, and one of which is from November 1889, deal especially with humility and self-knowledge. Bilsborrow clearly understood interior mortification to be part of one's knowledge of self, since SDA-207-043 (the last item in the box) is an undated sheet of notes by him on that subject.

ITEMS OF LECTURE MATERIAL

Bilsborrow's academic work before his consecration as Bishop of Salford is well attested in SDA-207. The contents of this box date back as far as his days as a theology student at Ushaw: SDA-207-006 is a notebook signed and dated September 1862, with his notes on the Ushaw first-year course on Moral Theology and third-year courses on the Sacraments. The academic material in SDA-207-001 - a bound notebook with Bilsborrow's signature, dated March 1857 and (presumably later) partly used for sermon notes - which contains notes on the history of the world, civilization, the Church, philosophy and law, is more likely than not to date from his student days.

Notes for John Bilsborrow's lectures as professor and Rector at Upholland (where he taught Moral Theology and Scripture) are in evidence. SDA-207-036/7 consist of notes for a lecture on the Canon of Scripture (undated but on the reverse side of a coach-builder's advertisement posted to Bilsborrow in October 1886) and pages from a notebook, dated May 1887 at Upholland, with Bilsborrow's 'Notes on Interpretation of Scripture.' There is also some lecture-note material in the bound and indexed notebook which is now SDA-207-002, which, again according to the signature and date, Bilsborrow obtained in 1866. But the remaining lecture-notes are more problematic insofar as, since they are all undated, one cannot be certain of whether these were taken from lectures attended during Bilsborrow's years at Ushaw and Rome, or else made for lectures delivered during his years at Upholland. As well as including further material on Scripture (SDA-207-035, 039, 040), these remaining notes also contain material on grace (SDA-207-020, 038), mixed marriages (SDA-207039), English church history from the sixteenth century onwards (SDA-207-034) and outline notes concerning other lectures (SDA-207-024).

SERMONS

The author of Bilsborrow's obituary in the Manchester Guardian noted with some care that he 'was most at home in the pulpit, where he was forcible and impressive, and spoke with an earnestness of conviction that was decidedly striking.' It is thus to be expected that Box 207's contents provide examples of Bilsborrow's ministry of preaching as priest and bishop. The sermon notes in SDA-207-006 date from Barrow in 1866; SDA-207-001/2 contain sermon notes as well as lecture-notes, while SDA-207-023 is a sermon headed 'Patronage of St Joseph 1887.' There is an undated sermon on Luke 4:4 (SDA-207-028), and another, this time incomplete, on Matthew 19:27-29 (SDA-207-030). Three other items consist of undated sermon notes (SDA-207-027, 029, 041). Additionally, there are two addresses by Bilsborrow, about which it is not clear whether he wrote them as sermons or as lectures. One is on the Church: though undated, it is from after 1882, since it is written on a re-used sheet from the September 1882 Will of Thomas Bilsborrow (SDA-207-032). The other, though incomplete as well as undated, is datable to after June 1885 because of its being written on the back of a Burns and Oates order form of that month, asking for subscribers to their publication of John Tauler's The Following of Christ (SDA-207-033). Bilsborrow seems to have taken an interest in others' preaching as well as his own inasmuch as SDA-207-031, dated 22 March 1890, is a record in Bilsborrow's handwriting of the sermon preached by Archbishop Carr of Melbourne at the opening of Sydney Cathedral.

Two sermons from the last year of Bilsborrow's life indicate different aspects of a bishop's work: SDA-207-026 was preached at the opening of St Joseph's Church, Salford, in April 1902, while the preceding item is his sermon -now incomplete- at the funeral of Father Albert Bennett in July 1902. It is appropriate to add to these the text of his Pastoral Letter (identifiable as such from the end of the text) of June 1902 (SDA-207-019). This is about prayers for King Edward VII, who was seriously ill at the time; it was written to the clergy of the Diocese of Salford with an instruction to read it to the people. Its presence here, complementing the Salford Diocesan Archives' volumes of Bilsborrow's Acta and Pastoral Letters (on which see below), calls to mind the papers in SDA-207 which are about diocesan administration.

MATERIAL ON PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION

Much of the bread-and-butter work of Bilsborrow's administration of the Diocese of Salford is represented in SDA-207. There is a four-sheet list of the missions of the diocese, which records the years in which each had Visitations, and the dates of Confirmations, between 1895 and 1903 (SDA-207-007). There is a printed statement of extraordinary faculties granted by Pope Leo XIII to Bilsborrow for two years in April 1900; this is duly signed by the Secretary of the Congregation of Propaganda Fide, under the jurisdiction of which England and Wales then fell (SDA-207-009). There is also a pastoral letter from Bishop Bagshawe of Nottingham of February 1899, about the papal renewal of a concession on dispensations from fasting and abstinence in Lent (SDA-207-010). This has a handwritten note (unsigned) from the same month, about Bilsborrow's having received similar notification from 'the Cardinal' (most likely Vaughan, though conceivably the Prefect of Propaganda) and this material therefore being apparently 'for all England.' Also in SDA-207 is the record of a marriage case referred to Rome: the Cardinal Prefect and the Secretary of Propaganda wrote a letter to Bilsborrow, apparently in July 1898, about the question of a dispensation from Disparity of Cult necessary to allow a particular marriage to take place. In August the Secretary wrote to Bilsborrow again, declining to grant the dispensation, at least at the time of writing (SDA207-015/6). This letter may have caused some relief to Bilsborrow, who saw mixed marriages as promoting Catholic lapsation and whose policy - outlined in a Pastoral Letter of February 1893 - was to refuse mixed marriage dispensations whenever possible. But it would be a mistake to infer from this that Bilsborrow lacked an irenic spirit: pages 215-216 of SDA-207-003 contain his copy of a letter of November 1892 from himself to H. Petre Eyre, seeking to make up a quarrel between Eyre and Cardinal Vaughan during the latter's episcopate in Salford.

As one might expect, some records of financial administration appear among the material in SDA-207. In the small light-brown notebook which is now SDA-207-004 and to which further reference will be made, we have Bilsborrow's estimate of the probable cost of a journey home from Rome and the expenses of an ad limina visit there, along with a list of the donations which he received towards the setting-up of the new mission at Grange-over-Sands and an inventory of its vestments. Furthermore, the black-bound notebook which was Bilsborrow's Account Book from 1892 (the first year of his episcopate) onwards is preserved as SDA-207-003. At its beginning, funds are indexed according to headings of income and expenditure. Then, for example, pages 218-221 give details of legacies which have been received, while pages 222-223 contain notes on Diocesan Funds; there is also a note on the back flyleaf about income from funds. Again, sheet 5 of the sermon at SDA-207-026 is written on the back of an undated list of donations from parishes and individuals in the Diocese of Salford, for a purpose not recorded here.

As to Bilsborrow's work for Catholic schools, SDA-207 does not hold records of his work for their finance and maintenance, and so this work is the only major aspect of Bilsborrow's ministry not explicitly covered by its contents. But an envelope 'On Her Majesty's Service', addressed to him from the Board of Education in June 1900, has pencil notes (most likely a draft for a letter) on the back about the 'Proposed Training College in Adelphi, Salford' for the education of the schools' teachers (SDA-207-017).

Then as now, bishops were subject to lobbying from individuals and pressure groups. Sheet 2 of the sermon at SDA-207-026 is written on the back of an apparently blank and undated petition form regarding a Civil List pension for the widow and daughter of a Mr Sutton. Again, the two sheets of the address at SDA-207-021 have been written, one on the back of a circular of July 1883 from Mr W.H.Perkins (Secretary of the Central Association for Stopping the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday) about a Sunday Closing Bill for England, and the other on the back of an undated handwritten text, most likely a draft, for a Petition to the House of Commons to pass such a Bill. In addition, a note on SDA-207-011 to 014 may be useful in helping subsequent researchers avoid a possible pitfall. These papers comprise correspondence addressed to the Bishop of Salford from the Central Board of the Traders' Defence Associations of the United Kingdom, in opposition to the Co-operative Movement, clergy support of it, and (in particular) to the bishop's addressing a Co-operative Society meeting. While the Board's Secretary has given letter SDA-207-011 the date 6 January 1903 (within Bilsborrow's episcopate, which must be why these papers have found their way into this box), it seems clear from the opening of letter SDA-207-012 of 12 January 1904 (in the episcopate of Bilsborrow's successor, Bishop Casartelli) that SDA-207-011 should have been dated 6 January 1904 and that SDA-207-011 to 014 actually pertain to Casartelli's, not Bilsborrow's, time as Bishop of Salford.

DIARIES AND OTHER SUCH MATERIAL

The more personal side of Bilsborrow's life figures in SDA-207, in addition to the public side. The source here is the notebook SDA-207-004, which contains his 'Diario Romano 1880', his 'Notes at Rome on Rome' (covering the period from April to summer 1881), his 'Notes on Loretto' (sic) and his 'Notes on the Journey fr[om] Rome', with details of some money in 1881-1882 at their end. This notebook also has further details of travel from Rome to England, noted under 'Trains to England'; 'Distances on Route to England' are recorded too. A list of intentions for Masses which Bilsborrow had celebrated appears in this notebook. An inventory of his clothing as Bishop of Salford is also included here, showing that his style of dressing was quite simple: he had, for instance, only one overcoat, one hat and one mackintosh.

OTHER RELEVANT MATERIAL IN SALFORD DIOCESAN ARCHIVES

While SDA-207 covers the major aspects of Bilsborrow's work apart from his work for Catholic schools, and this article mentions all the items in it, the relatively small amount of Bilsborrow archive material in the Salford Diocesan Archives makes it desirable to offer a summary of the main Bilsborrow papers and relevant material there. After his Acta, Pastoral Letters, faculties from Rome and copies of the Salford Diocesan Directory during his time as Bishop, these are listed chronologically according to earliest year and are as follows:

CONCLUSION

The certificate of Bilsborrow's death, on 5 March 1903, is provided at SDA-207-008 in an official certified copy dating from 1916 and attests, not only to the death of a man, but to the closure of a significant episcopate in the history of Victorian Catholicism. Not all Bilsborrow's attitudes have worn well: his unwillingness to grant dispensations for mixed marriages and his opposition to attendance by Catholics at the universities spring to mind here. Neither was he much interested in secular politics. But he was 'a solidly read man' (as Philip Hughes describes him), who shepherded his numerically large diocese effectively through the decade before the build-up of the Modernist crisis. His time as Bishop of Salford was a decade of expansion which saw the Catholic population of the diocese rise by over fifty thousand; it saw the opening of new missions and also of new schools, which were particularly badly needed. It now awaits an in-depth researcher's work. This article may contribute towards facilitating that, as well as familiarizing archivists with a body of material about John Bilsborrow's episcopate.

BOOK REVIEWS

Enchiridion Dei Beni Culturali Della Chiesa (Bologna: Edizioni Dehoniane, 2002, pp.xliii + 682). This compendium, in Italian and with an Introduction by Archbishop (now Cardinal) Francesco Marchisano, gathers together all the official documents issued by the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church (and its predecessor) from 1989 to 2002. It also lists the engagements of the Commission's officials for 1989 and for 2000-2001. The comparison is striking, in that the growth in activity serves as a reminder of the crucial rôle played by the Commission in the life of the universal Church. Moreover, it is heartening to find a number of references to the Catholic Archives Society embedded in this voluminous publication. Although not of great value except to those who can read Italian, this collection is, nevertheless, a significant contribution to the ever-expanding corpus of the Church's archival literature.

Ailsa C. Holland & Kate Manning (edits.), Archives and Archivists (Dublin: Four Courts Press, 2006, pp. 230). This beautifully produced volume marks the thirtieth anniversary of the beginning of the formal training of archivists in Ireland. In particular, it celebrates the achievements of the Archives Department of University College Dublin (UCD) from its inception in 1971 to its merger with the School of History in 2005, now forming the School of History and Archives. The School offers the only professional course in archival studies in Ireland – from September 2006 an M.A. in Archives and Records Management. The fifteen essays in this collection cover the following topics: digitisation; medieval manuscripts; the use of the UCD Archives; education; archival ethics; local developments (Wexford and Waterford); corporate archives; an archival comparison between Ireland and South Africa; the Chester Beatty Library; the Lindsay Anderson diaries; architectural records; the destruction of records; and archives in everyday life. However, from a Catholic point of view, two chapters are of particular interest. Marianne Cosgrave (since 1996 the Congregational Archivist for the Sisters of Mercy in Ireland) and David Sheehy (until recently Archivist of the Archdiocese of Dublin) have co-authored 'The preservation and management of the archives of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland, 1850-2005.' In a broad sweep, including a tribute to the pioneering influence of Robert Dudley Edwards, who established the Archives Department at UCD, and an assessment of the archival implications of recent abuse scandals, the essay offers a very useful insight into the growth in professionalism among the archivists of Ireland's Catholic institutions. Elizabeth Mullins, author of the second contribution of special interest to Catholic archivists, lectures at the School of History and Archives at UCD. She offers a study of Father John MacErlean S.J. (1870-1950) and his rôle in the development of the Irish Jesuit Archive. Before beginning his work as Province Historian in 1927, MacErlean, spent a number of years seeking out primary sources. Having started off in London, he went on to comb the Continent in pursuit of archival treasures pertinent to Irish Jesuit history. The transcriptions and research notes gathered and compiled by this intrepid archivist and historian form an important part of the modern Irish Jesuit Archive in Dublin.

Michael C. Questier (edit.), Newsletters from the Caroline Court, 1631-1638: Catholicism and the Politics of the Personal Rule (Cambridge University Press for the Royal Historical Society, London, 2005 [Camden Fifth Series, vol.26], pp.xvi + 358). The newsletters in question were written by Catholics who enjoyed access to the Court of King Charles I and Queen Henrietta Maria. The original documents are preserved among the papers of the English secular clergy in the Westminster Diocesan Archives (the A & B Series and the Old Brotherhood Archives), and so it is only right that Father Ian Dickie's name is the first among those acknowledged. Michael Questier's scholarly introduction, as well as his editing of the texts themselves, also reveals recourse to the Vatican Archives and the Jesuit Archives in Rome and at Farm Street. It is particularly gratifying, from a Catholic archival perspective, that Dr Questier's work has found its place as part of such a prestigious series.

It has sometimes been remarked that the architecture of Catholic churches in England and Wales has little to offer. Christopher Martin, A Glimpse of Heaven: Catholic Churches of England and Wales (Catholic Bishops' Conference of England & Wales/English Heritage, Swindon, 2006, pp.223) puts paid to such a view. With a Preface by Sir Neil Cossons, Chairman of English Heritage, a Foreword by Cardinal Cormac Murphy O'Connor (Co-Patron of the Catholic Archives Society), and a beautifully crafted text lavishly illustrated by the photographs of Alex Ramsay, this book traces, in chronological sequence, the development of Catholic ecclesiastical building in England and Wales from before the Reformation (in that a number of Catholic places of worship still in use pre-date the Reformation, e.g. St Amand's Chapel, East Hendred and Stonor Park Chapel) to the late twentieth century (the last building featured is the new Brentwood Cathedral (opened in 1991). While acknowledging the work of Brian Little and Denis Evinson, the author also expresses his thanks to, among others, Abbot Geoffrey Scott, who is not only President of the Catholic Archives Society but also a member of the Patrimony Committee of the Bishops' Conference, and Michael Hodgetts, an historian well known to many readers of this journal. This publication serves to put the treasures of Catholic church architecture very firmly 'on the map', not only for the benefit of the Church herself – as a reminder of our heritage and the importance of caring for it – but also for the wider (secular) architectural and artistic community. Indeed, the book received a number of very good reviews in the national press at the time of its launch in November 2006.

Michael Greenslade, Catholic Staffordshire 1500-1850 (Leominster: Gracewing, 2006, pp. xxi + 297). The author died less than a month after writing the Preface to this book, which, being the fruit of many years of devoted labour on the subject, will serve not only as the standard account of Catholicism in Staffordshire from the Reformation to the Restoration of the Hierarchy, but also as a posthumous tribute to perhaps the leading and most professional local historian of English Catholicism of recent years. Archivaly, the book has its roots chiefly in the Staffordshire Record Office, the William Salt Library, Stafford, the Birmingham Archdiocesan Archives, and the Lichfield Record Office. Those who knew or met Michael Greenslade will not be surprised at the high standard of scholarship and command of subject-matter to be found in these pages.

From a whole county to a single mission, Father David Higham's The Priests and People of Harvington 1580-2006: A History of the Catholic Mission of Harvington, Worcestershire (Leominster: Gracewing, 2006, pp. x + 197) chronicles the development of one of the best known Catholic centres in the West Midlands, indeed in the whole of England. However, notwithstanding the fascination of Harvington Hall and its Saint Nicholas Owen hides, the book is much more than an account of the era of the martyrs and the recusant period. Written by the present incumbent, it makes good use of parish archives and draws together each aspect of Harvington's rich tradition: buildings, gentry, clergy, ordinary folk, the library of the secular clergy, the school, pilgrimages, almshouses, and local houses of Catholic interest. There are also very useful biographies and bibliographies of the priests who have served at Harvington, including Hugh Tootell (alias Charles Dodd the Church historian) and Monsignor James Crichton, one of the pioneers of the post-Vatican II Liturgical Movement in the English-speaking world. Reading this book offers one an opportunity to glimpse the wealth of Catholic tradition in one corner of rural England.

William Poynter was consecrated titular Bishop of Halia in 1803 and served as Coadjutor to John Douglass, Vicar Apostolic of the London District, until the latter's death in 1812. Poynter then succeeded to the London District, where he remained until his own death in 1827. Canon Peter Phillips has edited The Diaries of Bishop William Poynter V.A. (1815-1824) (Catholic Record Society, London, 2006: Records Series volume 79, pp.v + 293), and it is particularly fitting that he, a distinguished Edmundian himself, has been responsible for this publication given that Poynter was so much associated with St Edmund's College, Old Hall Green, where was appointed as its first Vice-President in 1795 and seven years later became President, an office he continued to hold after his episcopal consecration and which he only relinquished upon succeeding to the London District. The surviving diaries cover the years 1815, 1817-1819, 1821-1822, and 1824, with just three entries for 1816 and two for 1820. As with all the volumes in the CRS's Records Series, this book is very much a case of 'bringing archives to life', not simply by the fact that original (and, given their age, potentially vulnerable) manuscripts have been introduced into the public forum, but also because its appearance adds to our knowledge and understanding of a critical period in the history of the Church in England as the struggle for Emancipation gathered pace. The diaries also contain references to Poynter's involvement, as Vicar Apostolic, with the foreign missions and offer an insight into the problems of the Church in France in the post-revolutionary period as they affected England, e.g. the émigré clergy and the Blanchardist schism. The original diaries form part of the St Edmund's College Archives, now kept in the Westminster Diocesan Archives (SEC 15/2-3). The editor has provided an introduction and copious footnotes, as well as indices of people and missions/churches in addition to a general index. This volume will serve not only as a tribute to an important figure in the history of the Church in England but should also act as an encouragement to would-be editors as a model of painstaking commitment to a task lovingly undertaken.

Pamela J. Gilbert, The Restless Prelate: Bishop Peter Baines 1786-1843 (Leominster: Gracewing, 2006, pp. xii + 276). Restless, certainly, and most definitely a prelate, Bishop Baines, who was educated by the English Benedictines at Lamspringe and thereafter entered the monastery at Ampleforth, stands as just about the most controversial figure in the history of English Catholicism in the first half of the nineteenth century. The fortunes of the Western District, centred upon Bath and Baines' own protégé, Prior Park, lie at the heart of this study, and while none of the less appetising elements in the story are ignored (ecclesiastical in-fighting, financial mismanagement etc.), the author helps us to appreciate the difficulties under which her subject laboured. The book is timely in that it resurrects not simply a complex character but places into context, as only the distance of time can, the career of a fervent, if often misguided and certainly misunderstood, champion of Catholicism in the period immediately before and after Emancipation. Pamela Gilbert's archival quarries have included: Ampleforth, Downside, the Bristol Record Office, Clifton Diocesan Archives, the Jesuit Provincial Archives, Farm Street, and the records formerly at St John's Presbytery, Bath (and now in the Clifton Diocesan Archives).

The demise of Bishop Baines was followed by the episcopal career of another Benedictine, this time a Gregorian (Downside). It is fair to say that the appearance of Judith Champ's William Bernard Ullathorne: A Different Kind of Monk (Leominster: Gracewing, 2006, pp. xvi + 538) truly fills a gap in our understanding of nineteenth-century Catholicism. Her book is the result of years of painstaking research rigorously and lovingly conducted, and (pace Cuthbert Butler) provides the first modern account of Ullathorne, treating as it does not only its subject's early career as a monk and as a pioneer of the Australian mission (the subject of Ullathorne's own autobiography), but his immense importance as a diocesan bishop as well as a national figure. In the latter regard it has often been remarked that Ullathorne was overshadowed by Wiseman, Manning and Newman. Whatever the truth of such a view, Judith Champ has left us in her debt by her incisive treatment of one of the giants of Victorian Catholicism. Her treatment of Ullathorne's relations with women religious, most notably Mother Margaret Mary Hallahan, foundress of the Dominican Congregation of St Catherine of Siena of Stone, is especially enlightening. As one might imagine, the archival pedigree of this book is outstanding, including as it does material gathered from collections that may be grouped into the following categories: international (Propaganda Fide); diocesan (Birmingham, Westminster, Southwark, Dublin, Sydney, Leeds, Clifton and Cardiff); male religious (Downside, Ampleforth and the Society of Jesus); women religious (the Sisters of Charity of St Paul, Selly Park, Stanbrook Abbey, the Dominicans of Stone, St Mary's Abbey, Colwich, the Sisters of Charity, Australia, and the Sisters of Mercy, Handsworth); collegiate (the Venerable English College, Rome, Oscott, Ushaw and the Irish College, Paris); and Oratorian (the Newman Archive at the Birmingham Oratory).

The third English episcopal biography to have appeared within the last year is Martin John Broadley's Louis Charles Casartelli: A Bishop in Peace and War (Manchester: Koinonia, 2006, pp. x + 301), a meticulously researched and referenced study of the fourth Bishop of Salford (1903-1925) and a book which deserves a wide readership. Casartelli (1852-1925) was an internationally renowned orientalist and a scholar with an immense personal bibliography whose talent and calibre had been recognised by Herbert Vaughan when he himself was Bishop of Salford (1870-1892). As a bishop Casartelli stood out from the majority of his episcopal brethren in that not only was he a professional academic, but he saw the need to reach out intellectually and pastorally to non-Catholics as well as to his own flock. Hence his membership of various secular learned societies in Manchester and beyond. Although he was not perhaps one of the most approachable of ordinaries in one sense – the Salford clergy were expected to deal with his Vicar General in the first instance - Bishop Casartelli was nevertheless a pioneer in terms of galvanizing the power and influence of the laity. Indeed, one of his principal achievements, in addition to an enduring association with St Bede's College, Manchester, was to instigate the now internationally-organised Catenian Association. Apart from the Salford Diocesan Archives, on whose team Father Broadley serves, the following collections were among those consulted: Westminster, Birmingham, Southwark and Liverpool Archdiocesan Archives; the Duke of Norfolk's Archives at Arundel Castle; the Vatican Archives; Downside Abbey Archives (Cardinal Gasquet's Papers); the National Library of Wales (Bishop Hedley's Papers); Propaganda Fide Archives; and the Archives of St Bede's College, Manchester, St Edmund's College, Cambridge, the University of Louvain, and Ushaw College (Casartelli Letters). Of special interest to the reviewer was the author's analysis of Casartelli's response to the First World War and his rôle in episcopal action at that time directed towards forestalling Cardinal Bourne's attempts to effect the division of dioceses. The full story of that difficult chapter in early twentieth-century English Catholic history has still to be written, but Broadley opens up yet another avenue in the saga. His book will also complement the earlier part of Kester Aspden's recent study (Fortress Church: The English Roman Catholic Bishops and Politics 1903-1963, reviewed in Catholic Archives 23, pp.103-104), offering as it does a most timely insight into one of the greatest minds to have graced the episcopal bench in England and Wales.

Magdalen Goffin, The Watkin Path, An Approach to Belief: The Life of E.I.Watkin (Brighton/Portland: Sussex Academic Press, 2006, pp.xiii + 321). Written by one of his daughters, this book is not only a biography of the Catholic philosopher Edward Ingram Watkin (1888-1981), it also acts as a commentary on the Catholic revival which flourished in England in the wake of the earlier Modernist crisis. In addition to Watkin himself, the renaissance of the 1920s and 1930s, the effects of which were felt well into the post-war era, counted among its protagonists such figures as Watkin's great friend

Christopher Dawson, as well as Ronald Knox, Frank Sheed, Maisie Ward, and Tom Burns. The author has made extensive use of family papers, especially letters to and from her father's numerous correspondents drawn from the worlds of scholarship, politics and the Church. She writes movingly of Watkin's friendship with Don Luigi Sturzo, the Sicilian priest who led the anti-Fascist Partito Popolare in Italy until exiled to England under Mussolini, and she also makes particularly good use of the letters and reminiscences of her brother Christopher (the late Dom Aelred Watkin of Downside). E. I. Watkin's life was not without its controversial episodes, and these the author tackles in a forthright manner. Nor does she fail to expose the weaknesses of the pre-Conciliar Church – or indeed some of the less successful results of the Second Vatican Council – but the book is an example not of filial hagiography but of intelligent, critical pietas. The reviewer happened to read the studies of Watkin and Casartelli almost simultaneously, and found it instructive to discover that both the philosopher and the bishop were men who, in their different spheres, sought to reinvigorate the way in which Catholics approached their religion.

Brother Edmund Damian, Heyday of the Teaching Brothers: The Story of the De La Salle Brothers of the London District 1945-1958 (De La Salle Brothers, 140 Banbury Road, Oxford OX2 7BP, 2006, pp. viii + 210). In 2000, Brother Damian FSC, archivist for the De La Salle Brothers and the then CAS treasurer, published Welcome Invaders: The Story of those French Brothers of the District of Nantes who came between 1904 and 1939 to Work in England. Since then, Brother Damian, in his own words, has not been 'wasting my time since I ceased to be the Brothers' archivist' and he has now followed his earlier work with this new volume, divided into three parts. First, Brother Damian describes the organisation of the Brothers in London in the mid-nineteenth century, their government, training and everyday life, the management of their communities and their schools, their anniversaries, conferences, and vocations. In the second part he describes the individual schools and colleges in more detail, and part three consists of lengthy biographies of those individual brothers from that period who are now dead. The book will interest anyone connected with the De La Salle Brothers and anyone who wants to know about its individuals, institutions and work in England. It will also interest anyone studying the background of those who followed their vocations into religious life, as well as anyone concerned with twentieth-century Catholic education and Catholic life.

The Catholic Archives Society Conference, 2006

The Catholic Archives Society held its Annual Conference from 22 to 24 May 2006 at Ushaw College, Durham. The speaker on Monday evening was Andrew Nicoll, Keeper of the Scottish Catholic Archives, whose paper ('Catholic Archives in the Twenty-First Century: The Scottish Experience') is reproduced on pages 30-35 of this edition of Catholic Archives.

The talk due to be given by Father Stewart Foster on Tuesday morning ('Bishop Bernard Ward: An Historian's Use of Archives') was cancelled owing to the speaker being unwell. It is, however, hoped to publish this paper in a future number of Catholic Archives. However, the session allotted for this talk was used most profitably by the Chairwoman and other Officers of the Society to discuss points of interest and concern. Miss Jennifer Gill, County Archivist of Durham, then spoke on 'Developments in Archive Record-keeping in Durham', in which she outlined the usefulness (and the pitfalls) of computer technology in archive administration. The visit to Durham County Record Office on Tuesday afternoon was thus particularly appreciated by the conference delegates, giving them as it did an opportunity to meet the staff of the Record Office and to view some of the items referred to in Miss Gill's talk.

On Wednesday morning two further members of staff from the Durham Record Office addressed the conference. Liz Bregazzi (Senior Assistant Archivist) and Gill Parkes (Assistant Archivist, Cataloguing) focused on the educational programmes undertaken by the Record Office, in particular giving a description of the use of the latest digitisation techniques for photographs and other images. The conference also included the traditional Open Forum session and the Annual General Meeting of the Catholic Archives Society. For a full report on the 2006 Annual Conference, please refer to pages 6-11 of CAS Bulletin 30 (February 2007).

The Annual Conference of the Catholic Archives Society in 2007 will be held at Hinsley Hall, Leeds, from 21 to 23 May.

EDITORIAL NOTES

In the 2008 issue of the journal the Editor is pleased to be able to publish the text of a talk given by Margaret Harcourt Williams, Secretary of the Catholic Archives Society, at the Conference of the Religious Archives Group. The Conference, which had as its theme 'The State of Religious Archives in the UK Today', was also the setting for Father Nicholas Schofield's article on the Westminster Diocesan Archives. Its publication in Catholic Archives marks the first appearance in this journal of any detailed account of what is the most important Catholic diocesan archive in England and Wales. This year's journal also carries the second part of Sarah Jane Stanton's thesis on access to Catholic Archives in England and Wales. The Editor is also most grateful to the authorities of the Venerable English College, Rome, for their kind permission to publish two articles on that institution's recent Archive Project: the Vice-Rector, Father Andrew Headon, outlines the background, and Iris Jones, the Venerable's Project Archivist, then gives a personal account of her involvement in what must be one of the most exciting archival endeavours in recent times. The journal is also grateful to His Eminence Cardinal Tauran for permission to reproduce his Address delivered on the occasion of the re-opening of the Archives and Third Library at the College. The final contribution this year comes from Dr John Davies, writing on Holy Week in Rome in 1863 using archival evidence from a prominent Unitarian family in Liverpool.

One of the strengths of this journal is that it receives material for publication not only from those who are already members of the Catholic Archives Society, but also from archivists and historians who have come into contact with the collections of Catholic institutions in other ways. Both categories of contributors are much appreciated, and the Editor is again grateful to all who have supplied articles for Catholic Archives. Nevertheless, and as these Editorial Notes pointed out last year, the principal responsibility for the future of the journal must still rest with the willingness of the Society's existing members to share their expertise in the public forum. Experience shows that the appearance of an article in Catholic Archives, as well as acting as a stimulus to those who are beginning the archival adventure, also encourages new members to join the Society.

CATHOLIC ARCHIVES AND THE CATHOLIC ARCHIVES SOCIETY

Margaret Harcourt Williams

I am here today to speak on Catholic archives. For this, I shall draw on what I have learnt from twenty years of membership of the Catholic Archives Society, for about half of which I have been the Honorary Secretary. I shall try to give an overview of what Catholic archives in the United Kingdom consist of, who looks after them, some of their problems, and the rôle of the society I represent. I am aware that there are quite a lot of CAS members present today, so apologies in advance to anyone who does not hear anything new.

Catholic archives are very extensive. When I attended my first CAS conference in the 1980s I was amazed at the number of organizations that had representatives there. I was already aware that the Catholic Church in the United Kingdom had a network of parishes and dioceses, schools, hospitals and societies, and male and female religious communities: I should have realized that they would be creating archives. However, the numbers and range really were a surprise. I will begin this overview with dioceses and attempt to summarize what the archives are and how they are looked after. I will do the same for religious and monastic orders and will then try to cover the Catholic community's other archive-creating bodies.

There are twenty-two Catholic dioceses in England and Wales, eight in Scotland and four in Northern Ireland (of which a number include parts of the Republic of Ireland). There is also a Bishopric of the Forces. However, I am most familiar with the archives of the English and Welsh dioceses so what I am saying here relates to them. This is not to imply in any way that the archives of other parts of the United Kingdom or the Republic of Ireland are not equally extensive or worthy of attention. In Scotland, for example, there is a central archive, the Scottish Catholic Archives in Edinburgh, in which there are diocesan archives, other administrative records and private and family papers; the archives of the Scots Colleges abroad are chiefly managed from there, and the archivists also advise local religious orders.

Returning to England and Wales, the dioceses here were formed at various dates after 1850. I will summarize, very briefly, the ecclesiastical organization for Catholics in England and Wales during Penal Times. Catholics, who did not conform to the Elizabethan religious settlement, were, for the first twenty years or so after that settlement, without any formal administrative structure. Then in 1581 the Pope appointed Cardinal Allen to be Prefect of the English Mission. He lived in Europe (chiefly in Rome) but in the later part of the sixteenth century and the early seventeenth century, archpriests resident in England were given authority over the English Catholic clergy. Then, from later in the seventeenth century until the mid-nineteenth century, the English and Welsh Mission was divided into Districts administered by Vicars Apostolic. In 1850 the English and Welsh Hierarchy was restored and a structure of Catholic dioceses and bishops re-established. Additionally, by the mid-nineteenth century, a pattern of parishes was developing.

All the English and Welsh dioceses have or have had diocesan archivists. I use the past tense here because some dioceses are at present without archivists due to the death of the person in post. However, there is no reason to suppose they will not be replaced. There is an Association of Diocesan Archivists, a sub-group of the Catholic Archives Society, which meets annually to discuss matters of mutual interest. Many diocesan archivists are priests. They have to combine this rôle with other duties - usually the care of a parish - and the time they can devote to the archives varies. Some priests work as archivists for several days each week, others rely greatly on the help of lay people, who may be employees or volunteers. Some use help from pre-archive course students. The Archdiocese of Westminster has engaged a professionally-trained archivist on a finite contract to assist the priest who is diocesan archivist. The Birmingham Archdiocesan Archives, where there are enviable search and strong rooms, has a priest-archivist who is there for four days a week, as well as a trio of volunteers, one of whom deals solely with genealogical enquiries.

Accommodation for diocesan archives varies greatly. Some have purpose-built or purposely-adapted accommodation, others are not so fortunate. Whatever the accommodation, many (if not most) diocesan archivists would like more space and say lack of space limits what they can do. The contents of such archives vary. The archives of a diocese will comprise whatever is produced by the diocesan administration and related bodies and considered worthy of preservation. Generally speaking, however, diocesan archives are for this sort of diocesan material and are not repositories for Catholic archives from a particular area. Nevertheless, this cannot be a hard-and-fast rule, especially given the difficulties of finding suitable storage for many archives, and I am sure all the diocesan archivists here today could give examples of collections they hold that are not strictly diocesan. There are a lot of archives to be stored: the Diocese of Nottingham, for example, has nearly 300m of shelving in use. In the older dioceses the archives will include surviving records of the Districts and earlier administrative bodies that I have mentioned already; most, if not all, dioceses will have archives from the eighteenth century, if not before.

There will also be a secret or closed archive, to which only the bishop of a diocese has access. 'Secret' in this context means 'private', and not secret in a more usual, twenty-first-century use of the term. The purpose of this archive is not to hide secrets but to hold information that legitimately should not be made available. Files on living clergy are the most obvious example, but there could also be records of matters confided to the bishop alone and which would constitute a breach of trust should they become public.

Dioceses have varying arrangements for the care of parish records. All diocesan archivists are concerned about the continuing secure preservation of such material. Some actively collect it, some would do so if they had more space, while others have arranged to transfer the registers to the appropriate local authority record office. In some dioceses the archivist carries out regular surveys to ensure they are being taken proper care of within the parishes. In Wales, at least one diocese has transferred its older archives to the National Library of Wales in Aberystwyth.

Moving to religious and monastic orders: here too the archives are older and more extensive than might at first be thought. Religious houses for English men and women flourished in Catholic Europe during the period in which they could not exist in England, and there are still religious communities that are direct descendents of these sixteenth- or seventeenth-century foundations. For many of them, the French Revolution prompted their return to this country, where by the late eighteenth century conditions for Catholics had improved. Their archives cover the time spent in both Europe and England, and the one I am most familiar with has significant archives relating to seventeenth- and eighteenth-century Flanders. The twentieth century was marked by a vast increase in the numbers of religious orders throughout Britain. Some were founded here, while others came to this country from mainland Europe and Ireland. They were both contemplative and active, in the latter case conducting schools and hospitals as well as providing other types of educational and social care. Still other religious orders came from France in the early twentieth century. All have archives.

The Second Vatican Council recommended that religious orders looked again at their roots. One result of this was that the orders became increasingly aware of their history and archives. Anniversaries such as centenaries or sesqui-centenaries of arrival in Britain, or of the foundation of schools and colleges and, more poignantly, the wish to preserve a record of their work in the face of closures and shrinking numbers, have all contributed to the desire to have the archives carefully ordered, preserved and made available for use. Additionally, many religious orders regard their founders or foundresses as among the Church's holy people – indeed many are already canonized saints- and would like this to be better known throughout the Church. Archives can be both evidential and supporting records in the prolonged and complicated process of putting forward someone's cause for canonization.

When I was preparing this talk, several archivists of religious orders generously provided me with details of what they do. Although these tasks vary according to the size of the order and the amount of time an archivist has available, they are all valuable. They include work such as cataloguing, conservation and preservation, answering queries, processing transfers of semi-current records, supervising researchers, promoting the archives, giving advice about archives to houses in the same religious congregation - especially to any facing closure - finding the whereabouts of related material and developing contacts with local and national archive and heritage bodies. Additionally, the archivist of a religious community or congregation is often expected to be its historian and chronicler. This may involve researching the order's foundations, writing histories, maintaining annals and encouraging others to do the same, making audio recordings of older members, recording details of past and present members, as well as finding and arranging for the maintenance of where they are buried.

What is in these archives? There are personal files on members, other administrative records such as title deeds, annals, constitutions, financial papers, correspondence and records of the order's development and work in the local community. This may have been and continue to be schools and colleges, industrial schools, special schools for the blind and deaf, hospitals, homes for the elderly, children's homes and orphanages, pastoral work in parishes and centres for the homeless. Additionally, members from this country working overseas will also generate records.

One respondent reminded me that her congregation today has members from England and Wales working in Ethiopia, Fiji, Haiti and Kenya and until fifty years ago had sisters in China. Others have records of work in India and Africa.

How are the records stored? As with diocesan archives, this varies but there is a general lack of storage space. Some religious houses have very well equipped strong-rooms, others make do with a variety of cupboards and filing cabinets and most are probably somewhere in between. Nevertheless, the need to be aware of BS 5454 and to seek professional advice in preparing and maintaining an archive store is taken seriously. What can such records be used for? Internal administrative enquiries, genealogy, spirituality, local and national history, especially social and women's history are some examples. There is a very active 'History of Women Religious in Britain and Ireland' research group. From the larger, better equipped archives there is some willingness to be included in the wider archival picture and to be involved in local history projects, the Archive Awareness Campaign and the London Open House.

Dioceses and religious orders are the largest creators of Catholic archives, but there are also smaller groups holding significant amounts of material. One such example would be the seminaries, of which there are now four in England. There used to be more. All have both an historic archive and modern administrative papers, covering not only all aspects of training for the priesthood but also the related financial and business management of a large establishment. Of the four existing seminaries, one, Oscott College near Birmingham, has deposited its archives in the Birmingham Archdiocesan Archives, where they are being catalogued and where a programme for the management of current and semi-current records and their regular transfer to the diocesan archives is under discussion.

Then there are the English Colleges abroad. These seminaries were very important to Catholic life in Penal Times and two, the Colleges in Rome and Valladolid, are still fully involved in training priests for England and Wales. As with the other English institutions abroad, the Colleges hold not only records relating to their primary (educational) purpose and to local English Catholic communities, but also have significant material for their own geographical areas. The archives of St Alban's Royal English College, Valladolid, for example, are especially important to that city and to the Province of Castille, as they survived intact in the wake of both the Peninsular Wars and the Spanish Civil War. The Valladolid archivist, who is a parish priest in London, visits the college regularly and a modern catalogue should be completed by the end of this year. At the Venerable English College in Rome, a state-of-the-art archive room has just been opened and re-cataloguing is in progress. Eventually, it is hoped that there will be a published catalogue of the archives of all seven (i.e. both current and closed) English continental colleges.

There are also numerous Catholic lay societies to consider. These groups may have or have had many branches, as well as a regional, national or international basis, and their archives have no obvious home. Some societies have deposited their records with an obliging diocesan archivist, but many are too widely dispersed throughout the country to make this a realistic option. Some have deposited their archives with relevant institutions, for example the Women's Library has the archives of what was once the Catholic Women's Suffrage Society. The late Robin Gard, a former Chairman of the Catholic Archives Society and founding editor of its journal Catholic Archives, laboured energetically to locate the records of lay societies, but no one has continued his work. Many of the societies have members - often present or former secretaries - keeping a box or boxes of records in their study or garage, and anxious to ensure that their archives should be properly ordered and suitable secure storage found for them. At present, this is difficult to achieve and these are, in my view, the Catholic archives whose future is most uncertain.

Additionally, there are Catholic archives in local authority or other record offices. These, especially in the North West of England, may hold extensive material relating to Catholic families, which, while not necessarily fully catalogued, are in safe custody. However, you may be thinking that this is all very interesting but that, after all, the Catholic Church is only one of a number of bodies represented here today. Many local authority record offices are official repositories for Church of England records, so why shouldn't Catholic records go there in the same way as these do or as the records of smaller Christian bodies do? Are Catholic archives being thought of as something separate and distinct, differentiated in some obscure way from the wider body of archives? The answer lies partly in the volume of Catholic archives and their complexity and international nature. I have touched on this already but even after nearly twenty years of active involvement, I know that I cannot summarize this adequately. To make matters more difficult, there is no obvious physical location for some of these archives. The superior of a religious order may be on perfectly good terms with the bishops of all the dioceses where that congregation has houses, but nevertheless he or she is independent and not under direct episcopal authority in the same way as the local diocesan clergy. Likewise, any particular lay Catholic institution or society may have or have had branches throughout the country and, while approved by the local bishop, nevertheless be independent of any parish or diocesan administration. Some of the organizations concerned have a chain of responsibility leading outside the British Isles, and there are already examples of religious orders transferring all their archives to a headquarters in Rome or to another house of the congregation in, for example, Italy, France or the United States or possibly elsewhere. It is a complicated mixture.

What other problems face Catholic archives today? I have already mentioned the lack of a place for the deposit of small archives or records whose continuing secure preservation is under threat. This is probably the most serious problem. In part, this is being addressed by the proposed 'Archive for Religious Orders' project at Douai Abbey, near Reading. This is a plan to gather the archives of closed monastic and religious communities into a new purpose-built repository. An appeal for funds was launched just before Christmas 2006 and is going well. However, this initiative, welcome though it is, cannot solve the problem on its own. The most difficult questions I have to answer as Secretary of the Catholic Archives Society are the ones about future storage, since there is no satisfactory reply that I can give. One possible (at least partial) solution would be for religious orders and communities to group their archives together, but this has yet to be discussed. It needs someone to take the initiative. Another difficulty is that many Catholic archivists, especially in religious orders, come into archive work after they have finished one or even two careers. They have to go through a vast learning curve to become familiar with the archives and may already have other jobs within their community. Many work in relative isolation and have limited professional contacts, while interesting their fellow priests, brothers and sisters in the archives can be an uphill task. However conscientious and interested they are, they are not usually in a position to develop close links with the wider world of archives. Some take one of the archive courses, some enroll on distance learning programmes, while others regret they have not been offered these opportunities. There is a constant demand for simple training and, with one exception, all the Catholic Archives Society's training days have been oversubscribed.

Many of the problems I have outlined will be the same for most, if not all, small and/or specialist repositories, in regard to which it can be very difficult to persuade people, particularly those responsible for money or personnel, that archives can be exciting, interesting and informative, and thus are worth preserving. The demands of public access can also be a source of difficulty. Catholic archives are private and, in the case of religious orders, are thought of as family archives. While it is true that many archivists welcome researchers, there is no automatic right of access. Opening hours for Catholic archives may be limited and the archivists may have little time to answer enquiries. Some standardization of practice would be welcome, e.g. a widely used set of search room rules.

So how does the Catholic Archives Society fit into this? It is an advisory body that aims to bring together for advice and support people who are looking after Catholic archives, as well as anyone from the wider archival or academic world who sympathizes with this aim. The society tries to do this by providing information and advice, by arranging meetings and training opportunities and by an active programme of publications. The Catholic Archives Society is not itself an archive repository, it does not have any archives other than its own and it does not collect archives. It began in 1979 when a number of people met to discuss the care and management of the Catholic archives for which some of them were responsible. The archive profession was well represented at the outset and, as it became clear there was a demand for even the most basic advice and a willingness to give it, a society was formally established. Today there is an annual conference and an annually-published journal (Catholic Archives), as well as the CAS Bulletin produced once or twice yearly. There are also training days, leaflets giving basic advice, occasional papers with more detailed treatment of particular topics, a presence on the Catholic history web-site (www.catholic-history.org.uk) and visits to European countries to look at archives there. Currently there are about 230 members, the majority of whom are non-archivists looking after archives. The CAS is an independent body, with no constitutional links with any other organization and no funding other than what comes from members' subscriptions and the sale of publications. The society now has more than twenty-five years of experience devoted to promoting best practice in the care and management of ecclesiastical archives and in communicating the variety, problems and strengths of Catholic archives to the formal administration of both the Catholic Church in Britain and Ireland and to the archive profession. The society is a forum where anyone who has been asked to 'take on the archives' can obtain advice and learn from what others are doing. The thrice yearly mailings provide an opportunity to inform members of meetings, training events and wider initiatives in the worlds of both religious archives and archives in general. I do, therefore, urge that one result of today's conference is that use is made of this network and that all organizations and individuals concerned with the future of religious archives communicate and work together as far as possible.

The Catholic Archives Society is run by volunteers, and many members have been hugely generous with their time, both in giving advice and in encouraging each other. But like most voluntary organizations it is facing a shortage of people with time to become involved. Although the situation is not yet critical, because there are now fewer active members it is beginning to be difficult to sustain what have been core activities. There are opportunities available for anyone with time to help, and any such approaches would be very much welcomed. I would welcome your views on how we can attract younger professionals who could offer fresh ideas. Unlike at the beginning of the CAS, there are now very few professional archivists involved, which means that there is possibly a lack of communication of information on professional issues. As I remarked earlier, lone unqualified archivists, which is what many CAS members are, can lack advice and support, and I think one of the main rôles of the society should be to draw attention to the experience and help the archive profession can offer.

I have tried to summarize what Catholic archives are and how they are being cared for. I have also touched on the main problems and the attempts to solve them. In the context of this conference, what can we do together? In the course of this talk I have mentioned a few areas of possible development or collaboration and you may have further ideas. It would be good to talk about them. Thank you.

PART II

Sarah Jane Stanton

(Produced as part of an MA in Archives and Records Management at University College London under the supervision of Elizabeth Danbury)

2:1 The Resource Problem

Part One of this article (Catholic Archives 27, pp.7-29) discussed intellectual issues regarding access and focused on the following topics: why Catholic archives need protection; whether access to them could be seen as a right or a privilege; and the need for a policy to regulate access. It concluded by stating that, in theory, a variety of users could be accommodated without a problem. In practice, however, this is a somewhat different story since we live in a world of limited resources, where there is insufficient funding available to achieve this ideal situation. Margaret Harcourt Williams asks a very challenging question: How much access can reasonably be expected from a body, such as a small religious order, whose members have numerous other rôles as well as looking after their archives, and how can the wider archive community facilitate this?¹ Part Two will discuss exactly how under-resourced Catholic archives are and what measures can be taken to enable them to maximize their resource potential.

At the root of the problem is money. Looking after archives is expensive and current funds are insufficient. It is a problem faced by the whole domain, not just the religious sector. Father Stewart Foster, Archivist of the Diocese of Brentwood and Editor of Catholic Archives, comments upon how in England and Wales the majority of diocesan archives function on a limited financial budget and much the same can be said for those of religious orders.² It may be helpful – although an over-simplification - to consider archival repositories as broadly falling into one of two categories: viz. those which are trying to care for their archives but feel that their potential is limited and those whose documentary heritage is at serious risk of being lost or destroyed because they have not started to invest in it. The former institutions, which have appointed an archivist, frequently enlist a priest or religious sister who has other duties and 'relatively few dioceses, religious congregations and lay associations in England and Wales have a full-time archivist'.³ This impacts directly on access as it means that the archive can only be open for certain hours in the day or certain days of the week. While most Catholic archives aim to be as accommodating as possible, it is quite unusual to find one which is always open from Monday through to Friday, from 9am to 5pm.⁴ Many archives are very short on space, meaning that they can only accommodate one to three users at a time, sometimes in the same room as the archives are stored.⁵ We find, therefore, a group of archives which are open to external users but which lack the resources for extensive access-centred activities. There was evident frustration among several archivists who do not have the time or money to achieve as much as they wish.

The second level of problems regarding resources encompasses those institutions which have yet to prioritize their archives. Comments on this topic will be more general since it is difficult to gain access to those archives that do not or cannot value external use. One respondent was concerned that many organizations fail to realize how expensive it is to look after archives properly. The seriousness of the problem is shown by a plea in the CAS Bulletin that stated that 'the Provincial Archives are not well housed and there is need for someone to take them over'.⁶ It calls for advice and help, including financial aid. There is a serious concern that if some women's religious orders die out their archives, especially those of single-house contemplative religious foundations, will be lost. When closed houses have been amalgamated with larger communities, their archives have been incorporated into those of the larger communities. Some diocesan archives, such as those at Westminster, will collect homeless records, but most archives are small and under-funded themselves and thus unable to accommodate large amounts of extra material.⁷ Currently, while only temporary solutions have been found, it is difficult to state exactly how under-resourced Catholic archives are. While those visited as part of this analysis all produced remarkable results with what they were given, they are perhaps not the most representative sample. Paul Shaw, for example, believes that the archives of the Poor Servants of the Mother of God are extremely fortunate, well-resourced and well-supported compared to similar institutions in the private or charitable sector.⁸ What is clear, however, is that immediate action must be taken. Some irreplaceable Catholic archives are at risk of being lost forever, and because others are rarely used, the role of the Catholic Church in English and Welsh society remains poorly understood. Due to the diversity of problems, a broad range of solutions will be required. Some archives require additional assistance to broaden their access programme. Others need more basic support to secure suitable accommodation so that access can even be considered. While caring for and making available the records of our past is extremely important, we must recognize, as does Father Foster, that an archive is never going to receive the same priority as a school or hospital.⁹ Since the Catholic Church cannot endlessly fund archival programmes, it is important to think up more imaginative solutions to remedy the situation.

2:2 External Funding

One possible solution for archives is to apply for external funding. There are serious resource inadequacies in the heritage sector and many archives, not just Catholic, find that they are not able to function on a single funding stream.¹⁰ In 1960, Pope John XXIII endorsed applications for aid from secular institutions for archival improvements.¹¹ The Heritage Lottery Fund (HLF) is the main source of funds and has allotted approximately £54 million to archives over the past five years.¹² The two main grants appropriate to Catholic archives are 'Your Heritage Grants' which cover bids of £5,000-£50,000, and 'Heritage Grants' for awards over £50,000.¹³ Organizations are required to make a contribution, in money and in kind, of at least ten percent if they receive more than £50,000 and twenty-five percent if they receive more than £1 million. Grants are affected by government agendas and increased or improved access is usually the underlying theme. Some archives have been awarded funding, including Birmingham Archdiocesan Archives, which has received three injections of financial support, both independently and as part of a consortium. The Poor Servants of the Mother of God show that smaller community archives are also able to benefit. They received funding of £500 towards a display case from Access 2 Archives.¹⁴ Catholic archives, therefore, can be successful in applying for external funding.

These archives, however, seem to be the exception rather than the rule, with two key barriers to Catholic archives applying for funding. Firstly, there is a lack of understanding, bordering on suspicion, in the Catholic archival community about external funding. Secondly, the requirements of the funding bodies do not always correspond to the needs or capabilities of those who require financial assistance. There does seem to be a certain amount of skepticism regarding the government agenda and a desire to keep Catholic archives separately and independently maintained. One archivist stated that the less the government was involved the better! The comment made by several archivists was that they felt unable to apply for funding because they could not produce the matching funding required or meet the access conditions.¹⁵ As previously mentioned, it is not always the case that matching funding has to be found: according to the HLF website, there is no minimum contribution for grants of £5,000-£50,000 and as this can be partially made in kind, utility bills and volunteer time can be included.¹⁶ The prominence of the access agenda is undeniable, but the successes demonstrate that it is compatible with the requirements of private archives. A report of a talk entitled 'The Heritage Lottery Fund and Archives' by Louise Ray, the Archive Lottery Advisor, stating what projects should aim to achieve, is available in the bulletin of the Catholic Archives Society.¹⁷ It appears that Catholic archivists could do with more guidance regarding when it is appropriate to apply and how to go about it. For those who are new to the issue, some preliminary contact details can be found in Appendix Three below.

The reluctance of Catholic archives to apply also indicates a failing on the part of the funding bodies, and there are some serious concerns within the archive community regarding the negative impact of competitive funding. These concerns centre around two key areas. Firstly, the difficulties small archives experience in applying for money on account of the risk of archives developing into a two-tier system in the United Kingdom: i.e. large archives that have the resources to apply for funding; and small archives that really need the money but do not have the capacity to apply.¹⁸ This is relevant for many Catholic archives that have to function with one member of staff, perhaps not even full-time, who may have no professional training and therefore no prior experience of how to write an effective bid. Establishments which had been successful commented how time-consuming and complicated it was to apply.¹⁹ The second key area of concern centres on the fact that financial support is not available for the developments that archives need: viz. the well-trained staff and good preservation programmes essential for extensive use of the archives to become a viable possibility. There is a concern by many archives, not just Catholic ones, that external competitive funds enforce central governance by proxy.²⁰ Inclusion for ethnic minority groups, people under the age of twenty-six and rural dwellers is seen as a high priority, but Father Sharp comments that it can be difficult to link these aims with the holdings of specialist repositories.²¹ After the money has been awarded there are continuing expectations for access that must be met, not always with ease.²² It is easy to see why Catholic archives are reluctant to apply for funding.

While Catholic archives do have access limitations which make them feel that such funds would be inappropriate, they cannot be unique in this regard. There must be other private archives, such as those of businesses and families, which want to set similar restrictions. Many Catholic institutions have, independently, recognized the importance of allowing access to their archives, with objectives similar to the HLF, except that they aim for a less intensive or regular level of access. Two examples will be provided: one project which was advised against applying for funding and another which, as yet, has not chosen to. The Douai Abbey Archives Project is part of a larger initiative at the Abbey, near Reading, which aims to serve the wider community since the closure of the monks' school. Facilities for people wishing to use books and papers are part of this wider development, which will include some space for deposited collections. A former Society of Archivist's Lottery Advisor advised that the project was unlikely to receive a capital grant for the library and archives building because there would be 'insufficient public benefit', but that cataloguing grants might be available once the repository was established.²³ The second example is that of the Sisters of Mercy at St Mary's Convent, Handsworth, Birmingham, who have created a heritage trail, provide tours around their house and have an interactive computer charting the history of their convents in Great Britain – all of which would be of interest to scholars and members of the general public.²⁴ The Sisters of Mercy have been reluctant to apply for funding due to difficulties regarding the access conditions. Both examples seem very deserving of financial assistance. In addition, Liverpool Archdiocesan Archives applied for funding as part of a larger building project. Although their application was turned down, they were encouraged to re-apply. Perhaps the funding bodies need to reconsider their agendas so as better to accommodate the needs of private archives, which are engaged in some very exciting projects to which they wish to encourage access, but to do so on special terms. External funding is still a viable option that should at least be considered by Catholic archives. These archives need to be aware that they are not alone in questioning the applicability of such funding and should try to seek changes rather than being resigned to its irrelevance.

2:3 Collaborative Solutions

The potential benefits of co-operation between Catholic archives will now be studied. A broad spectrum of activities will be discussed ranging from exchanging copies of finding aids to depositing records in another institution. Father Stewart Foster describes how current management of archival heritage is very much a local (diocesan and religious) issue.²⁵ Co-operation, however, provides a mechanism to solve mutual problems and to improve advocacy by making the pro-archives voice stronger. It can also enable goals that may be blocked by the institutional structure and generate an economy of scale, allowing more to be done for less.²⁶ The government recognizes collaborative work as an effective mechanism to apply for funding.²⁷ It is possible that the critical mass of housing the records of six dioceses helped the Scottish Catholic Archives to achieve a considerable amount of their external support: £21,500 between 2003 and 2006. The arrangement for Catholic archives in Scotland will be discussed in detail later. Paul Shaw believes that consortium bidding would be effective.²⁸ It is true that it brought success for Birmingham Archdiocesan Archives. The Church has shown support for such endeavours in The Pastoral Function of Church Archives, which situates 'the ecclesiastical archive within mainstream archival practice' and encourages 'mutual collaboration with civil bodies.'²⁹ However, current collaborative practice on the part of Catholic archives is 'somewhat uneven.'³⁰ In general, there seems to have been a simple co-operation aimed at immediate goals rather than formal or long-term initiatives. This section will discuss some of the various options, their advantages and disadvantages and will offer an analysis of examples of co-operation practiced by Catholic archives.

Communication is the essential starting-point for successful co-operation: an appropriate structure needs to be developed so that organizations can communicate and make decisions without inappropriate delay. The Catholic Archives Society (CAS) and the Society of Archivists (SoA) are two mechanisms already in place. The CAS generated the Association of Diocesan Archivists and the SoA has two relevant subgroups, viz. the Religious Archives Group and the Specialist Repositories Group. An electronic mailing list for Catholic archivists could be a useful communication addition. This would only help those archivists who have access to the Internet, but it is to be hoped that this now encompasses the majority. A mailing list for archivists, conservators and records managers based in the United Kingdom is well-used, and people frequently post questions and receive help and advice from their colleagues.³¹ It would provide a quick and easy way for Catholic archives to blacklist people who have abused access. It is an unnecessary habit of the archival profession to set up a new organization for every emergent issue rather than extending the role of an existing one.³² Catholic archives are already part of a very effective network and they should take full advantage of this.

Considering the structure of local authority archives throughout England and Wales, collaboration with these institutions seems an obvious option. They clearly have much to offer in terms of advice and expertise on archival management and usually have greater resources. The Poor Servants of the Mother of God aimed to collaborate with Hounslow Local Studies & Archives, and while this failed owing to the latter body changing its plans, Paul Shaw believes that this is the way forward in developing outreach activities.³³ Birmingham Archdiocesan Archives also formed a consortium with local authority services to apply for funding. Father Sharp was initially reluctant because he thought that smaller archives would be swamped by the expertise, knowledge and experience of the larger services. While he found that the big players do dictate proceedings, he considers that larger record offices are not always as advanced or efficient as one might expect. Small services should remember that their size does not devalue the contribution that they have to offer.

A more contentious issue is whether Catholic institutions should deposit records in local authority offices. Many dioceses and at least one religious order have already done so.³⁴ Sometimes only parish registers are deposited, whereas some dioceses have transferred a variety of documents. Portsmouth Diocesan Archives has deposited a number of registers kept by French émigré priests with the Portsmouth Record Office and is now collaborating on indexing and translating them. Volunteers have been found within the diocese to do the work, while the record office is providing photocopying for free. It appears to be a very successful arrangement, and the Catholic Archives Society has commended this practice as long as control over access is maintained.³⁵ Benefits could include the ability of the record office to accommodate a large number of users and provide conservation methods which enable wider access such as microfilming and preservation. It is the most economical way for the Church to care for its records, and in general, local authority offices are only too pleased to receive deposits. However, not everyone agrees with this policy, e.g. Monsignor Read, Chancellor of the Diocese of Brentwood and a leading Canon Lawyer, who believes that it is not permitted by Canon Law: 'The Code envisages a diocesan historical archive, not that such materials be passed over to the state. If they are not secure, then it is for the bishop to make appropriate regulations so that they are kept securely within the diocese or parish.'³⁶ Some services are less inclined to accept items on temporary deposit, having found that they invest a lot of time and money cataloguing and conserving items, only to have them removed. In addition, these records may be subject to Freedom of Information requests as the result of being housed in a public repository. Exemption 41 states that information provided in confidence may be exempt, but only actual cases will reveal how the public interest test will be applied.³⁷ Deposit in local authority archives seems an excellent access solution for material which is generally open and under high user demand or with significant preservation requirements. Those Catholic archives which are already well-established would probably regard it as unnecessary. There is nothing wrong, archivally-speaking, with this practice: quite the contrary, it makes a lot of sense. However, there should be a clear and consistent policy on the matter.

An alternative is to look at solutions that can be achieved internally within the Catholic community. This can include joint events, sharing staff and communal repositories. Considerable informal collaboration, such as information sharing, already takes place between Catholic archives. Examples include the Archive of the British Province of the Society of Jesus which has donated records to other archives which would provide a more appropriate home. The Diocese of Brentwood has given photocopies of relevant material to other Catholic archives and has received similar copies in return. Further collaborative ventures are possible for archives which still want to maintain independent control of their records, such as sharing staff. The Archdiocese of Westminster and the Catholic Bishops' Conference of England & Wales appointed a professional archivist in September 2006, but any future joint appointments do not necessarily have to be professional archivists. A conservator, archives assistant or IT specialist could be appointed: all would enable the archive to offer a greater level of access to its users. It is necessary for the archives to have a similar scope and purpose and be geographically near each other.³⁸ One former religious archivist made the comment that detailed knowledge of the congregation is important for the staff of a religious order archive: to understand a series of records, one must have knowledge of the organization that created them. If the organizations offering a split-post position were similar in scope, this should aid the employee's understanding. Physical proximity is purely a practical issue. While arrangements, such as the salary, pension and insurance across two or more organizations could be complicated, the new position in London shows that it is workable.

Consideration has already been given to how most Catholic institutions choose to maintain their own archives. August Suelflow argues that 'a highly centralized form of Church government does not necessarily produce a centralized archive, but often leads to quite decentralized agencies'.³⁹ This has been the case with the Catholic Church in England and Wales. While a hierarchy has been in place since the Restoration in 1850, this has not resulted in the creation of a central depository for Catholic records. Although the current arrangement of independent repositories does bring benefits, it is not necessarily the best model for access. Joint housing not only has obvious advantages for those organizations which are unable to care for their own records but also offers potential benefits for others which currently run a small programme. There are management difficulties with the current decentralized arrangement, which include the potential for disagreement over the ownership of records when a bishop moves diocese and chooses to take his records with him, or between a diocese and a religious community that jointly manage an institution.⁴⁰ From an historian's perspective, Catholic archives are currently housed in physically dispersed repositories that do not have the facilities of large establishments.⁴¹ It could be argued that a large, centralized collecting institution would be able to provide a better level of access.

For over fifty years there has been an extremely effective arrangement for Catholic records in Scotland, where the archives of six out of eight dioceses are deposited with the Scottish Catholic Archives at Columba House, Edinburgh. The critical mass enables many things to be achieved. The Scottish Catholic Archives can accommodate ten researchers, have received £21,500 in funding between 2003 and 2006, have an extensive outreach programme, and liaise with institutions and bodies concerned with Scottish history and culture.⁴² Catholic archives in Scotland have a long and significant history. In the early nineteenth century Bishop James Kyle started collecting records, first at the seminary at Aquhorties, and thereafter at Blairs College, both in Aberdeenshire. The late Abbot Mark Dilworth described how 'almost single-handedly, he [Bishop Kyle] had reconstituted the archives of the Scottish Catholic Church and had provided both continuity with the past and safe custody for the future'.⁴³ In 1954 a full-time archivist was appointed, and later in that decade it was decided that the archives should be moved to Edinburgh. The Columba Trust, founded by Lord Colum Crichton-Stuart, gave a grant to buy Columba House. This building was renovated in the 1970s following further financial help from the Columba Trust. These conditions prepared the basis for an effective national agency to collect and centralize Catholic archives in Scotland.

The long history of this arrangement means that what has been possible for archives in Scotland may not work for records in England and Wales. In Scotland, the centralization process started during the Reformation, but the Hierarchy was not restored until 1878, later than in England and Wales, and unlike the English county record office system, local authority archive services have only been present in Scotland in the last twenty to twenty-five years. As Andrew Nicoll concludes, 'a central archive seemed the most natural solution for Catholic records in Scotland'.⁴⁴ In addition, significant financial backing was available from the Columba Trust. The Scottish dioceses, however, pay for the daily running costs. In contrast, England and Wales is a larger geographical area with more Catholics and therefore a much larger institution would be required to provide a national repository. While the arrangement in Scotland could not be transplanted into England and Wales, it is important to look at why it has been successful and what can be learnt from it. Andrew Nicoll is not aware of any negative feelings about having to travel to Edinburgh and comments that 'people like the fact that they can look at the records in close proximity'.⁴⁵ Nothing is transferred automatically and Nicoll is careful to encourage a feeling of ownership, ensuring that the dioceses are always fully informed. He considers this to be a vitally important task. While this may not be the most appropriate solution for England and Wales, there have been similar proposals for collecting institutions.

The Douai Abbey Archives Project will have considerable but finite space for deposited collections, receipt of which will be considered from religious houses that have closed, communities that are shrinking rapidly, and ones that may face future problems.⁴⁶ Access has not yet been discussed in detail but is on the agenda. While the priority must be safeguarding archives that are at risk of loss or destruction, access should be seen as an integral responsibility of custody and therefore central to the project design. While the proposals for Douai are exciting, they are moving quite slowly and will require significant financial support from within the Catholic community. In addition, it will not solve all of the Catholic archival community's problems of storage and, therefore, access to its archives.

This is not the first time that a collecting repository has been proposed for Catholic archives. In fact, similar suggestions have been made at least three times in the last thirteen years.⁴⁷ One archivist commented that it had been discussed ad nauseam for the last twenty years. In 1993 or 1994, there was a suggestion to combine the holdings of the Society of Jesus, the Archdiocese of Westminster and possibly the Archdiocese of Southwark under one roof and as part of a Historical Research Centre based at Heythrop College, University of London.⁴⁸ The proposal failed because the bishops did not support it. The issue arose at the Conference of Major Religious Superiors about eight years ago and more recently there were proposals to establish an institute at St Mary's College, Strawberry Hill. The establishment of a collecting repository is very complicated, as the unsuccessful attempts show. Some archivists commented on the challenges of such a project, e.g. the cost and resultant need to secure funding and the requirement for policies on access.⁴⁹ In addition, there is not universal support for the proposals. One archivist believes that it is not required and another commented how, due to the diocesan structure with individual bishops, he had misgivings about a regional headquarters and would be unhappy about a national one.⁵⁰ There is evidently a degree of personal ownership felt for records and archives and, furthermore, it is undeniable that if material is retained in its place of origin, local knowledge greatly aids interpretation. An additional complication exists for the archives of religious communities which belong to international congregations. If any of these houses close, their archives should be transferred to the generalate of the order concerned, which may not be in this country.⁵¹ All proposed developments for collecting repositories must consider the current arrangement for archives and the natural divisions within England and Wales. There would need to be at least two establishments, one for the north and one for the south. One archivist commented that a system based on the five metropolitan provinces might be an appropriate arrangement: the archdiocesan archives in these areas could be enlarged to accommodate records in need of a home.⁵² This would enable resources to be more focused without completely removing the records from their place of origin. No definitive solution has been proposed for this challenging issue which needs to be high on the agenda of both the archival and Catholic community in England and Wales.

It is vital to be realistic about co-operative ventures. According to John Fleckner, 'co-operation is no panacea, it is often expensive, it requires planning and management, it sometimes fails'.⁵³ The Religious Archives Technical Assistance Project (RATAP, 1987-1989) illustrates the challenges faced by co-operative ventures.⁵⁴ The aim was to help thirty-nine archives from New York using workshops, reports and co-operative endeavours. It found that sharing archival resources, such as micrographic facilities, was unworkable because large repositories were too busy and small ones had very limited budgets and resources. While one of the reasons for co-operation is frequently cited as saving money, in the library and information profession it is disputed whether such activities actually reduce or increase costs.⁵⁵ It can be difficult to demonstrate success when achievements include mutual respect, confidence, good will and strength.⁵⁶ There can be problems of deciding with whom to co-operate. Brentwood Diocesan Archives commented that more formal collaboration could be difficult because of its geographical location, with the only two realistic possibilities being the Archdioceses of Westminster and Southwark. Father Sharp found constraints of time to be a problem since meetings were arranged for heads of services without considering the implications for a diocesan archive with only one member of staff. For successful co-operation, the initial work starts at home. Individual archival programmes must be well-managed and the necessity to co-operate should be recognized at ground-level rather than simply imposed from above. The development of sustainable partnerships will involve a considerable amount of planning, experimentation and learning. The mutually acceptable goals and financial implications should be clear to all parties at the outset. Co-operation can sometimes be marred by negative attitudes and preconceptions. John Fleckner advises archivists to 'lay aside trifling differences and petty jealousies and join hands in a noble crusade' as when successful, co-operative working can bring many benefits.⁵⁷

3 New Methods for Providing Access

As well as the suggestions to maximize resources through co-operation and external funding, Catholic archives may find it helpful to reconsider their approach to access. R. J. Cox reminds us that: 'Merely gathering archival records together and processing them for access does not guarantee that the records will be effectively used as they should or are hoped to be.'⁵⁸ New methods for enabling access need to be considered which take advantage of ICT developments and alternative methods of management. These include outreach activities, use of the Internet and understanding the significance of the intellectual rather than merely the physical control of records, all of which are rooted in a re-focusing on access as opposed to arrangement and description. The PSQG argues that 'there is a general need for creativity to reach a wider population'.⁵⁹ Information management is changing and archivists need to employ modern techniques to enable them to make an impact.

It is important to encourage people to access archives as there is still no general awareness of their uses and benefits. Over the last seventy years, a theology has re-emerged within the Church that supports these endeavours although 'the "archive as cultural centre" is still in its infancy'.⁶⁰ Significantly, the Second Vatican Council urged greater participation in the political, economic and social life of the community.⁶¹ Pope John Paul II also underlined that 'we must systematically and wisely promote [cultural heritage] in order to make it part of the life blood of the Church's cultural and pastoral activity'.⁶² Like co-operation, outreach work generally takes place on an individual or informal basis. This statement, however, is not meant to belittle the sterling work done by some Catholic archives in this area, which seems to be less recognized outside the ecclesiastical community. Many of the archives visited organize tours, talks and exhibitions - even publicity through the local media - and it is not possible to mention all of their many achievements.

The Central Congregational Archives of the Poor Servants of the Mother of God will be used to illustrate the challenges that a small archive might encounter when engaged in outreach work. Their heritage room needs to be supervised for visits for which staff cannot be made permanently available. In addition, the archives and heritage room are situated in the building where the sisters live, and while the House Superior is supportive, it would be inappropriate for the sisters to be disturbed by visitors. Despite these difficulties, they have staged five exhibitions since the acquisition of a display case in 2003, and have taken part in the Archives Awareness Campaign and the London Open House, for which the archivist arranged historical talks and archival displays in conjunction with the sisters.⁶³ It is evident that some Catholic archives are already trying to maximize use. It is understood that these are significant expectations that will consume time and money: many Catholic archives will feel that they do not have sufficient resources. August Suelflow believes that a 'vigorous information programme can go a long way in overcoming handicaps and the limitations that may seem to serve as the parameters of an agency'.⁶⁴ There is a risk of becoming trapped in a negative cycle where the less you achieve the less recognition and support you receive. Even small efforts can help to demonstrate what could be accomplished with more resources. External funding and co-operation with other archives should make these aims easier to realize.

Computing developments over the last twenty years have brought many new and exciting possibilities for access. Dr Whittle of the Liverpool Archdiocesan Archives believes that any alternative system of access is going to be technological, specifically the use of material on the Internet, as pioneered by The National Archives.⁶⁵ Combining surveys and catalogues of Catholic archives in England and Wales and making them available online would enable many more people to learn about the resources - an important preliminary step to access. There are several projects which are working towards this challenging aim. From the worldwide perspective, the International Information Exchange Network is recording archival information from dioceses around the world.⁶⁶ At the other end of the scale, in the 1990s, volunteers on behalf of the Catholic Archives Society undertook a localized, specific survey of the records of one hundred lay societies.⁶⁷ The Catholic Archives Society also publishes a Directory of Catholic Archives and it seems that both they and the Bishops' Conference of England & Wales aim to compile a more detailed inventory or survey of all Catholic archives.⁶⁸ In 2001 a guide to Jesuit Archives was published which listed the repositories of the Society of Jesus worldwide. Another religious congregation, the Sisters of Mercy, aims to create a detailed inventory of its records.⁶⁹ This will be a very valuable resource for them since their archives are spread all over the world. The Internet seems the most appropriate tool, of which some Catholic archives have already taken advantage. This is not to say that paper-based finding aids are redundant - hard copy publications are still useful - but Catholic archives need to be aware of the opportunities offered by newer technologies. For this, some archivists will require training. The Sisters of Mercy in Handsworth, Birmingham believe that enquiries have significantly increased since the launch of their website in April 2006.⁷⁰ Benefits, therefore, could be felt almost immediately.

There are different options for hosting material on the Internet. If a password-protected database could be designed, then confidential material could be entered and made available, from any location, to those who have the right to access it. It is, however, a challenging project. Catholic archives are extremely diverse and extensive and, because of the constraints of time and resources, this seems an almost impossible goal to achieve. Currently, not all Catholic archives have the time fully to catalogue their holdings. The solution found by Birmingham Archdiocesan Archives was to have their paper catalogues put online as part of the Seven Ages of Man retro-conversion project. They are posted on Access 2 Archives (A2A), a site which enables archives to put their finding aids online without having to create their own website.⁷¹ Father Sharp believes that in some respects the move online produced more work because access to the catalogues is easier, with enquiries being sent in from around the world.⁷² It must be a concern of small archives that they might become inundated with requests for information. There are benefits for the archive, however, in that an online catalogue reduces the number of 'cold callers' and enables people to ask more specific questions.⁷³ The previous section discussed some benefits of gathering many records together in one building. It is important to realize, however, that intellectual control of records is equally as important for access as their physical control. If the Church was better aware of what records were held where, use of them would be much improved.

It could be argued that there has been too great a focus on arrangement and description in Catholic archives and that attention needs to be re-directed towards access and outreach. A major strength of the ecclesiastical archive community has always been its commitment to this undeniably important archival task, but it is perhaps not such a fundamental prerequisite to access as usually believed.⁷⁴ This is especially the case in archives where there is only one member of staff who has to be very careful in deciding how to divide his or her time. A statement by the National Conference of Catholic Bishops in America in 1974 criticized the discouragement of access because dioceses had little idea of what materials were in their possession and urged greater use of diocesan records.⁷⁵ Studies conducted for the RATAP in New York in the 1980s found that 'better physical and intellectual control over records did not correlate at all with use.'⁷⁶ The majority of archive services function with

This section discussed the two levels of resource problems in the Catholic archival community and how, therefore, requirements for development in the domain are very wide-ranging. It is possible to conclude, however, that to some degree, all Catholic archives are under-resourced, i.e. all are unable to fulfil their access potential. Several solutions have been suggested. The most significant is collaboration, in one of its many forms, as an effective basis for more enterprising initiatives. While such ventures need to be carefully planned and managed, it should be possible to design them to suit the specific requirements of the institutions involved. External funding, especially applying as part of a consortium to distribute the workload, should also be considered by Catholic archives. While some might not see funding as relevant to their situation, they could consider lobbying for a change in the agenda because many archives are developing exciting projects which deserve to be supported. Full advantage should be taken of the opportunities the Internet offers to connect finding aids and establish the Church's intellectual control over its documentary sources. In addition, archives may find they need to re-think their approach to external access. It has been suggested that archives should aim to offer an average level of service to many people rather than a good level of service to a smaller number. This section has looked at many different possibilities for the management of archives and the debate over the best methods continues. For archivists, however, the ultimate aim has to be providing the best possible care for archives and the best possible access for users. It is to be hoped that this section will have highlighted some of the ways that Catholic archives might overcome their constraints of resources and allow greater access to their collections.

Attitudes towards access are changing, as illustrated by recent legislation. The Catholic Church can either accept this and keep up-to-date with developments or be left behind, regarded as secretive and irrelevant to society. If the Church has a rôle to play in the daily life of the ordinary person, then surely the records, recording these interactions, do so too. R. J. Cox reminds us how it is important to 'be the agents of proactive change rather than the effects of it.'⁸² It was suggested that in the future legislation regulating for private archives may be passed. It would be advisable if the Church found ways to modify its policies to correspond with current popular opinion.

Carmen Mangion is aware of one religious congregation that closed its archive because the archivist felt unable to deal with FOI requests.⁸³ This is a very sad occurrence where the Act had exactly the converse effect to what was intended. Catholic archivists should be aware that there is much free advice and support available from the Society of Archivists and the Catholic Archives Society, and that access should not mean releasing sensitive information which might cause distress to a living individual or their family. While recent changes may seem like huge challenges for

⁸³ Dr Carmen Mangion: Interview with Sarah Stanton, 14 July 2006.

Catholic archivists it is vital that they do as much as they are able. They should also take pride in recognizing how much has already been achieved. The Catholic archival community has gone from strength to strength, especially since the establishment of the Catholic Archives Society in 1979, and it is on this structure that future developments should be built. It is also important, however, not to be separated from the rest of the archival community because other small and private archives are facing similar access challenges which need to be addressed by the sector as a whole. If Catholic archivists lobbied alongside business and family archivists, their demands would receive greater recognition. While they may have certain specific access requirements, Catholic archives will also benefit from being part of a larger archival network.

It is possible to identify both intellectual and resource problems for access. In daily practice, however, the problems are often intertwined, but it is simpler to discuss them separately. One important distinction that should be made is between the archives of religious orders and dioceses, since they will frequently have different needs and requirements. This distinction is not unlike that between family and institutional archives. While both contain confidential material, the archives of religious congregations and houses are usually deposited within the community that created them, and access to the archives will involve entering into that community and interaction with the creators of the records. They may not be able to run as an extensive access programme as a diocesan archive.

Something that was evident from the majority of discussions with Catholic archivists was the importance of protecting living individuals or their surviving families from the insensitive release of information, rather than a general opposition to access or a desire to stifle research. The fact that good intentions are present, however, does not necessarily mean that a successful and modern access policy naturally follows and that the access conditions for the archives of the Catholic Church are perfect.⁸⁴ While genuine problems have caused this situation, it still needs to be addressed as quickly as possible: ecclesiastical archives are likely to receive an increasing number of requests for access. It is also true that some individuals within the Catholic Church would advocate a policy of destroying documents that portray the Church in negative circumstances or provide evidence of its less illustrious actions. While it is to be hoped that they are now a minority, it is an attitude which is yet to be fully eradicated. Catholic archives do need protection because they contain genuinely sensitive material. There should be restrictions in place that are carefully controlled by a policy on access to ensure that decisions are made fairly and consistently. Although access is a privilege, the Catholic Church has a duty to make its archives as open as possible. This discussion has aimed to be aware of the severe limitations of resources that most Catholic archivists have to work under. Even with all the enthusiasm and best intentions for access, it must be difficult to achieve much with very little time and money. Various solutions were discussed such as collaboration, funding, outreach and the use of the Internet. An effort was made to show how these actions would mutually support each other in an archive. Birmingham Archdiocesan Archives illustrates this example perfectly because it applied for funding as part of a consortium in order to enable it to put its catalogues online. This analysis has aimed to make suggestions to improve the access conditions of Catholic archives, which could be realized in the not too distant future, rather than propose ideal solutions that are not feasible.

While access is important, it is necessary to ask how far Catholic archives can ever succeed in meeting the needs and wants of external users. It is important to strike a balance between legitimate external requests, the needs of the institution and the best possible practice for the archives themselves. This analysis has suggested that with sufficient resources, most requirements can be met. It is likely that 'sufficient' resources will never be found for archives, even if institutions use various policies to maximize their potential. For this reason, a realistic approach must be adopted where external access does not damage the records in preservation terms or put an unnecessary strain on the institution allowing access. The PSQG suggests that if there are 'irreconcilable tensions between the needs of different groups in the community' the best course of action is to 'recognize the tension and seek a balance which meets the approval of the responsible body.'⁸⁵ It is likely that however hard archives work to meet the requests of users, external demands will always increase as people continually desire to see more material in a shorter space of time. Archives should only be expected to respond to reasonable demands.

The Pastoral Function of Church Archives was published in 1997 and, therefore, the significance of this issue has been recognized by the Church for a number of years, i.e. before the current United Kingdom Government agenda became prominent. This external pressure from the Government should be seen as a secondary impetus to encourage access as well as offering the opportunity to benefit from external funding streams and collaboration with local authority archive services. There appears to be a paradox in the management of Catholic archives. In some respects, the Church places a high value on memory and tradition and yet recognition of the practical needs and value of archives has not occurred to some more senior members in the Church. The Catholic Church does not need to be informed of the value and uses of its archives: it just needs to listen to itself. Some dioceses and communities have achieved incredible results with minimal resources. At the same time, diocesan archivists reported disturbing stories of a general unawareness within parishes of what records needed to be kept and what should happen to them. Clearly, this will have an impact on the access situation of the future. However hard individual archivists work, they will not achieve significant success unless their superiors provide full support - bishops and superiors of religious orders must realize that this is a pressing issue.

One religious congregation, which places a very high priority on its heritage, has an important reminder for everyone who has responsibility for archives: 'Because papers are inert, some believe, erroneously, that papers can wait. But those papers are a rich source for making judgments about the future [...] Neither the papers nor the judgments on which these decisions depend can wait'.⁸⁶

It is not an option to leave archives unlisted in strong rooms and cupboards, with few, if any people aware of the potentially wonderful resource. Access should be high on the agenda of every archive. Sadly, it is still a minority of people who advocate the archival cause within the Catholic Church and recognize the true cost of preserving and making available its heritage, as well as the even greater cost of not doing so.

Appendix Two: Select Interview Questions and Responses

1. When is the archive open?

Brentwood Diocesan Archives Usually open 10am-5pm on Tuesday and Friday and at other times by arrangement. Closed for lunch 1pm-2pm

Central Congregational Archive of the Poor Generally open three days a week during normal office hours
Servants of the Mother of God

Salford Diocesan Archives By appointment

Archives of the British Province of the Society of Jesus By appointment

Sisters of Charity of St Vincent de Paul 10am-5.30pm, Monday to Friday

Liverpool Archdiocesan Archives 9am - 4pm, Monday to Wednesday

Birmingham Archdiocesan Archives 11am-6pm, Wednesday to Friday

Union of the Sisters of Mercy of Great Britain By appointment

Scottish Catholic Archives⁸⁷ 9.30am-4.30pm, Monday to Friday (closed 1-2pm)

⁸⁷ The author is aware that Scotland is not in England and Wales and details from this archive have been included for comparative purposes.

2. How many users can you accommodate at one time?

Brentwood Diocesan Archives	1-2
Central Congregational Archive of the Poor Servants of the Mother of God	1
Salford Diocesan Archives	1-2
Archives of the British Province of the Society of Jesus	10
Sisters of Charity of St Vincent de Paul	3
Portsmouth Diocesan Archives	Is required to book a room in Cathedral House. Has never had more than two, which were easily accommodated
Liverpool Archdiocesan Archives	Five desks but usually a maximum of three researchers
Birmingham Archdiocesan Archives	10-12
Union of the Sisters of Mercy of Great Britain	10
Scottish Catholic Archives	10

3. What closure periods are set for records?

Brentwood Diocesan Archives	There is a general closure period of 30 years, longer for certain sensitive materials
Central Congregational Archive of the Poor Servants of the Mother of God	30 years for most records and 100 years for personal material (unless Data Protection applies)
Salford Diocesan Archives	Varies depending on the nature of the record
Archives of the British Province of the Society of Jesus	40-year rule on personal papers with flexibility. Institutional records are decided on a case-by-case basis.
Sisters of Charity of St Vincent de Paul	30-year rule for most records with individual decisions made for sensitive information. Nobody is denied access to their own records

Portsmouth Diocesan Archives 75-year rule for most records although each item is decided on a case-by-case basis

Liverpool Archdiocesan Archives Varies depending on the nature of the record (30-year rule for material that could be accessed in the public realm, e.g. education papers; parish registers are open after 70 years; complete closure on the papers of the late Archbishop Worlock)

Birmingham Archdiocesan Archives In general a 30-year rule although it depends on the records and items will be dealt with discretion e.g. death registers are open. There is compliance with Data Protection legislation

Union of the Sisters of Mercy of Great Britain The closed periods depend on the type of record – usually a 30-year closure on personnel records

Scottish Catholic Archives Varies depending on the nature of the record.

4. Have you applied for funding?

Brentwood Diocesan Archives No - because of match funding and access requirements

Central Congregational Archive of the Poor Servants of the Mother of God Received £500 from Archives Awareness Campaign towards a display case. Intend to apply for money for conservation

Salford Diocesan Archives Not yet but would seriously consider it

Archives of the British Province of the Society of Jesus Not yet but would seriously consider it for conservation of items which have broader interest than just to the Society of Jesus

Sisters of Charity of St Vincent de Paul No (wish to retain complete control)

Portsmouth Diocesan Archives No

Liverpool Archdiocesan Archives Yes, as part of a larger building application. It was turned down but they were encouraged to re-apply

Society of the Sacred Heart No - because of match funding and access requirements

Birmingham Archdiocesan Archives HLF 'Your Heritage' Funding as part of an independent cataloguing project. West Midlands consortium 'The Seven Ages of Man' retro-conversion project coordinated by Shropshire Record Office via A2A. Pay and Power Project for a cataloguer as part of MLA West Midlands, contributed £2,500

Union of the Sisters of Mercy of Great Britain No, but might consider it

Scottish Catholic Archives £1,000 grant for cataloguing eighteenth-century music from Royal Holloway College, £3,500 from the National Manuscripts Conservation Trust for preservation materials and £17,000 from the Big Lottery Fund. They are also applying for £30,000 from the Wellcome Trust, £50,000 from the HLF and £30,000 from the Carnegie Trust

5. Have you had any bad experiences where you have granted access which has been abused?

Brentwood Diocesan Archives None, although sometimes people publish things without sending a copy. Also, when published, articles etc. can have mistakes which, had the author sent a draft, could have been corrected

Central Congregational Archive of the Poor Servants of the Mother of God None - is aware that this has happened to other religious orders

Salford Diocesan Archives Not as yet, but is aware of convent archives that have been badly used. Would regard requests from the media with great suspicion

Archives of the British Province of the Society of Jesus None

Sisters of Charity of St Vincent de Paul A TV researcher did not study the material that had previously been agreed

Portsmouth Diocesan Archives	None
Liverpool Archdiocesan Archives	None
Birmingham Archdiocesan Archives	No real bad experiences - people who do not acknowledge sources, one stolen item, one person who was not careful in handling a register
Union of the Sisters of Mercy of Great Britain	No really bad experiences. Someone who was studying at the house passed on some information to another Mercy archive without checking first - seemed discourteous. Have heard of other congregations with problems of information quoted out of context or where people have not looked at the whole picture to understand events
Scottish Catholic Archives	None

6. What is the primary purpose of your archive?

Brentwood Diocesan Archives	Administrative - for the Bishop and the Chancellor
Central Congregational Archive of the Poor Servants of the Mother of God	To preserve the archives as the memory of the congregation and its works; to facilitate access to the archives and heritage collections by the congregation, its employees and associates; and in a wider context to serve as part of the cultural heritage of world Catholicism, and hence encourage a wider research use. Primary user group is the congregation
Salford Diocesan Archives	Preservation of historical documents and artifacts; facilitation of research and religious and cultural understanding
Archives of the British Province of the Society of Jesus	Primary user group is the Jesuit administration

Sisters of Charity of St Vincent de Paul The primary purpose of the archives is to record the history and development of the Community in the British Isles as part of the social history of the 19th and 20th centuries

Liverpool Archdiocesan Archives The Archbishop is keen that the rich Catholic cultural heritage is open for research so parishioners and scholars are encouraged to visit

Birmingham Archdiocesan Archives Preserve and conserve the archival patrimony of the diocese and make it available to anyone who wishes to use it

Union of the Sisters of Mercy of Great Britain Produce guides to the house, give tours and talks; retreat days for Mercy Associates; ministry to women and children in the Birmingham area

Scottish Catholic Archives Obligation to the Bishops first and foremost as the head of the organization

From Betamax to Bombole: Future-Proofing a Project in Time

Rev. Andrew Headon

If you remember Betamax then you are as old as I am; and yes, we were one of those families who couldn't swap videos with our friends who all had VHS!

The rapid advances in technology in the past thirty years have been matched only by my learning curve of archives and all things archival in the past two years. And it amazes me to think that while we have just created a state-of-the-art room for the preservation of the Venerable English College's archive material dating back to include fourteenth-century scrolls, future records will probably be stored on something as small as a single memory stick. The new room has a steel-reinforced floor to take the weight of the compact shelving and the walls of the three rooms below had to be strengthened in order to bear that load. In contrast, I am sure that the same volume of material could be carried these days in one's pocket.

The re-housing, storage and cataloguing of the Archives is therefore as much about future-proofing access to the material as it is about preserving its condition. The Archive Project began two years ago on Martyrs' Day, 1 December 2004, when Mr and Mrs Urs Schwarzenbach generously offered to help preserve the patrimony of the College. We now celebrate the completion of the most visible aspect of that project, the restoration of the Third Library, and the creation of a new Archive room and a Rare Books' room (where the Archives used to be housed). The unseen endeavours, however, will continue for the next few years. The Archive will be moved to the new room once the climate has been monitored over twelve months and we are sure that the temperature and humidity levels are acceptable. Meanwhile, the present catalogue is being verified and computerized. The last stage will then be to digitize much of the material so that it will be available online; and likewise the catalogue.

Project management is about realizing an ultimate goal through setting short-term targets: milestones on a time-line towards that end. Two years ago, I realized that the first stage of the process needed to be the gaining of the best advice. There had been an Archive Conference at the VEC in April 2002¹ which was of undoubted importance in raising awareness of the significance of the collection, and Joe Coughlan and the VEC administration at the time are to be commended on this initiative. But the reasons for convening that conference were different; and by its very nature and purpose, this second one was always going to be more focused. The first conference was a rich but diverse collection of presentations. The second conference needed to go into more depth on the matter of preservation and the practicalities of moving an archive; I also wanted to keep the group of advisors as small as possible (the first conference had twenty participants).

So it was that a conference of archivist and historian friends convened in the Third Library in February 2005 and, as well as some excellent brainstorming and discussion, the group listened attentively to more than an hour's detailed talk on bombole in Italian, the fruit of which is the huge canisters of inert gas behind a new hedge in the garden! The chronology of tasks which lay ahead was debated and included, for example, the most practical and logistical considerations such as where the books in the Third Library would be kept while the furniture was being restored, bearing in mind their weight and volume, fluctuating room temperatures and humidity, and the risk of factors such as security and unforeseen water ingress. The third floor corridor known as "Mayfair" was considered but ruled out in favour of the Gradwell Room.

The group also spent part of the two days drafting a job description and person-specification for the post of Project Archivist and considered the best means of advertising this. In fact, the whole process leading up to Iris Jones' appointment as Project Archivist is a good demonstration of how its record will be left in the Archive in contrast to the bulk of the accounts book (cf. p.49, bottom picture). The move towards a paperless office has already begun. Not one letter was sent or received. All communication was via e-mail; the speed of communication amazed me when the advertisement on an archive website immediately prompted eight enquires within the space of an hour. The job description and person-specification were sent by return, as attachments, and CVs came back likewise. I forwarded twenty-one of these to the interview panel together with a Microsoft Excel matrix for their scoring of the candidates. The record of correspondence is less than a megabyte in size.² A generation ago the same would have taken considerably more time, might have consumed several reams of A4 paper, involved many secretarial hours, cost postage, photocopying and ultimately the space of another box file.

The dangers in terms of preservation are no longer a question of paper quality and the need for acid-free envelopes but the need to make back-up copies and the choice of storage medium. Archive material from the early 1990s, for example, will be lost unless it is soon transferred from floppy disks to a medium which is future-proof... well, at least for the time being.

So the conference heard stories of how some institutes rushed into electronic copying only to realize that the processes they used were either damaging the material or not future-proof (i.e. hardware or software becoming obsolete), or the problems that one archive had with an anti-incendiary powder which was released in error with harmful effect. Throughout the project we are grateful to all those who have shared with us their wisdom in the hope that we have avoided known mistakes and reduced the risk of others.

Finally, and appropriately for archival record, I would like to thank the following people: Barbara Donovan, our Administrator, for all her help in seeing this project through to completion whilst at the same time overseeing so many other projects; Iris Jones for her expert contribution to date and for so quickly becoming part of the team; those who attended the conference in 2005; the restorers, ARIEM srl, and Tonino Sordini, our contractor.

January: Archive Conference idea conceived & invitations issued.

Foster (Archivist, Diocese of Brentwood), Dott.sa Alessandra Gioenco (Archivist, British School, Rome), Dr Daniel Huws (formerly Keeper of Manuscripts & Records, National Library of Wales), Dr Carol Richardson (Lecturer in Art History, Open University), Dott.Tiballi.

March-June: Visit to the Archive of the British School, Rome; meetings with architects; permissions sought from the Belle Arti and Vigili del Fuoco for proposed works; tendering process begins.

April: Advertisement placed for Project Archivist.

June: Interviews for the post of Project Archivist.

August: Construction work begins on new Archive room; floor reinforced to take the weight of the compact shelving; walls strengthened for the load.

September: Iris Jones takes up her appointment as Project Archivist; temporary shelving installed in Gradwell Room; Jonathan Reilly (antique book expert) identifies and removes rare volumes from Third Library.

October-December: Transfer of Third Library books to Gradwell Room.

December: Compact shelving installed in new Archive room; book cleaning machines arrive for use in New Year.

February-May: Restoration of shelving in the Third Library.

July: Remaining shelving and cold-lighting completes the work on the new Archive room; books replaced on shelves of the Third Library.

September: Transfer of Archives to Gradwell Room; work begins to prepare the space which was the Archive room to become the new Rare Books' room; electronic sensors continue to monitor the climate in the new Archive room before the transfer of the collection.

February: Reopening and Blessing of new Archive room by Cardinal Tauran, together with re-opening of the Third Library.

The Venerable English College, Rome: Archives Restoration Project

Iris Jones

My first contact with the English College Archives was one of sheer delight. Before my interview for the post of Project Archivist in June 2005, the VEC Librarian, Sister Mary Joseph McManamon, took me around the College and showed me the Archives. She opened an old, somewhat rickety door and presented me with a veritable treasure trove, the kind that archivists dream about. There was a bit of everything: parchments dating all the way back to 1280, vast quantities of account books, maps, glass negatives, diaries, drawings, photographs of students in their leisure moments... It combined the history of the Catholic Church in England and Wales with a more personal quality, like a family archive. I was impressed by the fact that student archivists had apparently taken considerable interest in the collection in the past. But it needed attention now: cleaning; adequate housing for the material; a disaster prevention plan; and an up-to-date catalogue, which could make the collection more accessible to scholars and easier to monitor. Fortunately it is not an especially large collection and this makes it more manageable.

The VEC project was certainly interesting and many-sided. I learned that my rôle would be not simply to re-catalogue the material, but also partly to oversee construction of a new, state-of-the-art repository, making sure that the shelving, lighting and general storage conditions would secure a long lifespan for the documents. I was likewise to be involved in the restoration of the stunning Third Library shelving. It was a welcome opportunity for me to grow professionally and I was very struck by the fact that the momentum for making these changes came from the College itself.

When I started work in September 2005, my first goal was to check all the material, using a typewritten catalogue made by a former Student Archivist, Father Jeremy Bertram, in 1978. It was important to see if any pieces were missing and to assess the state of conservation of each unit. It also gave me a chance to become familiar with the Archives and to see what kind of intervention was needed for each section. The scrittura series, for example, contains a lot of letters and single-sheet documents of various types. They were stored in metal filing cabinets, packed tightly in each drawer so that opening and closing the cabinets produced mechanical damage on the edge of each sleeve. And the sleeves were made of wood-pulp paper, which is certainly harmful in the long term. So these would inevitably have to be replaced with new, acid-free sleeves and boxes. All things considered, the collection looked like it was in good condition, but I wanted some expert advice to confirm this. I asked Dott. Enrico Flaiani, Chief Paper Conservator at the Vatican Secret Archives, to come in and run some checks for us. I also asked ICCROM, the United Nations agency for conservation, for their opinion. Both of them felt that the Archives were relatively well-preserved, but would obviously benefit from their new, carefully-chosen environment. The crucial issues that emerged focused on climate control, adequate storage conditions, cleanliness and disaster planning. First of all we broached the issue of cleanliness: the College bought two professional book-dusters. One we dubbed 'the carwash', because the more robust items were inserted and given a thorough dusting by big, rotating brushes. The other became 'the incubator': you put the more delicate items inside the machine, then you stick your arms through long sleeves and gently aspirate the dust off the 'baby' by hand.

In the past shelving had been inadequate, so in order to increase storage space, compact shelving was put into the new repository. I am told that after the floors were reinforced to bear the extra weight, all the students were invited to a jumping party in the room as a test, but I did not actually witness this scientific experiment. Upstairs in the mezzanine, cabinets with open-mesh, sliding doors were chosen to allow for air-circulation. The large, well-preserved collection of parchment documents, which were originally kept in wooden drawers, will be moved to metal flat-storage, along with maps and other bulky drawings.

To implement or not to implement climate control was another crucial issue. These systems are clumsy and if they break down can do a lot of damage. They are also a long-term expense. Old Roman buildings are supposed to have an ideal climate provided by their thick walls: cool in the summer and warm in the winter. So it was decided that the relative humidity (RH) and temperature (T) levels would be recorded over a year and then we could make an informed decision. In July 2006 we set up data-loggers in the Third Library, new repository and old Archive room. The results were surprising: the temperature in the old repository peaked at 30°C in July and RH readings were higher than expected. At one point a sensor in the Third Library showed soaring RH, and I was quite worried.

However, by the time it reached 99% RH, I realized that, since it was not actually raining inside, there must be something wrong with the sensor.

Disaster preparedness thus far has mostly focused on a fire-extinguishing system. The College chose to use an inert gas called IG 55 as a fire extinguisher. This is a mixture of nitrogen and argon which uses oxygen depletion to put out fires. If the alarm should ever go off, the gas would be pumped in from huge metal canisters in the garden, saturating the environment and burning up all the oxygen in the room in just nine seconds. It is totally dry, so it would not dirty the books or documents if ever the need to use it should arise. One of the restorers was working away in the Third Library one day when the alarm went off. Terrified that the gas would burn up all the oxygen in her lungs, she vaulted over the scaffolding and sprinted for the door. She arrived breathlessly in the First Library in about three seconds! Fortunately, it was just a trial run: at that time the canisters of gas had not yet been hooked up.

When I arrived at the College, the Third Library was a beautiful room in much need of attention. The shelves tipped, the gold was muted and the black flecked and dirty. The College set up a tender and four companies made bids to do the restoration. The quotes varied considerably, but eventually ARIEM srl was chosen to do the work. This involved sanding the shelves down to bare wood, patching and repairing as need be, fumigating and finally repainting the whole structure. Dust and fumes wafted around the whole library for weeks, but the final effect is magnificent. The College Archives have now been moved out of the old storeroom and will eventually be moved slowly back into the new, modern repository as cataloguing progresses. The old room has been turned into cold storage for rare books and photographs. The next short-term goal will be the new catalogue and the lengthy process of changing storage materials from the old acid paper into acid-free folders and boxes. I would like to thank everyone at the Venerable English College for welcoming me and making my work so enjoyable, and especially Father Andrew Headon, the Vice-Rector, who brought the practical knowledge that has made it all happen, Monsignor Nicholas Hudson, the Rector, and Barbara Donovan, the College Administrator. I am also grateful to the British School of Rome, Dott. Enrico Flaiani, and ICCROM for sharing their expertise with me.

AN ADDRESS BY CARDINAL TAURAN, ARCHIVIST OF THE HOLY ROMAN CHURCH,
AT THE VENERABLE ENGLISH COLLEGE ON THE RE-OPENING OF THE ARCHIVES AND THIRD LIBRARY, 18 FEBRUARY 2007

These are just a few words to tell you how pleased I am to have been invited to share the joy of your community at the re-opening of the Archives and the Third Library of your College. A well-organized, clean and accessible archives and library are the reflection of vitality of the institution which takes care of them. Through the records of facts, the writings of our ancestors, and the visit of a traveller we can better understand who we are, why we are here – in the Via Monserrato. In other words, the archives and library mean inspiration and transmission! When you possess good archives, when you enjoy a good library, it means you believe in your future! Moreover, when you deal with Church archives, for example, you have in front of you much more than mere historical documentation. You have in front of you, as Pope Paul VI said: 'echi e vestigi del passaggio della Chiesa, anzi dal passaggio del Signore Gesù nel mondo'. The Venerable English College keeps precious items, records of the history of England, information on its alumni and their activities through the centuries, and also documentation relating to special events: I think of the celebration of the Second Vatican Council, during which the English Fathers were your guests. I cannot but mention also the historical visit of the Archbishop of Canterbury, Michael Ramsay, who stayed with you in March 1966. Through the abundant documentation, a legacy of Christian witness and of cultural patrimony is handed over. This College is a link in a long chain. Dear students of today, you have the privilege to be a bridge between yesterday and tomorrow. Draw from this unique heritage, which so often speaks about the courage and the perseverance of the English Catholics - an inspiration for your service to the Church. You have the privilege to be trained in the proximity of the See of Peter, next to the Roman Curia and the Pontifical Universities. Here, reading the past and looking at the beginning of a new pontificate, you learn to think, to breathe and to look at the world in a catholic manner, that is to say universally! So I congratulate all those who have generously helped in the restoration of these archives, the Rector and the Vice- Rector, and their collaborators who have diligently followed the works. I wish that many researchers can perceive always ever more the fecundity of the encounter between Faith and Culture.

THE WESTMINSTER DIOCESAN ARCHIVES

In 1817 a Catholic priest from Lancashire, Father Robert Gradwell, was sent out to Rome to act as Agent to the English bishops and to re-open the Venerable English College, the seminary that had been closed during the French occupation. His letters and journals are now kept in the Westminster Diocesan Archives and it is clear, by thumbing through them, that he was particularly interested in archiving. A passage from one of his letters will strike a cord with anybody who works with archives: 'when I first came to the College I found a great cartload of dusty and rotting papers on the library floor. The greater part were rubbish but several were very valuable ... I selected all the valuable papers and carried them carefully to my own room, where I filled three drawers with them ... Unfortunately two of my drawers did not lock. A superannuated servant had used these valuable papers as waste paper before I found out.'

My purpose in this article is to share with you something of my hopes and frustrations as Archivist of the Archdiocese of Westminster. I am not proposing to suggest that Westminster is any sort of model - in fact, at first sight, it shares some similarities with Gradwell's description of the English College archive nearly two hundred years ago: plenty of 'dusty and rotting papers,' some of which are very valuable, some less so. What I hope to do is to describe the nature of the Archive, its importance and challenges, and to explain how we have begun to organize the collection.

In some ways, the title 'Diocesan Archive' when used for Westminster is rather misleading. Most diocesan archives, as you would expect, deal with the personages, events and institutions within a particular diocese: the papers of the bishops; the history of individual parishes and schools; the documents of Catholic societies; and the workings of the diocesan administration. They can be particularly useful for local historians and genealogists. In the case of the Westminster Diocesan Archives, one could be forgiven for thinking that most of the papers concerned the Catholic community in that diocese, which covers the London Boroughs north of the River Thames and west of Waltham Forest and Newham, the districts of Staines and Sunbury-on-Thames and the County of Hertfordshire. Since the diocese was only erected by Pope Pius IX in 1850, one might also think that there would be very little in the Archive from before the mid-nineteenth century.

However, the Westminster collection contains much that is not, strictly speaking, 'diocesan.' Even the extensive papers of our archbishops concern many national and international issues. This is because the Archbishops of Westminster have all (so far) been Cardinals, appointed by the Pope and with a rôle in Rome, and leaders of the English and Welsh bishops (for example, as Presidents of the Bishops' Conference) in addition to being bishops of a large, predominantly urban area. In their files one is just as likely to find correspondence with the Prime Minister or the Pope as letters to and from parish priests.

The papers of past archbishops, no matter how important, are only one part of the Westminster Diocesan Archives. A handful of documents actually date from the period before the Reformation. They include the reports of fifteenth-century heresy trials from the Diocese of Norwich and a Middle English miscellany of texts produced by a fifteenth-century Carthusian monk, including advice for confessors and even a recipe for making ink. It is unclear exactly how they ended up with us, but most probably had been in Catholic hands for many centuries, perhaps ever since the religious revolutions of the sixteenth century.

The bulk of our early papers, however, date from the period between the accession of Elizabeth I (1558) and the Restoration of the Catholic Hierarchy in 1850. The most important documents are bound in fifty handsome volumes. These chiefly concern the secular clergy and the work of the Vicars Apostolic and the Bishops' Agents in Rome. All in all there are some 9,000 items relating to this period, making the Westminster Archive one of the richest sources for the Catholic history of the country in the early modern period.

These are supplemented by independent collections, such as the archive of the 'Old Brotherhood' (originally the Chapter of the Secular Clergy that governed the English Catholic Church between 1631 and 1685, when there was no active bishop in the country) and of the historic seminary of St Edmund's College, Ware, which claims descent from the English College, Douai (founded in 1568). These usefully supplement our early modern collections and are often consulted by researchers. In addition to these there are a random selection of archives of 'other' Catholic organizations, such as the Catholic Evidence Guild, the Catholic Police Guild, the Newman Association and the Catholic Union of Great Britain (an influential association of laity who promote Catholic interests, especially in matters arising from Government action and proposed legislation).

It is not an exaggeration, therefore, to say that the Westminster Archive is of national and international importance; in some ways, the Catholic equivalent to Lambeth Palace Library. This is reflected in the number of visitors each year: in 2006 there were 137 visits - not insubstantial for a private archive which is only open two afternoons a week. The researchers included the inevitable stream of family historians who come to consult our small selection of sacramental registers and, I am pleased to say, priests pursuing historical studies, but also many doctoral students and academics not only from this country but from institutions of higher education in Europe and the United States. Many of the users have studied themes that reach beyond the traditional confines of English Catholic history -including emigration to Canada and the study of the theatre at the Court of Henrietta Maria.

I was appointed Diocesan Archivist at Easter 2005 and, like all but one of my predecessors and the majority of other diocesan archivists, I am a Catholic priest. This situation has its obvious limitations, of course, most notably in the fact that priest-archivists will normally lack archival qualifications. I have no professional training beyond a degree in Modern History, and my previous archival experience was courtesy of a summer job in the Department of Manuscripts at the British Library. I also spent two years as Archivist of the Venerable English College, Rome (which goes back to 1362), although this was a seminary 'house job' and took a definite second place alongside my training for the priesthood. The other limitation with priest-archivists is that we tend to work on a very part-time basis, since our main concern is pastoral work - funerals and feast-days can often prevent the archives from opening. I currently manage to spend two afternoons a week in the Archive, which allows me to deal with correspondence and supervise researchers, although there is little opportunity personally to catalogue or organize the collection.

But, despite the increasing professional expectations for archives and the shortage of priests in this country, I think it right and fitting that many dioceses still appoint priests as archivists. After all, most of the documents in the Archive were produced by priests for priests and so it helps if a priest has an involvement in the Archive and can readily understand the purpose and provenance of many of the documents. A priest-archivist is also highly appropriate given that a diocesan archive fits into the structure and mission of the Church: it is not merely a collection of historic, 'dead' documents that requires cataloguing and conservation, as required by the Church's Canon Law (cf. Canon 491 §2), but, according to The Pastoral Function of Church Archives, a very important document issued by the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church in 1997, such an archive is a 'place of memory' that records the 'path followed by the Church through the centuries in the various contexts which constitute her very structure ... Indeed historical sources trace the Church's action in an uninterrupted path of continuity. This begins with Christ's message, goes through the writings of the first apostolic communities and all the Church communities which follow up to our present day.'

However, this is certainly not to suggest that Church archives should be the preserve of the clergy. As soon as I was appointed Archivist, I realized that I needed a great deal of professional advice and assistance so that the Westminster Diocesan Archives could meet even basic national standards. In my first year, I asked Dr Norman James of the National Archives to visit and share his expertise. This was useful in identifying goals - in the long-term, proper cataloguing and possible re-location; in the short-term, basic steps such as installing fire and security alarms and introducing retention and collection policies. An Advisory Committee was founded to give further advice, consisting of a small group of custodians, experts, users and a senior representative from the Archdiocese of Westminster.

An unexpected blessing came last year when we entered into an arrangement with the Catholic Bishops' Conference of England and Wales, who were themselves looking for a part-time archivist and records management officer. We decided to advertise for a newly-qualified archivist on a two-year contract who would spend three days a week working in the Westminster Diocesan Archives, situated near Kensington High Street, and two days with the Bishops' Conference at Eccleston Square, near Victoria Station. And so, in September 2006, we welcomed our new Project Archivist, Tamara Thornhill. I continued acting as a sort of archives manager, mostly dealing with correspondence and administration and supervising researchers, while Tamara started to go through the archives systematically, identifying exactly what we had and investigating provenance.

Despite the richness of its collection, the Westminster Archive faces many challenges. Perhaps like many Catholic archives in the past, it also saw itself as a private collection, of interest only to Catholics, and consequently few links were made with the wider archival community. I well remember walking around the Archive once I had been given the keys by my predecessor. It was rather like an 'Aladdin's Cave': the death mask of Cardinal Hinsley could be found alongside audio cassettes that had once belonged to Cardinal Hume; a well-preserved uniform of the Palatine Guard (a now extinct regiment in the Papal Army) alongside out-patient records of St Andrew's Hospital, Dollis Hill; the remains of a flower carried to Tyburn by one of the English Martyrs, Blessed Thomas Maxfield, alongside honorary degrees given to the Archbishops of Westminster. Things had literally been deposited in the Archive and twenty years later still remained unsorted in cardboard boxes. On some shelves it was very obvious that a drawer of a filing cabinet had simply been emptied and dumped with us. On my arrival there was no general system and frequent inconsistencies. I recently looked through some of the boxes relating to Cardinal Bourne, Archbishop of Westminster between 1903 and 1935, which I thought was one of the better organized parts of the collection. To my horror, I soon realized that many items actually dated from the time of his successor, Cardinal Hinsley, and that things had been placed in the 'Bourne Papers' simply because they had been transferred to the Archives some time after the latter's death. Thus, there was a whole series of boxes containing eighteenth- and nineteenth-century wills, clearly labeled with a Cardinal Bourne reference number.

Another key problem, which we are in the process of addressing, is to decide what exactly the Westminster Diocesan Archives is for. I have already mentioned that the Archive houses many items that are not strictly speaking 'diocesan' - both a valuable collection of documents dating from the period before the Catholic Hierarchy was re-established in 1850 and a rather miscellaneous selection of records of 'other' institutions. In fact, it could be said that the Westminster Archive is the nearest thing the Catholic Church in England and Wales has to a 'central, national archive.' We do not advertise ourselves as such, but this is how we are seen - in much the same way that the Archbishop of Westminster is often mistaken as being the Primate of the Catholic Church in England and Wales. We are often the first port of call for those who want to find a home for 'orphan records'. In May 2007 the Advisory Committee will be discussing and formulating a new Collections Policy.

The identity of the Westminster Archive within the archdiocese itself also needs to be resolved. We call ourselves the 'diocesan archive' and yet, in addition to the 'Secret Archive' required by Canon Law and kept at Archbishop's House, there are separate archives for Westminster Cathedral, the Diocesan Property Office and the Diocesan Chancery and Tribunal - the latter two bodies, many of the records of which are currently housed in the Westminster Diocesan Archives, deal respectively with (marriage and other) dispensations and marriage annulments. And that is not to mention the countless diocesan departments and individual parishes which maintain their own 'archives' - I suspect to varying levels of success. Curiously, our weakest point in being a 'diocesan' archive is that we have few easily accessible documents relating to the 216 parishes and 223 schools in the archdiocese. Over the coming months and years we hope to build up and streamline the diocesan side of the Archive, especially by working alongside the diocesan administration and the parishes. Part of this process, of course, involves reminding people about the importance, purpose and needs of archives, for such things can easily be forgotten by over-burdened, multi-tasking priests and officials.

Records management will also need to be looked at because one of our main problems is that, in the past, Archbishop's House has archived everything. For example, the papers of Cardinal Hume, who was Archbishop of Westminster between 1976 and 1999, amount to over one thousand boxes. Every letter he received has been carefully filed, together with a copy of any reply that was sent. It made for an efficient system for his office, but there was no Retentions Policy. Thus, there are copies of journals which can easily be found in libraries and several boxes of 'regrets' - i.e. invitations to various events (such as the opening of a parish fête) and the corresponding letter explaining why His Eminence could not attend. That is not to mention the hundreds of rather eccentric letters that a person in a high position will inevitably receive. A Diocesan Retentions Policy would save much work and effort for future archivists.

Thanks to Tamara Thornhill, our new Project Archivist, much progress has already been made and the contents of the storeroom are slowly becoming more ordered and manageable. Since, prior to her appointment, about sixty per-cent of the Archive was not boxed or listed, many new discoveries have been made. Box lists are being created in an electronic searchable format, although we are not yet in a position to use a system like CALM; search room procedures have been implemented; a reprographics service has been set up; and an accessions register started. We have also started to use volunteers to help with item-listing and transcriptions.

The Archive is also beginning to be rationalized: e.g. defunct financial records have been shredded; and we are slowly transferring the Chancery and Tribunal records (mostly dealing with marriage cases) to separate locations, which will free up a lot of space. Papers relating to Westminster Cathedral are likewise being transferred to the Cathedral Archives, which has recently started employing an enthusiastic part-time archivist. This is creating some much-needed space.

The public profile has been raised through articles, involvement in conferences and through a Westminster Archive blog, which is an easy means of putting news and information on the web. We are tentatively starting to organize school visits - I say 'tentatively' because our facilities and space are severely limited and I would eventually like to organize 'History Days' for the Archdiocese, with a range of speakers and visits.

We still have a very long way to go. Our basic aim at the moment is to find out what we have in our storeroom, and this will continue over the coming months. The challenges of cataloguing, digitalization, conservation and re-location all lie happily in the future. The system that we now use at Westminster certainly works for us - i.e. to have a part-time priest 'archives manager', a professional archivist and a team of volunteers. We hope this will continue into the long-term future. The assistance of the wider archives community has also been invaluable, especially through the Advisory Committee. To echo Margaret Harcourt Williams' point (cf. pp. 3-11 above), standardization of policy, sharing of good practice and increased co-operation amongst Catholic archivists would also be most welcome. With these goals in mind, it is my hope that the Westminster Diocesan Archives will grow in its function as custodian, conservator, collector and promoter of the Memoria Ecclesiae - the memory of the Church and of the Catholic contribution to the history of this country.

Holy Week in Rome: Impressions of a Liverpool Unitarian Family

John Davies

Local record offices often produce pleasant surprises for the historian of the Catholic community. The papers of the Holt Family, Unitarians and members of Liverpool's business elite in the nineteenth century, at first sight might not seem promising territory for those seeking insights into the Catholic community or into how that community was viewed by others. A number of members of the Holt family kept diaries and although there are very few references to Catholics in Liverpool, the travel journals kept by some family members do illustrate English middle-class perceptions of Catholicism, as in the following example taken from a visit to Rome. The Holt Papers are catalogued under 920 DUR in Liverpool Record Office.

In the spring of 1863 three members of the Holt family from Liverpool, Emma, widow of George, and two of her children, Anne and Robert, travelled to Italy with a French lady companion, Madame de Finance, a young maid servant, and a professional guide, who joined them in France. By the middle of the nineteenth century the Holts were firmly embedded in Liverpool's business, banking and ship-owning community. Like many of the city's business elite at this time the Holts were Unitarians.¹ They were also firm believers in the educational value of foreign travel and made frequent visits to Europe. By the middle of the nineteenth century the wealthy middle class from Britain's cities regularly took holidays in Italy. As early as 1817 the poet, Lord George Byron, had rather sniffily complained that Rome was 'pestilent with English'.² The Holts would have rejected any suggestion that they were merely aping, perhaps in a minor way, the grand tours of the aristocracy in the eighteenth century. They would have agreed with William Roscoe's assertion in his inaugural lecture of the Liverpool Royal Institution in 1817 on the 'Fruitful history of commerce and creativity' that: 'In every place where commerce has been cultivated upon great and enlightened principles, a considerable proficiency has always been made in liberal studies and pursuits.'³ It was to further such 'liberal studies and pursuits' that the Holts set out for Italy in the spring of 1863. Anne Holt, unmarried and in her early forties, an ardent advocate of women's, or at least middle-class women's, education, a stereotypical 'blue-stocking', was the prime mover behind the visit to Italy and was certainly its most enthusiastic participant. In the family journal she noted on 23 February 1863:

We have for some little time talked vaguely of going to Rome and now the decision has at last been come to rather suddenly. We shall probably start on the 11th of March, that is Robert, Mother and I are to be joined in Paris by Madame de Finance, who will travel with us.⁴

Two weeks later she wrote:

We ourselves are full of preparations for our approaching visit to Rome; all our plans being now fixed for departure on Wednesday 11th. Cataldi is the name of the courier we have engaged. If all be well we ought to arrive in Rome on the 18th.⁵

In early June Anne, on her return from Italy, resumed the family diary, which had been suspended and replaced during the visit to Italy by her individual journal:

Wednesday the third of June being exactly twelve weeks since we left home, Mother, Robert and I with maid Jemima, returned in good health and safety from our very enjoyable and prosperous tour in Italy. We have visited and seen satisfactorily what we proposed to ourselves in starting, the great cities of Rome, Naples and Florence, also viewing in a more cursory manner the places that necessarily came before us on our way Our journey has been in every respect successful, free from accidents and misfortunes of every kind; and sociably rendered very agreeable by the companionship of our old friend Madame de Finance, who joined us in Paris and left us there on our return. I cannot but feel very thankful that this long and somewhat arduous journey has been so happily terminated, nothing whether abroad or at home having occurred to mar its pleasantness.⁶

Anne Holt and her mother Emma both kept a journal of the visit to Italy. Anne's brother, Robert Durning Holt,⁷ although keeping a sketchy diary during this period of his life, left no account of the Italian visit. However, Anne Holt in particular was a meticulous recorder of her travels and experiences. Her mother, Emma, kept a more modest journal.⁸ During their stay in Rome, in between exhaustive and exhausting tours of the city's classical remains, architectural wonders, basilicas and art galleries,⁹ they, as Unitarians, also watched as spectators, rather than participated in, some of the Holy Week ceremonies led by Pope Pius IX.

Their first impressions of Rome, however, were somewhat mixed. From a distance, on the way from Civitavecchia, Emma Holt was quite entranced, writing on the 18th March:

The first appearance of the old city was very picturesque, the setting sun shining upon the old houses and walls and producing very pleasing effects.

But the following day, however, her impressions were not so favourable:

The entrance to Rome from the station not very pleasing -dirty streets, low neighbourhood and shocking smells ... So now we are in Rome, a place I never thought to see.

⁶ Ibid., 3 June 1863.

⁸ Anne Holt, Diary of a Visit to Italy, 1863 (LRO, 920 DUR 4/27/2) and Emma Holt, Diary of a Visit to Rome, 1863, (LRO, 920 DUR 3/28/3). Neither diary has page numbers. The extracts below are taken from these two accounts.

Similarly for Anne Holt, the entry into Rome was not what she had expected. On 19th March she recorded:

The railway stops quite in the outskirts where, as well as during the long drive to the hotel, was nothing whatever to make us fancy ourselves in Rome - nothing but the narrow, miserable looking, dirty streets of an inferior Continental town. Nothing of St Peter's, nothing of any relic of antiquity to be seen. Capaldi [their guide] told us that we passed through the Ghetto - but I did not see that there was anything more miserable about this part than the rest of the route. I must confess my first impressions are very disappointing.

The visit to Rome proper began the following day and Anne seems to have shrugged off her initial disappointment. She, Robert and Emma, to a lesser extent, then embarked on their strenuous schedule of visits.

Anne Holt: 20th March

We have been to St Peter's. Curiously enough it is very much what I expected. I neither feel disappointed nor surprised, but it fully equals my expectations. It is magnificent in the fullest sense of the word but I should not build a church in that style. On each Friday in Lent the Pope [Pius IX] comes to prayers in St Peter's and we were fortunate enough to have so good a view of him that we all feel we should not care if we have not another opportunity of seeing His Holiness. Preceded and followed by an immense retinue of priests he offered short prayers at two side chapels and then came to a temporary place arranged in front of the giant Baldachino under which are the remains of St Peter. We so stood as to face him. I could see every feature and expression distinctly. His portraits give a faithful representation of what seems to be a kind, good, old man, rather proud of his small plump pretty hands - His dress was all white except a scarlet cape with a long train carried by priests, and a vast multitude of whom knelt around him while he prayed, reading from a large printed card by the help of one taper held towards him by some officials and using his eyeglasses quite as much on the people as on the card of prayers. The whole thing is too much of a mere form. Who could pray in such a way?

Emma Holt: 20th March

The weather wet and cold, requiring good wood fires. Our first visit in Rome was to St Peter's. On entering the church, I felt at once impressed with its effect. I had often heard it spoken of and that in the first instance it disappointed you but such was not the effect it produced on me. I question whether the first effect was not the greatest - in taking in detail you lost the great whole As we were looking about us we became aware that there was some stir about the great altar and on enquiring we found that the Pope was expected. It is his custom during Lent to pray, if prayer it can be called, in front of the high altar. He walked in accompanied by a great number of priests and officials, and kissing the toe of a bronze statue of St Peter in passing, knelt at an altar or table placed for him, and with a priest on each side of him holding a lighted candle, continued his devotions. The multitude also knelt with him, but we looked on as strangers... In rising he gently extended his hands which is considered the benediction and then retired as he came. We had a very good view of him, and were pleased with the kindliness of his expression.

Emma Holt: 22nd March

Anne Holt: 22nd March

Anne Holt: 29th March [Palm Sunday]

Left the hotel at half-past seven to witness the ceremonies peculiar to this day in St Peter's. Mother, having a bad cold and fearing the fatigue, did not go - but Madame and I were fortunate in getting very good places and in sitting near some well-behaved people, especially the French lady who comes here every year from Paris, and an American, quite a lady, and whom from the liberality of her remarks, I should guess to be a Boston Unitarian. Really the conduct of many of the English and American men and women one meets here makes one ashamed of speaking the same language! The service was over about one o'clock and we found our carriage without any difficulty, the whole passing off more easily and in less time than I expected. It was to me altogether a less trying and fatiguing, and more striking and magnificent spectacle than I ventured to hope. Robert, on the contrary, was disappointed, probably expecting more.

Emma Holt: 29th March

They went to St Peter's to see the Pope bless the palms. I remained in the house. They were late back but glad to have seen the spectacle. Brought back with them an artificial piece of palm but Robert got a piece of the real one from a young priest.

Emma Holt: 1st April

After lunch to Saulini's [an artist who was painting Emma Holt's portrait] and thence to St Peter's to hear a Miserere, but the talking amongst the people very objectionable. While standing at the high altar joined by a French priest who was very devout and civil and anxious to point out to me the relics which were exhibited from one of the side balconies.

Anne Holt: 2nd April [Maundy Thursday]

Having tickets went to the Washing of the Feet by the Pope in St Peter's. Had to go very early and got very weary, the accommodation for the ladies being very indifferent - Somewhat curious but like all other ceremonies I have seen, not worth going to see. The behaviour of a great many English women there as everywhere else is scandalous, a disgrace to the nation.

Emma Holt: 2nd April

Today was the washing of the disciples' feet by the Pope. I thought I should like to see it as part of the ceremonies of Holy Week. The time we had to wait and the standing so fatiguing that I left my place and gave up the sight.

Anne Holt: 3rd April [Good Friday]

Mother with Saulini, afterwards at St John Lateran, a large, fine basilica. Central nave too ornate for the aisles and not in very good taste. Corsini Chapel very fine, with vault for interments. A very fine Pieta there and the sarcophagi of the family all round; a nice place for burial. Very pretty cloisters, but badly kept as also the garden - all such things here speak of decay and blight. The spirit that once animated, made them beautiful is gone and without that they are nought. Many relics kept there and in an adjoining building the Scala Santa, which many people were ascending on their hands and knees - melancholy exhibition... On returning visited the Protestant Burial Ground where we saw several names we knew, as well as poor Shelley.¹¹ It was satisfactory to see it so trim and well-kept; many of the graves attended to with loving care and all neat.

Emma Holt: 3rd April

Sunshine. The church of St John Lateran. Large statues in marble of the different apostles. A chapel of the Corsini family. Very splendid. Good cloisters and curious things shown in them such as the pillars of the Temple that were broken when the veil of the Temple was rent in twain, the pillars from Pilate's house, the table on which the Last Supper was eaten, an altar with a hole made in it by a wafer in consequence of the incredibility of the priest.

Anne Holt: 4th April [Holy Saturday]

The great ceremony of today is the baptism of the Jews and other converts at the Lateran - did not go. Rain most of the day - has been gathering for some days, so fear it may last and spoil the fetes.

Anne Holt: 5th April [Easter Sunday]

And so all is over: illumination and all. We heard such an account of the crush that we did not venture to go to the Mass. Madame however did and reported the scene before getting to the seats as almost awful, but is glad to have been, as she saw and heard the whole well and pronounced it to be far more magnificent than she could have imagined. The pope's voice still fine and powerful; that of Antonelli, the assistant deacon, quite inaudible. We only drove to the Piazza, but starting at 10.30 as advised, were too late to get very good places. The crowd was the principal spectacle and the Pope looked very imposing from the central balcony at the Benediction. Madame left here at 7, time enough she says. In the evening drove to the Pincian. The sunset was very splendid, so much so as to conceal the process of illuminating St Peter's though that does not begin till after the great luminary is set. The colouring of the sky was singularly clear and beautiful, the yellow tints fading through the most lovely rosy lilacs into violet and blue. Then gradually the lamps on the vast structure began to tell along every frieze, column and projection up to the highest summit of the pinnacle of the dome. It was exceedingly beautiful and so continued in that comparatively subdued state, till 8 o'clock struck. Then fresh fire as if by magic ran along the whole edifice converting it into a very mass of light, the cross at the top of all being beyond all description. Then gradually the splendour diminished and we left ere it was gone. Nothing in its way can be finer.

Emma Holt: 5th April

Madame de Finance was the only one of the party who attempted the ceremonies at St Peter's. We drove to the Piazza for the purpose of seeing the Benediction but were at too great a distance either to hear or see without a glass. We did see the Pope extend his arms and carried into the centre balcony of St Peter's. In the evening saw the illumination of St Peter's which certainly is a very fine sight. Drove in the Pincian which was crowded with gay carriages, amongst others the ex-King of Naples. An accident or two.

In travelling to Italy the Holts had followed one of the routes recommended by the standard guidebook John Murray's, A Handbook of Rome and its Environs: 'In going we sailed directly from Marseilles to Rome, or rather Civita Vecchia.' They returned by one of Murray's suggested alternatives, arriving home on 3 June: '...in returning [we] took the land route by Perugia to Florence and thence by Pisa, Genoa and the Cornice road to Nice.'¹² In this as in other ways the Holts were typical, conventional, middle-class visitors to Italy. They, particularly the indefatigable Anne, were prepared to work hard at their 'liberal studies and pursuits'. Their comments as Unitarians on the strange spectacle of the Catholic celebrations of Holy Week in Rome are perhaps also typical of their class and religious background. They had travelled to Rome to see the wonders of the classical world and the art and architecture of the Renaissance, a reflection of and an attempted return to classical values. Papal Rome in the 1860s was in its death throes, although the Holts, if they were aware of its precarious position, made no reference to it, nor to the fact that they would be among the last of the English to experience the full spectacle of a Papal Holy Week. The Papal States had been incorporated in 1859 and 1860 into the newly united Kingdom of Italy. Papal control of Rome itself was twice threatened in the 1860s by attacks from Garibaldi's Red-shirts. The city finally fell to the Kingdom of Italy in 1870 when the protective French garrison was withdrawn during the Franco-Prussian War. The Pope himself would remain in Rome as the 'prisoner of the Vatican', but the full splendour of the Papal celebration of Holy Week would be dimmed. The Holts had not come to Rome for these Papal rituals and the Holy Week ceremonies were an extra rather than being at the heart of their Roman visit. However, as open-minded liberals they were prepared to observe these medieval remains, generally with a slightly patronizing tolerance, although at times they allowed their liberal Unitarian slips to show.

BOOK REVIEWS

Rosemary Hill, God's Architect: Pugin and the Building of Romantic Britain (London: Allen Lane/Penguin, 2007, pp. xiii+ 602). The author, who is a prominent member of both the Pugin Society and the Victorian Society, offers here an extensive and meticulously-researched biography of the most celebrated Catholic architect of the nineteenth century. From an archivist's point of view this book is to be particularly welcomed for its comprehensive list of Pugin's works (both executed and unbuilt) with references to documentary sources, including the names of archival collections where original maps and plans are currently located. The archives consulted by the author are, as might be expected, wide-ranging, and include: The National Archives; Scottish Record Office; Magdalen College Archives, Oxford (Bloxham Letters); Hardman Archive, Birmingham City Library; State Papers, Windsor Castle; House of Lords Record Office; British Library; Royal Institute of British Architects; the County Record Offices of Wiltshire, Lincolnshire and Northumberland; and the Yale Center for British Art (Pugin Papers). Of special interest to readers of this journal will be the fact that the following collections were also used: the Myers Papers courtesy of Tim McCann; Ramsgate Abbey Archives; the Archdiocesan Archives of Westminster, Birmingham and Southwark; the Rosminian Archives at Stresa, Italy; and the Archives of Ushaw College.

Melissa J. Wilkinson, Frederick William Faber: A Great Servant of God (Leominster: Gracewing, 2007, pp. xix + 322). Another prominent Victorian (who was acquainted with Pugin) was Father Frederick Faber who, as both an Anglican and a Catholic, has left an important legacy of spiritual writings, hymns and other works. The subject of this book is of course honoured as the 'father' of the London Oratory, and it is that institution's archives that Melissa Wilkinson made her principal quarry for what is the first comprehensive scholarly study of Father Faber and his spiritual teaching. At the Brompton Oratory she made extensive use of letters written by Faber, including those to Newman, and likewise copies (from the Birmingham Oratory Archives) of correspondence from Newman to Faber. The London Oratory also houses important MS files containing Faber's notes, sermons etc., all of which the author has combed with great care. Among other collections used are the following: British Library (Faber's poems and letters); Calverley Church Archive, Yorkshire (material associated with Faber's family and birthplace, where his paternal grandfather was the incumbent); Cambridge University Library (Faber's letters to Lord Acton and H. Bence Jones); Carmelite Monastery, Notting Hill (Faber's letters, especially to Sister Mary of the Blessed Trinity); Westminster Diocesan Archives (Faber's letters to Cardinal Wiseman, various Oratorians, Pugin, Acton and The Dublin Review); Lambeth Palace Library (correspondence of the Wordsworth family, viz. Charles, Christopher and Christopher junior); as well as the archival collections of Pusey House, University and Keble Colleges, Oxford, the Ripon & Leeds Diocesan Registry, and Huntingdon County Record Office.

A History of St Mary & St Michael's Parish, Commercial Road, East London (Parish of St Mary & St Michael, Commercial Road, London E1 0AA/Terry Marsh Publishing, 2007, pp. viii + 360). At the opposite end of London to the Brompton Oratory lies Commercial Road, where the Catholic church of St Mary and St Michael has often been called 'the Cathedral of the East End'. This book, which is largely the fruit of painstaking research conducted by Jean Olwen Maynard, is a treasure-trove of information, narrative, analysis and anecdote, skillfully put together and well illustrated, and tracing the history of Catholicism in this part of the capital from Penal Times through to the Irish influx of the nineteenth century, the ravages of the Blitz and the emergence of a modern, multi-cultural parish. Commercial Road can boast a number of well-known parish priests, including Father (later Archbishop) Peter Amigo (1899-1901), that legendary priest of the East End Canon Timothy Ring (1904-1941), Monsignor (later Archbishop) Derek Worlock (1964-1965) and Bishop Patrick Casey (1966). Much local interviewing took place to produce this fine record, and the archival acknowledgements run as follows: Westminster Diocesan Archives; Brentwood Diocesan Archives; Tower Hamlets Archives; British Newspaper Library; London Metropolitan Archives; and the Archives of the Sisters of the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary, Chigwell, the Sisters of Mercy, Hardinge Street, the Little Company of Mary, and the Daughters of Charity of St Vincent de Paul.

Moving from the history of an urban parish to a large rural one, Father Edward Crouzet O.S.B., in Slender Thread: Origins and History of the Benedictine Mission in Bungay 1657-2007 (Downside Abbey Books, 2007, pp. viii+120) has produced an attractive and well-researched history of Catholicism along one stretch the Suffolk-Norfolk border from recusant times to the present day. The author is the Benedictine parish priest of Bungay and a monk of Downside Abbey, and the book celebrates the 350th anniversary of the arrival of Dom William Walgrave as the first Benedictine missionary at Flixton Hall. Two subsequent key dates in the development of the Bungay mission are 1823 (the erection of the first Catholic chapel in the town) and 1891 (the opening of the present church built above and outside the existing chapel). Moreover, since 1885 all the priests serving Bungay have been Gregorians (monks of Downside), with the exception of 1938-1945 and 1985-1986. Father Crouzet has added a valuable chapter to the history of the English Benedictine Congregation and in doing so has utilized a variety of archival sources: St Edmund, Bungay, Parish Archives; the Suffolk and Norfolk County Record Offices; Downside Abbey Archives; East Anglia Diocesan Archives; and the Norfolk Papers, Arundel Castle.

Another publication from the East of England is Charles Goldie, Our Lady of Compassion, Saffron Walden: The First Hundred Years (2008, pp.60: available from The Presbytery, Castle Street, Saffron Walden, Essex CB10 1BP). The author, who is a descendent of the celebrated family of Catholic architects of the same name, modestly claims that the present booklet is not a systematic history of the Catholic parish of Saffron Walden. Be that as it may, this is a very skillfully arranged and well illustrated account of the re-establishment (in 1906) of a Catholic presence in a far-flung corner of the Archdiocese of Westminster (since 1917 in the Diocese of Brentwood) by the Westminster Diocesan Missionaries of Our Lady of Compassion - the forerunners of the now defunct Catholic Missionary Society - under their founder, Father Charles Rose Chase, a convert clergyman and former officer in the hussars. Two subsequent parish priests of Saffron Walden also had military connections, viz. Father Brian Reeves MC (1924-1927), who served on the Western Front in the Royal Welch Fusiliers alongside Siegfried Sassoon, and who is mentioned in the latter's Memoirs of a Fox-Hunting Man, and Father Eric Bindloss Smith CBE, OBE (1961-1969), who as a Brigadier in the Royal Artillery saw distinguished service in the Second World War. Incidentally, the reviewer must claim an interest in this publication, not only because the author worked methodically through the Saffron Walden papers in the Brentwood Diocesan Archives, but also on account of the fact that in 1906 my paternal grandfather's family were among the original parishioners at Saffron Walden (my grandfather was confirmed in the church by Cardinal Bourne on the Sunday before the outbreak of the First World War).

From East Anglia we move northwards to Yorkshire, where a trio of publications from Leeds/Middlesborough is to be welcomed. John Dunne has edited the Report to Propaganda Fide of Bishop Thomas Smith, Vicar Apostolic of the Northern District, and in The Northern Catholic Community in 1823: A Report to Rome (Leeds Diocesan Archives, 2007, pp.40) we discover a model of careful scholarship and intelligent commentary. He has used several collections in the Leeds Diocesan Archives to complete his task (Gibson, Smith and Penswick Papers, Leeds Mission file, Pastoral Letters of the Vicars Apostolic of the Northern District, and the Minute Book of the Synods of the Vicars Apostolic, 1803-1849). Likewise, James Hagerty, in Priests and Paupers in Victorian Bradford (Keighley: PBK Publishing/Leeds Diocesan Archives, 2007, pp.44) has made valuable use of Workhouse and Boards of Guardians' records in the Bradford Metropolitan District Archives, as well as material in the Leeds Diocesan Archives (Briggs and Cornthwaite Papers), to give a very readable account of Catholic provision for the inmates of the Poor Law institutions in nineteenth-century Bradford. The third Yorkshire publication is Martin Craven's, The Langdale Legacy: Catholicism in Houghton and Market Weighton (2007, pp.116: available via Middlesborough or Leeds Diocesan Archives), which traces the fortunes of the Langdale family in the East Riding and their support for the Catholic Faith, bringing the story up to modern times by chronicling the development of the present parish of Market Weighton. A variety of archives have been utilized, including the collections at Ampleforth Abbey, the Bar Convent, York, the East Riding Record Office, Beverley, the Hull University Archives, the Archives of the British Province of the Society of Jesus, the House of Lords Record Office, Westminster Diocesan Archives, Middlesborough Diocesan Archives, Ushaw College Archives, the Borthwick Institute, York, and material kept at Our Lady of Perpetual Help, Market Weighton.

Clodagh Weldon, Fr Victor White, O.P.: The Story of Jung's "White Raven" (Scranton/London: University of Scranton Press, 2007, pp. xii + 340). The theologian and analytical psychologist Father Victor White (1902-1960) was one among a galaxy of eminent Dominicans of the English Province of the early and mid-twentieth century. This study, by the Associate Professor of Theology at the Dominican University, River Forest, Illinois, offers both a biography of Victor White and examines his relationship, professional and personal, with Carl Gustav Jung, who hailed the Dominican as the only theologian who really understood him. The author has based her study on much original, unpublished material, as well as a vast corpus of published works. In particular, she has made generous use of the Archives of the English Province of the Order of Preachers, which houses copies of White's letters to Jung and is the repository for letters written to White, although those from Jung to White were published in the 1970s as part of a two-volume edition of Jung's correspondence. Clodagh Weldon, in an exhaustive bibliography, also notes letters from and interviews with a number of people who knew White, including Father Bede Bailey O.P., the Dominican archivist, as well as other friars of the English Province.

Sister Maureen McGuirk R.S.M., Elizabeth McQuoin: Singing to the End of the Service – Founder of the Sisters of Mercy, Sydney, Australia, 1865 (Caringbah NSW: Playright Publishing, 2007, pp.294). This is a very well-produced and sensitively-written study of Elizabeth McQuoin (1819-1893), a native of London who entered the Sisters of Mercy in Liverpool and who in 1865, as Mother Ignatius McQuoin, led a small group of sisters to make a foundation in Sydney. The author has reproduced Elizabeth McQuoin's own account of the momentous task confided to her, as well as other documents, including her letters to her original community in Liverpool. Both Bishop Goss of Liverpool and Bishop Polding of Sydney feature in the story, and the book includes valuable biographical information on Elizabeth's family, especially her brothers, viz. Father Joseph McQuoin S.J. and Father James McQuoin. The latter, who was an acquaintance of Newman, had once thought of establishing an Oratory in the East End of London where he worked as a priest. He was responsible for bringing the Ursuline Sisters to Forest Gate and was himself Rector of the Catholic mission at Stratford before it passed from the secular clergy to the Franciscans in 1873. The use of archives in the author's research is impressive: she has worked in Ireland (Mercy International Archives, Dublin); Australia (the Sydney Archdiocesan Archives, the Marist Archives, Sydney, and the Sisters of Mercy's Archives at North Sydney, Melbourne, Brisbane, Bathurst, Grafton and Singleton); and in England (the Archives of the Sisters of Mercy at Birmingham, Bermondsey and Liverpool, the Archives of the Faithful Companions of Jesus, the Westminster Diocesan Archives, the Archives of the British Province of the Society of Jesus, and the Archives of the Ursuline Convent, Forest Gate).

Moving across the same continent, from Western Australia comes New Norcia Studies 15 (September 2007), a journal dedicated to the history and culture of the Spanish-founded Benedictine Abbey of the same name and its missions. The present number includes studies of brick-making and brickwork at New Norcia, the first aboriginal cottages constructed on the mission, and meteorological records (dating from 1849) in the New Norcia Abbey Archives, as well as a canonical explanation of an 'Abbey Nullius'. There is also an article on the Company of St Teresa of Jesus, a missionary congregation founded at Barcelona in 1876 which, between 1904 and 1920, sent religious sisters to teach at New Norcia.

Brother Edmund Damian F.S.C., The Nantes Brothers in England: A History of the De La Salle Brothers of the District of Nantes and of their Establishments in England during the Second World War (De La Salle Brothers, 140 Banbury Road, Oxford OX2 7BP, 2007). Brother Damian, whose book Heyday of the Teaching Brothers was reviewed in Catholic Archives 27, has now turned his attention from the London District of the De La Salle Brothers to that of Nantes. The Nantes District made a foundation in England early in the twentieth century and by 1940 were conducting schools at Ipswich, Southsea (Portsmouth), Norwood (South London), and on Guernsey, Channel Islands. In that same year their numbers in England were added to by the evacuation of the Nantes junior novitiate and by brothers from Quimper. After an introduction, Brother Damian considers the purpose of the De La Salle Brothers and their schools, their administration and recruitment, formation and teaching. He describes in detail the life of the Nantes District communities in England, and supports his narrative with extensive quotations and numerous illustrations, in which many of the people shown are identified. He appends lists of the Nantes novitiate, and the Quimper and Nantes religious stationed in England during the Second World War. Evacuations took place not only to England but also from English towns to safer rural areas, and the descriptions of the schools re-establishing themselves in Sussex and Hertfordshire amid wartime hardships are particularly interesting.

The Catholic Archives Society Conference, 2007

The Catholic Archives Society held its Annual Conference from Monday 21 to Wednesday 23 May 2007 at Hinsley Hall, Leeds. The speakers on the first evening of the Conference were Fathers John Broadley and David Lannon of the Salford Diocesan Archives. In two sessions, entitled respectively 'Well, I never expected to find that there!' and 'Archives and the Internet', delegates were given a most interesting introduction firstly to the diocesan archives covering the geographical counties of Lancashire and Cheshire (viz. Salford, Liverpool, Lancaster and Shrewsbury) and, secondly, to the highways and by-ways of using the www in an archival context. On Tuesday the speakers were Robert Finnigan of the Leeds Diocesan Archives, who illustrated the use of archives in the restoration project recently completed at St Anne's Cathedral, Leeds, followed by Jenny Moran, Public Services Manager at the Northamptonshire Record Office. The second talk ('Access to Archives in the Twenty-First Century') examined the principles of copyright, data protection and freedom of information, using as its example the Archives of the Little Company of Mary, Nottingham. An afternoon visit was then made to the City Archives in Hull, where the Lord Mayor welcomed the party before Mr Martin Taylor gave a presentation and conducted tour. On the final morning, before the Annual General Meeting of the Catholic Archives Society, Sister Mary Campion McCarren of the Faithful Companions of Jesus spoke about her own congregation's International Archive Conference. Full details of all the papers given at the Annual Conference may be found in CAS Bulletin 31 (November 2007).

The Annual Conference of the Catholic Archives Society in 2008 will be held at Brunel Manor Conference Centre, Torquay, Devon, from 19-21 May.

EDITORIAL NOTES

It gives me great pleasure to introduce Catholic Archives 29 (2009) and to thank all the contributors to this year's edition of the journal. I hope that the members of the Catholic Archives Society and subscribers to Catholic Archives will find the articles to be both of interest and practical assistance to them in their work as custodians of the Church's archival heritage.

Two of the articles offered this year were first presented as papers at the Catholic Archives Society's Conference in 2008, viz. Sarah Stanton's comprehensive introduction to the provision of secure access to archival collections, and Father Kristian Paver's masterly summary of the relationship between Canon Law and the United Kingdom's Data Protection and related legislation. We are truly in the debt of both authors for two very enlightening pieces.

Of great practical interest too is Dr Graham Foster's account of how Nottingham Diocesan Archives have approached the task of cataloguing and storing photographic material such that it can be easily retrieved. The whole area of the archival approach to visual images repays our close consideration, and this article provides a number of very helpful suggestions. Likewise, it is surely the case that Edward Walsh, in giving us a description of his work on the archives of one East London parish (Our Lady of Lourdes, Wanstead), will at the same time offer much-needed encouragement to priests and laity alike in the very important matter of ensuring that proper care is taken of the archives in our parishes. And on a similar theme, Dr John Davies, basing himself on the notice books of a now dosed parish (St Peter, Seel Street, Liverpool), illustrates the importance of such documents as primary sources of history. Finally, in what is the first article in Catholic Archives 2009, Father Nicholas Paxton shows the value of such primary documents as he narrates the story of the re-foundation of Farnborough Abbey in 1947.

As is now customary from the pen of the Editor, an appeal is made to members of the Catholic Archives Society (and indeed to any non-members who may read these lines) to consider offering an article to the journal for future publication. As this year's edition illustrates, articles do not have to be of any particular length (they can be quite brief or more extensive), nor do they necessarily need copious footnotes, but what they do require is the commitment and generosity on the part of their authors to share ideas and experiences on how best to promote the preservation and conservation of the archival patrimony of the Catholic Church. Once again, therefore, I express my gratitude to our contributors and invite others to consider putting pen to paper.

Father Stewart Foster

THE RE-FOUNDATION OF FARNBOROUGH ABBEY IN 1947: A STUDY IN ARCHIVAL HISTORIOGRAPHY

Rev. Nicholas Paxton

The intention of this article is to emphasize the importance of archive research by illustrating the connection between such research and historiography. The subject chosen for this purpose is the re-foundation from Prinknash in 1947 of Farnborough Abbey, together with some aspects of Farnborough's life before it became an independent priory in 1980. In order to shed new light on the story this article is based entirely on material in the Prinknash, Farnborough and Storrington archives, along with some personal information and an account of its church written from personal observation only. Secondary sources are eschewed altogether. Archive references are as precise as possible, though the use of unclassified archives can, of course, mean that the heading, origin, date and present whereabouts of a document may have to suffice in some instances.

The example of Monsignor David McRoberts (a distinguished former Keeper of the Scottish Catholic Archives), for whom 'history was not merely a matter of documents: he had a keen eye for the importance of objects as historical evidence,'¹ makes clear that our appreciation of the Catholic Church's cultural patrimony should be based on artefacts as well as papers. We will therefore begin with a description of the Farnborough abbey church in terms of its being unique in its purpose and highly untypical of nineteenth-century Gothic design in England, and look next at the circumstances which made it necessary for Prinknash to re-establish Farnborough and at the work of re-foundation itself. To clarify the picture, we will then look at five important aspects of the new community's life at Farnborough: the financial position; the maintenance of the services in the church; the building-up of the archives and new library; the different sorts of farming which formed so much of the community's labour; and the re-founded abbey's progress towards independence.

THE ABBEY CHURCH

Farnborough Abbey was founded by the Empress Eugenie of the French (1826-1920), after the deaths of her husband and son. It was to be both a mausoleum for them and (eventually) for herself, as well as a functioning church with a household of clergy to offer Masses and prayers for the imperial family - much like the Escorial in her native Spain. The abbey church, designed by H.A.G.W. Destailleur (1822-1893) of Paris, and built between 1883 and 1888, is of Bath stone, cruciform, and in the French Flamboyant Gothic style. Its dome, which Eugenie seems to have wanted to be added in imitation of the Invalides in Paris (Napoleon I's mausoleum), is slightly out of period with the rest of the design, being in Renaissance style. It is nonetheless a striking sight, surmounted by its lantern. The church has an aisle-less nave of three bays. The arches have no capitals: instead, vaulting and pillars die into each other. The transepts are each of one bay only, like those of the crypt beneath, and the crossing area is under the dome. The sanctuary ends in a five-sided apse, its walls and ceiling painted and gilded. The sanctuary ceiling culminates in a gilt crown of pendants set over the high altar. The apse windows are rose windows, as is that over the main door at the other end of the church. The large transept windows have completely plain glass; this is useful for letting a lot of light into the church. From the left of the high altar a staircase leads down into the Imperial Crypt, which is underneath the crossing, transepts, sanctuary and sacristy.

The Imperial Crypt has two parts: a square area with single-bay transepts on either side (under the church's crossing and transepts) and an apse (under the sanctuary). The imperial family's tombs are placed in the former. In contradistinction to the Flamboyant Gothic of the church, the crypt's style is Romanesque, though one wonders whether some of the ornamentation - such as the elaborate capitals and the carved bosses of the vaulting in the transept - may not be rather too late for the style. The tombs of Napoleon III and the Prince Imperial - Eugenie's husband and son - are in the transepts, while Eugenie's own tomb is between them at one end of the crypt, on a ledge above an altar.

THE BACKGROUND TO THE RE-FOUNDATION

The offer to re-staff Farnborough from Prinknash in 1947 was made by the Subiaco Congregation (then known as the Cassinese Congregation of the Primitive Observance) in England in order to stop Farnborough Abbey being abolished altogether.² Allowing the abbey to continue would mean that the obligations of Masses and prayers for the Bonaparte imperial family (which the Empress Eugenie had imposed as part of her foundation of the abbey) could continue to be fulfilled, as well as enabling the house eventually to regain autonomy. Since the mid-1920s Farnborough's earlier Benedictine community of monks of the Solesmes Congregation had experienced a continuing fall in numbers. Farnborough was placed temporarily under Abbot Gabriel Tissot of Quarr, who sent Father Aelred Sillem to Farnborough as local superior, after the retirement in 1941 of Farnborough's second abbot, Bernard du Boisrouvray.³ It appears that the main reason for the lack of an abbatial election was that the Abbot of Solesmes, who had to preside at such elections within the Solesmes Congregation, was unable to come to England for the purpose at the height of the Second World War.⁴

On 5 September 1946, Tissot wrote from Quarr to Abbot Adrian Taylor of Ramsgate (Abbot Visitor of the English Province of the Subiaco Congregation) that the Solesmes Congregation's General Chapter held two months earlier had decided that that Congregation could no longer maintain Farnborough. The General Chapter had laid on Tissot himself the task of finding a solution, particularly since the obligations imposed by the Empress meant that the Solesmes Congregation could not simply have the abbey shut down altogether by Rome.⁵ The reason for the seemingly uncompromising attitude of the French Congregation is unclear. It is true that Farnborough's fall in numbers had been caused by the deaths of numerous monks and the community's failure to attract both new French vocations to England and enough English vocations to allow it to perpetuate itself at its previous level. Thus Tissot - in a letter to Abbot Upson of Prinknash in September 1946 - stated that, after some departures from the community in the event of a takeover from Prinknash, there would only be eight priests 'with a high average age' and two other monks. Furthermore, the capacity of the dwelling quarters was forty-five monks, excluding the novitiate-cum-juniorate, which could house the novice master and eight others.⁶

However, it is also true that, according to the late Father Francis Isherwood (formerly the Portsmouth diocesan archivist), there were still seventeen priest-monks on the Farnborough community list in 1947, although Isherwood's list includes two whom Tissot excluded from his reckoning, as well as the names of Tissot and Sillem. Moreover, some of the monks were to prove long-lived: Father Peter Conway and Father Leopold Zerr, who stayed on at Farnborough after the 1947 suppression and re-foundation - though without joining the Subiaco Congregation - were still there in 1956, and Conway only died (albeit elsewhere) in 1973. Again, du Boisrouvray, despite having retired in 1941, did not die until 1970. Also, not all the Farnborough monks were elderly in 1946: the Farnborough annalist records separate visits to the abbey by Father Austin Delaney and Father Henry Lindeman, monks of the former community, as late as 1977 (leaving aside the presence at Quarr of Father Joseph Warrilow and Father Maurice Waterman, who were the last monks to die of the Solesmes community at Farnborough).⁷ Moreover, as we have seen, the lack of an abbatial election in 1941 was, at least primarily, not caused by the reduction in the community's numbers. Thus the community, though in decline, was not moribund in 1946.

One comment is particularly worth recording here. According to a handwritten paper headed 'Farnborough' in the Prinknash Abbey Archives, Father Dyfrig Rushton, later Abbot of Prinknash, stated in 1952 that, once the Congregation of Solesmes had resolved to give Farnborough up, the Farnborough community asked to transfer to another Benedictine Congregation, and the monastic observance of the Congregation of Subiaco was nearest to that of the Solesmes Congregation. Other documentary sources in the Prinknash archives confirm the accuracy of Rushton's recollection.⁸

Thus the question arose as to which abbey should provide monks for Farnborough. Though Prinknash was already taking steps to re-found Pluscarden in Morayshire, Abbot Taylor observed that the preparation of the Pluscarden buildings for occupation would take some time and that Prinknash had an overflow of monks. These monks, formerly at Bigsweir House near the River Wye, were by this time at Millichope Hall, near Craven Arms in Shropshire, on which the lease was coming up for renewal. The task of replacing the Farnborough monastic community therefore fell to Prinknash; and, while the Prinknash monks at Millichope were content there, they said that they too were prepared to do all they could for Farnborough.⁹

The Chapter Meeting of the Subiaco Congregation's English Province held at Ramsgate in 1946 had envisaged accepting the French community at Farnborough into the Province. However, it soon emerged that a much neater, more workable and quicker solution would be to close down the Solesmes Congregation's abbey altogether in favour of a re-foundation from Prinknash. Several of the French community suggested this solution to Abbot Upson of Prinknash on 29 October 1946, and Upson wrote to Tissot on 14 November, from a General Chapter of the Subiaco Congregation at Parma, saying that that Chapter had approved of a re-foundation of Farnborough by Prinknash.¹⁰ Accordingly, Abbot Germain Cozien of Solesmes (as head of the Solesmes Congregation) petitioned the Vatican for the suppression of the French foundation at Farnborough. On 6 February 1947 the Congregation for Religious issued a rescript suppressing it. However, Rome stipulated that the French abbey's suppression should not take effect until the Prinknash monks had arrived at Farnborough; it further specified that they were to do this by 29 April. So, on 10 March, Cozien (whom the Vatican had delegated to put the suppression into practice) endorsed the suppression, making it take effect when the Prinknash monks had taken over.¹¹

THE PRINKNASH MONKS' WORK OF RE-FOUNDING FARNBOROUGH

The first superior from Prinknash at Farnborough was Father Bede Griffiths (who later became well known as the head of a Christian ashram in India). Griffiths arrived at Farnborough with a group of monks on 28 April 1947. The first page of the Subiaco community's annals (in the Farnborough Abbey Archives) gives the first list of officials under him. The next month three removal vans arrived at Farnborough from Millichope with church benches, cases of books, 'scriptorium and art stuff, etc.'¹²

One of the new community's other monks was Father Benedict Steuart, who had been a monk of the Congregation of Solesmes at Farnborough for fourteen years before transferring to that of Subiaco. In the annals for 19 May 1947 we read: 'It is a strange experience for Fr. Benedict to be here again after the lapse of 21 years.' On 25 May (Whit Sunday) 1947 the monks who had arrived from Prinknash officially took over control of Farnborough from the Solesmes Congregation: Griffiths officially succeeded Sillem as local superior; and (on behalf of the Holy See) Upson succeeded Tissot as Apostolic Administrator. More monks arrived from Prinknash soon afterwards: the final total was between twenty-five and thirty, including nine priests.¹³

FINANCE

In describing Farnborough's assets to Upson, Tissot was careful to distinguish between property belonging to the Imperial Foundation and property which the French community had acquired during its tenure of the abbey but which was not part of the Foundation. Briefly, the Foundation consisted of some twenty-seven acres of land, £23,000 worth of investments, the church and house, and such furniture as the church and house had had at the abbey's establishment as a Benedictine monastery in 1895,¹⁴ after eight years as a Premonstratensian house founded from Storrington.¹⁵ As Rushton noted in 1959, the Foundation had 'two trusts founded by the Empress Eugène (~~et~~) - The one for the upkeep of the buildings, the other for the support of the community.'¹⁶

The French community's own property at Farnborough comprised sizeable assets: thirty-eight acres of land; investments worth about £29,000; some housing yielding about £335 annually; the monastic library and all house and sacristy furnishings brought in after 1895 'except what would be considered as replacement.'¹⁷ One clause over land which caused later difficulties was: 'The French congregation retains for the present the ownership of the lands acquired by the former community of Farnborough but yields their free use to Prinknash' (ibid.). The Farnborough archives from between 1949 and 1964 testify that a protracted dispute later arose over the terms of the use and purchase of such land by the Prinknash community, though a compromise was eventually reached on the terms of the sale.

In 1956 the total value of the abbey's assets was £60,863, excluding the church and house and their contents (all of which were together insured for £250,000), and some twenty acres of land other than the gardens and farm. On the other hand, the abbey's liabilities in the same year totalled £15,565; and, working on a figure of £250 per head per annum, the 1956 cost of living for the community was £6,250. The community expected to have an income for 1956 of £6,500 from sources other than trades such as farming, printing and bookbinding, and the different trades which the community practised seem to have made a total profit of at least £600 that year. But the financial situation was clearly difficult and unsatisfactory in terms of ready money, particularly since poor management at the farm meant that it lost £3,120 over two years. It would seem to have been at about this time that Prinknash felt obliged to lend Farnborough £15,950.¹⁸ In 1958. Upson noted that he had reported the situation to a Diet (i.e. a meeting of the Abbot President and Abbots Visitor) of the Subiaco Congregation at Affligem on 5 September 1957.¹⁹ However, a profit was being made in 1956 on Farnborough Court, which was 'a Guest House for permanent guests, chiefly retired people who wish to live near the monastery.'²⁰ That year only one flat was unlet; when this too was let, Farnborough Court was expected to make a clear profit of £1,000 annually.

THE CHURCH FURNISHINGS AND SERVICES

The church at Farnborough benefited from a munificent gift in the late 1940s: hand-coloured lithographs of the Stations of the Cross by Sir Frank Brangwyn RA arrived at Farnborough on 8 April 1948 'and were placed on exhibition in the cloister.'²¹ According to the Prinknash archives, they were set up in the church there before the end of February 1950.

In 1949 the position of the monks' choir stalls was changed to the first bay of the nave, instead of using stalls in the transepts, along with those in the apse which Destailleur had designed. Again, a 1951 renovation of the organ provided a suitable time to move it to a former side-chapel. Though the organ was later restored to its original position behind the altar, the arrangement of the liturgical choir, as it stood in 1956, was insufficient for the growing community. A change of arrangement was being contemplated which would allow for up to forty-five monks in choir, while the seating capacity of the rest of the nave was estimated at 150.²² In the event, the abbey's lay choir, founded in 1966, later moved behind the main altar, before moving to stalls in both the transepts where there had previously been transept altars.²³

Under the terms of an agreement which du Boisrouvray and Upson signed in January 1947, the maintenance of the church services "was facilitated by the French community's gift of the contents of the sacristy and linen-room, save for such items as it - or individuals among its members - might wish to keep.²⁴ As to the services themselves, the obligation to pray for the souls of the imperial family consisted of four High Masses a year, two Low Masses every week and 'a number of suffrages' (that is, of prayers for the dead).²⁵ These are mentioned periodically in the Farnborough annals. In the entry for 5 April 1950 the annalist writes, 'Pontifical Absolutions for Napoleon III after Sext'. On 9 January 1973 the Bishop of Portsmouth, Derek Worlock, sang the commemorative Mass for the centenary of Napoleon III's death before the Bonaparte family (Prince Napoleon, his wife Princess Alix and their son Prince Jerome) and representatives of the French Embassy and the Foreign Office. On 1 June 1979 the centenary Mass for the Prince Imperial took place amidst the displays of a flower festival which was in progress in the church at the time. In 1979 the annalist recorded that although 11 July was the Empress Eugenie's anniversary, it had to be kept on the following day because 11 July is also the Feast of St Benedict; however, the anniversary was duly observed on 12 July, and the celebrant of the Mass wore the chasuble made in 1920 for her funeral. Abbot du Boisrouvray was also remembered: the Conventual Mass on 6 December 1971 was a Requiem to mark his first anniversary.²⁶

Meanwhile, the daily round and the common task of a monastery's liturgical life continued. The Feast of the Transfiguration had its First Vespers broadcast from the abbey in August 1947, and Farnborough's daily Community Mass and choir office are mentioned in the Prinknash archives.²⁷ However, the Farnborough annalist records that on 25 May 1967 there was no Corpus Christi procession, probably the first such omission for a long time.

THE ARCHIVES AND LIBRARY

As part of instructions from Cozien to Tissot of 16 October 1946, the archives of the Solesmes Congregation abbey at Farnborough were earmarked for removal without the possibility of their being left in situ. The Abbey of Solesmes therefore now has twelve files of Farnborough archives.²⁸ However, one MS which is now at Solesmes ('Ephemerides de Farnborough 1895-1936'), being the diary of Brother Emile Moreau, one of the Farnborough monks, has a bound photocopy in the Farnborough archives authenticated in 1986 by a flyleaf note of Farnborough's prior of the time. Other archive diaries of first importance, this time in the originals, are those from 1911 to 1949 of Father Peter Conway, whose continued presence at Farnborough after the re-foundation explains why the Farnborough archives still contain his diaries. The archives also include a typescript selection of material from the Conway diaries by Father David Higham and Brother Leander Hogg. As with any editorial work, their choice of material can appear a shade unexpected at times: for example, they omit the full account by Conway (who was acting as guest-master at the time) of Ronald Knox's stay at Farnborough, and of Knox's reception into the Catholic Church there on 22 September 1917. However, their work is both a valuable tool for first-time readers of Conway's work and an important vademecum for those who do not wish to have to read the diaries in full. The archives also contain papers of Donald Christie, a Farnborough novice monk of the 1930s, as well as material relating to the compilation of Higham and Hogg's unfinished 'Chapters of the History of St. Michael's Abbey, Farnborough'. While the research for this work did not really include archive material from Solesmes,²⁹ the Farnborough archives include the work's typescript in two files. As one would expect, these archives provide a wealth of material from after 1947, of which the community annals and the correspondence with Prinknash are the most important for our purposes.

In the event, the Solesmes Congregation also reserved to itself the French community's library under the terms of du Boisrouvray's and Upson's agreement of 16 January 1947. Upson understandably wrote that he would prefer its removal before the advance party's arrival from Prinknash. So the transfer of this library in 1947 raised the difficulty of how to move the books out before the Prinknash community moved in.³⁰ From Sillem's letters to Upson of the 22 and 28 February 1947, it seems that the this library was removed to Quarr and from there distributed among different Benedictine abbeys of the Solesmes Congregation. The new community brought in some books, probably not more than two thousand,³¹ from Prinknash and - as we have seen - from Millichope, as the basis for building up a new library.

FARMING AND CRAFTS

The considerable majority of the community re-founded from Prinknash did manual labour on the abbey farm and vegetable garden. Farm labour is constantly mentioned in the early pages of the community's annals. The vegetable garden's produce was mainly for domestic use, though the monks sold the surplus. Fruit was provided by the abbey orchards. A lot of money had to be spent on restoring the farm with a view to eventually making the abbey self-supporting, presumably because most of the monks of the French community had undertaken primarily academic and intellectual work instead. Additionally, while bee-keeping was also practised, we can amplify our picture of this aspect of the life of the Prinknash community at Farnborough from its dairy, poultry and silk farming.³²

As to dairy farming, the abbey farmer in 1947, Brother Louis, was a monk of Clervaux, Luxembourg, and Sillem undertook to try to persuade the Abbot of Clervaux to leave him at Farnborough to run the farm while the new community settled in.³³ He does not seem to have succeeded: the Farnborough annals record Brother Louis as leaving on Whitsunday 1947. Father Bede, in thanking Brother Louis for his work, said that he had 'worked the farm single-handed for 20 years.'³⁴ At this time the cows numbered seven or eight and were mainly red polls. According to the annalist, they 'have reacted very badly to T.B. Tests, so we have decided to get rid of them and go in for Guernseys, as at Prinknash.' The dairy farm was finally given over to lay management in 1969 as the result of a fire the previous year.³⁵

While the dairy farm's purpose was to provide the community with milk, poultry farming was done primarily to raise money. In 1951 there were 700 birds; by September 1956 this had increased to 1,200, but one problem was succinctly described in a 1951 comment in the Prinknash archives: 'Foxes! Four in broad daylight.' By March 1961 the demand for poultry from the abbey for eating purposes had almost completely disappeared, and Brother Edmund Fatt therefore stated that he would stop poultry farming.³⁶ The poultry farm ceased to operate at about the same time as the dairy farm passed out of the monks' hands.

Silk farming also took place as an activity of the Prinknash monks at Farnborough. Its purpose was apparently to produce silk for vestment-making. According to the annalist, one monk (Brother Edmund Fatt) had got back from Ireland 'laden with silk worms' on 7 September 1948. However, while the silk was of sound quality, and this work still made a profit in 1955, the post-war availability of cheap artificial silks eventually made it uneconomic.³⁷

The smaller number of monks who did not labour on the farm were those with good capacities for art and for specialized crafts such as printing and bookbinding, who worked at those instead. The abbey's commercial work in arts and crafts was concerned mainly with woodcarving. It seems that bookbinding was re-started in 1955. The printing press at Farnborough, started in 1952, was not making any profit in 1956. It was expected to break even that year; but, after six years of printing, the final profit figure for 1957 was only £80, whereas the machinery had cost £4,400. Printing had stopped at Farnborough by November 1959, though Father Hildebrand Flint noted in 1980-1981 that photo-typesetting without printing had since been done there.³⁸ Even so, different types of farming and crafts remained essential to the life and work of the new community of monks at Farnborough, who were finally to be successful in bringing about its return to autonomy.

TOWARDS A NEW AUTONOMY

Although Father Bede Griffiths became Prior rather than merely Superior in 1949,³⁹ it remained clear that Farnborough was still under Prinknash, both canonically and for practical purposes. Moreover, the situation was unpromising: in 1951 the Chapter of Prinknash unanimously asked that of the Subiaco Congregation's English Province to free Prinknash from its obligations with regard to Farnborough, principally because it felt unable to provide Farnborough with more monks or more money. While 'this petition was submitted to the Curia [of the Abbot President of the Subiaco Congregation] by the Provincial Chapter', the Curia handed down a negative answer,⁴⁰ and despite Upson's view that the community's condition was unsettled in 1951, the Subiaco Congregation's English Provincial Chapter resolved that Farnborough should become independent of Prinknash within ten years.⁴¹ As Prior from 1951 to 1958, Father Basil Robinson (otherwise known as the son of the cartoonist Heath Robinson)⁴² did some important work in unifying the community and raising its morale. But the financial position remained very precarious.

Although the Farnborough community still had twenty-two monks in September 1956 (of whom eleven were priests), together with a choir postulant and a 'regular choir oblate',⁴³ staffing the abbey seems to have become a problem by early 1960, when Father Raphael Davies (Prior from 1959 to 1961) expressed regret over the shortage of able-bodied monks there. Again, of the recruits to the monastic life who entered Farnborough, fewer stayed the course than their superiors had hoped. No entirely Farnborough-trained monk made his solemn vows until 1977, though two others soon followed him.⁴⁴ Nevertheless, the community heard on 18 June 1969 that the Abbot President of the Subiaco Congregation had, with his Council of Visitors, approved the raising of Farnborough's status the week before to that of a simple priory, which gave it a greater degree of autonomy from Prinknash. Farnborough was formally constituted as a Priory by decree of the Abbot President in July 1969.⁴⁵ (One way that the community marked this event, despite having resolved to continue with the white Prinknash habit in 1956, was a decision to wear the black Subiaco habit instead.⁴⁶) On the last day of 1969 the Farnborough annalist wrote: 'The year ends with a deep sense of gratitude for the advance of our community towards independence during the year 1969.'

In November 1978 Father Anscar Nielsen retired as Prior of Farnborough.⁴⁷ Abbot Rushton, himself intending to retire the following Easter, took the view that the Farnborough community was ready to become autonomous.⁴⁸ And so we leave the community on the eve of attaining in 1980 the status of a fully independent monastery, for the first time since 1947. Great credit is due to the monks sent to Farnborough from Prinknash in and after 1947, who had striven hard in re-founding an abbey with a famous past.

CONCLUSION

This article has shown how the contents of three monastic archives, a first-hand description of a church building and some material obtained by the oral transmission of history can be used - without recourse to any secondary sources - to chronicle and clarify the suppression and re-foundation of an individual monastery in 1947, in the context of its development from 1946 to 1979. In doing so it has emphasized anew the close relationship between archival research and historiography. As and when archivists wonder to what extent their labours are worthwhile in the conservation and organization of records, and perhaps even think 'Is it all worth it?', this article may also merit consideration by way of encouragement.

PROVIDING SECURE ACCESS TO YOUR ARCHIVES: EXAMPLES OF BEST PRACTICE AND SOME PRACTICAL SUGGESTIONS

Sarah Stanton

Introduction

This article will cover the key practical aspects of providing secure access to your archives. The scope of a paper on security in archive operations could be very large; the issues impinge upon most elements of repository management. My aim is to stay reasonably practical, including giving suggestions that could be employed in your own archive. It will also feature, however, some examples of best practice, in order to promote awareness of what are considered to be the current optimal conditions. I will deal with physical side of providing secure access, such as policies and procedures for the reading room, and I will focus on how to manage access for external researchers.

It is probably not necessary to emphasise the importance of this issue. While the majority of people coming to use archives are honest and genuine, there is a small minority who will visit archives with malicious intent and others who would be prepared to act dishonestly if the opportunity arose. None of the suggestions that will be made are foolproof and it is important to remember that it is impossible to eliminate all threats completely. The aim is to construct an interlinking network of security measures which will make it very difficult for someone to act improperly.

As many of you work in small archives with restricted resources, I will aim to make my recommendations applicable to these conditions as frequently as possible. The following quotation from F.I. Dunn's Society of Archivists' Best Practice Guidelines on Security 2: Security (1994) will, I hope, provide some reassurance for those people working with very limited budgets:

It is confidently asserted that policies, procedures and genuine intentions, which for the most part are free, are at least as important as investment in costly equipment, gadgets and bought-in systems in achieving an acceptable level of security.

Accreditation and registration of readers

There are certain steps that can be taken before someone arrives in your archives to ensure that their visit is as well-managed as possible. It is perfectly valid - and important - to know the full name and permanent address of anyone visiting your archives, so that you are then able to contact them at a later date if necessary.

Knowing their research purpose is a slightly different and more complicated issue. Some would argue that a requirement to state the subject of research is valuable since justifiable suspicions may be aroused if the documents requested prove inconsistent with stated objectives. Others would maintain that this might tempt one to discriminate against some people who wish to conduct a certain type of research. In general, the more you know about someone's research aims, the more helpful you can be: it is natural to try and gently encourage people to be forthcoming with as much information as possible as it will usually make their visit more productive.

Many archives will require researchers to visit by appointment. This may be because they have limited space for researchers to work or because they are only able to open a few days a week. Some larger archives, however, also request that researchers make an appointment since this enables them to plan for visits and maintain an adequate level of security.

Some institutions require researchers to write a letter (not a fax or an e-mail) in order to make their first appointment - even if they have already made initial contact via telephone, e-mail or in person - to help confirm their identity and permanent address. Not all researchers will be happy with what may be viewed as a slow procedure; people frequently want an instant response. In spite of these objections, however, this policy is still valid, although it may need to be reconsidered during an extended postal strike. In addition, it is very common to ask people to bring some form of identification with them which provides proof of their name and permanent address. Frequently, after these more rigorous initial checks, researchers can make subsequent appointments by telephone or e-mail.

Some local authority archive services use a CARN (County Archive Research Network) ticket. These are usually provided free of charge on proof of identity and are valid for about four years. They allow access to approximately fifty archive services. Whatever method of identification you choose to use, the key point is that you can be sure that people are who they say they are and that you are able to contact them again at a later date, if necessary.

Reading room design and lay-out

Many people have to work in reading rooms that are not ideal and, in most situations, are required to make do with what they have. It is desirable to have somewhere where people can sit and study the documents, to make sure that a member of staff is on duty in the room all the time a researcher is present, and to have a separate locked strong room where the archives are kept. We do not live in an ideal world, however, and it may be that you have only one room available for the archives, so that the reading room and strong room have to be combined. On the other hand, you may have a separate strong room but only one member of staff, in which case you have to leave the researcher alone while you go off to fetch their documents.

If you do have the luxury of space and have a larger room, you need to think more carefully about surveillance. The staff member supervising the reading room should have a clear view of the whole room. Ideally, there would be no pillars or corners for people to hide behind and it is important to try to avoid overcrowding and storage of unnecessary items in the reading room, including piles of volumes and boxes. You can use mirrors to help with blind spots and also take advantage of mutual surveillance if researchers are sat facing each other. Close circuit television monitoring is also an option, and while it is expensive it does provide a record which can be checked at a later date.

If you do not have a purpose-built reading room, it is important to be aware of the security limitations of your working areas and to try and combat them to the best of your ability. You will want to give at least the appearance of consistent and versatile surveillance: researchers should never have the impression that they are unsupervised. If you have limited staff time to devote to reading room supervision you might consider restricting opening times to what is realistic, restricting the production of records to set periods when duplicate cover can be assured, and asking researchers to pre-order what they want to view.

The general ambience of the archive area should also be considered. People ought to feel aware when enter the reading room that they will be required to abide by some specific rules. This is not to say that you should try and create an unfriendly or intimidating atmosphere, but it is important to appear professional and organised.

It is quite natural to consider restricting entry to the archive reading room. If you use an appointments system, most visitors will be expected and it is appropriate to check researchers' identification at the start of their first visit. Controlled exit is equally as important, however. The reading room should be an enclosed area. Researchers should have returned all their items before leaving, and you will need to be sure that no items could be concealed about their person. It is important to be aware of all exits from the reading room - ideally there would just be one - and to be conscious of hazards such as a connecting lavatory with an outside window. Related to this issue is the prompt return of items to the strong room when they are finished with, or at least their removal from the reading room. A trolley piled high with archives is likely to lead to confusion, if nothing else.

Reading room procedures

Most archive services do not let people bring their bags, briefcases or similar items into the reading room. Some places will let people take in small handbags, others will permit certain items -e.g. pencils and paper - in a clear plastic bag. The archival principles behind this policy are three-fold: firstly, to prevent researchers from stealing material; secondly, to prevent them bringing in spurious documents and adding them to the archives; and thirdly, to prevent people from hiding behind their belongings and obscuring the supervisor's view of what they are doing. The policy does produce another problem, however: you will need to provide somewhere for visitors to leave their bags.

If you have the space, lockers usually work quite well although you may still wish to post a sign along the lines of 'Items are left at the owner's risk'. We are now facing an additional problem of terrorism, and certain establishments may need to exercise extra caution about what may be concealed in bags. One archive in London scans visitors' bags before they enter and then requires them to keep them with them at all times. However, it is to be hoped that terrorist threats are not an issue for most of us. Perhaps the best solution for a smaller archive is to have a table and/or a rail of hooks in the corner of the room where people can leave their bags and coats.

There are several materials which will frequently be banned from an archive reading room, some for security reasons. Certain establishments only allow people to take in yellow-coloured notepaper to prevent them from smuggling in spurious documents or taking out genuine ones. Some forbid pencil sharpeners since the blades can be removed and used to cut out signatures from documents. If you do decide to place a ban on pencil sharpeners, you will need to supply one for use. Apparently, moistened string can also be used to remove pages from a volume: the wet string is placed down the inside of an open volume which is then closed, enabling a page to be torn out without making a loud ripping noise.

Many archive services have a set of reading room regulations which they require visitors to sign before they are permitted to start their research. These rules define exactly what people are and are not allowed to do. They should concentrate the mind of any researcher upon how they are expected to behave. While such rules will not prevent someone from acting improperly, they will help to maintain control, and even to allow the ejection of an individual if necessary. The Public Service Quality Group (PSQG) issued a standard for Access to Archives a few years ago and is currently considering compiling a general set of reading room regulations to which all local authorities would subscribe.

The issuing of documents to researchers varies from institution to institution. It is important that the materials which are issued are logged somewhere, partly because it tends to be useful for absent-minded researchers but mainly because it means the archivist can check back at a later date if there is a suspicion that there may be a problem. Many archive services combine a document issue log-book with document order slips which produce duplicate or triplicate copies. These slips usually record the name of the researcher, the item required and the date. For administrative purposes it can also be useful to record the location and the initials of the staff member who removed and returned the item. One copy would be left on the strong room shelf or in the box from which the item was removed and one would be kept by the member of staff at the point of issue. If there is a third copy, this may be given to the researcher. When all slips are married up and initialled, it is possible to be sure that the document has been safely returned. It should be noted, however, that a strong room location is sensitive information which should not be revealed to members of the public.

Most archive services will restrict the number of files that a researcher can have at any one time. The reason for this rule is to prevent material becoming disarranged or damaged. People can only really look at one thing at a time, so unless they want to compare something with another item it seems unnecessary to give them a sizeable amount of material in one go. A large pile of volumes on the desk can also be used to obscure the view of the staff.

At this point it is probably useful to mention the specific archival meaning of the word 'file'¹:

An organized unit of documents grouped together either for current use by the creator or in the process of archival arrangement, because they relate to the same subject, activity, or transaction. A file is usually the basic unit within a record series.

This definition, taken from the General International Standard of Archival Description (ISAD(G), 2nd edition) is, in essence, a reference to a single volume or bundle which it would be intellectually illogical to subdivide. It is wise to think about how the archives will be issued when you are cataloguing and re-packing. If you have a very large file of papers that logically belong together, it is sometimes wise to package them separately as bundle one, bundle two and so on, so that they retain their intellectual integrity but do not become unmanageable in the reading room.

Some archive services will issue only one volume or bundle at a time, others will issue more at their discretion, depending on the nature of the files or the nature of the research. A further option is to weigh bundles at issue with highly sensitive scales and then weigh them back in on return. It is probably best to do this openly. This method is not completely foolproof because the files will always have a small, natural weight change as a consequence of use and moisture loss between the strong room and warmer reading room. At least two control bundles (used on alternate days) should be maintained for comparison with any suspiciously light bundles. It would, of course, be possible for someone to take out an archival document and replace it with another piece of paper. The scales, however, still act as a visual deterrent to thieves and have the advantage of helping staff to learn what constitutes a natural weight change and what might indicate that something has been removed from the file.

At the National Archives in London (formerly the Public Record Office) staff issue up to three items at a time into individual lockers and people collect their items themselves - a process which has completely removed human interaction - coupled with CCTV surveillance in their reading rooms. This is not an ideal situation but a necessity because of the staff-searcher ratio. They do have a separate, enhanced security search room for items with a particularly high monetary value or other special significance.

Files of loose papers are the most vulnerable to loss, both from intentional theft and unintentional muddling. Ideally, every single piece of paper would be given an individual sub-number. Some archives will count out the number of pages and make a note of this at issue. However, with many twentieth-century collections containing hundreds of pages in one file, this has become impossible; no archive service has the time to do this with all their collections. However, if you do have some items that you know would sell well at auction it might be worth considering numbering the pages individually for that series of files.

Another potential theft deterrent is to mark documents permanently, a practice which has now become uncommon. It is difficult to choose an effective method that does not alter the original document unacceptably. Embossing, perforating and stamping with visible or invisible inks are the current options but they all have quite major drawbacks. Any mark that can be cut, torn, erased, bleached or abraded from a document without damage to its contents is not fulfilling its function and invisible marks fail as an obvious and identifiable deterrent. Stamping with visible inks probably remains the best method where stamping is considered essential. Permission should be sought from private depositors before placing marks on their documents, and a high standard of quality control and application is required before any stamping is undertaken. It should not be seen as a mechanical operation. The only recommended and suitable ink currently available is formulated by the Library of Congress (currently available from Conservation Resources [UK] Ltd) and it needs to be skilfully applied with small, well-designed stamps. Experience shows that stamping does not in itself prevent documents being stolen. It has now become very unusual for an archive to mark documents permanently and, in general, it is considered to be bad practice.

Staff and volunteers

Many archives may already use, or are considering using, volunteers to help operate the service. This is an excellent way of gaining free or low-cost assistance from people who are frequently very enthusiastic and knowledgeable. It is important, however, initially to screen volunteers and ask for references, as one would for any member of staff. Depending on the person in question, it may be necessary to make different judgements about access to un-catalogued material and the possession of keys or security codes. It may be advisable to draw up a form of contract, for the benefit of both parties, to help define both access and security needs and limitations. At the end of January 2008 it came to light that an archivist had stolen hundreds of historical artefacts from the State Library in New York and sold them. Sadly, we do need to bear in mind that that it is not just external researchers who sometimes act with indiscretion. Theft from archives is a serious criminal matter and if it is detected or suspected the police should be informed.

It is not at all pleasant to feel that one may have to think the worst of people and it is true that it is a very small minority of individuals who come into an archive with an intention to steal or to cause damage or harm. However, it is important to be aware of what people are capable of doing and what can be done to keep archive collections as safe as possible. You may find that some researchers think that you are being pedantic. It can be useful to explain the purpose behind the rules, namely that they are standard for everyone who wants to use the collections and, because the archives are unique and irreplaceable, we must do everything in our power to look after them.

It is also vital to remember that no single method will ensure an adequate level of security. We need to aim for a combination of measures which will make life as difficult as possible for the would-be thief without intimidating the well-intentioned majority. Many of you will be working with severe resource limitations. If possible, you should assess the risks present in your particular situation and make your senior colleagues aware of these along with your recommendations for improvement. This will be in the hope that you can work to find the best compromise for your particular situation.

A PRAGMATIC APPROACH TO CATALOGUING, STORING AND SEARCHING VISUAL IMAGES AS DEVELOPED BY THE DIOCESE OF NOTTINGHAM

Dr Graham Foster

Introduction

Over the past few years the Nottingham Diocesan Archives (NDA) have been re-arranged and catalogued in an attempt to increase their accessibility, and to make more room for new acquisitions. In the process of doing this, it became apparent that there was a sizeable collection of visual images. The purpose of this article is to show how these images are catalogued, stored and retrieved. Whether it is 'good archival practice' is for the reader to judge. The system developed in Nottingham has three main advantages:

1. It is cheap and utilised mainly existing resources.
2. It is flexible and capable of infinite variation.
3. Visual images are classified, stored, and retrieved according to their source.

Finding a Visual Image

Visual images are found in the following catalogues. Each can be found on the Diocesan Website: www.nottingham-diocese.org.uk Go to the Archives home page and follow the links. Each catalogue can be downloaded.

The Catalogues

1. Diocesan Year Books Illustrations Indexes

The Nottingham Diocesan Year Book has been an annual publication since 1921, apart from 1926. The books contain many photographs relating to people, events, and buildings. Illustrations are classified according to place, person or date. Each entry is located according to Year Book and page.

2. Parish Magazine Indexes

The NDA have a varied collection of parish magazines dating from 1869. In total they cover around half of the parishes at some point in time. Illustrations are classified according to people, events and buildings. Each entry is located according to parish magazine, date and page number.

3. Scrapbooks and Bound Photo Albums

Over the years various people - religious, clergy and laity - have donated books with illustrations to NDA. The majority are not labelled but frequently the subject matter can be identified from the context. These books are listed in the General Index.

4. Slides, CDs, Films

NDA has a limited number of these. They cover such items as pilgrimages and the opening of churches. They are listed in the General Catalogue.

5. Photographs

In total NDA have over 2,000 loose individual images, covering a wide variety of subjects. Images are classified on an Access database under Category, Subject, Date, and Explanatory Details.

Step-by-Step Guide to Classification of Photographs

1. Collect all the images together

This is not meant as a joke. As photographs are collected the size of the problem becomes clear. In doing so an insight is gained into the variety and main emphases of the collection.

2. Obtain a large number of plastic mushroom trays gratis from the local greengrocer

Our local greengrocer disposes of these each day. They have the advantage in that they are rigid, can be easily stacked, have a slot in which a label can be inserted, and a gap on the side through which photographs can be inserted.

3. Start with a general look through the pictures

By looking through the photographs it became apparent that the pictures covered some subjects in detail (such as church buildings, bishops, clergy) and others (such as religious houses) in fewer numbers. With this in mind photographs were given an initial sort according to the subject matter, using the trays.

4. Adjusting the classification as work progressed

Taking 'Buildings' as an example, it soon became clear that there were a number of common factors. 'Buildings' was soon sub-divided according to 'Buildings/County (there are five counties in the Diocese of Nottingham). The same principle was applied to 'Priests'. These are classified alphabetically. As sorting progressed a new section 'O/M' was created for 'Orders: Male (Religious Order)'. This idea can be added to or changed as cataloguing continues.

5. Labelling the photographs

The next step was to start a detailed examination of each photograph. On the reverse, using archival photographic pens, known details such as people, location and date were written. As this went on some sub-division occurred: e.g. for 'Nottingham St Barnabas' photographs were classified as 'interior' and 'exterior'. The interior ones were then classified under 'pre-1962' and 'post-1963'. This is because a major refurbishment took place at this time.

6. Setting up the Access Database

Access is used because of its search facilities, which means that a photograph can be located in several different ways. The database has the following headings:

- a. Unique Number
- b. Category (this was a general heading)
- c. Subject (a refinement of Category)
- d. Date
- e. Details

The Unique Number is automatically entered by the computer. As an example, Category could be 'Bishops of the Diocese'; Subject is the individual bishop, such as Bishop Bagshawe; Date is that when the photograph was taken; Details refers to further information that would be helpful to the researcher. Clearly, for some photographs it was not possible to have full information, so blanks were left. Date was frequently problematical. If known, a definite date was given. If not, an approximate one was inserted, and '(approx)' added to the Details column. In the case of individual pictures of priests with no other images in the photograph, the date given is that of their ordination. This is clearly an arbitrary decision and shows how the system can be adapted to individual needs.

7. How to decide Category or Subject

This is done purely by choice. As an example, consider a photograph in which Bishop Ellis is at the Church of the Good Shepherd, Arnold, baptizing Lorna Jones in 1951. Arbitrarily, it was decided that the entry would be 'Laity: Baptisms' in the Category column, 'Jones, Lorna' in the Subject column, and '1951' in the Date column. The Details column read 'Bishop Ellis at Good Shepherd with family members'. In this way researchers could find additional information on Bishop Ellis or Good Shepherd Church.

8. Establishing the Storage System

Use was made of the existing filing cabinets in the NDA. Sorting of material meant that some draws were now empty. File inserts were labelled according to Subject. By the first Subject entry a label was inserted. Labels were hand written with separate colours for Category and Subject. Through experience it soon became apparent that it was advisable to leave blank file inserts in each draw to allow for sub-divisions and for some Subjects having many photographs.

9. Numbering, entering on the Database and storing

In turn a tray was taken to the computer. Each photograph was then entered onto the database giving it its Unique Number, Category, Subject, Date and Details. The Unique Number is then written on the reverse of the photo or on the protective sleeve. If a photograph is larger than A4, then an '0' was entered in the Details column. Photographs were then filed in the appropriate Subject insert: large ones in a separate box. It was frequently found that there was more than one copy of a particular photograph. In this case the copies were given the same Unique Number and stored in a large box labelled 'Duplicate'.

10. Labelling and Producing a printed Catalogue

Once the photographs have been catalogued and stored, each file insert was given a printed label, with separate colours for Category and Subject. A list was made of the contents in each draw and affixed to the front of each one. A second copy of each list was made and forms part of the printed Catalogue.

Using the database, each Category was selected in turn, arranged alphabetically, and printed off on varying coloured sheets of paper; this makes identifying sections in the Catalogue easier.

Finally, the sections were collated, and a brief introduction added to form the final Catalogue.

THE OLOLPA PROJECT

Edward Walsh

The Our Lady of Lourdes Parish Archives (OLOLPA) Project began almost by accident and promptly assumed a life of its own. It started in about September 2007 when Father Patrick Sammon, Parish Priest of Our Lady of Lourdes, Wanstead, London E11, placed a notice in the parish newsletter enquiring if anybody would be interested in sorting out the parish archive. Practical experience had been gained when cataloguing and indexing the business, historical, administrative and technical archive of a major U.K. engineering consulting group as well as when working in historical archives while pursuing my own particular research into the nineteenth-century Irish migration to South America. An offer was made to undertake the work: Father Sammon agreed, commenting that the archive contained 'only a few newspaper cuttings and some photographs, not very much really.'

Time for a reality check and to be presented with the contents of OLOLPA: a few boxes of papers in folders taken from a filing cabinet, and an assorted collection of loose plans and tubes containing drawings, newsletters, notebooks, a few photographic albums and about four or five black bags. Not very much really! True, and not true. There are always surprises. It never ceases to amaze me just how much historical material - letters, documents, photographs, drawings, plans, paintings, sketches etc. - continues to be found, just like the recent discovery of the earliest known picture of an England football team (1876).¹

Sorting and categorizing the material was initially a somewhat laborious and time-consuming task, but a very necessary one. Guidance was taken from the Occasional Papers produced for the Catholic Archives Society by Paul Shaw² and Elizabeth Semper O'Keefe.³ The thrill of discovering really unexpected and interesting letters and documents, which forms the basis of this article, has been almost entirely the result of cataloguing and indexing OLOLPA.

The Church of Our Lady of Lourdes, Wanstead, together with the Presbytery and Parish Pastoral Centre, is situated at 51 Cambridge Park, London E11, and is set back from the A12 trunk road between the Green Man roundabout, Leytonstone, and Wanstead Underground Station (Central Line). The parish traces its origins to Christmas 1910, when Father (subsequently Monsignor) William O'Grady of Our Lady & St George, Walthamstow, opened a Mass centre in Hall Lane, Wanstead. The Catholic Times of 5 January 1911 carried a news item under the title 'Eastern Counties', with a caption 'Catholic Revival at Wanstead.'⁴ Wanstead was at that time in the Archdiocese of Westminster, but in March 1917 Essex and much of East London were cut off from the Metropolitan See to form the new Diocese of Essex (subsequently Brentwood). Father O'Grady became Vicar General of the new diocese and had acquired a property in Cambridge Park, Wanstead, which he considered suitable as the residence for Bishop Bernard Ward.⁵ However, the seat of the new diocese had been fixed at Brentwood and so the Wanstead property was put to another purpose. Monsignor O'Grady (as he now was) invited the Sisters of Mercy from Commercial Road to make a foundation, with the result that Bishop Ward opened St Joseph's Convent, Wanstead, on 8 December 1917.⁶ By Christmas 1918 the congregation had moved from Hall Lane to what became the hall attached to St Joseph's Convent School. Father Basil Eustace Booker (1885-1954)⁷ became the first resident Parish Priest when appointed to Wanstead by Bishop Ward on 4 August 1919.⁸ Booker was a most remarkable individual, a man of great faith, who from 1915 had served as a military chaplain in the First World War. His portrait in military uniform was taken by Arthur Hands, a well-known local photographer whose studio was located at 27 High Street, Wanstead.

From the very beginning of his time as Parish Priest Booker was interested in education, and in the period leading up to the 1929 General Election he wrote to the three parliamentary candidates for the Epping Division. In his handwritten note, which came to light during the sorting of OLOLPA,⁹ he enquired of the candidates:

Do you agree to the principle that the same amount of public money should be expended on the schools in which definite religious teaching is given, as is expended on schools in which no such teaching is given? And in the case of Catholic schools will you endeavour to persuade your party to introduce, and will you support any measure framed, so as to give effect to that principle, wholly, or in part, which does not infringe the existing right of Catholic managers, by whatsoever government it is introduced?

All three candidates replied, viz. J.R. Walton Newbold (Labour), G. Granville Sharp (Liberal) and Winston Churchill (Conservative),¹⁰ and all had something pertinent to say. Churchill, writing from The Wood House, Epping, on 23 May 1929, responded as follows:

I have received the question put to me by yourself and [the] Parish Priests of Woodford [Green], Chingford and Loughton. It is clearly right in principle that, other things being equal, schools in which definite religious teaching is given should have as much public money spent on them as the others. As however the second part of the question implies, another consideration is introduced by the fact that the Managers of a Church School have a statutory right to appoint their own teachers, and such a school should in its own interests have an independent income. Subject to this proviso, my answer is in the affirmative.¹¹

Father Booker was no slouch when it came to building a church. The site, obtained in 1924, was described in a legal document as a 'piece of land situate in the Parish of Wanstead in the said county of Essex on the East side of and adjoining a road called Hall Road [now Cambridge Park]...'¹² Before the site was purchased it had for some years been worked by a local nurseryman whose displays of exotic blooms and sub-tropical plants had been much admired. The former market garden cost £1,750. The location was excellent, and on 28 July 1927 the foundation stone of the Church of Our Lady of Lourdes was laid by Bishop Doubleday,¹³ in the presence of the clergy and more than five hundred people. After ten years of collecting funds the nave of the church was built and completed. Prior to the opening of the first section of the building, Mass and other services were held in a small house located in the grounds of the Convent of Mercy, where there was accommodation for a congregation of about 150. The new church would hold about six hundred people and was designed by Geoffrey Raymond of Scoles & Raymond, Basingstoke. The Express and Independent of 20 October 1928 reported the opening of the first part of the church and published a drawing of the front elevation of The New Catholic Church- as it will be.' However, the projected tower was never constructed.

¹³ Arthur Doubleday, second Bishop of Brentwood 1920-1951.

Father Booker resided nearby, initially in lodgings at 25 Lonsdale Road, and from 1922 in what became the first presbytery at 20 Wellesley Road, off Wanstead High Street. In a letter of 23 June 1931 Booker advised Bishop Doubleday that he had accepted a deposit on account of £775 for the sale of the house in Wellesley Road, observing that 'the drains have just chosen this time to go wrong - the price is fair.'¹⁴ The letter is annotated in another hand, "B[isho]p approvesf,] leave to Diocesan solicitors to effect sale.' The present Presbytery at 51 Cambridge Park was built in 1931 and three years later an aisle in the church was completed at a cost of £2,153. A second aisle was opened by Bishop Doubleday on the first Sunday of Lent, 11 February 1940 - also the feast of Our Lady of Lourdes - £3,400 having been expended. The fact that this second aisle was built during the early stages of World War II was quite extraordinary, and came about by virtue of the fact that Booker had managed to obtain the necessary permit just one week before all such documents were withheld owing to wartime conditions.

OLOLPA contain a number of Ad Clerum letters written by Bishop Doubleday during the war years. They make very interesting reading. For example, in a confidential note of 30 August 1939 he advised his priests where they could purchase an armet that would give them "freedom of movement in the exercise of their duties if war should break out"¹⁵ - the armet cost i/-6d and was only obtainable from H.J. Nicholl & Co. Ltd. of Regent Street. Respirators costing 7/-6d and steel helmets at 8/-6d were available from the Home Office, but only via Bishop's House. By a letter of 9 October 1940 Father Booker was very matter-of-fact when advising Bishop Doubleday's secretary that the 'house and church [are] still intact though an incendiary bomb hit the church roof and bounced off D[eo] Gfratias], Six others burnt themselves out on the grass.'¹⁶ In a letter dated 9 July 1941 Booker advised Bishop's House that he had been 'asked to act as officiating Chaplain to the military units in this area...'¹⁷ and requested permission to do so. The letter is annotated in another hand: 'Reply 22/07/1941. Permission given by the B[isho]p. F.D.'¹⁸

The gravity of the situation was underlined by a letter from Bishop Doubleday of 25 May 1942 regarding the requisition of metal railings. He wrote:

...railings of Churches and Presbyteries have been scheduled for removal and the Ministry of Works has written to me asking that they should be given up freely to help the War effort. There appears to be no appeal against the removal of railings unless they are of artistic nature. I leave it to the local Parish Priest to arrange with the Local Authority but if any difficulty should arise I shall be glad to give advice to any priest who requires it.¹⁹

After the end of World War II it was once again education that became important. A makeshift classroom in the sacristy had been opened in 1937 and continued to function. The Sisters of Mercy provided the teachers. On the reverse of one of two fliers entitled 'Christmas Services for 1948' there is an undated handwritten note by Canon Booker regarding fund-raising to finance the building of a primary school:

I appeal to all who can afford to do so, to put at least a penny in the school box which is held at the church door after all Masses. The cost of building a permanent school is about £200 a place, so that our minimum requirements (120 primary age children) would cost the parish an amount of something between £24,000 and £25,000. It is only common sense to try and lessen the burden as much as possible now. Bishop Beck²⁰ is going to give us a school site - so we will not have that expense to meet.²¹

Canon Booker left Wanstead in January 1952, having served there for over thirty-two years, upon his appointment as Parish Priest of Grays. His successor was Father (subsequently Canon) James V. Hemming. In September 1963 Our Lady of Lourdes Primary School, for which Canon Booker had so long wished and desired to build, was eventually opened by Bishop Wall.²² The school took one year to build, at a cost of £56,000 and with an outstanding debt of £7,000 on opening.

LOLPA has an excellent collection of documents - letters, miscellaneous correspondence, Ad Oerum and pastoral letters, parish notices and newsletters, fliers, newspaper cuttings, parishioners' memoirs and personal recollections, photographs, and architects' plans and elevation drawings, as well as those for mechanical, civil, electrical and drainage work. All these plans and drawings have been indexed and catalogued using the classic engineering nine-column format:

This is very much a case of work-in-progress. Large-size photographs taken by the photographer Arthur Hands have been scanned and put on disk. The newspaper cuttings remain to be scanned and placed on disk. When the project has been completed it is intended to have both a hard copy of the archive index as well as one on CD. Duplicate copies of documents have been passed to the Brentwood Diocesan Archives to be added to the Wanstead file. Strange as it may seem, new and previously unknown material continues to come to light.

Canon Booker drove a soft-top Austin Seven motor car. The engine and chassis number indicate that the vehicle was built in 1927 - the registration number is VW 6100. VW' was an Essex registration number and on 8 August 1928 Essex County Council registered the car for private use in the name of the owner, Basil Eustace Booker of 20 Wellesley Road, Wanstead. The bodywork was by Mulliners of Birmingham. The car has had only five owners, one of whom (Miss Edith Janet Dallas) was secretary at Gayhurst School, Gerrards Cross, Buckinghamshire. Martin Bluhm, a retired schoolmaster from Bexhill-on-Sea, acquired the car 'a little worse for wear' in 1968. The vehicle, now fully restored, is used for weddings and other special occasions. Canon Booker's will revealed that he left an estate which beneficially amounted to a net value of £3,256-3-11d. It was left to his widowed sister, Elfreda Mary Tomlin of 9A St Scholastica's Retreat, Kenninghall Road, Clapton, London E5.²³

Our Lady of Lourdes, Wanstead, was until recently the largest parish (in terms of Mass attendance) in the Diocese of Brentwood, and it has had only four Parish Priests in ninety years: viz. Canon Basil Booker (1919-1952); Canon James Hemming (1952-1970); Monsignor Canon Christopher Creede (1970-2000); and Father Patrick Sammon (appointed in 2000). In 2008 the parish celebrated the eightieth anniversary of the opening of the first part of Our Lady of Lourdes Church, and how appropriate it was to discover a letter from Canon Thomas Barrett, Parish Priest of Our Lady & St Patrick, Walthamstow, to Monsignor Creede on the occasion of the Golden Jubilee celebrations thirty years earlier:

Congratulations on your very successful celebrations last night and thank you for the invitation to attend it, and your hospitality. It brought back memories to me. It was in the Convent - the old Church - that I made my First Holy Communion, one of six children, the first of a long line. Even in those days we were prepared by Sister Xavier (later Rev[eren]d Mother). I was present of course at the blessing of the foundation stone & the opening of the present church (which cost £10,000!!!) and it was in that church that I sang my first Mass [on] May 19th 1940. All these thoughts & memories of baptisms I performed in the church, came to me last night and I was pleased to see that the new decorations had not destroyed the old reredos and that you have decorated it very pleasantly.²⁴

PARISH NOTICE BOOKS AS SOURCES OF HISTORY: ST PETER'S, SEEL STREET, LIVERPOOL, IN 1929

Dr John Davies

On the flyleaf of the notice book for 1929-1935 at St Peter's, Seel Street, Liverpool, the Rector, Father Basil Primavesi OSB, wrote, 'Do not destroy this Notice Book. The history of the parish is recorded in it.'¹ His wishes were respected, and in the 1960s this notice book - the twentieth in a series dating back to the early nineteenth century - was deposited along with its fellows in the Liverpool Record Office. Regrettably, the notice books of many other Catholic parishes have not been treated so kindly. Although some have been preserved in diocesan archives or local record offices, many others have disappeared, been destroyed, or lost in storage. The fate of many notice books is in sharp contrast to baptismal or marriage registers, of which far more are available in archives and record offices. These parish registers have proved an invaluable source for family historians in particular, but the value of notice books to historians of the Catholic community has not received the same recognition.

Father Primavesi's notice book for 1929, the year in which Catholics in England and Wales celebrated the Centenary of Emancipation, is a fine example of the genre. Written as a collection of notices, often in a form of shorthand, for the benefit of the laity and with instructions to his fellow clergy as to how these announcements were to be delivered, it sheds considerable light upon his concerns and, indirectly, on the life of the parish. Primavesi was greatly exercised by what he considered the poor level of Catholic religious practice in this densely populated, multi-ethnic, working-class parish in the southern part of Liverpool's dockland. He had designated each Thursday as a 'Day of Reparation' for 'Mass-missing', but attendance at the 9.00 a.m. Mass of Reparation was generally not to his satisfaction. In the first weeks of 1929 he complained, 'Last Thursday - miserable attendance'; and for the following Thursdays, 'Poor' and 'Still poor.'² 'Poor' Mass attendance continued to trouble him throughout the year. On the first Sunday of Lent he noted, 'Slight improvement in Mass attendance but still hundreds down.'³ In May he appealed for 'more parents and grown-ups at Mass and Communion each day in May.' He summarised the 'Catechism' or homily for Sunday 16 June as 'Mass missing: Last Sunday hundreds down', and for the following Sunday as 'Mass missing in summer: Last Sunday over 500; last SS Peter & Paul (1928) over 800.⁶ During a fortnight's parish mission in September his curates were instructed: 'Urge all to daily Mass and Holy Communion during mission.'⁶ In this Benedictine parish the congregation was also told: 'You should come to Mass and Holy Communion' on the feasts of All Saints OSB and All Souls OSB.⁷ He ended the year with this admonition: 'Mortal sin to miss Mass [on] New Year's Day (a holyday of obligation) generally worst record of the year.'⁸

Primavesi was similarly concerned at the poor attendance at evening services, usually Benediction with a sermon and the recitation of the rosary. The evening service, on Sunday and on one or two weekday evenings, was an important part of the Church's devotional programme in the days of morning-only Mass. In the first week of the year he appealed, 'We want better evening services this year', but to little avail because at the end of January he complained, 'Evening services are -I -! Grown-ups [are] conspicuously absent.'⁹ There was little improvement by the summer: 'Evening service!!!'¹⁰

A further concern of Father Primavesi, connected no doubt with poor attendance at Mass and evening service, was the decline in parish revenue from church collections. Parishioners could reserve their seats in the church by paying twice-yearly bench rents. The latter were a relic of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries when the Seel Street area housed a substantial middle-class population. By the 1920s the middle classes had gone and the parish was almost exclusively working-class. The relatively small number of parish 'elite' who took up the bench rent option at St Peter's seem to have been extremely reluctant to pay, and each half-year there were exasperated appeals from Primavesi: 'Bench rents are still due.'¹¹ The vast majority who did not pay bench rents were expected to pay 'entrance money' (usually Id) and to contribute to the offertory collection and to numerous appeals and 'special collections'. In February Father Primavesi thought it necessary to inform his parishioners that '...door money and offertory only increase on the Sundays we speak. The church collection is quite inadequate - We shall have to refer to this till you support our church properly.'¹² The following week he again complained, 'Door money and offertory still insufficient.'¹³ In June he drew attention to this problem once more, insisting 'Door money and offertory must be more.'¹⁴

Primavesi's annual report for 1929, inserted in the notice book, indicated a steady decline in income from church door and offertory collections. In 1927 the annual total had been £781. In 1928 it had fallen to £715 and in 1929 was only £696. However, church and parish expenses totalled about £1,000. The context in which this decline occurred was the increasing poverty that gripped the parishioners, acknowledged elsewhere in the notice books, in these years of a national economic slump. In the 'spiritual' column of his report Primavesi noted that 'Mass missing' had been worse in 1929 than in the previous two years, with nine hundred absent on New Year's Day. The number of Holy Communions throughout the year had also declined, although he was able to detect one 'consoling feature' in that the last six months of 1929 had been 'better than [the] last 6 months of 1928.'¹⁵

The 1929 report painted rather a bleak picture. However, this can be countered by the glimpses of a lively Catholic community offered by the notice book. Despite Primavesi's strictures against poor attendance, popular devotions seemingly flourished in the Seel Street parish. A new shrine of St Theresa¹⁶ of Lisieux, paid for by popular subscription, had been opened in 1928. On 6 January 1929 Primavesi was able to announce that the cost of oil for the lamp that burned before the shrine had already been donated along with that for the sanctuary lamp, although he still needed a donor for the 'Lady Oil' in the Lady Chapel.¹⁷ On 3 October, the feast-day of St Theresa of Lisieux, the 8.00 a.m. Mass was celebrated at her shrine. Donations had also poured in for a newly commissioned 'Angel Guardian group', although £10 was still required.¹⁸ Other popular devotions flourished. St Patrick's Day fell on a Sunday in 1929 but shamrock was blessed after the Sunday evening service and the feast was celebrated the next day and shamrock was again given out.¹⁹ Primavesi complained of poor attendance levels in May but the procession on the first Sunday of that month was popular, with flowers being given for a special May altar.²⁰ Primavesi also encouraged devotion to Our Lady of Lourdes and for the past three years had led a small group of thirty parishioners as part of the Archdiocesan Pilgrimage. Those who could not go to Lourdes were asked to 'pray for graces during the Liverpool pilgrimage.'²¹ He also encouraged his flock to 'pray to the Immaculate Heart of Mary that all parishioners may make their Easter duties.' He claimed that this particular devotion had been traditional at St Peter's since 1854.²² There were processions on the Sunday after Corpus Christi, at the beginning of June (the month of the Sacred Heart), when the statue of the Sacred Heart was carried, and in October as part of the celebrations for the month of the Holy Rosary.²³

The parish also supported a vibrant social life, with a bewildering array of socials and whist drives for particular guilds and confraternities, as well as for the wider community. There was a special 'Jumble Sale' in April, which would be many weeks in the preparation. This was St Peter's principal fund-raising event and proved 'successful'.²⁴ The Girls' Club also held its annual display in April, while in June the parish enjoyed its field day at Dove Park,²⁵ Woolton, the home of Sir James Reynolds, a Catholic businessman who was the M.P. for Liverpool Exchange, the constituency in which Seel Street was situated.²⁶ In December the Infants' School staged a special 'entertainment' in the Guild Hall (the recently acquired parish hall). Reserved seats for this performance were priced at 1/-6d and 1/-0d.²⁷

On the first Sunday of Advent (1 December) the Lord Mayor of Liverpool made a 'state visit to St Peter's' at which Archbishop Richard Downey preached on the text

'Fear God and honour the King.'²⁸ The parish was also involved in the Archdiocesan celebrations for the Centenary of Catholic Emancipation. From 13 April to 5 May the Catholic Exhibition visited Liverpool. Its purpose was to evoke the history of Catholicism in England and Wales since the Reformation, and it was lodged in the Royal Institution in Colquitt Street, a mere two hundred yards from St Peter's. Primavesi urged his parishioners to make the short journey along Seel Street to visit the exhibition.²⁹ After the exhibition closed in Liverpool one of the prize exhibits, 'the pre-Reformation vestment given by Pope Leo X to Henry VIII for refuting Luther', was worn at High Mass on 19 May.³⁰ In late August special trains from Liverpool Central Station, a short distance from Seel Street, carried parishioners from St Peter's and other inner city parishes to Knotty Ash in the eastern suburbs, where an open-air Mass was celebrated in Thingwall Park. Programmes for the day's events were sold at the church door, priced 2d. Primavesi called for a General Communion of the whole parish in 'thanksgiving for all the blessings of Emancipation.'³¹

St Peter's also played its part in the local and national campaign in 1929 towards seeking an increase in state aid to Catholic schools. It seemed likely that the General Election scheduled for that year would be followed by a new Education Act, regardless of which political party won office. It was thought that the new legislation would implement some of the proposals of the Hadow Committee (1926) and extend the provision of secondary education, which would inevitably increase the financial burden of the Catholic community if it wished to continue maintaining its own schools. At the end of January Father Primavesi pressed upon his parishioners a 'limited number of [a] most important pamphlet - Our Schools.' On the following Sunday at the evening service there was an 'important sermon on Education and the Schools' Question', which parents especially were encouraged to attend.³² The campaign continued to gather momentum and this was duly reflected in the notice book. On 3 March Archbishop Downey presided at a special meeting at the Palais de Luxe cinema on Lime Street. On the following Sunday there was a meeting 'on the Education Question with special speakers' in St Peter's Guild Hall. Parishioners - no children - were encouraged to 'Roll up!' Archbishop Downey presided at a mass meeting for women only³³ on Low Sunday in the Palais de Luxe, and again for a general audience on 5

May.³⁴ On Trinity Sunday there was no sermon at the evening service at St Peter's in order 'to enable all to be in St George's Hall for [a] great rally re-education.' Primavesi announced that both parliamentary candidates in 'this ward' (i.e. Liverpool Exchange constituency) had 'answered 'Yes' on [the] School Question.'³⁵ In the autumn following the General Election Archbishop Downey called for the feast of Christ the King to be observed as 'Special Education Sunday'. At St Peter's Father Primavesi led the parish in a 'General Communion and intercession on account of danger to schools.'³⁶

Other events occurring outside St Peter's in 1929 found their way into the notice book. Early in the year there was the veneration of the pallium and the official inauguration of Richard Downey as Archbishop of Liverpool at the Pro-Cathedral of St Nicholas, a neighbouring parish to St Peter's, close to the city centre. On Monday 14 January Pontifical High Mass was celebrated by Archbishop Downey, with the sermon delivered by Canon George, a former Rector of the Beda College, Rome.³⁷ Primavesi informed his parishioners that the event was 'free - roll up!'³⁸ In June a Te Deum was sung at St Peter's in thanksgiving for the recovery from serious illness of King George V. Shortly afterwards Archbishop Downey wrote to all parishes asking for the King's recovery to be marked by a similar act. In the meantime, at the end of June, St Peter's had sung the Te Deum to celebrate 'the settlement of the Rome Question' by the signing of the Lateran Treaty and Concordat between the Holy See and Mussolini's Italy. The instruction at Mass on 30 June was on 'The Church is greater than the State - [the] Roman Question.'³⁹ Primavesi, although born and educated in England, was the son of an Italian father and an English mother. He spoke Italian fluently and took a keen interest in Italian affairs. He preached in Italian in St Peter's on a number of occasions for the benefit of Liverpool's 'Italian colony.' St Peter's was a mission staffed by monks of Ampleforth Abbey and as such played a part in the obsequies to mark the death of Abbot Anselm Burge, the last Prior of Ampleforth before the monastery was raised to abbatial status. Abbot Burge had served as Rector of St Austin, Grassendale (in Liverpool's southern suburbs), for thirty years (1898-1928). A leading figure in the movement to revive plainchant, he had been honoured with the titular abbacy of Westminster. His Requiem Mass, which Primavesi urged parishioners to attend, was celebrated in St Anne's, Edge Hill, which was the most grandiose of the Benedictine churches in Liverpool.⁴⁰

The parish of St Peter, Seel Street, closed in 1988, two hundred years after the foundation of the mission. For a short time the church was used by Liverpool's then small Polish community. The Benedictines had handed the parish to the Archdiocese of Liverpool and after some years of lying empty the church, having been deconsecrated, was sold to developers. Liverpool's oldest surviving Catholic church building is now a Cuban-style restaurant and wine bar. The former densely inhabited tenements have been demolished by the city planners, the work having been initiated by the Luftwaffe, and the population has moved out to Kirkby, Skelmersdale or Speke. The area is now being developed as part of Liverpool's entertainment district and the sole reminder of St Peter's service to the local community is the former Priory, which is now home to a community of Mother Teresa's nuns (the Missionaries of Charity). Fortunately for the historian, there is a wealth of archival material. Parish records of various kinds, including the notice books, were kept by a succession of history-conscious Benedictine monks who served the parish for two centuries. This material was subsequently deposited in the Liverpool Record Office. Father Basil Primavesi, when compiling his weekly notices for the parish, although he could not predict the future of what he termed "St Peter's-by-the-Sea", was fully aware that what he wrote in 1929 would have a value and resonance far beyond that year.

DATA PROTECTION AND RELATED ISSUES: CIVIL AND CANON LAW

Rev. Kristian Paver

In recent times, with the increased use of electronic media and the ease of communication, there has been a growing concern amongst private individuals regarding their right to privacy¹ and the information that the State and other institutions hold concerning them. In terms of civil legislation, this issue has been brought into greater focus over the last decade by the provisions of the Human Rights Act 1998 (HRA), the Data Protection Act 1998 (DPA) and the Freedom of Information Act 2000 (FOIA). Although one might be tempted to take the view that the effects of this legislation is an unwarranted interference in the affairs of the Church, no such general exemption is recognized by the State and the impact on certain areas of ecclesial life could be considerable. That said, as far as I am aware, complaints to the Information Commissioner's Office (ICO) regarding the processing of data by the Church and its institutions have been rare and, although preliminary assessments have been made by the ICO in a few cases,² no enforcement notices have been issued.

In the life and ministry of the Church, the gathering and storing of information at all levels is an everyday matter. This information, which is more often than not highly personal, must be gathered, held and processed in accordance with the ¹ Cf. Human Rights Act (hereafter HRA) 1998, Article 8: "(1) Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence. (2) There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.' In the ecclesial context, the right to the protection of privacy is to be found in canon 220. This is coupled with the prohibition on the unlawful damaging of a person's reputation. This latter prohibition is supported with a penalty for false denunciation in canon 1390 §§2 & 3. Cf. R. provisions of the DPA 1998, whilst acknowledging that the requirements of the latter Act and those of Canon Law are not always compatible.

1. THE DATA PROTECTION ACT 1998

The DPA 1998 superseded the DPA 1984 and implemented the European Data Protection Directive (95/46/EC). The new provisions came into force on 24 October 1998, with two transitional exemption periods that ended on 24 October 2007. Thus, the DPA 1998 is now fully in force.

1.1 Processing of Data

Whereas the earlier DPA applied only to electronic data processing, the DPA 1998 applies to the holding and processing of personal data by all individuals and groups if the data is contained in a 'relevant filing system'. The Act defines a 'relevant filing system' as:

...any set of information relating to individuals to the extent that, although the information is not processed by means of equipment operating automatically in response to instructions given for that purpose, the set is structured, either by reference to individuals or by reference to criteria relating to individuals, in such a way that specific information relating to a particular individual is readily accessible.

Thus, information that is unstructured does not fall within the ambit of the Act. However, one of the aims of an archive is to have material stored in a readily accessible way and so it is very likely that an archive would have a referenced filing system of some kind. The DPA applies to both computerised and manual files, unlike its predecessor which was only concerned with the former. Data controllers³ are required to notify the ICO that they are holding and processing personal data in an electronic form and detail the purposes for which data is being held.⁴ The notification of data held and processed in manual files which fall under the Act is not mandatory, but advisable. In dioceses in the United Kingdom the data controller will normally be the Trustees or analogous body. The same would apply to religious institutes. Those who process data on behalf of the data controller are termed 'data processors'. The individual to whom the data refers is called the 'data subject'. It is important to note, in the context of historical archives, that the Act only covers data referring to living individuals. Thus, unless data concerning an individual who is deceased contains information relating to a third party who is not dead, the requirements of the DPA do not apply, although there may be issues of confidentiality to consider⁵ - depending on the type of information - and questions of ownership of property if the material belongs to someone other than the owner of the archive.⁶

⁴ DPA 1998 s.17. There is an exemption from notification for 'not-for-profit' organizations such as small clubs, voluntary groups and some charities. However, the application of this exemption is narrow and subject to the following conditions: that the organization processes data solely: (a) for establishing and maintaining membership; (b) to support a 'not-for-profit' body or association; or (c) to provide or administer activities for either members or those who have regular contact with it. These organizations are restricted in the type of information they can hold, the people that it relates to and the disclosures that it can make. Cf. Data Protection General Practice Note: The exemption from notification for 'not-for-profit' organizations, www.ico.gov.uk/upload/documents/library/data_protection/practical_application/jpn_not_for_profit_v.10_web_version.pdf Accessed 18/05/08.

The most significant distinction in the Act is that data are divided into two main groupings:

- (a) General Personal Data: viz. relating to a living individual who can be identified from those data and including any expression of opinion and any indication of the intentions of the data controller or any other persons in respect of the individual.⁷
- (b) Sensitive Personal Data: this includes information relating to racial or ethnic origin, political opinions, religious beliefs, trade union membership, physical or mental health, sexual life, the commission or alleged commission of offences, the records of the proceedings relating to the latter, and the disposal of such proceedings or the sentence of any court in such proceedings.⁸

1.2 Consent

The distinction between general and sensitive personal data is extremely important since, in some cases, the required consent of the individual to hold and

⁶ Cf. Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Patrimony of the Church, Circular Letter, The Pastoral Function of Church Archives, 2 February 1997 (hereafter PFCA), art.2.1: 'A Church historical archive can find itself in the situation of receiving private archival material (either from individual faithful or from a private ecclesiastical juridical person). These types of archives remain the property of the faithful or entity which has deposited the material, with due regard for the rights acquired at the time of the concession of the material.'

process general personal information is less stringent.⁹ However, the holding and processing of sensitive personal data normally requires the explicit consent of the data subject unless one of the other conditions contained in Schedule 3 is present.¹⁰

1.3 Data Protection Principles

Data must be processed in accordance with the Data Protection Principles,¹¹ the fundamental requirements for the lawful processing of data which should inform the practice and policy of all data users. The following are a summarised version of them:

1. Personal data shall be processed fairly and lawfully. The issue of consent is central to the observance of this principle.
2. Personal data shall be obtained only for one or more specified and lawful purpose, and shall not be further processed in any manner compatible with that purpose or purposes.
3. Personal data shall be adequate, relevant and not excessive in relation to the purpose or purposes for which they are processed.
4. Personal data shall be accurate and, where necessary, kept up to date.
5. Personal data processed for any purpose or purposes shall not be kept for longer than is necessary for that purpose or those purposes.
6. Personal data shall be processed in accordance with the rights of data subjects under the DPA 1998.
7. Appropriate technical and organizational measures shall be taken against unauthorized or unlawful processing of personal data and against accidental loss or destruction of, or damage to, personal data.

¹¹ These can be found in DPA 1998 Schedule 1.

The processing of data is far more than the simple holding of information on file. It includes obtaining, recording, organizing, adapting, altering, disclosing, blocking, erasing or destroying information.

1.4 Access Rights

Data Subjects generally have access rights to the data held concerning them,¹² as long as the rights of third parties are not infringed by the disclosure.¹³ The rights include that to prevent processing likely to cause damage or distress, the right to compensation, rectification, blocking, erasure or destruction, and the right to request assessment by the ICO.¹⁴ Failure to comply with an access request can lead to a court order to do so. Likewise, the non-compliance with Information¹⁵ or Enforcement¹⁶ Notices from the Commissioner is an offence¹⁷ subject to fines.¹⁸ The Act also provides for a compensation claim on the part of the individual for any damage or distress caused by contravention.¹⁹

2. FREEDOM OF INFORMATION ACT 2000

The FOIA 2000 places on 'public authorities'²⁰ the duty (a) to confirm or deny that they hold whatever information is requested, and (b) to communicate that information if held, unless an exemption applies. Although this Act is significant in that it shows the importance given by the secular law to transparency in relationships between individuals and institutions, it is limited in scope. Moreover, its primary concern is with the organs of State and it does not in fact apply to the Church, which is not regarded, per se, as a public authority. The requirements of the FOIA would apply, however, to information held by educational, medical or social institutions run by the Church on behalf of, or in conjunction with, the State, such as Voluntary Aided schools or hospitals funded by the National Health Service.

¹² An individual is entitled to be informed whether personal data is being processed, to be given a description of the personal data, the purposes for which they are being processed, those to whom they may be disclosed, and to have communicated to him in an intelligible form the content of the data with an indication of its source. Cf. DPA 1998 s.7(1).

3. DATA PROCESSING AND THE CHURCH

The Church deals with tremendous amounts of personal information, whether in chanceries, curial offices, tribunals or archives. Given her structures and the nature of pastoral ministry, most of this information falls into the category of sensitive personal data which is closely regulated by the DPA. In principle, this information can only be processed with the explicit consent of the individual concerned. This, as will be immediately apparent, is not always the case. Dialogue with the ICO has made it clear that the effect of the DPA on the internal workings of the Church was not considered by the Government during the passage of the legislation, and so there are no specific exemptions which cover it.²¹ Areas which are most likely to be affected by the legislation are the processing of marriage nullity cases in tribunals and the holding of files and archives on matters of clergy discipline, especially with regard to child protection procedures. Though offering reassurance that note will be taken of action undertaken to comply with the DPA and that criminal prosecution would only occur as a last resort if an Enforcement Notice was not acted upon, the ICO was unwilling to give any undertaking that the Church would not be subject to prosecution in these areas in some instances.

²¹ In Schedule 3 s.10 there is provision for the Secretary of State to make an Order to cover circumstances not foreseen in the DPA. This remains an avenue for the Church to pursue, but there is no guarantee that such a request would be granted. In a written response from the Assistant Information Commissioner, it is stated: '...it was recognized at the outset that there were likely to be circumstances in which perfectly legitimate processing of personal data might not be readily covered either by the conditions in Schedule 3 or those provided by SI2000 no.417. Typically these include circumstances where one individual wishes to pursue a course of action which involves providing personal data which relates to another individual who may not readily consent to the provision of the information in question... However, equally we would be uncomfortable with any provision which, in effect, provided a general basis for the disclosure of sensitive personal data relating to one individual by another where the latter felt that it was not in his/her interests to do so. It is, however, likely that in due course the Home Office will revisit the issue of Schedule 3 and provide further ones.' Ref: PJ/SP/F0385, 11 April 2001.

3.1 Data Protection Exemptions

The DPA itself does provide a number of exemptions from the requirement of obtaining the explicit consent of the data subject when processing sensitive data,²² and these were added to by a later Statutory Instrument.²³ However, both discussion with the ICO and the advice of leading counsel have shown that none of the possible exemptions is free from uncertainty when applied to the workings of the Church. Pending further clarification from the Government or the courts, it would appear that the holding and processing of data in Church archives falls within the exemption contained in Schedule 3, paragraph 4. The latter permits the processing of sensitive personal data by a non-profit association for political, philosophical, religious or trade-union purposes. However, there must be appropriate safeguards for the rights and freedoms of data subjects; it must relate only to members of the association or those who have regular contact with it; and the data must not be disclosed to third parties without consent. Uncertainty lies around the 'appropriate safeguards' requirement, the issue of membership and disclosure. Also applicable to archives, the DPA provides certain exemptions for the processing of personal data for research purposes, including historical and statistical purposes, as long as the data is processed exclusively for those purposes.²⁴ However, such data cannot be used to support measures or decisions relating to the individuals concerned, nor may it be processed in such a way that substantial damage or distress is likely to be caused to them. Importantly, third party access to this type of data is greater and the data can be retained indefinitely, contrary to the requirements of the Fifth Data Protection Principle. With regard to child protection and related issues, the DPA does provide a certain exemption regarding the processing of sensitive personal data when dealing with the prevention or detection of crime and the apprehension or prosecution of offenders.²⁵ This is further developed by paragraphs 1 and 2 of the Statutory Instrument that cover certain types of processing for the prevention or detection of an unlawful act, where the obtaining of the consent of the data subject would prejudice the action taken. They also cover cases where the processing is required to discharge functions that protect members of the public from certain forms of conduct which, though not necessarily unlawful, are concerned with dishonesty, malpractice, mismanagement, unfitness or incompetence. Uncertainty here centres around the meaning of the 'substantial public interest' required by both paragraphs as a condition and the meaning of 'discharging the function' in paragraph 2.

²³ The Data Protection (Processing of Sensitive Personal Data) Order 2000, SI2000 no.417.

4. ARCHIVES

After stating clearly the principle that all documents concerning the diocese and parishes must be preserved with the greatest of care,²⁶ the Code of Canon Law provides only basic norms concerning archives. They can be summarised as follows:

4.1 The Diocesan Archive

There must be a secure and ordered Diocesan Archive that contains documents concerning both the spiritual and temporal affairs of the diocese,²⁷ including a copy of the inventories of all immovable goods, those movable goods which are precious or of a high cultural value, and all other goods, drawn up by administrators of public juridical persons subject to the Diocesan Bishop.²⁸ Copies of documents establishing the rights of the Church or institute to its goods are also to be conserved in the archive where possible,²⁹ as well as documents regarding the dedication or blessing of a church or cemetery³⁰ and those referring to the establishment of pious foundations.³¹ The Chancellor is to ensure that copies of all acts of the curia are kept in the archive.³² An inventory of the Diocesan Archive must be drawn up.³³ The archive is under the care of the Bishop and the Chancellor, and access is granted by the Bishop or by the Moderator of the Curia and the Chancellor acting together.³⁴ Likewise, only the same authorities can permit the removal of documents from the archive for a short time.³⁵ A copy of documents which are of a public nature and which concern his/her own personal status may be given to the individual concerned.³⁶

4.2 The Secret Archive

A separate archive, which must be either entirely separate or within a secure place within the Diocesan Archive, is to be established containing documents that are to be kept secret.³⁷ Amongst other things, the Secret Archive will contain documents relating to canonical penal cases³⁸ and a book containing dispensations of occult marriage impediments.³⁹ Only the Bishop, or in the time of vacancy in the see the Diocesan Administrator, may have access to this archive and documents cannot be removed.⁴⁰ The documents in the Secret Archive are to be updated yearly and those relating to canonical penal cases destroyed once the individual concerned has died or ten years have passed from sentence. Only a brief summary of the case and a copy of the definitive sentence are to be retained.⁴¹

4.3 The Historical Archive

The Historical Archive is to contain documents of an historical value, filed systematically.⁴² It is for the Bishop to establish norms for this archive, particularly regarding access to, and removal of, documents.⁴³

4.4 Cathedral/ Collegiate/ Parish Church Archives

Each church is to have its own archives, containing acts and documents which may be necessary or useful to preserve. Amongst other things, these include parochial registers,⁴⁴ Mass intention registers,⁴⁵ documents relating to pious foundations,⁴⁶ and episcopal letters.⁴⁷ Administrators must also preserve documents and records establishing the rights of the Church or institute to its goods.⁴⁸ Two inventories of this archive are to be drawn up, one to be kept in the parish, the other in the Diocesan Archive.⁴⁹ The Parish Priest bears a particular responsibility for the safeguarding of the archive. The Bishop is to make norms regarding access to these archives and the removal of documents.⁵⁰ He or his delegate is to inspect these archives at the time of visitation or at another appropriate time.⁵¹

In addition to the registers of baptisms, marriages and deaths, there are to be, in each parish in England and Wales, registers of confirmations, of the reception of converts (sic), and (where applicable) of burials in the parish cemetery, in accordance with canon 535 §1.'

4.5 Commentary

It can be seen immediately that the Diocesan Bishop plays a central role in establishing norms for the care of archives in his diocese, particularly the Historical and Parish Archives, and in supervising their observance. These norms should detail what documents are to be preserved, who is to care for them, how they are to be kept, who can access them and on what conditions.⁵² Clearly, these norms must not only be in accordance with Canon Law, but should also comply as fully as possible with the requirements of the DPA.⁵³ The Code is silent with regard to the archives of religious institutes and reference should be made to the Constitutions and Directories of each institute, which should have appropriate norms regarding archives. In the event that they are lacking, the provisions of canon 19 come into play.⁵⁴ Religious Archives should be structured and ordered in a similar way to Diocesan Archives, the place of the Diocesan Bishop being taken by the Major Superior or equivalent.⁵⁵

There should also be common guidelines on the use of Parish Archives and those belonging to institutes of consecrated life, ibid., art.4.2.

⁵³ PFCA art.2.3: 'Regarding the political community it is the duty of the Diocesan Bishop and all those responsible for Church Archives to maintain an attitude of respect for the laws in force in the various countries, keeping in mind the conditions foreseen in canon 22 of the Code of Canon Law.' Cf. ibid., art.4.2.: '...norms [should] be harmonized with state or civil ones as much as possible.'

It will be apparent from what has gone before that an Historical Archive that contains only data concerning those who have died is not covered by the DPA. However, if the same archive contains 'live' files, as will more than certainly be the case for the general Diocesan Archive, then the requirements of the DPA will need to be observed. The concept of a 'Secret Archive' is incompatible with the principles of the DPA, although it is probable that much of the documentation in such an archive will be of little interest to data subjects, e.g. occult dispensations of marriage. However, the situation becomes more complex with regard to penal matters, particularly with reference to documentation relating to allegations of child abuse. As has been noted, there are exemptions to access provided in the DPA regarding criminal matters and it may be that these will apply. However, the status of such archives in terms of civil law is ambiguous and resort to the Secret Archive should be kept to a minimum.

Canon 487 §2 is potentially more restrictive than the DPA in that it only allows copies of documents to be given to an individual if those documents are (a) of a public nature and (b) concern his or her personal status. Entries in sacramental registers fall into these categories. In November 1988 the Catholic Bishops' Conference of England & Wales endorsed the proposal of the Catholic Archives Society that registers be microfilmed, but it was left 'to each diocese to decide about accepting the offer made by the Genealogical Society of Utah.'⁶⁶ However, following the grave concerns expressed in a letter of 29 January 2008 by the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith about the practice of 'baptism of the dead by proxy', the Congregation of the Clergy sent a letter to all Episcopal Conferences on 5 April 2008 requesting that their members be instructed to prevent the Church of Jesus Christ of the Latter Day Saints (Mormons) from microfilming or digitising baptismal registers:

⁵⁴ "In a particular matter where there is not an express provision of either universal or particular law, nor a custom, then, provided it is not a penal matter, the question is to be decided by taking into account laws enacted in similar matters, the general principles of law observed with canonical equity, the jurisprudence and practice of the Roman Curia, and the common and constant opinion of learned authors.'

The Congregation requests that the Conference notifies each diocesan bishop in order to ensure that such a detrimental practice is not permitted in his territory, due to the confidentiality of the faithful and so as not to co-operate with the erroneous practices of the Church of Jesus Christ of the Latter Day Saints.⁵⁷

Thus, it is clear that the practice of allowing the Mormons to microfilm baptism registers is no longer permitted and the Bishops of England & Wales will be required to revise the guidance given in 1988.

5. CHILD PROTECTION AND ARCHIVES

In recent years issues connected with documents relating to allegations of child abuse by the clergy and other members of the Church have become more pressing. Lord Nolan recommended that records relating to individuals and allegations should be kept for a long time, i.e. a minimum of one hundred years,⁵⁸ and that the confidentiality of these records should be scrupulously maintained.⁵⁹ The Recommendations of The Nolan Report have been endorsed by the findings of the review of safeguarding procedures undertaken by the Cumberlege Commission. In particular, The Cumberlege Report stresses the importance of establishing a safe, secure and centralized record storage facility⁶⁰ and recommends that the new Catholic Safeguarding Advisory Service develop an information sharing policy within twelve months from the publication of its Report.⁶¹ The implication of this is that documents relating to allegations of child abuse, whether historical or live, and whether found proven or not, should be stored separately from the general Diocesan Archive and should be subject to stricter access requirements. However, such material should not

...[T]he accused must be provided with a copy of the investigator's report and any supporting documentation (including the external risk assessment where there is one). Care must be taken to preserve the rights within the Church of the accused and the victim/complainant in so doing. The accused should have been given recourse to appropriate assistance, should have received proper access to all the documentation and any other evidence...⁶³

6. SUMMARY

(a) The overriding principle is that personal data, especially that which is sensitive, should be handled in accordance with Data Protection Principles whenever possible.

(b) Notwithstanding the possible exemptions from seeking the consent of the data subject, good practice dictates that an individual's consent should be obtained whenever possible.

(c) Every diocese and religious institute should have a data protection and confidentiality policy, setting out basic principles for holding, processing and accessing information.

⁶² PFCA, art.4.2: \..[I]t would also be desirable that limits be placed on the consultation of personal files and other documents whose nature makes them confidential or are retained so by bishops. We are not referring to the bishop's secret archive,... but to the Church archive in general. In this respect, some archival methodologies suggest that confidential papers be well marked in the inventories and catalogues which are made accessible to researchers.'

⁶³ Cumberlege Report, paragraph 4.57, pp.70-71.

(d) It is essential that every archive should have a policy that clarifies, amongst other things, the purposes for which data is held, who has access and under what conditions, how and why data may be transferred between data processors, and what data will be retained and for how long.

(e) It is important to clarify the distinction between historical and active archives. Historical archives that contain data relating solely to those who are dead are exempt from the provisions of the DPA.

(f) Whether active archives are covered by the DPA will depend on whether they contain information that is stored in a relevant filing system, either manual or electronic. Even data that is 'relatively structured' is covered by the Act.

(g) Access to active archives is foreseen both in Canon Law and by the DPA. The area of disagreement pertains to the nature of the information accessible and by whom. The DPA would seem to provide for greater access to information for the data subject, whilst the Code limits the information but makes it accessible to any interested party.

(h) Particular care should be taken concerning storage of and access to data in personal files, especially documents relating to allegations of the abuse of children or vulnerable adults.

(i) Secret Archives, to which the data subject has no access, are not foreseen in the DPA, although there are exemptions that may cover some information often contained in such archives, e.g. that relating to child protection issues. Use of the Secret Archive should be kept to a minimum.

7. CONCLUSION

There can be no doubt that the Catholic Church in the United Kingdom is embarking upon a new era in terms of the relationship between its own Canon Law and the law of the State in many areas of life. It is clear that, at this stage, some issues can only be addressed tentatively or in general terms, pending further developments in secular jurisprudence and particular legislation. Whilst there are some tensions, and even conflicts, between the provisions of Canon Law and secular legislation, in my view Canon Law possesses the basic norms to enable the Church to comply with the fundamental provisions of the new legislation. Indeed, in some ways this new legislation will act as a catalyst for a review of established practices within ecclesiastical institutions in order to make them more compatible with the requirements of the Code itself. However, notwithstanding efforts at renewal of practice and the establishment of clear policies, there will remain a small number of points where the requirements of Canon Law and those of the DPA 1998 will not be compatible, particularly with regard to the procedures of ecclesiastical tribunals. The Church's best defence in any situation of conflict is to show that she has made every effort to work in accordance with the Data Protection Principles, whilst at the same time being bound to give priority to the provisions of Canon Law. She will need to show that, whilst being applied with charity and equity, the observance of her own Canon Law, whether universal or particular, has been faultless.

Editorial Note: Father Kristian Paver J.C.L., who is a member of the Canon Law Society of Great Britain and Ireland, is a priest of the Diocese of Plymouth, where he is Judicial Vicar on the Diocesan Marriage Tribunal. This article is a slightly amended version of a paper delivered at the Catholic Archives Society Conference, 2008. While the focus of the article is on the relationship between Canon Law and Data Protection Principles and legislation in the United Kingdom, and has specific reference to the Catholic Church in England and Wales, the majority of Father Paver's points will be of great value to ecclesiastical archivists in general, irrespective of particular national or local civil legislation.

BOOK REVIEWS

The Family and Descendants of St Thomas More (Leominster: Gracewing, 2008, pp.290) is a fascinating account of the history and genealogy of the martyr's family written by Martin Wood, who is descended from More on his mother's side. The book traces the fortunes of the family from immediately after the events of July 1535 until the nineteenth century. A great many archival collections have been consulted, both ecclesiastical and secular. Among the former one may mention the following: the Venerable English College, Rome; British Province of the Society of Jesus; Jesuit Archives, Naples; and York Minster Archives. The list of national, legal and county repositories is even more impressive: The National Archives; Guildhall Library, London; Lincoln's Inn and the Inner Temple, London; and the County Record Offices of Essex, East Sussex, Lancashire, Lincolnshire, Shropshire, Durham, Norfolk, West Yorkshire, Sheffield, Herefordshire and Hertfordshire. It is particularly gratifying to see mentioned the significant number of articles in Essex Recusant on the More family, most of them the work of the late Monsignor Daniel Shanahan - recusant scholar, canon lawyer and patron of Anstruther's Seminary Priests (volumes 2-4) - whom many readers of Catholic Archives will remember with affection.

In the Preface to Monsignor Michael Williams' second edition of The Venerable English College Rome: A History (Leominster: Gracewing, 2008, pp.xxii + 343) the Rector of the Venerabile, Monsignor Nicholas Hudson, refers to the recent archive project at the college (see Catholic Archives 2008). The appearance of this revised and expanded edition of Michael Williams' book, originally published in 1979 to mark the fourth centenary of the college, takes the story from the departure of Monsignor John Macmillan as Rector in 1952 until recent times, in a new chapter entitled 'From Post-War to Post-Conciliar Rome'. There are expanded notes and appendices that take into account research conducted since 1979, and there are also additions to the account of the college archives, although a complete catalogue is, as yet, still to be produced.

Like that of Monsignor Michael Williams, the name of the late Father Francis Edwards S.J. is one well known to members of the Catholic Archives Society, of which he was sometime Chairman. When Father Edwards died in September 2006 he left the completed manuscript of The Enigma of Gunpowder Plot, 1605: The Third Solution (Dublin: Four Courts Press, 2008, pp. xvi + 510). Historians of this perplexing and (for Catholics) tragic episode are divided in terms of their interpretation of its causes. Broadly speaking, there are three main views: (1) that there was a plot concocted by (mainly Catholic) conspirators; (2) that Robert Cecil, Secretary of State to James I, although not the originator of the Gunpowder Plot, knew about it, encouraged it and then 'discovered' it, thus emerging as the defender and saviour of the monarchy; (3) that there was no plot per se, the events of 1605 being a cynical move by Cecil to discredit the Catholics and enhance his own position. 'Gunpowder' Edwards, as the author was known at the old Public Record Office, was of the third persuasion, and in this volume argues his case forcefully, if not to the satisfaction of some historians of the Plot. Those who knew Francis Edwards will not be surprised by the fact that his text is supported by copious notes and references. Archivally, his chief sources include the following: Westminster Diocesan Archives; Archives de Royaume, Brussels; Jesuit Historical Archives, Rome; Vatican Archives; British Library (especially Harleian MSS); Archives of the Jesuit British Province; Lambeth Palace Library; National Archives (formerly Public Record Office); Spanish National Archives, Simancas; Stonyhurst College; Venerable English College, Rome. Swathed in his neckscarf, which he appeared to wear in all weathers, Father Edwards visited these and other repositories over a period of fifty years in order to give us, posthumously, what Father Tom McCoog S.J. in his Foreword describes as 'the final word of the last "No-Plotter".'

Christina Kenworthy-Browne C.J. has edited Mary Ward 1585-1645: A Briefe Relation... With Autobiographical Fragments and a Selection of Letters (Woodbridge: The Boydell Press for The Catholic Record Society, Records Series volume 81, 2008, pp.xxii + 175). This book has been produced for the fourth centenary of the foundation of the Congregation of Jesus/ Institute of the Blessed Virgin Mary. The very first acknowledgement made by Sister Christina is to the late Sister Gregory Kirkus C.J. of The Bar Convent, York, herself a distinguished archivist and scholar, and a much esteemed member of the Catholic Archives Society. The present volume contains the earliest biographical account (A Briefe Relation, c.1650, from The Bar Convent Archives) of that great Yorkshirewoman, Mary Ward, and reproduces for the first time other sources (autobiographical fragments and selected letters) hitherto only available in manuscript form in private archives. Other archival collections consulted by the editor include: I.B.V.M. Archives, Manchester; Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, Rome; State Archives for Upper Bavaria, Munich; and the C.J. Archives at Munich/Nymphenburg (especially the Mary Ward papers from the seventeenth century) and Bamberg.

Moving now to the contribution of the non-Roman tradition in English seminary education, the bicentenary of the Northern daughter of the English College at Douai has been marked by its alumni with the publication of W.J. Campbell (edit.), Ushaw College 1808-2008: A Celebration (Ushaw: St Cuthbert's Society, 2008, pp.x + 142). This beautifully produced and lavishly illustrated volume covers in some detail every aspect of the history of the seminary, with contributions from, among others, Fathers David Milburn ('Journey to the Promised Land from Douai to Durham'), Michael Sharratt ('The Old School or Purple Socks? Robert Tate on a Changing Church') and Peter Phillips ('Pitched between Heaven and Charing Cross: A Tradition of Education in Common'). The Ushaw College Archives are everywhere in evidence, particularly in the many well-chosen illustrations. Although the book does not claim to provide a comprehensive history of Ushaw, and in that sense does not rival the work of Milburn and others, nevertheless it offers a very attractive introduction to the distinguished pedigree of one of the two colleges (the other being Allen Hall, now in Chelsea but formerly at St Edmund's College, Ware) that continue on English soil the educational tradition established by William Allen and others in 1568. As well as training men for the priesthood, in former years Ushaw conducted a school for lay boys, and nowadays provides courses in theology and philosophy for laypeople. Given the fact that the Catholic Archives Society has so often held its Annual Conference at Ushaw (including the current year, 2009), this is a book that many of its members might wish to purchase.

The Mary Ward nuns referred to above became well known for their educational work. Another religious institute much involved in the education of girls, and which traces its roots to the Continent in Penal Times is New Hall, near Chelmsford, which until recently was also the home of the Canonesses of the Holy Sepulchre, founded at Liege in 1642. In New Hall and its School (Free Range Publishing, 2006, pp.xii + 243) Tony Tuckwell, a former Headmaster of King Edward VI Grammar School, Chelmsford, tells the story of the house, the religious community (which migrated to England in 1794, settled at New Hall in 1799 and departed there in 2005) and the school itself, formerly an academy for young ladies but now co-educational. The New Hall Archives have of course been the principal source used by the author - indeed, they record details of every pupil educated at the school since its foundation in 1642 - but a number of other collections have been used, notably the Brentwood Diocesan Archives and the Essex Record Office. Good use has also been made of the memories of those associated with New Hall for many years, and members of the Catholic Archives Society will not be surprised to find, among others, the name of Moira Metcalfe mentioned in the list of acknowledgements. The book is well illustrated and contains copious notes and references.

Father Peter Phillips will need little introduction to members of the Catholic Archives Society. His latest publication is John Lingard: Priest and Historian (Leominster: Gracewing, 2008, pp.xvi + 495), a biography of the most celebrated English Catholic historian, whose own life stretched from the pre-Catholic Relief era (1771) to the first year after the Restoration of the Hierarchy (1851). The author has conducted his research by using a most impressive range of archival sources and has produced a scholarly yet readable account of Lingard, a son of Ushaw who spent most of his life as the mission priest at Hornby, near Lancaster, and who may be justly considered as the father of modern historical writing in England. The archives consulted fall into two broad categories of ecclesiastical and secular. Of the former one may note the following: Archdiocese of Birmingham; Birmingham Oratory; Diocese of Clifton; Downside Abbey; Diocese of Hexham & Newcastle; Ushaw College; Scottish Catholic Archives; Diocese of Salford; St Mary's Church, Hornby; Stonyhurst College; the Royal English College of St Alban, Valladolid; the Scots Colleges at Rome and Salamanca (formerly Valladolid); the Venerable English College, Rome; Propaganda Fide; the Diocese of Leeds; the Archdiocese of Liverpool; the Archdiocese of Westminster (where the Archives of St Edmund's College, Ware, and those of the Old Brotherhood of the Secular Clergy are also housed); the British Province of the Society of Jesus; Archdiocese of Southwark; Diocese of Northampton; and the Diocese of Shrewsbury, of which the author is himself the custodian. The secular repositories visited include the University Libraries of Cambridge and Edinburgh, and Harris Manchester College, Oxford, as well as the Bodleian Library. Among the other libraries and archives listed in the bibliography we find that of the Dean and Chapter, Durham, National Library of Scotland, British Library, Lancaster Central Library, Liverpool Record Office, Lancashire Record Office and Broughton Hall, Skipton.

Carmen M. Mangion, another person who needs no introduction to the members of the Catholic Archives Society, has published Contested Identities: Catholic Women Religious in Nineteenth-Century England and Wales (Manchester & New York: Manchester University Press, 2008, pp. xiv + 281), a study of the dynamic contribution made by Catholic religious sisters to Victorian society. This book will be of interest not only to students of the development of women's religious life, but also to social and economic historians and those concerned with the disciplines of cultural and gender studies. The following archives of religious congregations are listed in the bibliography: Sisters of Mercy (Mercy International Archives, Dublin; Institute Archives, Bermondsey; Union Archives, Handsworth, Birmingham; Midhurst, Sunderland); Daughters of Charity (Mill Hill); Sisters of Notre Dame of Namur (Liverpool); Faithful Companions of Jesus (Broadstairs); Society of the Holy Child Jesus (Oxford); Sisters of Charity of St Paul the Apostle (Selly Park, Birmingham); Servants of the Mother of God (Brentford); Daughters of the Heart of Mary (Wimbledon); Little Company of Mary (Ealing); Sisters of St Joseph of Annecy (Llantarnam Abbey, South Wales); Religious of La Retraite (Streatham); and the Sisters of St Joseph of Peace (Nottingham). Indeed, the Catholic Archives Society and its members are singled out for praise!

Dom Paschal Scotti, in Out of Due Time: Wilfrid Ward and the Dublin Review (Washington D.C.: The Catholic University of America Press, 2006, pp. x + 329), has produced a scholarly analysis of one of the most important English Catholic intellectuals of the late-Victorian and Edwardian eras, who in a very real sense helped to lay the foundations of the subsequent Catholic literary revival of the inter-war years. Wilfrid Ward, son of the celebrated Oxford convert W.G. Ward, and brother of Monsignor Bernard Ward, the historian of English Catholicism from the eve of Emancipation to the Restoration of the Hierarchy (and subsequently the first Bishop of Brentwood), was editor of The Dublin Review from 1906 until his death in 1916. 'The Dublin', as it was known, had been founded in 1836 by the future Cardinal Wiseman, with support from the great Irish patriot Daniel O'Connell. Scotti's book concentrates on themes such as Literature, Politics, Society, Foreign Affairs, Ireland and the First World War, and is essentially an intellectual history of English Catholicism in the Edwardian age - itself very much the 'golden era' of the journal. Under Ward The Dublin Review attracted a galaxy of eminent contributors, including Hilaire Belloc, G.K. Chesterton (not then a Catholic), Francis Thompson, Alice Meynell, Father Herbert Thurston S.J., Monsignor Robert Hugh Benson and Father Cyril Martindale S.J. Moreover, Ward's editorship managed to guide the journal through the theological minefields of the Modernist period, in itself no mean achievement. The author's chief archival sources are St Andrew's University (Wilfrid Ward Papers), Downside Abbey Archives (Gasquet Papers), and the British Library (George Tyrell & Maude Petre Papers). He also visited the Westminster Diocesan Archives.

A subsequent, although short-lived, editor of The Dublin Review (1940-1944) was the historian and philosopher Christopher Dawson. Bradley J. Birzer, in Sanctifying the World: The Augustinian Life and Mind of Christopher Dawson (Front Royal VA: Christendom Press, 2007, pp.xvi + 316), offers a profound intellectual biography of another leading figure of the Catholic literary revival of the first half of the twentieth century. The book is an example of meticulous research, in this case in the several archival repositories in the United States where so many of the papers of Dawson and his associates have migrated: Georgetown University Archives (Harman Grisewood & Bernard Wall Papers); Princeton University Library (Paul Elmer Moore & Allen Tate Papers); University of Notre Dame, Indiana (Christopher Dawson, Leo Ward, and Sheed & Ward Family and Business Papers); University of St Thomas, Minnesota (Christopher Dawson Papers); Wheaton College, Illinois (Inklings Papers). In addition, the book provides an exhaustive bibliography of the prolific Dawson.

Christopher Dawson was the first Vice-President of the Sword of the Spirit, the movement for religious and moral renewal established by Cardinal Hinsley in the early years of the Second World War. The welcome appearance of Dr James Hagerty's Cardinal Hinsley, Priest and Patriot (Oxford: Family Publications, 2008, pp. 415) offers a ground-breaking study of Britain's great wartime Catholic leader: Churchill is reputed to have remarked that he trusted only two people to speak for the interests of the nation in those dark days - one was himself, the other was Cardinal Hinsley. Dr Hagerty, who is a member of the team working in the Leeds Diocesan Archives, has spent many years researching the life of Hinsley, and whilst the war years are admirably covered the book captures the many-faceted contribution to the Church of this Yorkshire-born prelate. Hinsley's early life (1865-1900) is examined in detail: after his ordination in 1893 he was a professor at Ushaw and in 1900 became the founding headmaster of St Bede's Grammar School, Bradford (of which academy Dr Hagerty himself was once headmaster). After difficulties with Bishop Gordon of Leeds and others, Hinsley was accepted into the Diocese of Southwark, where from 1904 until 1917 he served in a variety of capacities: parish priest at Sutton Park, near Guildford, and then at Sydenham; professor at St John's Seminary, Womersley; and Amigo's agent in Rome during part of the Westminster-Southwark troubles as the Bishop of Southwark found himself at loggerheads with Cardinal Bourne (Amigo's own predecessor at Southwark and Hinsley's eventual predecessor at Westminster). Then came the years as Rector of the Venerable English College, Rome (1917-1930), and Hinsley's appointment as Apostolic Visitor (1928-1930) and Apostolic Delegate (1930-1934) to the Catholic missions in British Africa. The five chapters devoted to Africa are an important contribution to missiology and missionary history. Hinsley's somewhat unexpected appointment as Archbishop of Westminster (1935) and his subsequent elevation as Cardinal (1937) are also treated in depth, as are the many issues that confronted him: international affairs, domestic politics; diocesan issues; and of course the Second World War itself. In his Foreword Bishop Roche of Leeds describes this book as 'a most valuable contribution to the history of English and Welsh Catholicism and also the history of the Catholic Church in Africa'. The present reviewer can only echo these words. The acknowledgements made by Dr Hagerty read like a 'Who's Who' (past and present) of the Association of Diocesan Archivists, a subsidiary group of the Catholic Archives Society. The following collections were consulted by Dr Hagerty: The National Archives (Colonial Office); Rhodes House, Oxford; Vatican Archives (Apostolic Delegations in Mombasa and Nigeria); Diocese of Leeds (Cornthwaite, Gordon, Cowgill & Poskitt Papers); Venerable English College, Rome (Membrane, Libri e Scrittura ii, vols 57-130); Archdiocese of Westminster (Bourne & Hinsley Papers); Archdiocese of Birmingham (Ilsley & Williams Papers); Archdiocese of Liverpool (Whiteside & Downey Papers); Archdiocese of Southwark (Amigo Papers); Diocese of Brentwood (Ward, Doubleday & Heenan Papers); Diocese of Hexham & Newcastle (Thorman & McCormack Papers); Diocese of Nottingham (Dunn & McNulty Papers); Diocese of Salford (Henshaw & Marshall Papers); Diocese of Shrewsbury (Moriarty Papers); Downside Abbey (Gasquet Papers); Mill Hill Missionaries (Roman & African Mission Papers); St Patrick's Society, Kiltegan, Co. Wicklow (Whitney Papers); Pontifical Irish College, Rome (O'Riordan & Hagan Papers); Royal English College of St Alban, Valladolid (Henson Papers); St Bede's Grammar School, Bradford; Talbot Library, Preston (Memoirs of Monsignor Richard Smith).

As if his study of Cardinal Hinsley was not impressive enough for one year, the admirably industrious James Hagerty is also the author of The Catenian Association: A Centenary History 1908-2008 (Coventry: Catenian Association, 2007, pp. xiv + 222). This Catholic men's society, which stresses 'the three Fs' (Family, Friendship and Faith), traces its origins to the Manchester Chums Benevolent Association (Catenian Association from 1910). There are now over 10,000 members in three continents. Dr Hagerty, who is himself a Catenian, has not only made extensive use of the Catenians' own archival collections, but has taken great pains to consult a great many senior members of the Association and also to utilize papers in private hands. A number of diocesan archives have also been quarried: Hexham & Newcastle, Leeds, Middlesborough, Nottingham and Westminster, in addition of course to Salford, the diocese in which, with the encouragement of Bishop Casartelli, the Catenian Association was established. In many respects this book offers a bird's eye-view of the development of the lay apostolate in twentieth-century Britain and beyond. Of particular help (to diocesan archivists at least) is the comprehensive appendix containing the dates of foundation (and sometimes closure) of every Catenian Circle.

Among the parish histories that have come to the attention of the reviewer, mention can be made of Our Lady of the Rosary & St Patrick, Walthamstow, 1908-2008: A Centenary Celebration (pp. 95, available from The Presbytery, 61 Blackhorse Road, London E17 7AS). Compiled chiefly by Father Peter McCawille SMA and Raymond Waters and Naomi Waters, it is an extremely well-researched and tastefully illustrated booklet that achieves the goal that should be set by the author(s) of any such local history project, viz. to capture in a readable and attractive form an accurate record of the development of the parish from its origins to modern times, the construction of its buildings, biographical details of its clergy and an appreciation of the labours of its parishioners, both past and present. The compilers of this particular work, which tells the story of one East London Catholic community, have used archival sources (the parish, the Diocese of Brentwood, the London Borough of Waltham Forest) and the recollections of senior parishioners. It is curious to note that the longest-serving parish priest, Father Theophilus Borer (1912-1940), was originally a member of the Society of African Missions, and that since 1990 St Patrick's has been served by the same institute of priests. For this reason the SMA Archives in Rome have been a useful, if not surprising, source for the early history of the parish.

Finally, and moving westwards across the capital, Catholic historians and archivists can but envy their Anglican counterparts who now have at their disposal Rex Walford's The Growth of 'New London' in Suburban Middlesex (1918-1945) and the Response of the Church of England (Lewiston, Queenston, Lampeter: The Edwin Mellen Press, 2007, pp.xiii + 461). This monumental work of historical geography, to which the Bishop of London has contributed a Foreword, traces the growth of suburban Middlesex in the inter-war period and therein chronicles the response of the Church of England, pastorally and architecturally, to the expansion of the metropolis. Five case studies (North Harrow, Mill Hill, Temple Fortune, Neasden and Belmont) provide more in-depth analysis of the way in which the Anglican Communion sought to evangelise such burgeoning areas, some of them industrial and working-class, others residential and middle-class, but each of them a challenge to the maintenance and extension of the parish system. The archival collections consulted include the Guildhall Library, London (Diocese of London Papers), Lambeth Palace Library (Papers of Bishop WInnington-Ingram) and Kings College, Cambridge (Papers of Dean Milner-White). The author presents a great deal of statistical and topographical analysis, supplemented by maps and tables. From the perspective of the readers of Catholic Archives, it is surely the case that a similar study could be made of the growth of Catholicism in suburban London between the two World Wars.

THE CATHOLIC ARCHIVES SOCIETY CONFERENCE, 2008

For the first time in its history the Catholic Archives Society travelled to the South West of England, to the delightful county of Devon, for the 2008 Annual Conference. The meeting was held from 19 to 21 May at Brunel Manor, Torquay, home of the celebrated Victorian civil and marine engineer, Isambard Kingdom Brunel.

Two of the papers delivered at the Conference appear in full in the current edition of Catholic Archives: viz. Father Kristian Paver's presentation on the relationship between Civil and Canon Law in terms of Data Protection and associated legislation now in force in the United Kingdom (a synopsis of which appeared in CAS Bulletin 32, November 2008); and Sarah Stanton's talk on how to ensure security in archival repositories.

Given that the Society was meeting in the South West, it was entirely appropriate that delegates were treated to Abbot Aidan Bellenger's highly informative and most entertaining account of the post-Reformation (1556-1850) history of Catholicism in that part of England. A further session was taken up by a very interesting presentation on disaster planning by Rebecca Saunders of the Devon Record Office. Indeed, it was to that repository, now housed in state-of-the-art facilities on the outskirts of Exeter, that a visit was made on the afternoon of 20 May. Members were given an extensive tour of the building and were introduced to the different departments of the D.R.O., including the conservation studio and the searchroom with its library, as well as the archive stacks and storage areas. The final paper was that given by Paul Shaw on the Central Congregational Archive of the Poor Servants of the Mother of God, in which he outlined the life and work of the foundress, Frances Margaret Taylor, and then focused upon the congregation's principal archive and its development and collection policy.

The Annual Conference, which as usual included the Annual General Meeting of the Catholic Archives Society and an Open Forum at which members were able to raise issues of mutual interest and concern, was a memorable occasion, made all the more so by having convened on the 'English Riviera' at a time of year when the climate and spectacular sea views of that part of the world are at their best. It was also a pleasure to welcome Bishop Budd of Plymouth to the opening session of the Conference.

EDITORIAL NOTES

Catholic Archives 2010 opens with the text of the address by Abbot Zielinski, Vice President of the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church, delivered at the Catholic Archives Society's Annual Conference at Ushaw in 2009. This is followed by an account of the Oscott College Archives by Margaret Harcourt Williams, someone who needs little introduction to readers of this journal. Likewise, two other regular contributors, John Davies and Edward Walsh, offer very interesting pieces on a parish archive in Liverpool and film archives respectively. Canon Anthony Dolan, a former Chairman of the Society, writes on Ad Limina reports. There is also an obituary notice, reproduced from The Daily Telegraph, of Father Geoffrey Holt S.J., for many years the Archivist at Farm Street and a figure much respected by members of the Catholic Archives Society and the Catholic Record Society for his friendly assistance, gentlemanly scholarship and encyclopaedic knowledge (especially of the eighteenth century). Another article in this year's journal looks at the way in which archives were used by Monsignor Bernard Ward, the foremost chronicler of late eighteenth- and early nineteenth-century English Catholic history. I hope readers will forgive this intrusion by the Editor, but I thought to include this piece (which, had illness not intervened, was due to have been delivered at the Society's Annual Conference at Ushaw in 2006) since this is the last issue of Catholic Archives for which I shall be responsible. The founding Editor, Robin Gard, produced fourteen issues from 1981 to 1994. Catholic Archives 15 (1995) was a joint effort, and I have carried the torch, as it were, from 1996 to 2010 (nos. 16-30). I now hand over to Father John Broadley who is part of the Archives Team of the Diocese of Salford. In asking God's blessing upon his new task and, on behalf of the new Editor, in encouraging the continuation of the support from contributors which I have enjoyed, I would like to take this opportunity to thank all those who have assisted me over the past fifteen years. A special note of thanks is due to successive Officers of the Catholic Archives Society (particularly the Co-ordinators of the Publications Sub-Committee) and to my own bishop, who is currently Chairman of the Patrimony Committee of the Catholic Bishops' Conference of England & Wales, for their personal support for my editorial work. Building upon Robin Gard's pioneering labours, this journal has continued to find a place in the archival world, both religious and secular. I am happy to have had the opportunity to develop what Robin established, and I am confident that under its new Editor Catholic Archives will continue to play a crucial role in the promotion of a wider knowledge and the continuing care of the Church's archival heritage.

ECCLESIASTICAL ARCHIVES AND THE MEMORY OF GOD'S PEOPLE

Rt.Rev.Michael John Zielinski O.S.B. Oliv.

Introduction

To use an image taken from daily life, an ecclesiastical archive can be compared to a family photograph album. An album speaks of our personal history and, although referring to the past, tells who we are today. Consequently, ecclesiastical archives represent a cultural heritage in a broad sense, that is, an object having 'civilizational' value.

Moreover, ecclesiastical archives represent the memory of a particular Church or Christian community. Their specific task is to preserve the memory of the 'care of souls': for this reason they are ecclesiastical cultural goods. Nevertheless, their content opens up in general terms an eloquent perspective upon civil life as well. Therein one can find pages rich in secular history, which can be of interest to the majority of the population of a particular place.

Archival Documentation as Ecclesiastical Cultural Heritage

But what precisely does the Church mean when she speaks of ecclesiastical cultural heritage? Pope John Paul II gave a descriptive list during a discourse to the members of the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church gathered for its first Plenary Assembly. By 'cultural heritage' he means: '...first of all the artistic patrimony of painting, sculpture, architecture, mosaics and music, placed at the service of the Church's mission. To this we add the printed heritage contained in ecclesiastical libraries and the historical documents protected in the archives of the ecclesial community. Finally, included in this area are literary, theatrical and cinematographical works produced by the means of mass communication.'¹

During the subsequent Plenary Assembly, Pope John Paul highlighted the aims of these cultural goods, thereby specifying the meaning they assume within the context of the Church: '[they] are intended for the promotion of humanity and, in the ecclesial context, assume a specific meaning in that they are ordered to evangelization, worship and charity.'² In particular, the Pope noted, '...archives, especially ecclesiastical archives, not only preserve the record of human events, but also bring us to meditate upon the action of Divine Providence in history, such that the documents preserved therein become a memorial of the evangelization carried out in time and an authentic pastoral instrument.'³

These precious instructions are reflected in the Circular Letter of the Pontifical Commission entitled The Pastoral Function of Church Archives (2 February 1997). This document was addressed to the bishops but was intended as well for all ecclesiastical archivists. These magisterial pronouncements and this document integrate and contribute to the reconsideration of a new concept of cultural and archival heritage derived from the ecclesiology and the new juridical conception originating in the Second Vatican Council – new, but profoundly rooted in the Great Tradition.

We have been witnessing, in fact, for some time now, an evolution of the concept of artistic-cultural patrimony which has even brought about a precise theological reflection on cultural goods. On the one hand, the meaning of their function has developed with regard to a greater appreciation qua works of art and products of culture; on the other hand, the perception of the effectiveness of such cultural goods with regard to worship and evangelization has also been affirmed.

In particular, by means of increasingly extensive doctrinal and theological investigations moving from a once prevalent juridical ecclesiology towards a new ecclesiology of communion, the concept of the ecclesiastical archive as an item of cultural heritage and as part of the patrimony of the history and memory of civil society has already become commonplace. This is in comparison with previous models in which the Church's archives were considered almost exclusively (even in their historical section) as the custodial repositories of juridical rights or even the reserved and jealously-guarded seat of official records through which the institution expressed itself.

In other words, the concept of memory and source has been augmented to the point of prevailing over that of memory and self-documentation in the realm of ecclesiastical documents, viz. a source for the history of the Church, its institutions and protagonists, its devotions and religious sensibilities, as well as for the artistic and architectural heritage, and the economic, social demographic and biographical history of a local area. And for this reason The Pastoral Function of Church Archives states: 'The material stored in the archives is a heritage preserved so as to be transmitted and utilized. [...] Those responsible must make sure that the use of Church archives be facilitated further, that is not only only to those interested who have the right to access but also to a larger range of researchers, without prejudice towards their religious or ideological backgrounds, following the best of Church tradition. [...] Such an attitude of disinterested openness, kind welcome and competent service must be taken into careful consideration so that the historical memory of the Church may be offered to the entire society.'⁴

The Archive as a 'Theological Locus'

The documentary memory is not a desire for self-aggrandizement, but rather an occasion for thanking the Lord of 'great things' who has acted in his Church, despite the human fragility of its members. What is stored in the archives expresses the alternate vicissitudes of fidelity and infidelity, charismatic power and institutional weakness, charitable commitment and the lack thereof which has marked the experience of every Christian community. On the other hand, 'memory' has biblical, liturgical and sacramental resonances and is central in the ecclesial setting where man does not shrink before historical accountability. Indeed, despite the contradictions of human sinfulness, this remembrance is the locus, the place, of God's passage. Archives thus document the slow process of the recapitulation of all things in Christ, renewed in every generation as well as in each individual, until the consummation of time. Therefore, in the words of Pope Paul VI, 'to have reverence... for the archives is as if to say, to have reverence for Christ, to have the sensus ecclesiae, to give to ourselves and to those yet to come the story of the passing of this phase of the transitus Domini in the world.'⁵

⁵ Paul VI, Allocution to Ecclesiastical Archivists, 26 September 1963.

The remarks of the Dominican theologian, Marie-Dominic Chenu, for the presentation in 1986 of the new Italian edition of his famous work La Teologia del XII Secolo (first published in 1957) are well known. Chenu observed first of all that the object of his reflection was not so much the thought of the great theologians and thinkers of that pivotal era in European cultural history, so much as 'the mental and cultural fabric which offers the contexts of the great works of the doctors and which serves as the field of theological analysis,' i.e. a history 'of a mentality', and in that particular case, of a 'theological mentality.' He concludes: 'If we were obliged to re-do this work we would give even greater space to the role of socio-economic conditioning, to the evolution of political structures... just as we would reserve greater space for the history of the arts, both literary and plastic: these are, in their own way, not merely aesthetic illustrations but true theological loci.' For its part, ecclesiastical historiography had understood for some decades the need to investigate not only the important events of the Church's institutional history, ecclesiastical diplomacy, councils, religious orders or great personalities, but also the lived history of the People of God, the concrete behaviour and the collective sensibilities of the faith of the believing community. These events are the reflection of the debate carried out at the academic level, but they are also in part its cause. In any case, as Chenu points out, the two areas are profoundly intertwined: 'It follows that the experience and the enunciation of the faith are substantially involved in the culture, without obfuscating the object, for this immediate object is the historicity of God.' Analogically, the Jesuit theologian Jean Daniélou, in his Essai sur le Mystère de l'Histoire (1953), when speaking of history as a mystery, also suggests that the history of the Church is neither the mediator of the revelation of the plan of salvation nor the bearer of its energy charged with redemption, but that she, the Church, is 'only' the privileged locus in which the mystery of salvation is accomplished.

The privileged stewards of this history of the People of God are precisely the ecclesiastical archives. The Pastoral Function of Church Archives affirms: 'Church archives while preserving the unique and spontaneous documentation produced by persons and events, cultivate the memory of the life of the Church and manifest the sense of Tradition... Thus in the mens of the Church, a chronological memory carries with it a spiritual reading of events in the context of the eventum salutis and imposes the urgency of conversion in order to reach ut unum sint.⁶ The same document underscores further 'the ecclesial interest in the work of preserving the living heritage of memory aimed at attracting the attention of the People of God towards its own history,' and urges an adequate preservation of the 'pages of memory' as 'a demand of justice which we, today, owe to those from whom we have inherited.'⁷

Growth of the Sensus Ecclesiae by Means of Archives

The use of the ecclesiastical historical archive works towards the maturation of the sensus ecclesiae and, in this sense, the archive is an ecclesial locus. It bears witness to the Church's actions in the past, which finds its verification in documents which have survived the vicissitudes of history, and it is a sign of historical passage, cultural changes and contingent frailty. It narrates the history of the Christian community, the multiple forms of piety, social circumstances and specific situations and contexts. The archive belongs to the irreducible complexity of the Church's action in history and as such is a 'living reality.'

Archives give to the community of the faithful in the present an historical perception favouring ecclesial development. In fact, 'the forward-looking awareness of the historic action of the Church, as understood through archival sources, offers the possibility of an adequate adaptation of Church institutions to the needs of the faithful and men of our times.'⁸ These 'determine the work of the inculturation of the faith in the local context, for which it is opportune to appreciate the archives... so as to grow in the sense of belonging to a certain territory.' Moreover, they display the generational connective fabric of each individual Christian community, and thus it is proper, for example, 'to allow the faithful to discover their own parish archives where the testimonies of the various families and lives of the community are preserved.'⁹

Archives are projected into the future as well. Based on an awareness of its own past, the Christian community lives out its ecclesial commitment today, realizing that it must entrust its inheritance to tomorrow, and so guarantee an original experience of the Traditio. The current period must be reinterpreted in the light of the urgency of the 'New Evangelization', gathering in the treasures of history and recent events, in which the adversity and the ecstasy of so many generations are expressed as they worked out their assent to the message of the Gospel.

The figure of the archivist can also act as a protagonist in the production of a culture increasingly aware of its own historical roots. Given a knowledge of the fundamentals – the history of the Church and its institutions, the history of Canon Law, paleography and the science of public documentation – the model archivist will need to go beyond the image of one who, in the best of cases, was seen as an expert organizer of sources to be investigated by others in order to appropriate for himself a sector in which he can become an expert, viz. the study of the history of his own archive, its physiognomy and structure, in organizing its collections and series. The history of an archive is not a matter of chance: behind the reorganizations, extrapolations, additions, integrations, losses and discarding, there are often projects, self-portrayals of the ecclesiastical institutions, projections of models of pastoral governance and the attainment or reconfirmation of theological, ecclesiological or devotional orientations. This alone could be an original contribution to the history of the culture, pastoral practice and spirituality of particular churches, religious orders and lay organizations, both old and new.

The Pontifical Commission's Circular Letter also points out the truth that the ecclesiastical archivist enters into the cultural dialectic in the forefront of the 'act which is fundamental to the consultation of the archival patrimony' constituted in its description or inventory. The benefit of this service will be rendered more accessible the more preference one gives to international or widely shared systems and to the use of the most common terminology possible (cf. ISAD, ISAAR etc.). Church archives are not only ample sources of news, but rather large, complex and stratified 'texts' which, in order to be 'read' and understood, require the predisposition of an attentive exegesis and the formulation of a pertinent hermeneutic. Those who work in such archives make an effective contribution to cultural development because they offer their scientific expertise in assisting researchers (one thinks of university students) to grasp the nature and meaning of the documents produced. Researchers are often unaware of what such documents might be, where they came from and what they might have been used for: 'By promoting critical editions of sources and collections of studies, such austere tabernacles of memory will express their full vitality and will insert themselves in the creative process of culture and in the pastoral mission of the local church.¹⁰

Finally, ecclesiastical archives must be protected with care, particularly in the context of our times when the changed social and clerical conditions oblige us to unite dioceses and parishes, suppress religious institutes and sodalities lacking dynamism, assimilate the competencies of sundry groups, all of whose respective archives either lie abandoned or suffer imprudent reorganization so as to make any historical research arduous. To these snares, which we would define as classic, new ones are added such as proposals by the Mormons to place baptismal registers on microfilm with the aim of 'baptizing' their predecessors post mortem. The anagraphical data, reaching the conspicuous number of 600 million people, has been placed on line at www.familysearch.com, provoking as of this moment the sole reaction of the French government, arguing a violation of privacy.

Europe's Memory Cannot Omit Christianity

A central theme in the magisterium of Pope Benedict XVI, in continuity with that of his predecessor, is the identification of Christianity as a fundamental root in the identity of Europe. It suffices to quote, by way of example, from Pope John Paul II's homily in St Adalbert's Square, Gniezno, Poland, on 3 June 1997: 'The goal of the authentic unity of the European continent is still distant. There will be no European unity until it is based on unity of the spirit. This most profound basis of unity was brought to Europe and consolidated down the centuries by Christianity with its Gospel, with its understanding of man and with its contribution to the development of the history of peoples and nations. This does not signify a desire to appropriate history. For the history of Europe is a great river into which many tributaries flow, and the variety of traditions and cultures which shape it is its great treasure. The foundations of the identity of Europe are built on Christianity. And its present lack of spiritual unity arises principally from the crisis of this Christian self-awareness.'

It is first of all true that memory is fundamental for contemporary man just as it has been for people of all ages. Krzysztof Pomian, an historian and philosopher, and author of Des Saintes Reliques à L'Art Moderne (2003), an essay about the birth of museums, unveils the profound modernity of relics, which are a bridge between past and present. His words can also be applied to archives and the treasures they preserve: 'Relics bear a profound significance, not only for believers, but also for non-believers. Think of the need to touch, to see, to perceive objects which come from the distant past to establish a connection with today... Because memory is fundamental for giving existence to the future as well.' In fact, according to Pomian's way of thinking, 'places of memory' are fundamental for the sensibility of modern man, above all in the wake of the demise of ideologies and the diminishing importance of religion in society. These present themselves as the new antithesis of attraction, places of a new sacrality, charged with preserving the vestiges of the past and transmitting them to an indefinitely distant future.

But those who wish to read history with eyes unimpeded by prejudice cannot but see that the social, political and cultural fabric of Europe is deeply permeated by Christianity. In Le Siècle des Platter: 1499-1628 (2 volumes: 1995, 2000), the historian Emmanuel Le Roy Ladurie, an exponent of the historiographical school of 'Nouvelle Histoire', investigated over a century of European history through the life events of three generations of the Platter family, who were famous Swiss travellers of the sixteenth century. The author notes that in their travel logs the term 'Europe' appears as a synonym for 'Christianity'. In 1966 the same historian, by means of studying the meticulous notes related by an inquisitor between the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries during the period of the Cathar heresy, published an essay on the village of Montaillou in Languedoc, in southern France. From this study there emerges a cross-section of a micro-community of civic realities, popular religiosity and living worlds that were the strength of the social and institutional fabric of the time, with numerous offshoots even in the modern world, viz. several Marian shrines.

It is impossible to know just how many treasures are contained in archives, whether awaiting analogous, ingenious research or simple, ordinary studies, until such places are explored completely with respect and love, and with the desire to make these documents speak. For such documents await nothing less than to tell us their secrets.

Church Archives and Contemporary Culture

The growing importance attributed to micro-history, defined by schools of thought once limited to the realm of sociology but today fully received in that of historiography, has stimulated greater interest in local history, a field which in fact has long enjoyed great credit in the Church. In this type of history the past more than ever is perceived as something which in some way has continuity with the present and concerns the person of today. In such research, the archives which are most persistently consulted are naturally those closest to the community and which have a greater resonance with the events of the same community and its protagonists, of their projects, needs, passions, sufferings and conflicts, and of the anniversaries, births and deaths of real men and women. This type of source is preserved in local institutions, such as city halls and of course parishes, with their sacramental registers and historical chronicles. These archives are, moreover, connected with the charitable, educational, health and aid structures which have formed the very fabric of civil society.

The principal type of researcher who is interested in deriving benefit from ecclesiastical archives is the professional historian already endowed with the instruments of bibliographical and archival research or with primary source analysis and reading in the field. Such researchers only need and, we would add, have a right to a cordial welcome and the best conditions for carrying out their own work. But there are also university students who wish to learn the skills of research. They will need to be shown greater attention not only in order to direct them to what they are seeking, but also to give them an ecclesial vision of history. A third type of researcher, who in no way should be underestimated, can be added to the previous two, viz. those interested in knowing primarily their own past, that of their family, their town or neighbourhood, their community or the group to which they belong. This type of archive user searches through the documents not with the intention of objective, impartial historical research along positivist lines, but rather asks our help in remembering.

A dialectical relationship exists between history and memory which has been made the subject of historiographical and even theological debate, although it is not our intention to recall it here. It is enough to limit our discussion to pointing out two different ways of approaching ecclesiastical archival sources, both of which have the right to exist. In effect, the archive as a 'memory bank' or, according to a popular and perhaps a rather over-used expression, a 'place of memory', has in recent years been laden with hitherto unknown expectations and symbolic significance. Integral to this memory, and not limited to the accumulation of information and knowledge, the archives are found to contain an evocative power full of affective resonances which transform them into depositories not only of self-documenting memory and source-memory, but of identity-memory which has to do with what individuals and groups claim to be.

A new perception of archives in the popular imagination is gaining ground. No longer are they seen merely as reservoirs of knowledge or as remote places filled with dusty papers occasionally consulted by some aloof scholar, but places of relevance in which the past and the present seem to cancel each other out, where the living and the dead meet and blend in together, where the communication of the visible with the invisible is made possible, or even (using a purely theological category) the communion of saints is attained. In the light of all this, how can we not see that ecclesiastical archives, perhaps initially consulted for frivolous reasons such as seeking to discover if one has famous ancestors, become a formidable opportunity for the proclamation of the Gospel?

Nevertheless, great attention must be paid to the fact that memory is not immediately history. It can be subject to manipulation and thus become dangerous if rendered absolute. This is because memory can become an instrument of a biased vision. It must, therefore, be judged by history, itself an ever-problematic reconstruction of that which is no longer, subject to revision every time new elements emerge. Laden with sentiments, memory is nourished by nuanced recollections, while history requires analysis and critical discourse.

Furthermore, if the use of archival sources for research is a given, it is less so at the didactic level. This must increasingly recognize the necessity of integrating primary source research with scholarly apparatus in order to extract a deeper knowledge from the 'bare bones' of chronological data which is based on broad generalizations or even on an ideological vision which is at times less than respectful of genuine ecclesiastical history.

Today, however, the ecclesiastical archive is also considered from other points of view: as a repository of treasures to be visited; as an inspiring place for conferences or book launches; as a promoter of exhibitions featuring its own artefacts or particularly impressive original documents; or as the lending institution for items of special interest for display in other venues. Another type of public has been presenting itself for some time now, a clientele composed of highly cultured people, perhaps not from a background in the humanities but from a more scientific or technical one. Such people are interested in archives in the same way as they might be interested in other facets of culture, motivated by a general interest in knowledge and seeking to identify themselves with a definite past which they can call their own.

Finally, the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church reminds us that: 'Initiatives [such] as the conservation and promotion of cultural heritage require individuals and time. Even with archives, it is necessary that a pastoral attitude be fostered, considering that their conservation prepares for future cultural developments. Their appreciation could constitute a valid meeting ground with today's culture and offer occasions to participate in the progress of humanity as a whole.'¹¹

THE ARCHIVES OF ST MARY'S COLLEGE, OSCOTT

Introduction

St Mary's College, Oscott, is the seminary for the Archdiocese of Birmingham. It traces its roots to 1794 as a college for training priests and educating Catholic boys. It was the first seminary to be established in this country after the Reformation – St Edmund's College, Ware, and Ushaw College, Durham, being lineal continuations of the English College, Douai. At first, Oscott was situated at what is now Maryvale or Old Oscott and was under the general management of a group of Catholic gentry and nobility. However, financial difficulties led to the transfer of the college to Bishop Milner, Vicar Apostolic of the Midland District, and the new St Mary's College was opened in 1808. The increasing number of students outgrew the existing building, land was bought and a new college erected. Since 1838 Oscott College has occupied its present site.

The college was a school for both lay and clerical students until 1873, in which year some of the latter moved to St Bernard's Seminary, Olton, near Solihull. However, Olton was only ever partially built and not all the seminarians transferred there, so, rather than maintain seminary training in two institutions, St Bernard's was closed in 1889. Its students returned to Oscott, where the lay school was duly closed, and St Mary's became exclusively a seminary.

From 1897 to 1909 Oscott was the Central Seminary for the Archdiocese of Westminster and the Dioceses of Clifton, Portsmouth, Northampton and the whole of Wales. Today, it remains as the seminary for the Archdiocese of Birmingham but also accepts students from other dioceses.

The Archives Project

This history of more than two centuries has created a great deal of paperwork, and the Oscott College Archives (OCA) were deposited in the Birmingham Archdiocesan Archives (BAA), housed in the Curial Offices at Cathedral House, St Chad's Queensway, Birmingham, adjacent to St Chad's Cathedral. A series of transfers were made between 2003 and 2008, and the OCA now fill about 48 linear metres of shelving in the BAA. In 2004 I was appointed by the Trustees of Oscott College to prepare a catalogue, the primary aim of which was to inform them and other interested parties of what the collection consisted. The original intention was not to make details of the OCA widely available or to increase public access – although there was no suggestion that these matters were unimportant – but to catalogue the collection for the use and information of its owners. At first, the work was funded by Oscott alone, and not by any external agency or grant: in other words, the owners and those responsible for the OCA were paying for work to be done on them in order to discover what they had.

Reassuringly, I was told that no one was expecting that in the time I was given for the project I would be able to do everything that would be required with the collection. I was fortunate that there would be people who could advise me on the background to the OCA. Accordingly, I received generous advice and help from both Rev. Dr John Sharp, the Archivist of the Archdiocese of Birmingham, and Dr Judith Champ, the historian of Oscott College, where she is also a member of staff.

When I started my work on the OCA, I found that it had been shelved and that the Diocesan Archivist had sorted and listed part of the collection. This meant that although I moved things around as I worked out a scheme of classification, I did not, for example, find examination records mixed up with financial records, or records of college societies and details of estate management brought randomly together. This made it far easier to get to grips with the task than might otherwise have been the case. A principle of archive sorting and cataloguing is to return to and reflect the original order of the documents as far as possible. A scheme of classification is a way of arranging the archives so as to reflect this order and to present information about them in a structured and comprehensive manner.

The Content of the OCA: What I Found

Most of the collection represents the administrative papers of Oscott College, generated by its work as a teaching institution and as an owner of land and other property. The OCA had been examined at the college itself some years before they were transferred to the BAA, and almost 12,000 documents had been extracted and arranged in chronological order to form what came to be called 'the Correspondence and Miscellaneous Papers' or CMP series. This was a closed series, ending in 1924. It was difficult to see why some documents had been selected to form this series, and the chronological arrangement imposed on them had nothing to recommend it. This arrangement destroyed whatever original order the papers may have had and resulted in the separation of documents that belonged together, e.g. copies of some items had been catalogued within CMP, other copies – sometimes multiples – remained elsewhere in the OCA. The effect of creating the CMP series was thus to divide the OCA into two parts. The first section comprised these 12,000 documents, the other held the rest of the collection, beginning in the late-eighteenth century and continuing to early in the present century, and which will have other modern material added from Oscott in due course.

I soon realized that although these two sections of the OCA overlapped, I would be unable to deal with both of them in the time allowed by the Trustees' grant. My priority, therefore, was to address what was largely uncatalogued. This did not mean that I dismissed CMP – on the contrary, it appeared at first to be the core of the historical archive such that I spent some time familiarising myself with its content before concentrating on the rest of the collection.

The CMP series took up two shelves, which left the contents of the remaining 40-plus shelves to deal with. In general, the non-CMP material related to the administrative work of the college and included several distinct archive series, of which one of the most extensive was the financial records spanning the period from the foundation of Oscott until the mid-1990s. They are an important source of information on college management because they may be used to check expenditure on the buildings and estate, salaries, students' accounts and much more. There were also records of land owned by the college from the nineteenth century onwards. These documents shed light upon local farming and property management, as well as the gradual disposal of Oscott's once extensive estate, much of which is now part of Birmingham.

Documents relating to the school and seminary date back to 1794 and include an extensive list of household and administrative expenses and of students' accounts. There is also a mass of general correspondence, examination programmes, timetables, reports, details of the rules to be kept by the students and of their conduct, exhibition programmes, specifications and accounts for building work (especially from the 1830s), details of housekeeping expenses, students' board and lodging... the list was endless.

The OCA continued with varying amounts of papers from different presidents and rectors, some well represented, others represented by a single bundle or folder, and some not represented at all. There were also different amounts of papers from individual staff members and students, although this series was patchy and the survival of such material somewhat random. The survival of applications submitted by prospective students for the priesthood was also rather uneven. However, there were extensive records of examinations and of student life, as well as of the activities of college societies such as the band and football team. The OCA also included items sent to, rather than produced by, Oscott, e.g. pastoral letters, administrative papers of some related organizations, a few pre-Oscott documents and other papers and small collections that may originally have been transferred to the college for safekeeping.

The Progress of the Project

My initial task was to gather together what once belonged together, and to use the structure that emerged as the basis of a scheme of classification. I prepared brief descriptions of documents or series of documents and numbered them according to a preliminary classification. The result was a lengthy word document, to which I added a number of suggestions for further work on the archives. This was presented to the Oscott Trustees in the summer of 2006. The Trustees recognised the value of this document as a source of information both for themselves and for other interested parties, as well as its usefulness as a finding aid for researchers, be they academics, local historians or family history enquirers. Consent was duly given to Father Sharp's proposal that joint funding be given for further work.

The second part of the project was thus carried out not only by me but also by Father Sharp and the volunteers who work in the BAA. Firstly, the extensive but artificial CMP series was broken up, as a result of which the original series was reconstituted and items that had been artificially separated were reunited. Much of the CMP material then fitted into and extended the work that I had already done, e.g. there were additional papers from some of the presidents of the college, as well as documents relating to buildings, property and administration. New series were also created, among the most important of which was that containing the accounts and receipts for the construction of the present Oscott College (these documents now being listed individually). Numerous other papers relating to buildings and property also emerged, with the result that there was a significant extension to this series.

It also became clear that CMP included more than one copy of some documents and that these duplicates were further replicated in the archives that I had already catalogued. There was no obvious reason for this, but many of the duplicates were of items that were probably produced in fairly large numbers, the most extensive being programmes for exhibitions (viz. examination results, prize-givings, plays, concerts and other events). Weeding out duplicates meant that the 12,000 or so documents in the original CMP shrank considerably.

Breaking up CMP and incorporating its documents where they belonged was but one part of the extended Oscott project. Another task was to return to some of the series that I had not catalogued in detail and to extend my descriptions. Father Sharp appraised the large collection of papers of Henry Thomas Parkinson, President of Oscott from 1897 to 1924 and a major figure in the Catholic Social Movement, and produced a lengthy list of his correspondents which should be very valuable to researchers. He also catalogued parts of the students' archive in further detail and, although recent papers are closed, this too has research value.

I went to Oscott again to see what archival material was still there. I had spent some time at the college during the first part of the project, particularly to look at financial papers, and I had had some additional financial records transferred to the BAA. These further visits yielded papers from twentieth-century rectors and a large collection of timetables and other organizational items from the same era, all of which were transferred. While I was at Oscott I listed the plans kept by the House Manager. This produced possibly the most striking result from the whole project: my list included a plan of the drains which proved invaluable when work was needed recently, and I am told that finding this plan saved the Trustees more than the archive project has cost them!

By this time it was possible to gain a clear idea of the whole collection. The OCA provides information on the training of students for the priesthood and the education of boys, as well as being a source for architectural and artistic history (building plans and accounts), social history (the papers of Monsignor Parkinson et al), local studies (procurators' correspondence and financial and property records) and for family and parish history. A valuable insight is provided into the working of the college and its estates, although it is less useful for the life of the seminary and individuals. The best-documented periods are the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, while the beginning of the nineteenth century and the bulk of the twentieth are less well represented.

There are, therefore, large gaps in the OCA. For example, there is very little material on Old Oscott, although some papers from this period had previously been transferred to the BAA to form part of its C Series. The collections of papers from presidents and rectors vary from a few items to several metres of shelving. The survival of teaching material, such as notes and examination scripts, has been uneven; and the series of papers from staff and students represents a small proportion only of the possible total. There are also some significant omissions, e.g. an absence of formal title deeds or letters of appointment of Trustees (although there are some drafts of these), and there are very few minutes or reports of the meetings of the Trustees.

Then, when it seemed as though the project was at an end, Oscott College sent a large collection of photographs, both loose and in albums, to the BAA. The project was therefore extended yet again, since the photographic archive required considerable sorting, identification and weeding, together with the preparation of a lengthy itemised list. Most of the photographs dated from the second half of the nineteenth century and were of individuals, buildings and college events. The portraits of people were mainly formal and taken in photographic studios. Some of the albums formed a series, with the contents arranged in chronological sequence and identified by a card index. Others, however, appear to have been collected and assembled randomly and may have been given to Oscott or left there by students and staff. The large albums containing pictures of groups and sporting events were retained and conserved where necessary, but despite the fact that a few of the smaller albums had once been attractive, all parties concerned agreed that they were now too decayed to retain. The photographs were removed, duplicates were weeded out, and the collections were catalogued and stored in archival photographic pockets in archive quality boxes.

The Catalogue

By now, my original catalogue had been greatly extended but was still a word document. The main collections in the BAA are catalogued using CALM, and so the next step was to amend what I had produced in order that it would be compatible with the CALM system. Using CALM, the catalogue is presented as follows:

1. Oscott as a Physical Institution: this section is subdivided into buildings, property, title deeds and plans. It is concerned with St Mary's College, Oscott, as a physical entity, with its buildings, property and financial management. Sub-sections include archival material relating to the old and new college buildings, extensions and alterations to the new building, and buildings in the grounds. There is an appeal, with plans, accounts and details of the opening ceremony, including financial records from the architect, Joseph Potter, and a large quantity of receipts relating to building supplies, tradesmen and labourers. A small number of documents refer to the work of A.W.N. Pugin. There are letters, estimates and invoices for internal and external maintenance and alterations, mainly to buildings. Mid- to late-twentieth-century plans are still held at Oscott for administrative purposes. A further sub-section relates to the financial management of the college (including student, staff and domestic accounts), its estates and the farm.

2. Oscott as an Educational Institution: here the sub-sections include: record and scrapbooks, together with reasonable amounts of papers relating to constitutions, prospectuses and rules; library and patrimony; chapel and liturgy; presidents and rectors; staff and students; reports, administrative papers, teaching notes and bishops' papers. The scrapbooks are a key source of information on the life of the college and began as handwritten records of its academic structure and general life. In time, these books became collections of printed ephemera and newspaper cuttings associated with the college, its members, their academic and sporting achievements, musical and dramatic productions, as well as including items of wider ecclesiastical interest and importance. There are press cuttings on the deaths of former students and members of staff, as well as details of estate management, processions, first Holy Communion, confirmations, ordinations, the weather, current affairs... The collection of constitutions, handbooks, prospectuses, rules and timetables dates from the eighteenth century to the present day, while the library and museum papers concern administration and acquisitions (not content), and the material relating to the chapel concerns divine worship

There are smaller collections of reports, most of which relate to studies, although there are some disciplinary and general comments and small amounts of administrative and teaching material. The archives of presidents and rectors vary in content and amount, and they include general papers on the life of the college as well as personal material. By far the largest collection is that of Henry Parkinson (see above), which in addition to personal and administrative papers and notes for lectures, sermons and talks, includes a long series of letters, now held in nearly 1,200 folders and indexed by correspondent. Rectors' papers from the late twentieth century onwards are retained at Oscott. There are, moreover, numerous papers relating to the men, and some women, who were students or who served on the teaching or domestic staff. Although only a small proportion of the total number of staff and students is represented, these papers cover a range of topics and include useful details of life at Oscott. Other material relating to the students includes lists, registers, health statements, examination results and academic reports, as well as papers from college societies, confraternities and sporting groups. There are nearly 800 student files, which may include baptism and confirmation certificates, application forms and letters of recommendation and dimissorials. Not all the possible documents will be found in any one individual file – which are governed by an eighty-year closure rule. Additionally, there is correspondence with some bishops about their students. Bishops and Archbishops of Birmingham are represented by two artificial collections associated with Bishops Ullathorne and Ilsley. Only some items in these collections relate directly to Oscott, and how they came to be within the OCA is unknown. The Ullathorne papers were brought together as a collection before being deposited in the BAA, while the Ilsley collection has been formed from material scattered throughout the OCA.

3. Archives of Related Institutions: this section includes material relating to the Central Seminary, St Bernard's Seminary, Olton, and St Thomas' Seminary, Grove Park. The archives of each of these institutions were deposited at Oscott when they closed (although of course the Central Seminary was located at Oscott).

4. Oscott as a Diocesan Resource: this is a small section relating to St Mary's College, Oscott, not in its chief role (as a seminary) and is mostly concerned with retreats.

5. Non-Oscott Material: this section comprises papers contained in the deposits made from Oscott but which have only a tenuous connection with the college, or no link at all. The archives of the Society of St Cecily (founded in 1904) and of the Apostolic Union of Priests (the first Congress of the English Branch of which was held at Oscott in 1909) are probably there because Monsignor Parkinson was closely involved with both of these bodies. Papers from individuals who were neither college staff nor students may have originally been given to Oscott for safe-keeping. Some material of unknown provenance or authorship is also included here, as are a number of sermons and historical papers apparently overlooked when other documents deposited at Oscott were transferred to the BAA to form part of the B and C series. There is also a collection of sermons from the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries which have not as yet been fully identified.

6. Photographs: the loose photographs have been divided into those of men (both lay and clerical), women and children; and they have been arranged and catalogued alphabetically within these groups. Names of individuals in the large albums of group photographs have also been included in the catalogue.

Conclusion

As well as sorting and cataloguing, the Oscott project involved extensive re-packaging and the preparation of a conservation survey. Many of the most badly damaged volumes and documents have now been repaired. A final catalogue of 700 pages in the printed version was presented to the Trustees of Oscott College in July 2009. Current and semi-current papers, including cemetery records, remain at the college.

PARISH LOGS: ST AUSTIN, GRASSEDALE, 1899-1929

John Davies

In a lecture given at the Diocese of Lancaster's Talbot Library, Preston, in April 2009, under the auspices of the North West Catholic History Society, Father John Broadley discussed the sources available to him in his reconstruction of the parish community of the Church of the Holy Name, Manchester. Amongst the parish records he found valuable was an early log or journal. Sadly, in the North West of England Holy Name is not typical, in that it has preserved this log and made it available to historians. Relatively few such parish logs have survived or surfaced in archive collections in this region. In Liverpool the best collection of parish records is that of St Peter, Seel Street, now housed in the Liverpool Record Office. But even for this parish there is no surviving log.

Where these logs have survived, however, historians have greatly benefited. In her work on the early history of the parish of St Mary (formerly St Benedict), Woolton, now in the southern suburbs of Liverpool, Janet Hollinshead was able to draw on the record kept by Dom Edward Bernard Catterall. In notebook form, it relates to his work in establishing the mission. From these notebooks, or logs, she was able to reconstruct the mission finances, e.g. the cost of building the chapel and its furnishing, and Catterall's household expenses. His record of his routine household costs and living expenses provides a fascinating insight into the lifestyle of a late eighteenth-century parish priest and his parishioners in a semi-rural environment. We learn that in 1768 his chimneys were swept, that his mare had to be shod, and that he himself was in need of new clothes. When it came to food, Father Catterall was to some extent self-sufficient: in 1772 he extended his outbuildings and bought two pigs and a cow. He generated a small surplus and at the end of 1774 was able to sell one hundredweight of cheese.¹

One of the best examples of a surviving log is that kept by Dom Thomas Anselm Burge, later titular Abbot of Westminster, during almost thirty years as Rector of St Austin, Grassendale, Liverpool, a mission established in 1838 and served from that time until the present day by the monks of Ampleforth Abbey, Yorkshire. Burge took up his appointment in 1899 and served at St Austin's until his death in 1928. He had previously been Prior of Ampleforth (1885-1898) and had been instrumental in establishing its house of studies, Benet Hall, at Oxford. He was a keen musician, a devotee of plainchant, who played an important role in its adoption in the Catholic Church in England and who participated with some vigour in the international disputes which the spread of the chant precipitated. He had been expected by many to be elected as the first Abbot of Ampleforth when the house was raised to abbatial status in 1900. However, Dom Oswald Smith, Burge's successor as Prior, became the first Abbot and Burge himself embarked upon his lengthy ministry in suburban Liverpool.

Burge kept his log in a stiff-backed exercise book, and apart from his first year at St Austin's, usually devoted one or two pages to each year. The log seems to have been written up at the end of each year or copied from notes taken earlier. It was in part his official record of the mission, listing Mass attendance figures and providing basic financial information, and partly a vehicle for his private opinions and comments, some of which were extremely caustic. He was clearly a man of strongly expressed views who did not tolerate fools gladly.

The log for Burge's first year of rectorship is rather more detailed than those for later years and gives a clear picture of the problems he faced and some idea of his priorities. He arrived at St Austin's on 31 January 1899. His predecessor, Father O'Brien, had died in October 1898 and the mission had relied on supply priests from Ampleforth during the interregnum. What Burge found at Grassendale did not please him: 'Found the house in confusion. Dining room littered with papers and old letters. Sitting room table heaped up with tobacco tins, drawing board, paints, papers, magazines. Sofa in room also strewn with old papers.' The parish accounts had not been properly kept and he subsequently found that they were '£15 out.'²

The first thing that Burge did in January 1899 was to reorganize the parish choir and to introduce plainchant at Mass.³ He discovered that his predecessor had accumulated a 'large balance of £57' in the Altar Society Fund. Three new copes, 'white, purple and black', new surplices and banners for processions were bought in February. Burge also obtained new candlesticks for the High Altar and had all the existing brassware re-lacquered.⁴

The porch steps were described as being dangerous at night and so an oil lamp was installed in March 1899. The old coconut matting in the church aisles was replaced with linoleum. The organ was repaired and the console was placed at right-angles to the altar. Until this time the organist had sat with his back to the altar and there had been no communication between him and the choir. Burge complained that the organ had not been touched for years. It cost him £22 to have it repaired, which he regarded as a 'frightful overcharge'. In the same month he 'brought the garden into cultivation', removing the 'heavy pine and cypress trees which covered the entrance' and planting flowerbeds at the front.⁵ The outside of the church was painted in April and the sacristy was 'refurnished'. A total of £40 was subscribed by parishioners for a statue of the Sacred Heart as a memorial to Father O'Brien. Later that month Burge started a branch of the Children of Mary in the parish. Moreover, to supplement the income of the mission, he took a lodger into the presbytery.⁶ The experiment was not a success: the lodger, Dr O'Reilly, paid the not inconsiderable sum of thirty shillings per week. Burge commented: 'At first everything smooth – soon complained of food, had to have special meals for himself, complained of failing health and left in July.'⁷

Reflecting the popular devotional practice of the day, in May 1899 Burge 'instituted [a] procession in honour of [the] Blessed Virgin Mary.' It 'went round the church' and was considered 'very successful.' This was followed at the beginning of June by 'the first procession in honour of the Blessed Sacrament' to celebrate the feast of Corpus Christi. An altar was erected on a large open space at the top of the cemetery next to the church. Again Burge thought the procession to have been 'very successful.' In June also there were 'charity sermons'⁸ preached in St Austin's by Dom Romuald Woods. A total of £50 was collected. A later note added by Burge commented: 'Never reached such a figure since.' He then left to make his annual retreat at the Benedictine house at Malvern. On his return, before going on holiday in July, he had a greenhouse erected in the garden.⁹

There are no further entries in the logbook for 1899 until November, when Burge recorded that the choir of St Austin's had joined with that of its sister Benedictine parish of St Mary, Woolton, in two performances, one at Woolton and one at Grassendale, of the 'Hymn of Praise' to mark the end of the nineteenth century. Burge was not completely satisfied with the performance: 'Only so-so, we had no decent sopranos.'¹⁰

The average attendance figures which Burge provided for Lent 1899 give a clear idea of the size of the Catholic community in Grassendale and the surrounding districts. The number present at the first Mass on Sunday (8.00 a.m.) was 91, with 147 attending the second Mass (10.00 a.m.). Benediction in the evening drew the respectable figure of 113 in the congregation. Easter communions were calculated at 225. In the same year there were 10 infant baptisms and one adult baptism, with two marriages celebrated in the church.¹¹ The average weekly receipts from the congregation consisted of door money (£1-10-0d) and offertory (£3-8-0d). This seemed to cover the ordinary financial needs of the mission with ease, and at the end of December Burge 'invested £75 of surplus revenue and £9 from cemetery with the Eonomus [at Ampleforth].'¹²

The log kept by Burge at St Austin's provides a fascinating insight into the life of a small Catholic parish on the fringes of Liverpool. During his thirty-year stay at Grassendale Burge witnessed the gradual encroachment of suburbia on his parish, particularly in the 1920s when there was something of a building boom in the southern part of Liverpool. At that time, in order to accommodate the growing Catholic population of the area, Burge began to plan for a new church to replace the 'Georgian Box' of the 1830s. In the event, although land was acquired (now occupied by St Austin's School), the economic depression of the 1930s and the advent of war in 1939 overtook the project and the new church was never built. Many typical Liverpool parishes of the period had a strong working-class core. St Austin's, by contrast, was markedly middle class, which was reflected in many of the parish activities recorded in the log. Burge lamented that the parish debating society failed; but there were many successful classical music concerts. Moreover, when new land was acquired in the 1920s the parish established its own tennis club. The log also illustrates the impact of social change and of national events on this small Catholic community. Thus we read of sectarian violence in Liverpool before the First World War, of the Liverpool transport strike in 1911, of the impact of the Great War, during which Burge struggled to provide support for Belgian refugees in the city, and of the post-war influenza pandemic. At the end of his log Burge included some notes on 'Psychical Phenomena', events for which he felt there was no natural explanation, or, more crudely put, ghost stories. Two of these 'events' were accounts of his own experiences at St Austin's.

Historians of this local Catholic community thus have a valuable source in the parish log for the first thirty years of the twentieth century. However, that they have this resource is partly due to chance and partly on account of the diligence of the then Parish Administrator in the 1990s. During a routine clearing out session he came across Burge's log, the existence of which had been forgotten for sixty years. Recognising its importance, he saved it from the rubbish skip and the probable fate of many other parish logs over the years. The Parish Pastoral Council subsequently decided to publish an edition of the log before the original was safely stored in the Ampleforth Abbey Archives.

MONSIGNOR BERNARD WARD: AN HISTORIAN AND HIS USE OF ARCHIVES

Rev. Stewart Foster

Biographical Summary

Bernard Nicholas Ward was the third son and seventh of the eight children of William George ('Ideal') Ward by his wife Frances Mary Wingfield. A prominent convert to Catholicism from the Oxford Movement, W.G. Ward was Professor of Theology at St Edmund's College, Old Hall Green, near Ware, Hertfordshire. Bernard Ward was born on 4 February 1857 at Old Hall House, the family home built for his father in the college grounds ten years earlier by A.W.N. Pugin. Bernard Ward was to spend more than forty of his sixty-two years at St Edmund's: from 1858 to 1861 the family returned to their estates on the Isle of Wight, but the remainder of Bernard's childhood and his entire schooling was passed at the college; and of the thirty-seven years of his priesthood all but eight were lived out at St Edmund's.¹ He was profoundly influenced by the place and its traditions, which stretched back to its lineal predecessor, the English College at Douai, founded by William Allen in 1568.

Bernard Ward was a lay student at St Edmund's College from 1868 to 1875, and soon exhibited great ability in the classroom, especially in mathematics and science. At the end of his schooling he returned to the Isle of Wight, where he spent time on the family estates at Weston Manor and Northwood Park. At this point in his life he had no definite intention to become a priest, and in the autumn of 1875 he left for a tour of Canada and the United States before returning to London to begin training as a land agent and surveyor. He was destined for a career as an estate bailiff and duly entered employment in the City of London. In 1878 he was appointed as land agent to the Catholic Jerningham family at Costessey near Norwich. Ward was still uncertain of his future when on 8 October 1879, while praying in the chapel at Weston Manor, he made the decision to answer a possible vocation to the priesthood.

In January 1880 Bernard Ward was sent to Oscott College as a candidate for the Diocese of Southwark. He completed his studies in three years, during which time he assisted with the teaching of mathematics in the school. When the Diocese of Southwark was divided in 1882 and a new see erected at Portsmouth, there was the question as to which diocese Ward should belong. Meanwhile, Cardinal Manning, having recognized the young man's abilities, arranged for him to transfer to the Archdiocese of Westminster. In August 1882, and by now a deacon, he left Oscott and returned to St Edmund's as Prefect of Discipline under the President, Monsignor Fenton. Ward was ordained to the priesthood by Cardinal Manning at Archbishop's House, Carlisle Place, on 8 October 1882, three months after the death of his father and three years to the day of his initial decision made in the chapel at Weston Manor.

Early in 1886 Ward left his post at St Edmund's, having been sent by Cardinal Manning to establish a new mission at Willesden in North West London. In October 1888 he returned to Oscott to teach Natural Sciences. He also attended scientific lectures in Birmingham. When in 1890 Bishop Ilsley appointed himself Rector of Oscott, which was now solely a seminary following the closure of the lay school, Ward was chosen as one of the professors. However, his appointment did not last long because later in that same year Manning recalled him to St Edmund's as Vice President and Prefect of Studies. When Herbert Vaughan became Archbishop of Westminster in succession to Manning in 1892, Bernard Ward was appointed Pro-President of St Edmund's College and President in the following year. Ward had the good fortune to assume the presidency at the time of the centenary of the establishment of St Edmund's College at Old Hall Green following the dispersal of the English College at Douai in 1793. The timing proved decisive in that Vaughan, who was now preoccupied with the Central Seminary scheme at Oscott, had toyed with the idea of closing the college completely. Instead Ward transformed St Edmund's into one of the leading Catholic schools in the country, holding the office of President until July 1916. He continued to serve as Prefect of Studies until 1904. He was created a Domestic Prelate by Pope Leo XIII in 1895; he was appointed as a Canon of Westminster in 1903; and in 1909 was elected to the Old Brotherhood of the Secular Clergy.

Ward as an Historian

It was during Bernard Ward's presidency of St Edmund's that his powerful intellect was directed towards chronicling the history of English Catholicism from the death of Bishop Challoner in 1781 to the Restoration of the Hierarchy in 1850. Although earlier in his career Ward had both studied and taught mathematics and science, it was to historical scholarship that he now applied himself with great energy and enthusiasm. In the light of the impending Modernist crisis and the dangers attached to more speculative disciplines, his decision served to ensure that he was on safe ground.

Ward, who was to become one of the founders of the Catholic Record Society in 1904, exhibited a scholarly mind imbued with a deep love of England's Catholic past, and of the Edmundian tradition in particular, together with a strong personal devotion to the English Martyrs. He engaged in serious historical research from the beginning of his appointment as Vice President of St Edmund's in 1890. He sifted through the rich archival collection at the college,² mindful of the impending centenary in 1893, and was determined to write a fuller history than that produced by Doyle in 1869 to mark the centenary of the opening of the Old Hall Green Academy. Ward's History of St Edmund's College was his first major publication. It appeared in the spring of 1893, a few weeks ahead of the centenary celebrations. While pursuing his research he had begun to arrange the college archives, although he recognized that the task of producing a definitive history had been hampered by his inability to gain access to many of the deeds of the college property: it was only after the book had been published that Ward discovered among the Westminster Diocesan Archives evidence that the school at Standon Lordship (a predecessor of the Old Hall Green Academy) had been established in 1749 and not 1753 as previously supposed.³ Research for the book also engaged Ward in a wide correspondence, including for example a series of letters giving details of Edmundians who fought in the Crimean War.⁴

Ward's scholarly contribution to the history of his alma mater did not end in 1893. During the summer months of 1899 he began research for his Life of St Edmund of Canterbury by visiting all the places associated with his subject. The book was eventually published in 1903. The same year also witnessed the appearance of the History of St Edmund's College Chapel which Ward co-authored in six weeks with his then Vice President and fellow historian Edwin Burton. Finally, in 1909 Ward published his Menology of St Edmund's College, a work requested and financed by his eldest brother Edmund Granville Ward, who had inherited the major part of the family fortune on the death of their father in 1882. Bernard Ward's Preface and Historical Introduction to the Menology provided yet another summary of the foundation of the English College at Douai and the history of St Edmund's.

The first decade-and-a-half of the new century found Monsignor Ward engaged in intense historical research of a broader kind, the result of which was a proliferation of books and articles, each breaking important new ground, and crowned by the publication between 1909 and 1915 of his celebrated trilogy which surveyed the background to, achievement and aftermath of Catholic Emancipation. A great deal of Ward's archival research was done at St Edmund's itself, as well as in archives and libraries in England, but equally it was his visits, holidays and pilgrimages abroad, many of which were made for the purposes of convalescence, which allowed him to conduct a systematic search for records pertinent to his topic. Early in 1904 he visited Paris, where he investigated the archives of Saint-Sulpice, and thereafter stayed at Milan and Athens before making for the Holy Land. Four years later he journeyed to Cologne, to Paris for a second time, and on to Valladolid (where he consulted the archives of the English College) and Switzerland. In 1910 he made archival visits to Rome and Dublin. He returned to Rome in 1913, to Switzerland and Italy in 1914, and one year later turned his attention to the archives of the English College at Lisbon while making an official visitation of that seminary of behalf of the Hierarchy.⁵

The first of the 'non-Edmundian' books was Catholic London A Century Ago, which appeared in 1905 and traced the history and development of Catholicism and its chief characters and sites in the capital at the turn on the nineteenth century. At the same time Ward made a transcript of the Diary of Bishop Douglass,⁶ the original of which had been temporarily mislaid by Canon Johnson, a member of the diocesan curia, when moving into the new Archbishop's House in Ambroseden Avenue, Westminster, in 1903.

Ward had a particular regard for Bishop Douglass, and in the course of his work entered into a protracted correspondence on both Douglass and Douai with Father Raymund Stanfield, whom Archbishop Bourne had appointed as his Diocesan Archivist. It was a great consolation to Ward that as President of St Edmund's he was able to arrange for the re-burial beneath the college chapel of the bodies of Douglass and others among the Vicars Apostolic of the London District.

Bernard Ward was also a major contributor to The Catholic Encyclopaedia, a remarkable work in fifteen volumes edited in the United States and published from New York and London between 1907 and 1912. The articles penned by Ward are in themselves works of original scholarship and reflect his keen desire for the pursuit of historical knowledge and truth, yet are flavoured by an older Catholic outlook and a love of the traditions of Penal Times.⁷ Among other contributors from England were Bishop Casartelli, Adrian Fortescue, the Benedictines Cuthbert Butler and Bede Camm, and the Jesuits Herbert Thurston and John Hungerford Pollen.

It has been noted that Ward produced his history of the chapel of St Edmund's College jointly with Edwin Burton. No account of Ward as an historian would be complete without recognition of the scholarly co-operation and personal friendship between the President of St Edmund's and his Vice President. Thirteen years his junior, Burton had been a lay student at the college during Ward's early years on the staff. He had then continued his education at Ushaw and, like Ward, had taken up secular employment – in Burton's case he studied law and was admitted as a solicitor in 1893. It was then that he applied for the priesthood and was sent by Cardinal Vaughan to the Central Seminary at Oscott in 1894. He was ordained four years later and was appointed to the staff at St Edmund's College, where he assumed the office of Vice President in 1902. Burton's own historical interests focused on the period immediately before that favoured by Ward, and it was with Ward's encouragement that he set about producing his two-volume biography of Bishop Challoner, published by Longmans in 1909 and dedicated to Ward. Indeed, it had been Ward who had accompanied Burton to Milton, Berkshire, in January 1907 to examine Challoner's burial place,⁸ and throughout the years of his research for the book it was Ward to whom he turned for advice. Ward had often communicated to Burton details of material on Challoner that he had discovered in the course of his own archival labours, as evidenced by the several dozen extant letters from Ward to Burton in the St Edmund's College Archives.⁹ It was a somewhat fitting recognition of this collaboration, therefore, that both men were elected as Fellows of the Royal Historical Society in 1907.¹⁰

It is the more remarkable that Ward (and indeed Burton) conducted such intensive research while performing so many other duties. Masie Ward admired her uncle's devotion to scholarship in the midst of the cares of a busy life in education: 'With the Ward capacity for work... he added to his college administration the collection of records of English Catholicism which became five large volumes.'¹¹ In the course of preparing his major work, the trilogy covering the period between 1781 and 1850, Ward '...read in the library of every house or college he visited and never went away without some spoils for the book. He was a fine historian, for he never took anything at its face value... His large volumes were balanced and documented to a point that set them at once in the first rank of original work... Bernard Ward, like Lingard, held that fairness was not a matter of faith but of facts.'¹²

It was for this reason that Ward was not afraid to return to the old controversies which formed so much a part of the story of English Catholicism in the period with which he was concerned. For example, he described the episcopate of Bishop Baines in the Western District as 'one tortured history of quarrels and disputes';¹³ and in the wake of Pugin's campaign for all things Gothic, Ward considered the gulf between 'Roman' and 'English' Catholics to have widened to the point where they were 'deeply and even bitterly opposed to one another on questions of far deeper moment than that of mere taste in ecclesiastical ornament.'¹⁴ In one passage in particular Ward allowed his own celebrated wit to enter his description of Pugin's extreme enthusiasm: 'He called out for Gothic shops and Gothic railway arches, as being the only lasting and suitable kind, and he drew a Gothic railway station to contrast with the then new arch-entrance to Euston. In his own house, all the furniture was Gothic, and he even designed Gothic moulds for the cook to use in making his puddings and jellies. He was not insensible to the humour of his actions, and on one occasion he wrote to a friend that his wife was about to present him with a Gothic baby.¹⁵

¹⁰ Burton also contributed articles to The Catholic Encyclopaedia. At least one book has been dedicated to Ward and Burton (and to all Edmundians), viz. D. Newton, Catholic London (London, 1950), which on p.216 acknowledges the debt owed to the two scholars by all Catholics for their research into the history of the capital.

Although very conscious of the need to preserve a sense of balance in his judgements, Ward never fought shy of offering critical appraisal when he believed it justified. This was true even in the case of such a revered figure as Cardinal Wiseman – after whom Bernard Nicholas Ward was named – on the question of Lingard and the cardinalate, and the consequent dispute with Canon Tierney.¹⁶ Indeed, one recent biographer of Wiseman has noted how indebted historians are to both Bernard Ward and his brother Wilfrid for their 'unsurpassed' and 'remarkably unbiased' books, even though it must be admitted that they were 'not entirely unaffected by their father's influence.'¹⁷ Nevertheless, Bernard Ward's own prejudices, if that is not too strong a word, may occasionally be detected, such as, for example, his disapproval and even dislike of Bishop Milner which he never hid, although such disapprobation did not prevent him from acquiring Milner's walking stick as a personal souvenir.¹⁸

The Dawn, The Eve and The Sequel

Bernard Ward's celebrated trilogy appeared in seven volumes between 1909 and 1915, published by Longmans in a style uniform with Burton's Challoner, and at once marked by and acclaimed for its use of original documents. Indeed, chronologically, Ward continued where Burton had finished, viz. in 1781. Having received particular encouragement from Bishop George Ambrose Burton of Clifton to research the history of the later Vicars Apostolic, Ward rescued the period from the death of Challoner to the Restoration of the Hierarchy from relative historical obscurity.

The Dawn of the Catholic Revival (2 volumes, 1909) was written within two years and considered the period between 1781 and 1803. Completed despite a prolific workload as President of St Edmund's, the book was very well received, although its author's modesty was such that he regretted his inability to devote as much time to the project as he felt was required.¹⁹ Archbishop Bourne expressed his approval and encouraged Ward to continue his labours, and the first two volumes of The Eve of Catholic Emancipation appeared in the closing weeks of 1911, followed by a third in 1912. In The Eve Ward took his narrative to the threshold of the Act of Emancipation in 1829 – a piece of legislation which, incidentally, he considered to have been of less significance in terms of granting Catholics religious liberties than the 1791 Relief Act. In support of this judgement he pointed to the rapid development of Catholicism in the period from 1791 to 1829, as opposed to a more moderate growth in the immediate aftermath of Emancipation itself.²⁰

Ward's dedication and skill as an historian notwithstanding, one should never lose sight of the encouragement and assistance given to him by prelates, scholars and archivists in the course of the preparation of his volumes. Bishop Burton and Archbishop Bourne have been mentioned, but there were others. For example, the records of the Archdiocese of Dublin were among the collections consulted by Ward while working on The Eve, and he acknowledged the interest shown in his work by Archbishop Walsh and his generosity in placing the diocesan archives at his disposal.²¹ Ward was also most grateful for the help offered by the Archivist of the Archdiocese of Dublin, Father Michael Curran, who was then in the process of re-arranging the collection. Curran read the chapters dealing with Ireland, and Ward was able to re-draft his treatment of the Veto question of 1807-1808 in the light of new archival evidence brought to his attention by Curran. In the same volume Ward also acknowledged the assistance of Father Pollen with material relating to the English Jesuits, and the help given by Albert Purdie, a student at St Edmund's College, in researching the history of the loss of the Douai funds following the French Revolution. Edwin Burton read the proofs and also offered comments and suggestions. The final part of the trilogy, The Sequel to Catholic Emancipation, considered the period from 1829 to 1850 and was published in two volumes in 1915.

Mention has been made of Ward's visit to the Dublin Archdiocesan Archives. Indeed, an important feature of the trilogy is the fact that the author exhibited a particular sensitivity towards the contribution of Ireland to the development of Catholicism in England. It was Denis Gwynn, writing at the time of the centenary of the Restoration of the Hierarchy, who noted this awareness of the part played by the Irish poor in the establishment of Catholic parish life in nineteenth-century England: 'Their achievements in this respect were remarkably recognised... by Bishop Bernard Ward, who had no recollection of the earlier phase [of Irish immigration] and whose instinctive sympathies were naturally repugnant to the Irish Catholics in England.'²² Ward paid tribute to the debt owed by English Catholics to their Irish co-religionists, '...without whose assistance in the time of struggle the modern development of Catholicity in this country would never have been possible.'²³ Moreover, Ward, who was very much the son of his Tractarian father, and who was writing at a time of growing tension in terms of the movement for Home Rule, considered the post-1846 phase of Irish immigration as having had a greater influence on English Catholicism than the Oxford Movement in terms of the expansion of missions and schools. The Eve was dedicated to the Catholics of Ireland.

Nevertheless, the process of research was not without its difficulties. In his preface to The Eve Ward made the following acknowledgements: 'The Archbishop of Westminster once kindly offered me the use of all the papers in his Archives, as did the Bishop of Clifton, and the other Bishops and heads of Colleges who had helped the former work [i.e. The Dawn] in this manner, repeated their kindness in the present instance. In addition to these, the Rector of the English College at Rome, Bishop Giles – who at the time of writing is believed to be the oldest living 'Edmundian' – threw open to me the most valuable collection of papers there, which include the greater part of the correspondence of the Agent of the English Bishops during the period under review; and by the kindness of Cardinal Gotti, I was enabled to take advantage of my visit to Rome to spend several days in the Archivium of Propaganda, which contains documents which were practically essential to the work in hand.'²⁴ But Ward's private correspondence, especially his letters to Edwin Burton, tell a different story. Ward invariably reported his scholarly findings to Burton. For the mostpart he met with co-operation from archivists and librarians. Thus, for example, in 1906 he informed his Vice President that there was a good deal of correspondence from Bishop Poynter among the Archives of the Bishop of Clifton,²⁵ and two years later, while working on material for The Eve, he remarked of his labours at the English College, Valladolid: 'My visit here will substantially improve my chapter on the English Colleges abroad.'²⁶ Likewise, in the spring of 1910, his visit to the Venerabile was successful: the place was practically empty but the Rector, Bishop Giles, had left him two volumes of archives 'which will I think occupy me several days.'²⁷ A few months later he reported to Burton from Dublin: 'There are an enormous number of papers to look through, but not so very many to copy... about 200 Milner letters... Archives arranged in bundles & usually inaccurately labelled: this lends the fascination of surprise.'²⁸ And in 1915, while acting as Apostolic Visitor to the English College in Lisbon, Ward took advantage of the opportunity to work on the archives: 'I have been very hard at work here, 9 a.m. till 9 p.m., but am on the whole satisfied with what I have done.'²⁹

But when it came to gaining access to various archives in Rome while working on The Sequel, Ward met with several obstacles. Essentially this was because the Vatican authorities were unwilling to allow scholars to consult more recent nineteenth-century material. Ward, who was somewhat restricted by a lack of fluency in Italian, was permitted access to some papers at Propaganda, but did not enjoy complete freedom. On a visit to Rome in 1913 he discovered that Cardinal Gotti would not read a letter of introduction from Cardinal Bourne requesting permission for Ward to consult the Vatican Archives. Ward was told that the collection must remain secret and that he was to make a list of the documents he wished to study. A typist would then copy the archival material if Cardinal Gotti considered it appropriate. 'Of course this is practically useless to me,'³⁰ Ward complained to Burton, regretting that he was thus unable to help his friend with documents for his own period of research. However, he met with greater success at the English College: 'The Rector has rummaged in his room and unearthed a large bundle of archives, some very important,' which necessitated Ward staying on for a few days in order to copy them; but when he enquired about the Propaganda Archives he was simply informed that there was a Russian priest somewhere in Rome who was reputed to possess a complete list of the contents, having spent fifty years working there. Ward was, understandably, quite exasperated by such a cloak-and-dagger approach to archives, and somewhat sarcastically remarked to Burton: '...if the priest is susceptible of bribes, we might get lists for your period.'³¹ Ward returned to England disappointed.

Conclusion

Much of Ward's research and writing took place during prolonged absences from St Edmund's College in the later years of his presidency, a period which he came to consider as the most difficult of his life. Turned down for the vacant see of Northampton in 1908, he entered a period of depression and self-imposed seclusion. His heart was no longer in his work at St Edmund's in the way it had been before, and in some respects his historical studies acted as a channel for his frustration and disappointment in other areas of his life. He resigned as President of St Edmund's in July 1916, convinced (correctly in fact) that there had been a move among some of the staff to remove him. However, in March 1917 he was named Ordinary of the new Diocese of Essex, which in July of that year was erected as the Diocese of Brentwood. He died suddenly in January 1920. Yet to the very end, whether it was as a disgruntled former President of St Edmund's College or as a fledgling bishop locked in a series of disputes with his Metropolitan, Cardinal Bourne, Bernard Ward always had an eye to the importance of archives, not only as a long-time user of such collections, but also as a creator thereof. Almost his last act before departing St Edmund's was to deposit in the college archives the diaries he had kept since 1890. Likewise, in his short episcopate at Brentwood he was meticulous in keeping copies of correspondence despatched as well as retaining letters and documents received. He also engaged Burton in the task of drawing up historical notes on the missions and clergy of Essex from Penal Times onwards to form the basis of a projected history of Catholicism in that county.³² As an historian and as a pastor Bernard Ward knew the value of archives and the importance of preserving the record of the past for future generations.³³

In Search of Valentine's Film Archive

Edward Walsh

Audio recordings, tapes, braille texts and films are just as important archive resources as documents and correspondence in paper format. Little has been written in this journal about film and sound archive resources. In 2009 an enormous archive of 16mm film of news bulletins from the 1960s and 1970s belonging to Associated Press was discovered – some 20,000 film cans containing 3,000 hours of footage had been forgotten, stored in tunnels under Goadge Street in central London. 'For film and documentary makers the archive allows them the chance to see unseen footage to illustrate moments in history rather than the same old shots, which are often repeated.'¹ Just prior to that discovery another cache of long-forgotten films was discovered by Kate Lees in the garage of her grandfather's house in Highgate, north London.² Lees' grandfather was the film maker Arthur Dent, who was also Sam Goldwyn's agent in the United Kingdom. Film buffs and cinema aficionados are familiar with the work of the great directors and producers – names such as Alfred Hitchcock, Cecil B. de Mille, John Ford, John Huston, Steven Spielberg, Luis Buñuel, Anthony Minghella and Guy Ritchie readily come to mind. These giants of the movie world have often been nominated for Oscars, Golden Globes and Baftas, and have won many prestigious awards. Their names are frequently to be seen on cinema billboards. But Valentine has long been forgotten, his name was never seen on any advertising hoarding nor ever appeared on any list of Oscar or Bafta nominees. He was unknown in the Hollywood and Pinewood studios. Yet as both a director and producer he was an innovative cinematographer.

My attention was drawn to this film maker by an article by Uaitear Mac Craith³ entitled 'Peig ar Video'⁴ in Nuacht Litir Fhionduireacht an

³ Uaitear Mac Craith is the Irish language nomenclature for Walter McGrath (1921-2006), a highly esteemed Irish Examiner journalist and historian.

Blascaoid,⁵ an obscure Irish language publication, being the newsletter of the Blasket Foundation. So who was Valentine? He was Father Ferdinand Valentine O.P. (1892-1968), born near Wigan and educated by the Jesuits at Mount St Mary's, Spinkhill, near Sheffield. He entered the Dominicans at Woodchester in 1912, was ordained in 1919, completed his studies at Louvain and returned to England in 1920. An influential preacher, he travelled widely in Britain giving retreats and missions. He was also a prolific author of books and articles, and today is perhaps best remembered for his biography of fellow Dominican, Father Vincent McNabb (1863-1943).⁶ However, it was the blind who were the object of his special care and attention when he took up the work of Father Bruno Walkley O.P. (1886-1945), founder of the Guild of St Cecilia, producing braille texts as well as making recordings and tapes.⁷

From some point in the 1930s Valentine began making films. Father Bede Bailey O.P. recalls that Valentine 'had a copy of Potemkin, and the means of showing it.'⁸ Valentine's views on film-making and Catholic involvement therein were set out in two articles. He was of the view that '...[T]he film medium must be used – like the printing press... a Catholic Film Library of substandard stock is already in the making. The library is destined primarily for use in Catholic schools, parish halls, and for the new style of film-lecture. The movement will grow. To feed this library it is proposed to found a Catholic Cine Society, as will be announced later in the Catholic press.'⁹ Valentine developed his thinking and in the light of the comments of Pope Pius XI in a letter to Canon Brohee, President of the Centre Catholique d'Action Cinematographique, dated 25 April 1934, observed that 'our present need is not Catholic films but films made by Catholics. We need Catholic film artists, Catholic scenario-writers, Catholic directors, producers, cameramen and critics. Catholics, in fine, who understand film and who are prepared to earn their livelihood in this medium.'¹⁰ He spoke of the formation of the Ichthys Film Company and the production of its first film Golgotha, and recommended amateurs to make films. After these two articles he appears to have kept silence. But there are clues as to his further film work: he made a total of eighteen films, of which only one is known to survive.

'Monks as Film Makers – Woodchester Dominicans' Lively Enterprise' is the title of an article from the magazine Today's Cinema: 'A film, partly in colour, and showing the life of the monks in the priory, has been made by the Dominicans of Woodchester, Glos. Father Ferdinand Valentine O.P. is a leading light of the enterprise. The monks have other films planned, including "The Dominican Mass" and "Holy Matrimony." They will show them at specially chartered performances.'¹¹ The Catholic Film Society was formed in 1934 with Valentine, Dom Wilfrid Upson (subsequently Abbot of Prinknash) and Father Francis Young of the Diocese of Southwark as the moving spirits. Bishop McNulty of Nottingham acted as Chairman of the C.F.S.¹² Valentine was an innovator and far ahead of his time, but he was also a most sensitive priest. He outlined his views in a letter to Father Martin Gillet O.P. (1875-1951), Master General of the Order of Preachers (1929-1946), dated 20 July 1937:

Forgive the liberty I appear to be taking in sending you a report on our activities and progress in regard to the 'Catholic Film Society' of England, which is under the direction of our Fathers. The movement has already received the approval and blessing of our Father Provincial, Reverend Father Delany O.P.,¹³ and of [Cardinal Hinsley] the Archbishop of Westminster. The Bishop of Nottingham, the Right Reverend John McNulty is our President. All that now remains (to complete our happiness), Very Reverend Father, is your own valued approval and blessing, which with all my heart I humbly request. Supported by your blessing, we hope that our work will be successful. As you see, all our affairs are in order, so that we may do much good in our land and become a powerful means of advancing the Catholic cause in England. Above all, our work is an attempt to fulfil, within the limits of our national circumstances, the ardent and wholehearted wish of our Holy Father, Pope Pius XI, that the film apostolate may progress.¹⁴ even the modest price of 1d per copy. Generous friends of Father Valentine therefore subsidised it. Archbishop Amigo of Southwark was advised by Valentine of this venture:

I am enclosing details regarding the new magazine, Catholic Film News, which is to be [published] on November 1st. This new publication has been formally approved by the Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster who contributes a foreword to the first number, and by His Eminence Cardinal MacRory.¹⁵ In the name of the Executive of the Catholic Film Society may I humbly ask you to bless this new venture and to give it your official approbation. We feel at this time that a positive lead should be given to enable Catholics in Great Britain and Ireland to choose good films, and that this can best be done by selecting a panel of Catholic film-viewers who will see and comment on each production for the benefit of those who wish to avoid the more dangerous films and to choose wholesome entertainment for themselves and their children. A word from your Grace would help our cause most potently and be of considerable help to priests. Catholics will in future be unable to say that they have not been given an opportunity of knowing what competent Catholic film-viewers think of films before they are released.¹⁶

With the advent of war in September 1939 the practical work of the C.F.S. ceased, although Catholic Film News reappeared in March 1940 after a year's suspension and continued under the most precarious financial and physical conditions. It was edited by Miss Dorothy Retchford and published from her flat in Fulham. The C.F.S. was re-established in 1945 and on Valentine's resignation Father John A.V. Burke was elected Honorary Secretary. It was decided to change the name of the organization to 'The Catholic Film Institute.' The C.F.I. was backed by the Bishops of England and Wales and received their commendation in letters Ad Clerum.¹⁷ However, despite episcopal support, the C.F.I. only survived until 1957. On 17 October of that year the Private Secretary to Bishop Cowderoy of Southwark quite abruptly advised Father Burke that: 'The Catholic Film Society is to cease from today's date and no further expenditure, of any nature whatever, is to be made. The Bishops wish you to wind up the Society in conjunction with the Bishop of Southwark. The Bishop has asked Monsignor D.P.Wall and myself to work with you to this end. On this condition their Lordships are prepared to make a grant to pay any debts of the Society to date.'¹⁸ Burke complied and did as requested, but finding himself between a rock and a hard place, he expressed his acute chagrin to Father Peter Strand, Assistant Private Secretary to Bishop Cowderoy. Writing from his home at 407 Beulah Hill, Norwood, London SE19, where he was Chaplain to the De La Salle Brothers at St Joseph's College, Beulah Hill, Burke was direct in what he had to say:

I feel that to protect myself I must write to let you know that newspaper people have been phoning me to ask for the 'story' behind the closing down of the Film Institute. It has percolated to Fleet Street, I imagine, as a result of letters which I have had to write to various film concerns cancelling arrangements with them. I have pointed out that there is 'no story' behind this closure apart from the fact that, as we were unable to pay our way, we have had to stop. But you know what these newspaper types are, and it is difficult to control their imaginations once they get an idea into their heads. I have fought them off as best I can, but they have referred to the recent Encyclical which asks for centres to be set up, and I have said that something may be done later on but that I can make no comment at the moment. I hope that there will not be anything silly in any of the papers, but I feel I have to say that it is a matter quite out of my control at the moment.¹⁹

By the time of his resignation as Secretary of the Catholic Film Institute in 1945 Valentine had made eighteen films,²⁰ the master copies of which were deposited for safekeeping in the Southwark Diocesan Archives. The titles are as follows: 1. Night Prayers; 2. Spirit of Holy Week; 3. Dominican Mass Parts I & II;²¹ 4. Mount Melleray; 5. Baptism; 6. Sunday (two copies); 7. Joan of Arc; 8. Morning Offering; 9. Back to the Land; 10. Eternal City Parts I & II; 11. Just for Today; 12. Bread of Life; 13. Mission Field

(two copies); 14. Tewkesbury Abbey; 15. Catholic Cambridge; 16. Unknown Ireland;²² 17. Catholic Canterbury; 18. Aran of the Saints Parts I & II. Sister Catherine Dunne of Our Lady's Convent of Mercy, Abingdon, advised the present writer: 'I enclose a list of films given to us by Fr Ferdinand Valentine O.P. [received from Bishop's House, St George's Road, London SE1, on 15 November 1959]. I am sorry I cannot say the condition in which the films are, as I understand they were in storage for quite a long time before Father gave them to us. I feel privileged and grateful for knowing Father Ferdinand for so many years – thirty-three in all. Unfortunately, he was very often misunderstood, being so much ahead of his time.'²³ Film no.16, originally entitled Unknown Ireland, is today referred to as Peig On Video and is the only one of Valentine's movies known to still exist. It seems to have been made some time between 1939 and 1941-1942 when Valentine travelled to the then very remote Basket Islands off Dunquin at the end of the Dingle peninsula, Co.Kerry. To journey there in those days was an amazing feat and there is no evidence to indicate that Valentine stayed with the Dominicans at Holy Cross Priory, Tralee, at any stage of his travels.²⁴

As noted above, 'Peig' is Peig Sayers (1873-1958) who lived on Great Basket for over forty years, was a fount of folklore and a noted storyteller. Her autobiography Peig, dictated to her son Michael, was edited by Maire Ni Chinneide and published in 1936. Today she is ranked with other literary greats of the island such as Maurice O'Sullivan, author of Twenty Years A-Growing, and Tomas O'Crohan, who wrote The Islander.²⁵ Sister Catherine came upon Ray Stagles' book The Basket Islands²⁶ and, courtesy of its Dublin-based publisher, contacted the author and presented him with Valentine's film. Ray Stagles takes up the story: 'I visited the Abingdon nunnery twice. First to collect the film, second to show them (a party of about 6 nuns) the video made from it by the Technical Department of Bulmershe College of Education, Reading... My own recollection of its contents is that they did not contain anything different from the several other 'documentaries' made at that time... My memory is that it was quite brittle, and 'my' technicians had to handle it very carefully when making the video.²⁷ Ray Stagles took both the new video and the old reel film to Dunquin and presented them to Ionad an Bhlascaoid Mhor (The Basket Centre).

But what happened to the other Valentine films given to Sister Catherine Dunne? Sister Catherine, born in Ireland in 1913, was baptized 'Mary Baptist Dunne', her second name taken from that of a paternal aunt who was a Sister of Mercy at Abingdon. Sister Catherine herself entered the same convent in 1930, made her final profession in 1937, and after training at Mount Pleasant College, Liverpool, spent many years as a teacher. She was regarded as an excellent archivist by her community and a fine historian who loved undertaking research. She died on 5 September 2006. An enquiry as to what happened to Father Valentine's films produced an unusual outcome. From Abingdon, Sister Monica Sheehy duly wrote to apologize 'for the delay in my response and sadly I have to tell you that there is nothing here pertaining to your request. I do know that Sister Catherine spent many hours/days/months sorting out her few possessions and well before she died, thus leaving us all wondering where your request ended up.'²⁸ The Irish film producer Breandan Feirtear used Valentine's Unknown Ireland in his own film Deireadh an Ail (Last of the Blood). This story is thus truly a tale of the unexpected, leaving an unsolved riddle as to the whereabouts of those uniquely valuable films and the beguiling hope that one day they may be found.²⁹ assessment of the state of his diocese and how he views its future, the bishop is asked to list any abuses of which he may be aware in matters of 'faith, observance of ritual, morality, administration of the sacraments, the preaching of the Word of God, or any other matter,' and he is invited to give the main reasons for such abuses and to suggest ways in which they might be rooted out.

There is one fairly full report, dated 1904, from Bishop Brindle and a very short one by the same bishop from 1908. Later reports are not being considered in this article. What follows is an examination of eight of the nine reports to which reference has been made, with comments on some of the items which have struck me as I have re-read them. Different items would no doubt have struck others.

The 1860 Report (Italian)

In view of the fact that Richard Roskell had been bishop for a little over six years when he submitted his Ad Limina report in March 1860, it is not surprising that it was relatively brief. He did not answer all the questions (e.g. no individual comments are given on priests serving in the diocese), and some questions he lumps together. It is the only one of his reports that I have been able to locate; and I am not convinced that there was in fact another one. He noted (Question 8) that the total population of Nottingham stood at c.100,000, of whom about 6,000 were Catholics (and of which about 500 were converts). In answer to Question 26 he gave the total number of Catholics in his diocese as approximately 23,000. The response to Question 27 reveals that there were 43 schools for the poor in which 2,450 pupils were educated. In the list of parishes (Question 8) the bishop noted that in Derby 580 girls were being educated in the schools adjacent to the church. He commented on this mission as follows:

The state of this mission, if one takes into account the zeal of the missionaries and the religious sisters [the Sisters of Mercy], the provision of worship and the number of children being educated in the schools leaves little to be desired.

In his reply to the same question Bishop Roskell also referred to Irish labourers, some of whom were seasonal, e.g. at Ashbourne, while others were more permanent, such as miners in the Chesterfield area. As to the number of Nottingham. In the reports I copied there are, with one exception, only answers. We had to guess the questions. Most of the time this was easy enough, but it was a great help when the late Robin Gard, Archivist of the Diocese of Hexham and Newcastle [and founding Editor of Catholic Archives] gave me a set of questions he had found. In later transcriptions I was able to insert the appropriate question before each answer.

The Historical Background to Ad Limina Visits

From the early days of the Church, Christians have come to Rome in order to visit the tombs of the Apostles Peter and Paul. Visits on the part of bishops, as successors of the Apostles, to the limina (i.e. 'thresholds', but we usually say 'tombs') of the Princes of the Apostles have been seen as a manifestation of the unity of the leaders of local churches or dioceses with the chief bishop, the Bishop of Rome (the Pope). In 597, the year in which St Augustine of Canterbury arrived in England at the behest of Pope St Gregory the Great, that same pontiff reminded one of his ambassadors of the ancient practice whereby the bishops of Sicily visited Rome every three years. He later determined that the visits should take place every five years. Over the centuries the form and content of these Ad Limina visits has varied but three elements have remained fairly constant, viz. the visit to the tombs of SS Peter and Paul, the meeting with the Pope and the report on the state of the individual diocese. This article will concern itself almost exclusively with the third of these elements.

The Ad Limina Reports

Canon 340 §1 of the 1918 Code of Canon Law states: 'Each bishop is bound every five years to provide the Supreme Pontiff with a report on the diocese entrusted to him in the form given by the Apostolic See.' Canon 399 §1 of the 1983 Code, in almost the same words, states that: 'Every five years the diocesan bishop is bound to submit to the Supreme Pontiff a report on the state of the diocese entrusted to him, in the form and at the time determined by the Apostolic See.' The format of the report has, not surprisingly, changed over the 160 years since the Restoration of the Hierarchy of England and Wales. During the First Vatican Council (1869-1870) some of the bishops expressed the wish that the questions asked in the report preparatory to the Ad Limina visit should be adapted to the needs of the Church in nineteenth-century society. To what extent this was done is not clear since the questions asked in all the reports from 1875 to 1908 seem to be fundamentally the same as those to which Bishop Roskell gave answers in 1860. The kind of questions asked varies with the mentality of the age, and this variety would provide an occasion for theological as well as historical reflection. There were certainly some modifications in the format of the Ad Limina reports in the early part of the twentieth century, as we know from the two reports submitted by Bishop Thomas Dunn (1916-1931) of which there are copies in the Nottingham Diocesan Archives. The most recent questionnaire is that published after the promulgation of the 1983 Code of Canon Law. Since both questionnaires are reproduced as appendices to this article, the reader can form an overall impression of the differences of outlook and emphasis behind the questions.

In the report submitted in 1860 by Bishop Roskell, the first seven questions deal with the name of the bishop, the size and location of his diocese and the ecclesiastical province to which it belongs. They ask about the cathedral and the episcopal residence, what faculties the bishop has from the Holy See, and what his sources of income are. In reply to Question 8, the bishop gives a list of all the missions in the diocese with a brief comment about each of them. In the next two questions he is required to state when a visitation of the diocese was made and when diocesan and provincial synods were held. Question 11 asks whether neighbouring bishops interfere with him in the running of his diocese! The following several questions concern the Chapter, the seminary, the status of the diocesan clergy – are they parish priests or simply ‘missionaries’? – and how and where the Blessed Sacrament is reserved. Then comes a question about parishes entrusted to religious orders. The number of Catholics in the diocese is the subject of the next question, and this is followed by several more about Catholic schools and religious education, the number of diocesan priests and the provision made for them. The priests had to be listed by country of origin and by name, with a brief comment to be made on each one. Interestingly, the 1860 report does not name individuals nor do the two reports submitted by Bishop Robert Brindle (1902-1915). It is also asked whether any of the priests had studied at the College of Propaganda Fide in Rome. Questions are asked about the regular clergy, the parishes or missions they serve, whether they have special faculties and, if so, whether these are shown to the bishop before being used. It is also asked if the religious priests render any other services to the diocese apart from the care of parishes and whether any women reside in their houses. Houses of female religious are listed next. Several questions are asked about legacies and other financial matters. Finally, before giving a general

The Diocese of Nottingham's Ad Limina Reports

Canon Anthony Dolan

Introduction

It was more or less by accident that I first became interested in Ad Limina or 'Quinquennial' reports. Not long after I was appointed Archivist of the Diocese of Nottingham, I came across copies (or drafts) of several of these reports that had been sent to Rome in connection with Ad Limina visits in the last quarter of the nineteenth century during the episcopate of Edward Gilpin Bagshawe, third Bishop of Nottingham (1874-1901). Some of these documents were beginning to deteriorate, so it seemed to me a good idea to transcribe them before they disintegrated beyond repair. After having copied out four or five reports, I began to realize how valuable was the material they contained: after all, these reports give factual information, at frequent if not always regular intervals, about various aspects of the life of the Church in a particular area together with the bishop's assessment, in particular and in general, of the state of his diocese. They should, therefore, be regarded as an invaluable primary source for historians. It was for this reason that I began to take an interest in the documents themselves. My next task was to try and find missing reports. From Bishop Bagshawe's diary we were able to learn when he went to Rome for his Ad Limina visits and when he submitted his preparatory reports.

To search for missing reports led me to Rome, where I was able to find a lot of relevant material in the Archives of the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples (previously known as the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith or Propaganda Fide). As England and Wales were under the jurisdiction of Propaganda Fide until 1908, it was the obvious place to look. I found these reports, the earliest of which is dated 1860, among the 'Scritture riferite nei Congressi' since they had been sent to this Congregation as part of the preparation for the Ad Limina visits. I was able to obtain copies of some further reports from the Congregation for Bishops. The Vatican Secret Archives provided me – at not inconsiderable expense – with a copy of the report for 1908. Copies of more recent reports, including that for the quinquennium ending in 2009, have been obtained from Bishop's House, diocesan priests (Question 30), the bishop noted that there were 38 in all. Of these 'only two' were French and the remainder belonged to the diocese. All of them were engaged in parish work and, on the whole, were maintained by the people they served. In the case of very poor missions with virtually no income, the bishop helped out as best he could. The concluding observations about the progress of the Catholic religion in the diocese (Question 54) are very revealing:

As regards the progress of religion in recent years, there is no doubt that it has been tremendous. This can be seen especially in the big industrial towns. Ten years ago the towns of Nottingham, Derby, Leicester and Glossop had only about half their present Catholic population. Six years ago, there was no mission in Chesterfield. Now this town has a beautiful church and a Catholic congregation of more than two thousand souls. In the last three years, the mission of Glossop, which had only one priest, has now been split into three separate missions. Two new churches have been built and four missionaries now exercise their ministry there. Religion makes progress wherever industry and [opportunity for] work is found; for the mostpart this stems from the influx of Catholics coming from Ireland and elsewhere. These form the basis of the congregation and make necessary the building of schools and churches. The exercise of [priestly] ministry and preaching of the Gospel consequent upon this results in conversions, and religion grows and flourishes. But in the older country missions and the small country towns where there is no industry or movement of population, it is very difficult for religion to make any progress. The most one can hope for in such missions is to preserve whatever shoots of religion exist there.

The 1875 Report (English)

This is the first of the six complete reports (there are several partial ones) by Bishop Bagshawe. The first four are in what may or may not be the final form since they have been seen only in the copies found in the Nottingham Diocesan Archives. It is not known to what extent they differ from the text that was eventually submitted to Propaganda, although presumably any differences between the two would have been insignificant. The remaining two reports have been transcribed from original documents in the Archives of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith. In answer to Question 9, Bagshawe pointed out that he had been consecrated for only six months and had not yet been able to make a canonical visitation of his diocese. However, he had made brief visits to 20 missions. He noted (Questions 22ff.) that there were 48 missions, of which six did not have their own pastor. His observations on a random selection of those missions are as follows:

Cathedral: Masses and services in the Cathedral, both on Sundays and on weekdays, are very well attended, as are those recently begun in the Kent Street Chapel, and the vernacular hymns and divine praises are sung with much spirit.

Newark, Nottinghamshire: The mission, owing very much to the ill-health of the incumbent, has not been well looked after.

Lincoln: The state of the congregation appears to be fairly satisfactory [~~but this sentence has been crossed out~~].

Louth, Lincolnshire: A considerable seasonal town... [it] is served by the Rev. H. Hall, who however, being over seventy years of age and very infirm, has asked to leave to retire.

Marple Bridge, Derbyshire: ...[S]erved by Rev. Fr. Luke of the Cistercian Order, an old man over seventy. The bishop saw him lately, and found him ill of a complaint judged to be incurable, and having received the last sacraments. He has just heard of his death.

Hathersage, Derbyshire: The Rector has been seriously unwell for some time and has recently been operated on for cataract, happily with success.

In this report, as in most of the others, a lot of detail is given about financial matters, e.g. the various funds. Questions 51 and 52 ask the bishop to list any abuses in various areas of Church life of which he may be aware, to give their causes and to suggest ways in which these abuses may be eradicated. Part of his reply is as follows:

The use of Gothic vestments, which appears to be contrary to the Synodical Decree & the mind of the Holy See, is general, and the bishop believes, universal, in the diocese. The bishop, in a decree in his first Diocesan Synod, has forbidden the introduction of any new ones in any church except those of the Roman usage, and is providing for the Cathedral [which was very ill-furnished] a complete set of the latter.

Bishop Bagshawe went on to say:

There is a great deficiency of clergy. Several priests have lately offered themselves from Ireland, and elsewhere. The bishop hopes that the Grammar School at Nottingham may be a first step towards the formation of a clergy taken from the diocese itself and trained under the eye of the bishop. [The Grammar School had recently been founded in Bishop's House].

In answer to Question 54, about whether the Catholic Faith had increased or diminished over roughly the last twenty years, Bagshawe replied that he believed '...that the state of Catholicism has much diminished in the country places and small towns of the diocese, and somewhat increased in some of the larger ones.' He concluded his report by stating that he had '...no further suggestions to make at present.' He had only been able to give his first impressions of the diocese and clergy 'upon an acquaintance of not more than six months', but felt sure, therefore, 'that many modifications and corrections will be found necessary in what he has already written.'

The 1879 Report (English)

In reply to Question 6 Bishop Bagshawe listed more or less the same faculties from the Holy See that he had listed in his previous report. However, he also noted that he had '...an authorisation from the Cardinal Prefect of Propaganda dated 4 January 1876, permitting him to make short journeys to London and other parts of England at his discretion without special leave from Rome each time.' Clearly the Roman authorities of that time were anxious to make sure that bishops did not stray from their posts: this question is no longer asked! Part of the answer to Question 7 about the bishop's sources of income is quite informative with reference to an inter-diocesan dispute that dragged on for a long time:

There is no Mensal Fund. The bishop believes that the diocese has a claim upon the Bishop of Northampton for a portion of a sum of £2,500 paid to the Vicar Apost[olic] of the Central District as his share of the Mensal Fund of the old Midland District of England when the Districts in England were multiplied. When the new Districts were again divided into dioceses, Lincolnshire was detached from the Central District and given to the Diocese of Nottingham. In respect of Lincolnshire a portion of the £2,500, say £800, has been long claimed from Northampton. The illness of the Bishop of Northampton has prevented his attending to the matter, but the Chapter of Northampton declines to entertain the claim on the ground that monies due to them from Birmingham have not yet been paid. The matter will be further investigated with the assistance of the Nottingham Chapter, and if need be, referred to the Holy See.

But things were not all bad since, in answer to Question 11, Bagshawe wrote: 'The bishop has in no way been hindered in the exercise of his jurisdiction by the neighbouring bishops.' After listing the individual missions and their respective distances from the cathedral city (Question 8) – an interesting question in itself – the bishop described his pattern of parish visitation:

During the first year the bishop was too much occupied to be able to make any canonical visitations, although he has visited informally nearly all the places in the diocese. During the last three years, however, a canonical visitation has been made of all the missions of the diocese, with the exception of two, which have quite recently been established. The bishop has visited canonically 30 missions himself, spending in nearly all of them 3 days. He has been obliged to commit the canonical visitation of 19 (including 5 in and close to Nottingham) to his Vicar General, partly because of an illness which lasted six months, partly because he preferred to visit more thoroughly rather than a greater number, and partly from the press of other engagements. He expects for the future to be able to complete the visitation of the whole diocese in person every three years, as prescribed in the First Synod of Westminster. Since his appointment the bishop has held confirmation in nearly all the missions, and has confirmed 3,537 persons, 1,659 males and 1,880 females. [NB. This does not add up, but that is what is written].

There was, at this time, no seminary in the diocese (Question 17), and the bishop stated that it did not require a supply of Church students sufficient for a seminary. He was clearly thinking ahead. He always tried to have two or three of his students at the Cathedral so that 'while each of them pursues their studies for a year or two, he [the bishop] may better learn their character, dispositions and abilities, and they may be trained in ecclesiastical duties and ceremonies.' By this time there were 51 separate missions in the diocese (Question 22), each having its own resident pastor. As in the 1875 report, Bagshawe went through the missions in some detail. In these accounts he shows his great concern for the social conditions of his flock, which have an impact upon their spiritual lives. This was to be one of the major aspects of Bishop Bagshawe's ministry – as Dr Graham Foster, Assistant Archivist of the Diocese of Nottingham, has demonstrated in his as-yet-unpublished doctoral thesis. Again, to take a selection of missions:

St Patrick, Nottingham: The congregation... numbers about 1,100 – many of them are good and fervent, but there is a large number of them who neglect their duties, and are very disedifying. These are chiefly among those who come and go from the large lodging-houses which are in that part of the town, a class very difficult to deal with. There are Confraternities of the Sacred Heart and of the Apostleship of Prayer, and of the Holy Family: also a Society of St Vincent of Paul and a Total Abstinence Society.

Hadfield, Derbyshire: with a total population of 2,693, has 550 Catholics... very poor and rough people.

Shepshed, Leicestershire: 462 Catholics, mostly English and converts.

Gainsborough, Lincolnshire: 8,635 inhabitants of whom 204 are Catholics... a great many conversions having been made. 219 children, as yet mostly Protestant, attend the two schools (one for infants) kept by the Sisters of Mercy.

It would be interesting to know how the bishop obtained such precise figures for the civil population. He gives them for almost every parish.

In answer to Question 30, there were 57 secular priests residing in the diocese. Of these, 24 were English, 20 were Irish and 13 were foreigners. Of the 57, five were retired due to age or infirmity. The diocese had nine ecclesiastical students (Question 35) of whom one was at Nottingham, two each were at Douai, Oscott and Lisbon, one at St Wilfrid's College, Cotton, Staffordshire and one at All Hallows, Dublin: 'They will all be ordained titulo Missionis after the usual preparation and theological examinations.' In addition to the secular or diocesan clergy, there were a number of priests and brothers belonging to religious orders (Questions 37-46) who, for the main part, worked on the missions: 'The Rosminians, Norbertines and Benedictines have not made any objections to the Bishop's exercise of pastoral authority in any respect.' There were, however, difficulties with the Jesuits and the Dominicans arising from different understandings of jurisdiction.' As with the previous reports, it is worthwhile quoting the bishop's summary (Questions 54-55):

The bishop has no statistics by which to judge of the progress made by the Catholic religion in the last 20 years. He believes however that it has on the whole considerably increased, but not so rapidly or so much as in some parts of England. A considerable increase however has taken place in the last few years in the number of priests, missions and schools. Within the last year from Easter 1878 to Easter 1879 converts and their children to the number of 496 were received into the Church. There is a vast number of towns and villages, some 1,620 in the diocese, where the Word of God is never preached. It is the bishop's desire to establish school/chapels and missions in as many places as possible, and to have missions preached occasionally elsewhere in hired buildings or in the open air: but the want of means to maintain priests, and pay the necessary expenses is the great hindrance. If some of the religious orders would undertake the task and bear the expense of giving such missions in the neglected towns and villages of England, much good might be done.

The 1885 Report (English)

This is the longest of Bishop Bagshawe's reports. It runs to 44 sides of foolscap in the original! We know from the bishop's diary that the report was submitted to Propaganda on 30 April 1885. In his previous report (1879) Bagshawe had spoken of his general plan of parish visitations (Question 9). In 1885 he described in detail the programme for each visitation:

The last visitation of the diocese was commenced by the bishop in August 1881, and was completed in the spring of 1884. All the missions existing in the diocese at its commencement, and some others, to the number of 56 in all, were visited by the bishop in person, and in the visitation the rules of the sacred canons were carefully observed. Generally speaking, one mission was visited each fortnight, and the order of the visitation was as follows: On Friday evening the bishop was solemnly received, discoursed to the people, and made the visitation of the tabernacle. On Saturday morning he visited the church, sacristy, presbytery and clergy, making enquiries and notes. On Saturday afternoon and evening he heard confessions. On Sunday morning the bishop gave a General Communion at his Mass, and afterwards assisted and preached at the last Mass. On the Sunday afternoon he heard confessions, and in the evening preached, confirmed and gave Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament. On Monday morning he again gave Holy Communion, and afterwards visited and catchesised the parish schools. Nearly everywhere the number of communions given was very large in proportion to the congregation. Five new missions, erected since the visitation commenced, have not been visited, being reserved for the commencement of the next visitation.

The seminary (Question 17ff.) was dealt with as follows: 'The bishop has not as yet a seminary properly constituted: but a certain commencement of one has been made at Our Lady and St Hugh's College, close to the Cathedral, where several ecclesiastical students reside.' He gave further information about the seminary in his comments about the Cathedral mission.

By this time there were 61 missions in the diocese, each with a resident priest. Every mission is described in some detail (Question 23), of which the following are a random sample:

Cathedral: There are established Confraternities of the Children of Mary, the Holy Family, the Sacred Heart, the Immaculate Heart of Mary and the Precious Blood. As well as these, there are Franciscan and Dominican Tertiaries... An upper-class school for girls, attended by 53 boarders, and day-scholars, is provided by the Sisters of Mercy, whose convent is adjacent to the Cathedral. They also keep a large school for girls and infants of the lower classes, attended by 240 scholars: also a House of Mercy for servants out of place. Within the limits of the Cathedral mission there are also two chapels, one a very beautiful and large chapel in the Convent of Mercy near the Cathedral: the other a chapel in the house of the Poor Sisters of Nazareth at Lenton. These Sisters have a large house and extensive grounds, and lodge and maintain 43 old men and women, and 37 destitute children.

St Joseph, Nottingham: The mission lies in the centre and to the east of the city... it has a congregation of about 1,400, almost all Irish. They have been much congregated in the centre of the town, and there is still much drinking among them, and many of them wholly neglect their duties. A great and consoling improvement has however been made among them by their zealous pastor, who has established a Total Abstinence League of the Cross, and hired large rooms for their meetings. [Here again one cannot fail to note Bishop Bagshawe's pastoral concern for his people].

St Augustine of England, Nottingham: ...has a congregation of about 500, a large part of which consists of English people, in fairly easy circumstances. On the whole they are good and devout Catholics, the church is well attended, and the mission promises well. The Confraternity of the Holy Ghost is established there.

St Mary's, Glossop, Derbyshire [founded in 1882]: ...there are about 1,300 Catholics. They are nearly all poor, but good and religious. They are principally engaged in cotton factories.

Hathersage, Derbyshire: The congregation numbers 140. It has much diminished, and is divided and on the whole not edifying. It is hoped that it is now in the way to improving, and a railway, which is to pass near the town, will probably give an impulse to Religion.

Holy Cross Priory, Leicester: [This] belongs to the Dominican Fathers, and has for many years had a mission attached to it. It has lately been erected into a priory, it being alleged to the bishop that in towns in which the Order had had priories before the Reformation, it was not necessary to obtain the consent of the Holy See in order to erect one now.

Eastwell, Leicestershire [situated 17 miles south-east of Nottingham, it was one of the smallest missions in the diocese with less than 30 Catholics and too small to keep a priest busy on a full-time basis]: There is no school, and hardly any Catholic children. The Rev. Charles Turner has the charge of Eastwell mission, the revenue of which maintains him. He resides from Saturday to Monday morning every week, but spends the rest of the week at the Cathedral, where he teaches the seminarists. The bishop thus gains the services of a professor, whom he could not otherwise maintain, and the priest's time is more usefully employed, and more beneficially for himself, than if he resided always in so small a place.

Sleaford, Lincolnshire: The mission has a very handsome school/chapel for 200 persons, an excellent new presbytery, and a site for a large church. The school/chapel was opened in 1883. The whole, with the furniture of house, church and school, has been provided for the mission by the energy of the Rev. Hermann Sabela, the priest of the mission, who has also formed a congregation of 144 Catholics in a town purely Protestant, in which he commenced preaching from a wagon in the open air. 50 children attend the school, of whom half are Catholics. Father Sabela has also purchased a large site for a future mission at Skegness, a town on the sea-coast of Lincolnshire, about 70 miles east from Nottingham, and of which he has the spiritual charge.

Stamford, Lincolnshire: although it had a good church, presbytery and school, was described as being 'a very bigoted place.'

Catholic education continued to be a matter of concern to Bishop Bagshawe, and he quoted various statistics (Question 27):

There are in the diocese 73 Poor Schools, of which 6 are for boys, 5 for girls, 15 for infants, and 47 are mixed schools. These are attended by 7,748 poor children, of whom 5,197 are Catholics and 2,551 are Protestants. The Protestant children, however (except 62, whose parents object), are regularly taught the Catholic Catechism and Christian doctrine, and learn and answer it as well and willingly as do the Catholics. There are three Catholic colleges for upper-class boys, and two other schools for the same, containing in all 337 pupils.

The bishop explained (Question 29) that some Catholic children were forced to go to non-Catholic schools (of which there could be as many as 2,000 in the diocese) since the law of the land required all children to attend school. In the majority of cases Catholic children attended non-Catholic schools because they lived too far away from a mission which had a Catholic school, although 'every effort has been made both to build schools and to induce children to attend them.'

In answer to Question 30, Bishop Bagshawe stated that there were 67 secular priests living in the diocese, 27 of whom were English, 30 Irish and 'ten are of other countries.' Six priests belonging in some way to the diocese did not currently reside in it. All these were then listed individually with a comment on each priest. There were 11 ecclesiastical students (Question 35), of whom one, a deacon, was at Oscott, another, a subdeacon, at Ushaw, with three students in Nottingham itself, two at Douai, two at Lisbon and one at All Hallows, Dublin. The list of houses of women religious (Question 47) includes, in each case, the names of the chaplain and of the confessor.

Financial matters are dealt with in some detail (Question 49ff.), and in reply to Question 55 Bagshawe noted that: 'Since the year 1875 there has been a considerable increase in the state of religion in the diocese.' He then gave comparative tables of statistics for 1875 and 1885, concluding:

There is great interest felt everywhere now in the Catholic faith, and there is no difficulty in collecting congregations to listen to Catholic teaching. The faith might be extended indefinitely, if there were sufficient money to open schools and chapels, and to maintain priests. Preaching of missions by the Regulars in places which never hear the Word of God would do much good, if they were able to find the time & the money necessary.

In a postscript he recorded that since 1875 he had confirmed 7,380 persons. The number of Catholics in the diocese he now estimated at 26,300, the number of Easter confessions for 1884 had been 14,410 (the number for 1885 had not been received) and the entire population of the diocese was about 1.5 million.

The 1890 Report (Latin)

Inevitably, a lot of what is contained in this report is a repetition of what was contained in previous ones. Answers to the questions about the size and physical characteristics of the diocese (Question 2), which ecclesiastical province it belongs to (Question 3), or whether it is a diocese or an archdiocese (Question 4) are thus likely to remain the same. Indeed, the boundaries of the Diocese of Nottingham have been altered only once, and this much later when the Diocese of Hallam was created in 1980. Moreover, in the 1890 report the answers to other questions, such as 'Does the bishop suffer any interference in the exercise of his jurisdiction on the part of neighbouring bishops?' (Question 11) or 'Do the canons [of the Cathedral Chapter] interfere in the running of the diocese or hamper the bishop in the free exercise of his jurisdiction?' (Question 16), tend to be the same each time: 'No'. Later, in Bishop Dunn's time, a different answer would be given to Question 16!

In 1890 Bishop Bagshawe noted that since 1887 he had visited the Cathedral, the Chapter and all the missions of the diocese (Question 9). On the occasion of a parish visitation he had also paid a visit to the houses of women religious within the parish. He had made a formal visitation of the principal houses except that of the Sisters of Providence in Loughborough, which came under the care of the Rosminian Fathers (the Institute of Charity), and he was adequately informed about the state of the other convents.

The bishop was able to report that he now had a seminary (Question 17). This was located in the College of Our Lady and St Hugh next to the Cathedral. In this same building there was also a boarding and day school for boys of the better class ('melioris conditionis'). Ten students were being trained in the seminary, two of whom were deacons and one a cleric. The remainder were not yet attached to the diocese. The course of studies comprised Dogmatic and Moral Theology, Philosophy, Canon Law, Church History, the writing of Latin and Gregorian chant.

By 1890 there were 56 missions in the diocese, each with a resident priest (Question 22ff.). Hucknall Torkard, Nottinghamshire, had a beautiful new church with a school and presbytery, all built in 1886-1887. The priest of this mission also served the chapel-of-ease of Our Lady at Bulwell, a suburb of Nottingham. There were about 310 Catholics in the mission, many of them coalminers. There were 78 Poor Schools in the diocese (Question 27) and 11 schools for children who were better-off ('ditiore'). Of the clergy belonging to the diocese, 59 resided within it, while a further 10 priests lived elsewhere: these are the true figures – the bishop gave a total of 58. Three ecclesiastical students were at the seminary in Nottingham (Question 35), with one at the Venerable English College, Rome, two at Lisbon and one at Valladolid. Two lay students – presumably ones who had not received the tonsure – were at Douai. At Nottingham there were a further six ecclesiastical students not yet attached to the diocese – presumably this again means that they had not been tonsured.

Once again, in answer to Question 49, much detail is given about financial matters, while under Question 35 the bishop gave statistics about marriages (the significance of which is not entirely clear to the present writer). As at the end of the 1885 report, Bishop Bagshawe gave comparative statistics, in this case for the years 1875 and 1890:

...[I]n the last fifteen years there has been a miraculous change of attitude of English people in the diocese and, indeed, throughout England. This has been especially so in the more recent times. Nowadays, most English people show goodwill towards and even interest ('studium') in Catholics, and they accept and even look for their participation in various public affairs. It seems to the bishop that this change of popular opinion offers great hopes of conversions in the future.

Finally, in answer to Question 55, he wrote:

If religion is to grow indefinitely, it will be necessary that the Word of God is preached everywhere and that more churches and schools are built. But the financial resources necessary for this are not available. It is to be hoped, however, that these will be supplied by those who come into the Church.

The 1895 Report (Latin)

In the space of the previous three years the bishop had visited the Cathedral, the Chapter, the seminary and all the missions together with their chapels-of-ease, as well as the convents of nuns (Question 9). There were only four students in the diocesan seminary since a number of them had recently been ordained and sent on the missions. Of the four, one was studying philosophy and the others theology and, since they were foreigners, English language (Question 17). There were 61 missions each with a resident priest (Question 22). There were 78 Poor Schools and 10 schools for the better-off children. The total number of pupils in these schools was 8,527, with about one third of these being non-Catholic (Question 27). There may have been as many as 2,000 non-Catholic schools in the diocese, with c.900 Catholic children attending them. This was partly because of the scarcity of Catholic schools and the distances pupils would have to travel in order to attend them: 'But some Catholics send their children to non-Catholic schools because, it seems to them, they receive a better or a cheaper education there' (Question 29).

Secular priests working in missions in the diocese numbered 68, with a further 8 leading private lives ('vitam privatam'). Here Bishop Bagshawe's figures do not add up since he states that of the 75 (sic.) priests, 42 are English, 19 Irish and 14 foreigners. There were about 41 priests belonging to religious orders (Question 30). There were eight clerics and seminarians: two at Nottingham (one of whom was a priest who had not yet completed his studies and another who was in minor orders); two at Douai; and one each at the Venerable English College, Rome, the English Colleges at Valladolid and Lisbon, and All Hallows, Dublin (Question 35). Question 40 always asked whether male religious had women residing in their houses as maidservants ('ancillae'). The answers vary. In the case of the Norbertines at Crowle and Spalding in Lincolnshire, the bishop knew that they used to have maids living in but did not know whether this was still the case.

In answer to Question 51, Bishop Bagshawe was unable to tell whether there were any abuses in the diocese beyond the common vices ('vitia ordinaria') and neglect of religious duties:

However, throughout England for as long as the bishop can remember, it has been the practice that nothing is said or taught about the positive laws of the Sacred Congregation of the Index, and that nothing – or virtually nothing – of these laws is observed. Although from time to time sermons are preached about the natural law in this matter, there is no mention of the positive laws.

Question 54 asked about the growth (or decline) of the Catholic Faith over the previous twenty years or so. Bagshawe noted that the general good will of the [English] people towards Catholicism had been wonderfully brought about by the extraordinary movement of the Puseyites and Ritualists. He concluded his answer to this question by giving comparative statistics for the years 1875 and 1895. It was his belief 'that it would be of the greatest benefit to the Catholic religion if the Catholic faith could be preached – in public places and in the open air – in the very many villages and towns which at present never hear the Word of God. In this task, members of the religious orders specially appointed for this task could render the greatest assistance' (Question 55).

Prefaced to this report are a couple of pages, signed by Bishop Bagshawe under the date 8 February 1898, giving comparative statistics for the years 1875 and 1898 together with a list of buildings which had been erected or rented, or land which had been acquired since the Ad Limina report of 1895. Thus, in the Cathedral mission 'a large parish hall has been built along with three smaller ones.' It is not clear what precisely is meant by this – a parish hall with one large room and three smaller ones, perhaps? At the new mission of St Peter, Leicester, 'a decent-sized piece of land for a school/chapel has been bought. For the time being, a good presbytery and two large rooms, the upper one of which has been set out as a church, have been leased.' At Lincoln additions had been made to the school buildings, and at Woodhall Spa, Lincolnshire, a large school/chapel had been built on a substantial piece of land which had been donated.

The visitation of the diocese begun in May 1895 had almost been completed. It had been carried out in accordance with Canon Law (Question 9). In the diocesan seminary there were eight students: viz. one recently-ordained priest; two deacons; one subdeacon; and four who were not yet subjects of the diocese. The subjects taught in the seminary comprised Dogmatic and Moral Theology, Ascetics, Sacred Scripture, Canon Law, Church History and Ecclesiastical Chant. The students familiarised themselves with Sacred Rubrics, Church services and the running of the sacristy in the nearby Cathedral (Question 17). There were 71 missions in the diocese with a resident priest (Question 22) and 74 Catholic elementary schools with a total of 9,010 pupils, of whom 6,183 were Catholic and 2,827 non-Catholic (Question 27). This time the figures do add up! There were 75 secular priests working in the diocese, of whom 62 were English or Irish and 13 were foreigners (Question 30). There were eleven ecclesiastical students: one each at All Hallows, Dublin, and at Douai; two at the English College, Valladolid; and the remainder at St Hugh's Seminary, Nottingham (Question 35). There were 31,000 Catholics in the diocese of whom 16,013 were noted as attending Sunday Mass – presumably this means on a particular Sunday (Question 52). But the expansion of the diocese was still beset by financial difficulties as well as a shortage of priests:

The bishop has not sufficient money to establish and build up more missions. Moreover, there are not enough preachers who could bring the faith to the 1,700 towns in the diocese. All the secular clergy are bound to the service of the churches from which they receive their support. The bishop would not be able to support other priests for this task, and there are no religious priests who could take it on.

The 1904 Report (Latin)

The first few pages of this report in the version obtained from the Archives of Propaganda Fide are somewhat confusing since, although headed 'Nottingham', two of them appear to relate to the Diocese of Salford! Leaving these aside, one page contains a letter dated 8 November 1904 which was written by Bishop Brindle to the Prefect of the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide. It relates to the sources of income ('redditus') and financial affairs in general in the Diocese of Nottingham. Brindle explained that when he was appointed in 1902, he found the finances of the diocese to be in a terrible mess; and although he had tried to sort them out, he disclaimed any responsibility for the state of affairs he had inherited. He regretted having to point this out, but he did not wish to be blamed for something that was not his fault. He referred to a statement of accounts which he enclosed. This has, clearly, at some point been detached from the Ad Limina report and will not be considered here.

Before coming to Nottingham in 1902, Bishop Brindle had spent most of his priestly life as a military chaplain of great distinction. He had then served for three years as an Auxiliary Bishop of Westminster. Thus, this was the first Ad Limina report he had had to compile, and one can almost sense a degree of frustration in his attempts to answer some of the questions asked of him. Thus, when Question 8 required him to 'list the towns and villages of the diocese and their respective distances from the cathedral city', he replied: 'I don't know how to answer this question. If, perhaps, what is being asked for is a list of the towns where there are missions, there follow the names and dedications of these missions.' Having listed the churches, the bishop gave the locations of 18 semi-public oratories in the diocese. Bishop Brindle stated that he had carried out a visitation of the diocese with the exception of a few oratories, and that he had done so, as far as he was able, in accordance with Canon Law (Question 9). He reported that there was no seminary in the diocese. One student currently at Bordeaux would be ordained at the end of 1904; one student was studying Philosophy at the Venerable English College, Rome; one was at Valladolid and two at Thurles. There were 13 other seminarians studying Humanities: ten at Lisbon; two in France and one at 'New' Douai. 'In this way,' Brindle wrote, 'we hope to train native clergy who will be given a sound basis in ecclesiastical discipline and virtue who will be equipped to work for the greater glory of God in everything' (Question 17). He also noted (Question 21) that missionary rectors were chosen by himself after consultation with the Chapter. This was the first time that a role other than a liturgical one had been mentioned with regard to this body.

Secular priests served 68 missions, of whom 25 were 'immovable.' This seems to mean that such priests had security of tenure rather like many clergy of the Church of England have 'freehold.' This presented the bishop with great difficulties in running the diocese because some of these 25 missionary rectors were unworthy and some were not up to the task and ministry required of them. However, the bishop was unable to do anything about them. The number of such missionary rectors was, moreover, totally inadequate for the number of missions (Question 22). Ten missions were served by religious orders (Question 24). In addition to the Cathedral, which had four priests, ten missions had a second priest in addition to the missionary rector (Question 25). There were six 'native' priests, by which term Bishop Brindle explained that he meant 'born in the diocese.' There were 45 from other parts of England, 17 from Ireland, one from France, six from Holland and three from Germany (Question 30). In answer to Question 31, Brindle, unlike Bagshawe, did not list all the priests individually, describing the character of each one together with the responsibilities they exercised and assessing their usefulness in the service of the Church. Instead he stated that they were all engaged in pastoral work (attached to missions), adding that: 'In truth, some of them are short on knowledge, short on piety and short on usefulness.'

The conclusions of the previous reports examined – the one by Bishop Roskell and the six by Bishop Bagshawe – were all very positive. That of Bishop Brindle seems, on the face of it, to be very negative, although I do not think it is entirely so. This is how he ends his report (Question 51):

In various places, and I say this sadly and reluctantly, many people have lapsed from the faith, others had neglected the sacraments, infants have been left unbaptised, and the faith was growing weak [Question 55]. All these evils have arisen from the life of and the example given by the priests. Some have been ordained without having done a theology course. Others, having been expelled from other dioceses, have been accepted here even without testimonial letters with the result that, in this diocese also, they have quickly given cause for astonishment and scandal. In my view, these evils are gradually dying away. Some of the priests I have referred to have died, others have left the diocese, and others, thank God, have improved their way of life. With the passage of time, with God's help, these things will be forgotten. I have already begun to apply a remedy, as I noted in number 17, by training young men as well as possible in colleges founded for clergy, where these young men may be able to learn thoroughly a way of life and conduct which is thoroughly ecclesiastical.

When Robert Brindle arrived in Nottingham in 1902 the diocese was financially, administratively and spiritually in a very bad state. Although his predecessor, Bishop Bagshawe, was a man of great faith, he lacked the administrative acumen of many of his contemporaries. Thus the new bishop was faced with a well-nigh impossible task, but he set his mind to it with great vigour – not an easy thing for a sixty-four-year-old former army chaplain. While recognizing the difficulties, as he did particularly in the concluding section of the 1904 report, Bishop Brindle nonetheless held out hope for the future. Like his predecessors and successors at Nottingham, Brindle was aware that he was continuing the mission given by Christ to the Apostles to preach the Good News to the ends of the earth; and he was aware that he was doing this in communion with the Successor of St Peter. As part of this mission, he was assessing the state of that portion of Christ's Church entrusted to his governance and pastoral care and reporting on it to the Chief Pastor, the Bishop of Rome. The more I have seen of the Ad Limina reports, the more I have become convinced of the value of these documents as an important source of material for those who wish to learn of the workings of God's grace in history.

Appendix A: Questions for the Ad Limina Report (19th Century)

1. State the Bishop's name, age and country of origin and – if he is a religious – the name of the Order/Institute to which he belongs.
2. State the size of the Diocese and describe its physical characteristics.
3. Give the name of the Province to which it belongs or the number of Provinces [this is a mistake for 'dioceses'] contained in it.
4. In the case of an Archdiocese, give the number and names of the Suffragan Dioceses. In the case of a Diocese, state of which Metropolitan See it is a Suffragan.
5. Is there a Cathedral and a residence for the Bishop?
6. Does the Bishop hold special faculties from the Holy See? Please list them.
7. Has the Bishop his own sources of income? Please describe them.
8. List the towns/villages of the Diocese and their respective distances from the Cathedral City.
9. When was the last Visitation of the Diocese performed? Was it done in accordance with the prescriptions of Canon Law?
10. When were the last Provincial and Diocesan Synods held?
11. Does the Bishop suffer any interference in the exercise of his jurisdiction on the part of neighbouring bishops?
12. Is there a Cathedral Chapter? How many Canons has it?
13. Are there any Prebends? If so, please give details.
14. What service do the Canons render to the Cathedral? Do they also act as parish priests in the various parishes of the Diocese?
15. Do the Canons reside in their parishes?
16. Do the Canons interfere in the running of the Diocese or hamper the Bishop in the free exercise of his jurisdiction?
17. Is there a seminary? If so, where is it situated? How many young men are trained there and what studies do they pursue?
18. Are the rules of the Council of Trent concerning seminaries observed?

19. Does the Diocese have 'parish priests' or are they simply 'missionary priests'?
20. Are the parish priests 'perpetual' or can they be removed at the will of the Bishop? Do they celebrate Mass pro populo on (Sundays and) feastdays?
21. Are the parish priests appointed by the Bishop?
22. How many parishes are there? Is the Blessed Sacrament reserved there, and with due reverence?
23. Do the parishes have fixed boundaries and their own churches? How many chapels are there in each of the parishes?
24. Are some parishes entrusted to the care of religious? Please list them.
25. Do the parish priests have other priests to help them in the care of souls?
26. Give the number of Catholics in each place together with a description of them.
27. Are there Catholic schools in the Diocese? How many are there?
28. Is Catholic doctrine free from error given in the vernacular, and to what extent is it not?
29. Are there non-Catholic schools in the Diocese? How many are there? Do Catholic pupils attend them? If so, how many?
30. Give the number of native-born priests (understood as English rather than natives of the Diocese) and of foreign priests.
31. List all the priests, giving their country of origin. Describe the character of each one together with the responsibilities they exercise, and assess their usefulness in the service of the Church.
32. Do any of the priests hold faculties from the Apostolic See? How are their material needs met?
33. Among the priests are there any [former] students of the Sacred Congregation of the Propagation of the Faith? If so, please list them and state whether they are fulfilling the tasks entrusted to them.
34. List the names and ages of priests residing outside the Diocese together with a description of their character. State where they are living and what they are doing. Do they have a particular obligation to serve their own Diocese?
35. Are there any Clerics [presumably a reference to those in Minor Orders]? If so, how many? How, and under what 'title', are they to be ordained? Where do they live? What is required of them before they can be promoted to Sacred Orders?
36. Are there missionaries belonging to Religious Orders? How many are there from each Order and to which region [viz. Province of the Order] do they belong?
37. Are certain parts of the Diocese allocated to particular Orders and by what authority?
38. Where do these religious live? To which superiors are they subject?
39. Do they have recognized religious houses or simply houses of residence? Is enclosure observed in them?
40. Do they live in community with regular observance?
41. What form of dress do they wear?
42. Are natives of the country admitted to the habit and to religious profession?
43. Do religious hold special faculties? If so, do they show these to the Bishop before they exercise them?
44. In what areas are religious dependent on the Bishop?
45. How are religious maintained? Do they receive any remuneration for administering the sacraments? What sort of reputation do they have?
46. Do they work in a useful way for the salvation of souls and for the advancement of religion?
47. Are there any houses of women religious in the Diocese? If so, to which Orders do they belong? By what authority were they founded? Who is responsible for ministering to them?
48. Do these women religious observe the common life? Are they bound by solemn vows of poverty, chastity and obedience and enclosure?
49. Are there any Pious Foundations or Pious Legacies in the Diocese? (N.B. These are technical terms for bequests or trusts for Masses or other purposes).

50. Are the revenues of these legacies administered correctly and the appropriate canons observed?
51. Please list any abuses which may have infected even Catholics with regard to matters of faith, observance of rites, morality, administration of the sacraments, the preaching of the Word of God or any other matter.
52. Give the main reasons for such abuses and suggest ways in which they might be rooted out.
53. Do marriages take place in accordance with Canon Law?
54. Has the condition of the Catholic Faith increased or decreased over roughly the last twenty years? Please give reasons.
55. Finally, the Bishop is asked to consider carefully the spiritual needs of Christianity [in his Diocese], to describe them in detail, to suggest appropriate ways of rooting out the errors of the past and of achieving the greater advancement of religion.

Appendix B: Questions for the Ad Limina Report (post-1983 Revision of the Code of Canon Law)

1. Pastoral and administrative organization of the Diocese.
2. Identity and general religious situation of the Diocese.
3. The ministry of the Diocesan Bishop.
4. Liturgical and sacramental life; the cult of the saints.
5. Catholic education.
6. Catechesis.
7. Life and ministry of the clergy.
8. Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life.
9. Missionary co-operation.
10. The laity.
11. Ecumenism.
12. Other religions.
13. Pastoral care of the family.
14. Evangelization of culture.
15. Social communications.
16. Social justice and the social teaching of the Church.
17. Christian charity and human development.
18. Health care.
19. Pastoral care of migrants and itinerants.
20. Artistic and historical patrimony of the Church (NB. this section would include a report on the Diocesan Archives).
21. Financial state of the Diocese.
22. Bishop's assessment; outlook for the future and summary.

EDITORIAL NOTE: Canon Anthony Dolan M.A., S.T.L. is Parish Priest of Grantham, Lincolnshire, Archivist of the Diocese of Nottingham and a former Chairman of the Catholic Archives Society.

Obituary: Father Geoffrey Holt S.J.

Father Geoffrey Holt, who died on 30 September aged 97, was an English Jesuit for a record 80 years and a notable historian of the Society of Jesus' province in this country. Most English Jesuit historians have restricted their research to the years of early recusancy, or non-compliance with the religion of state, starting in the late 16th century and continuing to the reign of King James I. Holt chose the comparatively neglected 18th century, about which he wrote with great sympathy and understanding. Specialising in the period leading up to the suppression of the order in 1773, he gave particular attention to what happened to individuals – how they fared, how some returned and why others did not. He wrote two books. William Strickland and the Suppressed Jesuits (1988) was about the administrator who minded their finances until the province was restored in 1803. The English Jesuits in the Age of Reason (1993) covered the way they worked in later Penal Times. Holt's keen curiosity in obscure Jesuits and those who assisted them also led him to write 18 entries in the Oxford Dictionary of National Biography and 55 in the Diccionario Histórico de la Compañía de Jesús. John Thorpe, the priest and letter-writer resident in Rome who conducted Catholics on the Grand Tour, was another subject of articles elsewhere.

Thomas Geoffrey Holt was born on 17 April 1912, the son of Arthur Holt, the Anglican town clerk at Hereford and Oxford, and his wife Mary Frances Wilding, who raised their sons as Catholics. Educated at Stonyhurst College, Lancashire, Geoffrey entered the Jesuit novitiate in 1930 at 18. He owed his vocation to a school retreat given by Father Martin D'Arcy, who made a lasting impression that was consolidated when Holt went up to Oxford in 1936 to read History at Lutyens' newly-built Campion Hall, where D'Arcy was Master. After completing his theological studies at Heythrop College, near Chipping Norton, Holt went on to teach briefly at the Jesuit preparatory school at Corby, Sunderland, followed by two years at Stonyhurst. Ordained priest in 1945, he taught for three years at Mount St Mary's College, Spinkhill, before returning to Stonyhurst where he remained for 16 years and became head of the history department. As a boy he had been taught by the writer Christopher Hollis, and later he himself taught the subject to Hollis' son, Crispian, the current Bishop of Portsmouth. During this time he edited the school magazine, where he published his first historical articles – models of accuracy that require little revision even today. This period deepened his love for the school, its history and traditions, and he continued to take a keen interest in its fortunes.

In 1966 Holt was appointed writer and assistant in the province's archives at the Jesuit curia at Mount Street in London, and 19 years later he was made archivist in succession to the late Father Francis Edwards. For 40 years Father Holt remained in London, publishing his books and articles but doing little pastoral work in Farm Street church beyond occasionally celebrating a public Mass and hearing confessions. Charming and fastidious in dress and appearance, Holt embodied the best of the Jesuit tradition. Without fanaticism he continued to celebrate privately the old Mass and say the unreformed Roman Office; he only concelebrated Mass once, at a family funeral. His architectural ideal was Wardour Chapel in Wiltshire, where he frequently celebrated Mass and was welcomed by the congregation. Reserved without being cold, he rarely expressed his private views, and it was only by the slightest nuance that he intimated disapproval. He was reticent about developments in the Church since the Second Vatican Council, his strongest comment being that the Netherlands had gone off the rails. With a dry but warm sense of humour he delighted in the foibles of his fellow Jesuits, past and present. Though, from 1974, he started travelling to lecture on history at St John's Seminary, Womersley, he never went abroad, even to Rome. A Fellow of the Society of Antiquaries and of the Royal Historical Society, Geoffrey Holt was a council member of the Catholic Record Society. His personal austerity was embodied in his tidy room, which was distempered white. It was furnished only with a bed, a chest of drawers, a table and chair, a wardrobe, a trunk, a crucifix and a portrait of St Thomas More. R.I.P.

BOOK REVIEWS

Paul Keane, The Martyr's Crown: Rome and the English Church, Oxford: Family Publications, 2009, pp.232. This book is a very well-written and illustrated account of the newly restored wall paintings in the Church of St Thomas of Canterbury at the Venerable English College, Rome. The original paintings dated from 1583 and were commissioned as an act of homage to the many former students of the College who suffered martyrdom (there were to be forty-four such martyrs from the Venerabile). The paintings, having suffered destruction in the wake of the Revolutionary period, were skilfully recreated from contemporary prints in 1883. The thirty-four images tell the story of the Church and its saints in England and Wales from the dawn of Christianity until the Reformation. The author, who is a Cambridge-trained historian and a priest of the Diocese of Brentwood, was ordained from the College in 2003. In fact, the restoration of the pictures was made possible by the generosity of the same benefactors who have made funds available for the College's recent archive project.

Leo Gooch, A Complete Pattern of Nobility: Lord John Lumley (c.1534-1609), University of Sunderland Press, 2009, pp. vi + 232. The author, whose name will be familiar to many as Honorary Secretary of the Catholic Record Society, is well known as an historian of Jacobitism and the Catholic North-East. His latest work is a biography of an Elizabethan Catholic nobleman, an ancestor of the present Earl of Scarborough, much associated with efforts to reverse the religious policy of the Crown. A supporter of the Queen of Scots, Lumley was connected to the rising of the Northern Earls and the Ridolfi Plot, but his principal claim to fame is as the key figure in the patronage of art in sixteenth-century England. The inventory of his portrait collection is a work of monumental importance. Leo Gooch has used a variety of sources, printed and manuscript, in the compilation of this book, and in particular has consulted archival collections at the National Portrait Gallery and Durham University.

Michael Questier (edit.), Stuart Dynastic Policy and Religious Politics 1621-1625, Cambridge University Press for the Royal Historical Society, 2009 (Camden 5th series, vol.34), pp.xx+427. In the latter years of Lumley's life, and in the period immediately after his death, the English throne was occupied by James I (VI of Scotland). Michael Questier, Professor of History at Queen Mary College, University of London, provides a masterly 130-page introduction to his erudite edition of the newsletters and reports written by English Catholics (both clerical and lay) from France, Flanders and Rome, as well as their native land. Their subject matter comprised analysis of James' foreign policy and attempts to guarantee the royal succession via the marriage of his son Charles Stuart to a daughter of a Catholic power, and the consequences of the subsequent failure to secure such a union with the Spanish branch of the House of Austria. The author's principal quarry has been the Archives of the Archbishop of Westminster (A Series, B Series and the Archives of the Old Brotherhood), but other sources include the Jesuit Provincial Archives in London, as well as the Society's Roman Archive, the British Library and the National Archives. From the point of view of Catholic historical scholarship, it is gratifying to see this publication in such a prestigious series as Camden.

Gabriel Glickman, The English Catholic Community 1688-1745, Woodbridge: Boydell Press, 2009, pp.ix+306. The Westminster Diocesan Archives are just one of many sources that have been utilized in this important study of English Catholicism in the period from the so-called Glorious Revolution to the failure of the attempt by Prince Charles Edward Stuart to regain his grandfather's throne. Although the first half of the eighteenth century was overshadowed by the Penal Laws and the Jacobite movements, Glickman's thesis is that English Catholics also exhibited many signs of a vibrant engagement with issues of national and European importance. He uses contemporary recusant literature and correspondence in order to examine areas such as education, scholarship, spirituality and domestic life. In addition to Westminster, where Father Ian Dickie is singled out for special praise, and likewise Andrew Nicoll at the Scottish Catholic Archives, the following repositories have been visited: Vatican Secret Archives; Royal Archives, Windsor; British Library; National Archives; Jesuit Provincial Archives, London; Downside Abbey; Douai Abbey; Ushaw College; Duke of Norfolk's Archives, Arundel Castle; Lambeth Palace Library; Bodleian Library; Tempest Family MSS, Leeds; University of Hull; and the County Record Offices of Lancashire, Warwickshire, Oxfordshire, Gloucestershire, Northumberland, Cambridgeshire and Suffolk.

The Throckmorton Papers in the Warwickshire Record Office were consulted by Gabriel Glickman. Now, Peter Marshall and Abbot Geoffrey Scott O.S.B. (President of the Catholic Archives Society) have edited Catholic Gentry in English Society: The Throckmortons of Coughton from Reformation to Emancipation, Farnham & Burlington VT, Ashgate, 2009, pp.vii+282. The Throckmorton Papers, held jointly by the Warwickshire Record Office and the Shakespeare Centre Library, Stratford-upon-Avon, form but one of the many repositories consulted by the contributors to this handsome volume which surveys the fortunes of this distinguished Midlands Catholic recusant family in nine chronologically-themed chapters. The book has been published to mark the 600th anniversary of the Throckmortons at Coughton Court, Warwickshire, which, together with Buckland in Berkshire, forms the chief setting of the study. Although space prevents an analysis of each chapter, readers will not be surprised to learn that Michael Hodgetts has contributed a characteristically scholarly and fascinating account of the role of Coughton at the time of the Gunpowder Plot. The Foreword has been written by none less than Professor David Starkey. Among the collections used by the contributors one may also mention material at Coughton, the National Archives, the British Library, the Berkshire Record Office, the Westminster Diocesan Archives and those of the Archdiocese of Birmingham.

Nicholas Schofield and Gerard Skinner, The English Vicars Apostolic 1688-1850, Oxford: Family Publications, 2009, pp.256. Fathers Schofield and Skinner, two priest-historians of the Archdiocese of Westminster – the former also being the Diocesan Archivist - are fast becoming the Ward and Burton of the twenty-first century. Their much acclaimed volume on the English cardinals has been followed by an equally well-researched and readable account of the Vicars Apostolic who, in the name of the Pope, governed the Catholic Church in England and Wales from the exile of James II to the Restoration of the Hierarchy in 1850 (the first Vicar Apostolic was appointed in 1625 but the book begins with the erection of the four vicariates in 1688). In a chronological narrative that proceeds per District, the careers of individual bishops are treated in succinct chapters. As well as meeting the 'big guns' (Giffard, Challoner, Milner, Baines etc.), one of the delights of this study is to introduce the lesser known bishops of the Penal Days. Moreover, in some of the chapters there are direct references to primary sources, notably the A and B series in the Westminster Diocesan Archives. An attractive and lavishly illustrated work – including a reproduction of the dog which saved the life of Bishop Benjamin Petre (of whom no known portrait exists) – this latest volume by Schofield and Skinner should find a welcome place on the bookshelves of Catholic archivists.

John T. Smith, 'A Victorian Class Conflict?': Schoolteaching and the Parson, Priest and Minister, 1837-1902, Brighton & Portland OR: Sussex Academic Press, 2009, pp. viii+ 233. This ground-breaking book examines the relationship between clergymen and schoolteachers in the Anglican, Nonconformist and Catholic traditions from the accession of Victoria to the 1902 Education Act. It is a cross-confessional study in that Dr Smith, who is Senior Lecturer in Education at the University of Hull and thus formerly a colleague of Professor Alan McClelland, draws upon both printed and archival sources in order to highlight the similarities and differences between the traditions under examination. Indeed, he has read and researched widely in his field, which is no mean achievement given the mass of evidence available, chiefly managers' minute books. Nevertheless, from an archival point of view, and judging from the primary sources listed in the bibliography, it is somewhat disappointing to note that the author appears to have found comparatively fewer documents from Catholic schools to be available in the public domain.

Pauline J. Shaw M.F.I.C., Elizabeth Hayes: Pioneer Franciscan Journalist, Leominster: Gracewing, 2009, pp.xx+320. Born on Guernsey in 1823, the subject of this study entered the Wantage Anglican Sisterhood in the wake of the Oxford Movement and in 1856 was received into the Catholic Church. Her reception took place by the Jesuits at Farm Street, her spiritual director was the future Cardinal Manning and at Bayswater, under Mother Mary Elizabeth Lockhart, she was one of the original group of what became the Missionary Franciscan Sisters of the Immaculate Conception. In addition to her missionary labours in Jamaica and the United States, Elizabeth Hayes' principal apostolate was that of the pen, and her chief work was to edit the Annals of Our Lady of the Angels, inaugurated in 1874. Sister Pauline Shaw, a Missionary Franciscan of the Immaculate Conception, has utilized her own congregation's archives in Rome, Australia and England (Braintree, Essex), as well as those of the Anglican Sisterhood of St Mary the Virgin, Wantage, the Franciscan mission at Santa Barbara, California, and the Franciscan Sisters in Glasgow and Little Falls, Minnesota. Elizabeth Hayes died in 1894 and remains an important figure in the development of Catholic journalism in the English-speaking world.

Tony Tinkel, Cardinal Newman's School: 150 Years of the Oratory School, Reading, London: Third Millennium, 2009, pp.176. The author, who is Archivist of the Oratory School, is well known to members of the Catholic Archives Society, especially in connection with the visit to Hildesheim in 2007, when his fluent German was most useful! The present work, which complements A Catholic Eton? - Paul Shrimpton's recent study of the foundation of the school in 1859 and the immediate aftermath - looks at the entire history of Newman's educational enterprise at Edgbaston, now happily esconced at Woodcote, near Reading, whence it transferred from Birmingham in 1942 via a twenty-year stay (1922-1942) at nearby Caversham Park. The book is lavishly illustrated and has a coffee-table appearance, but lacks nothing by way of scholarship. The author has busied himself in the Archives of the Oratory School, the Birmingham Oratory and those of the Duke of Norfolk at Arundel Castle. The Oratory School is one of only two surviving institutions established directly by Newman himself, the other being the Birmingham Oratory. In a year that promises to witness the beatification of J.H.N., this publication will find a central place on the shelves of his devotees.

Gilbert Thompson, From Bugbrooke to Brompton (published by the author: 3 Queen Anne's Gardens, London W4 1TU), 2008, pp. xii+74. It is the London Oratory at Brompton which features in the next work under review. The subject of this brief study is Herbert Harrison, a scion of the rectors and squires of Bugbrooke, Northamptonshire, and a maternal ancestor of the author, who is himself an Emeritus Professor of Medicine. Herbert Harrison, who was related to the Æ Becketts, another convert family, was received into the Catholic Church by Father Bowden of the London Oratory in 1861. Aged eighteen and still a pupil at Westminster School, his conversion was vehemently opposed by his father, the Reverend James Harwood Harrison (1799-1890). In fact the episode came to national prominence as Harrison senior attacked Father Faber and the Oratorians in the press. Herbert Harrison developed a close spiritual relationship with Faber (who died in 1863), became an Oratorian novice soon after his reception, was admitted as a full member of the community three years later and was ordained to the diaconate in 1866, thus entitling him to the designation 'Father'. However, he died in the following year without having been able to proceed to the priesthood. Harrison's father thereupon renewed his attack on the London Oratory, blaming its neglect of his son for the latter's premature death. The author has made use of the Archives of the London Oratory, especially volumes 19 (Faber's letters to Harrison) and 31 (Harrison's letters to the Duchess of Norfolk). There are also a number of illustrations reproduced from albums at Brompton.

Terry Tastard, Ronald Knox and English Catholicism, Leominster: Gracewing, 2009, pp.xii+215. A twentieth-century convert to the Catholic Faith who needs little introduction, Ronald Knox is engagingly and honestly portrayed by Father Terry Tastard, Parish Priest of Brook Green, Hammersmith, who manages to capture his subject's gifted though complex character. The focus of the book is on Knox's life within the context of English Catholicism in the early and mid-twentieth century. In this the author complements Evelyn Waugh's biography of Knox and other studies that consider Knox as apologist, spiritual writer etc. The archival sources are manv.

and include the following: BBC Written Archives Centre, Caversham Park, Reading; Evelyn Waugh Papers, British Library; Archives of the British Jesuit Province; Knox Papers, Mells Manor, Somerset; Sir Arnold Lunn & Douglass Woodruff Papers, Georgetown University Library; Harold Macmillan Papers, Bodleian Library, Oxford; Sheed & Ward Papers, Archives of the University of Notre Dame; and the Universities' Catholic Education Board Archives housed in the Westminster Diocesan Archives.

Michael Fisher, Hardman of Birmingham: Goldsmith and Glasspainter, Ashbourne: Landmark Publishing, 2008, pp.ix+177. The author, a non-stipendiary minister of the Church of England, is a leading authority on A.W.N. Pugin (1812-1852) and thus the ideal guide to the celebration of 170 years of the establishment of John Hardman and Company in Birmingham. John Hardman junior (1811-1867) became Pugin's closest friend and collaborator and the Hardman dynasty is known throughout the world for its metalwork and stained glass. The firm is still in business and its archives, on which there is a very useful appendix in the book, are currently divided between four principal repositories: Birmingham Museum & Art Gallery; Birmingham City Archives; Birmingham Archdiocesan Archives; and the Lightwoods House Collection, Hardman Studio, Birmingham. Among the many archivists mentioned in the acknowledgements are Miriam Power (Westminster Cathedral) and Sister Barbara Jeffery (Sisters of Mercy, Handsworth, Birmingham).

L.M. Bray, The Duchemin Family History, Ely: Lantern Tower, 2009, pp.xii+341. Staying in Birmingham, the present study examines the fortunes of another prominent Catholic family. Louis Duchemin (1776-1857) was an officer in Napoleon's navy who was captured in 1805 and ended up as a prisoner of war in England. He duly became a professor of languages in Birmingham. His son Charles Jean Duchemin (1826-1900) was a pianist, professor of music and a composer, and his son Charles (1886-1965) became a long-serving Rector of the Beda College, Rome. This book is thus an important contribution to the history of the latter institution, and indeed to that of the Venerable English College itself. Monsignor Charles Duchemin, as he became, was educated at the Oratory School, Edgbaston, Downside and Cotton College. Indeed, his godfather and relative, Canon John Hawksford, was both Rector of Oscott (1877-1880) and President of Cotton (1885-1897). A Cambridge graduate, Duchemin was ordained in 1914, having studied at the Beda, to which college he returned as Rector in 1928 after parochial work in the Dioceses of Northampton and Southwark. He remained at the Beda for thirty-three years, including its wartime evacuation to Upholland. He retired in 1961, the year in which the present Beda was opened near St Paul-without-the-Walls. As well as material at the Beda itself, the author has used papers located in the Birmingham Archdiocesan Archives, the Birmingham Oratory, the British Library, Downside Abbey Archives, and the Archives of the Little Company of Mary (Monsignor Duchemin retired to their convent at Harrow).

J.A. Hilton, The Artifice of Eternity: The Byzantine-Romanesque Revival in Catholic Lancashire, Wigan: North West Catholic History Society, 2008, pp.ix+177. Moving northwards, the author of this well-researched and illustrated book offers a guide to fifty-one churches in Lancashire, ranging from the Lutyens Crypt of the Metropolitan Cathedral, Liverpool, to chapels-of-ease. In an age of contraction for the Catholic Church in so many parts of Britain, it is important that there are also details provided of churches now closed and/or demolished, such as the former Norbertine Basilica of Corpus Christi, Miles Platting, Manchester. The N.W.C.H.S. is to be congratulated for publishing such an attractive volume, one which it may be hoped will inspire similar architectural gazeteers in other regions.

Jan Ward, The Leonard Stokes Directory: Architect in a Dressing Gown (published by the author: jan@leonardstokes.co.uk), 2009, pp.164. The prominent late Victorian and Edwardian architect Leonard Stokes (1858-1925) was the son of Scott Nasmyth Stokes, a convert of 1846 and the first Secretary of the Catholic Poor School Committee. Stokes was a prolific designer of churches, convents (especially Nazareth Houses), school buildings (notably at Downside), private houses, public buildings and telephone exchanges (he married the daughter of the General Manager of the National Telephone Company). This study is a labour of love from one who has engaged in a detailed investigation of all Stokes' known commissions, and it relies heavily upon archival material discovered by the author in a variety of repositories, a great many of them Catholic. To give an indication of some of the better known ecclesiastical buildings for which Leonard Stokes was responsible, wholly or in part, the following may be mentioned: Sacred Heart, Exeter; Nazareth Houses at Hammersmith, Southsea, Isleworth and Bexhill-on-Sea; St Joseph, Southampton; St Clare, Sefton Park, Liverpool; Our Lady Help of Christians, Folkestone; All Souls, Peterborough; Holy Ghost, Balham; All Saints Pastoral Centre, London Colney; Chigwell Convent Chapel; and the Catholic Cathedral at Georgetown, Guyana. The book is very well illustrated and also includes projects that never came to fruition, such as Stokes' designs for Liverpool Anglican Cathedral.

Jean Olwen Maynard, 150 Years of Mercy: A History of the Sisters of Mercy, Commercial Road, East London, (available from the Convent of Mercy, 88 Hardinge Street, London E1 OEB), 2009, pp.304. In 1853 Father William Kelly, a native of Co. Westmeath, assumed responsibility for the large East End mission of Commercial Road and three years later opened the Church of St Mary & St Michael. In 1859 he secured the services of the Sisters of Mercy from Tullamore, Co. Offaly, who made a foundation in Commercial Road. The author of this book is the widely published historian of East London's Catholic community, and in chronicling the story of the Convent of Mercy, its foundations and various apostolates (especially education) she complements her previous work on the Commercial Road parish itself. Her archival sources are many and include the following: the Convent of Mercy, Hardinge Street (now part of the Union of the Sisters of Mercy, whose archives were also consulted); the Westminster Diocesan Archives; the Annals of the Convent of Mercy, Tullamore; the National Archives (ED 21); London Metropolitan Archives (education); and the Tower Hamlets Archives. Indeed, her painstaking research in secular as well as Catholic repositories serves to make this book as much a study of East End life as well as its principal focus on the life and work of a religious community.

Marilyn Johnson and Stewart Foster, The Catholic Parish of St Margaret and All Saints, Canning Town, London E16: 1859-2009 (available from the Parish Office, 79 Barking Road, London E16 4HB), 2009, pp.101. Moving slightly further eastwards, in the same year that the Sisters of Mercy arrived in Commercial Road, a new mission was established (from Stratford) at Canning Town, a poor neighbourhood in the heart of London's burgeoning dock area. In 1897 the Franciscan Missionaries of Mary made a foundation in Canning Town, which survives to this day as St Margaret's Convent, Bethell Avenue. The present study, which focuses upon Canning Town as a district, the Catholic parish and its clergy, the convent and schools (and especially the evacuation of this much-blitzed part of the capital during the Second World War), is the fruit of co-operation between a local historian and the Archivist of the Diocese of Brentwood. As well as the Brentwood Diocesan Archives, those of the Archdiocese of Westminster, the Franciscan Missionaries of Mary and the London Borough of Newham have been used in order to piece together the history of a parish which at one time early in the twentieth century claimed to be responsible for educating more Catholic children than any other in London, and possibly in the country.

Moving from London's East End to the Hertfordshire-Essex border, Geoffrey Kinton provides a very informative and excellently referenced history of the foundation and development of another parish: Our Lady of the Immaculate Conception and St Joseph, Waltham Cross, 1860-2010, Edmonton: Spectrum Press, 2010, pp.x + 81 (available from the church: 204 High Street, Waltham Cross, Hertfordshire EN8 7DP). The moving force behind the establishment of this mission was the Oxford convert Father George Bampfield who, in addition to his unsuccessful attempts to bring the novelist Anthony Trollope (a resident of Waltham Cross) into the Catholic fold, is revered as the modern-day Apostle of Hertfordshire and North Middlesex. In addition to records held at the church itself, the author has used a number of archival collections in the course of his research, including those of the Westminster Diocesan Property Services Office, the Royal Institute of British Architects, the Daughters of the Cross of Liège (with acknowledgement given to their Archivist, Anselm Nye), the Catholic National Library and the Hertfordshire Record Office.

Yet another 150th anniversary publication is Changing Times, Changing Needs: A History of the Catholic Children's Society (Westminster) by Jim Hyland (available from the same Society at 73 St Charles' Square, London W10 6EJ), 2009, pp.108. The author, whose professional life was spent in child care, both Catholic and secular, has used the Westminster Diocesan Archives, the Brentwood Diocesan Archives and the archives of the Daughters of Charity of St Vincent de Paul to produce a readable and well-illustrated account of the Crusade of Rescue, since 1983 known as the Catholic Children's Society (Westminster). In many ways, however, this book chronicles not simply the story of the pioneers of Catholic children's services in the two dioceses (Westminster and, from 1917, Brentwood also), but offers a summary of social policy as it has affected orphans and children who came under the protection of the courts. Hyland treats in an honest but sensitive fashion controversial issues such as the child migrant schemes to Canada and Australia which were in operation from the end of the nineteenth century until after the Second World War. Likewise he gives credit to the clergy, religious and lay workers who sacrificed a great deal in order to provide a wide range of services to needy children and their families, an apostolate which continues to this day despite the many changes in society and legislation, not least the morally unacceptable nature of recent laws on adoption policy.

Emma Rix, Josephine Ronan and Marian Ruston (edits.), A Child of St Bernard's is Known Everywhere: A Centenary History, 1910-2010, Southend-on-Sea: Desert Island Books, 2009, pp.224. The School Sisters of Notre Dame from Germany opened a convent and school at Westcliff-on-Sea (Southend, Essex) in 1875. Thirty-five years later the Bernadine Cistercians from Slough took over the school and renamed it 'St Bernard's.' The Bernardines withdrew from Westcliff in 1983 but the school continues to flourish, the trusteeship having been transferred to the Diocese of Brentwood in 1990. This publication has been compiled by two history teachers currently on the staff and a school secretary, two of the authors being 'old girls' (others among whom include the actresses Helen Mirren, Gemma Creaven and Anne Stallybrass). Being the work of those engaged in education, the book is structured in such a way that readers of all ages may use it with profit, especially in the way that the editors manage to weave national and international events into the story of the school. A number of archival sources have been used: St Bernard's School and the Bernardine Cistercian Archives; Southend-on-Sea Museum and Archives; Brentwood Diocesan Archives; and a very wide selection of short memoirs contributed by past pupils, members of staff, governors etc. The illustrations, in terms of both quantity and quality, are to be commended.

Brian Hilton, The Vatican Pimpernel: The Wartime Exploits of Monsignor Hugh O'Flaherty, Wilton, Cork: Collins Press, 2008, pp.xii+212. The subject of this fascinating book was made famous by the actor Gregory Peck in the film The Scarlet and the Black (1983). Monsignor Hugh O'Flaherty (1898-1963), a Kerryman born in Co.Cork, was a student at Propaganda Fide (1921-1925) bound for service as a priest in Cape Town, South Africa. In fact he spent most of the rest of his life in the Vatican. Ordained in 1925, he became Vice Rector of Propaganda and then, while attached to the Holy See's diplomatic service, he was, during the Second World War, the lynchpin of a clandestine organization in Rome which successfully hid and protected Allied prisoners of war and others (including Jews escaping from Nazi genocide). This study uses archival material held by the Irish Department of Foreign Affairs and the papers of Michael MacWhite (Minister at the Irish Legation in wartime Rome), now kept in the Archives Section of the James Joyce Library, University College Dublin. The author also visited the National Archives at Kew to consult the papers of the British Organization for assisting Allied POWs in Rome. Monsignor Charles Burns receives a special acknowledgement from Brian Hilton.

The Catholic Archives Society Conference, 2009

The Society's 2009 Annual Conference took place at Ushaw College, Durham, from 18 to 20 May. The theme of the gathering was very much slanted towards the archival heritage of Catholic institutions in Britain and Ireland within their European contexts.

The first speaker was Abbot Geoffrey Scott, President of the Catholic Archives Society, who spoke on the English Benedictine material to be found in the Archives du Nord, Lille – one of the venues visited as part of the Society's trip to Douai in Northern France in 2001. The second paper was given by Dr Simon Johnson, who considered the digitisation of the Archives of the English College, Lisbon, which collection is now held at Ushaw. He also gave a description of the Lisbon Library which forms part of the deposit.

Abbot Michael John Zielinski, Vice President of the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church had prepared a presentation entitled 'Ecclesiastical Archives and the Memory of God's People' (reproduced in the current edition of Catholic Archives). Owing to his having been recalled to Rome immediately before the conference, this paper was read by Margaret Harcourt Williams.

Iris Jones, Archivist of the Venerable English College, Rome, delivered a stimulating account and an 'up-date' of her work at what is the oldest British institution abroad. Readers of this journal will recall a recent series of articles on the Archive Project at the Venerabile (see also the first book review above). Finally, Andrew Gray, Archivist at Durham University Library, spoke about on-line catalogues and digital imaging. The conference also hosted the Annual General Meeting of the Catholic Archives Society as well as the customary Open Forum.

Full accounts of the papers given at the conference may be found in the Catholic Archives Society's Bulletin (no.33, December 2009), where the reports of the Officers of the Society at the A.G.M. and the topics raised at the Open Forum are also reported in detail. The Annual Conference of the Society for 2010 will be held at High Leigh Conference Centre, Hoddesdon, Hertfordshire, from 24-26 May, taking as its theme 'Back to Basics.'

Editorial Notes

This — the 31st issue of the Journal of the Catholic Archives Society — is my first as its editor. I am delighted to have been asked to take over the baton from Fr Stewart Foster who edited the Journal for fifteen years. If I can run with it as he did I will have achieved much, and no doubt the readership will remain more than satisfied. The articles in this issue are nicely topical: Paul Shaw especially, and Br James Hodkinson, SJ, both speak of John Henry Newman, whose beatification we have celebrated less than a year ago. Fr Nicholas Paxton's contribution on the early stages of the liturgical revival in an English diocese is most appropriate as we await the introduction of the new Roman Missal. Mgr Gordon Read's paper, read at last year's Conference and reproduced in this current volume, is a timely reminder that archives are the treasures of the Church's memory and thus a vital component in the 'New Evangelization' — which Pope Benedict has recently instigated. Dr John Davies's article on parish logbooks is a perfect example of how we might go into the archival memory store in order to help the teaching of history. He touches upon an important issue. The closure and amalgamation of parishes has signalled a critical moment for the ensured safekeeping of parochial records and archives. What for years may have been ignored and forgotten — yet at least 'safe and sound' in the keeping of individual parishes — now stand in danger of being lost or destroyed. There is need of a greater awareness and of a general policy applicable at parish, diocesan and national level which will ensure that these and other 'treasures' will be carefully preserved. The outcome of the now immanent closure of Ushaw College, and the way its unique and valuable library, archives and artefacts are to be disposed of, will no doubt be indicative of the extent and depth of the value and importance currently invested in the treasures of the Church's memory. Mgr Read's paper is therefore of wide and critical importance. Finally, the article by Fr Peter Philips on 'The Papers of Canon John Francis McHugh' — who taught at Ushaw for many years — signals a further effort to make more widely known the archives of yet another English Catholic scholar. Such articles will be a regular feature I hope in future editions of the Journal. If I may end this brief editorial note with a request for things to be included in future volumes: firstly, for notices/reviews of local studies of Catholic interest; and secondly, for the notification and a description of any papers or archival collections recently deposited into diocesan and other Catholic archives.

Access to Archives in Civil and Canon Law

Mgr Gordon Read

Introduction

'In the mind of the Church, archives are places of memory of the Christian community and storehouses of culture for the new evangelization. Thus they themselves are a cultural good of primary importance whose special merit lies in recording the path followed by the Church through the centuries in the various contexts which constitute her very structure. As places of memory archives must systematically gather all the data making up the articulated history of the Church community so that what has been done, the results obtained, including omissions and errors, may be properly evaluated.'¹

'Church archives while preserving the unique and spontaneous documentation produced by persons and events, cultivate the memory of the life of the Church and manifest the sense of Tradition. In fact, the information stored in archive collections enables the reconstruction of the daily occurrences involved in the evangelization and education to the Christian lifestyle. They represent a primary source for writing the history of the multiple expressions of religious life and Christian charity. The will on the part of the community of faithful and, in particular, of Church institutions to gather from apostolic times onwards the witnesses of faith and cultivate their memory expresses the oneness and the continuity of the Church. The venerated recollection of what was said and done by Jesus, by the first Christian community, by martyrs and Church Fathers, by the expansion of Christianity in the world, is sufficient motive to praise the Lord and thank Him for the "great deeds" which have inspired His people. Thus in the mens of the Church, a chronological memory carries with it a spiritual reading of events in the context of the eventum salutis and imposes the urgency of conversion in order to reach ut unum sint.'²

For the Church archives have a spiritual and pastoral role. Preservation and access are at the service of this wider role. These roles justify the resources spent on archives from the point of view of the Church's mission and should also shape policies concerning both preservation and access. Documents and artefacts are preserved in order to be available for study and to serve the needs of the Church, not simply as a legal requirement or desire to squirrel things away.

General Principles

The term 'archive' covers many different types of material and storage. It refers to material of historical interest, but also to current working files. These comprise not only traditional paper based documents, but also electronic records of varying kinds, and materials such as microfilm or microfiche. They include photographic records and items of historical interest or cultural and religious value. They include not just Diocesan archives but those of parishes, religious communities and other institutions within a diocese. Some but not all of these bodies are subject directly to the oversight of the Bishop in this field. For others diocesan guidelines and policies provide a useful model.

'One should underline the primary responsibility of the particular churches in terms of their own historical memory. Accordingly, the Code of Canon Law specifically charges the diocesan bishop, and consequently his equivalent according to can.381.2, to have careful care that "archive records and documents of cathedral, collegial, parochial, and other churches that are present on his territory be adequately conserved" (canon 491-§1). To this must be added the duty to establish within the diocese "a diocesan historical archive and to see that documents of historical value be carefully kept there and be systematically organized" (canon 491-§2). The diocesan bishop must, in addition, according to can. 491-§3, provide such an archive collection with specific regulations, which may ensure its correct function in relation to its specific goals.

The correct organization of the diocesan historical archive can set an example to other Church entities and organizations present in the territory. More specifically it can constitute a useful paradigm for institutions of consecrated life and societies of apostolic life, where there is often an abundant archival deposit, so that the latter institutions' historical archives can be established following similar criteria.'¹

Church and State

At times there can be a tension between civil and canon law. This is not just a question of safeguarding ownership or discrepancy between particular regulations. It can indicate different perspectives on the role of such archives. The state can see them from a purely civil and historical point of view. Equally the Church can see them as purely private property and resist civil regulation as a form of trespass; this is not how the Circular Letter sees things.

'In many nations there is already an advanced policy for the cultural heritage currently in place, established through specific laws, regulations, agreements with private entities, and concrete projects. In her relationship with nations, the Church stresses the pastoral aims of her cultural goods and their persistent up-to-date role in obtaining these aims. This position does not exclude but rather renders more vital the use of the documents gathered in a specific territory and of a certain cultural conjunction to the advantage of both the Church and civil communities.

Such attention on the part of the political community involves the cultural heritage belonging to official Church bodies in various ways. We often encounter mutual agreements drafted in order to favour the harmonization of specific actions. In fact, there is a widespread belief that historical archives of ecclesiastical entities are also part of the national heritage, even if they remain autonomous. In this sense, norms must be guaranteed and promoted by which their ownership, nature, and origin should be respected. In addition, initiatives aimed at making known the action carried out by the Church in a certain political community through archival documents should be favoured and supported.

Regarding the political community it is the duty of the diocesan bishops and all those responsible for Church archives to maintain an attitude of respect for the laws in force in the various countries, keeping in mind the conditions foreseen in can. 22 of the Code of Canon Law. It is also desirable that the particular churches work in collaboration with the political community on the basis of the proper agreements drawn up by the Apostolic See or by its express mandate.¹ Moreover the document strongly encourages common guidelines for the Episcopal Conference:

'Such interaction between competent Church and civil authorities urges national and regional Episcopal Conferences to promote a common orientation in the particular churches in order to better co-ordinate the actions taken in favour of historical-cultural goods and more specifically archives, with due respect for the legislative power proper to the diocesan bishop by divine right (canons 381, 375-§1, 455-§4).

It is therefore considered suitable:

- to reaffirm the respect that the Church has always shown towards cultures, even classical non-Christian ones, of which it has preserved and handed down many written documents, often saving them from total oblivion;
- to stimulate the belief that the care and appreciation of archives assumes an important cultural importance and can have a profound pastoral significance as well as become an efficient instrument of dialogue with contemporary society;

- to preserve in archives the acts established and all that which can help make better known the concrete life of the Church community;
- to encourage the drafting of diaries where the principle local events of the individual Church entities are recorded in order to provide a valid point of reference for the daily documents which are gathered in archives;
- to have particular care in gathering (also with the help of new technologies) documents on those religious traditions and ecclesial initiatives which are dying out in order to perpetuate their historical memory;
- to converge on common practical guidelines the effort of the particular churches concerning the methodology followed for the arrangement, appraisal, protection, use of the documents in the archive collection;
- to study the possibility and the way to recover archives which have been confiscated in the past, often as a result of complex historical circumstances, and dispersed in other locations, by drawing up agreements of restitution or by using computerized reproductive means (microfilms, optical discs, etc), especially when they contain documents concerning the history of the Church community;
- to remind each administrator of Church goods of their responsibility regarding the protection of material documents in accordance to the canonical guidelines set forth;
- to encourage archivists in their responsibility to protect the collection by promoting adequate up-to-date training programs, inviting them to take part in national associations competent in this field and by organizing seminars and congresses for a better understanding of the problems involved in the appraisal and management of Church archives;
- to reawaken in pastors and in all those responsible for the juridical persons subject to the diocesan Bishops a greater sensitivity towards the archives under their care so that they might contribute a stronger effort in properly collecting, ordering, and appreciating this type of material.
- to encourage efforts to see that 'parish registers be correctly inscribed and duly safeguarded...' (canons 555 §3 & 535)¹

General Principles of Access

The Circular Letter sets out some general principles on the beneficiaries of Church archives and access to them in Section Four: 'The Appreciation of the Patrimony of Documents in the Historical Culture and the Mission of the Church'

'The documentation contained in archives constitutes a heritage that is preserved in order to be transmitted and utilized. Its consultation allows an historical reconstruction of a specific particular church and the society in which it operates. In this sense the papers of memory are a living cultural good because they are offered for the training of the Church and civil community and handed down for generations to come. Therefore it becomes our duty to protect them carefully.'¹

4.1 The Universal Destination of the Archival Patrimony

'Archives, as part of the cultural heritage, should be offered primarily at the service of the community that has produced them. But in time they assume a universal destination because they become the heritage of all of humanity. The material stored can not be, in fact, precluded to those who can take advantage of it in order to know more about the history of the Christian people, their religious, civil, cultural and social deeds.

Those responsible must make sure that the use of Church archives be facilitated further, that is not only to those interested who have the right to access but also to a larger range of researchers, without prejudice towards their religious or ideological backgrounds, following the best of Church tradition yet while respecting the appropriate norms of protection offered by universal law as well as the regulations of the diocesan bishop. Such an attitude of disinterested openness, kind welcome, and competent service must be taken into careful consideration so that the historical memory of the Church may be offered to the entire society.'²

4.2 On Regulations Concerning Archives

'Given the universal interest which archives must arouse, it would be desirable that individual regulations be made known publicly and that norms be harmonized with state or civil ones as much as possible. This would serve to underline the common service which archives in general are destined to give. Besides the rules and regulations concerning the diocesan archives, it would be wise to establish common guidelines also concerning the use of parish archives in respect of the canonical norms, as well for other archives, in order to avoid mistakes in the recording process of data or in the gathering of documents. This type of co-ordination can favour an eventual computerization of data within one's diocese in order to obtain some statistical information regarding the entire pastoral activity of a certain particular church. It would also be wise to co-ordinate these rules and regulations also with the archive collections of other Church entities, especially those of institutes of consecrated life and societies of apostolic life while respecting their legitimate autonomies.

However, it would also be desirable that limits be placed on the consultation of personal files and other documents whose nature make them confidential or are retained so by bishops (canon 491-§3). We are not referring to the bishop's secret archive, as explicitly described in canons 489-490 of the Canon Law Code, but to the Church archive in general. In this respect, some archival methodologies suggest that confidential papers be well marked in the inventories and catalogues which are made accessible to researchers.¹

Freedom of Information Act (2005)

The Church is not a public body from the point of view of the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), but consideration of how this act is applied in relation to the Data Protection Act may be helpful. The guidance provided by the FOIA is that requests for information should be blind to both the identity of the applicant and their motivation. There are, however, exemptions, e.g. where this would conflict with Data Protection principles concerning third parties, or other exceptions, e.g. vexatious requests. The FOIA and the EIR (Environmental Information Regulation) apply to information held by public authorities. They do not have to create new information to respond to requests. A public authority is not creating new information where:

- it presents information it holds in the form of a list or schedule;
- compiling an answer to a request involves simple manual manipulation of information held in files; or,
- it extracts information from an electronic database by searching it in the form of a query.

What do the Act and the Regulations say?

Section 1 FOIA states that any person making a request for information is entitled to be told whether the public authority holds the information requested and, if held, to be provided with it. Section 84 FOIA defines information for these purposes as information recorded in any form. Section 11 FOIA requires a public authority to provide information.

When it comes to personal information about deceased persons the exemptions under the Act no longer apply. The exemption for personal information (section 40) only applies to living individuals. This exemption cannot be used for information about someone who has died. However, the exemption may still apply if the information in question is also personal information about another identifiable living person. Requests for information about a person's own data are exempt and cross referred to the Data Protection Act, even when the information also refers to third parties.

Data Protection Act (1998)

Introduction

This is a lengthy and complex piece of legislation, amending previous legislation on this subject. It did not enter into effect immediately. Initially only electronically stored data were covered, but as of 24 October 2001, the Act applies also to manual files. This includes both files in the traditional sense, and also card indexes, registers and similar ways of retaining records. Each Diocese and Religious Order must be registered with the Data Protection Commissioner. The responsibility ultimately falls on the Diocesan Trustees. Legal advice has been sought on this subject on behalf of the Bishops of England and Wales, and also from the Data Protection Commissioner. The response of the latter has been totally non-committal on the matters raised. Legal advice is that, in general the Data Protection Act applies as much to the Church as anyone else. However, certain categories of data may be covered by various exemptions contained in the Act. The full text is available at: www.hmso.gov.uk/acts/acts1998/80029--a.htm

Meaning of the Act

Data means information which is being or intended to be processed by automatic equipment, or which is part of a filing system, or forms an accessible record. A Data Subject is any living person who can be identified from the data, or additional information likely to come into the possession of the processor. Processing means any kind of organisation, adaptation, retrieval, consultation, disclosure, or even destruction of the information. Sensitive personal data includes information on religious beliefs, physical or mental health, sexual life, allegations of any offence or proceedings relating to such an allegation.

Right of Access to Personal Data

The Data Controller (i.e. on behalf of the Diocesan Trustees) must inform the data subject whether he is processing any personal data, stating its nature, the purpose for which it is being processed, and to whom it may be shown, the content of the data and its source. However this obligation arises only on the receipt of a written request and the appropriate fee. He is not obliged to comply with the request if this involves disclosing information about someone else without that person's consent. This information must be supplied within forty days of application. If necessary the applicant can seek a court order. The data subject may also require the processor to cease processing such data if this is likely to cause substantial damage or distress. If the processor does not intend to comply, he must give reasons, and again the matter can be taken to court. Note that the court may order the obliteration, amending or destruction of data, or where it is an accurate record of information received, order a supplementary statement of the true facts to be added.

Exemptions

Personal data processed for certain purposes are exempt from the first principle of the Act (see below). This includes: the prevention of crime, apprehension and prosecution of offenders, protecting the public against dishonesty, malpractice or improper conduct, or incompetence on the part of persons authorised to carry on any profession or other activity, protecting charities against misconduct or mismanagement. Data may also be processed for statistical or historical research, in which case it may be kept indefinitely. Information which is of its nature public is likewise exempt (e.g. sacramental registers). Personal data are exempt from non-disclosure provisions when this is required in connection with legal proceedings, or to establish, exercise or defend legal rights.

The Eight Data Protection Principles

1. Personal data shall be processed fairly and lawfully and, in particular, shall not be processed unless-
 - (a) at least one of the conditions in Schedule 2 is met, and
 - (b) in the case of sensitive personal data, at least one of the conditions in Schedule 3 is also met
2. Personal data shall be obtained only for one or more specified and lawful purposes, and shall not be further processed in any manner incompatible with that purpose or those purposes.
3. Personal data shall be adequate, relevant and not excessive in relation to the purpose or purposes for which they are processed.
4. Personal data shall be accurate and, where necessary, kept up to date.
5. Personal data processed for any purpose shall not be kept for longer than is necessary for that purpose or those purposes.
6. Personal data shall be processed in accordance with the rights of data subjects under this Act.
7. Appropriate technical and organisational measures shall be taken against accidental loss or destruction of, or damage to, personal data.

Data Protection Act and the Church

Unfortunately only court cases will establish the extent to which there is any incompatibility between civil and canon law in this area. However, in my view the likelihood of such conflict has been overstated, and can be minimised where the Church acts in accordance with its own laws. For example, in marriage nullity cases both parties already have the right to inspect the acts of the case and make comments to correct anything that appears erroneous. It seems likely that the actual processing of such data would be covered by the exemptions in the act. A potential area of difficulty might be the transmission of a case to the Holy See. If the Church is entitled to hold the data in the first place, it is likely to be entitled to process it in other ways.

Data protection good practice note: checklist for handling requests for personal information (subject access requests)

(This guidance aims to assist small and medium sized organisations that receive requests for information covered by the Data Protection Act 1998 (the Act)).

Individuals have a right under the Act to make a request in writing for a copy of the information you hold about them on computer and in some manual filing systems. This is called a subject access request. They are also entitled to be given a description of the information, what you use it for, who you might pass it on to, and any information you have about the source of the information. Organisations have been dealing with requests from individuals for many years, certainly well before there was a formal right of access. Where you are happy to provide the information requested it often makes sense to do so as part of your normal course of business, rather than treating any written request for personal information as a formal request under the Act. At other times you will need to consider the request in the light of the specific provisions of the Act. This simple checklist should help you deal with subject access requests.

1. Is this a subject access request?

Determine whether the person's request will be treated as a routine enquiry or as a subject access request. Any written enquiry that asks for information you hold about the person making the request can be construed as a subject access request, but in many cases there will be no need to treat it as such. If you would usually deal with the request in the normal course of business, do so. Examples of such requests might be:

- 'I've lost the guarantee number for my fridge. Can you tell me what it is please?'
- 'How many cash withdrawals did I make from my account last month?'

The following are likely to be treated as formal subject access requests.

- 'Please send me a copy of my staff records.'
- 'I have a right to see all the invoices issued to me for the last three years. Please send copies to me.'
- 'I am a solicitor acting on behalf of my client and request a copy of his medical records. An appropriate authority is enclosed.'

If you are in any doubt how to respond, go back to the individual or their representative and clarify the situation. Train your staff so they are able to recognise subject access requests when they receive them and know what to do.

No Handle the query as part of your normal course of business.

Yes Go to 2.

2. Do you have enough information to be sure of the requester's identity?

Often you will have no reason to doubt a person's identity. For example, if a person with whom you have regular contact sends a letter from their known address it may be safe to assume that they are who they say they are.

No If you have good cause to doubt the requester's identity you can ask them to provide any evidence you reasonably need to confirm it. For example, you may ask for a piece of information held in your records that the person would be expected to know, such as membership details, or a witnessed copy of their signature. Once satisfied, go to 3.

Yes Go to 3.

3. Do you need any other information to find the records they want?

No Go to 4.

Yes You will need to ask the individual promptly for any other information you reasonably need to find the records they want. You might want to ask them to narrow down their request. For example, if you keep all your customers' information on one computer system and your suppliers' information on another, you could ask what relationship they had with you. Or, you could ask when they had dealings with you. However, they do have the right to ask for everything you have about them and this could mean a very wide search. You have 40 calendar days to respond to a subject access request after receiving any further information you need and any fee you decide to charge. Go to 4.

4. Are you going to charge a fee?

No Go to 5.

Yes If you need a fee you must ask the individual promptly for one. The maximum you can charge is £10 unless medical or education records are involved. The 40 calendar days in which you must respond starts when you have received the fee and all necessary information to help you find the records. Go to 5.

5. Do you hold any information about the person?

No If you hold no personal information at all about the individual you must tell them this.

Yes Go to 6.

6. Will the information be changed between receiving the request and sending the response?

No Go to 7.

Yes You can still make routine amendments and deletions to personal information after receiving a request. However, you must not make any changes to the records as a result of receiving the request, even if you find inaccurate or embarrassing information on the record. Go to 7.

7. Does it include any information about other people?

No Go to 8.

Yes You will not have to supply the information unless the other people mentioned have given their consent, or it is reasonable to supply the information without their consent. Even when the other person's information should not be disclosed, you should still supply as much as possible by editing the references to other people.

Go to 8.

8. Are you obliged to supply the information?

There may be circumstances in which you are not obliged to supply certain information. Some of the most important exemptions apply to:

- crime prevention and detection;
- negotiations with the requester;
- management forecasts;
- confidential references given by you (but not ones given to you);
- information used for research, historical or statistical purposes; and
- information covered by legal professional privilege.

No If all the information you hold about the requester is exempt, then you can reply stating that you do not hold any of their personal information that you are required to reveal.

Yes Go to 9.

9. Does it include any complex terms or codes?

The information may include abbreviations or technical terms that the individual will not understand, for example, '02' means a monthly account, '03' means 'paying on receipt of goods' and so on.

No Go to 10.

Yes You must make sure that these are explained so the information can be understood. Go to 10.

10. Prepare the response

A copy of the information should be supplied in a permanent form except where the individual agrees or where it is impossible or would involve undue effort. This could include very significant cost or time taken to provide the information in hard copy form. An alternative would be to allow the individual to view the information on screen. You have 40 calendar days to comply with the request starting from when you receive all the information necessary to deal with the request and any fee that is required. Individuals can complain to the ICO or apply to a court if you do not respond within this time limit.

Protection technical guidance note: dealing with subject access requests involving other people's information

This technical guidance note replaces the previous guidance on this subject ('Subject Access Rights and Third Party Information') published in March 2000. It deals with the potential conflict between an individual's right of access and a third party individual's rights to privacy or confidentiality, which can arise when dealing with a subject access request. In particular, this guidance sets out the main factors you need to consider when you receive a subject access request which involves information which relates to other individuals as well as the individual making the request.

Legal framework

Section 7(1) of the Data Protection Act 1998 (the Act) gives individuals the right to access their personal data. By making a written request and paying a fee, an individual is entitled to see (among other things):

- the information which is the personal data;
- any information available to the data controller about the source of the data.

Responding to such subject access requests may involve providing information relating to another individual (a 'third party individual'). For instance, if the requested information is a personnel file on an employee, it may contain information identifying managers or colleagues who have contributed to (or are discussed in) that file. This may lead to a conflict between the requesting employee's right of access and the third party's rights over their own personal information.

Section 7(4) of the Act provides that if you cannot comply with the request without disclosing information relating to another individual who can be identified from that information, then you do not have to comply with the request unless:

- the third party has consented to the disclosure; or
- it is reasonable in all the circumstances to comply with the request without the consent of the third party individual.

To help you decide whether to disclose information relating to a third party individual, follow this three-step process.

Step 1 Does the request require the disclosure of information which identifies a third party individual?

Section 7(4) of the Act is only relevant if information about a third party individual is necessarily part of the information which the requesting individual is entitled to. You should consider whether it is possible to comply with the request without revealing information which relates to and identifies a third party individual. In doing so, you should not only take into account the information you are disclosing, but also any information which you reasonably believe the person making the request may have, or get hold of, that may identify the third party individual. For instance, in the personnel file example discussed earlier, even if the third party individual is only referred to by their job title then it is likely they will still be identifiable based on information already known to the employee making the request. As your obligation is to provide information rather than documents, you may delete names or edit documents if the third party information does not form part of the requested information. However, if it is not possible to separate the third party information from that requested and still comply with the request, you need to take account of the considerations in section 7(4).

Step 2 Has the third party individual consented?

The practical effect of section 7(4) and associated provisions of the Act is that the clearest grounds for disclosing the information is to get the third party individual's consent. However, there is no obligation to try to get consent. There will be some circumstances where it will clearly be reasonable to disclose without trying to get consent, for example, where the information concerned will be known to the requesting individual anyway. Indeed it may not always be appropriate to try to get consent (for instance, if to do so would inevitably involve a disclosure of personal data about the requesting individual to the third party individual).

If the third party individual has consented, you would be obliged to comply with the subject access request and disclose all the relevant information, including that relating to the third party individual. However, in practice, it may be difficult to get consent. The third party may be difficult to find, they may refuse to give consent, or it may be impractical or costly to try to get their consent in the first place. In these situations, you would then need to consider whether it was 'reasonable in all the circumstances' to disclose the information anyway (section 7(4) (b)).

Step 3 Would it be reasonable in all the circumstances to disclose without consent?

Section 7(6) of the Act provides a non-exhaustive list of factors to be taken into account when deciding what would be 'reasonable in all the circumstances'. These are:

- any duty of confidentiality owed to the third party individual;
- any steps you have taken to try to get the consent of the third party individual;
- whether the third party individual is capable of giving consent; and
- any express refusal of consent by the third party individual.

We would expect you to be able to justify and keep a record of your course of action and reasoning, including, for example, why you chose not to try to get consent or why it was not appropriate to try to do so in the circumstances.

Confidentiality

Another factor to be considered in assessing how reasonable a disclosure would be is whether a duty of confidence exists for the third party information. This would arise where information which is not generally available to the public (that is, genuinely 'confidential' information) has been disclosed to you with the expectation that it will remain confidential. This expectation might result from the relationship between the parties. For instance, the following relationships would generally carry with them a duty of confidence in relation to information disclosed.

- Medical (doctor/patient)
- Employment (employer/employee)
- Legal (solicitor/client)
- Financial (bank/customer)
- Caring (counsellor/client)

However, you should not always assume confidentiality. For instance, just because a letter is marked 'confidential', a duty of confidence does not necessarily arise (although this marking may indicate an expectation of confidence). It may be that the information in such a letter is widely available elsewhere (and so it does not have the 'necessary quality of confidence'), or there may be other factors, such as the public interest, which mean that an obligation of confidence does not arise. However, in most cases where a clear duty of confidence does exist, it will usually be reasonable to withhold third party information unless you have the consent of the third party individual to disclose it.

Information generally known by the individual making the request

If the third party information has previously been provided to the individual making the request, is already known by them, or is generally available to the public, it will be more likely to be reasonable for you to disclose that information. It follows that third party information relating to a member of staff (acting in the course of their duties), who is well known to the individual making the request through their previous dealings, would be more likely to be disclosed than information relating to an otherwise anonymous private individual.

Similarly, where the third party individual is the source of the information held about the person making the request, there may be a strong case for their identification if the person needs to correct some damaging inaccuracy. However, it will always depend on the circumstances of the case and in the Durant v Financial Services Authority case ([2003] EWCA Civ 1746), the Court of Appeal decided it would be legitimate for the Financial Services Authority (the data controller) to withhold the name of one of its employees who did not consent to disclosing the requested information because Mr Durant (who made the request) had abused them on the telephone.

Information relating to certain professionals

There is separate legislation relating to access to education records, health records and social services records (see note 1). In practice this means that if the third party individual is an education, health or social services professional, information relating to them can be disclosed.

Circumstances relating to the individual making the request

These will also be relevant in assessing how reasonable it is to disclose third party information – in particular, how critical access to the third party information is in preserving the privacy rights of the individual making the request. This approach reflects the judgement in the Gaskin case. In this case, the individual, who had been in local authority care for most of his childhood, wanted to see the local authority records relating to him as they were the only coherent record of his early childhood and formative years. The court held that the local authority had to weigh the public interest in preserving confidentiality against the individual's right to access information about his life, even where consent to release the information had been withheld.

Disclose or withhold?

If you have not got the consent of the third party individual and you are not satisfied that it would be reasonable in all the circumstances to disclose the third party information, then you should withhold it. However, further to section 7(5) of the Act, you are obliged to communicate as much of the information requested as you can without disclosing the identity of the third party individual. So, disclosing the information with any third party information edited or deleted may be the best way to meet this request if you cannot disclose all the information.

Comment

While the Freedom of Information Act does not apply to Church archives, the Data Protection Act does. When read carefully it is clear that the conflicts are less than might be expected. It is important to bear in mind that in neither civil nor canon law are you required to hand over documents – only information in the form of a certified copy. Equally access may and perhaps must be restricted in certain circumstances.

Diocesan Archives

It is the responsibility of the Diocesan Bishop to ensure that documents pertaining not only to the diocese, but to all the churches and parishes within the diocese, are carefully preserved and to establish detailed regulations for his diocese (canon 491). In addition there is to be a central historical archive where materials of historical interest are kept.

At diocesan level, each Curia is to have its own archive, which is the responsibility of the Chancellor. He or she may be assisted by a vice-chancellor (canon 482), and also professionally trained archivists (Circular Letter, n.2.5). The Archive must be kept locked, and only the Bishop and Chancellor are to have the key (canon 487). Access may be granted by the Bishop alone, or by the Chancellor and Moderator of the Curia jointly. There should be a separate area where documents may be studied under supervision. People are entitled to a copy of documents 'which are of their nature public and which concern their own personal status', can. 487-§2. This refers to documents such as extracts from baptismal registers. It does not refer to private documents such as letters. Access to these is granted on a discretionary basis. Note that article 4.1 of the Circular Letter encourages an open and generous spirit with regard to access. In principle access should be available to all who can take advantage of it, not just from a religious point of view, but also historical and cultural and regardless of their religious or ideological backgrounds.

Archives for current affairs

In addition to the 'Archives' as such there will be large numbers of documents in current use for the work of the Diocese and retained in the appropriate offices. There needs to be a policy as to when items are transferred from one to the other, but also about access to current files. Clearly these are far more likely to contain confidential and sensitive materials as well as posing practical problems with regard to granting of access. The Circular Letter refers to these in section 2.2. It emphasizes the distinction between the short, medium and long term and areas that are ongoing or have a limited time-span. Not specifically mentioned but of great significance today is whole question of e-mails.

The secret archive

In addition, there is a Secret Archive. Access to this is granted to the Diocesan Bishop alone; even when the see is vacant a Diocesan Administrator can have access only in a case of real necessity (canon 490). Certain documents must be stored here: criminal cases concerning matters of a moral nature; documentary proof of canonical warnings or reproofs in the context of canonical offences or scandalous behaviour (canons 489-§2 and 1339); acts of a preliminary investigation for a penal process closed without formal trial (canon 1719); dispensations granted from occult impediments in the internal non-sacramental forum; secret marriages. The Bishop may use it to store other matters of a particularly confidential nature. The only circumstance in which it is foreseen that documents may be removed from the Secret Archive is when needed to complete a penal process (canon 1719).

Preservation

In general all documents should be kept indefinitely, though there is no need to retain duplicates, e.g. typed copies and original hand-written text or notes. Clearly some discretion is needed in this, and in the absence of concrete guidelines, parishes and Commissions will make their own judgement. However even apparent trivia may be of historical interest in the future.

Documents relating to formal canonical processes have set time scales for retention. These are related to the possibility of appealing or re-opening cases. Cases relating to personal status can always be re-opened, even, in certain situations, by the heirs, when both parties are deceased. The acts of such cases must be kept in perpetuity. Civil suits for damages have a more limited life-span, but are extremely rare. Penal actions are extinguished after ten years, and a statute of limitations prevents action being taken over alleged offences that occurred more than ten years before. They are also extinguished by the death of the accused. In consequence documents kept in the secret archives which relate to moral or other accusations of a penal nature must be destroyed on the death of the person accused, or after a time gap of ten years. All that is to be retained, and only where a penal case has led to conviction, is the text of the judgement and a summary of the facts (canon 489-§2). Since no one else has access to the Secret Archive, it is the personal responsibility of the Diocesan Bishop to go through the Secret Archive annually, to ensure that such documents are destroyed. The only documents retained indefinitely in the Secret Archive, then, are the registers of internal forum dispensations and of secret marriages.

Access

The Code of Canon Law restricts access to the Secret Archive to the Diocesan Bishop. This does not imply that no one else may see items contained in it. For example, if a further penal case arises concerning an individual the Bishop may retrieve them and make them available to those concerned in handling the fresh allegations. It does mean that they are not open for research. Since the Holy See makes some documents in its own Secret Archive available in due course there is no absolute prohibition on transferring documents to a more open archive when sufficient time has elapsed so that no one may be injured by this. Access may be granted for legitimate reasons to all other documents, subject to guidelines laid down by the Bishop, or custodian of the archive. The policy of Brentwood Chancery is to grant access after thirty years, unless a Commission has set a longer period of reservation on a particular document. A reservation of one hundred years is set on Tribunal files. Each Commission has its own policy as to when working documents are transferred from office filing cabinets to the Diocesan Archive.

Guidelines or regulations will also be needed as to how access is provided in terms of suitable facilities for study or the copying of documents in a way that is secure. This concerns not only physical arrangements but also the marking of files with any reservations or restrictions as to access. A particular issue, mainly at parish level, will be the granting of access to sacramental registers since this will allow enquirers to study entries not relating to their own personal status and at times reveal sensitive information about marital status, etc. Note that canon 487-§2, unlike the original draft of the Code does not grant the right to inspect the original document but only to receive an authentic copy, whether transcription or photocopy. On the other hand it does not restrict the giving of a copy of the documents concerned only to those entitled, nor of other documents of a more private nature. Canon 488 makes a clear distinction between being granted access and permission to remove documents from the archive. This should not be given if a copy will suffice. Moreover, permission is needed either from the Diocesan Bishop or from both the Moderator of the Curia and the Chancellor, not the Chancellor (or archivist) or Moderator alone.

Church and Civil Law

Clearly the provisions of civil and canon law may differ. However, as far as possible, Diocesan Bishops, and all responsible should show respect for the civil laws in these matters, and harmonise their own regulations with these (Circular Letter, n.2. 3). From this it will be clear, that, unless there is a clear contradiction, civil law on the retention of documents and the granting of access to them should be obeyed, not just because civil law requires it, but also the Church's law. This has relevance to the application of the Data Protection Act, and other legislation such as the Human Rights Act. In a paper given to this year's annual conference of the Canon Law Society of Great Britain and Ireland Edward Morgan drew attention to four points that help to avoid conflict:

1. Devising and Adopting a Data Protection Act Policy. Often decisions are made in a reactive and ad hoc manner. There should be policies indicating:
 - a. The purpose for which data is collated
 - b. The means by which consent is obtained from the data subject
 - c. The use to which data is put
 - d. Duration of storage
 - e. Processes to be followed when data requests are received
2. Protocol Documentation. A set of correspondence templates to deal with such requests would help reduce the level of stress and allows a timely response.
3. Audit and review: policies and practices should be reviewed annually.
4. Reference to the Information Commissioner: they are always willing to offer advice on policies or queries.

Particular issues for discussion

- Sacramental Records

A Catholic who left the Church would be entitled to insist that his details be deleted from parish records, but not that they be removed from a public record such as the baptism register. He could only insist on a marginal note being added to update the entry.

- Clergy Personnel Files

Evidently the person in question has the right to know what is in such a file, and insist on the correction or elimination of erroneous or defamatory material. If it is needed for a penal process of some kind then it should be in the Secret Archive, and would be covered by the appropriate exemption under the Act. He would in any case have a canonical right to see the material if it becomes part of a penal process. Should the material not be used for this purpose, the Code already provides for its destruction on an established time-scale, and prevents its disclosure. One would imagine that the Bishop would not, in any case, wish to retain erroneous or defamatory material on file, and that he would wish to obtain the cleric's comments on such matters. Clearly anonymous allegations are of no value, even if the substance should be true.

A cleric, then, has the right to see what is in his own personnel file, and insist on corrections or deletions. He does not have a right to access to the Secret Archive, but if the material in it relates to accusations against him, then he will have a right to see its content in the context of a canonical penal process, and to make appropriate comments. If the case is proven, and he is convicted, then there is a presumption as to the truth of the data retained, and a time-scale set for its destruction. The latter is in accordance with the provision that data be not kept longer than necessary. The data contained in such files are protected from unauthorised disclosure, by appropriate restrictions on access.

- Minutes of meetings

The FOIA only requires these to be made available in the case of meetings that are of their nature public, or where policy decisions are made, not of lesser meetings. One should apply the same principles even if not required by civil law.

The Liturgical Revival in the Diocese of Salford under Bishop Casartelli, 1903-1906

Fr Nicholas Paxton

'The average English Catholic is not interested in the liturgy and does not even know what the word means. And if I ask a Catholic what Sunday it is or what is the liturgical season generally speaking he does not know.'¹

'(Great Britain and Ireland) can hardly be said to be deeply affected by the Liturgical Movement ... the clergy are generally disinterested ... participation by the great masses hardly exists.'²

'England played virtually no part in developing the early stages of the modern liturgical movement ... it was left to the mainland of Europe to produce the blend of scholarship and pastoral concern which marks the liturgical movement proper.'³

These three statements, published at almost exact quarter-century intervals between 1930 and 1980, clearly take a low view of the state in England of the Liturgical Movement, that is, 'the new awareness of public worship's primary place in the Church's life ... as expressed in retrieving tradition and implementing renewal in the Church's current worship'.⁴ In the following, however, I wish to describe how Louis Charles Casartelli, Bishop of Salford from 1903 to 1925, made sure that his diocese did not conform to the trend which these statements indicate by actually anticipating Pius X's legislation on church music and by insisting that his diocese follow the Bishop's directives. I therefore wish to indicate the course of the nineteenth-century plainsong revival and then discuss Bishop Casartelli's pastoral letter of 3 October 1903, the teaching of Pius X on church music and active participation in the liturgy by the congregation, Casartelli's response to that teaching and the way in which the 77 documents, mostly letters, in Folder 1 of Box 193 of the Salford diocesan archives, show the fulfilment of the Bishop's requirements between 1903 and 1905.

The Nineteenth-Century Revival of Plainchant

The leading nineteenth-century figure in reviving plainsong was undoubtedly Dom Prosper Guéranger who re-founded the abbey of Solesmes and was its abbot from 1837 to 1875. 'The work of the Solesmes monks in restoring the plainchant led to a long-lost appreciation of a form of music that in a deep sense was an enhancement of the verbal texts.'¹ This is particularly true since Solesmes used mediaeval – not post-mediaeval – sources in its work of revival. On the one hand, much Renaissance and post-Renaissance plainsong was written for effect, an excellent example (which Koenker quotes), being the Mass Si diligis me for the Common of Popes, even though Credo III (which has played a significant part in promoting congregational participation) dates only from about 1600. On the other hand, Solesmes's plainchant scholarship may, not necessarily rightly, have assumed that each piece of plainsong had a single correct form. It is noteworthy that Cardinal Bartolucci, formerly the director of the Sistine choir, has expressed serious misgivings over the accuracy of Solesmes's work.²

However, in restoring the liturgy's chant, Guéranger also sought to restore its spirituality. While his work is usually seen as a prologue to the Liturgical Movement proper, one should note that he seems (in 1851) to have been one of the first to use the term 'liturgical movement'. Though such writers as Koenker and Every have seen the work of Guéranger and his immediate followers as not meant to promote popular liturgical participation, Franklin has since shown that Guéranger sought to promote it by recommending that people join in bodily postures, bodily actions and such responses as were possible, for example 'Amen' and 'Alleluia'. Guéranger thus sought 'to give, to such of the laity as do not understand Latin, the means of uniting in the closest possible manner with everything that the priest says and does at the altar'.³ His work thus served as a foundation for the later liturgical movement because of its stress on community, not individualism.⁴

Though the plainsong revival's monastic beginnings place this aspect of the Liturgical Movement's background well outside parish life, 'the monasteries preserved and renewed the liturgy at a period when other institutions in the Church did not understand it and would probably have made matters even worse if they had attempted anything in this field.'¹ However, Guéranger abolished genuine mediaeval Gallo-Roman material in his imposition of the 'pure' Roman liturgy in France up to about 1860. Nonetheless, it is important to note that other Benedictine houses took up the Solesmes revival, particularly Beuron (re-founded by the brothers Wolter in 1863) and houses founded from Beuron, including Maredsous (1872), Maria-Laach (1892) and Mont-César (1899). But it remains a paradox that, in seeking a supposedly authentic return to the Middle Ages, Solesmes and its school made plainsong into a dead tradition by not allowing composers to write in it. Meanwhile, in England, the First Synod of Westminster (1852) commended plainchant as church music's highest form. In Salford diocese, the 1880 diocesan synod under Bishop Vaughan forbade women singers and imposed Pustet's editions of plainsong – two measures which anticipated Pius X's 1903 letter to Cardinal Respighi about church music in the Diocese of Rome. This raises the question of how and why Bishop Casartelli's work anticipated Pius X's.²

Bishop Casartelli's Rulings on Church Music before those of Pius X

Casartelli, in section IV of his first pastoral letter, 'The Signs of the Times' (3 October 1903), wrote: '(Pius X) is credited with an intention to prosecute with vigour at no distant date the much-needed Reform of Sacred Music'.³ Clearly, this statement, made against the background of the nineteenth-century plainsong revival, led Casartelli to anticipate Pius' work. What is less clear is how he knew that Pius was to intervene in reforming church music, but one indication may be seen in a comment by Pius in the introduction to Tra le sollecitudini (hereafter TLS), his Motu Proprio of 22 November 1903 on church music and congregational sharing in the liturgy (otherwise called Inter Pastoralis Officii), where he mentioned 'the great number of complaints' he had received even in the short time which had elapsed between his election as Pope and the date of TLS.⁴ Casartelli wished his diocese to take a leading part in this reform; indeed, he 'placed high on his priorities the reform of church music within his diocese in order that its people might be re-introduced to the primary source of the Christian life, which was the liturgy'.⁵ He regretted the theatrical style of much church music (as Pius was to do) and called for the introduction of spiritually beneficial short and simple settings of the Mass. He also renewed previous condemnations of women soloists in church, instead stating that boys' choirs could be trained to sing simple Gregorian masses.

Casartelli, in conformity with his organizing temperament,¹ would not tolerate half measures. In 'The Signs of the Times' he specified that, whenever he was called on 'to assist at High Mass or Benediction in any Church of the diocese', a list of the music was to be sent to him a week beforehand and that no music which he did not approve would be performed. He also stated that he had appointed an advisory committee on church music in the Salford diocese; in this, he conformed to a requirement which Pius X was later to lay down, as the next section will show.

The Work of Pius X

Pius X's purposes in TLS were to legislate about church music, to suppress the operatic style of so much church music, to encourage participation in the liturgy by the congregation and to make certain that everyone knew the law. The last paragraph of the decree's introduction fulfils the last aim. As to the others, Pius, while drawing attention to the advances already made (of which Bishop Casartelli's work formed an important part in England) noted that 'the good work already done is very far indeed from being common to all' (TLS Introduction). As part of his revival of plainchant, Pius commissioned improved versions of the Kyriale with the Order of Mass, the Graduale and the never-finished Antiphonale. Though these versions were Solesmes-inspired, this inspiration did not prevent mutual opposition between those who favoured the Vatican and the Solesmes editions. Such disagreement was not entirely in accord with Pius' teaching on Gregorian chant's universal nature, to which distinctively local music was subordinated (TLS 1-2).²

Pius also encouraged the revival of polyphony, most of all Palestrina, while noting that modern music was to be treated more cautiously but was permissible if it conformed to the liturgical laws which he laid down (TLS 4-6, see also TLS 23). However, he insisted that, in terms of sanctity, art and universality, Gregorian chant 'has always been regarded as the supreme model for sacred music' (TLS 3) and was thus to be restored, both by its presence in the liturgy and 'so that the faithful may again take a more active part in the ecclesiastical offices, as was the case in ancient times' (TLS 3). He developed this communal liturgical spirituality by writing that

'the faithful assemble for no other object than that of acquiring (the Christian) spirit from its foremost and indispensable font, which is the active participation in the most holy mysteries and in the public and solemn prayer of the Church' (TLS Introduction). TLS therefore 'contained the germ of what became the pastoral liturgical movement: it stated that the foremost and indispensable source of the true Christian spirit is the active [liturgical] participation of the people'.¹

TLS 12-13 provided for a choir of laymen; the choir could thus include boys but not women, though this situation was to change by 1912. The importance for present purposes of TLS 24, which specified on 22 November 2003 that bishops were to establish a sacred music commission in their dioceses if they had not done this already, is that Bishop Casartelli had already set up the Salford Diocesan Church Music Commission by 3 October that year.

On 8 December 1903, Pius wrote to the Cardinal Vicar of Rome, Cardinal Respighi, that a return to plainsong and Renaissance polyphony would 'at first ... produce some wonder among individuals'. This happened in England, where not everyone was happy about the restoration of plainchant; some church choirs resigned, either in protest or on their parish priests' initiative. At Salford Cathedral, Aloysius Norris suffered much from adverse congregational reaction, as I will show. It seems that numerous English parishes took no notice of Tra le sollecitudini. But Bishop Casartelli, with his provision of a church music commission, an approved music list and a requirement that he receive the musical liturgical programme before visiting a church or chapel, had made sure that the people, particularly the clergy and church musicians, of Salford Diocese took notice.²

Casartelli's Response to Pius, 1903-1906

On 4 May 1904, Casartelli sent a questionnaire, mainly about church choirs, to the different missions in the Salford diocese, in preparation for the discussion of church music by the bishops of England and Wales at their meeting of the following June. In the questionnaire, he asked whether TLS was already being implemented in each mission. He also enquired as to the number of Catholics in the mission and the number of boys in its schools, whether there was a choir of men and boys and/or a mixed choir, whether or not the choir was paid and how much it cost the mission every year, whether it would be feasible for the mission to substitute a men and boys' choir for a mixed choir and whether the missionary rector could form a choir from the boys in the mission's schools.¹

Three months later, Casartelli – in section II of his ad clerum letter of 12 August 1904 – wrote that he was enclosing two copies of TLS to each mission, one for the missionary rector and one for the choirmaster, and that TLS was to be put into practice at once. While he added that 'the English Bishops will shortly issue joint instructions on the subject [of church music]' after receiving answers from Rome over details connected with TLS, one should remember that he had placed his own diocese in the forefront of liturgical progress, since he had already issued guidelines in October 1903 which promoted similar aims to those of TLS. Reiterating two of these aims here, he called for choirs of schoolboys, and for congregations, to sing 'simple Masses and Benediction services', and he drew attention to the Salford diocesan church music list, which accompanied this ad clerum.²

It may at this point be useful, both to describe the church music commission which Casartelli had instituted for the Salford Diocese as far back as October 1903, and to explain that each item in the Salford Diocesan Archives has both a box number and an item number within the box: thus, for example, SDA-193-001 is Salford Diocesan Archives, Box 193, item 1. In 1903, the chairman of the commission was Dom Anselm Turner OSB and the other commission members were Frs A[nselm] Pooch and Francis Daniel and Messrs W.A[loysius] Norris (the Salford Cathedral choirmaster) and H.P. Allen (a church music expert, frequently consulted by Casartelli), who was the secretary. The 'Honorary Consultants' were Mgr [Henry] Parkinson, Rector of Oscott, Fr [Henry] Bewerunge, Professor of Music at Maynooth, who did important work in producing performing editions of Renaissance polyphony for male choirs in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries (see SDA-193-050), Fr Michael Maloney, a priest at Westminster Cathedral and a plainsong expert (see SDA-193-054), Fr J.J. Dunne of Holy Cross College, Clonliffe (see SDA-193-057) and Messrs R[ichard] R[unciman] Terry of Westminster Cathedral (see SDA-193-002) and Alfred Booth of St Joseph's, Liverpool (see SDA-193-050). By the time the 1906 Supplement to the diocesan church music list was issued, Dom Anselm Turner had died on 2 December 1905 and Fr Daniel had succeeded him as chairman, Fr T. Donovan of St Bede's College, Manchester (SDA-193-058) and Fr Joseph Dohmen had joined the commission as members, and Mr R.W. Oberhoffer of St Wilfrid's, York (see SDA-193-050) had become an honorary consultant, replacing Fr Moloney who had died on 24 May 1905. Clearly, Casartelli had assembled a body of people who had between them a great amount of talent and who knew what they were doing, even though a certain amount of classical Viennese and stylistically somewhat secular contemporary music was left on the list.¹

On 20 January 1906, Casartelli issued 'A Letter on Church Music'. Since he strongly wished for congregational liturgical singing, he recommended teaching schoolchildren 'to sing simple unison masses'² and strongly recommended simple psalm tunes for use in churches with inadequate facilities to sing the Gregorian Mass Propers. While still forbidding women's solos in church, the letter allowed for choirs of men and women in smaller churches without sufficient choirboys.³ For the plainsong of the Order of Mass, the Vatican version of the Kyriale was to be used.⁴ Finally, I wish to trace the ways in which the contents of Folder 1 of Box 193 of the Salford Diocesan Archives indicate the implementation, and fulfilment, of Casartelli's aims and policies on plainsong and the congregation's sharing in the liturgy.

Salford Diocesan Archives, Box 193, Folder 1: Corroboration of Casartelli's Work

As a result of the section on church music in 'The Signs of the Times', Casartelli received numerous letters of congratulation. Box 193 provides instances of such letters. Some of Casartelli's correspondents wasted no time. Although 'The Signs of the Times' was only issued on 3 October 1903, James Britten, editor of Catholic Book Notes, 126 Kennington Park, London SE wrote to the Bishop in support of his stance on church music as early as 5 October (SDA-193-005), as did a Mr Mitchell from Longsight, Manchester, four days later (SDA-193-004). A.K.B. Brandreth of Crewe went out of his way to thank Casartelli for his pastoral letter, writing on 11 October (SDA-193-022). William Colegrave of West Brighton wrote to the same effect on 13 October (SDA-193-008), to be followed the next day by Fr E. Gaynor, a Vincentian priest from St Vincent's Church, Cork (SDA-193-015). Gaynor's letter is particularly interesting in that he enclosed five programmes of the plainchant and Renaissance polyphony which were sung at that church (SDA-193-009 to 012 & 014). Suffice it to say that the choir must have been good and the parishioners fortunate. Meanwhile, Norris consulted Charles Gatty, a church musician of some significance (who had written to Cardinal Vaughan on the improvement of church music the year before and who included a copy of his letter to Vaughan when writing to Norris). Gatty replied to Norris on 20 October, praising him and the diocesan church music committee which Casartelli had set up (SDA-193-027 to 030). The next month, Percy FitzGerald MA, FSA wrote on 1 November from the Athenaeum Club in Pall Mall, London SW to Casartelli, with thanks and congratulations regarding the Bishop's church music policy (SDA-193-026),¹ while Dudley Baxter from Colchester followed suit on the 9th (SDA-193-030). Additionally, in an undated letter at SDA-193-003, Casartelli was told that Sir Thomas Wardle had approved of his work on church music despite not being a Catholic.

Composers, also, expressed approval. Among other matters, Joseph Short of Birmingham praised Casartelli's stand on church music on 13 January 1904 (SDA-193-040); two days later, Alfred Harborough of Southport agreed to emendations in some music, which Casartelli had called for (SDA-193-041), while Émile Wambach, of Antwerp, also sought Casartelli's patronage (SDA-193-037/8). Meanwhile, Abbot Hugh Edmund Ford OSB of Downside proposed on 15 March 1904 to visit Casartelli the following Thursday to hear him talk about his policy on church music (SDA-193-052) and Fr A. Dekkers of Sacred Heart, Leeds, expressed his warm thanks to Casartelli on Ash Wednesday (SDA-193-042). On 14 August that year, Allen reported that he had visited the Solesmes monks (who were in exile at Appuldurcombe, Isle of Wight, because of strongly anti-clerical legislation by France's Third Republican government) and wrote to Casartelli: 'They are very interested in our work and are delighted we had already chosen their edition of Gregorian Chant' (SDA-193-057). Also interesting is an article, 'English Music Commission's Work' in the North American journal The Teacher and Organist, at SDA-193-045. The article attributes the formation of a church music commission by 'the Bishop of the Sanford (sic), England' to the influence of the Archbishop of Cincinnati and his diocese, but this is surely only coincidence. More to the point, this article lists the music which the Salford commission considered suitable and unsuitable for use in church. Likewise, SDA-193-002 gives a short list of works which the commission considered unsuitable at an early meeting, and SDA-193-048 provides undated lists from Allen of music recommended for use in church and music forbidden as unsuitable.

Box 193 of the Salford archives also makes clear that the commission was well able to give frank advice to Casartelli when the need arose. In October 1903, a

Jesuit priest from Stonyhurst submitted a programme of music for a forthcoming visit by Casartelli. The Bishop must have got in touch with Allen, who advised the rejection of Schubert's Mass in F, for which a further letter from Stonyhurst accordingly substituted Perosi's Missa Pontificalis (SDA-193-023 to 025). On 5 June 1904, Allen, writing to Casartelli, considered that the commission would reject some music Casartelli had sent him (SDA-193-053). On 17 August 1904, the commission gave up the 'tolerated' category of music in its list, having found agreement as to the contents impossible for practical purposes (SDA-193-058). Also in 1904, Allen, writing from Appuldurcombe, told Casartelli that a Benedictus by [T.J.] Bordonel, proposed by Canon Tynan for a visit to St Gregory's, Farnworth, was not on the diocesan list and not acceptable to the commission (SDA-193-062/3).¹ Avoiding such situations as this would seem to be one of the reasons why the commission resolved to ask Casartelli to specify that all church music in the Salford Diocese was to be chosen 'from the official Diocesan List' (SDA-193-060).

SDA Box 193 also provides examples of the direct implementation of Casartelli's requirement that the programme of music for pontifical functions should be submitted to him in advance. Fr Ward, SJ, of the Holy Name, Manchester, sent Casartelli a list of the music to be performed there on Sunday 11 October 1903. Casartelli urgently enquired of Allen as to whether this music was suitable, and Allen duly replied that it would pass muster (SDA-193-006/7). SDA-193-016/7 give the programme for Sunday 25 October 1903 at St Mary's, Oswaldtwistle, with Allen's comments on it. SDA-193-024/5 are two documents on which I have already remarked, from a Stonyhurst Jesuit and dated 19 October and 26 October 1903, while SDA-193-035 lists the music for High Mass on 29 October at St Chad's, Manchester. Canon Boulaye, Vicar General, sent in the list of music for a visit by Casartelli to St Joseph's, Halliwell, Bolton on 10 April 1904, on which Allen commented that it would be tolerable (SDA-193-046/7). As already noted, SDA-193-063 is a memorandum from Canon Tynan at St Gregory's, Farnworth, giving no date but apparently listing the music to be performed at a Pontifical Solemn Mass. The musical programme for Sunday 4 September at St Francis', Gorton can be seen at SDA-193-066.

The next item (067) in the box is a letter from Fr Lynch, (missionary rector of St Wilfrid's, Hulme, Manchester) advising Casartelli that the Missa de Angelis would be sung at St Alphonsus', Old Trafford, the following Sunday, after the Solesmes fashion and 'in the strictest accordance with the recent law of the Holy Father'. The Father Cantor of St Sebastian's Dominican Priory, Salford, wrote to

Casartelli's secretary about the music for the following Sunday (SDA-193-072).¹ Lastly, the same Jesuit from Stonyhurst who wrote SDA-193-024/5 sent two programmes of music, for Masses, dated 24 June and 20 July 1905 (SDA-193-076/7). Significantly, SDA-193-077 also gives a note in Casartelli's handwriting as to whether the music mentioned there was on the 'tolerated' list published in the Salford diocesan periodical The Harvest. This is surprising inasmuch as the church music commission had previously given up the 'tolerated' category in their classification of music; one can only suppose that the category must have been revived.

However, mention of The Harvest invites consideration of a memorandum to the Bishop of 5 November 1904 from Fr C. Rothwell, who was the parish priest at Urmston and also had responsibilities about the production of The Harvest and the running of the Catholic Truth Society (SDA-193-068). This memorandum, unfriendly both to Casartelli and to the publication of items of music in The Harvest which formed part of his work on church music, described Fr Rothwell's unwillingness (mainly for financial reasons) to publish items connected with the diocesan church music list in The Harvest, and also his wish to resign from the CTS. The memorandum's main significance is that it shows that there was opposition to Casartelli's policies, either actively or by inaction. As noted above² and as Crichton has shown, some church choirs resigned either in protest at the plainchant revival or at the behest of their parish priests. Irrespective of the circumstances of their dissolution, opposition to TLS can clearly be seen to have been present.

SDA-193-069 to 071 provide another instance of this, in Casartelli's own Cathedral, in the form of three letters from Norris (who, as well as being on the commission, was the Cathedral's choirmaster) to Casartelli. In them, Norris described the opposition of some (though not all) of the leading parishioners at Salford Cathedral to Palestrina and, more especially, Gregorian chant. He observed, on 6 December 1904, that some of these opponents were going to Mass 'somewhere else where they find the style of music that suits their ears' (SDA-193-069). Since Norris had only done what the Bishop had instructed and the commission had decided, he wrote in item 069 that the state of affairs at the Cathedral had reduced him to tears. He was therefore much heartened to receive a letter from Casartelli affirming the value of his work (see SDA-193-070). As to another member of the Commission, SDA Box 193 tells us that Mgr Parkinson invited Casartelli to Oscott to sing Vespers and High Mass on 23-24 November 1903 (SDA-193-020/1).

Bishop Whiteside of Liverpool wrote to Casartelli on 21 December 1904, commending Casartelli's decision to allow only church music which was on the diocesan list (SDA-193-073). Two other items in SDA Box 193 clearly show Casartelli's enforcement of his ruling that he was to be notified in advance of the music for pontifical functions in the Salford diocese. The parish priests of St Mary's, Burnley (SDA-193-031) and St Wilfrid's, Hulme (SDA-193-067) had evidently forgotten to supply this information, and these letters from the priests in question show that Casartelli or his secretary had followed up these omissions by contacting them.

The most important point to make by way of conclusion is how forward-looking the Diocese of Salford was in the early 1900s, under Bishop Casartelli, about church music and the congregation's actively sharing in the liturgy. The Bishop had anticipated a Papal document, had provided structures which facilitated its implementation, had thrown himself behind its being put into practice, had gained favourable attention nationwide for his policy and, in his diocese, had reduced the inevitable opposition as far as possible. Clearly, his liturgical work was a story of success.

Frances Taylor and Cardinal Newman: A Literary Relationship from the Archives

Paul Shaw

In this article I have the modest aim of drawing attention to the archival evidence for the relationship between the Blessed John Henry Newman and a notable Victorian Catholic writer and religious founder, Frances Margaret Taylor (1832-1900), whose desultory but nonetheless significant intrusions into his life and work cast interesting side-lights on both of their careers. In particular, I hope to assist in further elaborating the precise circumstances of the original publication of Newman's well-known poem The Dream of Gerontius in 1865. Taylor, known in religion as Mother Mary Magdalen of the Sacred Heart, was the founder and first superior in 1872 of a religious congregation of women, which is still in existence, the Poor Servants of the Mother of God. Two writers who I am greatly indebted to are Joyce Sugg,¹ whose book is the only one to deal in any depth with the relationship between Taylor and Newman; and Norma Hollingsworth, whose doctoral thesis² has greatly clarified the somewhat vexed issues surrounding the role of Frances Taylor in the publication of the 'Dream', and the relationship between various manuscript versions which are extant. Both Newman and his greatly lesser-known contemporary Frances Taylor are going through the rigorous procedures demanded by the Catholic Church as a hopeful prelude to the immense honour of canonisation, and I will take the opportunity initially to draw some parallels between their careers.

At the outset it should be noted that both Newman and Frances Taylor were converts from the Church of England. In the case of Taylor, she was the tenth and youngest daughter of a moderately 'High Church' Lincolnshire clergyman. Her conversion took place in 1855 whilst she was serving as a volunteer nurse during the Crimean War. Secondly, they were both in some sense religious founders: Newman, famously of an English branch of the Oratorians, Taylor of an entirely independent English congregation dedicated particularly to the service of the urban poor. Thirdly, both were to a large degree dedicated to literary labours. Frances Taylor was the author of over twenty books, fiction and non-fiction, in the capacity either of author, editor or translator, in addition to numerous works in popular Catholic journals and magazines; she was always noted for her spirit of unflinching hard-work and self-effacing humility.

2 Norma Hollingsworth, The Dream of Gerontius Poem and Oratorio (PhD thesis University of Keele, 2008).

Taylor's interests are reflected in her archive, which is currently in the process of being catalogued. The great mass of material, particularly her correspondence, is concerned with the practical and businesslike concerns of running a growing congregation and administering the institutions which it controlled, but her literary activities are also represented to a lesser degree amongst her correspondence. The letters from Newman are a tiny part of a very large correspondence in the archives between Frances Taylor and many leading Catholics of her day, including a particularly extensive correspondence with her two leading lay benefactors, her great friend Lady Georgiana Fullerton (1812-1885), the famous Catholic writer and philanthropist, and Lady Georgiana's husband, Alexander George Fullerton (1808-1907); the archive also includes important letters from Newman to both of the Fullertons. However, this article will focus on the material relating to the relationship between Frances Taylor and Newman, which was overwhelmingly related to their mutual interest in Catholic writing and publishing.

The letters in the SMG central archive¹ in Brentford from Newman to Frances Taylor cover the years 1862 to 1886, and are ten in number. There is additionally relevant material amongst Newman's papers in the Birmingham Oratory: one further letter to Frances Taylor, and two drafts which relate to originals which do not appear to survive. Where reference is made to these items below they are to the published Letters and Diaries of Newman produced by the Birmingham Oratory. Regrettably, no copy or draft 'out-letters' to Newman have survived in the SMG archives. Additionally, some of the letters which Frances Taylor wrote to Newman have recently come to light in the Oratory collections: these are 17 in number, and appear to cover the period from March to November 1864, when she was most concerned to obtain his assistance with her journal the Month. They unfortunately arrived too late to contribute materially to this article, but some brief notice will be made of them. Two letters at Brentford dated 1867² relate to an effort by Frances Taylor to re-establish contact with her sister who had joined an Anglican Sisterhood, hoping that Newman would intervene on her behalf with his old Anglican friend, Dr E. B. Pusey. There is insufficient space to discuss this fascinating story here, though it is interesting to note the effort which Newman made to assist Frances Taylor over this difficult family crisis.

In referring again to the documentary evidence for the relationship between Taylor and Newman, we should note that their first contact appears to have come indirectly via the agency of her friend Lady Georgiana Fullerton. Taylor was responsible at this time for the publication of a collection of stories and poems called Offerings for Orphans (1861), which was intended to provide support for the Fund for Orphan and Destitute Catholic Children, to which Newman offered two poems. The first letter extant from Newman to Lady Georgiana, dated February 1861, is a response to her request for a literary composition for her use, which suggests that the original connection between Taylor and Newman may be linked to Lady Georgiana.¹

The first direct contact between Taylor and Newman which is documented came in December 1862, she having written to him seeking contributions to a popular Catholic literary journal The Lamp. Her editorial activities may be easily summarised. From January 1863 to June 1871 she was proprietor and editor of the (already existent) Lamp. She was also founder of a new Catholic periodical The Month, which she edited for just a year, from July 1864. At a time when the need to provide literary nourishment for the Catholic community was seen as increasingly pressing, Taylor had set about the task of editing The Lamp with characteristic vigour and industry, contacting many notable Catholics and even gaining favourable notice from Pope Pius IX. Given Newman's notable literary achievements in such a variety of genres, it was inevitable that she should also seek him out as a contributor, even though, as is well known, his career was at something of a low ebb at this point. Newman seems to have been ambivalent, on the one hand expressing his admiration for the determination of someone who had the persistence to approach him twice and the 'selfdenying [sic] toil'² which she had expended in re-establishing The Lamp, whilst at the same time expressing some ambivalence as to the role of her chosen mediator Father Henry Formby, which had led him to be suspicious as to the tone of the publication.

However, Newman did eventually show great interest in The Month, and offered an article for it in June 1864. Taylor had written to Newman on 12 March 1864, stating that she intended 'a monthly magazine for the educated and keeping The Lamp for the poor and middle classes of readers'.³ The first volume came out in July 1864, described as 'an Illustrated Magazine of Literature Science and Art', with the editor characteristically remaining anonymous. Taylor's biographer stated that the motive was 'to have an organ in which serious subjects and important questions of the day – from the Catholic standpoint – could be dealt with at sufficiently frequent intervals'.⁴ It is clear that this also struck a chord with Newman who was friendly to the establishment of a magazine which 'without effort or pretence...took part in all questions of the day'⁵ and whilst taking an overtly Catholic stance did not do so in a provocative way which could be interpreted by Protestants as being unpatriotic.

Taylor continued to edit The Month until it was taken over by the Jesuits with Father Henry Coleridge, S.J., as editor. Her precise role in the enterprise, and in the publication of The Dream of Gerontius, has been questioned.¹ She herself was typically self-effacing, stating for instance, that she was only an 'avant-courier' and also that 'Cardinal Newman took it up from the first'.² Whilst accepting to some degree Taylor's protestations about her eagerness to put aside these labours, at a time when she was already editor of another journal, we may in fact doubt that she played as small a role as she liked to suggest. It is clear that, as with The Lamp, she made great efforts to obtain supporters and contributors; these included Cardinal Wiseman, Father Coleridge, and, unsurprisingly, Lady Georgiana Fullerton, who's 'recusant' novel Constance Sherwood was serialised in the magazine.

The case of Newman may be considered to be paradigmatic in this regard, as it is clear from his published letters that Frances Taylor was most assiduous in pursuing him for 'copy', which he did not always find it easy to provide. One of her clerical associates, Father William Ronan, SJ, recollected later: 'Her writings caused her immense labour and she nearly broke down under her editorship of The Month.'³ From her letters in the Birmingham Oratory, we can see that she was greatly determined both to interest Newman in the future of the magazine, and to obtain his contributions, not least due to the considerable cachet which would be obtained from his illustrious name. She was also quite clear, despite later protestations, that she was the sole owner of The Month and fully responsible for its content.

In general, we may be unsurprised, therefore, that much of the short correspondence between Newman and Taylor relates to literary matters, this providing both the occasion and the rationale for their relationship. In relation to The Month they include a request for the dispatch of a copy of the magazine to Italy,⁴ and a reply, sent in March 1865, to a reminder from Taylor for an article, in the series 'Sayings of the Saints of the Desert' (which appeared in The Month between October 1864 and March 1866), delayed, according to the author, because of work on the second edition of his Apologia pro vita sua.⁵ The somewhat gnomic tone of these 'Sayings' resulted in a satire in Punch, and may have traded on their author's reputation for asceticism. His other contributions to The Month, excepting of course Gerontius – which will be discussed below – were two short poems, both appearing under the pseudonym ‘Daleth’, and appearing in September 1864 and February 1865.

Whilst unfortunately no correspondence survives to cast light on this episode, it is clear that Newman’s famous poem The Dream of Gerontius first appeared in the two editions of The Month in 1865, whilst the periodical was still under the editorship of Frances Taylor. The manuscript of this published version was later sold by Taylor to the British Museum. Despite these simple facts, Frances Taylor’s role in the publication of the Dream has, as we have noted, sometimes been overlooked or challenged the past. The poem first appeared in the May and June 1865 editions, and famously describes the drama of the journey of a soul from the verge of death to purgatory, guided by its guardian angel. Of the circumstances surrounding the publication of the poem, Frances Taylor’s contemporary and first biographer Sr Mary Campion Troughton SMG wrote: ‘...the story has been told in another Catholic magazine,¹ and repeated with modifications by Frances Taylor herself, how a “distressed editor” once went to Dr. Newman to implore him for a contribution, and how, after a plea of want of leisure, he took from his waste-paper basket, a manuscript thrown in as valueless, and told her to use it, if she thought it worth anything. This proved to be the now world-famed “Dream of Gerontius”, and the distressed editor was Fanny Taylor in search of copy for “The Month.”’²

A receipt relating to the sale of the manuscript, with Newman’s permission, is held in the congregational archives, recording the sum of £30 obtained.³ The receipt is undated, but the headed paper, which is from the convent at 4, Percy Street in London, implies that its sale took place between 1886 and 1898, the years during which this address was used by the congregation. The archives of the British Library record that the transaction was completed in March 1891; the original asking price of the manuscript may have been £100! Frances Taylor had a great admiration for Newman, and it is noteworthy that nonetheless she was prepared to sell the manuscript, no doubt to support the work with the poor.

The story is not, however, as straightforward as it sounds. Newman’s fair copy of the poem made in early 1865 is separate both from his rough ‘working’ copy, and from the copy which Frances Taylor published in The Month, which had been prepared especially for this purpose by a secretary. It is very difficult to believe that Newman intended to dispose of the manuscript that he had worked on for so long, which would be entirely out of character. However, it may be that he showed Frances Taylor his rough manuscript of the poem, and realised that in releasing the poem for publication by this determined and painstaking woman for her literary journal, he would be doing a service both for himself and for the Catholic literary community. If the poem did not prove to be popular, then at least it was published at a slight remove from its author, through the organ of a periodical. If it did strike a chord with the reading public, then his own fair copy was at hand to be utilised in whatever way he thought fit. It may be perhaps said, therefore, that Frances Taylor's determination to obtain 'copy' from Newman generated the occasion of the publication of the poem, rather than the ensuring its survival as the traditional account would suggest; but it is nonetheless a great tribute to her acumen and abilities that she obtained such a prize for her journal.

The remaining letters may briefly be reviewed. In general it may be said Newman's correspondence with Frances Taylor is occasional and mainly businesslike, being generally related to specific events in Taylor's life and career when she had a need to call upon his assistance. One may be linked to the appearance of Newman's Verses on Various Occasions in January 1868. A letter from Newman dated February 1868, thanked Taylor for sending a copy of her 'Meditations', and asks, in an exchange of literary courtesy, whether she had received a copy of his Verses.¹ The 'Meditations' were the Practical Meditations for every day of the Year, also published in that year, and translated by the author from the French. A copy of Newman's Verses, complete with the author's 'compliment' slip is still extant in the SMG archives: Newman's autograph, presumably from a covering letter, including his 'best wishes of this sacred season', has been carefully pasted into the volume. Another 'literary' letter dates from over ten years later, and is a brief but polite acknowledgement of the receipt of a copy of a book from Taylor; most likely this was the collection of stories entitled Stoneleighs of Stoneleigh.²

In a rather different category is a simple and touching letter written in March 1869 to conveying Newman's condolences, in reply to a letter from Frances Taylor informing him of her mother's death, in which he stated: 'God will sustain and comfort you, and you will be able to bless Him and thank Him (as indeed you do, but) with joyfulness, for what at first causes you such sharp suffering.'³ Frances

Taylor appears here to have been referring to the impact on her at this time of his poem 'To F W N – A Birthday Offering' with its ardent expressions of grief.

Going almost from the sublime to the ridiculous, there are two letters from Newman relating to a Miss Emma Crofts, who had sought assistance from Frances Taylor and Lady Herbert, falsely claiming that she had been authorised by Newman (January-February 1873).¹ Taylor's final letter, dated 1885, relates to her efforts to obtain recollections from correspondents of her great friend Lady Georgiana, to which unfortunately Newman felt unable to contribute, perhaps surprisingly giving the correspondence which he had exchanged with the Fullertons over the years, and given their mutual literary interests.²

Overall, we may say that the evidence examined in this article may be said to be paradigmatic of the courtesy, respect and concern with which Newman treated his female correspondents, even those with whom his relations were largely of a businesslike nature. Though his relations with Frances Taylor are largely reflective of Newman's willingness to support Catholic literary activities with his pen, it is impossible not to be aware of the mutual regard of the two authors, both dedicated to forwarding the cause of Catholicism in England through their writing and their Apostolic works.

Evacuation Logbooks: St Peter's, Seel Street, Liverpool

Dr John Davies

September 2009 marked the seventieth anniversary of the beginning of World War Two. The early days of September 1939 saw an unprecedented mass migration of children, their teachers and helpers, and, in some cases, parents, from areas which were considered to be at risk from German bombing attacks to safer regions. In most cases this meant the evacuation of children from densely urban areas into rural and small town environments. Central government agencies and local authorities had been preparing their plans for this mass migration from 1937 onwards.¹ As well as the logistical problems in transporting children from towns and cities into the rural hinterland there were anticipated social problems when education was disrupted and when urban and rural cultures and ways of living collided. The Catholic community, particularly in its urban heartlands in London, the Midlands and the North of England, was greatly affected by this social upheaval. Whole schools left their familiar surroundings and were transplanted into the safer rural and semi-rural areas where they began to share buildings with local schools, usually on a part-time basis. Many of these safer areas had very small Catholic populations. Catholic children were billeted with non-Catholic host families and provision had to be made to enable them to continue the observance of their Catholic religious practices, particularly their attendance at Mass each week.

From the material deposited in Catholic diocesan archives, including the correspondence of the bishops with each other and with central and local government, and their instructions to their clergy, we can learn a great deal about how the Catholic authorities responded to these challenges.² These sources provide us with an overview of the evacuation process as it affected the Catholic community, and the community's response to the challenge presented by evacuation. We are also fortunate in being able, in many cases, to study evacuation at micro or parish level through the evacuation logbooks which were kept by the parochial schools. Sadly not all of these have survived but many have and can be found in some of the diocesan archives, in local record offices, and in the archives of the teaching religious orders. The archives, for example, of the Sisters of Notre Dame, who provided the head teachers for many parochial schools, in Liverpool and the North West of England and elsewhere, have over many years proved a particularly happy hunting ground for students writing undergraduate and post graduate theses on evacuation and related topics. Additionally the Notre Dame archives contain records of the evacuation experience of various groups of teacher training students at Notre Dame College of Education – an invaluable source for the successors in Liverpool Hope University of those wartime students. These evacuation logbooks, wherever they are located, enable us to examine the process of evacuation in some detail. They also have the added advantage in that they are essentially lay Catholic records – if we count religious sisters as lay people – as opposed to the official clerical narrative available to us in the various diocesan archives.

The evacuation logbooks of St Peter's, Seel St, Liverpool were deposited, along with many other records of the parish, in Liverpool Record Office in the 1960s. These logbooks were the final ones for the parish's schools. Evacuation proved to be a swansong for the schools whose foundation dated back to the 1850s. Because of bomb damage the school buildings proved to be no longer usable and eventually after the return from evacuation the Infants' and Girls' Schools were merged with the nearby Notre Dame Demonstration School and after a long, but finally unsuccessful, struggle by the parish priest, Fr Bruno Dawson, to persuade the Board of Education and the Local Education Authority to agree to its re-opening, the Boys' School was closed in 1943 and the pupils were dispersed to nearby Catholic schools. The parish itself after serving the Catholic community in Liverpool for two hundred years closed in 1988.

The evacuation logbooks are an invaluable source for this final period of the schools' history. The Infants' and Girls' Schools had Notre Dame Sisters as head teachers while the Boys' School's head was the long serving Robert Mooney. The logbooks they produced are written in contrasting styles, perhaps reflecting the differing approaches to evacuation of the two nuns and Mooney. The logs for the Infants' and Girls' Schools provide brief but clear narratives for the first weeks of evacuation but with little extraneous detail. They record the salient points of what their head teachers saw essentially as a temporary measure which involved transporting the children to Chester, seeing that they received suitable accommodation, while attempting to insure that their education was disrupted as little as possible. The evacuation log of the Boys' School, written by the head who, apart from his army service in the First World War, had spent all his adult years as a teacher, and since 1927 as head teacher, in St Peter's, contrasts sharply with the other two log books. The brisk, spare prose of the logs produced by the two Notre Dame Sisters is replaced by Mooney's attempt to capture every detail of the evacuation experience. Mooney was prepared for the long haul, seeming to expect that evacuation would continue as long as the war itself. He did not envisage, unlike the majority of the parents of the pupils and his colleagues in the Infants' and Girls' Schools, that there would be a speedy return to Liverpool. Even when the Infants' and Girls Schools had formally returned, and the majority of his own pupils had been taken back to Liverpool by their parents, he resisted the pressure of the parish priest to come back and re-start the school in Liverpool in 1942, seeking reasons to stay in Chester with his rapidly dwindling band of evacuees.

The Evacuation Logbook for St Peter's Infants' School – Seel St is a mere five hundred yards from the centre of Liverpool – gives no account of the journey of the children to Hoole, a suburb of Chester, some fifteen miles from Liverpool. There is merely a bald statement that fifty-five children and four teachers were evacuated on 1 September 1939 but added that 'during the following week twenty children returned to their homes in Liverpool.'¹ For the next three weeks the remaining thirty-six children occupied a room in Westminster Road Infants' School from 1.30p.m. to 5.30p.m. each day. After three weeks the Cheshire 'County Inspectors' suggested that 'as the numbers were so reduced' they should be transferred to the Westminster Road Girls' School so that the 'resident Infants' School was thus able to resume normal sessions'. Once the transfer of St Peter's was completed in the first week of October the children were taught from 9.00a.m. to 12.30p.m. In the afternoons they enjoyed 'recreation in the local park'. Within a couple of weeks, however, with evident signs of the 'approach of winter' the park sessions were replaced by recreation in a room provided by Westminster Road Infants' School.² By the beginning of November full day schooling for the children had been resumed; once again back in the Westminster Road Infants' building. By the end of that week there were only eighteen evacuated infant children left in Chester and two teachers were recalled by St Peter's School Managers – effectively by the parish priest – to Liverpool to start a 'Home Teaching' programme for the returned evacuees. During the Christmas holidays a further teacher was recalled; after Christmas, in the third week of January, the remaining infant refugees were stricken by an 'epidemic of scarlet fever, diphtheria and measles'. The epidemic continued into February.³

The entries in the Infants Logbook for the remainder of the stay in Chester, until August 1940, were brief in the extreme. When the school closed for the summer holidays in July there were only seventeen children 'on roll'. School restarted on 29 July but a month later there was a 'severe' air raid in the Chester area, only a few miles from the Luftwaffe's target of Liverpool's docklands. On the morning after the raid: 'Only four children were present. They were transferred to one room, with the All Saints [Westminster Road] children, owing to a delayed action bomb in the adjoining fields.'¹ This was the final entry for the evacuation period. The next phase of the Infants' School's wartime life was back in Liverpool in its own building. During the 'May Blitz' of 1941 St Peter's, close to Liverpool's south docks, suffered severe damage. The Gilbert St building which housed the Infants' and Girls' School suffered a direct hit. The Infants' Log, in its somewhat understated fashion, recorded: 'Gilbert St premises "blitzed", burnt out completely, by enemy action. Stock, work, everything destroyed'.² The children were accommodated in the nearby Notre Dame Demonstration School in Maryland St next to the Notre Dame Mount Pleasant Training College, a short walk from Seel St and within St Peter's parish boundaries. By 1943 St Peter's Infants' School had been formally incorporated into the Demonstration School. Evacuation was thus the swansong of a parish school whose life had begun in the 1850s in the early days of the Catholic Poor Schools' Committee.

The treatment of the evacuation process by the Evacuation Logbook of St Peter's Girls' School was as brief as the account in the Infants' log: 'Evacuation to Westminster Road Girls' School, Hoole, Chester, took place September 1st 1939.' Three of the teachers' helpers returned to Liverpool the following day, 'chiefly because of unsatisfactory arrangements with regard to billets'. The remaining helper stayed in Chester until mid-October, supervising children 'going to the clinic' and looking after those 'children living at a distance'. She returned home on 13 October 'as the need for her help had ceased'.³

School sessions for the evacuated girls were for half a day, 'alternating from a.m. to p.m. every four weeks'. Westminster Rd Girls' School used the premises for the other half of the day. During the part of the day the girls were not in school they were taken for games in the park, walks to Chester and for 'homework and knitting etc.' in the local Mission Hall, which the school had been allowed to use. There were seven teachers, including the head teacher for the 102 pupils who had left Liverpool. Not all parents agreed to the evacuation of their children. It was decided to group the girls: Standards I and II, III and IV, VI and VII together, while Standard V was taught separately. In the early days of September the teaching staff received first aid and air raid protection training along with the local teachers. Members of the Chester police force spoke to the pupils about basic safety-first procedures.¹

In line with typical Notre Dame teaching methods and traditions there were extensive attempts to use the local environment as fully as possible as an educational tool and stimulus to learning for the pupils. One teacher worked with the senior girls to 'arouse interest in the study of Chester from the historical point of view'. Another visited the centre of Chester with 'small groups for art'. Visits were organised and made 'with enjoyment and profit' to Chester Cathedral, St John's Church, the museum, (Grosvenor Museum), the River Dee, the residence of the Duke of Westminster at Eaton Hall, the home of William Gladstone at nearby Hawarden, Chester Zoo, the City Walls, Handbridge – a suburb across the Dee from the city centre, and the local villages, now Chester suburbs, of Chrisleton and Upton. In return for a concert given in October by the girls of Westminster Rd School, St Peter's gave a November concert, followed by 'plays, songs and dances' to which the Chester residents who had housed the St Peter's girls were invited.²

By the end of the October mid-term holiday almost half of the original contingent of girls had returned, or been taken home, to Liverpool by their parents. The official number on the school roll was down to fifty-three. The head teacher was growing increasingly irritated by this trend and objected strongly to 'the casual way returning to Liverpool is taking place'. The drift back, however, continued; and a week later, at the end of October, the number of girls left in Chester had further fallen to forty-eight. Full day teaching for this dwindling number was restored in the first week of November.³ But the pattern had been set. After each school holiday the numbers returning to school declined and, as with the Infants' School, the Girls' School was back in its Liverpool premises in Gilbert St. by the autumn of 1940. Eventually, like the Infants' School, it was absorbed into Notre Dame Demonstration School after the blitzing of Gilbert St in May 1941.

The Boys' School's experience of evacuation was broadly similar to that of the Girls' and Infants' with the majority of the children eventually returning to Liverpool within a few weeks. The boys' evacuation, however, did have one distinguishing feature from the other two schools. What clearly differentiated it was the attitude towards evacuation of the head teacher, Robert Mooney. It emerges clearly from the logbook he kept that he saw evacuation as a long rather than as a short term venture. Even when the majority of his pupils had been taken back home he believed that there would be a re-evacuation programme. For that reason he insisted on staying in Chester even after the majority of his teaching staff had also returned to Liverpool and the manager of the school, the parish priest, Fr Bruno Dawson was urging his return also. Mooney's commitment to the evacuation process is also perhaps reflected in the detailed account he was prepared to write, particularly at the end of each of the first few hectic days. His narrative enables us to follow St Peter's Boys' School almost step by step through the early weeks of evacuation. Mooney, who had served in the British Army during World War One, seems to have seen evacuation as a military campaign and his, perhaps unconscious, choice of language reflects that view. Reading his detailed account some seventy years later the reader begins to get some understanding of how this unprecedented national mass migration of children and their teachers was acted out at local level.

³ Girls' Log, pp.5-6

Mooney was not satisfied with the brief statement of his fellow head teachers that the pupils were evacuated to Hoole, Chester. He provides no introduction to his account so we learn nothing of any prior planning of the events beginning on 1 September 1939. His narrative plunges immediately into a description of the evacuation.

The children, teachers and helpers to be evacuated met at Seel St Schools, Liverpool, at 9.30 a.m. with equipment, food and gas masks and picking up the Girls' and Infants' Departments proceeded to Central Station.

Central Station was some four hundred yards from Seel St and once there 'the entrainment by families' was carried out 'in splendid order and fine spirit'. Chester is some fifteen miles from Liverpool but it was 2.45 in the afternoon before Hoole, a mile from the town centre, was reached. In Hoole the children were given 'two days' rations' and then taken by bus or private car to All Saints Church of England Schools. There they were 'medically examined' and only then 'after much confusion finally distributed to billets over a wide area'. The confusion for many of the children continued as they 'were brought back to the centre and new billets had to be found for them'. Presumably the children involved in this re-allocation had been rejected by their original hosts despite having passed the earlier medical examination which had been intended to eliminate any possibility that these children from the slums of Liverpool would spread any infection to the 'receiving areas'. In the meantime after the relocation had been completed Mooney complained that the teachers 'had to fend for themselves'. It was 8.00 p.m. before he and his fellow members of staff 'found billets'. By the end of this long day the 250 children who had been evacuated from St

Peter's Schools, Boys', Girls' and Infants', along with sixteen teachers and a small group of helpers were 'well-scattered and thoroughly fagged out'.¹

On Saturday morning, 2 September, Mooney, with two of his senior assistant teachers, commenced the next stage of what he undoubtedly saw in terms of a military campaign. They set out to try to establish exactly where in Chester their pupils had been 'billeted'. Equipped with their nominal rolls they descended on the offices of the local authority, Chester Urban District Council, 'commandeered the billeting books (very poorly kept in many cases) and tried to check the disposition of our children'. They had completed this task, so far as it was possible to do so, by one o'clock. Later in the day these three senior teachers 'went right through the billeting area' and organised an assembly for the following morning in preparation for attendance at Sunday Mass.² They had successfully contacted 'many of the boys' and had met 'the people on whom they were billeted'. For these host families and the way in which they had coped with enormous difficulties 'no praise was too high' from Mooney. There was a slightly unfortunate ending in the evening to the day's work for, as they were about to return to their 'billets', Mooney's team were 'caught in a downpour of rain'.³

Mooney's account of events on Sunday 3 September began: 'Sunday and war declared by Great Britain on Germany.' The children, however, had 'responded splendidly 'to Mooney's house calls on the previous evening and to his 'impromptu call for Mass'. As a result 'a good crowd' met at 9.30 in Falkener St, Hoole, and 'marched' the mile or so to St Werburgh's Church in the centre of Chester. Arranging the 'parade' for Mass had enabled the teachers to 'keep up contact with the children as no assembly point or school had as yet been allotted to us'. The head teacher of All Saints School, Mr Hullah, had, however, allowed St Peter's the use of part of his school for Tuesday morning. This gave Mooney and his staff time to carry out on Monday, 4 September, 'a thorough census of our party'. He commented that Hullah's gesture was 'the only help, little or none coming from the UDC Office'. On that Monday morning the teachers from the three St Peter's Departments met in Hullah's room at 9.30 and 'divided the billeting area into three groups'. The teachers then visited these areas, Mooney himself taking the Hoole Lane area, 'warning all children to assemble at school at 9.30 a.m.' the following morning.⁴

The children 'rallied well to the roll call' on Tuesday morning but Mooney insisted that the 'nominal roll' be 'thoroughly checked' and 'absentees noted'. Having done this Mooney clearly felt some cause for concern because he then 'adjourned to the UDC Offices over the latter problem'. Once there he found that parents 'had been withdrawing their children without any form of notice and nothing could be done about it'. However, he consoled himself with the thought that he had done all that he could to carry out and complete the evacuation procedure: 'Still our list was completely checked'. The checked rolls and a list of the 'absentee families' were sent to the Director of Education, C.F. Mott, in Liverpool 'for his action'. Mooney rounded off his day by completing a report to be sent to the 'Rev. Manager', the parish priest, Fr Dawson. There were, however, still a number of procedures to be completed before school for the evacuated children could begin. The teaching staff met at All Saints School, Hoole on Wednesday morning, 6 September, at 9.30. There they received two instructions: all teachers were to attend a meeting in Chester Town Hall on Thursday morning at 10.30; the evacuated children were to assemble at Hoole and Newton School in the afternoon at 2.30 for a further medical inspection. This latter instruction 'necessitated the dispatch of teachers' to 'warn all children to parade' and to allocate them 'a spot for all to be examined medically'. In Mooney's view the medical examination 'seemed a superficial affair, as two doctors and a nurse could hardly be expected to cope with five hundred or more children'. (Other Liverpool schools, including St Peter's near neighbours, St Patrick's, had also been evacuated to Chester.) Later that day Mooney received two visitors from Liverpool who had come to review the progress made in the evacuation of St Peter's, a Board of Education H.M.I and one of the parish clergy, Fr Louis D'Andria.¹

The teachers, local and evacuated, 'acting on instructions' attended a further meeting in Chester Town Hall on Thursday, 7 September, where they were 'instructed' to open the schools on Monday 11 September. The evacuated children of St Peter's were to be taught initially in the afternoons from 1.30 until 5.00 p.m. The teachers were also given instructions about 'requisites, registration, curriculum and care of children under existing conditions'. Mooney arranged to meet his own staff on Friday morning at All Saints. He was increasingly concerned about children being taken back by their parents to Liverpool, a short train journey away. He therefore returned to the UDC Offices to check once again the nominal roll as 'the homeward trek continued, resulting from all sorts of rumours being carried back to Liverpool by the parents of returned evacuees'. For the teachers' meeting the next morning he had to draft 'an adaptable temporary timetable', individual timetables for each teacher, and to 'answer correspondence' so that he could 'have everything ready for school on Monday'. In the meantime he 'dispatched' two teachers to visit the 'billets' to 'check addresses and deal with complaints'.¹

At the staff meeting on Friday morning the teachers received 'nominal rolls of classes' and timetables. They were then 'dispatched round their districts' to 'warn those in charge of billets' that the boys were due to start school on Monday, 'the 11th instant' at 1.30 p.m. Mooney and one of his assistants took the 'Hoole Lane billets' and 'contacted in almost every case'. With another assistant he then 'motored to school' in Liverpool, arriving at 4.00 p.m. Once there he 'loaded up half sets, 20, of Literary, History and Arithmetic books for all classes, together with other necessities for carrying on work without loss of time.' These books were then to be collected by a further member of staff and transported to Chester. At this stage of the campaign 'Mr Henin and I took our first leave of 48 hours'.²

While enjoying this 'leave' on Sunday Mooney received news of a 'successful church parade' in Chester. On Monday, 11 September, 'Schools started for instruction at 1.30 p.m.' The teaching session lasted till 5.00 p.m. and he was able to report a 'good attendance', 111 out of 112 on the roll, one boy having gone on weekend leave. Work in school 'proceeded normally' and 'any deficiencies of stock or apparatus' were noted. These deficiencies would have to be 'rectified' at the weekend.³

In spite of Mooney's military-style planning and careful attention to detail not everything in the first week the school was operating went exactly to plan. The incident which caused the greatest concern to Mooney, and which he documented fully, was the case of boy R. On the morning of Tuesday 12 September, one of St Peter's staff visiting the UDC Offices was informed that this boy had not been seen since six o'clock the previous evening. Mooney went to boy's 'billet'. Not finding him there he decided to wait until the roll call at the beginning of school at 1.30 before taking further action. 'As he had not shown up by then we informed the police.' An hour later, however, news arrived that R. had been found on the Warrington road the previous evening, wandering and confused because of 'a change of billet'. He had been taken home by the Chester resident who had found him. Apart from this one boy the attendance at school was 'excellent'.⁴

³ Boys' Evacuation Log, pp.7 and 8.

⁴ Boys' Evacuation Log, pp.8 and 9.

The next morning, Wednesday, Mooney was 'dissatisfied' that he had still not made 'personal contact' with boy R. He, therefore, with one of his assistant teachers, Henin, went to the address of the Chester resident who had found boy R. When he arrived there he was shocked to find R. 'in the back shop, wearing a butcher's apron, and warned him to be in school for the afternoon shift. He was.' This was either a case of enterprising behaviour by the young man, R., or exploitation of child labour by the shopkeeper. Mooney offered no explanation in the logbook, possibly because having successfully dealt with this case he was almost immediately called to another incident, which tested further his fire fighting skills. On that Wednesday afternoon he found himself having to deal with a clash between the mores and culture of the Chester householders, who had offered accommodation to the St Peter's children, and the expectations of their Liverpool parents, some of whom had travelled over to Chester. The two ladies in charge of billeting confronted Mooney with letters of complaint from householders against the behaviour of some parents. Mooney did not specify the nature of these complaints but the next morning he toured the billets, listening to complaints in an attempt to defuse the situation. After the afternoon school session ended he had to leave for Liverpool to meet the mother of boy R. 'who had decamped on Monday night previous and gave her full details of his escapade with my opinion'. He did not specify what that opinion was but he was clearly greatly displeased. Mass at St Werburgh's on Sunday morning, after which Mooney and Henin 'marched' the children back to Hoole, marked the end of the first stage of what for Mooney would be a long 'campaign'.¹

For those of us reading these logbooks from the early days of World War Two one of the attractions is the 'unwitting testimony'² they provide. The brief accounts given by the Notre Dame Sisters who led the Infants' and Girls' schools set out to give us an overview of what they clearly saw as a brief interruption to the normal life and routine of the school. They deal with the exigencies of the war in a brisk, businesslike fashion and clearly were anxious to return to Liverpool as soon as possible. But while they were in Chester its educational opportunities should be exploited. This is left un-stated or at least under-stated in their logs. But their training in the Notre Dame tradition of pedagogy compelled them to look at what they and their pupils could learn from their unaccustomed surroundings. Mooney's logbook in contrast to the other two is meticulously detailed. Evacuation to him was part of the overall struggle against the enemy. As a young teacher he had volunteered to fight in World War One and in this later war he would lead his troops in another 'campaign'. His account is replete with military terminology, some of which, such as 'billets', was in general usage, but teachers were 'dispatched', and children

'marched' to 'church parade', and he took 'forty-eight hours leave'. Also, unlike the Notre Dame Sisters, he was prepared for a long 'campaign'.

The logbooks of St Peter's Seel St Schools are merely one example of a wonderful resource for the historian and the teacher. Individual logbooks give us the opportunity to understand the evacuation process, its challenges to teachers, pupils, parents and host communities at a local level, to sense its impact on specific localities and parishes. Sadly, many of these logbooks have been lost in recent years. Seventy years after the Second World War started it would be greatly to the advantage of historians, teachers and students if at least some of them were 're-discovered' and their treasures made available.

The Theological Papers of Canon John Francis McHugh

Fr Peter Phillips

(Shrewsbury Diocesan Archivist)

Recently the theological papers of Canon John Francis McHugh have been deposited in the Archives of the Diocese of Shrewsbury. John Francis McHugh was born in Stalybridge on 3 August 3 1927. He left for the junior seminary at Ushaw in September 1939. Having completed his schooling there in 1946, he was sent to the English College, Rome, where McHugh completed his training for the priesthood, and was ordained priest in St John Lateran by Archbishop (later Cardinal) Luigi Traglia on July 6th 1952. In Rome he was awarded the degree of Licentiate in Philosophy (De questione an S. Thomas Aquinas libertatem arbitrii humani cum natura omniperfecta conciliaverit, 1949), and Doctor of Divinity for a thesis on The Exaltaton of Christ in the Arian Controversy (1954) under the supervision of P. Galtier, S.J. (SHRDA/J McH/2). He continued his studies as élève titulaire at the École Biblique in Jerusalem (1955-1956). On his return to Rome he received the degree of Licentiate of Sacred Scripture.

After finishing his studies, McHugh spent a brief spell of eight months as curate in Shrewsbury Cathedral during 1957, before taking up a post on the staff at the seminary at Ushaw that autumn. Here he lectured in Scripture, and in other areas, from 1957 to 1976. These courses (typescripts deposited in Ushaw College Archives) offer a useful illustration of the move away from the theology of the manuals that occurred at the time. In 1976 he was appointed to a lectureship in the theology department in the University of Durham, becoming senior lecturer in 1978. From 1980 to 1982 he was dean of the Department of Theology.

John McHugh's hope was to contribute to the creation of an educated clergy and laity whose scholarship could respond to the needs of the times. His first two books, translations of Roland De Vaux's Ancient Israel in 1961 and Xavier Léon-Dufour's The Gospels and the Jesus of History in 1968 (SHRDA/J McH/4), were important attempts to make the fruits of European scholarship accessible to the English reader. His own book, The Mother of Jesus in the New Testament, published in 1975, combined his deep love for Scripture and his concern for ecumenical relations with his devotion to Our Blessed Lady: he wished to contribute to ecumenical relations by revealing how the recent developments in Catholic Marian theology could be reconciled to Scriptural understanding. This study provoked an important disagreement between McHugh and Raymond Brown about the relationship between history, exegesis and dogma (SHRDA/J McH/6-8). He was a long time member of the Ecumenical Society of the Blessed Virgin Mary, contributing much to its discussions. He also attended and contributed to the Marian Congress in Sydney, 1976.

Much of McHugh's work was done behind the scenes. In 1967 McHugh was invited by Archbishop Dwyer to act as a consultant to the newly created Episcopal Theology and Doctrine Commission (Dwyer, Butler, Fox), and he accompanied the Archbishop as peritus to a meeting in Rome called to discuss the relationship between National Theological Commissions and the International Theological Commission (1969) (SHRDA/J McH/9-12). After the publication of Humanae Vitae, he contributed a detailed analysis of the doctrinal authority of the encyclical in a series of three articles in The Clergy Review (Aug – Oct 1969) (SHRDA/J McH/13-14). In 1969 Denis Nineham invited him to join a regional study group for the Faith & Order Commission of the World Council of Churches to work on a report on 'The Authority of the Bible and Eternal Life' (1969-1970) (SHRDA/J McH/15). In 1972 he was proposed by Bishop Wheeler for membership of a Hebrew panel commissioned to produce a new translation of the psalms for liturgical use in the Church of England (SHRDA/J McH/24-29). It is a mark of the respect in which he was held in the Church at large that he was called to be a member of the Pontifical Biblical Commission from 1984 to 1990, and, on completing his term of office, received a warm letter of thanks from the then Cardinal Ratzinger. (SHRDA/J McH/34-35).

McHugh's involvement in liturgical translation led to a wide involvement with the liturgy. While at Ushaw he translated Vespers and Compline for use in the college, sending proposals on the new English breviary to Bishop Cunningham of Hexham and Newcastle, and corresponding with Bishop Wheeler of Leeds on this and other matters. He contributed sample translations of several collects to the International Commission on English in the Liturgy (ICEL), but was severely critical of their work. He submitted translations of Eucharistic Prayers II and III, as well translations of prayers for the first ten weeks of the year, as his entry for the Ronald Knox Prize of 1996. His open letter, On Englishing the Liturgy, addressed to Bishop Gray (1983) – his own ordinary and chairman of the English and Welsh Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy – provoked considerable interest at the time and much correspondence. This was published first in Liturgy (vol. 8 ns 1 & 2, pp. 17-39; 61-88) and then, privately, as a separate pamphlet; it includes McHugh's fine English version of the Exultet. (SHRDA/J McH/16-23)¹

¹ McHugh's papers on the liturgy complement the liturgical papers of Bishop Joseph Gray, Bishop of Shrewsbury and secretary of the Bishops' Conference of England and Wales' Liturgy Commission (1975-1983), already deposited in the Diocesan Archives.

McHugh was appointed Honorary Canon of the Diocese in 1981 and Diocesan Censor of Books in 1988. After retiring from Durham University in 1988, following a brief spell at Our Lady's, Edgeley, Stockport, he spent four and a half years as parish priest in Alderley Edge (1989-1993), before retiring to devote himself to writing, first, in 1993, to Langley Park in Durham, and then, to the Convent of Mercy, Alnwick, Northumberland. Here he settled down to continue a long planned and major commentary on St John's Gospel at the invitation of the editorial board of the International Critical Commentary. John McHugh died very suddenly in Alnwick on February 3rd 2006, aged 78. His commentary on the first four chapters of John's gospel was published by T & T Clark three year later (SHRDA/J McH/44-45).

Henry Foley: Jesuit Brother, Historian and Saint of God

James Hodkinson, SJ

(Most of the material for this article was obtained from the Jesuit Archives in London and Rome. Many thanks to Anna Edwards, the assistant Archivist British province, and Fr Robert Danieluk, SJ, at the Roman Archives. The section about Mother Magdalen Taylor was provided by Mr Paul Shaw, archivist of the Poor Servants of the Mother of God.) James Hodkinson, SJ.

Brother Henry Foley, SJ, is considered to be one of the great historians of the English Province of the Society of Jesus. He is most famed for his, Records of the English Province of the Society of Jesus: Historic Facts illustrative of the Labours and Sufferings of the Members in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries (published 1875-1883). The amount of research he did in a relatively short space of time is amazing. His father, the Rev. John Foley, was curate-in-charge at Astley, Worcestershire. Henry was born at Astley on 9 August 1811. The family was of moderate means and were distant cousins of Lord Foley; Br Foley's parents bore the same arms and had the same motto: Ut proxim. It was he, Lord Foley, who gave Henry's father the living of Hotton-cum-Witley in 1812. Henry was educated first at home by his father, then, at a private school at Woodchester. He was articled early in life to a firm of solicitors in Worcester prior to going to work in Dursley, Gloucestershire. During his time there he became a member of the 'Irvingites'. Founded around 1830 by Edward Irving, and referring to themselves as the 'Catholic Apostolic Church', they represented a very ritualistic sect who looked for a speedy second coming of Christ. So influenced was Henry by their teachings that he gave up his Articles and for a time went about as a preacher. This did not last long; the law firm for whom he had been working kindly took him back to finish his Articles. Soon after he went into partnership with a Mr Cameron; but only for a year, for he then set up business for himself. Though never very successful, he was known as a painstaking lawyer.

It was at Dursley that he came into contact with the Vizard family. Through his future brother-in-law, Mr John Vizard, Henry came under the influence of the Oxford Movement. Evidence of this is found in the fact that he did not return to the Irvingite church of St Clement's, he went instead to the more ritual services at the Cathedral – attracted no doubt by High Church notions. He also began to read some Catholic books – most likely the lives of some of the saints. It was about this time that he started to use the discipline as part of his daily mortification, a practice he was to continue until the end of his life.

It was from Mr Vizard's house that he left to get married to Anne Elizabeth Vizard, a native of Dursley, at St Pancras Church, London, on 10 June 1834.¹ The officiating minister was Henry's brother, the Rev. Edward Walwyn Foley. At the time he was a Fellow of Wadham College, Oxford; later he became vicar of All Saints, Derby, and then, in 1872, rector of Jevington, Sussex. Whether it was the influence of Mr Vizard or not, both husband and wife were received into the Catholic Church by Fr Beeston, SJ, on 3 January 1846. There is a legend that neither knew the other was going to be received until they arrived at the altar. Henry's wife was almost continuously an invalid; they had no children. Sadly his wife died in February 1851.

Between 1846 and 1851 – when he joined the Society of Jesus – Henry went to Hodder to make a retreat, probably more than once. During his first year as a member of the Society, he, along with some other novices, suffered scarlet fever. It was during this illness that the two novices who were looking after him learned a little of how he came to join the Society. The first was when he fell off his horse. While he was lying on the roadside Our Lady appeared to him and told him to become a Catholic. From that day forward he had a great devotion to Our Lady, even though he had shared in the usual Protestant aversion to this devotion. The second was when he was in retreat just prior to joining the Society. Our Lady again appeared to him, telling him to join as a Brother, not as a priest. When Fr Tracy Clarke, presuming Henry was entering as a Scholastic Novice, was about to write this down Br Foley said, 'Our Lady has settled that I am to be a Brother.'

He took his first vows on Easter Sunday, 27 March 1853. A year or so after he became Brother Socius to the Provincial. In 1854 he was sent to Rome to be Socius to the English Assistant, Fr Etherridge. He enjoyed Rome and was very sorry to leave there a year later; he was probably unaware of the great task which lay ahead of him. The General at that time, Fr. Peter Beckx, wanted Br Foley in Rome, but as far as can be made out the needs of the Province were deemed more urgent than those of Rome. Henry returned to England and carried on his work as Brother Socius to the Provincial, a position he was to hold for the next thirty years. His Records of the English Province, which he wrote over the next twenty years, are a treasure house of materials which have been widely used in the past, in the present, and no doubt will continue to be used in the future.² His literary style may not be of the best, but the historical details are enormous. A couple of insights into his work on the Records are to be found in letters to Frances Margaret Taylor, foundress of the Poor Servants of the Mother of God and first editor of the Month. She had been received into the church by Fr. Woolett, SJ, whom she had met in the Crimea. In a letter to Mother Taylor in 1875 Br Foley writes: 'If you ever have an opportunity of saying a word for my arduous and gigantic undertaking, it will be serviceable and in a good cause. It is a labour of love, but you little know what labour the MS. has cost me, with my other duties.'

His first book as a historian was concerned with Jesuits involved in conflict of one sort or another; this eventually became Volume 2 of the Records. Along with editing the Records and day-to-day administrative duties, Br Foley also carried out much legal work for the Province. When the Society sought to purchase Beaumont in September 1854, delicate negotiations were necessary owing to its proximity to Windsor. This was done via a third party; a solicitor by the name of Mr Tucker, who was considering his vocation to the Society, was chosen; Br Foley acting as his conveyance clerk.

His eyesight was never very good; most of the time he was writing the Records he had vision in only one eye. A cataract operation in 1881 helped him greatly, as even his good eye was beginning to fail him. The last volume of the Records was published in 1883; based on the Collectanea by Dr Oliver, which Br Foley corrected and enlarged, some see it as the most useful as it lists the short lives of all the deceased members of the Province. When finally the last volume of the Records was complete he undertook the task of compiling the Catalogues – a list of houses and the Jesuits in them, dating from the early years of the Province following the restoration of the Society in 1803.

Of his own personal holiness there seems little doubt that he led a strict life. His penances were, by to-day's standards very severe. He took the discipline at least twice a week, and wore a chain around his body. Once a week on Mondays he wore a hair shirt all day, and fasted on the eve of great feasts; it is said he slept on a board with a brick for his pillow. His spiritual Father asked him to write down the penances he observed, this has been preserved in the archives.¹ After finishing the Catalogues his mind seemed to fail as quickly as did his eye-sight. He needed constant attendance; some restraint was necessary as he thought a job was still to be done. He died at Manresa House, Roehampton, on 19 November 1891. His body was buried in the grounds there. At the end of the entry for Br Foley in the Register – a short CV of Province Jesuits written upon their death – it is written in brackets: 'a Saint of God'.

Catholic Archives Society Annual Conference 2010

Jenny Smith

(Archivist for the Union of the Sisters of Mercy)

High Leigh Conference Centre, Hoddesdon, provided the venue for the recent annual meeting of the Catholic Archives Society. This was to be my first conference, as a soon-to-be qualified archivist looking forward to taking up a position as archivist for a Catholic religious Order in June 2010. The programme was set out with seven sessions from guest speakers, a trip to either the Essex or Hertfordshire Record Offices for those who wished to learn more about the functioning of a local archives service, time for the Annual General Meeting and an open forum for the airing of issues of general interest. In between all this of course there were many opportunities for more informal discussion and, especially valuable for someone just beginning their professional career in this arena, a chance to make invaluable future contacts – it is a small world after all!

The guest speakers discussed an interesting and useful range of topics. Dr Kate Thompson of Downing College, Cambridge, addressed the question, 'What is an Archivist?' by highlighting legislative and professional duties of access and preservation in the context of shrinking budgets. We also heard some amusing anecdotes and stereotypes of archivists that are no doubt familiar to us all – 'has a cat' or 'bad dress sense' being typical examples! The first day ended with a presentation by Dr James Kelly from Queen Mary, University of London, who, from an academic's perspective, discussed the use of archives in the project, 'Who were the Nuns'? The difficulties created by the scattered nature of convents and issues of access were acknowledged; yet generally Dr Kelly saw a keenness to encourage interest in the convent sources, which should result from the project. The second day brought a talk by Fr David Lannon on the Salford Diocesan Archive's Pamphlet Collection, highlighting the importance of pamphlets in reflecting the place of Catholic communities in their historical context. This was followed by a discussion of appraisal from Susan Flood (Hertfordshire Record Office), Tamara Thornhill (Archdiocese of Westminster/Bishops' Conference) and Annaig Boyer (Medical Mission Sisters). As is often the situation of archivists nationwide, issues of space (or lack of it!) were apparent as a major concern amongst those responsible for Catholic archives. We were reminded of the importance of appraisal policies for providing a consistent framework of collection and to help fill gaps. The need to build flexibility into an appraisal scheme was also raised, drawing upon the archivist as decision maker.

At the Open Forum on the third day, a paper from the Catholic Family History Society on their revived 'Index to Nuns' project was read and briefly discussed, many of the members present had contributed data to the original project. There was also a progress report on the CAS survey of archives of lay societies. The response rate to this had been very good and, after discussions on their wider survey with the Religious Archives Group and the National Archives, it had been agreed to do some further work together. Staff involved with the National Archives Religious Archives survey highlighted its importance for assessing the state and needs of Catholic archives. It was clear that many attendees were either in the process of or had completed this survey, we await the results.

The final session of the conference was the paper read by Rt. Rev. Mgr. Gordon Read, a consultant to the Murphy Commission, entitled 'Access to archives in civil and canon law.' This promised much for resolving at least some of the personal concerns a new professional in the Catholic archives domain might have about possible conflict in this area. Although some tension was acknowledged – while the state allows the majority of records to become public after a set period of time, the Church often keeps certain classes of documents private for a longer term – I did come away feeling reassured. Church Law is seen to be urging a collaborative approach and an attitude of openness as far as possible. Catholic archivists are encouraged to consider F[reedom]O[f]I[n]formation as useful for setting out reasonable parameters.

The conference motivated me about my new role within the unique and dynamic sector of Catholic archives. The variety of topics discussed and the people I met more informally during the conference left me in no doubt that there is a wealth of good and progressive work being done by a myriad of people within the sector. I very much look forward to keeping up with issues and events through the Society's newsletters and bulletins, and to next year's Conference where I hope to contribute from my own experience of Catholic archives.

BOOK REVIEWS

Jerome Bertram, Vita Communis: The Common Life of the Secular Clergy (Leominster, Gracewing, 2009, ix + 316 pp., £15.99)

The importance of Father Bertram's book lies in its being a major work by an English scholar-priest that relies heavily on archival material which, while mostly published, still remains scarce. After an opening chapter devoted mainly to definitions, Bertram goes on to provide a well-organized account of the scanty, sometimes questionable, evidence for clerical common life before the Council of Nicaea. He well explains primitive Christian communism's restricted nature and the collegium concept under Urban I in the 220s. While community life was not the only model for secular priests, the period from the fourth to the seventh centuries provides considerably more evidence, and Bertram admirably synthesizes earlier research with reference to local conciliar acts. This period also opens the mediaeval flowering of clerical colleges, later codified principally in the Rule of St Chrodegang (c. 753), the Institutio Canonica of the 816 Council of Aachen and the Longer Rule of c. 900. While the tenth century saw disturbance (usually for political reasons) among secular clerical communities, it also saw reform and extension, particularly in England. Eleventh- and twelfth-century practice introduced vowed canons following St Augustine's Rule, bound to full personal poverty and termed Canons Regular, and restructured many secular cathedral chapters. The rate of new collegiate foundations increased further after the reforming Fourth Lateran Council (1215) and again – largely for political and educational reasons – after 1350. During the late antique and Middle Ages, there was repeated legislation that secular canons observe church discipline on sexual continence and share a common dormitory, though later mediaeval practice widely abolished the latter. Concerning the Catholic Reformation (c. 1400 – c. 1650), Bertram duly notes the importance of the Brethren of the Common Life and the Oratory of Divine Love. While chapter 11 can over-generalize, Bertram's later, expert, treatment of Oratorian movements, the French Revolution's dreadful effects on clerical communities, and nineteenth-century reconstruction repays close study. Bertram ends by discussing twentieth- and twenty-first-century models of collegiate bodies, either needing much organization, or more practicable, or else loose (to sell community life on understandably unwilling clergy?). While it is impossible for one scholar to agree with every single comment of another, Father Bertram's thoroughly-researched book is historiographically important. A bibliography and five indices further enhance its usefulness as a tool for archival research.

Rosemary Hill, God's Architect: Pugin and the Building of Romantic Britain (London, Penguin, 2008, xiii + 598pp., £14.99)

The appearance in paperback of this lengthy and attractively produced biographical study, published to considerable acclaim and widely reviewed in the mainstream press, may be said to mark the culmination of a revolution in the reputation of Augustus Pugin: a figure who is both one of the most important and influential of English designers, architects and polemicists, and also one of the most notable English Catholic converts of the nineteenth century. The most perfect parallel is perhaps with the composer Sir Edward Elgar, whose artistic productions, beyond the enthusiasms of a dedicated coterie, had also fallen into a kind of musty twilight of critical disdain in the thirty years or so following the Second World War. The revolution in Pugin's reputation has gone hand in hand with a revival of interest in the products of that extraordinary and peculiarly English aesthetic movement, the 'Gothic Revival' of the nineteenth century. In his pioneering essay on this movement, originally published in 1928, Kenneth Clarke explained that 'the real reason why the Gothic Revival has been neglected is that it produced so little on which our eyes can rest without pain'. However, just as we can now appreciate the rich late Romantic harmonies of Elgar without deriding him as a reactionary, we now seem able to look at Pugin's voluminous literary, artistic and built legacy without adverse comparisons with the worth the work of other eras. One of the great values of this study is that it places Pugin firmly in the context of the Romantic Movement of the early nineteenth century, rather than looking back on his achievements through late Victorian spectacles, an approach which has inevitably tended to see him merely as an antecedent of later developments of which, as Hill demonstrates very skillfully, Pugin was himself a pioneer. His work has a protean quality which meant that he was constantly evolving stylistically throughout his tragically brief career, though his pungent literary works and apologies had never quite the same flexibility and sophistication as those by men such as John Ruskin and G. E. Street, which left him sometimes appearing to defend entrenched positions which he had already superseded. It needs to be said that, particularly since the major exhibition at the Victoria and Albert Museum in 1994, there has been a tremendous labour of describing, identifying and re-evaluating Pugin's built works and his literary and artistic achievements. Hill's biography very much builds upon this legacy and is indebted to it, and much of what she says is prefigured in work by historians and critics such as Andrew Saint, Alexandra Wedgwood, and the late Clive Wainwright. Hence, the story of the enormous body of work which Pugin managed to produce in his short life - which included churches and cathedrals across the length and breadth of Britain and Ireland, and the designs for virtually every detail of the new Houses of Parliament at Westminster - has already been documented in a number of specialist studies. Hill's great achievement is that she manages to create a stirring narrative which is rich in detail, and based very firmly on Pugin's diaries and correspondence, but which also manages to weave into a fluent, chronological account an assessment both of the impact of Pugin's theoretical works, and also judicious assessments of the major historical questions and controversies relating to his career. Comparison with the earlier and very assured monograph on Pugin by Phoebe Stanton (1971) is instructive. Stanton's aesthetic judgements on Pugin's work still stand up very well, and in certain areas, such as her descriptions of Pugin's Irish works, her account provides a fuller and more satisfactory account. However, the wealth of detail of Pugin's personal and family life is entirely new, as is the description in particular of the religious and social milieu in which Pugin operated; the parallels and troubled relationship with that other leading convert and aesthete, J H Newman, are particularly well handled and documented. Whilst there is no separate list of archives consulted, the appendix, with a very full list of Pugin's executed and unexecuted schemes, the book clearly documents the wealth of archives and secondary sources consulted. There are over 60 photographic plates, which are well described, and grouped throughout the text, but they are rather stereotyped and over-familiar to those who have read widely on the subject, and in this Stanton's monograph is undoubtedly superior, even given the absence of colour in her book. Hill also deals with Pugin's sons and successors in a rather cursory and dismissive manner in her epilogue, but a certain exhaustion by that stage can certainly be forgiven.

Maura Duggan, OP, In Search of Truth: Journeys of nineteenth century Irish Dominican Women (Dublin, Linden Publishing Services, 2010, 526pp., £30)

The author of this long, detailed and very readable book is Sister Maura Duggan, a Cabra Dominican sister with a life long interest in history. In the foreword, Sister Helen Harmey OP, Congregational Prioress, rightly refers to Sister Maura's skill in story telling and eye for detail. In the informative introduction that follows, Sister Maura outlines the early history of Dominican women, beginning in Prouille in the 13th century even before the Dominican order was founded and then summarises their beginnings in Ireland, their exile, their return to Galway and their move to Dublin and late 18th century decline. The scene is therefore set for the subsequent chapters that cover their growth and development in Ireland and overseas from a small group in 1800 to large numbers at the end of the century (part I), the involved question of their status (part II) and relations between the various communities (Part III). Some chapters are extended by appendices, which cover building and domestic accounts, constitutions, biographies of Dominican and other priests and a list of prioresses. The journeys of the title are therefore not only the travels, adventures and successes arising from making foundations outside Ireland but also the practical and emotional journeys of the individuals involved. They are shown to be intelligent, committed and determined women, with charm, strength and qualities of leadership. The book is noteworthy for its wise approach to archives. Sister Maura refers to visits to other foundations in Ireland and elsewhere and her lists of references show that she used their archives extensively. However, her practical approach is evident from her admission, early in the introduction, that her original plan for the work was not possible because of the limitations of the surviving source material. Instead, she has used what is available to provide details of the lives of Irish Dominican women, to set them in context and to examine their ministry. The sources used include annals, profession books, accounts and other financial records, boarders' account books and school brochures as well as printed books, theses and oral reminiscences. The result is a factual account of Dominican life, growth, success, problems and individuals, with sufficient background to guide anyone unfamiliar with Irish religious history. The descriptions of extended families, of relations who were bishops or priests or members of Dominican or other religious orders and their influence on community life and management also help set the context. The range of work carried out was formidable and much of the book describes how the sisters founded and sustained their educational mission in Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and New Orleans as well as in Ireland. They taught the middle classes and the poor; they had night schools, industrial schools and schools for the deaf and they carried out religious instruction for adults, helped young priests and interacted with local groups. Towards the end, the author explains that 'the purpose of this book was to tell the story of nineteenth century Irish Dominican women, their recovery from near extinction, the development of their ministry, their heroic foundations abroad and to convey something of the price paid for their growth and expansion'. Maura Duggan has meticulously covered what she describes as 'a very human story of success and failure' to reveal a fascinating history.

Stephen Ball (ed.), Dublin Castle and the First Home Rule Crisis: The Political Journal of Sir George Fottrell, 1884-188

(Camden Fifth Series Vol. 33; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press for Royal Historical Society, 2008, xii + 342 pp., no price given)

The diary which Ball has edited, now National Library of Ireland MS 33,670, is that of the period as Clerk of the Crown for Dublin of Sir George Fottrell (1849-1925), Catholic Irish nationalist, solicitor, tenant farmers' champion, civil servant and educational reformer. Fottrell was an intermediary during public hostility between Dublin Castle and Parnell in the socio-politically unstable Ireland of the mid 1880s – times which 'demonstrate that, by 1885, important figures in Irish government believed that the time had come for the Irish people to be given ... "the right to regulate their own internal affairs, the right to preserve their revenues for their own advantage, and to make their own laws" ' (p. 74). This study contains three main sections: an extensive, well-referenced editor's introduction, Fottrell's 1885-1887 (not 1884-1887 as in Ball's title) political diary and 47 archive documents, usually by other writers. The documents and letters in the third section refer to events mentioned in Fottrell's diary or illustrate the context within which he worked; Ball has usefully cross-referenced all these with the diary and vice versa. Indeed, the care with which Ball has referenced Fottrell's diary and the remaining documents, particularly as regards the careers of the people Fottrell mentions, is noteworthy. The many archive sources consulted by Ball include: British Library (Althorp, Carnarvon, Gladstone and Edward Hamilton papers); National Archives: Public Record Office (Cabinet and Carnarvon papers, Records of the Metropolitan Police Office); Gloucestershire Records Office (St Aldwyn papers); Bodleian Library (William Harcourt Papers); Birmingham University Library (Joseph Chamberlain Papers); Churchill Archives Centre (Randolph Churchill Letters), Public Record Office of Northern Ireland; and National Archives of Ireland (Chief Secretary's Office Registered Papers, Dublin Metropolitan Police Reports, Irish Land League and Irish National League papers, Irish National Land League Proceedings). Misprints are virtually absent, though 'Eldon Hall' for 'Eaton Hall', the Duke of Westminster's Cheshire house, (p. 41) is unfortunate. A series of brief biographies and a thorough index complete this worthwhile study of an important stage of Catholic-influenced politics in Great Britain and Ireland.

Martin John Broadley, Bishop Herbert Vaughan and the Jesuits: Education and Authority (Woodbridge/Rochester NY, Boydell Press/Catholic Record Society, 2010, xxxvii+248pp., £45).

As the former Editor of Catholic Archives it gives me much pleasure to review a publication edited by my successor, Father John Martin Broadley, in this the first number of the journal for which he is responsible. The dispute between Herbert Vaughan, second Bishop of Salford (1872-1892), and the Society of Jesus in the matter of secondary education was a significant, and enduring, controversy within late nineteenth-century English Catholicism. The present work charts the affair in great detail, utilizing five major collections in the process: viz. the Archives of the Archbishop of Westminster; the Archives of the British Province of the Society of Jesus; the Archives of the Sacred Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith (Propaganda Fide, Rome); the Archives of the Society of Jesus, Rome; and the Salford Diocesan Archives – the author being a member of the latter repository's team. The bulk of the publication comprises a chronological presentation, superbly edited with footnotes, of correspondence to and from Vaughan on the matter of Jesuit education, followed by the bishop's diary written on his visit to Rome in the spring of 1875. The book also has a scholarly introduction, not the least useful part of which is a summary of the archival sources employed. Likewise, the Appendices and Bibliography (of both archival and printed sources) serve to make this publication not only a source-book for the history of Jesuit education in Victorian England and for Vaughan studies, but also a most useful tool for considering the wider question of the struggle for power and influence, especially in educational matters, that marked so much of the relationship between diocesan bishops and religious congregations in the post-Restoration era. The Catholic Record Society, in conjunction with the Boydell Press, must be congratulated on the appearance of what constitutes volume 82 of its Records Series.

Robert Whiting, The Reformation of the English Parish Church (Cambridge, CUP, 2010, XX+298pp., 60 b+w plates, xii colour plates, £55)

Archives consulted: British Library, Cornwall Record Office, Devon and Cornwall Record Society Library, Devon Record Office, Exeter Dean and Chapter Library, Public Record Office, Trinity College, Cambridge, Library.

This study begins by an imaginative, exploratory visit to the very sensory world – taking in the sight, sound and smell – of a typical English parish church of 1530, which formed the indispensable hub of communal life. This is then compared by a further imaginary visit in 1630 to the same church – the reader has entered a world dramatically changed by the events of the intervening years. Was the reformation generally welcomed and assisted, or often resented and obstructed? Was it a rapid or an extended process? What motives were behind these differing responses? These are fundamental questions in the debate about the English Reformation, a debate advanced by numerous local studies focussing on various counties (Kent, Suffolk, Lancashire, Lincoln, Yorkshire Devon and Cornwall). Studies have also been made of towns and villages, including London, York and Morebath. Whiting in his new book seeks to answer the above questions by looking at the material objects that may still be seen in England's parish churches: rood screens, altars, fonts, communion tables, bells, pulpits, pews, church plate etc. Written documents also form the basis of his research: letters and diaries, tracts and chronicles, documents produced by central, regional or local government, visitation returns. As Whiting puts it in the preface, 'Sources both material and documentary can thus allow us to imaginatively recreate the interior appearance of the parish church on the eve of its reform, and to envisage the additions, subtractions and modifications that it experienced in the ensuing era of religious revolution' (p.xi). In the first part of the book, 'Ritual Requirements', Whiting investigates how the various screens (parcloses and roods) define sacred space within the parish church. To moderate Protestants the rood screen was permissible; for the more radical both parcloses and roods were symbols of sacerdotalism. By 1530 a substantial number of roods were still relatively new. Date evidence suggests that production fell soon after the accession of Edward VI, and revised only moderately under Mary Tudor. The official campaign against the Mass and altars came in the reign of Edward VI. Church warden accounts record a general suppression of the Mass and a wider spread deposition of altars. During the time of Mary Tudor, in the churches where records are still extant, the majority replaced their altars. During Elizabeth I's reign most parishes seemed to have acquiesced in the renewed official campaign against altars, now replaced by protestant tables – thus symbolising a communion service and not a sacrifice. Baptismal fonts were, pre-reformation, often decorated with sacramental details and symbols, images of saints and requests for prayers for the donors. These suffered mutilation at the reform. Likewise, the imagery on church plate was removed in the reformation period; the Catholic chalice becoming transformed into the Protestant communion cup. Much plate was confiscated and sold. Church cloth was often associated with the Mass, and in the form of vestments and altar cloths highlighted the role of the sacrificing priesthood. The reformation decades saw a distinct fall in expenditure on cloth. The second part of the book is dedicated to 'Additional Components' namely: paintings, glass, images, organs, bells, seats, benches, pulpits and memorials. There was a shift in the form and content of depictions, a moving away from saints and sacramental symbolism to verses from Scripture and the royal coat of arms in place of the doom above the entrance to the chancel. During the reign of Mary there was only a partial renewal of such imagery. The pulpit became obligatory during Edward's reign – although a feature before 1530 in many parish churches – where Protestant homilies replaced the reading of the bede role. The Edwardian attack on religious images spelled the virtual cessation of construction of rood lofts; again, only a handful were reconstructed in the reign of Edward's successor, Mary Tudor. The post-1530 era saw a radical transformation in most parish churches. Catholic furnishings were removed or defaced or destroyed.

This saw only a partial halting in the time of Mary. Regional differences are apparent in the rapidity of the deposing. The speed of change was never uniform, often fastest in the south and east, slower in the north and west. The fact of a supportive attitude to traditional furnishings was not always a consequence of religious convictions. As Whiting points out, before about 1536, and again in 1553-8, conformity was in part compelled by fear of punishment and also compelled by a sense of duty to the crown. Evidence does suggest that antipathy to the traditional artefacts was increasingly a consequence of Protestant beliefs. Yet, until at least the middle of Elizabeth's reign, such beliefs were only of a minority. Protestant convictions can therefore only partly explain why most parishes accepted or even supported the reformation of their churches. Hence he concludes that duty, conformity, obedience were just as powerful as spiritual convictions or material interests. One criticism of this book I would make would be to highlight certain theological and liturgical inaccuracies regarding the Catholic doctrine of the Eucharist. Referring to belief in transubstantiation (p54) Whiting states how: 'God himself was thought to be physically [my italics] present in the consecrated bread.' This needs to be expressed with more theological subtlety if it is to truly reflect the Catholic doctrine of the day. Also, regarding the use of the piscina (p106): 'Wine left in the chalice after mass was believed to be Christ's blood: the drain conveyed it safely in to the churchyard's consecrated ground.' The contents of the chalice, should there be any after the priest's communion, are, and always have been, consumed by him and never disposed of in the way suggested by Whiting. The piscina or sacrarium was for the disposal of the water used at the lavabo i.e. the washing of the celebrant's hands at the offertory of the Mass. A minor detail is that the references to the illustrations are not always very clear to follow and thus the relevance of them is lost at times. This book is meticulously researched and carries an excellent bibliography.

(University of Notre Dame, Indiana, 2009, xxiii+487, £30)

'Political Catholicism' was a feature of inter-war England. This consisted of an articulate group of writers, artists, publishers, historians and journalists. They were neither of recusant nor Irish stock, though many were converts. The importance of this intellectual community has, in general, been lost. Lothian's book – the first full study of the English Catholic intellectuals in the inter-war years – argues that the group, united by an ideology, formed a genuine community. The primogenitor of the fundamental political and economic creed which bound together this group was Hilaire Belloc who had been deeply influenced by the thought and public spiritedness of Cardinal Henry Edward Manning. During the years 1912 to 1920 (when he published Europe and the Faith) Belloc laid the community's foundations, the blueprint being The Servile State (1912). The thesis of this work was that medieval England had been a just society and so provided a model for a radical overhaul of contemporary England. Belloc challenged the progressive Nineteenth Century Whig interpretation of history. For him the Reformation represented the severing of the trunk from its roots. History was for Belloc a branch of apologetics. Lothian defines the central tenets of Bellocianism as: emphasis on social justice, antipathy to parliamentary democracy accompanied by an enthusiasm for authoritative regimes, a vision of history that saw England as having Catholic roots, Distributism. The first Bellocians, which the author refers to as 'The Greater Servants', were Fr Vincent McNabb, OP, Eric Gill, G. K. Chesterton; each seized on Belloc's political economy. McNabb added to Belloc's influence Leo XIII's Rerum Novarum (an encyclical fundamental to all of the English Catholic intellectual community). Eric Gill for his part provided a sense of Beauty to Belloc's Truth and McNabb's Goodness. The Ditchling community, very much run by Gill, became the embodiment of the Distributist ideal. The second generation Bellocians – 'The Lesser Servants' – Douglas Jerrold, Douglas Woodruff, Christopher Hollis, Evelyn Waugh and Arnold Lunn ensured that Belloc's ideas became the operating political philosophy of the English Catholic intellectual community. By means of journalism they were instrumental in bringing Belloc's ideas into the mainstream of English Catholic thinking. A change began to appear with the historian Christopher Dawson, who began to move steadily away from Bellocian orthodoxy. A further shift became apparent thanks to the lessons which Frank Sheed and Maisie Ward had learned from their experience in the Catholic Evidence Guild. Rather than concentrate on Protestantism, as Belloc had done, they saw the necessity of confronting the secular world and addressing those ignorant of Christianity. In doing so Sheed and Ward helped to foster a new focus in theology. Their publishing house made available in English the work of the French philosopher Jacques Maritain, and the German theologian Karl Adam who called for the truths of Catholicism to be rearticulated for the benefit of the contemporary world. This represented a shift in focus away from, and a weaning of, Belloc's insistence on politics and economics. Dawson for his part 'stood for a distinct turning away not only from Bellocian solutions to contemporary ills, but in large part from the Bellocian diagnosis of these ills' (p.266). With Dawson the English Catholic intellectual community became less provincially tied to Belloc's 'Europe is the Faith and the Faith is Europe.' Unlike Belloc, history for Dawson was not a weapon with which to wage war upon the modern age. By the 1930s the bonds of the Catholic intellectual community were beginning to unravel. The younger generation were beginning to question the central tenets of Bellocianism. Tom Burns, Frank Sheed and Maisie Ward looked to Christopher Dawson for intellectual sustenance. The community thus developed two hubs:

Dawson and Belloc. Further instability stemmed from reaction to the Spanish Civil War. Jerrold, Lunn and Belloc supported Franco; it was not a forgone conclusion that Dawson and his followers would do so. The Tablet supported Franco, but the Catholic Herald, edited by Michael de la Bedoyère, having Dawsonite ties, was more circumspect. Despite these differences both Dawsonites and Bellocians agreed on the substantial issues and sided with the Nationalist cause. The community's cohesiveness was finally lost with the advent of the Second World War. The anti-democratic view of the English Catholic intellectual community proved problematic – it ran the danger of seeming unpatriotic. What were they to think of hostility toward Catholic countries – Italy, Vichy France? Jerrold and Hollis favoured Britain becoming more associated with the Latin Catholic bloc countries i.e. a triumvirate of France, Italy and Spain in opposition to the liberal-secularist-protestant-popular front tendencies of Britain, America and Russia. In March 1940 the Catholic Herald proposed a peace plan that effectively meant capitulation to Germany. Dawson, now editor of the Dublin Review, believed that the root of liberal democracy was essentially Christian in its foundations. He excluded contributors who were hostile to parliamentary democracy, favoured accommodation with Nazism or who still held Bellocian ideals of Italian Fascism. This support of liberalism was a sea change within the thinking of the English Catholic intellectual community. How were Catholics to respond to the war and be, and seen to be, patriotic? The answer came with the movement known as the 'Sword of the Spirit'. The idea was first conceived by Barbara Ward. She had come into the community in the early 1940s, believing that Britain's involvement in the war was in the cause of a restoration of the spiritual and intellectual tradition of the West. The Sword of the Spirit won the full support of Cardinal Hinsley and the intellectual support of Dawson. Woodruff, Hollis and Lunn contributed to Hinsley's efforts and so compromised the central planks of Bellocian orthodoxy. With the condemnation of parliamentary democracy dissipated and Britain's victory over an enemy that included Italian Fascism – which Belloc had so praised – parliamentary democracy had been vindicated and Bellocianism eclipsed. Lacking a unified theory of Catholic politics, economics and history the community, which had ceased to replenish itself by the later 1930s, fragmented, there was no replacement ideology. This is an important and very readable account of the largely lay inhabited English Catholic intellectual community. It draws on carefully researched archival sources held at the Westminster Archdiocesan Archives, Boston College, the British Library, Georgetown University, University of Notre Dame and University of St Thomas, Minnesota. Lothian's study is of a wide compass and a vital contribution to the understanding of twentieth century English Catholicism.

Penelope Harris, The Architectural Achievement of Joseph Aloysius Hanson (1803 – 1882)

'Joseph Aloysius Hanson (1803-82) was one of the most important and innovative architects of nineteenth century Britain, whose ecclesiastical designs defined and distinguished the Roman Catholic revival' (p.iii). His surname is still in common usage, spelt in lower case – a distinction granted to few people – it describes the cab he invented. He is also remembered as the founder of the architectural magazine the Builder and as the 'failed' architect of Birmingham town hall. Given all this, Hansom has not received the attention of a full biography. Penelope Harris has begun to readdress this lack. Of this present book she says that it represents '...only the tip of the "Hansom" iceberg. It has glimpsed briefly at a few of their pinnacles, but its function has been more the laying of a foundation stone for future work' (p.176). The image we are given is that of a restless man faced by 'continual crossroads and twisting paths' (p.2). He was driven by a passion for architecture, a thirst for learning and an untiring willingness to try new ideas and techniques. Joseph Aloysius Hansom was born in York in 1803. His early career was shaped by the artisan background of his family and their strong Catholic faith; among their descendents was the Yorkshire recusant Christopher Stonehouse. He left school, with very little formal education, at the age of 13. A compulsive workaholic, the lack of business acumen meant financial hardship was to be a constant feature of his entire life. He acquired a sound knowledge of architecture, especially Classical Roman and Gothic styles, at the hands of the Halifax firm of John Oates. Shortly after finishing his training he entered a competition for the design of Birmingham town hall. Unfortunately this venture turned sour, due partly to Hansom's naivety and his strong-headed nature. He stood as financial guarantor for the project, while also agreeing to the responsibility for both the design of the building and for the builders involved. As a result he found himself in a very difficult financial position. A failure to protect his ideas left him vulnerable to exploitation (as witnessed by his making very little money from the invention of the hansom cab owing to a lack of protection of the patents). Evidence of his wide concerns and interests, as well as being a caring employer, is found in his encouraging his employees to join trade unions. In certain circumstances Hansom deprecated the use of machines, believing that it would cause redundancies. For a time he was actively involved with Robert Owen – an alliance which did not always meet the approval of local officials. His attempts at being a social reformer sometimes brought him into conflict with his role as an architect. In the 1830s his contemporaries gave him the sobriquet 'the socialist architect'. The changing circumstances of the Catholic Church at the time: émigrés from the French Revolution, Irish immigration and the general relaxation of legislation meant more churches were needed to provide spiritual and pastoral care for the increasing number of Catholics in England. Hansom is above all best remembered for his ecclesiastical work. It was in this area that he made such an important contribution to the life of the Catholic Church in England. Throughout his whole life Hansom's work was interjected with work by the Pugin family. He was for a brief period in partnership with Edward Welby Pugin, a partnership that was soon dissolved. His most prolific years, 1845-1858, saw the building of twenty-two churches and six school or convents. His move to Lancashire was to see a life-long connection with the Jesuits. In Preston he built St Walburge's; in part inspired by Westminster Hall, it incorporates a medieval technique never before used on such a scale whereby by employing pairs of horizontal beams great arches could be raised and so used to span the central space. The book contains illustrations of some of his most important and stunning ecclesiastical work: St Walburge's, Preston, Mount St Mary's, Spinkhill, St Beuno's College, St Asaph, the Holy Name, Manchester. This is an expensive book; the cost puts at a disadvantage what is an important contribution to the history of the Church in England. Penelope Harris has promised us more on this Catholic, philanthropic, devoted family man of an architect, we can look forward to it with eagerness.
